

What if States Were Redrawn to Equalize Population?

Written On January 26, 2010 By Bob Kraft

This very interesting map has nothing directly to do with personal injury or Social Security disability except as to how the politics of those practice areas would be affected. I just thought it was a fascinating concept. Read about it on the Yglesias blog. The gist is that states could be redrawn occasionally to reflect population shifts. Each of these "states" has approximately the same population, and existing state lines are retained where possible. Each "state" would have two Senators, and that would certainly change Senatorial politics. The original idea, and a fuller description, is from FakeIsTheNewReal.
