Qui Tam, Quo Vadis II

By: John Jackson and Sara Hollan

Judge Ward in the Eastern District of Texas recently determined that the intent to deceive element of a false marking claim need not be pleaded with particularity under Rule 9(b). This ruling is notable because, as explained in Qui Tam, Quo Vadis?, many commentators predicted that language in the Federal Circuit's ruling in Stauffer vs. Brooks Brothers, Inc., 619 F.3d 1321 (Fed. Cir. 2010), would lead lower courts to conclude that Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading standard applies to the intent to deceive element in a false marking claim.

Toy or Tool? - My Top 6 iPad Attorney Apps

By: Carl Butzer

With the season of gift-giving nigh upon us, I suspect that a fair share of lawyers will begin the New Year trying to figure out how to fit an iPad into their legal practice. Having owned an iPad for the past month, I'd have to say -- it takes a bit of patience. Below is a starter list of basic apps that can help turn your fun new toy into a useful legal tool as well.
