Consumer protection laws exist to prevent companies from taking advantage of consumers by scamming, misleading or providing poor service among other practices. Because of consumer protection laws, consumers can file suit against the companies that wrong them. These cases are usually brought as class action lawsuits because there are often many plaintiffs wronged when consumer rights are violated.

Types of Consumer Protection Class Actions

Consumer rights are violated in a variety of different industries. Common defendants in these types of cases include:

- *Creditors
- *Debt collectors
- *Landlords
- *Banks
- *Retailers (such as automobile dealers)
- *Lenders
- *Advertisers
- *Credit bureaus
- *Consumer Protection Laws and Statutes

There are numerous federal and state laws designed to protect the rights of consumers. A few of the more commonly violated federal laws include:

- *Truth in Lending Act
- *Fair Credit Reporting Act
- *Fair Housing Act
- *Fair Debt Collection Practices Act
