IRS Raids Rapper's Home

The IRS field agents in Tennessee raided rapper Young Buck's home in an attempt to recover $300,000 in taxes. The entertainer, whose real name is David Darnell Brown, had earlier filed court motions to put his assets out of reach of the IRS but the IRS agents had acted nonetheless. They confiscated Brown's recording equipment, his platinum wall plaques, jewelry, furniture and even his children's Playstation.

In a statement, Brown said, "The worst part of this isn't the material stuff — that will all be replaced. It's what it does to the people around me. They took my kids' PlayStation, my assistants' computers, and my baby's mothers' jewelry. They took my home studio so I can't even record."

After complaining about how the IRS had taken his 'baby's mother's jewelry', Brown started to pass the buck (no pun intended) on to his support team. According to him, he entrusted his finances to his lawyers, accountants and managers and did not concern himself with these matters, which resulted in his tax delinquency. The rapper has since replaced his support team and is 'paying full attention now' according to his statement.

"Nothing like this will ever happen again," vowed Brown in his statement. "This is a huge wake-up call for all entertainers to stay on top of your own trusted employees and team members, and replace anyone that was put in place by your record label if the situation you have goes sour. This IRS situation came about because I trusted accountants, lawyers and managers to handle my business for me while I focused on making music". According to the rapper, he was fully able to repay his tax debts but apparently refused to do so.

Brown is a former member of the hip hop group based in New York City, G-Unit and was contracted with G-Unit Records before switching to Cashville Records. Young Buck's album sales have hit platinum figures in sales.

In another unrelated action involving celebrities, the IRS filed a Notice of Federal Tax Lien earlier this month against actor and comedian Chris Tucker of 'Rush Hour' fame to recover $11 million in unpaid taxes.
