On June 11, 2010, the Michigan Supreme Court denied seven applications for leave and two motions for reconsideration. The Court ordered oral argument on whether the court should grant leave to appeal in People v. Brandt, No. 140744, requesting the parties to brief “whether points for abuse of authority status against a vulnerable victim may be assessed for Offense Variable 10, MCL 777.40(3)(c) and (d), where the defendant was a financial officer for a credit union and embezzled funds from that financial institution.” The Court also ordered oral argument on whether to grant leave in Campbell v. Department of Human Services, No. 140319. Lastly, in People v. Gatiss, No. 139628, the Court vacated the trial court order in lieu of granting leave, directing the trial court to reconsider the defendant’s motion for relief from judgment. The Court noted that on remand the trial court must specify the reasons for its decision and identify which portions of the defendant’s pleadings were stricken as immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous.
