1. AUTOMATIC STAY

1.1 Covered Activities

- 1.1.a Court declines to enjoin third party claims against the debtor's jointly liable parent corporation. The debtor manufactured earplugs for many years. A major multinational corporation acquired it. Two years later, it transferred its earplug manufacturing operation to its parent. Although the parent continued to manufacture and sell the earplugs, 80% of the sales occurred before the transfer. The earplugs were ineffective, resulting in hundreds of thousands of product liability actions against the debtor and the parent in both state and federal court, with the federal actions consolidated under an MDL procedure. The debtor and the parent entered into a funding agreement, which provided that the parent would fund up to $1 billion to a plaintiffs' recovery trust and up to $240 million for the debtor's chapter 11 fees and expenses, and the debtor would indemnify the parent for any claims against the parent but could draw funding from the parent to pay any indemnification claims, with no repayment obligation (in effect, a circular transaction). In addition, the debtor and parent shared insurance policies that would cover a substantial amount of claims. Upon filing its petition, the debtor sought to apply the automatic stay to, or to affirmatively enjoin, the prosecution of the product liability actions against the parent. Section 362(a)(1) enjoins only litigation against the debtor, not third parties, unless (in some circuits) there is such an identity of interest that a judgment against the third party would amount to a judgment against the debtor or would cause the debtor irreparable harm. Circuit authority here does not extend the (a)(1) stay, so the court declines to apply it. Section 362(a)(3) stays acts to obtain possession of or exercise control over property of the debtor. Here, because the parent, under the funding agreement, will ultimately fund any liability imposed on the debtor, the tort litigation will not affect the debtor's property or its ability to pay claims. Section 105(a) permits the court to issue any order necessary to carry out the provisions of title 11, but the court must first have jurisdiction. A court has jurisdiction over an action if it is related to the title 11 case, that is, if the outcome could have any conceivable effect on the case, the debtor's assets, or claims. Because of the debtor's ability to access funds under the funding agreement, the tort litigation would not have any such effect. Therefore, the court denies any order staying the tort litigation. 3M Occupational Safety LLC v. Those Parties Listed on Appendix A to the Complaint (In re Aearo Techs. LLC), 642 B.R. 891 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. 2022).
- 1.1.b Automatic stay is not enforceable in the U.S. against a foreign creditor. The debtor borrowed money in Ireland, securing the loan by various Irish assets. When he defaulted, his Irish creditors pursued and obtained remedies in the Irish courts. The debtor filed a chapter 11 petition to attempt to stay any further foreclosure actions and sued the Irish creditors in the bankruptcy court for contempt for violating the stay. The automatic stay prohibits any act to exercise control over property of the debtor or property of the estate. Property of the estate includes any interest of the debtor in property, wherever located. Therefore, the automatic stay applies to protect the debtor's Irish property. However, a court may not enforce violations of the stay against creditors or other defendants over whom the court does not have personal jurisdiction. Here, the Irish creditors and other actors had no U.S. contacts and so were not subject to an enforcement action in the U.S. courts. Sheehan v. Breccia Unltd. Co. (In re Sheehan), 48 F.4th 513 (7th Cir. 2022).
- 1.1.c Authorizing issuance of additional shares in the debtor's corporation does not violate the stay. The individual debtor, who had embezzled substantial sums from a corporation while he was an officer, owned a 23% interest in the corporation. That interest became property of the estate. The majority shareholder adopted a resolution increasing the number of authorized shares in the corporation but took no action to issue any additional shares. The automatic stay prohibits any act to obtain possession of or exercise control over property of the debtor or of the estate. Merely authorizing the issuance of additional shares does not dilute the estate's interest in the corporation and therefore does not violate the stay. Because the corporate action did not contemplate issuance of new shares, the court did not need to address the issue of whether such an action would have violated the stay. In re Harrison, 643 B.R. 399 (Bankr. E.D. N. Car. 2022).

- 1.1.d False advertising to the debtor's customers does not violate the stay. The debtor provided telecommunications services to its customers. After its bankruptcy, its competitor sent advertisements to the debtor's customers implying that the debtor would be going out of business and would not be able to provide services. The automatic stay prohibits any act to obtain possession or control of property of the estate, including any act or proceeding that might dissipate the estate's assets. It protects both executory contracts and goodwill. However, a competitor's competitive efforts to attract customers, standing alone, does not interfere with the debtor's contracts with its customers, and its general advertising questioning the debtor's future longevity does not attempt to obtain possession of or exercise control over the debtor's goodwill. Not every illegal act violates the stay: nothing in the stay suggests that improper advertisements are attempts to obtain control but legitimate ones are not. Therefore, the competitor did not violate the stay. Windstream Holdings, Inc. v. Charter Commc'ns Inc. (In re Windstream Holdings, Inc.), 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183574 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 6, 2022).
- 1.1.e Order granting counterclaim declaring validity of mortgage on the debtor's property does not violate the stay. The debtor acquired property subject to a disputed mortgage. The debtor brought a quiet title action against the mortgagee. The mortgagee counterclaimed to declare the mortgage valid. While summary judgment motions were pending, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The nonbankruptcy court granted summary judgment to the mortgagee after the debtor's petition date. The automatic stay prohibits continuation of any action against the debtor that was or could have been commenced before the petition date, any act to obtain possession or exercise control of property of the estate, and any act to create, perfect, or enforce a lien against property of the debtor. Because the mortgagee's counterclaim was simply the mirror image of the debtor's complaint, did not seek additional relief, and was only a defense to the complaint, the mortgagee's counterclaim was not an action against the debtor. The counterclaim also sought only to maintain the status quo and as such, did not constitute an act to obtain possession or control of property of the debtor or the estate. It simply affirmed the validity of an existing lien. Finally, the judgment on the counterclaim did not create, perfect, or enforce a lien on the debtor's property. It only declared existing rights. Therefore, the nonbankruptcy court's summary judgment order did not violate the stay. Censo, LLC v. Newrez, LLC (In re Censo, LLC), 638 B.R. 416 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2022).
- 1.1.f Taggart v. Lorenzen standard applies to stay violation in a corporate case. The debtor sold assets prepetition. After the petition date, the buyer demanded payment of certain working capital adjustments provided under the purchase agreement. The automatic stay prohibits any act to collect or recover a prepetition claim. Section 362(k) allows an individual debtor to recover damages for willful violation of the stay. Under Sixth Circuit law, it does not protect non-individual debtors. Therefore, the remedy for a stay violation in a non-individual debtor case is a civil contempt citation under section 105(a). Taggart v. Lorenzen, 139 S. Ct. 1795 (2019), applied the general standards for a civil contempt citation to a violation of the discharge injunction, permitting a contempt finding only if the actor had no objectively reasonable basis on which to assert the discharge injunction did not apply. But in dicta, the decision distinguished automatic stay violations in individual debtor cases, suggesting a strict liability standard might be appropriate. Because section 362(k) does not apply in non-individual debtor cases, the distinction does not apply; the general civil contempt standards apply. In this case, compliance with the purchase agreement regarding purchase price adjustments would not violate the stay, but the belated demand for payment did. However, the seller had an objectively reasonable basis to conclude that the action did not violate the stay. Therefore, the court denies the request for sanctions. Harker v. Eastport Holdings, LLC (In re GYPC, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. S.D. Ohio Nov. 22, 2021).

- 1.1.g Refusal to quash a prepetition garnishment writ does not violate the stay as long as the creditor stays all proceedings. Before bankruptcy, the creditor obtained a writ of garnishment and garnished the debtor's bank account. The bank froze the account, but before it turned over any funds to the creditor, the debtor filed a bankruptcy petition. The creditor requested the state court stay the proceedings and advised the court that it had no objection to the bank's release of the funds, but it would not quash its writ or direct the bank to release the funds. The court stayed the proceedings, granted the debtor's request to quash the writ, and denied the debtor's request for a return of the funds. However, the bank unfroze the account a few days later. The automatic stay prohibits (1) a creditor from commencing or continuing an action to collect a prepetition debt, (2) enforcement against the debtor of a prepetition judgment, (3) any act to obtain possession of property of the estate or from the estate or to exercise control over such property, and (6) any act to collect or recover a prepetition claim. City of Chicago v. Fulton, 141 S. Ct. 585 (2021), held that section 362 requires a creditor holding property of the debtor or the estate to maintain the status quo but does not require turnover of the property, which is governed instead by section 542. Refusing to quash the garnishment was not the continuation of a prepetition action, nor is it an attempt to enforce a prepetition judgment, as long as the creditor stayed all proceedings in the action. Refusal to quash the writ was also not an act to obtain property or an act to collect the debt. Here, the creditor did nothing to change its position, and the debtor's account was unfrozen. Therefore, the creditor did not violate the stay. Stuart v. City of Scottsdale (In re Stuart), 632 B.R. 531 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2021).
- 1.1.h The debtor violated numerous state court orders in actions to recover amounts he misappropriated. The state court held him in contempt and imposed monetary sanctions and ordered him to stop managing property he did not own and to turnover proceeds from the illegal management. The debtor filed his bankruptcy petition the day before a state court hearing on sentencing the debtor to jail for contempt. Section 362(a) stays any prepetition action or proceeding against the debtor, but section 362(b)(4) excepts from the stay any action by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory power." The exception applies when the government's action is to effectuate a public policy to protect public safety and welfare or is to further its own interest but not if the government proceeds for a pecuniary purpose to recover property from the estate. The state court is a governmental unit, and its order to stop managing the property was in the interest of public safety. Its order to turn over money that the debtor collected in violation of the state court's order does not reflect a pecuniary purpose, even though money is involved, because it seeks redress of the violation of a court order and therefore comes within the police power exception. Kupperstein v. Schall (In re Kupperstein), ___ F.3d ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 11944 (1st Cir. Apr. 22, 2021).
- 1.1.i Automatic stay does not apply to state enforcement of COVID-19 protection measures. The state enacted measures to limit restaurant operations during the COVID-19 pandemic. The debtor disregarded those measures, claiming they were unconstitutional. The county sued in state court to shut down the debtor's operation. The debtor filed chapter 11, invoking the automatic stay. 28 U.S.C. § 959(b) requires a debtor in possession to manage and operate its property "according to the valid laws of the State." Therefore, the safety measures apply to the debtor in possession. Section 362(b)(4) excepts from the automatic stay an action by a governmental entity to enforce its police or regulatory powers. In determining whether an action falls within this exception, the court may not determine the merits of a debtor's challenge to the legality of the state law. Nothing in section 362(b)(4) authorizes the court to examine the legality of the governmental unit's action, which is left to the state court, lest the bankruptcy courts are to scrutinize every governmental regulatory action for legality. Therefore, the county's enforcement action may proceed. City of Allegheny v. Cracked Egg, LLC (In re Cracked Egg, LLC), 624 B.R. 84 (Bankruptcy W.D. Pa. 2021).

- 1.1.j Section 362(a)(3) does not require turnover of property of the estate. The city impounded the debtor's vehicle for nonpayment of traffic fines. The debtor filed a chapter 13 petition and demanded turnover of the car. Section 362(a)(3) stays any act to "exercise control over property of the estate." Section 542(a) requires one in possession of property of the estate to deliver it to the trustee. The most natural reading of section 362(a)(3) is that it prohibits affirmative acts that alter the status quo and does not impose an affirmative obligation on a party holding property of the estate to turn it over. Section 542(a) performs that function. Therefore, the city may retain the vehicle without violating the automatic stay. City of Chicago v. Fulton, 592 U.S. ___ 140 S. Ct. 2017 (2021).
- 1.1.k Automatic stay applies to state court litigation between equity holders over control of the debtor and its property. A faction in control of the debtor church brought litigation in state court against another faction for a determination that the debtor faction had control of the church and its property to the exclusion of the other faction. Section 362(a)(3) stays any act to obtain control over property of the debtor or of the estate. Although the faction currently in control of the debtor was the plaintiff, the litigation involved control over the debtor and its property and was therefore subject to the automatic stay. The litigation differed from other corporate control litigation, such as whether to hold a shareholder meeting or whether to permit the voting of pledged shares, to which the automatic stay does not apply. In re Korean W. Presbyterian Church of L.A., 619 B.R. 282 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2020).
- 1.1.l FERC proceeding to restrict rejection of a power purchase agreement may be subject to the automatic stay. The debtor had entered into several agreements to purchase power it no longer needed because its reorganization contemplated its exit from the business of selling electricity at retail. The contracts constituted a minimal portion of the debtor's power contracts and were an insignificant portion of the power market. Upon filing its chapter 11 petition, it sought to enjoin FERC from any action regarding the contracts, including any proceeding to prevent rejection in the chapter 11 case or to require the debtor to perform the contracts. The automatic stay prohibits any act to enforce a prepetition obligation, but an action by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory power is excepted from the stay if the action is to effectuate public policy rather than adjudicate private rights. Although FERC enforces public policy through its determination of whether power agreements are just and reasonable in the public interest, the minimal effect of these contracts on the power markets suggests that any FERC role here would be to vindicate the private interests of the contract counterparties, rather than public policy, so the bankruptcy court may properly enjoin FERC from prohibiting rejection and from ordering the debtor in possession to continue to perform the contract after rejection. However, the bankruptcy court's injunction may not deprive FERC of its own jurisdiction to determine whether the automatic stay applies nor prohibit FERC from taking any action whatsoever or enjoin all FERC's regulatory functions. F.E.R.C. v. FirstEnergy Solutions Corp. (In re FirstEnergy Solutions Corp.), 945 F.3d 431 (6th Cir. 2019).
- 1.1.m Bankruptcy court may grant stay relief to permit creditors to pursue trustee's avoiding power actions. The debtor was the subject of an LBO. In connection with the LBO tender offer, the debtor retained as "depository" a trust company, which performed multiple services for the debtor, including receiving the tendered shares and paying shareholders. Within a year after the LBO, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The creditors committee, on behalf of the estate, brought actual fraudulent transfer actions under section 548(a)(1)(A) against the cashed-out shareholders. The bankruptcy court granted creditors stay relief to bring constructive fraudulent transfer actions in nonbankruptcy courts against the cashed-out shareholders, which they did. Whether or not the automatic stay prohibits creditors from pursuing fraudulent transfer actions creditors had before bankruptcy, the bankruptcy court's stay relief permitted creditors to pursue the actions. In re Tribune Co. Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, 946 F.3d 66 (2d Cir. 2019).

- 1.1.n A creditor who retains repossessed property does not violate the automatic stay. Before bankruptcy, the car lender repossessed the debtor's car. After bankruptcy, the debtor demanded the lender turn over the car. Section 362(a)(3) stays any "act to exercise control over property of the estate." The stay applies only to an affirmative act to exercise control, not to passive control. Therefore, retaining possession does not violate the automatic stay. Section 542(a) requires a creditor in "possession, custody, or control of property of the estate that the debtor may use, sell, or lease under section 363" or that "the debtor may exempt under section 522" and that is not "of inconsequential value or benefit to the estate" to turnover the property. Bankruptcy Rule 7001(1) requires an adversary proceeding to enforce turnover, which is itself subject to several conditions and contingencies. Accordingly, section 542(a) is not self-effectuating, and the creditor is not required to turn over the property until the court determines the trustee or debtor meets section 542(a)'s conditions. In re Denby-Peterson, 941 F.3d 115 (3d Cir. 2019).
- 1.1.o Automatic stay requires city to return impounded car to debtor. After the debtor incurred multiple parking and traffic fines, the city impounded the debtor's car. A city ordinance gave the city a possessory lien on the car to secure payment of the fines. The debtor filed a chapter 13 case with a plan to repay the city over time and demanded the city return the car immediately. The automatic stay prohibits any act to exercise control over property of the estate. The debtor has an interest in the car, which becomes property of the estate. Retaining possession exercises control. A creditor is entitled to adequate protection of an interest in property of the estate. The city's possessory lien is such an interest. The creditor has the burden of seeking adequate protection. Requiring the debtor to provide adequate protection before obtaining return of the car would improperly shift that burden to the debtor. An automatic stay exception permits a creditor to take certain actions to perfect a lien. The exception does not apply to possessory liens, which remain perfected despite turnover required by court order or, in this case, the automatic stay, which functions like a court order. Therefore, the automatic stay requires the city to return the car to the debtor. In re Fulton, ___ F. 3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 18393 (7th Cir. June 19, 2019).
- 1.1.p Automatic stay does not apply to removal to the home bankruptcy court. Before bankruptcy, the debtor was sued in a class action in state court. After it filed its chapter 7 petition, the debtor removed the class action to the bankruptcy court. Section 1452(a) of title 28 permits a party to a nonbankruptcy action to remove the action to the bankruptcy court if the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction. Section 362(a) stays all actions against the debtor that were or could have been commenced before bankruptcy. The stay's purpose, among others, is to give the debtor a breathing spell and to centralize the administration of all claims against the debtor. A court must interpret a statute so as not to prevent a result that is absurd or demonstrably at odds with the drafters' intentions. If read literally, the automatic stay would enjoin any action against the debtor in the home bankruptcy court, including filing a proof of claim, objecting to an exemption or to discharge or dischargeability, or even to a request for stay relief. Such a literal reading would be absurd and demonstrably at odds with the drafters' intentions. The same applies to removal of nonbankruptcy litigation against the debtor that is removed to the home bankruptcy court. Therefore, the removal does not violate the automatic stay. In re Cashco, Inc. 598 B.R. 9 (Bankr. D.N.M. 2019).
- 1.1.q Contract parties may not contract out of the automatic stay by agreeing that a party is a "forward contract merchant." The debtor supplied electricity to its customers under long-term contracts. The contract with a customer who used electricity to manufacture metal auto parts specified the contract was a forward contract, the parties were both "forward contract merchants" as defined in the Bankruptcy Code, and upon a default (including a bankruptcy filing) by either party, the other party could terminate the contract. An exception to the automatic stay permits a forward contract merchant to terminate a forward contract. The Bankruptcy Code defines forward contract merchant as "an entity the business of which consists in whole or in part of entering into forward contracts as or with merchants in a commodity." A contractual term that purports to designate a legal status for a contract party is not effective to override a statutory definition of that status. Therefore, the court must determine, without reference to the contract, whether the customer is a forward contract merchant. In re FirstEnergy Solutions Corp., 596 B.R. 631 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2019).

- 1.1.r Electricity end user is not a forward contract merchant to whom the automatic stay exception applies. The debtor supplied electricity under a long-term contract to a customer who used electricity to manufacture metal auto parts. An exception to the automatic stay permits a forward contract merchant to terminate a forward contract. The Bankruptcy Code defines forward contract merchant as “an entity the business of which consists in whole or in part of entering into forward contracts as or with merchants in a commodity.” Electricity is a commodity. A merchant is one who engages in a business for profit. To qualify as a forward contract merchant, the entity must purchase or sell the commodity to generate a profit. Simply purchasing a commodity for end use in a business does not qualify the purchaser as a merchant. Therefore, the customer is not a forward contract merchant, and the automatic stay exception does not apply. In re FirstEnergy Solutions Corp., 596 B.R. 631 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2019).
- 1.1.s Failure to halt state court contempt proceeding to collect prepetition debt violates the automatic stay. The state court ordered the debtor to pay a property settlement to his former wife by a specified date or appear for a hearing a week later to sentence him for contempt. He failed to pay, and he filed a chapter 13 case before the sentencing hearing. At the sentencing hearing, the state court judge determined she was not restrained by the automatic stay and sentenced the debtor to 30 days in jail, subject to release upon payment of the property settlement amount. The wife’s lawyer made no attempt to stay or delay the sentencing hearing. The debtor brought an action against the wife and her lawyer for violating the automatic stay. The stay prohibits any act or the commencement or continuation of any proceeding to collect a prepetition debt. Courts have created exceptions to the automatic stay for contempt proceedings to protect the dignity of the nonbankruptcy court. In this case, the clear purpose of the sentencing hearing was to coerce payment of the property settlement, not to protect the state court’s dignity. Creditors have the burden to prevent stay violations. Because the wife and her lawyer did nothing to stay or delay the contempt hearing, whose sole purpose was to collect the prepetition property settlement debt, they violated the automatic stay. Wohleber v. Skurko (In re Wohleber), 596 B.R. 554 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2019).
- 1.1.t Court enforces stay waiver granted in prior chapter 11 plan. In its first chapter 11 case, the single asset real estate debtor confirmed a consensual plan with its secured lender. Among other things, the plan provided for a waiver of the automatic stay in a later bankruptcy case and the debtor’s agreement not to oppose stay relief in a later case. The debtor filed a new chapter 11 case a little more than three years after confirmation in the first case. A waiver in initial loan agreements of bankruptcy or the protections of the automatic stay are generally unenforceable. But the majority of courts tend to enforce a waiver granted in a confirmed plan or bankruptcy court-approved settlement agreement, absent extraordinary changed circumstances. The prior order is a final judgment, which binds the parties, including the debtor. The doctrines of res judicata and judicial estoppel also militate in favor of enforcing the prior waiver. In this case, there were no extraordinary changed circumstances, and the court enforces the waiver and grants stay relief. In re A. Hirsch Realty, LLC, 583 B.R. 583 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2018).
- 1.1.u Police and regulatory power exception to the automatic stay applies to the government’s False Claims Act action. The debtor operated nursing homes. The U.S. government asserted claims under the False Claims Act for the debtor’s billing and other violations. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The government filed a False Claims Act action against the debtor in the district court, and the parties filed a joint motion in the action to determine whether the police and regulatory power exception to the automatic stay applied to the FCA action. Section 362(b)(4) excepts from the automatic stay an action by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory power. The exception applies if the action does not relate primarily to the protection of the government’s pecuniary interest nor seek to adjudicate private rights. FCA actions “serve to inflict the sting of punishment on wrongdoers and, more importantly, deter fraud against the government.” Although only the bankruptcy court may grant relief from the stay, a court in which an action is pending has jurisdiction to determine whether the action is subject to the stay. An FCA action liquidates the government’s claim and does not give the government a pecuniary advantage against other general unsecured creditors. FCA actions effectuate public policy by deterring fraud and are not for the purpose of adjudicating private rights. Therefore, the exception applies. U.S. v. Vanguard Healthcare, LLC, 565 B.R. 627 (M.D. Tenn. 2017).

- 1.1.v Seizure under the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act is not subject to the automatic stay. After confirmation of the debtor’s chapter 13 plan, the government seized the debtor’s pension and retirement benefits under the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act (MVRA) on account of a prepetition criminal restitution award against the debtor. The automatic stay prohibits any act to collect or recover on a prepetition claim. The MVRA, enacted in 1996, permits the government, “[n]otwithstanding any other Federal law,” to enforce a judgment imposing a criminal fine “against all property or rights to property of the person fined.” 18 U.S.C. § 3613(a). The MVRA’s later enactment and its broad “notwithstanding” clause supersedes any other federal enactment, including the automatic stay. Therefore, the seizure did not violate the automatic stay. Partida v. U.S. (In re Partida), 531 B.R. 811 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2015), aff’d, 862 F.3d 909 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 1.1.w Supplier’s lien filing against owner’s real estate to collect debt from contractor violates the automatic stay. New Jersey suppliers’ lien law permits a general contractor’s supplier to file a lien against the owner’s real property for any amount the contractor owes the supplier, up to the total amount the owner owes the contractor. In this case, the supplier provided materials to a job, the contractor did not pay for the materials, and the contractor filed bankruptcy. The supplier filed a supplier’s lien on the owner’s real property in the amount of its unpaid bills. The automatic stay prohibits any act to create, perfect or enforce any lien against property of the estate. If allowed, the supplier’s lien would effectively divert to the supplier the contractor’s receivable from the owner. The effect is a lien against the receivable, which is property of the estate. Its creation through the supplier’s lien filing violates the automatic stay. In re Linear Elec. Co., Inc., 852 F.3d 313 (3d Cir. 2017).
- 1.1.x Police or regulatory power exception applies to Medicare and Medicaid Provider Agreement. The debtor operated a hospital and was under a Provider Agreement contract with the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) as a Medicare and Medicaid provider. The debtor wrote to CMS saying it was filing a chapter 11 petition the next day, “closing as a hospital” two days after that, and terminating the Provider Agreement. The day after the debtor closed as a hospital, CMS wrote back, terminating the Provider Agreement as of the previous day because the closing removed the debtor from the CMS definition of a “hospital.” The next day, the state authorized the debtor to admit patients again, and the debtor in possession notified CMS that it was not terminating the Provider Agreement. Although CMS said it would rescind the prior termination if the hospital started admitting inpatients again, the debtor in possession filed a motion to compel on the ground that the termination violated the automatic stay. Section 362(a)(3) stays the termination of an executory contract, but section 362(b)(4) exempts an action “by a governmental unit ... to enforce such governmental unit’s police or regulatory power.” The exception applies when the governmental action is designed primarily to protect public safety and welfare and is not an attempt to recover property from the debtor. Here, the termination was to enforce the Medicare and Medicaid regulations, not to enforce CMS’s contractual rights against the debtor. Enforcing regulations comes within the exception. Therefore, CMS’s termination did not violate the automatic stay. Parkview Adventist Med. Center v. U.S., 842 F.3d 757 (1st Cir. 2016).
- 1.1.y Police or regulatory power exception applies to enforcement of civil contempt sanctions. In a prepetition state court action, the debtor failed to respond to discovery. The state court imposed a monetary sanction, which the debtor did not pay. The creditor moved to cite the debtor for contempt. Before the hearing on the motion, the debtor filed bankruptcy. At the state court’s request, the creditor filed a brief addressing the automatic stay's effect on the motion. The debtor moved in the bankruptcy court to sanction the creditor for violating the stay. Section 362(a) stays the commencement or continuation of any action or proceeding against the debtor. Section 362(b)(4) exempts from the stay "the commencement or continuation of an action or proceeding by a governmental unit ... to enforce such governmental unit's police and regulatory power." Any action qualifies for the exemption if it does not seek to protect the governmental unit's pecuniary interest nor seek to adjudicate private rights. The state court is a governmental unit. The sanction order and the contempt proceeding were intended to protect the court's public policy interest in deterring certain kinds of litigation misconduct, not to protect the court's pecuniary interest nor the creditor's private rights. Therefore, the exemption applies, and the creditor's civil contempt proceeding against the debtor did not violate the stay. Dingley v. Yellow Logistics, LLC (In re Dingley), 852 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2017).

- 1.1.z Police or regulatory exception does not apply to Private Attorney General Act action. The debtor's former employee filed a complaint against the debtor with the state's Labor and Workforce Development Agency for violations of the state's labor laws. The LWDA took no action, which permitted the former employee to bring an action under the state's Private Attorney General Act to enforce the state's labor law against the debtor. The debtor removed the former employee's action for labor law violations, including a PAGA claim, to the district court, which referred the entire matter, including the PAGA claim, to arbitration. The employee appealed. While the appeal was pending, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The automatic stay enjoins any action or proceeding against the debtor that was or could have been commenced before bankruptcy to collect a prepetition claim. But the stay does not apply to an action "by a governmental unit ... to enforce such governmental unit's police or regulatory power." A PAGA action is similar to a qui tam action, which is not covered by the automatic stay exception. Although the employee brings a PAGA action on behalf of the state, where the state agency does not intervene in the action, the action is not "by a governmental unit," so it is not covered by the exception. Porter v. Nabors Drilling USA, L.P., 854 F.3d 1057 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 1.1.aa Automatic stay does not apply to subpoena to debtor in action against third parties. The creditor sued the debtor and others for violation of a non-compete agreement. After the creditor obtained an injunction and an award of attorney's fees against the debtor, the debtor filed a chapter 13 case. The bankruptcy court disallowed any additional damage claim. The creditor dropped the debtor from the state court action and continued the action against the other defendants. The creditor sought to depose the debtor for evidence to be used against the other defendants. The automatic stay prohibits the commencement or continuation of a judicial proceeding against the debtor that was or could have been commenced before bankruptcy and any action to recover a claim against the debtor that arose before bankruptcy. The creditor here did not seek recovery on a claim against the debtor, only against the other defendants, and only sought information from the debtor. The automatic stay does not apply to such discovery. Innerwood & Co., LLC v. Privett (In re Privett), 557 B.R. 580 (S.D. Ohio 2016).
- 1.1.bb Prejudgment asset freeze order on SEC's motion does not violate the automatic stay. In an SEC action for securities law violations, the district court found the debtor liable and ordered disgorgement. The SEC moved for an order temporarily freezing the debtor's assets. While the motion was pending, the debtor filed a chapter 11 petition. The district court proceeded with the hearing on the motion and issued a freeze order for the debtor's assets, with an eye toward "working harmoniously and cooperatively with the bankruptcy court" and therefore limited the freeze until the assets are "scheduled and thereby are clearly under the control of the Bankruptcy Court." The automatic stay prohibits any act to obtain possession or control of property of the debtor or of the estate, but it excepts a governmental unit's action to enforce its police or regulatory power, except to enforce a money judgment. The court issued the freeze order before it entered judgment, so the freeze was not part of a judgment enforcement proceeding. The order did not transfer title or possession of the assets but simply preserved the status quo. And the order does not impair the automatic stay's general purpose of centralizing in the bankruptcy court all disputes concerning property of the estate or the exception's purpose of preventing a debtor from frustrating governmental functions by filing bankruptcy. Therefore, the asset freeze order was within the police or regulatory exception but not within the exception to the exception for money judgment enforcement. SEC v. Miller, 808 F.3d 623 (2d Cir. 2015).

- 1.1.cc Imposition of multi-employer pension plan withdrawal liability on the debtor's affiliates does not violate the automatic stay. The debtor's subsidiaries participated in a multi-employer pension plan. On the same day three creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor, the pension plan sent a notice to the subsidiaries that the plan was expelling them from the plan. Three days later, the subsidiaries filed voluntary chapter 11 petitions. One month later, the plan asserted withdrawal liability against the members of the debtor's controlled group that were not debtors in bankruptcy cases. Under ERISA, one employer's withdrawal from a plan imposes withdrawal liability on the employer and all members of its controlled group. For ERISA purposes, all such members are treated as a single employer. The members' withdrawal liability is joint and several. (The case law is divided on whether withdrawal liability is a new obligation or simply the fixing of a date to determine a pre-existing obligation; the court here does not resolve the issue.) The automatic stay prohibits commencement or continuation of an action against the debtor that was or could have been commenced before bankruptcy, any act to obtain possession or exercise control over property of the debtor or the estate, and any act to collect, assess, or recover from the debtor a prepetition claim. The stay does not apply to non-debtors. ERISA's treatment of controlled group members as a single employer does not mean that the imposition of withdrawal liability on the non-debtors imposed it on the debtors, because withdrawal liability is joint and several; its imposition on the nondebtors does not require or necessarily result in imposition on the debtors. Therefore, the plan's actions did not violate the automatic stay. In re Caesar's Entertainment Op. Co., Inc., 540 B.R. 637 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2015).
- 1.1.dd Seventh Circuit adopts "conduct" test to determine when a claim arises and stay applies. The state adopted a law in April 2011 that imposed on all operating hospitals a fee to create a fund from which to reimburse the hospitals for the treatment of Medicaid patients. The fee period was from July 2011 to June 2013, payable in two installments, and the fee was based on a hospital's cost reports from May 2010 to April 2011. The state did not receive required federal approval to collect the fee until May 2012 and immediately began assessing the fee. It sent the debtor hospital a bill for the 2012 fiscal year on May 29, 2012 and began withholding Medicaid reimbursements from the hospital as a setoff against the fee. The hospital filed its chapter 11 petition on June 19, 2012. The state continued withholding reimbursements. The automatic stay prohibits any attempt to collect or offset a claim that arises prepetition. A definition of when a claim arises that contemplates the earliest possible time best serves the Code's underlying policy goal of giving a debtor complete relief. The court therefore adopts the conduct test, holding that a claim arises when the conduct giving rise to the claim occurs. Here, the conduct was the state's enactment and imposition of the fee well before the petition date, and the fee amount was based on the debtor's prepetition cost report. Therefore, the fee claim arose prepetition, and the state's offset of postpetition reimbursement amounts violated the automatic stay. The court does not address whether a prepetition relationship between the debtor and the claimant is also required, because such a relationship existed here. St. Catherine Hosp. v. Ind. Family and Soc. Servs. Admin., 800 F.3d 312 (7th Cir. 2015).
- 1.1.ee Seizure under the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act is not subject to the automatic stay. After confirmation of the debtor's chapter plan, the government seized the debtor's pension and retirement benefits under the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act (MVRA) on account of a prepetition criminal restitution award against the debtor. The automatic stay prohibits any act to collect or recover on a prepetition claim. The MVRA, enacted in 1996, permits the government, “[n]otwithstanding any other Federal law,” to enforce a judgment imposing a criminal fine “against all property or rights to property of the person fined.” 18 U.S.C. § 3613(a). The MVRA’s later enactment and its broad “notwithstanding” clause supersedes any other federal enactment, including the automatic stay. Therefore, the seizure did not violate the automatic stay. Partida v. U.S. (In re Partida), 531 B.R. 811 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2015), aff’d ___ F.3d ___, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 12166 (9th Cir. July 7, 2017). .

- 1.1.ff Automatic stay applies to Jewish religious court proceeding. The debtor in possession, a synagogue, commenced an adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy court against another synagogue for fraud, breach of fiduciary duty, and looting of the debtor’s assets. The other synagogue and its principals invoked a beis din, a Jewish rabbinical court, against the debtor’s principals, though not against the debtor itself, to enjoin the prosecution of the adversary proceeding. The beis din issued both a “summons” to the debtor’s principals and an “injunction” ordering them to discontinue pursuing the adversary proceeding and threatened them with a form of shunning or excommunication from the Orthodox Jewish community if they did not comply. The automatic stay prohibits “the commencement or continuation of a judicial, administrative or other action or proceeding against the debtor that was or could have been commenced before the commencement of the case” and “any act ... to exercise control over property of the estate.” The automatic stay protects the debtor’s principals when the challenged action attempts to control the principals’ conduct of the bankruptcy case. Here, the beis din’s purpose was to prevent the DIP from pursuing the adversary proceeding, which sought to collect property of the estate, and the other synagogue’s invocation of the beis din was therefore an act to exercise control over property of the estate. The First Amendment prohibits the government from interfering with the free exercise of religion. However, the Free Exercise clause does not prohibit government action or law that is neutral on its face and as applied and generally applicable in practice. The automatic stay meets those requirements, especially where, as here, the dispute is secular, does not involve religious observance, and promotes only the Congressional policy to prohibit self-help and to funnel all covered activity through the bankruptcy court. Therefore, the court enjoins further prosecution of the beis din and requires those who invoked it to request it to terminate its proceedings and revoke the summons, the injunction, and the threat of shunning. In re Congregation Birchos Yosef, 535 B.R. 629 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 1.1.gg Automatic stay does not protect nondebtors alleged to be the debtor’s alter ego. Before the debtor’s bankruptcy, a union and an ERISA plan administrator sued the debtor and three affiliates in the district court for unpaid plan contributions, alleging that all four defendants were each other’s alter egos. After the debtor filed its bankruptcy case, the other three defendants asked the district court to stay the litigation based on the automatic stay. The automatic stay protects only the debtor and its estate. An alter ego claim, even if successful, does not make the other defendants debtors; it only renders them liable for the debtor’s debts. It therefore does not enlarge the scope of the stay’s protection to encompass the other defendants. However, if necessary to the debtor’s, the estate’s, or creditors’ protection, the bankruptcy court may issue an injunction to protect the affiliates. Pavers & Road Builders District Council Welfare Fund v. Core Contracting of N. Y., LLC, 536 B.R. 48 (E.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 1.1.hh Court denies motion to enforce automatic stay against union’s boycott promotion activities. The debtor’s contract with its union expired a few days after the petition date. After the debtor in possession attempted unsuccessfully to negotiate a new contract, it rejected the contract. Before rejection, the union contacted the debtor’s customers to encourage a boycott. Claiming such action violated the automatic stay, the DIP moved to enforce the stay. Section 362(a)(3) prohibits any act to exercise control over property of the estate. A debtor’s customer relationships are property of the estate. However, the Norris-LaGuardia Act deprives federal courts of jurisdiction to enjoin certain union activities, including promoting a boycott. Although the automatic stay arises automatically and does not depend on a federal court order, applying the stay to protected union activities would require court involvement, through stay relief or enforcement motions, contrary to Congress's intent that federal courts not interfere in unions' exercise of economic leverage in labor disputes. To harmonize the two statutes, courts should consider the nexus between the conduct at issue and the estate's property interests, the conduct's impact on the estate, and the competing legal interests of the non-debtor party. Here, because of Congress's protection of union activities under the Norris-LaGuardia Act, the third factor weighs heavily against application of the stay to prohibit the union's exercise of economic leverage in its negotiations. The DIP may not use the automatic stay to shift bargaining power. The court denies the motion to enforce the stay against the union. In re Trump Entertainment Resorts, Inc., 534 B.R. 93 (Bankr. D. Del. 2015).

- 1.1.ii Termination payment assignee under terminated swap is not a swap participant. The debtor entered into a loan agreement and an interest rate swap with the bank and granted the bank a security interest in its assets to secure its obligations under both. Upon early swap termination for the debtor's default, the bank determines the amount payable, which, if payable by the debtor, is secured by the collateral. The swap provides that neither the swap nor any interest or obligation under the swap may be transferred without the other party's consent, but a party may transfer its interest in a termination payment. The debtor defaulted under the swap and the loan agreement, and the bank fixed a termination payment amount, which it added to the loan amount. It did not seek enforcement against the collateral but instead sold its position. Later, the debtor filed a chapter 11 petition. The automatic stay prohibits any attempt to collect a prepetition debt but excepts from the stay a swap participant's exercise of a contractual right under a security agreement to offset or net out any termination payment amount. By the time the bank assigned its termination payment right, the swap had been terminated, and the swap was not assignable without consent. Therefore, the bank assigned only the right to collect, not the swap. As a result, the buyer was not a swap participant that was protected by the automatic stay exception. A62 Equities LLC v. Chohan (In re Chohan), 532 B.R. 130 (C.D. Cal. 2015).
- 1.1.jj Stay in individual debtor chapter 11 case terminates upon case closing, even before discharge. After plan confirmation, the individual debtors closed their chapter 11 case to save U.S. trustee fees. They defaulted on the plan. A creditor sued in state court on breach of contract for amounts owing under the plan, which entered judgment for the creditor. The creditor then seized prepetition property on which it had a lien. The debtors moved to reopen their chapter 11 case to seek a contempt citation against the creditor for violating the stay. The automatic stay of an act against property continues until the property is no longer property of the estate, and the stay of any other act continues until the earliest of case closing, case dismissal, or discharge. Under section 1141(b), property of the estate reverts in the debtor on plan confirmation. Section 1115(a) includes as property of the estate all property the debtor acquires after case commencement and before the case closing, dismissal, or discharge. Here, the property the creditor seized was prepetition property that reverted in the debtors upon confirmation, terminating the stay as to acts against the property, and the stay of other acts terminated upon case closing. Therefore, the creditor did not violate the automatic stay. Rael v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (In re Rael), 527 B.R. 799 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2015).
- 1.1.kk Remand does not violate the automatic stay. The defendant removed a state court action to federal court. The day before the hearing on plaintiff's motion for remand, the defendant filed a bankruptcy petition. The automatic stay prohibits continuation of any action against the debtor commenced before bankruptcy. A remand is a determination that the court lacks power to hear the case and that the case belongs in another court, not a continuation of the action. One of the stay's purposes is to give the debtor a breathing spell from collection efforts. Sending the case back to the proper court, which should stay the action, does not contravene that purpose. Therefore, the stay does not bar remand. Sanders v. Farina, 67 F. Supp. 3d 727 (E.D. Va. 2014).

- 1.1.ii Creditor’s action against fraudulent transfer defendants based on independent claims does not violate the stay. Funds that had invested in a Ponzi scheme collapsed when the Ponzi scheme was uncovered and the debtor filed bankruptcy. The funds’ investors sued the funds and their managers for securities law violations, fraud, and other common law claims. The bankruptcy trustee sued the funds to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers. When the investors settled with the funds and their managers, the trustee sued to enjoin the settlements, claiming an automatic stay violation. The automatic stay enjoins actions against the debtor on account of a prepetition claim, any act to obtain possession or exercise control over property of the estate, or any act to collect or recover a prepetition claim against the debtor. A fraudulent transfer claim requires a claim against the debtor and therefore is an action on account of and to collect and recover a prepetition claim. Therefore, a creditor’s fraudulent transfer claim violates the automatic stay. Here, the investors’ claims against the funds and their managers are independent of any claims they might have against the debtor and therefore are not disguised fraudulent transfer claims. An action that adversely affects property of the estate also violates the stay’s injunction against obtaining possession of or exercising control over property of the estate, but only if the effect is inevitable, such as if the effect occurs by operation of law, not where the effect is only likely as a factual matter. Although the investors’ actions against and settlements with the managers might prevent the defendants from satisfying any judgment that the trustee might receive against them, this effect is not sufficiently inevitable to constitute a stay violation. Therefore, the court dismisses the trustee’s action to enjoin the settlements. Picard v. Fairfield Greenwich Limited, 762 F.3d 199 (2d Cir. 2014).
- 1.1.mm Withholding exempt bank account balance does not violate the stay. The debtor filed a chapter 7 petition. The bank where the debtor maintained deposits learned of the bankruptcy, froze the debtor’s accounts and three days after the petition date sent a letter to the trustee advising that the balances were “in bankruptcy status” and would remain so until receipt of the trustee’s direction or until the time for objecting to exemptions expired (30 days after the section 341 meeting) and requesting instructions on where to send the account balances. The same day, the bank sent a letter to debtor’s counsel advising of its actions. The bank was not a creditor and so did not assert a setoff right. The debtor did not claim the account balances as exempt in the schedules filed with the petition but amended his exemption claim 5 days after the date of the letter to claim 75% of the account balances as exempt. The debtor brought an action against the bank for damages for an automatic stay violation. Property that the debtor claims as exempt first becomes property of the estate and remains such at least until the trustee abandons it or sets it aside as exempt or the deadline for an exemption objection expires. Section 362(a)(3) stays any act to exercise control over property of the estate but not over property of the debtor. Where an asset is exempt without regard to value, it reverts in the debtor immediately upon the expiration of the period to object to exemptions. But if the asset is exempt only to the extent of a certain value, the debtor’s interest up to that value reverts in the debtor, but title to the property does not revert until it is abandoned or otherwise administered. Here, the property reverted in the debtor upon the objection period’s expiration. Until then, it was property of the estate. The bank did not violate the stay because it offered the property to the trustee and sought direction on its disposition, which the trustee did not provide. Once the property became property of the debtor, the automatic stay no longer applied. Therefore, the bank did not violate the stay. Mwangi v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (In re Mwangi), 764 F.3d 1168 (9th Cir. 2014).
- 1.1.nn Automatic stay does not apply to prepetition contempt proceeding. Before bankruptcy, the debtor violated a discovery order in a state court action. The state court imposed a sanction against him, which the debtor did not pay. The court issued an order to show cause why the debtor should not be held in contempt. Before the hearing, the debtor filed bankruptcy. The state court ordered the plaintiff to file a brief on the applicability of the automatic stay, which it did, and ordered the debtor to respond. Before the response deadline, the debtor filed a bankruptcy court proceeding to sanction the plaintiff for a stay violation. Section 362(a) stays the continuation of a proceeding to collect a prepetition debt. However, under David v. Hooker Ltd., 560 F.2d 412 (9th Cir. 1977), the stay does not apply to a contempt proceeding against the debtor whose purpose is to vindicate the court's authority rather than to collect the underlying debt. Here, the contempt proceeding was solely to vindicate the court's authority with respect to the award of discovery sanctions, not to collect the underlying debt the debtor owed to the plaintiff. Therefore, the stay did not apply, and the plaintiff was not in contempt. Yellow Express, LLC v. Dingley (In re Dingley), 514 B.R. 591 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2014).

- 1.1.oo Automatic stay does not prevent collection of criminal restitution from the estate. The debtor was subject to a criminal restitution order in favor of the United States. The debtor exempted property from the estate, but there was other property of the estate. The automatic stay prohibits any act to obtain property of or from the estate. Section 3613 of title 18 provides, “[n]otwithstanding any other Federal law ... a judgment imposing [restitution] may be enforced against all property or rights to property of the person [ordered to pay restitution].” Section 3613 supersedes conflicting laws. Although property of the estate is not property of the debtor, section 3613’s intent shows that it is intended to override any protection to property that a section 541(a) transfer of a debtor’s property to the estate would create. Therefore, the United States may pursue its claim against property of the debtor. U.S. v. Robinson, 764 F.3d 554 (6th Cir. 2014).
- 1.1.pp Section 362(b)(3) stay exception requires creditor to have prepetition interest in property. Subcontractors provided the debtor contractor with goods and services before bankruptcy. After bankruptcy, they sought to perfect their mechanics’ and materialmen’s liens on amounts owed to the contractor by its customers. Section 362(a)(4) stays any “act to create, perfect, or enforce any lien against property of the estate.” Section 362(b)(3) excepts from the stay “any act to perfect ... an interest in property to the extent that the trustee’s rights and powers are subject to such perfection under section 546(b).” Section 546(b) subjects the trustee’s rights and powers to applicable law that “permits perfection of an interest in property to be effective against an entity that acquires rights in such property before the date of perfection ...” “Interest in property” is a broader concept than a lien, which is an interest that secures payment or performance of an obligation. Sections 362(b)(3) and 546(b) require an interest in property as of the petition date. Here, applicable state law granted the mechanics and materialmen unperfected liens, which are interests in property, upon supplying goods or services. Therefore, section 362(b)(3) applied, and the automatic stay exception permitted the creditors to perfect their liens. Branch Banking & Trust Co. v. Construction Supervision Servs., Inc. (In re Construction Supervision Servs., Inc.), 753 F.3d 124 (4th Cir. 2014).
- 1.1.qq Postpetition de-acceleration violates the automatic stay; section 1110 does not require cure of an ipso facto clause. The debtor borrowed money secured by aircraft. The note indenture provided an automatic event of default and automatic acceleration of amounts owing under the notes upon a bankruptcy filing. It also required the debtor, upon a voluntary early repayment, to make a make-whole payment equal to the present value of the amount by which note interest payments to maturity exceeds hypothetical future interest payments at current rates. However, the make-whole amount was not payable in connection with an event of default or an acceleration of the notes. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession stipulated under section 1110 to perform all obligations under the indenture arising after the petition date but did not assume the indenture. During the case, interest rates fell, and the debtor in possession obtained replacement financing from which it repaid the notes. The automatic stay prohibits modification of the debtor’s rights under a contract. The indenture trustee may not waive the notes’ default and de-accelerate the notes’ maturity because it would modify the debtor’s right under the indenture to repay the notes without paying the make-whole amount. Section 365(e) prohibits the modification of the debtor’s rights or powers under an executory contract based upon the filing of a bankruptcy petition. However, it does not apply to an indenture for borrowed money, which is not an executory contract. Finally, a section 1110 agreement does not modify the parties’ contractual rights but only provides the debtor in possession with interim automatic stay's protection. It is not an assumption of the obligation. Even though the debtor in possession agreed to perform all obligations under the indenture, payment of the make-whole amount was not, by the indenture's terms, an obligation after an event of default. Section 1110 does not require cure or performance resulting from violation of such a provision, so even if the indenture required the payment, it was triggered by a financial condition provision and need not be cured. In re AMR Corp., 730 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 2013).

- 1.1.rr Automatic stay does not prevent collection of criminal restitution from the estate. The debtor was subject to a criminal restitution order in favor of the United States. The debtor exempted property from the estate, but there remained additional property of the estate. The automatic stay prohibits any act to obtain property of or from the estate. Section 362(b)(1) excepts from the automatic stay any criminal action or proceeding. Section 3613 of title 18 provides, “[n]otwithstanding any other Federal law ... a judgment imposing [restitution] may be enforced against all property or rights to property of the person [ordered to pay restitution].” Section 3613 is “powerful and far-reaching,” superseding any other federal law. Therefore, the United States may pursue its claim against property of the debtor. Section 541(a) divests the debtor upon the filing of the bankruptcy petition of any interest in property and vests it in the estate. Although the estate is not the person ordered to pay restitution, the operation of section 541(a) interferes with the operation of section 3613. Therefore, section 3613 takes precedence over section 541(a) and does not permit the debtor, by filing a bankruptcy petition, to shield property from collection to satisfy a criminal restitution obligation. U.S. v. Robinson, 494 B.R. 715 (W.D. Tenn. 2013).
- 1.1.ss Automatic stay may apply to nondebtor. The debtor in possession moved for an order that the automatic stay applied to a creditor's action against the debtor's parent and affiliates. The court denied the motion as a matter of law, without factual findings on the proceeding's effect on the estate. The automatic stay applies to “the commencement or continuation ... of a judicial ... proceeding against the debtor” and to any “act to obtain possession of property from the estate or to exercise control over property of the estate.” It therefore normally does not apply to a proceeding against a nondebtor. However, the stay may apply to a proceeding against a nondebtor if the claim asserted in the proceeding will have an immediate adverse economic consequence for the estate. The Court of Appeals therefore remands to the district court to determine the proceeding's effect. In re Residential Capital, LLC, 2013 U.S. App. LEXIS 1418 (2d Cir. July 15, 2013).
- 1.1.tt Automatic stay may apply to nondebtor. Before bankruptcy, a bond insurer brought an action against the debtor and the bond underwriter for fraud in issuing the bonds and obtaining the insurance. A second insurer brought an action related to another bond issue but named only the underwriter, alleging the same material facts. In the second action, the underwriter filed a third-party claim against the debtor for indemnification under the underwriting agreement. The automatic stay applies to “the commencement or continuation ... of a judicial ... proceeding against the debtor.” The stay's purpose is to provide the debtor a breathing spell. Courts look to this purpose when applying the stay to nondebtors, so that an action against a nondebtor is subject to the stay where there is such a close identity of interest with the debtor, or the claims against each as so inextricably linked, that a judgment would effectively be against the debtor. An uncontested or absolute indemnification right is sufficient but not necessary to make the link. Here, the debtor's indemnification obligation, the identical nature of the two actions and the underwriter's third-party claim against the debtor show that the claims against the underwriter and the debtor are completely linked so that a judgment in the second action would in effect be a judgment against the debtor. In addition, the stay applies to any “act to obtain possession of property from the estate or to exercise control over property of the estate.” An action that has an adverse effect on property of the estate is an attempt to obtain property of the estate indirectly and is therefore subject to the stay. The second action effectively seeks a determination of the debtor's liability and so would have an adverse effect on property of the estate. For these reasons, the automatic stay applies to the second action against the underwriter, even though the plaintiff did not name the debtor as a defendant in the action. In re Jefferson County, Ala., 491 B.R. 277 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 2013).

- 1.1.uu Automatic stay does not prevent enforcement of trial subpoena against the debtor. The debtor was a co-defendant in state court litigation. Before bankruptcy, the plaintiff served a trial subpoena on him. When the debtor filed his bankruptcy petition, the plaintiff severed him from the state court case but still insisted that he testify. Section 362(a)(1) stays "the commencement or continuation, including the issuance or employment of process ... to recover a claim against the debtor" Enforcement of a trial subpoena against a debtor who has been severed from the action runs the risk of requiring the debtor to employ counsel to represent him to ensure that the testimony does not adversely affect him in a later proceeding, for example, to determine dischargeability. However, where the plaintiff seeks the debtor's testimony to pursue the case against the other defendants and not primarily to build a case against the debtor, the automatic stay does not by its terms apply. A bankruptcy court may enjoin enforcement of a subpoena, but the burden rests on the debtor to seek an injunction, not on the other party to seek stay relief to enforce the subpoena. Kenoyer v. Cardinale (In re Kenoyer), 489 B.R. 103 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2013).
- 1.1.vv The automatic stay does not protect property that has been fraudulently transferred. The debtor contracted with an investor to develop wind power projects. The contract required the investor, upon commercial operation, to pay 75% of the projects' purchase price to the debtor and 25% to an advisor. The debtor transferred the development contract to an affiliate without consideration. It later filed bankruptcy. The debtor's bankruptcy trustee sued the affiliate and the advisor to avoid as a fraudulent transfer and recover the transfer of the contract and therefore the right to the purchase price. After commercial operation, the affiliate and the advisor sued the investor in state court for the purchase price. The state court issued judgment against the investor but, based on the trustee's notice of bankruptcy, ordered the payment to be deposited with the bankruptcy court. The state court then transferred the issue of whether the judgment was part of the bankruptcy estate to the bankruptcy court. The affiliate and the advisor successfully removed the action to the district court, where the trustee's fraudulent transfer action was pending. The district court consolidated the two actions. Over the trustee's opposition that the payment was property of the estate to which the automatic stay applied, the affiliate and the advisor obtained an order from the district court requiring distribution to them of the investor's payment. Section 541(a)(1) includes as property of the estate "all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case", and section 541(a)(3) includes "Any interest in property that the trustee recovers under section ... 550 ... of this title." Section 541(a)(3) includes property only once the trustee has recovered it. Section 541(a)(1) does not include fraudulently transferred property in which the debtor has divested itself of any interest unless the debtor retains an equitable interest to protect creditors. An equitable interest in property is a beneficial interest that gives the holder the right to acquire legal title. A trustee cannot acquire equitable title to property, which the automatic stay would protect, merely by alleging that the property was fraudulently transferred. Such a rule would infringe the transferee's title without due process. The statute does not suggest such a broad reading of section 541(a)(1). Therefore, the investor's payment was not property of the estate. Rajala v. Gardner, 709 F.3d 1031 (10th Cir. 2013).
- 1.1.ww Right to enforce automatic stay may be lost by laches. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. Investors in the scheme included various investment funds. The state attorney general sued an investment manager of one of those funds on behalf of fund investors, for violation of state laws. The trustee sued the manager and the funds to avoid and recover voidable transfers. Six months after learning of the attorney general's suit, the trustee informed the attorney general that he would seek to enjoin the action on the ground that the manager's funds derived from property of the debtor, that the manager's funds were therefore property of the estate and that the settlement therefore violated the automatic stay as an attempt to exercise control over property of the estate, unless the attorney general agreed to turn over any recovery to the bankruptcy estate. After some preliminary correspondence, the attorney general invited the trustee to negotiate a resolution of the stay dispute, but the trustee failed to respond for a year, after which the trustee again threatened to sue but did not sue. During the three years after the trustee's initial contact, the attorney general's litigation proceeded, with extensive discovery and summary judgment motions, and the trustee separately negotiated with the investment manager and the funds over settling his own action. In those negotiations, the manager told the trustee that it would not settle with the attorney general without a settlement with the trustee, but ultimately did. When the attorney general finally agreed to a settlement with the investment manager under which the manager would make a substantial payment to the attorney general, the trustee sued to enjoin the settlement. A defendant may assert laches as a defense if the plaintiff has inexcusably delayed bringing the action, to the defendant's prejudice. The trustee waited over three and a half years to seek to enjoin the attorney general's litigation, periodically threatening to sue but never doing so until the end. During that time, the attorney general incurred substantial expense and devoted substantial resources to prosecuting the action against the manager. The trustee is guilty of laches, which warrants dismissal of the action to enforce the automatic stay. Secs. Investor Protection Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC, 491 B.R. 27 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 15, 2013).

- 1.1.xx Proceeding to revoke probation for nonpayment of restitution and to resentence is excepted from the automatic stay. The debtor was convicted in federal district court of bank and tax fraud and sentenced to probation and restitution. He filed bankruptcy and stopped paying restitution. The court revoked his probationary sentence and resentenced him to imprisonment and an increased restitution amount, payable in monthly installments equal to 15% of his gross income. Section 362(a)(1) stays the commencement or continuation of a judicial proceeding that was or could have been commenced before the commencement of the bankruptcy case, but section 362(b)(1) excepts "the commencement or continuation of a criminal action or proceeding against the debtor". A criminal action is one initiated by the government to punish offenses; a criminal proceeding is one initiated to determine guilt or set punishment. Thus, a criminal action does not end upon the judgment of conviction but continues through satisfaction of the defendant's duties under the judgment and any proceedings to hold him to account. Imposition or enforcement of a restitution order is included, because the order, though monetary, is not imposed because a defendant has over-extended himself but is a compensatory obligation to victims arising out the debtor's conviction of a crime. The proceeding here to revoke probation and resentence was therefore a continuation of the underlying criminal action and is excepted from the automatic stay. U.S. v. Colasuonno, 697 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2012).
- 1.1.yy De-acceleration of a loan acceleration to take advantage of a make-whole payment obligation violates the automatic stay. The debtor airline had financed its aircraft under an indenture that provided for a make-whole payment if the debtor voluntarily paid the amounts owing before maturity and for automatic acceleration upon a bankruptcy filing. However, the indenture excluded the make-whole payment from the amount that became due and payable upon a bankruptcy. The debtor in possession entered into an agreement under section 1110, with which it complied, to make all principal and interest payments on time and to cure any other defaults under and abide by the terms of the indenture, other than the bankruptcy default provisions. The debtor in possession then proposed to refinance the amounts owing under the indenture, without making the make-whole payment. The indenture trustee proposed to waive the bankruptcy default and de-accelerate the amounts owing on the notes. The automatic stay bars a creditor for taking action to exercise control over property of the estate or assess a claim against the debtor. Property of the estate includes all legal or equitable interest of the debtor in property. Contract rights are property of the estate and are therefore protected by the automatic stay.

Waiver of the bankruptcy default and de-acceleration of the amounts owing on the notes would entitle the indenture trustee to the make-whole payment upon the debtor in possession's refinancing of the notes, resulting in assessment of a claim against the debtor and violating the automatic stay. Section 365(e) makes an ipso facto clause in an executory contract unenforceable. But section 365(e) does not apply to an ordinary note, because it is not an executory contract. Therefore, the bankruptcy default clause in this case is enforceable. In re AMR Corp., 485 B.R. 279 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

- 1.1.zz Automatic stay does not apply to debtor's action to extend automatic termination of FCC licenses. The debtor's FCC licenses would terminate if the debtor did not show "substantial service" by a deadline, subject to the FCC's extension in certain circumstances. If the FCC did not grant the extension, the debtor could request rehearing and, if denied, could appeal to the court of appeals. The FCC or the court of appeals may stay the FCC's order pending reconsideration or appeal. Shortly before the deadline, the debtor applied to the FCC for an extension. While the application was pending, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. Upon learning that the FCC was about to issue an order terminating the licenses, the debtor in possession filed an adversary proceeding against the FCC seeking either a declaration that the automatic stay prevented termination or an injunction against termination until exhaustion of all administrative and appellate review. Property of the estate includes all of the debtor's interest in property as of the petition date. The debtor's interests in the licenses and its rights to seek extension of the termination deadline, to seek reconsideration and to appeal are all property of the estate. The automatic stay applies to the commencement or continuation of a judicial or administrative proceeding against the debtor and any act to obtain possession of property of or from the estate. The FCC proceeding was not an action against the debtor. The stay against any act to obtain property is subject to the police or regulatory power exception in section 362(b)(4). FCC control over licenses is an exercise of the police power and therefore exempt from the stay. Fibertower Network Servs. Corp. v. FCC (In re Fibertower Network Servs. Corp.), 482 B.R. 169 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2012).
- 1.1.aaa Court enjoins termination of FCC licenses pending FCC review of license extension request. The debtor's FCC licenses would terminate if the debtor did not show "substantial service" by a deadline, subject to the FCC's extension in certain circumstances. If the FCC did not grant the extension, the debtor could request rehearing and, if denied, could appeal to the court of appeals. The FCC or the court of appeals may stay the FCC's order pending reconsideration or appeal. Shortly before the deadline, the debtor applied to the FCC for an extension. While the application was pending, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The debtor in possession obtained a cash collateral order that terminated if the licenses were finally terminated. Upon learning that the FCC was about to issue an order terminating the licenses, the debtor in possession filed an adversary proceeding against the FCC seeking either a declaration that the automatic stay prevented termination or an injunction against termination until exhaustion of all administrative and appellate review and moved for a preliminary injunction. Property of the estate includes all of the debtor's interest in property as of the petition date. The debtor's interests in the licenses and its rights to seek extension of the termination deadline, to seek reconsideration and to appeal are all property of the estate. The automatic stay does not apply to the FCC proceeding here, because of the regulatory exception in section 362(b)(4). However, section 105(a) authorizes the court to issue any order necessary or appropriate to carry out the Bankruptcy Code's provisions. Section 105(a) permits the court to enjoin actions that are excepted from the automatic stay. To obtain an injunction, the debtor in possession must show a likelihood of success on the merits, irreparable injury, balance of equities and that the injunction would serve the public interest. The merits inquiry is of the action in which the plaintiff seeks the preliminary injunction, because the preliminary injunction is in aid of the relief sought in the adversary proceeding. The bankruptcy court should not usurp or second-guess the FCC's regulatory authority by ruling on the likelihood of success of the FCC proceeding. Therefore, the question here is whether the court is likely to grant the requested injunctive relief. The court is likely to do so, because the relief involves only a stay of termination pending the FCC's and appellate court's rulings, which the FCC itself would have authority to grant, and because it protects property of the estate. The debtor in possession has a risk of irreparable injury because the cash collateral order terminates upon license termination and because the FCC might reallocate the licenses upon termination, making recovery of the licenses slow, difficult or impossible. That potential harm is greater than the harm to the FCC's regulatory interests, and preserving property of the estate to permit reorganization is consistent with the public interest. Therefore, the court issues the preliminary injunction. Fibertower Network Servs. Corp. v. FCC (In re Fibertower Network Servs. Corp.), 482 B.R. 169 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2012).

- 1.1.bbb Action to require operation violates the automatic stay. The chapter 9 debtor voted to close a hospital. Other municipal authorities sued under applicable state law to require the debtor to maintain operations. Section 362(a)(3) stays any act to exercise control over property of the estate (which is construed in a chapter 9 case to refer to property of the debtor). This provision applies to any action that affects property of the debtor. Therefore, the lawsuit is an act to exercise control over the hospital and is stayed. In re Jefferson County, Ala., 484 B.R. 427 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 2012).
- 1.1.ccc Automatic stay does not apply to contempt injunction. The debtor operated a restaurant in violation of trademark rights. The trademark owner sued to enjoin the infringement. The court granted an injunction against use of the mark. The debtor violated it. Upon a civil contempt motion, the court issued a further injunction against operation of a restaurant as a contempt sanction. The debtor filed bankruptcy. The automatic stay applies to commencement or continuation of a judicial proceeding against the debtor that was commenced before the bankruptcy case. It does not, however, protect a debtor's tortious uses of property of the estate nor from violating a nonbankruptcy court's order (other than for the payment of money). Because application of the automatic stay would not permit the debtor to continue his tortious infringement of the trademark owner's mark, it does not apply to the nonbankruptcy court's injunction against operating the restaurant. Dominic's Restaurant of Dayton, Inc. v. Mantia, 683 F.3d 757 (6th Cir. 2012).
- 1.1.ddd Action against debtor's property improvement district is not subject to the automatic stay. The debtor owned undeveloped real property, subject to a mortgage in favor of the bank. Before bankruptcy, the debtor had formed a property improvement district, which is a separate municipal entity that state law authorizes to borrow money secured by tax revenues on the real property, to construct infrastructure, such as roads, utilities and sewers. After bankruptcy, the bank sought to sue the improvement district in state court to challenge the validity of its formation and sought an order from the bankruptcy court that the action did not violate the automatic stay in the debtor's case. The existence of an improvement district and its ability to finance infrastructure development can enhance property's value. The automatic stay prohibits an act to obtain possession of property of the estate or to exercise control over property of the debtor or estate. Here, the improvement district, as a separate legal entity that the debtor does not control, is not property of the debtor, so the bank's action against the district is not an act to obtain possession of or exercise control over property of the debtor. Although an invalidation of the improvement district would adversely affect the value of the estate's real property, merely having a possible effect on value is insufficient to bring the act within the automatic stay's scope. Rather, the judgment against the third party must be in effect a judgment against the debtor for the stay to apply. Here, the incidental effect on value that the action might have is insufficient. Therefore, the stay does not apply. Nat'l Bank of Ark. v. In re Panther Mtn. Land Devel., LLC (In re Panther Mtn. Land Devel., LLC), 686 F.3d 916 (8th Cir. 2012).

- 1.1.eee Police and regulatory exception applies to action that private party commences. The debtor operated wireless service under a wireless license granted by the FCC. Several wireline carriers initiated actions before various state PUCs complaining that the debtor was in fact operating a wireline service and, in doing so, violating either state regulatory law or an interconnection agreement with the wireline carrier. In most of the PUC proceedings, the PUC staff becomes a party to the proceedings, and some of the actions are similar to those that the PUC itself might initiate. Section 362(b)(4) excepts from the automatic stay, “the commencement or continuation of an action or proceeding by a governmental unit ... to enforce such governmental unit’s police and regulatory power”. This exception includes a proceeding that is not commenced by a governmental unit but is continued by a governmental unit, such as the participation in the proceedings by the PUC staffs. Therefore, the proceedings may be excepted from the automatic stay, even though not “commenced” by a governmental unit. Halo Wireless, Inc. v. Alenco Comm’ns Inc. (In re Halo Wireless, Inc.), 684 F.3d 583 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 1.1.fff State PUC proceeding to enforce interconnection agreement is within the police and regulatory power exception to the automatic stay. The debtor operated wireless service under a wireless license granted by the FCC. Several wireline carriers initiated actions before various state PUCs complaining that the debtor was in fact operating a wireline service and, in doing so, violating either state regulatory law or an interconnection agreement (ICA) with the wireline carrier. In most of the PUC proceedings, the PUC staff becomes a party to the proceedings, and some of the actions are similar to those that the PUC itself might initiate. Section 362(b)(4) excepts from the automatic stay “the commencement or continuation of an action or proceeding by a governmental unit ... to enforce such governmental unit’s police and regulatory power”. A proceeding comes within the exception if it does not primarily seek to protect a pecuniary governmental interest, as opposed to the public safety and health and attempts to effectuate public policy rather than adjudicate private rights. The PUCs’ role in ensuring that ICA rates are just and reasonable and that there is nondiscriminatory access to telecommunications services are public purposes and meet the public policy test. By limiting the PUCs’ ability to enforce any monetary judgment, the bankruptcy court ensures that the proceedings meet the pecuniary purpose test. Therefore, the police and regulatory exception to the automatic stay applies. Halo Wireless, Inc. v. Alenco Comm’ns Inc. (In re Halo Wireless, Inc.), 684 F.3d 583 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 1.1.ggg Automatic stay applies to creditor’s unjust enrichment action against debtor’s bank to prevent double recovery. The debtor ran a fraudulent scheme that involved moving money between bank accounts. The trustee sued the bank as a fraudulent transferee. One investor claimed that it could trace its investment through the debtor’s accounts. The investment was the subject of the trustee’s fraudulent transfer action. The investor sued the bank on an unjust enrichment theory. Fearing double liability for the same transfer, the lender asked the bankruptcy court to apply the automatic stay against the investor to prohibit the investor from proceeding with the unjust enrichment action. The bank, because of the double liability risk, has a sufficient personal stake in the matter to have standing to seek to enforce the automatic stay. The automatic stay applies only to actions that belong to the estate, not to actions that only a creditor may bring. The stay applies to “any act ... to recover a claim against the debtor”. A creditor’s fraudulent transfer action seeks to recover a claim against the debtor and is therefore stayed. An unjust enrichment action, as well as a constructive trust action, shares this quality with a creditor’s fraudulent transfer action. It is an effort to recover a claim against the debtor, rather than to redress harm the bank caused the investor. The stay therefore applies. Meoli v. The Huntington Nat’l Bank (In re Teleservices Group, Inc.), 463 B.R. 28 (Bankr. S.D. Mich. 2012).
- 1.1.hhh Automatic stay applies to, and court may properly enjoin, creditor’s common law action that duplicates estate’s fraudulent transfer action. The trustee sued a Ponzi scheme transferee in bankruptcy court to recover a fraudulent transfer. Investors brought tort claims against the same transferee in state court, asserting damages to them from the transferee’s participation in the Ponzi scheme. The investors' action alleged the same operative facts as in the trustee's complaint, although they sought different damages from the defendant. The harm for which the investors sought damages was harm that all of the debtor's creditors had been suffered in the same way. Any creditor could have brought the action. The automatic stay enjoins any act to exercise control over property of the estate or to collect or recover on a claim against the debtor. The trustee's fraudulent transfer claims were property of the estate, and the investors' action against the transferee was to collect on their claims against the debtor. In essence, the state court claims duplicate the trustee's fraudulent transfer claims and therefore violate the stay. Finally, the investors' action also harms the trustee more directly by creating a double liability risk for the transferee, thereby impeding the trustee's efforts to reach a settlement on the fraudulent transfer claim. An injunction enforcing the stay is appropriate. Fox v. Picard (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 848 F. Supp. 2d 469 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

- 1.1.iii Enforcement of a condominium association by-law provision that denies voting rights to a delinquent debtor violates the automatic stay. The debtor real estate developer owned about 20% of the units in a condominium development. The condominium association asserted assessment claims against the debtor with respect to only one of the debtor's units. The debtor disputed the assessment. After a state court judgment against the debtor for the assessment, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. An association by-law denies a delinquent unit holder the right to vote at a unit-holders meeting. Through canceling several annual unit-holder meetings, the association board effectively denied the debtor the ability to vote at the annual meeting. The court construes the denial as an attempt to enforce the by-law provision. The automatic stay prohibits any act to collect a prepetition debt. Denial of the vote may be designed to pressure a delinquent unit-holder to pay a delinquent assessment. Based on the debtor's voting power and the history between the debtor and the board, the court concludes that the meeting cancellation is an attempt to enforce the by-law provision and therefore violates the stay. Gordon Props., LLC v. First Owners Assoc. of Forty Six Hundred (In re Gordon Props., LLC), 460 B.R. 681 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2011).
- 1.1.jjj Declaratory action against the trustee to determine avoidability of a transfer violates the automatic stay. The trustee brought an action to recover voidable transfers from the initial transferee and from its related subsequent transferee. The subsequent transferee then brought an action in the Grand Court of the Cayman Islands for a declaration that it was not liable to the trustee. The automatic stay applies to "any act to obtain possession of ... or to exercise control over property of the estate". Property of the estate includes "all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case" "wherever located and by whomever held". It includes any cause of action the debtor had on the petition date as well as avoidance actions. By bringing the Cayman action, the subsequent transferee sought to control the avoiding power action by interfering with the trustee's ability to choose the forum in which to litigate it. The foreign action "seeking declaratory relief from a debtor's claim" therefore violates the automatic stay. Picard v. Maxam Absolute Return Fund, L.P. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs., LLC), 460 B.R. 106 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 1.1.kkk Court enjoins pension trustee's participation in U.K. pension funding proceeding against U.S. debtor. U.S. debtors were part of a multinational, Canadian-based corporation that also had significant subsidiaries and operations in the United Kingdom. The Canadian parent and the U.S. and U.K. subsidiaries all commenced insolvency proceedings in their respective jurisdictions on the same day, and all three courts granted recognition to the other proceedings. After the bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings were commenced, the U.K. pension regulator determined that the U.K. debtors' pension plans were substantially underfunded as of a date approximately six months before bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings and issued a "Warning Notice" of intent to issue a "financial support directive" (FSD) against the U.S. and Canadian affiliates to contribute to the U.K. pension trust fund. The pension trustees and the U.K. Pension Protection Fund filed proofs of claim in the U.S. chapter 11 cases for a portion of the underfunding deficiency. The automatic stay enjoins any act to assess a claim that could have been brought before bankruptcy. Courts use two tests to determine whether section 362(b)(4)'s exception for a proceeding by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory power applies: whether the proceeding has a public health and safety, rather than a pecuniary, purpose and whether it is taken in furtherance of a public policy and not to adjudicate private rights. The exception should not be construed broadly where the governmental unit is a foreign regulator, because the bankruptcy court cannot easily enjoin foreign proceedings. Although the pension regulator that conducts the proceeding is a foreign governmental unit, the pension trustee and the Pension Protection Fund, which insures workers' pensions, are private parties seeking adjudication of their rights against the debtor and do not qualify for the exception. The FSD proceeding addresses only a financial shortfall in pension funding, not any public health or safety issues, and its purpose is not to protect safety or welfare but only to adjudicate the private rights of the pension trust and the Pension Protection Fund. It is unnecessary in this case to decide whether both tests must be met for the exception to apply, because the proceeding fails both tests. Therefore, it does not meet any of the police or regulatory exception requirements, and the court enjoins the pension trustee and the Pension Protection Fund from participating in the FSD proceeding. Trustees of Nortel Networks U.K. Pension Plan v. Nortel Networks Inc. (In re Nortel Networks Inc.), 669 F.3d 128 (3d Cir. 2011).

1.1.iii Section 362(b)(4) does not protect a collection action receiver. The municipal debtor had issued revenue bonds, secured by a pledge of the net revenues of the debtor's sewer system. The debtor defaulted in payments. The indenture trustee sought and obtained the appointment of a state court receiver, as provided in the indenture, to take possession of and operate the system, collect revenues, set rates and pay net revenues to the indenture trustee for distribution to bondholders. Upon the debtor's filing its chapter 9 case, the receiver moved for the bankruptcy court to abstain from taking any action to interfere with the receivership. Section 362(b)(4) excepts from the automatic stay an action by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory power. Property that is subject to a receivership is in the custody of the receivership court, and a receiver takes possession only as an officer of the appointing court. Although the receivership court might be considered a governmental unit, the receiver, which holds the property only for the receivership court, is not. 28 U.S.C. § 1334(e) gives the bankruptcy court exclusive in rem jurisdiction over all property of the debtor as of the commencement of the case. The bankruptcy court's exclusive jurisdiction places the property in the custody of the bankruptcy court, ousting the receivership court of control and the receiver of possession. When the bankruptcy filing dispossesses the receivership court (and therefore the receiver), no property of the debtor remains within that court's jurisdiction for purposes of enforcing the police or regulatory power. In re Jefferson County, Ala., 474 B.R. 228 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 2012).

1.1.mmm Automatic stay prohibits attachment of a lien for unpaid municipal utility expenses. The Wisconsin municipal utility statute provides that, through a procedure initiated each year on October 15, an unpaid municipal utility bill "will be levied as a tax" on November 15 against the real property to which utility services were provided, and the amount will appear on the next property tax bill as a "special charge". The debtor owed substantial sums to its municipal utility when it filed chapter 11 on June 30. On October 15, the utility sent the debtor in possession a letter advising it that the unpaid amounts would become a lien against the debtor's real property if they remained unpaid after October 30. The automatic stay prohibits "any act to create, perfect or enforce any lien against property of the estate" or "any act to collect, assess, or recover a claim". Section 362(b) provides exceptions to the automatic stay, but courts must construe them narrowly to further the stay's protective purposes. Section 362(b)(3) excepts from the stay "any act to perfect ... an interest in property to the extent that", under section 546(b)(1), the perfection would relate back so as "to be effective against an entity that acquires rights in such property before the date of perfection". The exception applies only where the creditor, as of the petition date, has an unperfected interest in the property, not merely the right to obtain an interest. Here, the utility did not have such an interest at the petition date, because the lien would arise only on November 15 and only if the debtor did not pay the utility bill by then. Section 362(b)(9) excepts from the stay “the issuance to the debtor by a governmental unit of a notice of tax deficiency [and] the making of an assessment for any tax and issuance of a notice and demand for payment of such an assessment”. A tax is a governmental levy to support the functions of government, not a fee or reimbursement for services rendered. The Wisconsin statute’s treatment of the collection of the bill “as a tax” does not bring it within the meaning of “tax” in section 362(b)(9). Section 362(b)(18) excepts from the stay “the creation or perfection of a statutory lien for ... a special tax or special assessment on real property ... imposed by a governmental unit” after the petition date. A special tax or special assessment is limited to one imposed for payment for a local improvement or to enhance local property values. The utility charge does not qualify. Therefore, none of the automatic stay exceptions apply, and the utility’s notice to the debtor in possession violated the stay. Reedsburg Util. Comm’n v. Grede Foundries, Inc. (In re Grede Foundries, Inc.), 651 F.3d 786 (7th Cir. 2011).

- 1.1.nnn Automatic stay applies to action for equitable subordination of another debtor in possession’s claim. A debtor in possession filed a proof of secured claim in another debtor’s case. The debtor in possession in the second case moved to equitably subordinate the creditor-debtor in possession’s secured claim. The automatic stay prohibits the commencement or continuation of any judicial proceeding against a debtor that could have been brought before the commencement of the case and any act to obtain possession of property of or from the estate or to exercise control over property of the estate. These provisions do not prevent a party from defending an action that the debtor or debtor in possession has brought. A successful defense does not take property (the estate’s claim) of or from the estate or exercise control over property of the estate but only determines that there was no such property. A debtor in possession’s motion to subordinate a secured claim owned by another estate, by contrast, acknowledges the existence of the other estate’s claim and seeks to transfer the lien securing the claim to the objecting estate. Therefore, the action violates the automatic stay in the creditor-debtor’s case. Palmdale Hills Prop., LLC v. Lehman Comm’l Paper Inc. (In re Palmdale Hills Prop, LLC), 654 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2011).
- 1.1.ooo Tenth Circuit signals change in rule on automatic stay applicability to appeals. A creditor obtained a prepetition judgment against the debtor, who appealed. After bankruptcy, the creditor argued that the automatic stay applied to the debtor’s appeal. Section 362(a)(1) stays a judicial proceeding against the debtor that was commenced before the commencement of the bankruptcy case. All courts of appeals except the Tenth Circuit determine whether the proceeding is against the debtor by looking at the alignment of the parties in the original trial court proceeding. The Tenth Circuit’s precedents do not apply the stay to a debtor’s appeal of a judgment against the debtor, reasoning that the appeal is not a proceeding against the debtor. In this case, the Tenth Circuit follows its precedent, because the state appeals court had resolved the appeal before the Tenth Circuit issued its decision, and no purpose would be served by retroactively applying the stay to the appeal. However, it invites bankruptcy courts in the circuit “to rule in the alternative when the issue arises in future cases”. Chizzali v. Gindi (In re Gindi), 642 F.3d 865 (10th Cir. 2011).
- 1.1.ppp Action against property improvement district is subject to the automatic stay. The debtor owned undeveloped real property, subject to a mortgage in favor of the bank. Before bankruptcy, the debtor had formed a property improvement district, which is a separate municipal entity that state law authorizes to borrow money secured by tax revenues on the real property, to construct infrastructure, such as roads, utilities and sewers. After bankruptcy, the bank sought to sue the improvement district in state court to challenge the validity of its formation and sought a comfort order from the bankruptcy court that the action did not violate the automatic stay in the debtor’s case. The existence of an improvement district and its ability to finance infrastructure development can enhance property's value. The automatic stay prohibits an act to exercise control over property of the estate. An invalidation of the improvement district would adversely affect the value of the estate's real property, so the proposed state court action would violate the automatic stay. The court notes that the improvement district, though a distinct legal entity, had no practical or effective existence independent of the debtor and that the treatment of the real estate, including the district's ability to finance and impose taxes on the property that would result in placing liens on the property, is subject to the bankruptcy court's control. In re Panther Mtn. Land Devel., LLC, 446 B.R. 282 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

- 1.1.qqq Action seeking civil penalties or disgorgement may qualify for the police power exception to the automatic stay. The debtor operated in the securities industry but had ceased operations long before bankruptcy. The State sued the debtor before bankruptcy for violations of the securities laws, seeking disgorgement and civil penalties. After bankruptcy, the debtor sought to stay the State's action. Section 362(b)(4) excepts from the automatic stay an action by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory policy. In determining whether the exception applies, the court should not examine the merits or legitimacy of the underlying action, nor whether the governmental unit can show an urgent need to prevent imminent harm, and an action may qualify for an exception from the stay even if it does not seek only an injunction. The court should consider only whether the action satisfies either the pecuniary purpose test or the public policy test. The action meets the pecuniary purpose test if the purpose of the action is not to recover damages, but to vindicate a public policy. A civil penalty provides deterrence, which is a public policy, so seeking a penalty or disgorgement does not cause the action to fail the pecuniary purpose test. An action meets the public purpose test if its purpose is not to vindicate private rights. People v. Villalobos, 453 B.R. 404 (D. Nev. 2011).
- 1.1.rrr Court enjoins U.K. pension funding proceeding against U.S. debtor. U.S. debtors were part of a multinational, Canadian-based corporation that also had significant subsidiaries and operations in the United Kingdom. The Canadian parent and the U.S. and U.K. subsidiaries all commenced insolvency proceedings in their respective jurisdictions on the same day, and all three courts granted recognition to the other proceedings. After the bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings, the U.K. pension regulator determined that the U.K. debtors' pension plans were substantially underfunded as of a date approximately six months before bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings and issued a "Warning Notice" of intent to issue a "financial support directive" (FSD) against the U.S. and Canadian affiliates to contribute to the pension trust fund. The pension trustees and the U.K. Pension Protection Fund filed proofs of claim in the U.S. chapter 11 cases for a portion of the underfunding deficiency. The automatic stay enjoins any act to assess a claim that could have been brought before bankruptcy. The police or regulatory power exception in section 362(b)(4) applies only to an action by a governmental unit that has a public health and safety, rather than a pecuniary, purpose and is taken in furtherance of a public policy and not to adjudicate private rights. The exception should be construed narrowly where the governmental unit is a foreign regulator. The FSD proceeding addresses only a financial shortfall in pension funding, not any public health or safety issues, and its purpose is not to protect safety or welfare but only to adjudicate the private rights of the pension trust and the Pension Protection Fund. Therefore, it does not meet any of the police or regulatory exception requirements, and the court enjoins the FSD proceeding. Trustees of Nortel Networks U.K. Pension Plan v. Nortel Networks Inc. (In re Nortel Networks Inc.), 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32786 (D. Del. Mar. 29, 2011).
- 1.1.sss Dismissal of debtor's action for failure to prosecute does not violate the stay. The debtor corporation consented to its counsel's withdrawal from representation in the debtor's prepetition antitrust action. The court warned the corporate debtor that it could not proceed without counsel and would suffer dismissal for failure to prosecute if it did not obtain replacement counsel. The debtor was unable to obtain replacement counsel, and after the debtor's bankruptcy filing, the court dismissed the action for failure to prosecute. The automatic stay bars continuation of an action against the debtor and any act to obtain possession of property from the estate or to exercise control over property of the estate. The dismissal does not violate the automatic stay, because the action is not against the debtor and because an attempt to dismiss or defeat a debtor's actions is not an act to obtain possession or exercise control. Otherwise, those that a debtor sues could not defend themselves. Riviera Drilling & Exploration Co. v. Gunnison Energy Corp., 2011 U.S. App. LEXIS 255 (10th Cir. Jan. 5, 2011).

1.1.ttt Setoff of special purpose account against derivative contract liability violates the automatic stay. The debtor made numerous daily deposits and withdrawals from its accounts with a bank, often resulting in large intraday overdrafts, which were regularly cleared by the end of each day. Shortly before bankruptcy, the bank demanded collateral to secure intraday overdrafts. The debtor and the bank entered into a security agreement that provided for a large deposit account specifically to secure such intraday overdrafts. The bank also had numerous open derivative contracts with the debtor. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, it had no intraday overdrafts with the bank. After bankruptcy, the bank offset the entire deposit account against the debtor's obligations on the derivative contracts. Section 553(a) recognizes but does not grant a setoff right, which is governed by applicable nonbankruptcy (here, New York) law. New York law permits a bank to offset a depositor's indebtedness to the bank against the depositor's general bank account, but not against a special purpose account or against pledged collateral. Because the parties specifically negotiated the security agreement to secure only indebtedness arising from intraday overdrafts and the deposit was posted as collateral solely for that purpose, the debtor's account was a special purpose account and was pledged collateral that could not be used to offset against other indebtedness. Section 362(b)(17), which provides an automatic stay safe harbor for setoff relating to a derivative contract, does not protect the bank. It applies only to a contractual setoff right, which includes a right provided in a rule or bylaw of a derivatives clearing organization or by common law, "under any security agreement or arrangement or other credit enhancement forming a part of or related to any swap agreement". The setoff that the bank attempted here was not based on an agreement that was related to any swap agreement and therefore violated the automatic stay. Bank of America, N.A. v. Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 439 B.R. 811 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

1.1.uuu The police or regulatory power automatic stay exception applies to an ITC proceeding. Before bankruptcy, two plaintiffs brought a "preinstitution" proceeding before the International Trade Commission against the debtor and numerous other defendants for importing goods that violated the plaintiffs' patents. Based on such a proceeding, the ITC determines whether to institute an investigation. If it does, an ALJ hears a contested proceeding, issues a determination based on whether a patent violation has occurred and certifies the matter to the ITC, which consults with other government departments on issues of remedy and the public interest before determining whether to order that imports of the offending product cease. If the ITC does so, the order goes to the President, who has 60 days to disapprove it "for policy reasons". The only remedy the ITC may impose is to stop importation. Damages are not available. The procedure permits settlement with ALJ approval. Here, the plaintiffs settled on a confidential basis with two of the defendants, but not the debtor. Section 362(b) excepts from the automatic stay "the commencement or continuation of an action or proceedings by a governmental unit ... to enforce such governmental units' ... police and regulatory power". An action is exempt from the stay if it promotes public health, safety or welfare, rather than the government's pecuniary interest, and if there is public purpose in the action. Here, though private parties brought the preinstitution proceeding and were able to settle with some respondents, the ITC, a governmental agency, conducted the main proceeding to protect the public interest and further public policy. The proceeding did not involve any pecuniary interest. Therefore, the proceeding was an action by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory power and was excepted from the automatic stay. U.S. Int'l Trade Comm'n v. Jaffe, 433 B.R. 538 (E.D. Va. 2010).

- 1.1.vvv Automatic stay applies to a creditor’s action that belongs to the estate. In a Ponzi scheme case, the trustee filed a fraudulent transfer action against an investor. Other investors filed a class action in state court against the fraudulent transfer defendant for conversion, unjust enrichment, conspiracy and RICO violations, claiming lost investment income on their investments. The automatic stay prohibits a creditor from pursuing an action that belongs to the estate. An action belongs to the estate if it does not involve particularized injury to individual creditors and could be brought by any creditor. An action belongs to a particular creditor if the creditor suffered injury significantly different from injury to other creditors. The action here seeks to redress harm to the debtor resulting from the defendant’s receipt of payments in excess of his investments with the debtor, not particularized harm to the plaintiff creditors. The trustee’s fraudulent transfer action seeks to recover those payments for the benefit of all creditors. Therefore, the plaintiff creditors’ action is property of the estate and is stayed. Picard v. Fox (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 429 B.R. 423 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 1.1.www Direct action against debtor in possession’s directors for breach of fiduciary duty in connection with plan negotiations violates the automatic stay. The solvent debtor received an offer for its equity. The debtor’s board initially resisted a competing offer, but later initiated a process in its chapter 11 case for an auction, with bankruptcy court supervision and subject to bankruptcy court approval of a plan that reflected the auction results. A shareholder brought an action in state court asserting direct claims against the debtor’s directors for breach of fiduciary duty for their initial resistance to the competing bid and seeking an order requiring the directors to “obtain a transaction”. The Bankruptcy Code entrusts the administration of a chapter 11 case to the debtor in possession, subject to bankruptcy court supervision. Any attempt to assert control over the case’s administration in another court violates the automatic stay. In addition, an action against the debtor’s directors implicates the Barton doctrine (Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881)), which requires that a party must first obtain leave from the bankruptcy court before bringing an action against a fiduciary responsible for administering the estate. The debtor in possession’s directors qualify for Barton protection. Therefore, the bankruptcy court enjoins the state court action. In re Gen. Growth Props., Inc., 426 B.R. 71 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 1.1.xxx The police or regulatory power automatic stay exception does not apply to an ITC proceeding. Before bankruptcy, two plaintiffs brought a proceeding before the International Trade Commission against the debtor and numerous other defendants for importing goods into the United States that violated the plaintiffs’ patents. The plaintiffs settled on a confidential basis with two of the defendants, but not the debtor. Section 362(b) excepts from the automatic stay “the commencement or continuation of an action or proceedings by a governmental unit ... to enforce such governmental units’ ... police and regulatory power”. An action is exempt from the stay if it promotes public health, safety or welfare, rather than promoting the government’s pecuniary interest, and if there is public purpose in the action. Although there is a public purpose in preventing importation of goods that violate U.S. patents, the ITC action here was not brought or prosecuted by a governmental unit and sought only monetary recovery in favor of the plaintiffs. Therefore, the automatic stay applies. In re Qimonda AG, 425 B.R. 256 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2010).
- 1.1.yyy Court enjoins U.K. pension funding proceeding against U.S. debtor. U.S. debtors were part of a multinational, Canadian-based corporation that also had significant subsidiaries and operations in the United Kingdom. The Canadian parent and the U.S. and U.K. subsidiaries all commenced insolvency proceedings in their respective jurisdictions on the same day, and all three courts granted recognition to the other proceedings. After the bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings, the U.K. pension regulator determined that the U.K. debtors’ pension plans were substantially underfunded as of a date approximately six months before bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings and issued a “Warning Notice” of intent to issue a “financial support directive” (FSD) against the U.S. and Canadian affiliates to contribute to the pension trust fund.

The pension trustees and the U.K. Pension Protection Fund filed proofs of claim in the U.S. chapter 11 cases for a portion of the underfunding deficiency. The automatic stay enjoins any act to assess a claim that could have been brought before bankruptcy. The police or regulatory power exception in section 362(b)(4) applies only to an action by a governmental unit that has a public health and safety, rather than a pecuniary, purpose and is taken in furtherance of a public policy and not to adjudicate private rights. The FSD proceeding addresses only a financial shortfall in pension funding, not any public health or safety issues, and its purpose is not to protect safety or welfare but only to adjudicate the private rights of the pension trust and the Pension Protection Fund. Therefore, it does not meet any of the police or regulatory exception requirements. The court therefore enjoins the FSD proceeding. In re Nortel Networks Corp., 426 B.R. 84 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).

1.1.zzz Automatic stay applies to state court action against state agency seeking to enforce the agency's obligations concerning the debtor. A hospital filed a chapter 11 case and sought immediate approval of a closure plan. The court granted interim approval and scheduled a final hearing 20 days later. Local citizens brought an action in state court against only the state health department, alleging that it did not comply with state and federal law in authorizing the closure. The action asked the state court to require the health department to do so. It did not seek monetary or equitable relief against the debtor. The automatic stay enjoins any act to exercise control over property of the estate, whether or not the act directly involves the debtor. The plaintiffs' action would have the effect of exercising control over the hospital and therefore is subject to the automatic stay. Section 362(b)(4)'s police and regulatory power exception to the automatic stay does not apply to the action, because it applies only to an action by a governmental unit, not by a private plaintiff. Only a party in interest may seek stay relief. Since the Code's purpose is to provide a forum for creditors and debtors to resolve matters between them, only a creditor or the debtor is a party in interest for purposes of seeking stay relief. The plaintiffs are not creditors of the debtor and therefore may not seek stay relief. They also do not have standing as a party in interest under section 1109(b) to object to the debtor in possession's motion to approve the closure. In re Saint Vincents Catholic Med. Ctr., 429 B.R. 139 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

1.1.aaaa Equitable subordination adversary proceeding against creditor who is a debtor in another case violates the stay. A creditor filed a proof of secured claim. The debtor in possession objected to the claim and filed an adversary proceeding for equitable subordination of the claim and of the lien and for transfer, under section 510(c)(2), of the lien to the estate. The creditor was a debtor in possession in its own bankruptcy case. The automatic stay prevents an action to obtain property from the estate. An objection to claim, whether or not secured, determines whether the creditor has a claim. An action to subordinate a claim under section 510(c) applies only if the creditor has an allowable claim. By seeking transfer of the lien to the estate, the action attempts to remove property from the creditor's estate. Such an action violates the automatic stay in the creditor's case. Although the debtor's bankruptcy court may determine whether the stay applies, only the creditor's court may grant relief from the stay to permit the debtor in possession to seek equitable subordination of the claim and lien and transfer of the lien to the estate. The creditor does not waive the automatic stay in its own case by filing and pursuing the proof of claim in the debtor's case, and the debtor in possession is not handicapped by being unable to seek equitable subordination, as might be the case if the debtor in possession were stayed from objecting to the claim. The debtor in possession may still object to allowance and may seek stay relief in the creditor's case to pursue equitable subordination. Lehman Comm'l Paper, Inc. v. Palmdale Hills Prop., LLC (In re Palmdale Hills Prop., LLC), 423 B.R. 655 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2010).

1.1.bbbb Refusing to service machines that the trustee proposes to sell violates the stay. Before bankruptcy, the debtor purchased from the creditor large, complex machines that only the creditor could service. The creditor failed to perfect its retained security interest in the machines. After bankruptcy, the trustee attempted to sell the machines, which were worth $2,000,000. The creditor advised potential purchasers that it would refuse to service the machines. The creditor then offered to purchase the machines from the trustee for $100,000, intending to resell them at market value to recover its claim. Section 362(a)(6) enjoins “any act to collect, assess, or recover” a prepetition debt. The automatic stay protects not only the debtor but also creditors from other creditors’ collection actions. In this case, the debtor did not benefit from any protection, because it was liquidating. An action violates a creditor-protection stay if the action “could reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the creditor’s ability to collect, assess, or recover” a prepetition debt and is unfair under the circumstances. The creditor’s conduct here admittedly was designed to discourage any other buyers from buying the machines from the estate so that the creditor could recover its prepetition claim. Although outside of bankruptcy, a machine manufacturer may choose its service customers, such a choice may become unfair in bankruptcy if it otherwise violates the automatic stay by attempting to recover a prepetition claim, such as was the case here. Therefore, the creditor violated the automatic stay, and the bankruptcy court properly enjoined the creditor to provide service on the machines to any purchaser. Lewis v. Negri Bossi USA, Inc. (In re Mathson Indus., Inc.), 423 B.R. 643 (E.D. Mich. 2010).

1.1.cccc Automatic stay may apply to action for continuing postpetition patent infringement. Samsung had sued the debtor before bankruptcy for patent infringement. After bankruptcy, it withdrew a portion of its infringement claims and brought an action before the U.S. International Trade Commission (ITC) based on the debtor in possession’s post-petition importation into the United States of goods that allegedly infringed the same patents. The automatic stay applies to any “action or proceeding against the debtor that was or could have been commenced before the commencement of the case”. An action for a violation arising from continuation during bankruptcy of prepetition conduct is one that was or could have been commenced before bankruptcy and therefore is stayed. The ITC proceeding might be permitted under the police or regulatory power exception to the automatic stay if it does not relate primarily to protecting the government’s pecuniary interest and effectuates a public policy. Here, however, the ITC action is initiated by a private litigant against another private litigant, and the ITC plays a judicial role. Therefore, the action is to enforce private rights, not public policy, so the exception does not apply. Finally, section 959(a) permits an action against a debtor in possession for postpetition acts or transactions, but the court may enjoin such an action where necessary for the orderly administration of the estate. Because Samsung attempted to split the prepetition action by dismissing some of the infringement claims and bringing them instead in the ITC, Samsung appeared to be attempting an end run around the automatic stay, so the court enjoins the ITC action. In re Spansion, Inc., 418 B.R. 84 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).

1.1.dddd Automatic stay requires creditor to undo violations arising from state court order. Before bankruptcy, the debtor violated a spousal support obligation. The debtor’s ex-spouse filed a motion in the state court to hold the debtor in contempt. After bankruptcy, the state court ordered the debtor to pay the arrearages by a deadline or be jailed until payment. The order did not follow or track the domestic support payment exceptions to the automatic stay. The debtor sought relief in the state appellate court, which the ex-spouse opposed in full. Ultimately, the bankruptcy court voided the state court order before the payment deadline. The automatic stay prohibits the commencement and the continuation of an action to collect a prepetition debt. It imposes on a creditor that has commenced such an action an affirmative duty of compliance, including to ensure that the action is not continued and to relieve the violation, and does not require action only if the debtor so requests. Thus, in opposing the debtor’s state court appeal, the ex-spouse should have argued for affirmance only to the extent that the order fell within the domestic support automatic stay exceptions and could not rely on the ordinary adversary process in that court to reach the right result. The violation is wilful to the extent the creditor knew of the stay and acted intentionally, whether or not the creditor believed in good faith that the actions did not violate the stay. Sternberg v. Johnston, 582 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2009).

- 1.1.eeee Automatic stay prohibits contract termination upon adoption of the resolution authorizing a bankruptcy. The debtors operated ocean going shipping vessels. They were members of an insurance “club”. The club’s English law governed insurance policies contained a “cesser” clause, under which the policies terminated not only upon the filing of a bankruptcy petition but also upon the adoption of a winding up resolution by a club member’s board. The automatic stay prohibits a contract counterparty from terminating a contract with a debtor after the debtor’s bankruptcy, and section 541(c) invalidates any contractual provision that prevents a debtor’s property interest from becoming property of the estate. The counterparty may not evade these provision’s application by triggering the termination upon the adoption of the resolution authorizing the bankruptcy filing. Therefore, the policies remain property of the estates, and the club may not terminate them without relief from the stay. LaMonica v. N. of England Protecting and Indem. Assoc. Ltd. (In re Probulk Inc.), 407 B.R. 56 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).
- 1.1.ffff Creditor’s withholding possession of property of the estate violates the automatic stay. Before the debtor’s chapter 13 case, the creditor repossessed the debtor’s car. The creditor refused turnover without the debtor’s obtaining an adequate protection order. Section 362(a)(3) stays “exercise of control over property of the estate”. Merely retaining possession exercises control over an asset. Additional action, such as selling the asset, is not required. Therefore, the creditor violated the stay. Section 542(a) requires turnover to the trustee of property of the estate that the trustee may use, sell or lease. Section 363(e) requires the court to provide adequate protection “upon request of an entity with an interest in property”. Thus, the creditor must return possession of the car to the estate (the court refers to the “debtor”, not the trustee) and seek adequate protection. The creditor may not place the burden of seeking an adequate protection order on the debtor or the estate. In reaching this ruling, the Seventh Circuits joins the majority of courts in the Sixth, Eighth, Ninth and Tenth Circuits. Thompson v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp., 566 F. 3d 699 (7th Cir. 2009).
- 1.1.gggg Bankruptcy court may extend stay to nondebtors if it has jurisdiction and the preliminary injunction standards are met. The debtor and various nondebtors, including the debtor’s CEO, were defendants in prepetition litigation. Continuation of the action would have taken a substantial portion of the CEO’s time and prevented him from attending to the chapter 11 case. After bankruptcy, the debtor sought a 60-day preliminary injunction against continuation of the action against the nondebtors. Issuance of a preliminary injunction requires three distinct elements. The bankruptcy court must have jurisdiction over the injunction proceeding, there must be grounds to extend the automatic stay and the plaintiff must meet the traditional grounds for a preliminary injunction. Section 105(a) analysis alone is not adequate, as section 105(a) is not an independent source of subject matter jurisdiction or substantive rights and permits only enforcement of other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. A proceeding is “related to” a title 11 case and therefore within the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction if its outcome could conceivably have any effect on the estate. Here, the potential distraction of the CEO and other key reorganization personnel, among other things, provides the jurisdictional link. A court may extend the automatic stay to nondebtors in unusual circumstances, such as where there is an identity of interest between the debtor and nondebtor or where the third-party action will have an adverse impact on the debtor’s ability to reorganize. The facts here constitute unusual circumstances, because of the effect on the reorganization and the debtor’s possible indemnification obligations to the nondebtors. Because the standards for issuance of a preliminary injunction were present, the court enjoins the third party action for 60 days. In re Phila. Newspapers, LLC, 407 B.R. 606 (E.D. Pa. 2009).

- 1.1.hhhh Federal civil forfeiture action is excepted from the automatic stay. After the trustee sold the debtor's real property, the U.S. Attorney brought a civil forfeiture action against the trustee to seize the sale proceeds on the ground that the real property, and therefore its proceeds, were the product of criminal activity. Section 362(b)(4) excepts from the automatic stay an action to enforce police or regulatory powers, including an action to enforce a judgment other than a money judgment. An action comes within the exception if the action is to further public policy and not for a pecuniary purpose. A forfeiture action is punishment and therefore comes within the exception. The recognition of the action as within the exception does not conflict with the subordination of forfeiture claims under section 726(a)(5), because a forfeiture relates back to the time of the criminal activity and therefore prevents the property from becoming property of the estate and subject to the Code's distribution scheme. Jahn v. U.S. (In re Winpar Hospitality Chattanooga, LLC), 401 B.R. 289 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2009).
- 1.1.iiii Adversary proceeding to collect WARN Act payments for prepetition termination violates the automatic stay. The debtor terminated most of its employees before bankruptcy. After bankruptcy, a terminated employee brought a class action adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy court against the debtor and its sole shareholder. The automatic stay prohibits any attempt to collect a prepetition debt, even in the bankruptcy court. The WARN Act claims for a prepetition termination arose prepetition. Therefore, the adversary proceeding violates the automatic stay. Bridges v. Continentalafa Disp. Co. (In re Continentalafa Disp. Co.), 403 B.R. 653 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2009).
- 1.1.jjjj Action in the bankruptcy court does not violate the automatic stay. The debtor's mortgage lender filed a proof of claim in the debtor's chapter 13 case for principal and interest owing under the mortgage and for missed prepetition tax and insurance escrow payments, with a notation on the proof of claim that the debtor's monthly mortgage payments would increase to a specified amount to make up the missed escrow payments. The debtor objected to the claim and sought to hold the lender in contempt for violating the automatic stay by an act to collect or recover a prepetition claim. The automatic stay does not apply to any actions expressly permitted under the Bankruptcy Code. It applies only to actions outside the bankruptcy court forum. An action taken in the case does not violate the stay's purposes of protecting the debtor from litigation and centralizing administration of disputes in the bankruptcy court and can be addressed immediately by the bankruptcy court. Therefore, the lender's filing of its proof of claim, even if wrong, does not violate the stay. Campbell v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 545 F.3d 348 (5th Cir. 2008).
- 1.1.kkkk An action to enforce a perfected judicial lien is not excepted from the automatic stay. The creditors sued the debtor before bankruptcy, obtained an order for attachment of real and personal property and levied the attachments on real property and intangible personal property. Before the creditor obtained a judgment, the debtor filed bankruptcy. Applicable nonbankruptcy law in this state grants priority to a creditor levying on real property against later purchasers, but the judicial lien on the real property is not enforceable unless the creditor obtains a judgment in the underlying action. The state law does not similarly grant retroactive priority to an attachment of intangible personal property. The trustee's strong-arm power under section 544(a) permits the trustee to avoid an interest in real property that is not perfected against a bona fide purchaser of the real property as of the petition date. Section 362(b)(3) excepts from the automatic stay any act to perfect an interest in property under a statute authorizing perfection in accordance with section 546(b). Section 546(b) applies to any generally applicable law, not only a purchase money security interest and a mechanics lien, that permits perfection that takes priority over an interest acquired later. The real property lien was already perfected, and any act to obtain a judgment would be an act to enforce, not to perfect, the judgment. The state law here does not, once a judgment is obtained, grant the judicial lien on the intangible personal property priority over intervening interests. Therefore, the judicial lien on the real property and on the intangible personal property both fail the tests of section 362(b)(3), and continuation of the state court action is not excepted from the automatic stay. The bankruptcy court does not abuse its discretion in denying stay relief in the case, as to the personal property lien because it does not satisfy section 546(b)'s relation back test and as to the real property lien because stay relief could prevent orderly administration of property of the estate. Ivester v. Miller, 398 B.R. 408 (M.D.N.C. 2008).

1.1.III Police or regulatory power exception applies to state court action for money damages.

Shortly before bankruptcy, New York sued the debtor in state court for money damages associated with environmental contamination that the debtor, in part, had caused. The state court entered a default judgment against the debtor after bankruptcy and after New York had filed a proof of claim in the bankruptcy case for the damages. The police or regulatory power exception to the automatic stay itself contains an exception for any act to enforce a money judgment. Obtaining a judgment, even for past environmental response costs, does not amount to enforcement of a judgment. Therefore, the default judgment did not violate the automatic stay. Jurisdiction over civil proceedings in a bankruptcy case is nonexclusive. Therefore, New York's filing of a proof of claim does not give the bankruptcy court exclusive jurisdiction over New York's claim against the debtor such as would oust the state court of jurisdiction to enter the default judgment against the debtor after the filing of the proof of claim. In re Mystic Tank Lines Corp., 544 F.3d 524 (3d Cir. 2008).

1.1.mmmm Application of the automatic stay to a prepetition action for estate causes of action against a third parties requires the trustee to take "official action".

A bondholder brought an action in district court against the issuer before its bankruptcy, its sole shareholder and its president for tortious interference, fraudulent conveyance, breach of fiduciary duty and alter ego liability. The issuer's bankruptcy trustee sought a stay. Standing to bring an action is determined when it is commenced. The later bankruptcy filing, which may have divested the plaintiff bondholder of the claims, did not affect the plaintiff's standing. The trustee did not take any "official action" to raise the automatic stay and was not yet pursuing any of the plaintiff's claims on behalf of the estate. Therefore, the district court refused to apply the automatic stay to the action, noting, however, that the plaintiff assumed the risk that the action might be in violation of the stay and therefore void. Taberna Capital Mgmt., LLC v. Dunmore, 392 B.R. 559 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

1.1.nnnn Safe harbor applies to secured subordinated notes issued by a mortgage conduit.

The debtor originated mortgage loans. It sold them to a commercial paper conduit, which issued senior and subordinated notes secured by a security interest in the mortgage loans to fund the mortgage loans' purchase price. The debtor purchased the subordinated notes from the conduit and financed the purchase by reselling them to the conduit sponsor under a repurchase agreement. After bankruptcy, the conduit sponsor terminated the repurchase agreements and foreclosed on the subordinated notes. Section 101(47) defines repurchase agreement to include an agreement to transfer "interests in ... mortgage loans". Section 101(51) defines security interest as a consensual lien, and section 101(37) defines lien as "a charge against or interest in property". Therefore, the secured subordinated notes are an interest in the mortgage loans that the conduit owns, and the repurchase agreement here qualifies as a safe harbor repurchase agreement under section 101(47). Am. Home Mortgage Inv. Corp. v. Lehman Bros. Inc. (In re Am. Home Mortgage Holdings, Inc.), 388 B.R. 69 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).

1.1.oooo Automatic stay safe harbor applies to mortgage loan repurchase agreements but not mortgage servicing agreements.

The debtor originated mortgages. It entered into a contract with a financial institution to transfer the mortgages to the financial institution in exchange for cash and an agreement to transfer the mortgages back to the debtor within 180 days for the same amount of cash plus a "Pricing Differential" that was based on the number of days between the transfer and the re-transfer. The contract also provided that the debtor retain the right to designate the mortgage servicer. The financial institution paid less for the mortgages purchased on this "servicing retained" basis than it would for those purchased on a "servicing released” basis. The contracts are repurchase agreements, as defined in section 101(47), as they meet all the definition’s essential terms. Accordingly, the section 559 repurchase agreement safe harbor from the automatic stay applies, and the financial institution may close out or terminate the repurchase agreements without leave of or interference from the court. As a repurchase agreement, the contract is also a “securities contract” subject to the safe harbor of section 555. The servicing rights, however, are severable from the contract’s repurchase agreement portion. The mortgage purchase price depends in part on whether the buyer also acquires servicing rights. In addition, the right to service is separate from the mortgage itself, so the servicing agreement is not a repurchase agreement that benefits from the safe harbor. Calyon New York Branch v. Am. Home Mortgage Corp. (In re Am. Home Mortgage Corp.), 379 B.R. 503 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).

- 1.1.pppp Stay violation may be willful despite creditor’s reasonable belief the debtor had not filed bankruptcy. The creditor repossessed the debtor’s asset after the debtor filed bankruptcy. The debtor’s counsel telephoned the creditor to advise of the bankruptcy filing and demand return of the asset but did not send documentation to show the filing. The creditor doubted that the debtor had filed, because counsel did not send documentation, counsel’s telephone demeanor suggested to the creditor that the debtor was trying to scam the creditor into returning the asset, and because the creditor believed the debtor had recently filed a previous case and was ineligible to refile. The creditor did not, however, independently investigate whether the debtor had filed, and it retained the repossessed asset. The creditor’s stay violation was willful, despite its doubts. A stay violation is willful if the creditor knew of the stay and intended the actions that constituted the violation. Specific intent to violate the stay is not required, nor does any reasonable doubt or belief excuse a willful violation. Willfulness is to be liberally construed to encourage stay compliance. Finally the debtor need prove willfulness only by a preponderance of the evidence and need not meet a clear and convincing standard of proof. Johnson v. Smith (In re Johnson), 501 F.3d 1163 (10th Cir. 2007).
- 1.1.qqqq NLRB’s filing notice of successor back pay liability violates the stay. The court approved sale procedures for a sale of substantially all of the estate’s assets as a going concern. The NLRB had previously asserted unfair labor practice claims against the debtor. It filed a “Notice of Pendency of Unfair Labor Practice Charges” with the bankruptcy court, in which it asserted that a purchaser of the debtor’s assets may be required to remedy the unfair labor practices by, inter alia, making employees whole, and that potential purchasers may wish to reflect the potential liability in their bids. The NLRB withdrew the notice shortly after it was filed. The court could not determine whether the notice chilled the bidding. The notice does not fall under the police or regulatory stay exception, which exempts only proceedings by a governmental unit to prevent or stop violations or to determine damages, not a proceeding to collect a prepetition claim such as a back pay award for a prepetition period. The notice therefore violates the stay. The NLRB argued that the automatic stay does not apply to a filing in the bankruptcy court, but the court does not address this issue. In re Pan Am. Hosp. Corp., 364 B.R. 832 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007).
- 1.1.rrrr “Police or regulatory” exception does not permit a state to retain assets to conduct a state liquidation procedure. The state Director of Insurance obtained a state court order of conservation and injunctive relief against an automobile service contract provider and also requested an order to wind down and terminate the provider’s business. Before the state court ruled on that request, the provider filed bankruptcy. Although the provider was in a regulated business that permitted the Director to bring an enforcement action to wind down its business, the automatic stay’s police or regulatory exception does not permit the state, under the guise of a regulatory proceeding, to conduct a parallel liquidation case process. The exception is designed to permit the state “to prevent or stop violation of fraud, environmental protection, consumer protection, safety, or similar police or regulatory laws”, not to protect creditors of a regulated business that is otherwise eligible for bankruptcy. Here, because the debtor has stopped conducting business, application of the exception would not further the state's legitimate consumer protection interest that the exception protects. In re Automotive Profs. Inc., 370 B.R. 161 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007).

1.1.ssss Action against nondebtor subsidiary's assets does not violate the automatic stay.

A lessor brought an ejectment action against the debtor's nondebtor subsidiary. The debtor does not have an identity of interest with the subsidiary, which is a separate legal entity. The subsidiary's property is not property of the debtor's estate. Finally, the potential loss of value to the subsidiary resulting from the ejectment action does not affect the debtor's interest in the subsidiary, which remains the same; it affects only the value of that interest, which the automatic stay does not protect. Therefore, the action does not violate the automatic stay. The bankruptcy court might, however, enjoin the ejectment action under section 105 in appropriate circumstances. Kreiser v. Goldberg, 478 F.3d 209 (4th Cir. 2007).

1.1.tttt False Claims Act action is excepted from automatic stay.

A relator brought a qui tam action against a hospital under the False Claims Act for fraudulent Medicare payment requests; the government intervened as to some but not all of the claims. The hospital later filed chapter 11. Some courts have adopted a "pecuniary purpose" test to gauge the reach of section 362(b)(4)'s police or regulatory power exception to the automatic stay. Under this test, the exception applies if the action relates to the public safety or welfare but does not apply if the government is pursuing its pecuniary interest in the debtor's property. Other courts have adopted the broader "pecuniary advantage" test, under which the automatic stay applies to the government's action only if the action would give the government a pecuniary advantage over other creditors, whatever interest the government is pursuing. The exception to the exception—the enforcement of a money judgment—supports the use of the pecuniary advantage test. Thus, an action to fix damages would not be stayed, although enforcement would be. False Claims Act cases have a pecuniary purpose (restitution) but also permit treble damages, which evidence a police or regulatory purpose of deterring fraud. The government's action is therefore not stayed. The relator's action on the remaining claims is stayed, however, because the police or regulatory power exception applies only to an action by a governmental unit. U.S. ex rel. Fullington v. Parkway Hosp., Inc., 351 B.R. 280 (E.D.N.Y. 2006).

1.1.uuuu Reallocation of LLC ownership interests violates the automatic stay.

The debtor and his partner owned interests in an LLC. Before bankruptcy, the debtor agreed to allow the partner to control the debtor's interest, to make capital contributions, and to have a lien on the debtor's interest to secure repayment of the debtor's obligation to make comparable capital contributions. Before and after bankruptcy, the partner, but not the debtor, made capital contributions, and after bankruptcy the partner reallocated the ownership percentages in the LLC, purportedly to reflect his contributions. Doing so violates the automatic stay. There was no evidence that the reallocation properly reflected the differing capital contributions; the partner should have sought relief from the stay or a bankruptcy court ruling that the reallocation did not infringe the debtor's interest in the LLC. In addition, to the extent the reallocation depended on enforcement of the lien the debtor had granted to the partner, the lien enforcement violated the stay. Braunstein v. Panagiotou (In re McCabe), 345 B.R. 1 (D. Mass. 2006).

1.1.vvvv Private antitrust litigation to enjoin estate asset purchase violates the automatic stay.

The bankruptcy court approved a sale under section 363, which all parties in interest in the case supported, of the debtor's cable television networks. A cable channel whose signal the debtor and the buyer had refused to carry sued the buyer, but not the debtor or the estate, in the federal district court in another state on private antitrust grounds to enjoin the buyer from purchasing, but not the estate from selling, the estate's assets. Despite the exclusions, the action still violates the automatic stay. The action is an "act to ... exercise control over property of the estate,” stayed under section 362(a)(3), because it would interfere with the disposition of the estate’s assets. The automatic stay does not except private antitrust actions. A governmental unit might pursue its police or regulatory powers under the section 362(b)(4) stay exception, but a private party has no such protection under the statute, and there is no “unwritten” automatic stay exception for private antitrust actions. The bankruptcy court has broad “related to” jurisdiction under section 1334(b), so it may hear the plaintiff’s antitrust complaint in connection with the motion to approve the sale; alternatively, the plaintiff may seek stay relief to pursue a damage claim against the buyer or other relief that does not interfere with the asset sale. But it may not seek to enjoin the buyer in another court. Adelphia Communications Corp. v. The America Channel, LLC (In re Adelphia Communications Corp.), 345 B.R. 69 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

1.1.wwww Automatic stay protects property in which estate has only a disputed interest.

During marriage, the debtor’s wife bought real property in a community property state. The debtor filed bankruptcy on the eve of foreclosure on the property and notified the lender of the bankruptcy and of his claim of a community property interest in the property. The creditor foreclosed anyway, and the debtor sued for a stay violation. The district court later determined that the debtor did not have an interest in the property. Despite the later determination, the foreclosure violated the stay. The stay’s purpose is to protect the debtor and other creditors from potential dismemberment of the estate by a creditors’ race to the courthouse and asset seizures. If the automatic stay did not apply to property whose ownership was in dispute, creditors could often resolve the dispute as a practical matter by seizing the property, and the estate would often be hard pressed to contest the ownership issue later. Therefore, the automatic stay applies equally to property where the debtor’s interest is disputed but at least colorable. Brown v. Chesnut (In re Chesnut), 422 F.3d 298 (5th Cir. 2005).

1.1.xxxx Automatic stay may apply to an action against third party who holds estate property. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor directed its bank to transfer funds to the creditor. The bank failed to do so. After bankruptcy, the creditor sued the bank but not the debtor in state court for breaching its obligations to the creditor. The action violates the automatic stay. Even though the debtor was not named in the action, recovery against the bank would affect property of the estate, as the bank claimed no interest in the funds in the bank account. The creditor may not circumvent the automatic stay by action against the bank and not the debtor. Amedisys v. Nat’l Century Fin. Enters., Inc. (In re Nat. Century Fin. Enters., Inc.), 423 F.3d 567 (6th Cir. 2005).

1.1.yyyy Case dismissal annuls automatic stay.

The debtor filed two cases, both of which were dismissed. While the cases were pending, an unscheduled creditor, who did not have notice or knowledge of the cases, filed a state court action against the debtor and obtained a default judgment and writ of execution. In the debtor’s third case, the court allowed the creditor’s secured claim. Although the writ of execution was obtained in violation of the automatic stay in the first two cases, section 349 has the effect of annulling the stay. Although section 349 does not expressly so provide, it reinstates any transfer avoided under the avoiding powers (including section 549) and reverts property of the estate in the entity in whom it was vested immediately before the commencement of the case. Its purpose, therefore, is to restore matters to how they were before the bankruptcy, and its effect is therefore to annul the automatic stay. Although annulment would prejudice creditors in the third case, section 349(b) does not permit the court to exercise equitable discretion. Industrial Bank N.A. v. Brown (In re Brown), 330 B.R. 549 (N.D. Tex. 2005).

1.1.zzzz Reinstatement of dismissed chapter 13 case does not retroactively reinstate automatic stay. The bankruptcy court dismissed the debtor’s chapter 13 case. The debtor did not obtain a stay pending appeal, so the secured lender foreclosed. The B.A.P. determined that the dismissal was improper because the bankruptcy court did not give the debtor adequate notice of the grounds for dismissal and an opportunity to defend and reinstated the case. The reinstatement did not give the debtor the right to set aside the foreclosure sale as held in violation of the automatic stay, because the case reinstatement did not retroactively reinstate the stay, which terminated upon the dismissal under section 362(c) when the foreclosed property was no longer property of the estate. The court distinguishes In re Krueger, 88 B.R. 238 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1988), in which the bankruptcy court's due process violation resulted in the debtor not even having notice of the dismissal until after the foreclosure sale. Lomagno v. Salomon Bros. Realty Corp. (In re Lomagno), 429 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 2005).

- 1.1.aaaaa Stock sales that may impair NOL's do not violate the automatic stay. If the debtor's shareholders sold enough stock, it could result in a change of control that would substantially limit the reorganized debtor's ability to use its net operating loss carryforwards under the Internal Revenue Code. The stock sale might not, however, violate the automatic stay. Although the NOL's may be property of the estate, the stock sale is not an "act to obtain possession of property of the estate or of property from the estate or to exercise control over property of the estate." Any effect on the property of the estate would not occur because of any property of the estate that the shareholder possessed or controlled. Accordingly, section 362 does not apply. Since section 105 permits only implementation of other Code provisions, it cannot be used to enjoin a stock sale that is not subject to the stay. However, the analysis is only dicta, because the appeal was dismissed as moot on other grounds. In re UAL Corp., 412 F.3d 775 (7th Cir. 2005).
- 1.1.bbbbb Stay applies to claims asserted in one bankruptcy court in "dueling" bankruptcies. A creditor filed a proof of claim in the debtor's bankruptcy case. The debtor counterclaimed. Shortly before the bankruptcy court awarded attorney's fees to the debtor on his counterclaim, the creditor filed its own bankruptcy case in a different bankruptcy court. The first bankruptcy court's attorney's fee award against the creditor violated the automatic stay in the creditor's bankruptcy case. Although the creditor initiated the proceeding in the first debtor's bankruptcy case by filing a proof of claim, the debtor's counterclaim is an analytically distinct proceeding for purposes of applying the automatic stay. Therefore, the counterclaim was an action or proceeding against the creditor that was stayed upon the creditor's bankruptcy filing. Snavely v. Miller (In re Miller), 397 F.3d 726 (9th Cir. 2005).
- 1.1.ccccc Presentment of postdated checks does not violate the stay. Days before bankruptcy, the debtor gave a payday lender four postdated checks in repayment of a loan taken out that day. The lender's presentment of the checks did not violate the automatic stay, because section 362(b)(11) contains an express exception for "presentment of a negotiable instrument and the giving of notice of and protesting dishonor of such an instrument." The exception is not limited to situations in which the holder expects dishonor as a prerequisite to an action against a third party. The court does not address whether the honor of the check, transferring funds out of the bank account, might violate the stay, but the lender concedes that the transfer is a voidable postpetition transfer that the trustee may recover under section 549(a). Thomas v. Money Mart Fin. Servs., Inc. (In re Thomas), 317 B.R. 776 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2004).
- 1.1.ddddd Police or regulatory power exception applies to action by a different governmental unit. The State Attorney General brought a prepetition action against the debtor for violation of the federal Clayton Act, which may be enforced by the U.S. Attorney, a state attorney general, or a private party. Section 362(b)(4) excepts an action by a governmental unit "to enforce such governmental unit's police and regulatory power." This should not be read to require that the governmental unit enforce only its own laws. It may be enforcing its police powers even though it is relying on the laws of a different jurisdiction. It also does not matter that the law might be enforced by a private party, because when the government is acting, it is enforcing its police powers, not private powers, assuming that the other requirements of the exception (public, nonpecuniary purpose) are met. Lockyer v. Mirant Corp., 398 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2005).

- 1.1.eeeee Creditor’s complaint to real estate licensing board does not violate stay. The creditor claimed that the debtor real estate broker had misappropriated a deposit. After bankruptcy, the creditor filed a licensing complaint before the state licensing board, which has authority only to suspend or revoke a license, not to order restitution. Filing a complaint before a licensing board comes within the governmental police or regulatory power exception to the stay. The exception is not limited to proceedings that the government initiates. McMullen v. Sevigny, 386 F.3d 321 (1st Cir. 2004).
- 1.1.fffff Refusal to return repossessed car violates the stay. Under Georgia law, prepetition repossession of a car does not prevent the car from becoming property of the estate. The debtor retains title until the lender takes the necessary disposition or retention steps under the U.C.C. Therefore, the creditor’s postpetition refusal to turn over the car violated the stay. Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Rozier (In re Rozier), 376 F.3d 1323 (11th Cir. 2004).
- 1.1.ggggg Section 549(c) is not an exception to the automatic stay. Whether or not the foreclosing creditor knew of the filing of the bankruptcy petition, the foreclosure sale conducted after the commencement of the case was void as a violation of the automatic stay. Section 549(c), which protects a good faith purchaser of real estate in a postpetition transaction, may be used only as a defense to an action by the trustee to avoid the postpetition transfer of estate property. It is not an exception to the automatic stay and therefore may not be pleaded to validate a sale that is void because it was conducted in violation of the stay. Bustamante v. Cueva (In re Cueva), 371 F.3d 232 (5th Cir. 2004). Accord 40235 Washington St. Corp. v. Lusardi, 329 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 1.1.hhhhh Creditor does not violate automatic stay by retaining possession to protect possessory lien. The creditor had towed the debtor’s car before bankruptcy and claimed a statutory possessory lien for towing and storage charges under state law. After bankruptcy, the debtor demanded turnover, which the creditor refused, so as not to lose its possessory lien. After the bankruptcy court ordered turnover conditioned upon the grant of a lien on title to secure towing and storage charges, the creditor complied, and the debtor sued for violation of the automatic stay. The retention of possession was an action to maintain or continue perfection of a lien under section 362(b)(3) and therefore did not violate the stay. The possessory lien was senior to subsequent liens, so section 546(b)(1)(B) (protecting retroactive postpetition perfection) applied and exempted the action from the stay under section 362(b)(3). The court notes that the debtor did not seek sanctions for failure to turnover, but fails to address whether the creditor retention of possession constituted an unsatisfied demand for adequate protection that might have excused turnover under sections 542(a) and 363. Hayden v. Wells (In re Hayden), 308 B.R. 428 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).
- 1.1.iiii Automatic stay has extraterritorial reach. After bankruptcy, a creditor brought an arbitration proceeding in Switzerland against the debtor, obtained an award, domesticated the award in an Italian court, and registered a lien on the debtor’s real property in Italy. The court declared the lien registration void ab initio because the registration violated the automatic stay. The court’s jurisdiction under section 1334(e) includes property, “wherever located,” even outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. Comity does not require abstention or deference to the Italian judgment, because section 1334(e) explicitly grants jurisdiction over the foreign property. Still, the jurisdictional grant does not preclude foreign courts from exercising jurisdiction over property located within their countries, and because the property is located in Italy, the Italian courts must determine its ultimate fate, thereby rendering somewhat uncertain the effect of the court’s decision that the Italian registration was void ab initio. In this sense, the extraterritorial reach of the automatic stay is only in personam, not in rem. Sinatra v. Gucci (In re Gucci), 309 B.R. 679 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).

- 1.1.jjjjj Automatic stay does not prevent objection to debtor in possession-creditor's proof of claim. The creditor was a debtor in possession in an unrelated chapter 11 case. The debtor in possession in this case objected to the creditor's proof of claim. The creditor argued that the debtor in possession required stay relief in the creditor's own chapter 11 case. The court rejects the argument, holding that the automatic stay in the creditor's case does not apply where the debtor in possession in that case is acting as the claimant. Hi-Tech Comm. Corp. v. Poughkeepsie Business Park, LLC (In re Wheatfield Business Park, LLC), 308 B.R. 463 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).
- 1.1.kkkkk Action to reduce maintenance payments to debtor may violate automatic stay. The debtor and her husband divorced before bankruptcy. The divorce court had ordered the husband to pay her maintenance payments and had ordered the debtor to pay the mortgage on their house. She missed payments, and the lender foreclosed. After bankruptcy, the husband sought reduction of his maintenance payments to the debtor to compensate for the losses he sustained by the debtor's failure to pay the mortgage. The husband's divorce court action violated the automatic stay. Courts have generally construed the alimony and maintenance exception to the automatic stay in section 362(b)(2)(A) ("the establishment or modification of an order for alimony, maintenance, or support") to apply to an action against the debtor, not to apply to an action that would reduce payments to the debtor. Moreover, in the case, the husband's action was effectively to recover through reduction of maintenance payments a dischargeable claim against the debtor. In re Harris, 310 B.R. 395 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2004).
- 1.1.lllll Coercive discharge settlement negotiations may violate the automatic stay. The creditor had filed a complaint objecting to the discharge of the debtor, a real estate broker. In the course of settlement negotiations between counsel, the creditor's counsel threatened to seek revocation of the debtor's license from the state real estate commission if the matter did not settle. The debtor sued the creditor for violating the automatic stay by making a coercive threat in the negotiations. The First Circuit concludes that settlement negotiations over discharge are permissible, but that, as in reaffirmation negotiations, a coercive or harassing threat violates the automatic stay. The court remands to the bankruptcy court to determine whether this particular threat was coercive. Diamond v. Premier Capital, Inc. (In re Diamond), 346 F.3d 224 (1st Cir. 2003).
- 1.1.mmmmm Contract may not expand scope of automatic stay exceptions. The debtor's power purchase agreement stated that it was a "forward contract," with the intention that forward contract safe harbor provisions would apply and the automatic stay would not prevent termination. However, the counterparty was the Bonneville Power Administration. The Bankruptcy Code limits the definition of "forward contract" to a contract with a "forward contract merchant." "Forward contract merchant" is defined as "a person whose business" consists of forward contract trading. Because the debtor's counterparty was a governmental unit and therefore not a "person," the Code's forward contract safe harbor provisions do not apply. What's more, the parties cannot make them applicable by contract. Only Congress may define the scope of the automatic stay. In re Mirant Corp., 303 B.R. 319 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2003).
- 1.1.nnnnn Wisconsin wage lien statute is not subject to the automatic stay. A Wisconsin statute grants a lien against all of the assets of an employer to secure any unpaid wages. The statute provides, "the lien shall take precedence over all other debts, judgments, decrees, liens or mortgages" The employee perfected its lien after bankruptcy, relying on the retroactive perfection provision of section 546(b)(1) and the related exception to the automatic stay in section 362(b)(3). Although the statute does not specifically provide that the wage lien relates back to prime any intervening liens, such specific language is not required to come within the protection of section 546(b)(1). The statute's language was broad enough to prime any liens, whenever they attach and whenever perfected. The language of section 546(b)(1) looks only to whether the state lien primes preexisting liens. In re AR Accessories Group, Inc., 345 F.3d 454 (7th Cir. 2003).

- 1.1.00000 Improper chapter 13 petition does not create automatic stay. Upon dismissing the debtor's second chapter 13 case, the bankruptcy court issued a 180-day bar to refiling another bankruptcy case. The debtor moved for reconsideration of the 180-day bar. While that motion, which was ultimately granted, was pending, the debtor filed a third chapter 13 case in a different judicial district. The new judge held that the petition filed in violation of the other court's bar order did not trigger the automatic stay. The Ninth Circuit affirms, but later withdraws its opinion. Umali v. Dhanani (In re Umali), 345 F.3d 818 (9th Cir. 2003); opinion withdrawn, 382 F.3d 1158 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 1.1.ppppp Section 549(c) is not an exception to the automatic stay. The Ninth Circuit brushes aside dicta in several prior decisions to rule that section 549(c), which protects a good faith purchaser of real estate in a post-petition transaction, is not an exception to the automatic stay. The court rules that section 549(c) applies only to transfers by the debtor, not to a foreclosure sale that violates the automatic stay, because a transfer in violation of the automatic stay is void, not merely voidable. The effect is that the property interests remain the same as if no transfer had been attempted. The court follows the recent decision of the Ninth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel reaching the same conclusion. In re Mitchell, 279 B.R. 839 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002). 40235 Washington Street, Corporation v. Lusardi, 329 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 1.1.qqqqq Aircraft financiers' section 1110 protection is absolute. The lender failed to perfect an aircraft security interest that would otherwise be subject to the protections of section 1110. The failure to perfect does not affect the lender's right to protection, and section 1110 trumps even the trustee's power to avoid the unperfected security interest under section 544(a). Vanguard Airlines, Inc. v. International Aero Components, Inc. (In re Vanguard Airlines, Inc.), 295 B.R. 908 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2003).
- 1.1.rrrrr Automatic stay does not apply to collection of debt declared to be non-dischargeable. The creditor obtained a nondischargeability judgment against the debtor. The creditor promptly recorded an abstract of judgment in the County Recorder's office, so as to obtain a lien on the debtor's real property. However, the bankruptcy case was still open and the trustee had not yet abandoned the property. Accordingly, the debtor had no interest in real property at the time the abstract was recorded. The Ninth Circuit rules that the recordation of the abstract did not violate the automatic stay, because the debt had been held nondischargeable and also because the debtor did not have any interest in the real property and the abstract of judgment did not affect the estate's interest in the property. Palm v. Cady (In re Cady), 315 F.3d 1121 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 1.1.sssss Creditor's internal record keeping did not violate stay. During the chapter 13 case, the bank continued to accrue post-petition attorney's fees incurred in prosecuting its claim against the debtor and recorded those fees in the debtor's file at the bank. The bank did not, however, assert those fees in the chapter 13 case or against the debtor in any other way. Such internal bookkeeping entries do not violate the automatic stay. Mann v. Chase Manhattan Mortgage Corp., 316 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003).
- 1.1.ttttt Automatic stay does not stay appeal that may set precedent against the debtor. The debtor, his wholly owned corporation, and two other defendants were found liable in tort litigation. All four defendants appealed. While the appeal was pending, the debtor filed his chapter 11 case. The Second Circuit rules that the automatic stay applies to stay any further proceedings on the appeal by the debtor and to the appeal by his wholly owned corporation, because determination of the claim against the corporation would effectively determine the claim against the debtor. The stay does not apply to the appeal by the other two defendants, however, even though the appellate decision might have precedential affect against the debtor or might be used through offensive collateral estoppel against the debtor. Queenie, Ltd. v. Nygard Intl., 321 F.3d 282 (2d Cir. 2003).

- 1.1.uuuuu Automatic stay prevents enforcement of bankruptcy court order. The chapter 11 debtor's landlord obtained an order from the bankruptcy court requiring the payment of post-petition rent. When the debtor-in-possession did not pay, the landlord obtained a writ of execution from the clerk of the bankruptcy court and levied on the debtor-in-possession's bank account. The Ninth Circuit rules that the levy of the writ of execution violated the automatic stay of section 362(a)(3), even though the order that the writ sought to enforce was issued by the bankruptcy court against the debtor-in-possession for the payment of a post-petition obligation. Kir Temecula v. LPM Corp. (In re LPM Corp.), 300 F.3d 1134 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 1.1.vvvvv Automatic stay imposes affirmative duty to dismiss collection action. A creditor filed a collection action against the debtor shortly after the bankruptcy filing. The debtor's lawyer advised the creditor's lawyer by telephone and fax of the bankruptcy petition and demanded that the creditor dismiss the action within 14 days. The creditor did not dismiss for 23 days. The Ninth Circuit holds that the failure to dismiss promptly constituted a continuation of the action that violated the automatic stay, subjecting the creditor and its counsel to sanctions. The Ninth Circuit rules that the automatic stay imposes an affirmative duty to dismiss an action promptly, because the mere pendency of the action creates a threat to the debtor of a default judgment, which the automatic stay is designed to prevent. Eskanos & Adler, P.C. v. Leetien, 309 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 1.1.wwww Stay relief required for litigation over D&O insurance policies. The debtor in possession owned a D&O policy that insured not only the D's & O's, but also the debtor, for its own potential liability for securities law violations. The insurer sought to rescind the policy and had brought a declaratory judgment action before bankruptcy to do so. Because the policy itself (as contrasted to its proceeds) is property of the estate, the insurer may not proceed with the declaratory judgment action without relief from the stay. Similarly, because the debtor had a right to some of the policy proceeds, relief from the stay is required before any of the policy proceeds may be used to pay defense costs of directors and officers. Adelphia Communications Corp. v. Associated Elec. and Gas Ins. Servs., Ltd. (In re Adelphia Communications Corp.), 285 B.R. 580 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2002).
- 1.1.xxxxx Automatic stay motion does not violate sovereign immunity. The state initiated proceedings against the debtor and its officers for non-payment of pre-petition vacation pay. The debtor brought a motion before the bankruptcy court to determine the scope and applicability of the automatic stay. On appeal, the district court rules that the motion does not violate the state's sovereign immunity. First, the proceeding is not a suit against the state, because the state is not named as a defendant, is not served with process, and is not compelled to appear in federal court. Second, the motion asks the bankruptcy court to exercise its power to determine the scope of a provision based on its jurisdiction over the debtor and its estate, not jurisdiction over the state or other creditors. It is the bankruptcy law, not the court's order, that operates to stay the state's action. In re Midway Airlines Corp., 283 B.R. 846 (E.D.N.C. 2002).
- 1.1.yyyyy Stay relief stipulation does not govern plan terms. The debtor and secured creditor entered into a stipulation for relief from the stay, effective some months later, if the debtor did not make certain payments during the chapter 11 case. Before that deadline, the debtor proposed and confirmed a chapter 11 plan that was inconsistent with the stay relief stipulation. The Ninth Circuit rules that the stay relief stipulation does not restrict the terms of a subsequent chapter 11 plan, unless the stipulation expressly so provides. Atalanta Corp. v. Allen (In re Allen), 300 F.3d 1055 (9th Cir. 2002).

- 1.1.zzzzz Ordinary commodity contracts are subject to the safe harbor of section 546(e). Morgan Stanley Capital Group had entered into a contract for the purchase and sale of natural gas to the debtor. Morgan Stanley received four payments in the ninety days before bankruptcy. The trustee sought to avoid the payments as preferences. The Fifth Circuit rules that the contract for the delivery of natural gas is a “forward contract” within the meaning of section 101(25), because a “forward contract” encompasses all off-exchange forward contracts, even those for actual delivery of a commodity. The court then rules, without analysis, that Morgan Stanley is a “forward contract merchant,” as required to qualify under section 546(e). Finally, the court concludes that the payments were “settlement payments” within the meaning of section 101(51A), because that term includes any payments commonly made in the forward contract trade. Section 546(e) therefore prohibits avoidance of the transfers. Williams v. Morgan Stanley Capital Group, Inc. (In re Olympic Natural Gas Co.), 294 F.3d 737 (5th Cir. 2002).
- 1.1.aaaaa A bankruptcy court’s exclusive jurisdiction is coextensive with the automatic stay. The bankruptcy court has very broad jurisdiction. Where the automatic stay prohibits an action in another court, the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction is exclusive. Where an exception to the automatic stay applies, or where the bankruptcy court grants relief from the stay, its jurisdiction is concurrent. The non-bankruptcy court in which an action is pending may make a determination about the applicability of the automatic stay, but if it erroneously determines that the stay does not apply, the entire action may later be declared void. If the non-bankruptcy court is correct, it may issue orders that will later be enforced. Here, the Sixth Circuit reviews this question of exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction in the context of an action pending in a different district court from the district where the bankruptcy case was pending. Chao v. Hospital Staffing Services, Inc., 270 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 2001).
- 1.1.bbbbbb An FLSA “hot goods” action relating to billing records is subject to the automatic stay. The debtor health care provider failed during its chapter 11 case. It did not pay wages to employees who prepared billing records to bill patients for the last several weeks of operations. The Secretary of Labor brought an action under the Fair Labor Standards Act to enjoin the transportation of the billing records in interstate commerce as “hot goods.” The Sixth Circuit concludes that because the Secretary’s action was solely to collect wages owing to employees and because the goods would not compete in commerce with any other goods produced by an other manufacturers, the Secretary’s action did not meet the “public purpose” test of the police or regulatory power exception to the automatic stay in section 362(b)(4). Accordingly, the Secretary’s action was stayed. Chao v. Hospital Staffing Servs., Inc., 270 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 2001).
- 1.1.ccccc Automatic stay strictly enforced during involuntary gap. During the involuntary gap period, the debtor paid proceeds of collateral to its lender. The lender applied the proceeds to the loan. The lender’s application of the proceeds violated the automatic stay, which applies during the involuntary gap. Although the debtor is authorized under section 303(f) to use or dispose of property as though a petition had not been filed, it does not authorize the lender to apply proceeds received from the debtor during the gap to the loan. Bankvest Capital Corp. v. Fleet Boston (In re Bankvest Capital Corp.), 276 B.R. 12 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2002).
- 1.1.ddddd Italian automatic stay recognized in the United States. The Italian bankruptcy law, as the U.S. bankruptcy law does, includes as property of the estate all of the debtor’s property, wherever located. The Italian automatic stay also purports to have extraterritorial reach. The bankruptcy court here recognizes the extraterritorial reach of the Italian automatic stay in an ancillary case under section 304, on the ground that the United States cannot expect foreign courts to do the same if its courts do not equally recognize the impact in the United States of a foreign automatic stay. In re Aartimm, S.r.l., 278 B.R. 832 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2002).

- 1.1.eeeee Discovery against a debtor does not violate the automatic stay. The Rhode Island individual debtor was an officer of a corporate Pennsylvania debtor. An attorney in the Pennsylvania case sought an examination under Rule 2004 of the Rhode Island debtor. The 2004 examination request did not violate the automatic stay in the individual debtor's Rhode Island case. In re Carlson, 265 B.R. 346 (Bankr. D. R.I. 2001).
- 1.1.fyyyy Automatic stay does not prohibit post-bankruptcy creation and perfection of environmental super-lien. Under Massachusetts law, the Commonwealth may create, by recording in the land records office, a lien to secure all clean-up costs that the Commonwealth expended on the real property. The lien is superior to all previously perfected liens. Section 362(a)(4) of the automatic stay prohibits "any act to create, perfect, or enforce any lien," but the exception of section 362(b)(3) exempts "any act to perfect ... an interest in property" to the extent that the perfection primes prior liens. Because the Commonwealth's environmental super-lien is not created until the recording of the notice, the debtor argued that the Commonwealth's postpetition recording violated the automatic stay and did not come within the postpetition perfection exemption. The First Circuit rules otherwise, concluding that the prepetition right of the Commonwealth to file and thereby create and perfect the lien constitutes "an interest in property" that gets the benefit of the exception of section 362(b)(3). 229 Main St. Ltd. P'ship v. Mass. Dept. of Environmental Protection (In re 229 Main St. Ltd. P'ship), 262 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2001).
- 1.1.gyyyyy Bankruptcy trumps district court receivership. In the secured creditors' receivership proceeding in the district court, the district court enjoined all persons from commencing any action that affects the receivership estate. Nevertheless, several employees filed an involuntary bankruptcy case against the debtor. The district court held them in contempt of its prior order, despite their argument that the automatic stay prohibited the district court from acting any further with respect to this debtor. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit rules that the automatic stay applies to the district court and the receivership proceeding, that the district court's injunction could not determine or limit the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court as authorized under section 1334, and that in any event, a bankruptcy case was a far preferable means of liquidating the assets of a large corporation. Gilchrist v. General Electric Capital Corp., 262 F.3d 295 (4th Cir. 2001).
- 1.1.hyyyyy Bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction over automatic stay issues. After bankruptcy, an unsecured creditor brought an action against the debtor before a state agency. The debtor responded with a letter asserting the applicability of the automatic stay, but the state agency determined that the stay did not apply and proceeded to issue an order against the debtor. The debtor turned to the bankruptcy court for an injunction against the agency and the creditor. Relying on its decision in Gruntz v. County of Los Angeles (In re Gruntz), 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc), the Ninth Circuit affirms the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court to re-examine the automatic stay issue, despite the prior ruling of the state agency. The Ninth Circuit reasons that "Congress vested the federal courts with 'the final authority to determine the scope and applicability of the automatic stay,'" and that actions in violation of the automatic stay are void. Contractors' State Lic. Board v. Dunbar (In re Dunbar), 245 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2001).
- 1.1.iiiii State court may determine applicability of automatic stay. Disagreeing with the Ninth Circuit's decision in In re Gruntz, 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000), a New York bankruptcy court holds that a state court determination that its own order and actions did not violate the automatic stay binds the bankruptcy court under the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. In this case, the debtor was incarcerated post-petition under a pre-petition arrest warrant for contempt of the state court in a debt collection proceeding. The debtor unsuccessfully sought a state court order that the arrest violated the automatic stay. The state court's determination was binding, and the bankruptcy court would not revisit it. Siskin v. Complete Aircraft Servs., Inc. (In re Siskin), 258 B.R. 554 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2001).

- 1.1.jjjjjj Discovery against a debtor does not violate the automatic stay. The debtor was a co-defendant in an action pending in state court at the time the debtor filed her petition. The state court plaintiff sought discovery against the debtor to pursue the plaintiff's claim against the other defendant. On the debtor's motion for sanctions for violation of the automatic stay, the B.A.P. rules, in a matter of first impression that the stay does not prevent discovery against a debtor, even where the debtor is a co-defendant in the action. Groner v. Miller (In re Miller), 262 B.R. 499 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).
- 1.1.kkkkkk Government forfeiture action is excepted from the automatic stay. Section 362(b)(4), which excepts from the automatic stay an action by a governmental unit to enforce its police or regulatory power, was amended in 1998 to except the action from paragraphs (1) (2) (3), and (6) of section 362(a). Formerly, it excepted actions only from the stay under paragraph (1) or (2). The broadening of the language permits a governmental action for forfeiture of property used to commit a crime to proceed, despite the automatic stay. Such an action is not an action to enforce a money judgment and meets both the public purpose and nonpecuniary motive tests of the police or regulatory power exception to the automatic stay. United States v. Klein (In re Chapman), 264 B.R. 565 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).
- 1.1.llllll Government action against sub-prime lender is excepted from the automatic stay. A sub-prime lender filed a chapter 11 case, ceased business operations, agreed not to write any further loan originations, and began to liquidate under chapter 11. It sought to enjoin several states and the FTC under the automatic stay or by a preliminary injunction from pursuing regulatory actions that would enjoin further loan originations and would assess rescission and restitution amounts and civil penalties. The district court, on appeal, first determined that the actions were excepted from the automatic stay under section 362(b)(4), because the police and regulatory power exception is not limited to situations intended to prevent future harm and the pecuniary aspect of the restitution claim does not take it outside of the police or regulatory power exception. It then ruled that the bankruptcy court should not enjoin the action without a substantially greater showing than the risk of a potential increase in legal fees, inconsistent rulings, and diversion of the debtor's time, energy, and resources, because the exception to the automatic stay evidences a congressional policy favoring police or regulatory power litigation without a strong showing of serious adverse consequences to the estate. Federal Trade Commission v. First Alliance Mortgage Co. (In re First Alliance Mortgage Co.), 264 B.R. 634 (C.D. Cal. 2001).
- 1.1.mmmmmm Repatriation order violates automatic stay. The SEC obtained a judgment for securities fraud shortly before the debtor's bankruptcy. Between trial and entry of the judgment, the debtor transferred substantial assets to an asset protection trust. The SEC sought repatriation of the assets as a remedy for the debtors contempt for violating the judgment. The Second Circuit rules that the efforts to obtain repatriation constituted enforcement of the underlying money judgment and as such was prohibited by the exception to the exception for actions by a governmental unit in section 364(b)(4). More importantly, the Second Circuit rules that the 1998 amendments to section 362(b)(4) did nothing to affect the scope of the governmental unit exception to the automatic stay. SEC v. Brennan, 230 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2000).
- 1.1.nnnnnn Court award of sanctions is not subject to the automatic stay. The debtor was sanctioned before bankruptcy. The determination of the amount of the award was not stayed, based on both the pecuniary purpose test (is the government pursuing a pecuniary interest or a matter of public safety and welfare?) and the public policy test (is the government action to effectuate public policy or to adjudicate private rights?). Berg v. Good Samaritan Hospital (In re Berg), 230 F.3d 1165 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 1.1.oooooo Criminal prosecution with debt collection motive is not automatically stayed. The exception "of the commencement or continuation of a criminal action or proceeding against the debtor” contained in section 362(b)(1) of the automatic stay is absolute and does not admit of any exceptions, even if the prosecutor brings the criminal proceeding with a debt collection motive. A bankruptcy court may, however, enjoin a criminal proceeding under section 105 in appropriate circumstances. Gruntz v. County of Los Angeles (In re Gruntz), 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000) (overruling Hucke v. Oregon, 992 F.2d 950 (9th Cir. 1993)).

- 1.1.pppppp Qui tam (False Claims Act) action is excepted from the automatic stay. A private party relator brought a False Claims Act action against the debtor before bankruptcy. Even though the government had not substituted in as the plaintiff, the action was excepted from the automatic stay as a police or regulatory action brought by a governmental unit, because the action was brought in the name of the government and the government was the real party in interest. The fact that the action sought monetary damages did not affect the exception from the stay, although collection of any judgment would be stayed. United States ex rel. Doe v. X, Inc., 246 B.R. 817 (E.D. Va. 2000).
- 1.1.qqqqqq Any intentional act constitutes a willful stay violation. Although the creditor knew of the automatic stay, it mistakenly sent the debtor’s file to a law firm to initiate foreclosure proceedings. The resulting stay violation was “willful” under section 362(h). Once the creditor received notice, the burden is on the creditor to prevent violations of the automatic stay. Fleet Mortgage Group, Inc. v. Kanev, 196 F.3d 265 (1st Cir. 1999).
- 1.1.rrrrrr IRS statutory lien does not attach to post-petition after acquired property. The debtor received an inheritance post-petition which became property of the estate under section 541(a)(5). The IRS had perfected its tax lien against the debtor before bankruptcy and claimed that the lien attached to the after acquired property. In a case of first impression, the Third Circuit holds that section 362(a)(5) stays the attachment of the lien as “an act” to create a lien on property. United States v. Gold (In re Avis), 178 F.3d 718 (4th Cir. 1999).
- 1.1.ssssss Criminal proceedings exception to automatic stay does not encompass recording of criminal restitution lien. 18 U.S.C. § 3613 grants the United States a lien to secure a criminal restitution debt and provides that the lien is perfected against third parties when recorded. The criminal proceedings exception to the automatic stay of section 362(b)(1) does not apply to permit postpetition recording, because the purpose of the lien is compensatory, not punitive. Mayer v. United States (In re Reasonover), 236 B.R. 219 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1999).
- 1.1.tttttt “Hot goods” manufactured in violation of FLSA wage standards may not be sold after bankruptcy. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Secretary of Labor may enjoin the sale in interstate commerce of goods manufactured by employees who are paid less than the minimum wage. The district court holds that the Secretary’s action to enjoin the sale comes within the police or regulatory power exception to the automatic stay. Herman v. Hospital Staffing Services, Inc., 236 B.R. 377 (W.D. Tenn. 1999).
- 1.1.uuuuuu Actions in the bankruptcy court may violate the automatic stay. Before bankruptcy, GM attempted to terminate the debtor’s franchise. The debtor brought a proceeding before a state agency to challenge the termination notice. Under state law, the termination was not effective until resolution of that proceeding, during which the debtor filed chapter 11. The debtor attempted to sell the franchise during the chapter 11 case. GM objected, arguing that the franchise agreement had been terminated prepetition and was not an asset of the estate. The Third Circuit rules that GM’s actions in the bankruptcy court constituted acts to take possession or control of property of the estate and thus violated the automatic stay. Krystal Cadillac Oldsmobile GMC Truck, Inc. v. General Motors Corporation (In re Krystal Cadillac Oldsmobile GMC Truck, Inc.), 142 F.3d 631 (3d Cir. 1998).

- 1.1.vvvvvv Margin calls on broker loan are not subject to the automatic stay. In a straight loan transaction, the debtor borrowed money from a stock broker and pledged securities to secure repayment, under the broker's standard margin account agreement. As the stock moved downward, the broker made unanswered margin calls after the debtor's bankruptcy and ultimately sold the debtor's position. The stock later recovered, and the trustee sued for violation of the automatic stay. In a case of apparent first impression, the Ninth Circuit holds that the exception to the automatic stay of section 362(b)(6) for margin calls applies even to straight loan transactions that do not implicate the securities' markets generally. Wolkowitz v. Shearson Lehman Bros., Inc. (In re Weisberg), 136 F.3d 655 (9th Cir. 1998).
- 1.1.wwwwww Administrative hold may still constitute a violation of the stay. In Citizens Bank v. Strumpf, 516 U.S. 16 (1995), the Supreme Court held that an administrative freeze on a bank account did not violate the stay. In this case, however, the credit union waited four months before seeking relief from stay to effect the set-off. The District Court holds that the wait was too long and that the credit union therefore violated the automatic stay. Town of Hempstead Employees' Federal Credit Union v. Wicks (In re Wicks), 215 B.R. 316 (E.D.N.Y. 1997).
- 1.1.xxxxxx PUC revocation of a debtor's taxi licenses is not subject to the automatic stay. The PUC sought to revoke the debtor's taxi licenses for non-use. The bankruptcy court enjoined the PUC for a violation of the automatic stay. The Tenth Circuit reverses, holding that the governmental police and regulatory power exception of section 362(b)(4) applies to the stay of an act "to exercise control over property of the estate" in section 362(a)(3). Yellow Cab Co-op. Assoc. v. Metro Taxi, Inc. (In re Yellow Cab Co-op Assoc.), 132 F.3d 591 (10th Cir. 1997).
- 1.1.yyyyyy Town ordinance may violate the automatic stay. After agreeing to process the debtor's application for a landfill, the town council adopted an ordinance prohibiting further landfills within the town. The trustee sued for a violation of the automatic stay, arguing that the town attempted to "exercise control over property of the estate." "Exercise control" requires a direct connection between the conduct stayed and the property at issue. The trustee had leased the site and assigned the application to a third party. As a result, the application was no longer property of the estate, even though there was a contingent payout right to the estate. However, the debtor's actions in reliance on the town's representation created an estoppel right that was property of the estate, over which the ordinance exercised control. Accordingly, the automatic stay litigation could proceed. Slater v. Town of Albion (In re Albion Disposal, Inc.), 217 B.R. 394 (W.D.N.Y. 1997).
- 1.1.zzzzzz Directors and officer's liability insurance coverage litigation allowed to proceed in non-bankruptcy court. The debtor-in-possession sued its former officers and directors in the bankruptcy court. The directors and officers' liability insurer sued in state court for a declaration that the directors and officers were not covered by the liability portion of the policy. The debtor-in-possession obtained an injunction from the bankruptcy court against the insurer proceeding further in state court, arguing that the defendants' insurance coverage was like property of the estate and should be protected by the bankruptcy court. The Ninth Circuit vacated the injunction, ruling that the estate's difficulty in collecting damages from the defendants did not warrant the injunction. Pintlar Corporation v. Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York (In re Pintlar Corporation), 124 F.3d 1310 (9th Cir. 1997).
- 1.1.aaaaaa Retention of amounts owed by a State violates the automatic stay. The bankruptcy court ordered a State taxing agency to pay over to the trustee disputed taxes that had been paid under protest. Pending an appeal from the bankruptcy court's order, the State did not pay the trustee. The State's refusal to pay was held a violation of the automatic stay and of the section 542(a) turnover provision, which, the court holds, is automatic and does require either a demand or an action to enforce. Employment Development Department v. Taxel (In re Del Mission Ltd.), 98 F.3d 1147 (9th Cir. 1996).

1.1.bbbbbbb Insurer's lawsuit against debtor's shareholders does not violate automatic stay. An insurance company had issued environmental response cost policies to the debtor and to each of its two corporate shareholders. After the filing of the debtor's chapter 11 case, the insurance company sought declaratory relief against the shareholders in state court. Because the lawsuit was carefully circumscribed, it did not implicate property of the estate and did not violate the automatic stay. Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. Official Unsecured Creditors' Committee of Spaulding Composites Co. (In re Spaulding Composites Company, Inc.), 207 B.R. 899 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).

1.1.cccccc Prohibited bankruptcy filing did not create automatic stay. An order of dismissal was made "with prejudice to the filing of a petition under any chapter of the Bankruptcy Code for a period of twelve months." The debtor colluded in the filing of an involuntary petition against herself two months later. While the second petition was pending, she was sued. Because of the prohibition in the prior bankruptcy case, the second filing did not trigger the automatic stay of Section 362(a), and the judgment in the lawsuit was affirmed. Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation v. Cortez, 96 F.3d 50 (2d Cir. 1996).

1.2 Effect of Stay

1.2.a Government may seek stay annulment to validate postpetition setoff in violation of the stay. The debtors owed HUD on a guaranteed, defaulted housing loan. HUD notified the Treasury, which then offset the debt against the debtors' tax overpayment, which the debtors attempted to exempt, after the petition date. Section 6402(d) requires the Treasury Secretary to offset tax overpayments against any amounts the taxpayer owes to the government. Section 553(a) preserves the setoff right in bankruptcy. The debtors' exemption claim does not supersede the setoff right. However, the postpetition setoff violated the automatic stay, which HUD might remedy by seeking annulment of the stay. Wood v. U.S. Dept. of Housing & Urban Devel. (In re Wood), ___ F.3d ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 10029 (4th Cir. Apr. 7, 2021).

1.2.b Stay tolls foreclosure period for full period of the stay. The mortgagee accelerated the debtor's mortgage note before bankruptcy. Under state law, a mortgagee has four years after acceleration to file a foreclosure action. The mortgagee here filed a foreclosure action 127 days late. The automatic stay was in effect for 127 days, including both the day the bankruptcy petition was filed and the day the stay terminated by entry of the discharge. Section 108(c) provides "if applicable nonbankruptcy law ... fixes a period for commencing ... an action" that is stayed by section 362, "then such period does not expire until ... the end of such period, including any suspension of such period occurring on or after the commencement of the case." State law here does not have a specific tolling provision that provides for tolling (suspension) during the automatic stay but does accept the common law tolling principle as an applicable law that section 108(c) may incorporate. The common law principle prohibits counting against a person the time during which the person is prevented from exercising a legal remedy. Here, the mortgagee was prevented on the day the debtor filed the petition and on the day the stay terminated. The law does not split a day. Therefore, the deadline to file the foreclosure action was tolled for the full 127 days. HSBC Bank USA, N.A. v. Crum, 907 F.3d 199 (5th Cir. 2018).

1.2.c Section 108(c) extends the time to renew a judgment lien. Before bankruptcy, the creditor obtained a judicial lien against the debtor to enforce a judgment. By its term, the lien expired one year after it arose, unless renewed. The debtor filed bankruptcy within the one-year period. The creditor did not renew the lien. Section 108(c) extends until 30 days after notice of termination or expiration of the automatic stay any "period for commencing or continuing a civil action ... on a claim against the debtor" that has not expired before the date of the filing of the petition. Section 362(a)(1) stays "the commencement or continuation" of an action "that was or could have been commenced before bankruptcy to recover a prepetition claim;” section 362(a)(2) stays “the enforcement against the debtor ... of a judgment obtained before” bankruptcy; and section 362(a)(4) stays “any act to ... enforce any lien against property of the estate.” The attempt to enforce a judgment is a continuation of the civil action. Therefore, the renewal of the judicial lien is a continuation of the action, and section 108(c) extends the renewal deadline. A dissent argues that a judgment terminates the civil action, that the automatic stay deals separately with continuation and enforcement, and section 108(c) covers only continuation. Daff v. Good (In re Swintek), 906 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2018).

- 1.2.d Section 108(b) does not extend the time to exercise a purchase option. The debtor had an option to purchase real property, which expired one hour after the commencement of the case and which it was unable to exercise timely because it lacked sufficient financing. Section 108(b) extends for at least 60 days a deadline fixed under an agreement that has not expired by the commencement of the case to “file any pleading, demand, notice, or proof of claim or loss, cure a default, or perform any other similar act.” “Similar” means having common characteristics or very much alike or comparable. Exercising an option and purchasing property is not similar to filing a pleading, notice, demand, or claim or curing a default. Because the agreement permitted but did not require the debtor to purchase by the deadline, the debtor’s failure to do so was not a “default” that could be cured with the 60-day period. Therefore, section 108(b) does not extend the time for the debtor in possession to exercise the option. In re 1075 S Yukon, LLC, 590 B.R. 527 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2018).
- 1.2.e Section 108(c) applies to extend a judgment lien pending termination of the automatic stay. State law grants a judgment creditor a lien on all the judgment debtor’s personal property when the creditor obtains from the court and serves on the judgment debtor an order for appearance and examination (ORAP) to discover assets. The lien, which is not publicly recorded, lasts for one year. Here, the judgment debtor filed bankruptcy within the year, and the creditor took no action to enforce or extend the lien, but filed an adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy case to assert the lien more than one year after the ORAP. Section 362(a) stays the commencement or continuation of an action against the debtor, the enforcement of a judgment against the debtor, and the creation or perfection of a lien against property of the debtor or property of the estate. Section 108(c) tolls any applicable nonbankruptcy law deadline “for commencing or continuing a civil action ... on a claim against the debtor” until 30 days after notice of termination or expiration of the automatic stay. Because enforcement of a judgment is a continuation of a civil action, section 108(c) applies to protect the ORAP lien until after notice of the end of the automatic stay. Daff v. Good (In re Swintek), ___ F.3d ___, 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 29646 (9th Cir. Oct. 22, 2018).
- 1.2.f Section 108(c) tolls period for enforcement of a time-limited judicial lien. After obtaining a California state court judgment, the creditor obtained from the court an Order to Appear for Examination (“ORAP”). Under California law, service on the debtor of the ORAP creates a judicial lien on all the debtor’s personal property. The lien expires after one year unless the state court renews it. Using the ORAP lien, the creditor executed on some of the debtor’s assets. Before the one-year period expired, the debtor filed a bankruptcy petition. The trustee eventually took possession of the liened assets. More than one year after the creditor served the ORAP, the trustee sought to avoid the lien, asserting it had expired. Section 108(c) provides, “if applicable nonbankruptcy law ... fixes a period for commencing or continuing a civil action ... and such period has not expired before the date of the filing of the petition, the such period does not expire ... until 30 days after notice of the termination or expiration of the stay under section 362.” Enforcement of a judgment is a continuation of the civil action that led to the judgment. The automatic stay prevents the creditor from taking the liened property. Therefore, section 108(c) applies, and the creditor does not need to renew its lien while the automatic stay is in effect. Good v. Daff (In re Swintek), 543 B.R. 303 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2015).

- 1.2.g Automatic stay prohibits judicial lien attachment on after-acquired property. The debtor fraudulently transferred real property to an affiliate before the bank had obtained a judgment against the debtor. The bank recorded the judgment in the county where the property was located. Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, a recorded judgment becomes a lien on any real property in the county that the debtor acquires. After bankruptcy, the trustee obtained a reverse veil-piercing order against the affiliate, so that the transferred real property became property of the debtor's estate. Section 552(a) prevents a security interest from attaching to property that the estate acquires after bankruptcy, but it does not address nonconsensual liens, such as a statutory or judicial lien. Section 362(a)(4) prohibits any act to create, perfect or enforce a lien on property of the estate. But a judicial lien's automatic attachment is not an "act," at least not an act of the creditor. Nevertheless, the Code's overall policy of stopping collection efforts and preserving the status quo as of the petition date requires the application of the automatic stay's policy to the automatic attachment of a judicial lien after bankruptcy. Therefore, the trustee takes the real property free and clear of the bank's judicial lien. Rodriguez v. Gelman (In re Local Serv. Corp.), 503 B.R. 136 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2013).
- 1.2.h Section 108(c) extends a creditor's time to act under nonbankruptcy law, even where the automatic stay does not prohibit alternative action to preserve the creditor's rights. The debtor's mortgage obligation had matured. State law terminated the lien of the mortgage if the mortgagee did not commence a judicial foreclosure action or file a notice of extension within five years after the mortgage's maturity date. Before the five-year period expired, the debtor filed bankruptcy. The mortgagee did not commence foreclosure or file an extension statement. The automatic stay prohibits the commencement of a judicial foreclosure proceeding. Section 362(b)(3), however, excepts from the automatic stay an act "to perfect, or to maintain or continue the perfection of, an interest in property", such as recording the extension statement. Section 108(c) provides that if applicable nonbankruptcy law "fixes a period for commencing or continuing a civil action in a court other than the bankruptcy court on a claim against the debtor, ... and such period has not expired before the date of the filing of the petition, then such period does not expire until the later of (1) the end of such period ... or (2) 30 days after notice of the termination or expiration" of the automatic stay. The state statute gives only the mortgagee the option to commence a judicial proceeding or record the extension statement. The automatic stay stayed the mortgagee's right to commence the proceeding. Accordingly, section 108(c) extended the time for the mortgagee to commence the proceeding, whether or not section 362(b)(3) permitted the mortgagee to record the extension statement. Because bankruptcy occurred before the expiration of the five-year period and the automatic stay prevented the commencement of foreclosure proceedings, the state law did not terminate the lien of the mortgage unless the mortgagee did not act within 30 days after notice of termination of the automatic stay. Shamus Holdings, LLC v. LBM Fin., LLC (In re Shamus Holdings, LLC), 642 F.3d 263 (1st Cir. 2011).
- 1.2.i Mortgagee need not record an extension statement to prevent operation of an obsolete mortgage discharge statute. State law discharges a mortgage five years after its due date unless the mortgagee records an extension affidavit or commences a civil action to enforce the mortgage. In this case, the five-year period expired during the debtor's bankruptcy case. The automatic stay prohibits any action to enforce a lien, but an exception in section 362(b)(3) permits an act "to maintain or continue the perfection" in certain circumstances, which are present here. Section 108(c) extends applicable nonbankruptcy statutes of limitation for commencing a civil action that has not expired as of the petition date until 30 days after termination of the stay with respect to the action. Although the automatic stay exception permits the mortgagee here to extend the mortgage by recording the extension affidavit before the five-year period expires, the Bankruptcy Code does not require the mortgagee to elect that remedy rather than rely on the extension contained in section 108(c) to bring a civil action. Therefore, the obsolete mortgage statute did not discharge the mortgage. LBM Fin., LLC v. 201 Forest St., LLC (In re 201 Forest St., LLC), 422 B.R. 888 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2010).

- 1.2.j Stay relief does not divest the estate of its property interest. With the debtor in possession's consent, the bankruptcy court granted stay relief to permit foreclosure. An entity that the DIP's principals secretly controlled purchased the property at the foreclosure sale. Despite the stay relief, the property remained estate property, because stay relief only terminates an injunction; it does not dispose of any property or interest in property. The DIP's principals owed the fiduciary duty of loyalty to the estate not to deal with estate property for their own benefit, which they breached by their role at the foreclosure sale. Therefore, the court properly imposed a constructive trust on the property for the benefit of the estate. Lange v. Schropp (In re Brook Valley IV, Joint Venture), 496 F.3d 893 (9th Cir. 2007).
- 1.2.k Appellate reversal of dismissal order does not retroactively reinstate the stay. When the court denied confirmation of the debtors' chapter 13 plan, it dismissed their case. The debtors appealed and sought but were denied stays pending appeal. While the appeal was pending, the secured lender foreclosed on the debtors' real property. The appellate court later reversed the dismissal, and the debtors sought to void the foreclosure sale as violating the stay. The reversal and reinstatement of the chapter 13 case did not retroactively revive the automatic stay, so the creditor's foreclosure sale was valid. Some courts have adopted a "due process" exception to this rule: if the debtor did not receive due process notice of the motion to dismiss and the order is reversed on appeal, then the stay may be retroactively reinstated. This exception does not apply in the First Circuit. Even if it did, the debtors had adequate notice in this case, as the dismissal came at the conclusion of the confirmation hearing, which the debtors attended. Lomagno v. Salomon Bros. Realty Corp. (In re Lomagno), 320 B.R. 473 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2005).
- 1.2.l Section 108, not section 362, governs the tolling of a period of redemption. Under Vermont and other states' real property foreclosure law, the debtor has a fixed period of time after the judgment of foreclosure to redeem the property. If the debtor files a bankruptcy petition within that time period, the petition tolls a running of the redemption period. However, the tolling is governed by section 108, not section 362. Although the right of redemption is property of the estate, and section 362 stays any act to exercise control over property of the estate, section 362 does not stay the running of time, because the running of time is not an "act." In addition, section 108 would be rendered superfluous if section 362 provided an unlimited tolling. The Second Circuit joins the Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits in reaching this conclusion. Canney v. Merchants Bank (In re Canney), 284 F.3d 362 (2d Cir. 2002).
- 1.2.m Statute of duration of judgment extended beyond discharge by section 108. A state court judgment entitled the judgment creditor to a lien on the debtor's assets. The debtor had received his discharge, but there remained assets in the estate to be distributed. Because the automatic stay continues with respect to property of the estate until it is no longer property of the estate, section 108(c) suspends the operation of the statute of duration (which voids a judgment after ten years) until 30 days after the termination of the automatic stay. Spirtos v. Moreno (In re Spirtos), 221 F.3d 1079 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 1.2.n Bankruptcy court may not enjoin shareholders' securities suits against directors. The trustee brought a claim against directors for damage to the corporation. Shareholder sued the directors for violation of section 10(b)(5) of the Securities Act. The bankruptcy court enjoined the prosecution of the shareholder action. The district court reversed, holding that the shareholders action was not property of the estate, that the potential interference between the two actions was unlikely, and that the resolution of the potential conflict in the pursuit of directors and officers insurance policies should await liability and determination of coverage under the policies. In re Reliance Acceptance Group, Inc., 235 B.R. 548 (D. Del. 1998).
- 1.2.o Debtor may not stipulate to relief from stay during the involuntary gap period. Because a debtor does not have the powers of a trustee during the involuntary gap period, the debtor may not stipulate to relief from the automatic stay. The creditor may obtain relief only by filing a motion, with service upon the debtor and the petitioning creditors. In re E.D. Wilkins Gray Co., 235 B.R. 647 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1999).

- 1.2.p Bankruptcy Court has exclusive jurisdiction to determine applicability of automatic stay. The debtor was prosecuted in state court for nonpayment of child support while he was a debtor in a bankruptcy case and over his objection that the prosecution violated the automatic stay. Relying on section 1334(a) of title 28, which grants bankruptcy courts exclusive jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases (as opposed to “proceedings arising in cases” under section 1334(b), the Ninth Circuit holds that the determination of the effect of an exception to such a fundamental bankruptcy tool as the automatic stay must be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court. Gruntz v. County of Los Angeles (In re Gruntz), 166 F.3d 1020 (9th Cir. 1999).
- 1.2.q Court enforces pre-bankruptcy waiver of automatic stay. The court sets forth the following factors as relevant in determining whether a pre-bankruptcy waiver of the automatic stay provides sufficient cause for relief from the stay: (1) the financial and legal sophistication of the borrower; (2) whether the lender gave significant consideration for the waiver; (3) whether the case was primarily a two-party dispute; and (4) whether circumstances substantially changed since the granting of the waiver. Finding all four factors present in this case, the court granted relief from the stay. Mass. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Shady Grove Tech Center Assocs. Ltd. P’ship (In re Shady Grove Tech Center Assocs. Ltd. P’ship), 227 B.R. 422 (Bankr. D. Md. 1998).
- 1.2.r Automatic stay provides defense to liability. A Pennsylvania statute made the officers of a corporation personally liable to the employees for failure to pay over withheld union dues or vacation or other fringe benefit payments. When the corporation filed chapter 11, the automatic stay prevented the corporation from paying the amounts it owed. Because the corporation was prevented by operation of law from paying the amounts, the Third Circuit rules that the individual officers are not personally liable for non-payment. Belcufine v. Aloe, 112 F.3d 633 (3d Cir. 1997).
- 1.3 Remedies
- 1.3.a Court denies retroactive stay relief that would validate default judgment. The debtor did not notify a tort claimant of his chapter 11 filing. The claimant filed an action against the debtor after the bankruptcy filing. The debtor did not respond, and the claimant obtained a default judgment. The debtor’s case was dismissed for failure to prosecute. Later, the debtor filed a second chapter 11 case, which was converted to chapter 7. The claimant sought retroactive stay relief to validate the prior default judgment. An act taken in violation of the automatic stay is void. However, section 362(d) permits annulment or retroactive stay relief, which would validate a prior action taken in violation of the stay. A court should not grant retroactive relief to validate a default judgment. The debtor may justifiably rely on the stay to be automatic and to relieve the debtor from any obligation to respond to a post-bankruptcy complaint. Therefore, the court grants prospective relief to permit the filing of a new action but denies retroactive relief. Garcia v. Sklar (In re Sklar), 626 B.R. 750 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2021).
- 1.3.b Section 363(k) creates a private right of action the debtor may pursue independently of the bankruptcy case. Investors in a fund filed an involuntary petition against the fund manager but did not serve it properly. The manager failed to respond, and the court ordered relief. Afterwards, the investors removed the manager from the fund and installed a new one. The manager discovered the bankruptcy and moved to set aside the order for relief for lack of proper service, which the court did. The investors moved to dismiss the case, since they had achieved their objective of removing the manager. After dismissal, the manager sued the investors for damages for violating the automatic stay during the pendency of the case by removing the manager. Section 363(k) creates a private cause of action for stay violation. It exists and may be pursued independently of the underlying bankruptcy case. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court may not, in the dismissal order, limit the debtor's right to bring the action. Healthcare Real Estate P'ners v. Summit Healthcare Reit, Inc. (In re Healthcare Real Estate P'ners), 941 F.3d 64 (3d Cir. 2019).

- 1.3.c Debtor may recover fees for appealing denial of fees for stay violation. After the creditor violated the automatic stay, the debtor moved for sanctions, including attorneys' fees. The bankruptcy court awarded fees that did not account for several days of the attorney's work. The debtors appealed to the district court, which remanded for the bankruptcy court to calculate the fees. The bankruptcy court awarded a substantial amount more but not for the attorney's appellate work, on the ground that a request for such fees was then pending in the district court. The district court denied the request, and the debtors appealed to the court of appeals. Section 362(k) requires the court to award "actual damages, including costs and attorneys' fees," to an individual injured by a willful violation of the automatic stay. Without the prospect of an attorneys' fees award, most individual debtors would lack the means to seek redress for stay violations. Moreover, the risk of a fee award acts as a deterrent to stay violations. Neither function operates effectively if the debtor may not recover fees for pursuing the damages and fees claim to final judgment. Therefore, the court must award attorneys' fees to the debtor for pursuing or defending an appeal from an order under section 362(k). Easley v. Collections Serv. Of Nev., 910 F.3d 1286 (9th Cir. 2018).
- 1.3.d Debtor may recover attorneys' fees for litigating a damages claim for stay violation, including fees on appeal. The debtor moved for damages for a creditor's stay violation. The bankruptcy court granted the motion, including attorneys' fees. The creditor appealed to the district court and the court of appeals, which both affirmed. The creditor also sought the bankruptcy judge's recusal, which the court denied; the appellate courts affirmed, and the Supreme Court denied certiorari. The district court awarded the debtor fees for defending all the appeals. Section 362(k) provides "an individual injured by any willful violation of a stay provided by this section shall recover actual damages, including costs and attorneys' fees." The mandatory language overrides the American Rule, under which each party pays its own fees. The use of "including" broadens the scope of "actual damages" beyond the immediate injury resulting from the stay violation. Fee-shifting statutes such as section 362(k) entitle the party to fees not only at the trial level but also on appeal. Therefore, the debtor is entitled to all fees for litigating the damages claim and the subsequent appeals, including on the recusal motion, which was related to the stay violation litigation. Mantiply v. Horne (In re Horne), 876 F.3d 1076 (11th Cir. 2017).
- 1.3.e Court orders $1 million in actual damages and $45 million punitive damages for Kafkaesque automatic stay violation. The individual borrowers sought a loan modification on their home mortgage. The bank refused unless the borrowers were in default for at least three months. So after numerous conversations with the bank, the borrowers reluctantly stopped paying. They received modification forms from the bank, which they completed and submitted, but the bank routinely lost them. They submitted the forms 20 times. Bank records showed the bank had no intention of agreeing to a modification. The bank then noticed a foreclosure sale. The borrowers filed chapter 13 the day before the sale. The bank conducted the foreclosure sale anyway and did not rescind the sale for months. When it did, it did not notify the borrowers. Seeing no relief in bankruptcy, the borrowers dismissed their chapter 13 case. After the bank took title to their home at the foreclosure sale, it stalked and harassed the borrowers at the house. Once the borrowers vacated to escape the harassment and the threat of eviction following the foreclosure, the bank allowed the property to deteriorate, incurring homeowner association penalties. The borrowers suffered extreme illness and emotional distress. They brought a state court action against the bank for damages for various tort and contract causes of action and for the stay violation. The state court found the bankruptcy court had exclusive jurisdiction for the stay violation, so the borrowers commenced an action there. The automatic stay prohibits foreclosure or any act to collect a prepetition debt, voids any action taken in violation of the stay, and requires the violator to rescind any such action. An individual debtor is entitled to actual damages for a stay violation, and the court may award punitive damages. The foreclosure sale, the recording of title after the sale, the failure to rescind the sale and correct title, and the harassment and stalking were all stay violations. Stay violation damages are determined based on a tort causation model, and damages are not limited to the consequences flowing from the stay violation during the time the stay is in effect. Therefore, the bank is liable for all the damages the borrowers incurred through the time of trial, slightly over $1 million. Punitive damages are also appropriate, enough to cause the bank not to treat them as a cost of doing business, but allocated in a way not to give the borrowers a windfall. Considering the societal interest in punishing bad conduct, the court awards $45 million in punitive damages, grants $5 million to the borrowers and orders payment of the remaining $40 million to state institutions and nonprofit organizations that promote consumer protection in bankruptcy. Sundquist v. Bank of Am., N.A. (In re Sundquist), 566 B.R. 563 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 2017).

- 1.3.f Trustee is not liable to secured creditor who did not request adequate protection for property's decrease in value. The bank had an undersecured lien on the debtor's manufacturing facility. So as not to deplete unencumbered assets for the secured creditor's benefit and with the secured creditor's consent, the trustee determined not to purchase property insurance or to provide physical security to the property. Over the period of several years the trustee retained the property, scrappers took most of the metals from the facility, leaving it in serious disrepair. The trustee then abandoned the property. The purchaser of the secured claim sued the trustee for failing to protect and preserve property of the estate. A trustee is not required to expend unencumbered assets for a secured creditor's benefit, and a secured creditor is not entitled to adequate protection against decrease in collateral value unless the creditor timely requests protection. Therefore, the trustee is not liable to the claim purchaser for any decrease in value of the property. New Prods. Corp. v. Tibble (In re Modern Plastics Corp.), 543 B.R. 818 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2016), aff'd 577 B.R. 270 (W.D. Mich. 2017).
- 1.3.g Debtor-appellee may recover attorneys' fees for creditor's appeal of order enforcing the stay. A mortgage servicer foreclosed in violation of the automatic stay. The debtor filed a motion seeking reversal of the servicer's actions and imposition of damages, including attorneys' fees incurred in the stay enforcement motion, which the bankruptcy court granted. The servicer appealed to the district court, which affirmed. The debtor sought attorneys' fees for the district court appeal. Section 362(k)(1) provides, "an individual injured by any willful violation of a stay ... shall recover actual damages, including costs and attorneys' fees." The provision does not limit the remedy to damages alone or to damages, including fees, incurred in ending the stay violation. It also encompasses fees incurred in prosecuting a damages action. A statute authorizing an attorneys' fees award at trial ordinarily includes fees incurred in defending the judgment on appeal. Therefore, the debtor may recover attorneys' fees for the appeal. America's Servicing Co. v. Schwartz-Tallard (In re Schwartz-Tallard), 803 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2015), overruling Sternberg v. Johnson, 595 F.3d 937 (9th Cir. 2010).
- 1.3.h Debtor-appellee may recover attorneys' fees for creditor's appeal of order enforcing the stay. The mortgage servicer foreclosed in violation of the automatic stay. The debtor filed a motion seeking reversal of the servicer's actions and imposition of damages, including attorneys' fees incurred in the stay enforcement motion, which the bankruptcy court granted. The servicer appealed to the district court, which affirmed. The debtor sought attorneys' fees for the district court appeal. Section 362(k)(1) provides, "an individual injured by any willful violation of a stay ... shall recover actual damages, including costs and attorneys' fees." The stay has financial and non-financial purposes. The financial purpose is to allow the debtor to restore his finances, not to pursue creditors. The non-financial purpose is to provide a breathing spell; more litigation is inconsistent with a breathing spell. Therefore, a debtor may recover attorneys' fees for enforcing the stay or remedying the stay violation but not for pursuing a damages claim. Here, the debtor's defense of the servicer's appeal was a step in enforcing the stay, not an independent damages claim. Therefore, the debtor may recover attorneys' fees for the appeal. America's Servicing Co.

v. Schwartz-Tallard (In re Schwartz-Tallard), 751 F.3d 966 (9th Cir. 2014), withdrawn, 765 F.3d 1096 (2014).

- 1.3.i No remedy for automatic stay violation where there is no harm. The bank held a security interest in the debtor's certificate of deposit to secure three separate, cross-collateralized loans. After bankruptcy, the bank liquidated the CD and applied the proceeds to two of the loans in partial satisfaction of its claims. The trustee sought to strip the bank's lien as a remedy for the violation of the automatic stay. Section 362(a) stays the application of collateral proceeds to a loan, so there was a clear stay violation. A transfer in violation of the stay is void. The remedy is to return the parties to the status quo before the violation, which would revive the bank's security interest in the CD and place the parties in this case in the same position they are now in after the stay violation. Therefore, the estate did not suffer any damages and is not entitled to any relief. Jubber v. Bank of Utah (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 749 F.3d 895 (10th Cir. 2014).
- 1.3.j Trustee may use expired avoiding powers defensively in a stay relief proceeding. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor granted an unsecured creditor a security interest in his stock in a corporation to secure outstanding debts. The corporation's articles required board approval for the transfer of an interest in the stock, which the creditor did not obtain. After bankruptcy, the creditor sought stay relief to foreclose on the stock under section 362(d)(2) on the ground that the debtor did not have any equity in the stock. The trustee claimed that the stock transfer was a preference, but the trustee's statute of limitation under section 546(a) to avoid the transfer had expired. Section 502(d) permits a trustee to object to a claim on the ground that the claim holder received and has not returned a voidable transfer, even after the trustee's statute of limitations to avoid the transfer has expired. For the same reason, the trustee may assert the transfer's avoidability as a defense to the creditor's stay relief motion. Grant, Konvalinka & Harrison v. Still (In re McKenzie), 737 F.3d 1034 (6th Cir. 2013).
- 1.3.k Secured creditor seeking stay relief has burden of proving lien's validity. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor granted an unsecured creditor a security interest in his stock in a corporation to secure outstanding debts. The corporation's articles required board approval for the transfer of an interest in the stock, which the creditor did not obtain. After bankruptcy, the creditor sought stay relief to foreclose on the stock under section 362(d)(2) on the ground that the debtor did not have any equity in the stock. Section 362(g) imposes the burden of proof on the issue of the debtor's equity in the property on the party seeking stay relief and on all other issues on the party opposing stay relief. Whether the debtor has equity depends on whether the creditor's lien is valid. If not, then the debtor has equity. The creditor cannot show that the debtor does not have equity unless the creditor shows that the lien is valid and enforceable. Therefore, the creditor has the burden of proof on the lien's validity. Grant, Konvalinka & Harrison v. Still (In re McKenzie), 737 F.3d 1034 (6th Cir. 2013).
- 1.3.l No remedy for automatic stay violation where there is no harm. The bank held a security interest in the debtor's certificate of deposit to secure three separate, cross-collateralized loans. After bankruptcy, the bank liquidated the CD and applied the proceeds to two of the loans in partial satisfaction of its claims. The trustee sought to strip the bank's lien as a remedy for the violation of the automatic stay. Section 362(a) stays the application of collateral proceeds to a loan, so there was a clear stay violation. Section 362(k) permits an individual injured by a stay violation to recover actual damages, and in appropriate circumstances, punitive damages. A trustee acts on behalf of an estate, which is not an individual. Therefore, section 362(k) does not apply. A trustee may seek sanctions for a stay violation, but the sanctions are for civil contempt and therefore must be either solely compensatory or to compel compliance with the court order. Here, compelling compliance was unnecessary, because the trustee had already avoided the transfer. Lien-stripping would not be compensatory, because the estate suffered no damages. Once the trustee avoids the transfer under section 549 and recovers under section 550, section 502(h) provides that the creditor's claim arising from the avoidance and recovery must be determined and allowed or disallowed the same as if the claim had arisen prepetition. The effect of avoiding the transfer and recovering the property would be to restore the trustee and the bank to their positions as of the petition date. The bank would have a secured claim and would be entitled to the collateral value. Therefore, there was no harm to the estate from the bank's stay violation, so there is no need for sanctions to restore the parties to their pre-violation position. Rushton v. Bank of Utah (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 477 B.R. 176 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

- 1.3.m An involuntary debtor may not seek stay relief for its adversary. The debtor claimed a third party was infringing its patent. The third party brought a declaratory judgment action against the debtor to determine validity and infringement. While it was pending, creditors filed an involuntary bankruptcy petition against the debtor, which the debtor contested. The debtor then sought stay relief to allow the declaratory relief action to proceed. The third party opposed relief. Section 362(d) permits a party in interest to seek stay relief. A court determines who is a party in interest on a case-by-case basis. In section 362(d), the term is not limited to creditors. Therefore, a debtor may seek stay relief. But the debtor may not seek stay relief on behalf of the other party to the litigation. It may only seek to vindicate its own rights. In addition, section 303 permits the debtor to use, acquire and dispose of property during the involuntary gap period, but it does not invest the debtor with the authority to bind the estate, which would include the ability to waive the automatic stay. Therefore, the court denies the motion. In re Swepports, Ltd., 476 B.R. 540 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2012).
- 1.3.n A receiver is a party in interest for purposes of seeking stay relief or abstention from proceedings that would interfere with the receivership. The municipal debtor had issued revenue bonds, secured by a pledge of the net revenues of the debtor's sewer system. The debtor defaulted in payments. The indenture trustee sought and obtained the appointment of a state court receiver, as provided in the indenture, to take possession of and operate the system, collect revenues, set rates and pay net revenues to the indenture trustee for distribution to bondholders. Upon the debtor's filing its chapter 9 case, the receiver moved for the bankruptcy court to abstain from taking any action to interfere with the receivership. Only a party in interest may request relief from the bankruptcy court. The Code does not define "party in interest", though section 1109(b) contains a nonexclusive list of some parties in interest. An entity is a party in interest if it has a sufficient interest, whether pecuniary or practical, in the particular proceeding to merit representation. Although the receiver is not a creditor but is merely an arm of the appointing court, the receiver has a sufficient practical interest in knowing whether and to what extent the automatic stay and the Code's turnover provisions apply to qualify as a party in interest. In re Jefferson County, Ala., 465 B.R. 243 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 2012).
- 1.3.o Bankruptcy court may sanction for contempt on motion and may order relief to return the parties to the prior status quo. The debtor operated a mine on lease. A creditor filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The lessor attempted to terminate the lease, commenced a state court action to collect royalties owing under the lease and sued one of the debtor's customers to require it to pay to the lessor amounts that it owed to the debtor. The creditor filed a motion to hold the lessor in contempt for violation of the automatic stay. The lessor did not respond to the motion. The court found the lessor in contempt, declared any acts to terminate the lease void and ordered the lessor to return to the debtor any money it had collected, to dismiss the action to collect from the debtor's customer and to pay the creditor's attorneys' fees and costs for the contempt proceeding. Rule 9020 provides that Rule 9014 governs a motion for a contempt order. Rule 9014 permits a party to obtain relief by motion. Bankruptcy Rule 7001 requires an adversary proceeding to obtain injunctive, equitable or declaratory relief but does not apply to a motion to restore the status quo as it existed before a stay violation. Therefore, the creditor properly requested the relief by motion. A bankruptcy court may find a party in contempt for violating the stay. The court is not limited to ordering monetary sanctions. Therefore, the court may void any action that the contemnor took in violation of the stay to return the parties to the situation that existed before the violation. Std. Indus., Inc. v. Aquila, Inc. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 625 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 2010).

- 1.3.p Contempt action for stay violation may be brought by motion. A creditor filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. Before the hearing on the petition, another creditor terminated its contract with the debtor and attempted to collect a prepetition claim, and a third creditor sued the debtor's account party to collect funds that had been garnished by the petitioning creditor. The petitioning creditor filed a motion to hold the other two creditors in contempt for violating the automatic stay, seeking an order declaring the contract termination void, requiring repayment to the estate of any funds that the other two creditors had received, ordering the third creditor to dismiss the state court lawsuit and requiring payment to the petitioning creditor of the cost, including attorneys' fees, of pursuing the contempt action. Bankruptcy Rule 9020 provides that Rule 9014 governs a motion for an order of contempt. Rule 9014 governs contested matters. Thus, a motion suffices; an adversary proceeding is not required, even where the contempt motion seeks monetary damages or injunctive relief. In redressing a stay violation, a bankruptcy court is not limited to monetary relief. Here, the relief requested would only return the parties to the status quo ante and is appropriate. Std. Indus., Inc. v. Aquila, Inc. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 625 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 2010).
- 1.3.q Individual creditor may seek damages for stay violation. Shortly after the debtor construction company's chapter 11 filing, the debtor's bonding company advised customers that payments to the debtor in possession of amounts owing on construction contracts would reduce the bonding company's liability on the bond to the customers. Predictably, customers stopped paying the DIP, the DIP ran short of cash, the case converted to chapter 7 and the debtor liquidated. The debtor's individual shareholders had guaranteed the bonding company. They sued the bonding company for damages arising from the company's automatic stay violation. Section 362(k) provides that "an individual injured by any willful violation of a stay ... shall recover actual damages ...". Section 362(k) creates a private remedy for automatic stay violations. The term "individual" and the language of section 362(k) are not limited to the debtor. The automatic stay exists to protect creditors as well as the debtor. In addition, section 1109(b) gives a creditor standing to appear and be heard on any issue in a chapter 11 case. Finally, a claim for a stay violation is not solely property of the estate, because it arises only postpetition and is not listed in section 541(a). Therefore, standing is not limited to the debtor or the trustee. The shareholders here may assert a claim for damages, but only in their capacity as creditors. The court rules that they may not assert the claim in their capacity as shareholders but does not explain why. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Labuzan, 579 F.3d 533 (5th Cir. 2009).
- 1.3.r Stay violation actual damages does not include attorneys' fees for seeking damages. A creditor willfully violated the automatic stay. The debtor brought an action in the bankruptcy court for damages arising from the violation. Section 362(k)(1) grants an individual injured by a willful stay violation recovery of "actual damages, including costs and attorneys' fees". The American Rule does not include within the scope of damages for a breach of duty the attorneys' fees incurred in seeking damages. Section 362(k)(1) is unclear on whether Congress intended a departure from the American Rule. However, a departure would require a clearer statement of Congress's intent. The inclusion of the phrase "including costs and attorneys' fees" should therefore be read to include only the costs and attorneys' fees incurred to remedy the stay violation, such as any action to undo the violation or return the parties to their prior position. Consistent with the American Rule, "actual damages" does not include the costs or attorneys' fees incurred to recover the actual damages. Sternberg v. Johnston, 582 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2009).

- 1.3.s Bankruptcy court may award punitive damages and attorney’s fees for willful stay violation; emotional distress damages require specific evidence of harm. While incarcerated for criminal contempt for nonpayment of child support and his ex-wife’s attorney’s fees, the debtor filed a chapter 13 petition. Despite the automatic stay and clear notice of the stay, the ex-wife’s attorney continued efforts to collect her fees, including refusing consent to the debtor’s release from prison and refusing to appear in state court to present a stipulation providing for release, until her fees were paid, even though the debtor and ex-wife had settled and agreed to his release. Once released, the debtor sued the attorney for damages for a stay violation under section 362(k), including emotional and punitive damages and attorney’s fees for the section 362(k) proceeding itself. Section 362(k) permits “an individual injured by any willful violation of a stay [to] recover actual damages, including costs and attorney’s fees, and, in appropriate circumstances, [to] recover punitive damages. The bankruptcy court may award damages for emotional distress only where the debtor presents specific information concerning emotional distress damages, rather than generalized assertions. Where, as here, the debtor asserted that the continued incarceration caused him to miss his father’s funeral but only that missing the funeral was “very traumatic”, that he still had dreams about it and that he would likely never get over it, the evidence was not sufficiently specific to support an emotional damages award under section 362(k). A court may grant punitive damages if the creditor’s conduct is egregious. The attorney here ignored warnings about the automatic stay, ignored her client’s wishes that the debtor be released from jail, failed to appear before the bankruptcy court despite an order to do so and persisted in collection efforts despite the bankruptcy court’s admonition to stop. Such conduct is sufficiently egregious to warrant punitive damages. Finally, section 362(K) contemplates an attorney’s fees award for prosecuting the section 362(k) proceeding itself, not just for attorney’s fees incurred as a result of the stay violation. Young v. Repine (In re Repine), 536 F.3d 512 (5th Cir. 2008).
- 1.3.t Emotional distress damages are not available for an automatic stay violation. Reversing its prior ruling, 367 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2004), the Ninth Circuit concludes that a debtor may bring a claim under section 362(h) for emotional distress damages, whether or not the debtor suffers economic damages as well. Because section 362(h) provides for actual damages only for individuals, as distinguished from incorporeal entities, Congress must have intended to protect attributes of actual damages that are unique to individuals, such as emotional distress. However, to be entitled to emotional distress damages under section 362(h), the debtor must suffer significant harm, clearly establish it, and demonstrate a causal connection between that harm and the stay violation (as distinct from the emotional harm of bankruptcy or financial distress generally, for example). Dawson v. Washington Mut. Bank, F.A. (In re Dawson), 390 F.3d 1139 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 1.3.u Stay relief may not be denied solely to prevent lien perfection. The creditor had obtained a prejudgment attachment in state court before bankruptcy but had not “perfected” the attachment by obtaining judgment on the underlying claim because of the automatic stay. The creditor sought relief from the stay, which the bankruptcy court denied to prevent the creditor from perfecting the attachment and having a valid secured claim. Though there may be other reasons to deny stay relief in these circumstances, such as because the ultimate lien would have been worthless or because the underlying claim was invalid, it was improper to deny relief solely to block perfection of the creditor’s lien. First Fed. Bank v. Robbins (In re Robbins), 310 B.R. 626 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).
- 1.3.v Collateral agent has exclusive right to seek stay relief to enforce rights against collateral. The loan agreement and the security agreement irrevocably appointed an administrative agent and a collateral agent, respectively, and granted the agents the exclusive right to pursue claims against the debtor and to enforce rights against the collateral. As a result, the individual members of the bank group, and all members of the group acting together, did not have standing to enforce claims against the debtor or to seek relief from the automatic stay to foreclose on the collateral. The contract among the banks and the debtor was binding even in bankruptcy, and only the agent could bring the actions. Mizuho Corporate Bank, Ltd. v. Enron Corp. (In re Enron Corp.), 302 B.R. 463 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003).

- 1.3.w Emotional distress damages are not available for an automatic stay violation. A debtor may not bring a claim under section 362(h) for emotional distress damages. Section 362(h) is directed to economic damages resulting from a stay violation. Any claim for emotional distress should be brought only under state tort law. Dawson v. Washington Mut. Bank, F.A., 367 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir.), rev'd 390 F.3d 1139 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 1.3.x Standard for annulling the automatic stay is a “balancing of the equities” test. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. rejects an “extreme circumstances” test in favor of a “balancing of the equities” test in determining whether the bankruptcy court should retroactively annul the automatic stay. In this case, the debtor filed her second petition twelve days after her first petition had been dismissed and less than one hour before a scheduled foreclosure sale. The auctioneer at the foreclosure sale postponed the sale for two hours but then sold the property to a buyer who was not aware that the bankruptcy had been filed. The court annulled the stay solely on the ground that the purchaser was a good faith purchaser who would have been protected by section 549(c). The B.A.P. concludes that section 549(c) is not an exception to the automatic stay and that reliance on the factor alone does not adequately balance the equities. Fjeldsted v. Lien (In re Fjeldsted), 293 B.R. 12 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 1.3.y Judicial estoppel bars debtor from pursuing stay violation claim. The debtor and its franchisor litigated extensively over whether the franchisor properly terminated the franchise agreement, which would have had substantial value in a sale. During the course of the chapter 11 case, the court determined that the franchisor’s termination of the agreement violated the automatic stay. Nevertheless, the debtor’s disclosure statement did not state that it had a claim against the franchisor for violation of the stay, only for reinstatement of the franchise agreement. Nor did the debtor amend its Schedules to disclose the stay violation claim. As a result, the stay violation claim was barred by judicial estoppel. The non-disclosure of the potentially significant asset appears to have been designed to induce creditors to settle for less. That was an inconsistent prior position that the debtor took in bad faith. Krystal Cadillac-Oldsmobile GMC Truck, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 337 F.3d 314 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 1.3.z Trustee may not get punitive damages for stay violation. After bankruptcy, the creditor recorded a deed of trust, but it was unclear whether the creditor directly knew of the automatic stay. After the creditor was informed that the recordation violated the automatic stay, he refused to reconvey the deed of trust to undo the violation. The trustee then sought and received compensatory (attorney’s fees) and punitive damages. The Ninth Circuit reverses. The Ninth Circuit rules that the trustee is not an “individual” protected by section 362(h). The bankruptcy court may sanction for civil contempt under section 105(a) for a violation of the stay. Section 105 provides civil contempt authority, even though it does not provide a vehicle generally for enforcing provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. Sanctions for civil contempt under section 105(a) and for violation of section 362(h) both require willfulness, but in the context of section 362(h), willfulness requires only a finding that the defendant knew of the automatic stay and that its actions were intentional. For this purpose, knowledge of the bankruptcy petition imputes knowledge of the automatic stay. For civil contempt purposes, however, because the contemnor must actually know of the order being violated to be subject to sanctions, the contemnor must have actual knowledge of the automatic stay. Here, because the defendant did not remedy the violation after he learned of the automatic stay, sanctions were proper. Punitive sanctions, however, are not proper under the Bankruptcy Code’s civil contempt authority or under its inherent authority to sanction improper conduct. Civil contempt sanctions may be only compensatory or coercive, not punitive. Imposition of punitive sanctions requires compliance with criminal procedural protections. Sanctions under the court's inherent authority may be imposed only for bad faith or willful misconduct, which requires something more egregious than mere negligence or recklessness. By contrast, punitive sanctions are available under section 362(h) only because Congress expressly authorized them as a civil remedy. Knupfer v. Lindblade (In re Dyer), 322 F.3d 1178 (9th Cir. 2003).

- 1.3.aa Stay relief should be granted to pursue proceeds of embezzled funds. The debtor purchased goods using embezzled funds. Although the debtor had legal title to the goods, he did not have any equitable interest. The automatic stay should be lifted to permit pursuit of the victim's pre-petition state court action to recover the goods. The court distinguishes an action to impose a constructive trust on the grounds that with respect to proceeds of stolen property, the debtor never obtained equitable title, which the state court may determine. In the typical constructive trust, the debtor engaged in improper conduct after receiving the property, giving rise to the equitable remedy of a constructive trust, distinguishing In re Omegas Group, Inc., 16 F.3d 1443 (6th Cir. 1994). Kitchen v. Boyd (In re Newpower), 233 F.3d 922 (6th Cir. 2000).
- 1.3.bb Bankruptcy Court has exclusive jurisdiction over modification of the automatic stay. A proceeding to modify the automatic stay is part of the "case" for purposes of jurisdiction under section 1334(a). As a result, the bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction to modify the stay, and any state court judgment regarding the stay is void. The Ninth Circuit also suggests that any core proceeding is part of the "case" rather than a "proceeding" under section 1334(b). The court also vests the automatic stay with the qualities of "an injunction arising from the authority of the Bankruptcy Court." Gruntz v. County of Los Angeles (In re Gruntz), 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 1.3.cc Bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction over sanctions for stay violation. The debtor sought sanctions under section 362(h) in the state court for opposing counsel's violation of the stay in the state court action. The state court denied sanctions. The debtor later sought sanctions from the bankruptcy court for the same action of opposing counsel. The bankruptcy court denied sanctions on res judicata grounds, but the District Court reversed, holding that the bankruptcy court had exclusive jurisdiction over sanctions under section 362(h) and was therefore not bound by the state court's prior ruling. Halas v. Platek, 239 B.R. 784 (N.D. Ill. 1999).
- 1.3.dd Debtor may not enforce automatic stay to protect estate. The debtor's landlord sued the debtor for damage to the building and obtained relief from the stay on the grounds that the debtor's liability was insured. After conversion of the debtor's case to chapter 7 and the appointment of a trustee, the landlord obtained judgment in excess of the policy limits. The trustee settled with the landlord for the excess amount by assigning the debtor's insurance bad faith claim to the landlord in exchange for 5% of the landlord's recovery. The lawyer who defended the debtor in the underlying action at the expense of the insurance company brought a motion in the bankruptcy court on behalf of the debtor to "enforce the automatic stay," that is, to enjoin the landlord from proceeding against the insurer on the assigned claim. The court of appeals holds that in a chapter 7 case, the debtor does not have standing to enforce the automatic stay for the protection of the estate. In re New Era, Inc., 135 F.3d 1206 (7th Cir. 1998).
- 1.3.ee Equitable servitude granted as protection against automatic stay. The debtor filed a bankruptcy petition under questionable circumstances, listing a house as his only asset. On a motion for relief from stay and for further relief, the bankruptcy court granted relief and an in rem order, which operated as an equitable servitude on the property to bind all subsequent purchasers for 180 days so that any subsequent bankruptcy filing would not result in the triggering of the automatic stay against foreclosure on the real property. Great Western Bank v. Snow (In re Snow), 210 B.R. 968 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1996).

- 1.3.ff Contempt sanctions for violation of automatic stay. The Eleventh Circuit joins the Second and Ninth Circuits in holding that “individual” in section 362(h) does not include a corporation, but that the bankruptcy court has contempt power under section 105(a) to award monetary and other forms of relief for automatic stay violations. Because this case involved a stay violation by the IRS, the court further ruled that “section 106(a) unequivocally waives sovereign immunity for court-ordered monetary damages under section 105,” but that any attorney’s fees awarded against the IRS must be consistent with the Equal Access to Justice Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d)(2)(A) and section 7430 of the Internal Revenue Code. The court also prohibited any punitive sanction for the civil contempt violation of the automatic stay. Jove Engineering, Inc. v. Internal Revenue Service, 92 F.3d 1539 (11th Cir. 1996).

2. AVOIDING POWERS

2.1 Fraudulent Transfers

- 2.1.a Failure to exercise option is not a transfer. The debtor had an option to purchase real property within a specified period. The optionor gave notice of the commencement of the period. The debtor did not timely exercise the option. The debtor filed a bankruptcy petition a few months later and sought to avoid the option lapse as a fraudulent transfer. A transfer is any mode, direct or indirect, or parting with an interest in property. The debtor’s rights under the option were a future contingent interest, more akin to a business opportunity, not an actual interest in property. Therefore, there was no transfer. Berley Assocs. Ltd. v. 62-74 Speedwell Ave. LLC (In re Pazzo Pazzo Inc.), ___ Fed. App’x ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 34619 (3d Cir. Dec. 15, 2022).
- 2.1.b State court-approved settlement only partially binds a subsequent bankruptcy trustee. The debtor entered into a settlement of a shareholder derivative class action in which the plaintiffs alleged that a payment to the debtor’s parent was a breach of fiduciary duty. The settlement provided for the director defendants to pay the shareholder class and the debtor and for a full release of the directors. After a thorough fairness hearing, the state court approved the settlement. A few months later, and within four years after the payment to the parent, the debtor filed chapter 11. The plan provided for the appointment of a liquidating trustee, who then sued the former director defendants and the parent for fraudulent transfers. The trustee may avoid as a constructive fraudulent transfer one that is made for less than reasonably equivalent value while the debtor is insolvent. A release of claims is a transfer. However, the state court’s fairness approval determined that the releases were made for reasonably equivalent value and may not be attacked in a later bankruptcy. A bankruptcy trustee may bring fraudulent transfer claims for the benefit of creditors. The settlement of the breach of fiduciary duty claim for the payment to the parent was for the benefit of the corporation and its shareholders. For the prior settlement to bind the trustee, the parties must be in privity with the parties to the trustee’s action. Here, the creditors for whom the trustee acts were not parties to or in privity with the shareholder derivative plaintiffs or the corporation, so the settlement does not preclude the trustee from seeking to avoid and recover the payment. Ogle v. Morgan (In re Evergreen Helicopters Int’l Inc.), 50 F.4th 547 (5th Cir. 2022).
- 2.1.c Providing administrative services to a Ponzi scheme may constitute “value.” The debtor conducted a Ponzi scheme. He employed and paid a reasonable price to an administrator to keep records, maintain his website, and handle withdrawal requests and questions from investors. The SEC instituted a receivership proceeding against the debtor. Under the UFTA, a receiver may avoid and recover a transfer made with actual intent to defraud creditors, but not to the extent a transferee gave reasonably equivalent value to the debtor in good faith. Under the Ponzi scheme presumption, the debtor’s transfers are all presumed to be made with actual intent to defraud creditors. A transferee gives value if the debtor’s net worth is preserved. Here, the services provided value to the debtor, the debtor incurred a debt for the price of the services, and the payments preserved the debtor's net worth by discharging the debt. Enabling the Ponzi scheme to continue does not negate the value the administrator provided. The administrator's knowledge, if any, of the Ponzi scheme goes to his good faith, not to whether he provided value. Georgelas v. Desert Hill Ventures, Inc., 45 F.4th 1193 (10th Cir. 2022).

- 2.1.d Trustee may not rely on FDCPA reach-back based on allowed PBGC claim. More than four years but within six years before bankruptcy, the debtor paid consultants in connection with an illegal scheme to reduce the apparent underfunding of a private, single-employer defined benefit pension plan. The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, which is a corporation that is 100% owned by the United States, had an allowed claim against the debtor for the benefit of the plan, whose benefits the PBGC guaranteed. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer avoidable by a creditor holding an allowed unsecured claim. The Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act governs collection of debts owed to the United States, but not debts the United States seeks to collect on behalf of private parties or acquires by assignment. The FDCPA has a six-year reach-back period for the United States to avoid fraudulent transfers. Because the debt to the PBGC is not a debt to the United States, the PBGC could not use the six-year reach-back period here to avoid the transfers to the consultants. Therefore, the trustee may not rely on the PBGC as a triggering creditor under section 544(b) to avoid the transfers. Shuford v. Kearns (In re JTR1, LLC), 643 B.R. 403 (Bankr. W.D. N. Car. 2022).
- 2.1.e Safe harbor does not protect refinancing loan for purchase of the debtor's stock. The debtor was the subject of an LBO. The private equity firm created a holding company that acquired the debtor's stock using the proceeds of a bank loan to the holding company. A month later, the bank loan was refinanced with a loan to the debtor that was guaranteed by the holding company. A chapter 7 case ensued a year later. Section 544(b) permits a trustee to avoid a transfer that is voidable by a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim. The UVTA permits a creditor to avoid a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property that is made for less than a reasonably equivalent value while the debtor was insolvent and to recover the value of the transfer from the transferee or the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. If a transfer is avoidable by an unsecured creditor, the trustee need not separately avoid the transfer to recover from the transfer's beneficiary. Section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding under section 544 a settlement payment in connection with a securities contract to or for the benefit of a financial institution. Section 546(e) does not prohibit a creditor from avoiding such a transfer. The court need not determine whether the trustee may actually avoid the transfer, because "avoidability," not "avoidance," is the element of the trustee's claim. Therefore, the trustee may step into the creditor's shoes and assert the claim for recovery without first avoiding the transfer and without triggering the section 546(e) prohibition. In addition, section 546(e) applies only if the settlement payment is made "in connection with" a securities contract. "In connection with" implies a meaningful connection, consistent with the statute's purpose to protect the securities markets, with the transfer. Because the transfer here was made a month after the holding company's purchase of the debtor's equity securities, it was not made in connection with the purchase. Petr v. BMO Harris Bank, N.A. ((in re BWGS, LLC), 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 2313 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. Aug. 18, 2022).
- 2.1.f Termination of ownership interest before transfer precludes fraudulent transfer liability. The debtor provided retail electric service to its customers. When it failed to pay the wholesaler, the regulator terminated its right to service retail customers. Upon the termination, the regulator transferred the customers to a new provider. The trustee may avoid a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property if made within two years before bankruptcy for less than reasonably equivalent value while the debtor was insolvent. In this case, because the termination of the debtor's right to service its customers terminated before the customers were transferred to the new provider, the new provider did not receive an interest of the debtor in property and is not liable for a fraudulent transfer. Nelms v. TXU Retail Energy Co. LLC (In re Gritty Energy LLC), 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 2888 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Oct. 6, 2022).

- 2.1.g A bank's customer is a financial institution for purposes of section 546(e)'s safe harbor. The debtor's special purpose entity, which issued notes under note purchase agreements to facilitate the debtor's Ponzi scheme, transferred payments on the notes, as provided in the agreement, to the note holder at the holder's custodial account at a bank. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a settlement payment or made in connection with a securities contract and that is by or to (or for the benefit of) a financial institution. The Code defines "financial institution" to include a customer of a bank when the bank is acting as agent or custodian for the customer. The bank was an agent or custodian for the note holder, because it received the note payments into a custodial account for the note holder. Therefore, the note holder was a financial institution. The note is a security. But the court below did not adequately examine whether the transfer was made in connection with a securities contract. Therefore, the court remands for that determination. Kelley v. Safe Harbor Managed Account 101, Ltd., 31 F.4th 1058 (8th Cir. 2022).
- 2.1.h Imposition and payment of a tax penalty is not a fraudulent transfer. While insolvent, the debtor incurred and paid tax penalties before bankruptcy. A transfer of property of the debtor while the debtor was insolvent for less than reasonably equivalent value is avoidable as a constructively fraudulent transfer. By referring to an exchange for value and defining when a transfer is made as when it takes effect between the parties, the UFTA does not contemplate involuntary obligations such as tax penalties. Therefore, the UFTA does not apply to a tax penalty. Cook v. U.S. (In re Yahweh Center, Inc.), 27 F.4th 960(4th Cir. 2022).
- 2.1.i Tax foreclosure sale for the amount of taxes owing is subject to attack as a fraudulent transfer. The debtor defaulted on property taxes. In accordance with state law, the local taxing authority foreclosed on the property by bidding in the amount of the taxes, which was about 10% of the fair market value of the property. The debtor filed a chapter 13 case and brought a constructive fraudulent transfer action under section 548(a)(1)(B) to avoid the foreclosure sale. Section 548(a)(1)(B) permits a trustee (or a chapter 13 debtor) to avoid a transfer of property of the debtor made for less than reasonably equivalent value within two years before the petition date while the debtor was insolvent. In BFP v. Res. Trust Corp., 511 U.S. 531 (1994), the Supreme Court held that a regularly conducted, non-collusive mortgage foreclosure sale resulted in reasonably equivalent value and so was not subject to avoidance as a fraudulent transfer. However, the Court did not address tax foreclosures. In this case, the ability of the taxing authority to purchase the property without an auction for a price that had no relation to the property's value gave rise to potential fraudulent transfer liability. Lowry v. Southfield Neighborhood Revitalization Initiative (In re Lowry), ___ F.4th ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 13042 (6th Cir. Dec. 27, 2021).
- 2.1.j Trustee may avoid transfer as actual fraudulent transfer only if ultimate decision-maker has fraudulent intent. Before entering into a two-step LBO transaction, the debtor formed a special board committee of independent directors, which hired professional advisers. Each step required separate financing. It sought solvency opinions for each step of the transaction. The opinions were based on management projections, but before the issuance of the first opinion, management had concluded the company would not make the projections, yet the opining firm was not advised of this new information. The transaction's first step closed using borrowed money, and major shareholders, who were represented on the board, sold their shares. Before the second step, management revised its projections again. The opining firm, based on management misrepresentations, ultimately issued a second solvency opinion. Although two other advisers did not agree with the opinion, they did not try to stop the transaction, which then closed. The company failed one year later. The liquidating trustee sued to avoid the transactions as actual fraudulent transfers. A corporation can act only through individuals; state law determines who has authority to act for the corporation—in this case, the board of directors—which delegated its authority to the special committee. Actual fraudulent intent can be established only through the intent of the individuals who have the authority to control the transfer. Here, the management projections may have misled the special committee and the advisers, but there was no allegation that the board itself intended to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Moreover, it is “unreasonable to assume actual fraudulent intent whenever the members of a board [stand] to profit from a transaction they recommended or approved.” Therefore, the complaint fails to allege actual fraudulent intent adequately, and the court dismisses the complaint. In re Tribune Co. Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, 10 F. 4th 147 (2d Cir. 2021).

- 2.1.k Leveraged recapitalization through a financial institution agent is safe harbored from state law intentional and constructive fraudulent transfer claims. The debtor engaged in a leveraged recapitalization, borrowing from three groups of lenders to redeem equity interests and make distributions to equity holders. The funds flowed from the lenders to the subsidiary’s and the parent’s bank accounts to a bank disbursing agent’s account to the equity holders. The debtor retained control over the disbursing agent, who operated and made disbursements only according to the debtor’s instructions. After bankruptcy, the lenders assigned their state fraudulent conveyance claims to the chapter 11 plan’s liquidating trustee, who brought an action under the Bankruptcy Code avoiding powers and on the creditors’ claims against the equity holders. Applicable state fraudulent conveyance law permits a creditor to avoid and recover a transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors (an intentional fraudulent transfer) or made for less than fair consideration while the debtor was insolvent (constructively fraudulent transfer). Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a settlement payment or is made under securities contract by or to or for the benefit of a financial institution except under section 548(a)(1)(A) (Bankruptcy Code intentional fraudulent transfer). A financial institution includes a bank’s customer when the bank is acting as agent for the customer. Section 546(e) applies not only to the Code’s avoiding powers (other than section 548(a)(1)(A)) but also to state fraudulent transfer laws, whether the trustee is suing under the trustee’s own Code avoiding powers or as assignee of the creditors’ state law avoiding powers and whether the action is to avoid a constructive or an intentional fraudulent transfer. Here, the disbursing agent acted as an agent of the debtor, which was its customer; the equity interests were securities, which were transferred under a securities contract between the debtor and the holders upon a settlement payment for the purchase of the securities. As a result, the transfers to the equity holders were protected by the safe harbor. Holliday v. K Road Power Mgmt., LLC (In re Boston Generating LLC), 617 B.R. 442 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2020) aff’d Holliday v. Credit Suisse Securities (USA) LLC, ___ B.R. ___ (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 13, 2021).
- 2.1.l Trustee may not sue intermediate transferee to evade the safe harbor. The debtor owned securities of a subsidiary. In step one, it transferred the securities to an SPV. In step two, the SPV pledged the securities to an indenture trustee to secure notes the SPV issued to purchase another company. The liquidating trustee sued to avoid the step one transfer as a constructive fraudulent transfer. Section 546(e) safe harbors a transfer that is a settlement payment or a transfer made in connection with a securities contract by, to, or for the benefit of a financial institution. In determining whether the safe harbor applies, the court must identify the relevant transfer, which is the “overarching transfer the trustee seeks to avoid under one of the substantive avoidance powers.” The trustee may not escape that requirement by seeking to avoid an intermediate transfer and suing institutions protected by the safe harbor as subsequent transferees under section 550(a), to which the safe harbor does not apply. The step one and step two transfers here were part of a single integrated transaction, which was the transfer through the SPV to the indenture trustee to secure the notes. The underlying transaction involved the purchase of the target company’s securities, and the indenture trustee is a financial institution.

Therefore, the safe harbor applies, and the trustee may not avoid the transfer. SunEdison Litig. Trust v. Seller Note, LLC (In re SunEdison, Inc.), 620 B.R. 505 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2020).

- 2.1.m Payments to a Ponzi schemer’s administrative services provider are recoverable fraudulent transfers. The defendant provided administrative services to a Ponzi schemer. The services included preparing spreadsheets, circulating spreadsheets and statements to investors, receiving and maintaining investor agreements, coordinating withdrawal requests, and serving as the conduit for investor questions. The services helped ensure the smoother operation of the scheme, which helped entice new investors. All transfers by a Ponzi schemer are presumptively fraudulent transfers, but a defendant who gave reasonably equivalent value in good faith is not liable. Here, the defendant’s involvement in maintaining the scheme, despite the lack of knowledge that the business was a Ponzi scheme, negated any claim of reasonably equivalent value. Georgelas v. Desert Hill Ventures, Inc., 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 564 (D. Utah. Jan. 4, 2021).
- 2.1.n The UVTA does not require showing of actual injury to avoid actual fraudulent transfer. The judgment debtor divided his property with his wife under a community property regime. The record was unclear on whether the debtor had sufficient assets to satisfy the judgment without the transferred assets. The creditor sued to avoid the transfer under the Uniform Voidable Transaction Act as a transaction with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Under the statutory language, the creditor had to prove only the transfer of an asset made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud. He did not have to show that he suffered actual injury from the transfer. Stadmueller v. Sarkisian (In re Medina), 619 B.R. 236 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2020).
- 2.1.o LBO fraudulent transferee was not a “customer” of a financial institution. As part of a complex series of related transactions, the debtor entered into a note purchase agreement with an investment bank. The agreement specifically disclaimed that the bank was acting as the debtor’s agent or owed the debtor any fiduciary duty. The note proceeds were to be used to pay the debtor’s shareholders to purchase their shares. The investment bank paid the proceeds directly to the shareholders. The trustee sought to avoid the payment as a fraudulent transfer. Section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a settlement payment or a transfer in connection with a securities contract “made by or to (or for the benefit of) a ... financial institution” except under section 548(a)(1)(A) as an intentional fraudulent transfer. Under Merit Mgmt Group, LP v. FTI Consulting, Inc., 138 S. Ct. 883 (2018), section 546(e)’s focus is on the transfer to be avoided, without regard to any component parts of the transfer. Here, the trustee sought to avoid the transfer to the shareholders, without regard to the transfer by the bank as a component part of the transfer. However, a financial institution includes not only a bank but also, when the bank “is acting as agent or custodian for a customer ... in connection with a securities contract ... such customer.” An agency relationship requires that the principal vest in the agent authority to act on the principal’s behalf, subject to the principal’s control, and the agent consents to act. The relationship requires more than an agreement to effect a transaction as an intermediary. Otherwise, any service provider would qualify as an agent. Here, the note purchase agreement expressly disclaims the bank’s role as an agent. None of the other agreements in the related transactions expressed an agency relationship. The Code defines “custodian” in terms of one acting to enforce claims. Because the Code contains a definition of custodian, the court may not look to other sources to determine whether the bank qualified as the shareholder’s (or debtor’s) custodian. The transactions did not involve debt collection, and none of the prongs of the custodian definition applied. Therefore, the court denies the defendants’ motion for summary judgment on section 546(e) grounds. Buchwald Cap. Advs., LLC v. Papas (In re Greektown Holdings, LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 2938 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. Oct. 19, 2020).
- 2.1.p Holder of joint bank account with fraudulent debtor is not liable as a fraudulent transferee. The debtor opened a joint bank account as an accommodation to a friend, who funded the account. The debtor agreed the account would contain only the friend’s money, and, though they both had signatory authority, the debtor would not use the account. Without telling the friend, the debtor later transferred $1 million into the account and simultaneously wrote a check from the account to a company he owned. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the friend to avoid and recover the fraudulent transfer into the account. A recipient of funds is not necessarily a “transferee” for purposes of section 550(a). Having dominion and control is necessary but not sufficient to find the recipient to be a transferee, rather than a conduit. Here, none of the requirements were met. Because the debtor simultaneously wrote a check draining the account, the friend was completely unaware of the deposit, and the friend did not authorize or participate in the debtor’s use of the account, the friend did not have effective dominion or control over the deposit. Nor did the debtor intend to transfer the funds to the friend. He intended to transfer only to his other company, with the joint account acting only as a waystation in the scheme. Therefore, the friend was not a transferee and is not liable to the trustee. Jalbert v. Gryaznova (In re Bicom NY, LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 2458 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Sept. 21, 2020).

- 2.1.q Court extends section 546(a) two-year statute of limitations under Rule 9006(b). The trustee investigated the debtor’s extensive fraud scheme but encountered resistance from many fraud participants and record keepers. The trustee moved for an extension of the section 546(a) statute of limitations for bankruptcy causes of action. Rule 9006(b) authorizes the court to enlarge the time specified in any rule or order of court (with some exceptions) for taking any action. The Rule applies equally to statutory deadlines. Therefore, the court has authority to extend the statute of limitation and, based on the record in this case, concludes that it should. In re Campbellton-Graceville Hosp. Corp., 616 B.R. 177 (Bankr. N.D. Fla. 2020).
- 2.1.r Bank account deposit is not a “transfer” for UFTA purposes. The receivership debtors ran a Ponzi scheme. Acting under the state Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act, the receiver sued the debtors’ bank to avoid bank deposits as transfers made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. The UFTA defines “transfer” as any mode, direct or indirect, of disposing of or parting with an interest in property. Although a deposit to a bank account transfers title to the money to the bank, it remains subject to an unfettered right of withdrawal and is tantamount to cash. The depositor never relinquishes its interest in or control over the funds. Accordingly, the deposit is not a transfer for purposes of the UFTA. Isaiah v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A., 960 F.3d 1296 (11th Cir. 2020).
- 2.1.s CEO’s intent may be imputed to corporation to prove actual fraudulent transfer. In financial distress, the debtor agreed with its banks to a substantial paydown of the loans, restructuring of the credit facility and of the company, and release of all claims against the banks. The CEO drove the process, which was ultimately approved by the board, for his own personal gain. He knew or should have known that the transactions would render the company insolvent, unable to recover, and unable to pay its other creditors. After the debtor filed chapter 11, the trustee sued the banks to avoid and recover the paydowns and avoid the releases. The trustee may avoid a transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. A transferor that believes, appreciates, or knows the natural consequences of the transfer will hinder or delay or defraud creditors has the requisite actual intent. A corporate officer is an agent of the corporation. An agent’s intent may be imputed to his principal if the agent’s act falls within the scope of the agent’s employment or their corporate authority. Imputation may occur even if the agent is not in a position to control the transferor; rather, traditional rules of agency law apply. Here, the CEO acted within his authority in negotiating the transactions, so his intent may be imputed to the debtor, and because he appreciated the consequences of the transaction on other creditors, his intent met the requirements of an actual fraudulent transfer. Sher v. JPMorgan Chase Funding (In re Thornburg Mortgage, Inc.), 610 B.R. 807 (Bankr. D. Md. 2019).
- 2.1.t Court limits fraudulent transfer recovery in chapter 7 to amount of creditor claims. The chapter 7 trustee sued to avoid a prepetition restructuring transaction as a fraudulent transfer and to recover the value of the property transferred, which exceeded the total amount of claims asserted against the estate. Section 550(a) permits recovery of an avoided transfer “for the benefit of the estate.” The Third Circuit has construed that phrase to mean for the benefit of creditors. A recovery by a reorganizing or reorganized chapter 11 debtor might benefit creditors if they have a continuing interest in the reorganized debtor, but creditors do not receive a benefit from a recovery in excess of the amounts necessary to satisfy all allowed claims specified in sections 726(a)(1)–(5). Therefore, the court limits the trustee’s recovery to amounts payable under those provisions. Giuliano v. Schnabel (In re DSI Renal Holdings, LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 20920 Bankr. LEXIS 283 (Bankr. D. Del. Feb. 4, 2020).

- 2.1.u Section 546(e) applies to an LBO transaction effected through a financial institution. The debtor was the subject of an LBO. In connection with the LBO tender offer, the debtor retained as “depository” a trust company, which performed multiple services for the debtor, including receiving the tendered shares and paying shareholders. Within a year after the LBO, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The bankruptcy court granted creditors stay relief to bring constructive fraudulent transfer actions in nonbankruptcy courts against the cashed-out shareholders, which they did. Section 546(e) provides that notwithstanding sections 544 and 548, a trustee may not avoid, among other things, a transfer by or to a financial institution in connection with a securities contract. Section 101(22) defines “financial institution” to include a trust company and its customer, when the trust company is acting as agent or custodian for a customer. A customer is one for whom the financial institution provides services, and an agent is one who acts for the customer. A securities contract includes a contract to repurchase securities. Although the share purchases here were redemptions, redemption includes repurchase. Because the debtor contracted with the trust company to provide it services and the trust company acted as the debtor’s agent in performing those services in connection with the purchase of its shares, the debtor was a financial institution whose transfers are insulated from avoidance under section 546(e). Therefore, the cash transfers to the former shareholders are shielded by section 546(e). In re Tribune Co. Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, 946 F.3d 66 (2d Cir. 2019).
- 2.1.v Section 546(e) applies to postbankruptcy creditor actions to avoid transfers. The debtor was the subject of an LBO. In connection with the LBO tender offer, the debtor retained as “depository” a trust company, which performed multiple services for the debtor, including receiving the tendered shares and paying shareholders. Within a year after the LBO, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The bankruptcy court granted creditors stay relief to bring constructive fraudulent transfer actions in nonbankruptcy courts against the cashed-out shareholders, which they did. Section 546(e) provides that notwithstanding sections 544 and 548, a trustee may not avoid, among other things, a transfer by or to a financial institution in connection with a securities contract, which the court determined applied to the share purchases. State laws are preempted to the extent of any conflict with a federal statute, such as when state law stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment of Congress’s objectives. A presumption against preemption arises when Congress legislates in a traditionally state law area. Here, however, the area is Congress’s authority over bankruptcy, not state debtor-creditor law, defeating any presumption against preemption. Congress’s purpose in enacting section 546(e) was extensive protection of the securities markets, which conflicts with permitting creditor fraudulent transfer actions to avoid transactions that are subject to section 546(e). Therefore, the court dismisses the creditor constructive fraudulent transfer actions. In re Tribune Co. Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, 946 F.3d 66 (2d Cir. 2019).
- 2.1.w For purposes of the avoiding powers, the debtor has a sufficient interest in property obtained by fraud or illegal means. The debtor conducted a combined Ponzi/pyramid scheme. New participants received an invoice from the debtor for their “membership” fees, but most paid the invoice directly to the existing participant who recruited them, and the existing participant’s account with the debtor was debited by the amount of payment. After bankruptcy, the trustee obtained an order determining net winners and net losers based on total cash in/cash out from each participant, regardless of whether the participant had paid the debtor directly or had paid the recruiting participant. The trustee then brought preference and fraudulent transfer actions against net winners. A group of net losers brought a class action against net winners for unjust enrichment. The trustee sought to enjoin that action. A trustee may avoid a transfer of property of the debtor under section 547 (preference) or 548 (fraudulent transfer). For these purposes, “property of the debtor” is property that would have become property of the estate if it had not been transferred, including property in which the debtor did not have a possessory interest. Transactions induced by fraud are merely voidable, not void. Here, because the debtor designed and implemented the payment system, moneys paid by new participants to recruiters were functionally the same as money paid to the debtor, and since none of the participants sought to void the transactions, the debtor had an interest in those funds. Darr v. Dos Santos (In re Telexfree, LLC), 941 F.3d 576 (1st Cir. 2019).

2.1.x Under the Texas UFTA, a transferee who knows facts that raise a suspicion of fraud takes in good faith only if the transferee investigates. The debtor conducted a Ponzi scheme. An investor received substantial transfers (withdrawals) from the debtor. The investor knew of facts relating to the withdrawal that would have raised suspicion in a reasonable person that the transaction was fraudulent. However, the investor did not investigate. If the investor had investigated, he would not have been able to uncover the fraud, that is, the investigation would have been fruitless. The UFTA gives a transferee who takes for reasonably equivalent value and in good faith a defense to avoidance of a fraudulent transfer. Good faith requires honesty in fact that is reasonable in light of the known facts and no willful ignorance of fraud. A transferee on inquiry notice of fraud does not meet that standard unless the transferee investigates, because the transferee is charged with constructive knowledge of the facts an investigation would reveal. But failing to investigate amounts after knowing facts that create a suspicion of fraud amounts to willful ignorance, whether or not an investigation would have revealed the fraud. Therefore, a transferee who knows facts sufficient to create a suspicion of fraud is not in good faith without a diligent investigation. Janvey v. GMAC, L.L.C., ___ Tex. ___, 2019 Tex. LEXIS 1267 (Dec. 20, 2019).

2.1.y The financial contracts safe harbor protects a transaction with a financial institution’s “customer.” The debtor engaged a bank to act as depository and as exchange agent for the purchase of its shares in an LBO. When the debtor later failed and filed bankruptcy, the court authorized the creditors’ committee to pursue fraudulent transfer claims against the selling shareholders under section 548(a)(1)(B) (intentional fraudulent transfers). Upon the Supreme Court’s decision in Merit Mgmt. Grp., LP v. FTI Consulting, Inc., 138 S. Ct. 883 (2018), reversing previously controlling precedent based on the section 546(e) financial contracts safe harbor that prevented the committee from pursuing claims under section 548(a)(1)(B) (constructive fraudulent transfer), the committee sought leave to amend its complaint to add claims under the latter section. The court may not permit an amendment that would be futile. If the safe harbor still applied, the amendment would be futile. The safe harbor shields transfers made “by a financial institution.” A “financial institution” is “an entity that is a commercial or savings bank, ... and, when any such ... entity is acting as agent or custodian for a customer (whether or not a ‘customer’, as defined in section 741) in connection with a securities contract ... such customer.” Because the definition excludes the “customer” definition in section 741, the court must give “customer” its ordinary meaning. The debtor purchased services from the bank and therefore was the bank’s customer. The services were in connection with the purchase of the debtor’s shares under a contract to purchase the shares. Therefore, the debtor falls within the definition of “financial institution.” The transfer to the selling shareholders was by the debtor as a financial institution in connection with a securities contract and therefore is protected by section 546(e). In re Tribune Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, ___ B.R. ___, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69081 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 23, 2019).

- 2.1.z Section 548(c)'s "futility exception" to the good faith defense does not apply under Texas law. A receiver sued a Ponzi scheme investor under the Texas Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act (TUFTA) to avoid and recover the investor's withdrawals from the scheme. Like Bankruptcy Code section 548(c), TUFTA gives a fraudulent transfer defendant a defense if the defendant received the transfer for value and in good faith. A transferee who had inquiry notice of the fraud does not take in good faith, unless the transferee actually conducts a diligent investigation and does not uncover the fraud. Section 548(c) permits the transferee a defense if the transferee shows a diligent investigation would not have uncovered the fraud, that is, if the investigation would have been futile. Under TUFTA, if the transferee had inquiry notice, then failure to investigate prevents a good faith finding no matter what the investigation might or might not have revealed. The Bankruptcy Code futility exception does not apply. Janvey v. GMAG, L.L.C., 913 F.3d 452 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 2.1.aa Ponzi scheme presumption applies to transferees other than investors. The individual debtor conducted a Ponzi scheme. He used some of the scheme proceeds to gamble, in the hope of winning enough to repay his investors. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the casino to avoid the debtor's losses as actual fraudulent transfers. Under the Ponzi scheme presumption, transfers in furtherance of a Ponzi scheme are presumed to be made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. The presumption is not limited to transfers to investors in the scheme but applies equally to any transfer made to further the scheme. Because the debtor gambled and made transfers to the casino in the amount of his losses in the hopes of winning enough to keep the scheme going, the presumption applies. Pergament v. Marina Dist. Devel. Co., LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 177765 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 11, 2018).
- 2.1.bb Fraudulent transferee gets credit for returning transferred property to the debtor. Facing a judgment against his company, a physician transferred substantial sums from the company to another company he owned. Over the next year, the other company returned all the transferred funds. The first company filed bankruptcy a few years later. The trustee sought to avoid the transfers under the Pennsylvania Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act as transfers made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors and to recover the transferred sums under section 550(a). The trustee proved actual intent, and the court granted judgment avoiding the transfers. However, courts have limited recovery under section 550(a) based on equitable principles consistent with the Bankruptcy Code's purpose. The purpose here is remedial, not punitive. Because the property was returned, the creditors were not harmed. Permitting recovery of the property that was already returned to the debtor would give the estate a windfall. Therefore, the court denies the trustee's ability to recover the transferred property. Holber v. Nikparvar (In re Incare, LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 1339 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. May 7, 2018).
- 2.1.cc No indemnification claim against fraudulent transfer codefendant. The debtor transferred cash to its shareholder, who deposited it in, and then used it to purchase a certificate of deposit from bank A, which he pledged to bank B to secure a loan to an unrelated entity. The loan defaulted, and bank B foreclosed on the CD. The trustee sued both banks to avoid the transfer as a fraudulent transfer and recover the cash. Common law indemnity allows an innocent party who is liable to another because of vicarious, constructive, derivative, or technical liability, to claim over against another whose fault caused the plaintiff's loss. Here, the complaint sought direct, not derivative, relief against each bank. Each was potentially independently liable to the trustee for avoidance and recovery. Therefore, indemnity does not apply. Dunn v. Mercantile Commercebank, N.A. (In re GPC Miami Inc.), 582 B.R. 534 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2018).
- 2.1.dd Supreme Court narrows financial transactions avoiding power safe harbors. While insolvent, the debtor significantly overpaid for the stock of a competitor. The debtor funded the purchase price by a bank loan, which was wired directly to another bank who acted as escrow agent for the purchase transaction. At closing, the escrow bank paid the selling shareholders.

After the debtor filed bankruptcy, the trustee brought an action to avoid and recover the payment to the selling shareholder as a constructively fraudulent transfer. Section 546(e) provides that notwithstanding the trustee's avoiding powers, a trustee may not avoid a transfer that is a settlement payment or a payment made in connection with a securities contract "by or to (or for the benefit of)" a financial institution. Here, a financial institution made the initial payment into escrow, and another financial institution made the payment to the shareholder, though neither financial institution had any beneficial interest in the payment. Section 546(e) is closely coordinated with the avoiding powers themselves, so it should be construed as negating only the transfer that the trustee seeks to avoid under the avoiding powers. Here, the transfer the trustee seeks to avoid is the transfer to the selling shareholder, not either of the intermediate transfers by and to the two financial institutions. Because the transferee of the transfer that the trustee seeks to avoid is not a financial institution (or any other kind of entity that section 546(e) protects), the safe harbor by its terms does not apply. Merit Mgmt Group, LP v. FTI Consulting, Inc., 583 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 883 (2018).

- 2.1. ee Trustee may transfer section 544(b) claims. The debtor's largest creditor had sued the debtor and numerous transferees before bankruptcy for fraudulent transfers the debtor had made. After bankruptcy, the trustee took over the claims under section 544(b). After a partial settlement of one action, the trustee transferred the remaining claims back to the creditor, which continued to pursue them in district court. The creditor agreed to waive its claim in the case and to pay over to the trustee any amount by which its recovery exceeded its underlying nondischargeable claim against the debtor. A trustee may not transfer an asset that is not property of the estate. A majority of decisions hold that a section 544(b) claim is property of the estate. Although some courts have held that a trustee may not transfer avoiding power claims that arise only under the Bankruptcy Code, a section 544(b) claim differs, because the claim exists before bankruptcy, and the trustee only steps into the creditors' shoes for such a claim. The trustee may transfer such claims where doing so is necessary and beneficial to the estate. In this case, the transfer facilitated a partial settlement, which brought funds into the estate, eliminated the largest claim against the estate, and provided the possibility of additional recovery if the creditor pursued the claim successfully. Accordingly, the court approved the transfer. Cedar Rapids Lodge & Suites, LLC v. Seibert, ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47912 (D. Minn. Feb. 7, 2018).
- 2.1. ff "Jewel" waiver is not a transfer of property. Before a law firm partnership dissolved, its partners signed an amendment to their partnership agreement that waived any claim of the partnership to any portion of fees that the partners might earn at their new firms, a so-called Jewel v. Boxer waiver. After dissolution, partners joined other law firms and performed work on matters previously handled at the dissolved law firm on an hourly fee basis. The dissolved law firm filed a chapter 11 petition. After plan confirmation, the liquidating trustee sued the partners' new law firms for a share of the profits the new firms earned from the transferred hourly-rate matters, claiming that the waiver transferred property of the law firm to the partners and their new law firms. Because clients have the right to retain and dismiss counsel at any time, the law firm did not have a property interest in future hourly-rate fees that the clients might pay to the former partners. The law firm had a mere expectancy, the loss of which upon dissolution and transfer of pending matters, did not constitute a transfer of an interest in property. Heller Ehrman LLP v. Davis Wright Tremaine LLP, 4 Cal. 5th 467 (2018).
- 2.1. gg Trustee has a right to a jury trial in a fraudulent transfer avoiding power action. The trustee sued a lender to avoid a fraudulent transfer. The debtor had fully paid the loan, and the lender had not filed a proof of claim. The loan agreement waived the debtor's right to a jury trial. A fraudulent transfer avoiding power action that seeks to recover a money judgment is an action at law, in which the parties each have a Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial. The debtor's prepetition waiver of a jury trial right does not apply to an action that the Bankruptcy Code creates and vests in the trustee. Because the creditor did not file a proof of claim, the action is not part of the claims allowance process, which is a core proceeding in which the parties do not have a jury trial right. The creditor's possible assertion of a claim under section 502(h) upon payment of any judgment the trustee might obtain does not convert the action to one that involves the claims allowance process. Therefore, the trustee has a right to a jury trial in the action. Bakst v. Bank Leumi, USA (In re D.I.T., Inc.), 575 B.R. 524 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2017).

- 2.1.hh Delaware UFTA does not permit avoidance of a transfer by a non-debtor. To evade paying a judgment, Venezuela caused its indirect third-tier U.S. subsidiary to incur debt and to transfer the proceeds as dividends through the subsidiary's parent and "grandparent" corporations to Venezuela. The creditor sued the parent, which was not liable on the judgment, to avoid and recover the transfer as an actual fraudulent transfer under the Delaware Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act (DUFTA). DUFTA permits a creditor to avoid a "transfer made ... by a debtor ... if the debtor made the transfer ... with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor of the debtor." This statute requires proof of three elements: a transfer, by the debtor, with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor. The transfer was part of a scheme to remove assets from the United States to hinder or delay U.S. creditors. But the actual transferor was not liable on the creditor's judgment and therefore not a debtor to the creditor. DUFTA does not apply to a transfer to a debtor, only a transfer by a debtor. Therefore, the court dismissed the action. Crystallex Int'l Corp. v. Petróleos de Venezuela, S.A., ___ F.3d ___, 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 95 (3d Cir. Jan. 3, 2018).
- 2.1.ii Trustee may use FDCPA and IRC for longer reach-back periods. More than four years before bankruptcy, the debtor made transfers that the trustee alleged were fraudulent transfers. The applicable state fraudulent transfer law provided a four-year reach-back period. One of the debtor's major creditors was the IRS, who had a substantial allowed unsecured claim. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer that is avoidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an allowed unsecured claim. The Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act, in 28 U.S.C. § 3306(b)(2), gives the federal government, as creditor, a six-year reach-back period to avoid a fraudulent transfer. "Applicable nonbankruptcy law" as used in section 544(b) is broader than state law and includes applicable federal law. Congress intended section 544(b) to be expansive. Although the FDCPA provides that it "shall not be construed to supersede or modify the operation of ... title 11," using it under section 544(b) does not modify the Bankruptcy Code's operation, because section 544(b) expressly contemplates using applicable law. Section 6901 of the Internal Revenue Code permits the IRS to assess and collect liability of a transferee of the taxpayer. Assessment amounts only to recording the liability and does not authorize an action against the transferee. But the IRS may rely on state fraudulent transfer law to pursue a transferee, and unless Congress provides otherwise, the statute of limitations does not run against the sovereign. Therefore, the IRS's reach-back period is unlimited. The trustee's reliance on the IRS as the triggering creditor does not involve the trustee's exercise of sovereign powers, so the trustee may use the IRS's claim under section 544(b). Hillen v. City of Many Trees, LLC (In re CVAH, Inc.), 570 B.R. 816 (Bankr. D. Id. 2017).
- 2.1.jj Section 548(a)(1) applies extraterritorially to transfers from a California to a German supplier under a German contract. The California debtor issued payments from the United States to a German supplier under a development contract and a supply contract using funds provided under a Department of Energy loan program. The contracts provided for milestones to be achieved at the supplier's production facilities in Germany, German governing law and jurisdiction, and payment in euros. The debtor filed bankruptcy before receiving any products under the contracts. Under section 548(a)(1)(B), the trustee may avoid a transfer of property of the debtor in exchange for less than reasonably equivalent value made within two years before bankruptcy and while the debtor was insolvent. There is a presumption against applying a statute extraterritorially. To determine whether section 548(a) applies extraterritorially, the court must first determine whether the regulated or proscribed conduct occurred outside the United States and, if so, determine whether Congress intended the statute to apply to such extraterritorial conduct. Here, the transfers' center of gravity was in Germany, so the regulated conduct occurred outside the United States. Section 548(a) permits avoidance of a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property. Under section 541(a)(1), property of the estate includes all interests of the debtor in property, wherever located. It would be anomalous to include property wherever located in property of the estate but not to include such property in the avoiding powers. Reading those sections together, the court concludes that Congress intended section 548(a) to apply extraterritorially, just as section 541(a)(1) does. Emerald Cap. Adv. Corp. v. Bayerische Moteren Werke Aktiengesellschaft (In re FAH Liquidating Corp.), 572 B.R. 117 (Bankr. D. Del. 2017).

- 2.1.kk German fraudulent transfer law applies to transfers from a California company to a German supplier under a German contract. A little more than two years before bankruptcy, the California debtor issued payments from the United States to a German supplier under a development contract and a supply contract using funds provided under a Department of Energy loan program. The contracts provided for milestones to be achieved at the supplier's production facilities in Germany, German governing law and jurisdiction, and payment in euros. The debtor filed bankruptcy before receiving any products under the contracts. Under section 544(b), the trustee may avoid a transfer of property of the debtor that a creditor may avoid under applicable nonbankruptcy law. California fraudulent transfer law permits avoidance of a transfer made within four years before the commencement of the action; German law provides a shorter period that would not cover the transfers. The court should apply the "most significant relationship" choice of law standard used for tort and restitution claims to determine which law to apply in a fraudulent transfer action. Here, although the transfers originated in the United States, the contracts are governed by German law, they provide exclusive jurisdiction in the German courts to resolve disputes, and the contract performance was to take place in Germany. Therefore, Germany has the most significant relationships, and German law applies. Emerald Cap. Adv. Corp. v. Bayerische Moteren Werke Aktiengesellschaft (In re FAH Liquidating Corp.), 572 B.R. 117 (Bankr. D. Del. 2017).
- 2.1.ii Where debtor defrauds a single creditor, the Ponzi scheme presumption is unavailable. The debtor factored invoices with a lender. At some point, the debtor began creating phony invoices to factor. To repay the factor the amounts advanced on the phony invoices, the debtor created new phony invoices, and so on, until the scheme collapsed. The trustee sued the factor to recover the debtor's payments as fraudulent transfers. The Ponzi scheme presumption permits the finding, without further proof, that every transfer was made with actual intent to defraud creditors. The presumption applies only in a Ponzi scheme, which is a fraudulent investment scheme in which the fraudster uses money invested by later investors to pay prior investors, creating the illusion of profitability. Here, there was only one investor, the factor, so the Ponzi scheme presumption does not apply. And a debtor's transfer to a creditor of the creditors' own collateral is not a fraudulent transfer, because the creditor already has rights in the property, and the transfer does not deplete the estate. So the transfers are not avoidable as fraudulent transfers. Ehrlich v. Comm'l Factors of Atlanta, 567 B.R. 684 (N.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 2.1.mm A deposit into an unrestricted bank account is not a "transfer." The debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. During the scheme, he deposited scheme funds that he had received into his personal bank account. The trustee sued the bank to avoid and recover the deposits as actual fraudulent transfers. Section 101(54) defines "transfer" as any "mode, direct or indirect ... of disposing of or parting with" property or an interest in property. When the debtor deposited funds into his unrestricted bank account, he continued to have possession, custody, and control over the funds, and they were equally available to his creditors before bankruptcy and to his trustee after bankruptcy. He did not dispose of or part with property, so the deposits were not "transfers." Ivey v. First Citizens Bank & Tr. Co. (In re Whitley), 848 F.3d 205 (4th Cir. 2017).

- 2.1.nn A deposit into a bank account is not a “transfer.” The debtor ran a Ponzi scheme, using two principal companies. The bank lent to one of the companies. The debtor received deposits from investors into the debtor’s bank account, retained some of the funds in the account, and paid the bank’s loan with other funds in the account. The trustee may avoid a transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Under the Ponzi scheme presumption, any transfer the debtor makes is such a transfer. However, the debtor’s deposits into the bank account were not transfers. A transfer is any mode, direct or indirect, of disposing of or parting with property or with an interest in property. A transfer occurs only when the recipient acquires dominion and control over the transferred property. The debtor’s right to withdraw the deposits deprived the bank of dominion and control, so there was no transfer. However, the loan payments were transfers to the bank and were therefore avoidable. Meoli v. The Huntington Nat’l Bank, 848 F.3d 716 (6th Cir. 2017).
- 2.1.oo Contract termination might constitute a fraudulent transfer. The defendant contracted with a publicly traded affiliate to provide management services. The contract provided a base monthly fee and additional fees for performance. It gave the affiliate the right to terminate without cause on 60 days’ notice. After the defendant encountered financial trouble, the affiliate gave notice of termination, to which the defendant agreed, waiving the 60-day notice requirement and therefore the base fee payment during the 60-day period. One of defendant’s creditors sued to collect and named the public affiliate as a defendant in a fraudulent transfer claim. A transfer is any mode of disposing of or parting with property or an interest in property. Property is anything that may be the subject of ownership. Although a contract that is in default, that may not be assigned, and that is terminable immediately is not property for purposes of the fraudulent transfer statutes, the contract here was not terminable immediately and gave the defendant the right to base fees during the 60-day notice period. Waiver of that period was a transfer of an interest in property, which was subject to avoidance and recovery under the fraudulent transfer laws. Hometown 2006-1 Valley View, L.L.C. v. Prime Income Asset Mgmt., L.L.C., 847 F.3d 302 (5th Cir. 2017).
- 2.1.pp Indirect benefit to the debtor’s other solely-owned corporation is not reasonably equivalent value to the debtor. The individual debtor loaned her corporation funds to make a loan to a third party. The third party’s corporation performed services for the debtor’s two other corporations, for which they owed the third party’s corporation an amount exceeding the loan to the third party. The debtor’s lending corporation forgave the loan to the third party in exchange for the third party’s corporation’s release of amounts owing for services to the debtor’s other corporations. The debtor was her lending corporation’s sole creditor. After the individual debtor filed bankruptcy, the trustee, acting under section 541(a)(1) to collect the debtor’s claim against her lending corporation, sued the third party under the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act to avoid the prepetition release as a fraudulent transfer by the debtor’s debtor (the lending corporation). A creditor may avoid as constructively fraudulent a transfer the debtor makes without receiving reasonably equivalent value in exchange if the debtor is insolvent or renders the debtor insolvent. Here, the debtor’s lending corporation’s release was a transfer of its sole asset—its claim against the third party. The individual debtor was the lending corporation’s sole creditor and therefore would be the sole creditor harmed by the transfer, and the individual debtor might have benefitted by the release of her other corporation’s liabilities. But that benefit inured to the other corporations, not to the individual debtor or the lending corporation, which received nothing in exchange for the release. Therefore, the third party’s corporation’s release of the debtor’s other corporations does not constitute reasonably equivalent value to the lending corporation, and the debtor’s trustee, as a creditor of the lending corporation, may avoid the release. Motorworld, Inc. v. Benkendorf, 228 N.J. 311 (2017).
- 2.1.qq Actual fraudulent transfer complaint must allege ability to control decision-making and more than “should-have-known” intent. The debtor filed bankruptcy within one year after its LBO. The trustee sued the debtor’s former public shareholders under section 548(a)(1)(A) to avoid the transfers to them to purchase their shares. Section 548(a)(1)(A) permits the trustee to avoid the debtor's transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. A corporation acts through its agents, so the court must determine its intent through its agents' intent and their ability to control the transaction. The board's special committee was in a position to control the transaction. Officers do not make corporate decisions of this level, but their intent may be imputed to the corporation if they were in a position to control the disposition of property, whether through control of the board or otherwise. The trustee alleged that the debtor's special board committee and its senior officers had the requisite intent and that its senior officers had sufficient control over the special committee's decision to determine the outcome. He alleged that they had 13% voting power, attended all special committee meetings, and manipulated information provided to an outside expert who advised the special committee. These allegations are insufficient to support a finding that the officers controlled the special committee's decision to proceed with the transaction. An allegation that the special committee should have known that the transaction would place assets beyond creditors' reach, which is more a negligence standard, is insufficient to support a finding of actual intent. More is required: either facts raising a strong inference of actual intent, either through direct proof or through badges of fraud, or at least allegations of motive and opportunity or facts constituting strong circumstantial evidence of conscious misbehavior or recklessness. The trustee's allegations do not meet any of these standards, so the court dismisses the complaint. Kirschner v. Fitzsimons (In re Tribune Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation), 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3039 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 6, 2017).

2.1.rr Section 546(e) safe harbor does not apply to transfers made only through a financial institution. The debtor was acquired in an LBO, in which the buyer borrowed the purchase price from a bank and paid the selling shareholders through a bank escrow account. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued to avoid and recover the payment to a shareholder as a fraudulent transfer. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a margin payment or settlement payment or transfer in connection with a securities contract "made by or to (or for the benefit of) ... a financial institution." "By or to" and "for the benefit of" are ambiguous, because they do not make clear whether a transfer "through" a conduit, which is both "to" and "by" the conduit, is included. Section 546(e) is a limitation on the avoiding powers in sections 544, 547 and 548, which specify transfers by the debtor that the trustee may avoid, and should be read to limit the avoidance of such transfers, not others. Similarly, section 548(c) provides a defense to a fraudulent transferee that gave value in good faith. Section 548(d)(2) defines "value" to include a margin or settlement payment that a financial institution receives. Section 548(d)(2) would be unnecessary if section 546(e) already protected all margin or settlement payments to a financial institution, and if the broad reading of section 546(e) would protect an entity not otherwise protected under section 548(d)(2) if it made its payment through a financial institution. Finally, courts interpret section 550(a) to apply only to actual transferees, not to conduits who do not have dominion or control over the transferred funds. Consistent with these other avoiding power provisions, the section 546(e) safe harbor should apply only to a transfer in which the financial institution is not a mere conduit. Therefore, the trustee may avoid the LBO payments to the selling shareholder. FTI Consulting, Inc. v. Merit Mgmt. Group, LP, 830 F.3d 690 (7th Cir. 2016).

2.1.ss Trustee may not avoid a regularly conducted competitive auction tax sale as a fraudulent transfer. The county noticed a sale for unpaid taxes of the debtor's property. The county complied with state law, which requires the sale be to the highest bidder at a competitive auction preceded by sufficient advance public notice of the sale and of details of the auction. State law provides that the county tax collector's deed is "conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings." The trustee may avoid a transfer made for less than reasonably equivalent value while the debtor was insolvent. In BFP v. Resolution Trust Corp., 511 U.S. 531 (1994), the Supreme Court held that a regularly conducted, competitive auction, non-collusive foreclosure sale of real property was not subject to avoidance as a constructive fraudulent transfer, because the sale set the property's value and therefore was, by definition, for reasonably equivalent value.

BFP applies equally to regularly conducted, competitive auction tax sales. Therefore, the trustee may not avoid the sales. Tracht Gut, LLC v. Los Angeles County Treasurer (In re Tracht Gut, LLC), 836 F.3d 1146 (9th Cir. 2016).

- 2.1.tt Trustee may use IRS 10-year look-back period to avoid a fraudulent transfer. The debtor transferred assets to his wife nine years before bankruptcy. After litigation, the IRS assessed income taxes against the debtor 14 months before bankruptcy. The IRS filed an unsecured claim for the taxes. The trustee sued the wife to avoid the transfers as fraudulent transfers under section 544(b), which permits the trustee to “avoid any transfer of an interest of the debtor in property ... that is voidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an [allowable] unsecured claim.” Internal Revenue Code section 6502(a)(1) permits the IRS to collect a tax within 10 years after assessment. IRC section 6901(a)(1)(A)(i) permits the IRS to collect in the same manner as a tax “the liability, at law or in equity, of a transferee of property of a taxpayer.” State statutes of limitations do not run against the federal government. Therefore, the statute of limitation that applies to an IRS collection action against a transferee is 10 years. In this case, the IRS has an allowable unsecured claim and is not time-barred from avoiding the debtor’s transfer to his wife. The trustee may step into the IRS’s shoes and therefore is not time-barred. Mukamal v. Citibank N.A. (In re Kipnis), 555 B.R. 877 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2016).
- 2.1.uu CEO’s fraudulent intent may be imputed to the board and the corporation. The CEO negotiated an LBO for the debtor based on intentionally inflated projections, which he presented to the board to approve the transaction. The LBO left the debtor over-leveraged and inadequately capitalized. The CEO knew that and that the LBO was likely to result in a restructuring that would leave some creditors unpaid. He also knew that he misled the board. The LBO would provide him substantial personal benefits. The debtor filed chapter 11 about one year later. A trustee may avoid a transfer of the debtor’s property if the debtor had actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. A corporate agent’s actions are imputed to the corporation, even if the agent acts illegally or fraudulently, if the action is within the agent’s course of employment and for the corporation’s benefit. The agent’s knowledge is imputed if, in addition, the agent has the authority to act on the knowledge. The CEO is responsible for negotiating a sale of the corporation and for bringing the proposal to the board for approval. Therefore, the CEO’s actions and knowledge are imputed to the corporation and to the board, giving them the same knowledge and imputing to them the same actual intent as the CEO had. Because the trustee pled that the CEO knew that the projections on which the LBO was based were inflated and that creditors would suffer as a result, the trustee pled the requisite actual intent of the debtor to sustain an actual fraudulent transfer claim against the shareholder recipients of the LBO consideration. Weisfelner v. Hofmann (In re Lyondell Chemical Co.), 554 B.R. 635 (S.D.N.Y. 2016), reh’g denied, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 138449 (Oct. 5, 2016).
- 2.1.vv Section 546(e) safe harbor does not bar state law fraudulent transfer claim against bad faith LBO seller of private securities. The closely-held debtor’s shareholders caused its board to falsify its financial statements. They then conducted a sale process, which culminated in an LBO. After the acquisition, the debtor filed chapter 11. The chapter 11 plan provided for creditors to assign their state law fraudulent transfer claims against the selling shareholders to a litigation trust, which sued the shareholders to avoid and recover the payments for their shares under state constructive fraudulent transfer law. Section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding a settlement payment made by or to a financial institution in connection with a securities contract. By its terms, it does not apply to creditors’ claims to avoid such payments. Federal law preempts state law either impliedly, by occupying the field or if the state law erects an obstacle to Congress’ purpose in enacting the federal law, or expressly. Section 546(e) does not expressly preempt state law, because it refers only to the trustee, so preemption could only be implied. There is a presumption against preemption where Congress acts in a field that the states have historically occupied. Fraudulent transfer law is such a field. Congress’ purpose in section 546(e) appears to have been to protect securities markets, not individual participants in the markets, and to prevent a bankruptcy from causing a ripple effect in the markets. Therefore, section 546(e)'s safe harbor does not apply to a state fraudulent transfer claim where the targeted transaction poses no threat of a ripple effect in the securities market, the securities were not publicly traded and the transferees were corporate insiders who acted in bad faith. PAH Litigation Trust v. Water St. Healthcare P'ners L.P. (In re Physiotherapy Holding, Inc.), 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 2810 (Bankr. D. Del. June 20, 2016).

- 2.1.ww The debtor's release of claims against selling LBO shareholders does not bar a fraudulent transfer claim. After the debtor's LBO, the debtor released the selling shareholders from "any claims for losses, damages, indemnification, or other payment ... for any breach, violation or inaccuracy of any of the terms, conditions, covenants, agreements or representations and/or warranties in the Merger Agreement." The debtor's chapter 11 plan provided for creditors to assign their state law fraudulent transfer claims to a litigation trust, which sued the selling shareholders to avoid and recover the payments for their shares as fraudulent transfers. The Code's avoiding powers are vested in the trustee and do not derive from any rights that the debtor had as of the commencement of the case. Accordingly, a debtor's release of claims does not bind affect the trustee or the creditors' rights to bring avoiding power claims. PAH Litigation Trust v. Water St. Healthcare P'ners L.P. (In re Physiotherapy Holding, Inc.), 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 2810 (Bankr. D. Del. June 20, 2016).
- 2.1.xx Substantive consolidation does not augment the trustee's section 544(b) avoiding powers by allowing the trustee to rely on predicate creditors from another estate. The trustee of the substantively consolidated the estates of several related Ponzi-scheme debtors sued under section 544(b) to recover fraudulent transfers, relying on the unsecured creditors of the consolidated estates as the predicate creditors, because the transferor debtor had no prepetition creditors of its own. Substantive consolidation merges only the assets and liabilities of separate estates, not the separate debtor entities, and does not change the trustee's avoiding power rights. Substantive consolidation does not supply the missing predicate creditor, so the transferor debtor's lack of a predicate creditor prevents the trustee's from relying on section 544(b) to avoid transfers. Kelley v. Opportunity Finance, LLC (In re Petters Co., Inc.), 550 B.R. 438 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2016).
- 2.1.yy Ponzi scheme LLC does not receive value for paying its member's taxes. The debtor LLC was part of a Ponzi scheme. It was a pass-through entity for tax purposes. It paid directly to the IRS the taxes of one of its members under an operating agreement that permitted but did not require it to do so. The LLC could have elected not to be a pass-through entity, but the member's tax payment was about 15% less than if the LLC were a taxable entity and had paid its own tax obligation. The trustee may avoid a transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, unless the transferee received the transfer for value in good faith. The savings from the LLC's tax status does not constitute value to the LLC, because it was not in fact subject to federal income tax, and whether it could or would choose another tax status is speculative. A debtor might receive value in paying its member's obligation if it received a benefit from doing so. Here, the LLC did not receive value by paying its member's taxes because it was not under an obligation to the member to do so. Zazalli v. Swenson (In re DBSI, Inc.), 561 B.R. 97 (D. Id. 2016).
- 2.1.zz Access to a credit line rebuts unreasonably small capital claim. The debtor had a substantial undrawn bank credit line. The debtor engaged in speculative trading, in violation of the credit agreement terms, resulting in substantial losses. The debtor drew on the credit line to remain liquid. Ultimately, the debtor transferred the trading book, and soon thereafter, the banks called a default under the credit agreement, but not because the trading activity violated the credit agreement. After beginning the trading activity and before the default, the debtor paid dividends to its shareholders. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued to avoid and recover the dividend payments as fraudulent transfers, alleging that the debtor had unreasonably small capital when it paid the dividends. A debtor is adequately capitalized if it can borrow amounts necessary to remain liquid. Here, the debtor was able to do so, but the trustee disputed that based on the trading activity, which defaulted the line. Because the banks did not actually call a default until after the debtor transferred the trading book and only for other reasons, any examination of whether the debtor could have drawn if the banks had either known of or focused on the prohibited trading was too speculative and could not form the basis for an unreasonably small capital finding. In re SemCrude L.P., 648 Fed. Appx. 205 (3d Cir. 2016).

2.1.aaa Section 546(e) preempts state fraudulent transfer law as applied to settlement payments through a financial institution. The debtor failed shortly after a leveraged buyout. The debtor in possession pursued actual fraudulent transfer claims arising from the LBO against former shareholders but did not pursue constructive fraudulent transfer claims because of section 546(e), which prohibits “the trustee” from avoiding under section 544 or section 548 (other than section 548(a)(1)(A)—actual fraudulent transfer) a settlement payment made through a financial institution. After section 546(a)’s two-year avoiding power statute of limitation expired, creditors obtained stay relief and sued former shareholders in non-bankruptcy courts under state fraudulent transfer laws. Federal law impliedly preempts state law when “state law stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.” There is a presumption against implied preemption where Congress legislates in an area recognized as traditionally one of state law. Congress has plenary authority over bankruptcy and related creditors’ rights. The Bankruptcy Code and the bankruptcy courts control all aspects of a bankruptcy case’s conduct, including stay relief to permit creditors to bring state law fraudulent transfer claims. Therefore, the presumption against implied preemption does not apply. Creditors’ fraudulent transfer claims vest in the trustee under section 544(b). The avoiding power statute of limitation’s expiration does not indicate any intention to re-vest the claims in the creditors, nor does the imposition of the automatic stay suggest that section 544(b)’s vesting of the claims in the trustee causes the claims to revert to the creditors when the stay terminates. The vesting of the claims in the trustee is intended to concentrate and simplify proceedings; re-vesting claims in creditors would unwind that effect. Moreover, in the context of section 546(e) claims, permitting the trustee to pursue actual fraudulent transfer claims and the creditors to pursue constructive fraudulent transfer claims would create conflict. These issues dispel a clear textual basis for section 546(e) not to restrict post-bankruptcy creditor state law fraudulent transfer claims and make the scope of section 546(e)’s language ambiguous, permitting resort to legislative history and purpose to construe it. Congress enacted section 546(e) to protect securities markets by bringing stability, certainty and finality to securities transactions. Permitting post-bankruptcy creditor state law fraudulent transfer actions prohibited to the trustee under section 546(e) would undermine that purpose. Therefore, section 546(e) prohibits such actions. In re Tribune Co. Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, 818 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2016).

2.1.bbb Stay relief resolved any conflict between creditor state law fraudulent transfer actions and the trustee’s similar claims against the same defendants. The debtor failed shortly after a leveraged buyout. The debtor in possession pursued actual fraudulent transfer claims arising from the LBO against former shareholders but did not pursue constructive fraudulent transfer claims because of section 546(e), which prohibits “the trustee” from avoiding under section 544 or section 548 (other than section 548(a)(1)(A)—actual fraudulent transfer) a settlement payment made through a financial institution. After section 546(a)’s two-year avoiding power statute of limitation expired, creditors sued former shareholders in non-bankruptcy courts under state fraudulent transfer laws. Without resolving the question of whether the creditors had regained the right to prosecute such actions, the bankruptcy court granted stay relief to permit them to do so, and the confirmed plan authorized them to pursue the actions. Whether or not the automatic stay prohibited the creditors from bringing the state law fraudulent transfer actions while the debtor in possession

(and a liquidating trust under the plan) pursued federal actual fraudulent transfer claims, the bankruptcy court's order granting stay relief and the plan provision authorizing the creditors to bring the actions removed any prohibition on their doing so. The stay relief order resolved any concern that their action would interfere with the litigation trustee's action. In re Tribune Co. Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, 818 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2016).

2.1.ccc Section 548(a)(1) applies to a Belgian company's dividend to its Luxembourg shareholder.

The debtor was formed through a Belgian company's leveraged buyout of a U.S. company. After the companies signed the acquisition agreement but about two weeks before closing the acquisition, the Belgian acquirer divided substantial funds to its Luxembourg shareholder, under the direction of its ultimate shareholder, an individual operating in and conducting the business from the United States. The trustee of the liquidating trust that was created under the debtor's chapter 11 plan sued to avoid and recover the dividend from the Belgian company's shareholder as a fraudulent transfer. A court must first determine whether a complaint attempts to apply a statute extraterritorially and then whether Congress intended the statute to apply extraterritorially. In the first step, the court focuses on the specific area of Congressional concern in enacting the statute. In this context, the focus is on the nature of the transfer. A court should not consider a transfer to be domestic solely based on some connection with the United States or its territory. Here, though the direction to make the transfer ultimately originated in the United States, was connected to an acquisition of a U.S. company and had an effect in the United States of rendering a U.S. company insolvent, those connections are insufficient to make the transfer domestic. Section 548(a)(1) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property. Section 541(a)(1) includes in property of the estate all interests of the debtor in property, wherever located. Congress' clear intent in including within property of the estate an interest in property located outside the United States implies that Congress similarly intended that section 548(a) reach transfers of property outside the United States. Therefore, section 548(a)(1) applies extraterritorially in this case to permit the trustee to avoid the Belgian company's dividend to its Luxembourg shareholder. Weisfelner v. Blavatnik (In re Lyondell Chemical Co.), 543 B.R. 127 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016).

2.1.ddd A lease termination is a transfer. Before its chapter 11 case, the debtor terminated two profitable store leases without any consideration, returning the properties to the landlord. In the chapter 11 case, the creditors committee sued the landlord to avoid the transfers as preferences or fraudulent transfers and to recover the leases' value. In the meantime, the landlord relet the properties to a new tenant. The Code defines "transfer" to include "each mode, direct or indirect, absolute or conditional, voluntary or involuntary, of disposing of or parting with (i) property; or (ii) an interest in property." A leasehold is an interest in property. Therefore, the lease terminations were transfers that are subject to avoidance under sections 547 and 548. Section 365(c)(3) prohibits assumption or assignment of an unexpired lease that was terminated before the order for relief. This provision does not restrict the committee's authority to avoid the lease terminations, because the committee's action seeks recovery of the leases' value, not recovery of the leases to assume or assign them. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. T.D. Investments I, LLP (In re Great Lakes Quick Lube LP), 816 F.3d 482 (7th Cir. 2016).

2.1.eee Actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud requires allegations that the debtor intended that result, not merely that the result was the natural consequences of the debtor's actions.

The debtor failed from LBO debt. Under its chapter 11 plan, creditors assigned to a creditors' trust their fraudulent transfer claims against the shareholders who received the LBO consideration. The trustee's complaint alleged that the directors knew the projections that supported the LBO debt were grossly inflated, knew that the increased leverage posed substantial risks to the debtor in light of the cyclical nature of the debtor's business, knew that the financing would leave the debtor undercapitalized, knew they were thereby putting creditors at grave risk and therefore knew that the LBO would hinder, delay or defraud creditors. A creditor may avoid a transfer that the debtor makes with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. Under Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 9(b), the plaintiff must plead fraud with particularity, alleging facts that give rise to a strong inference of fraud. Allegations that make fraud merely a plausible inference are not adequate. Actual intent to defraud requires that the defendant desired to cause his act's consequences or that he believed that the consequences were substantially certain to result, not merely that the consequences were the foreseeable results or the natural consequences of the act. Moreover, intent to commit other wrongful acts such as negligence, gross negligence, recklessness and breach of fiduciary duty committed do not constitute actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. Here, the complaint alleges actual intent only formulaically and only by saying the directors knew the LBO would hinder, delay or defraud creditors, without saying how they knew or whether they intended that result. Therefore, the court dismisses the complaint for failure to state a claim. Weisfelner v. Fund 1 (In re Lyondell Chemical Co.), 541 B.R. 172 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

- 2.1.fff Section 546(e) may protect loan payments that are deposited into a securitization trust. Another corporation that the debtor's shareholders owned borrowed under a promissory note that provided it was to be transferred to a commercial mortgage backed securitization trust under a pooling and servicing agreement (PSA). The trust issued notes to fund the affiliate's loan. The debtor made payments on the note to a bank that serviced the securitization trust under the PSA. The trustee sued to avoid and recover the payments as fraudulent transfers. Section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding "a transfer made by or to ... a financial institution ... in connection with a securities contract." The provision protects a transfer to a financial institution, whether or not the institution holds a beneficial interest in the payments. A securities contract is a contract for the purchase or sale of a security. The PSA provided for the sale of the trust's notes. A transfer is made in connection with a securities contract if the transfer is related to the securities contract, whether or not the transfer is made for the purchase or sale of the securities. Therefore, the loan payments were transfers to a financial institution in connection with a securities contract and were protected from avoidance. The bankruptcy court recommends that the district court dismiss the action. Krol v. Key Bank N.A. (In re MCK Millennium Centre Parking, LLC), 532 B.R. 716 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2015).
- 2.1.ggg Bank's application of the debtor's deposits in a check kiting scheme is a transfer of property of the debtor. The debtor ran an extensive check kiting scheme. The bank honored overdrafts, which it covered by applying the debtor's later deposits. The trustee alleged that the bank knew or should have known of the scheme and sought to avoid and recover the overdraft payments as fraudulent transfers. The trustee may avoid a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property that the debtor made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. A check kiting scheme is designed to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. When the debtor deposits funds, the funds are property of the debtor. The deposit transfers the funds to the bank in exchange for the debtor's demand deposit account claim against the bank. When the bank applies the deposit to the overdraft, it transfers property of the debtor (the demand deposit account claim) to the bank. Therefore, the trustee's complaint adequately alleged a transfer of property of the debtor. Welch v. Highlands Union Bank, 526 B.R. 152 (E.D. Va. 2015).
- 2.1.hhh A fraudulent transfer claim sounds in contract and does not support a civil conspiracy claim. The trustee sued the debtor's principal and another, whom the trustee alleged participated in a fraudulent transfer from the debtor to a corporation owned by the other, for civil conspiracy to violate the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act. A civil conspiracy is a combination of two or more persons to accomplish an unlawful purpose or to accomplish a purpose, not itself unlawful, by unlawful means. The cause of action relies on the existence of an underlying wrongful act or means, such as a crime or a tort. A UFTA action to avoid a transfer, even a transfer with actual intent to defraud, sounds in contract rather than in tort. Therefore, the court dismisses the civil conspiracy cause of action. Sheehan v. Saoud, 526 B.R. 166 (N.D. W.Va. 2015).

- 2.1.iii Section 546(e) does not pre-empt an unjust enrichment claim based on actual fraudulent intent. The debtor issued notes whose proceeds were used to pay preferred equity interests and fees of its ultimate parent entity's shareholders. The trustee sued to avoid and recover the payments as actual fraudulent transfers and for recovery based on unjust enrichment. Section 546(e) is a safe harbor that protects a settlement payment or transfer in connection with a securities contract from a trustee's avoiding powers, except under section 548(a)(1)(A), which permits a trustee to avoid an actual fraudulent transfer. Most courts hold that a trustee may not plead around section 546(e) by asserting a common law cause of action, such as unjust enrichment, that is based on the same facts as a constructive fraudulent transfer claim, against a transferee protected by section 546(e). Otherwise, section 546(e) would have little or no practical effect, contrary to Congress's intent to protect the securities markets. However, because section 546(e) allows a trustee to recover an actual fraudulent transfer, permitting a common law action to recover a transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors would not undercut section 546(e)'s policies or protections. Therefore, based on the trustee's allegations of actual fraud in this transaction, the court denies the defendants' section 546(e) motion to dismiss the unjust enrichment claim. Hosking v. TPG Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Hellas Telecommunications (Luxembourg) II SCA), 526 B.R. 499 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 2.1.jjj Ponzi scheme presumption does not apply to a legitimate business gone bad. The debtor organized limited partnerships to invest in low-income housing and solicited limited partner investors, who would receive substantial tax benefits as well as returns on their investments. The debtor acted as general partner for some but not all of the limited partnerships. As the debtor's financial condition worsened, the debtor started raiding some limited partnership accounts to fund other accounts. The debtor paid interest to one limited partnership investor. The trustee sought to avoid the payment as a preference. Under section 547(c)(2), the trustee may not avoid a transfer made in the ordinary course of business of the debtor and the creditor. A Ponzi scheme does not engage in a legitimate business enterprise, so the ordinary course of business exception to preference avoidance does not apply. However, where the debtor actually conducted a legitimate business and only when it encountered financial trouble did it divert a small portion of its funds to pay other investors, the Ponzi scheme presumption does not apply, and the defendant may show that the payment was in the ordinary course of business. Templeton v. O'Cheskey (In re Am. Housing Found.), 785 F.3d 143 (5th Cir. 2015).
- 2.1.kkk Parent's payment of subsidiaries' expenses from a cash concentration account is not a fraudulent transfer. The affiliated debtors operated a consolidated cash management system. The subsidiaries transferred their daily cash receipts to a concentration account that the parent managed, and the parent paid all the subsidiaries' expenses. During the prebankruptcy period in which they participated in this arrangement, the subsidiaries transferred to the parent substantially more than the parent paid in the subsidiaries' expenses. After bankruptcy, the parent's liquidating trustee sued the subsidiaries' electric utility to avoid and recover the payments from the concentration account as fraudulent transfers. A trustee may avoid a transfer if the debtor was insolvent and did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange. The statute does not require that the transferee provide the value to the debtor; a third party may provide it. Here, the subsidiaries provided value by their cash transfers, which they would not have done if the parent had not agreed to pay their expenses. Moreover, the parent acted as the subsidiaries' disbursing agent, fulfilling its obligation to pay the subsidiaries' expenses. Therefore, the trustee may not avoid the transfers. LandAmerica Fin. Group, Inc. v. S. Calif. Edison Co., 525 B.R. 308 (E.D. Va. 2015).
- 2.1.III Section 546(e) safe harbor does not apply to an unjust enrichment claim whose allegations suggest actual fraudulent intent. U.K. liquidators obtained chapter 15 recognition in the U.S. of their foreign proceeding. They then brought an unjust enrichment action in the bankruptcy court to recover the debtor's transfers to the debtor's shareholders. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding or recovering a settlement payment or a transfer in connection with a securities contract, except under section 548(a)(1)(A) as an actual fraudulent transfer. A trustee may not plead around section 546(e) to avoid a constructive fraudulent transfer by asserting an unjust enrichment claim. However, where the unjust enrichment allegations are similar to the allegations of an actual fraudulent transfer claim, the section 546(e) exception applies, so the safe harbor does not bar the liquidators' action. Hosking v. TPC Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Hellas Telecomm'ns (Luxembourg) II SCA), 526 B.R. 499 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

2.1.mmm Section 546(a) statute of limitations supersedes state statute of repose. The debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. The trustee sued the debtor's banks to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers made more than six years before bankruptcy. Section 544(b) permits a trustee to avoid a transfer that is avoidable by an unsecured creditor under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Applicable law here permits a creditor to avoid a transfer within four years after the transfer or, for an intentional fraudulent transfer, within one year after the transfer was or could reasonably have been discovered, but prohibits avoidance after seven years. The seven-year bar is a statute of repose, designed to give the defendant peace, not a statute of limitations, designed to require the plaintiff's diligence. Section 546(a) gives a trustee two years from the order for relief in which to bring an avoiding power action, including one under section 544(b). Case law is uniform that a statute of limitations that has not expired as of the petition date is tolled during the two-year period under section 546(a), to give a trustee sufficient time to discover and determine whether to bring avoiding power claims. For the same reason, section 546(a) applies to a statute of repose. As a federal enactment, it preempts state law. Therefore, the trustee may bring the fraudulent transfer action for any transfer made within seven years before the petition date. Rund v. Bank of America Corp. (In re EPD Inv. Co., LLC), 523 B.R. 680 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2015).

2.1.nnn A fraudulent transferee has a good defense only to the extent of actual value, from the transferee's perspective, that it actually gave the debtor. The debtor's affiliate borrowed money from a bank, secured by the affiliate's real property, which the debtor occupied. The debtor began monthly payments to the bank in an amount equal to the required loan payments but in excess of the property's fair monthly rental value. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the bank to avoid and recover the payments as an actual fraudulent transfer. Under section 548(a), the trustee may avoid a transfer that the debtor made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Under section 548(c), a transferee "that takes for value and in good faith ... may retain any interest transferred ... to the extent that such transferee ... gave value to the debtor in exchange." Because subsection (c) refers to the value the transferee gave to the debtor, and consistent with subsection (c)'s intent to protect a good faith transferee, the court must analyze the amount of value from the transferee's perspective, not from the debtor/transferee's. "Value" in subsection (c) is not the same as "reasonably equivalent value" in section 548(a), which determines whether a transfer is constructively fraudulent. Rather, "value" refers to the actual value that the transferee gave the debtor. Subsection (c) protects the transfer "to the extent" the transferee gave value. Therefore, the court must net the value of what the transferee received against the value it gave, and it is liable for the difference, thereby protecting the estate and its other creditors from undervalued transactions. Williams v. Fed. Dep. Ins. Corp. (In re Positive Health Mgmt.), 769 F.3d 899 (5th Cir. 2014).

2.1.ooo Safe harbor protects withdrawals from stockbroker Ponzi scheme. The stockbroker debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. It accepted deposits into customer accounts under customer account agreements and trading authorizations that directed the stockbroker to purchase and sell a set group of common stocks and options, produced false account statements that showed consistently profitable securities trading in the accounts and honored withdrawal requests as they were made, until it ran out of money, though the debtor did not engage in any securities transactions. The trustee sued to recover account withdrawals as preferences and fraudulent transfers. The section 546(e) safe harbor prohibits avoidance of a stockbroker's transfer that is a settlement payment or that is made in connection with a securities contract. A securities contract is defined with extraordinary breadth as a contract for the purchase, sale, or loan of a security; any other agreement or transaction that is similar to such a contract; a master agreement that provides for an agreement or transaction to purchase, sell, or loan a security; or any security agreement or arrangement related to any such agreement or transaction. The customer agreements are sufficient to create securities contracts, even though the stockbroker did not execute any trades, because they both provided for the purchase and sale of securities and acted as master agreements for numerous trades; the definition does not require any actual trades for the contracts to qualify. A transfer is made “in connection with” a securities contract if it is related to or associated with the contract. The account withdrawals were related to the customer agreements and therefore were made in connection with a securities contract. The transfers are subject to the safe harbor. Picard v. Ida Fishman Revocable Trust (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 773 F.3d 411 (2d Cir. 2014).

- 2.1.ppp Extension agreement of more than one year does not take repurchase agreement out of the safe harbor. The debtor financed mortgage backed securities with repurchase agreements, all of which provided for repurchase within less than one year. The counterparty issued substantial margin calls, which the debtor could not meet. They negotiated an agreement to defer further margin calls and delay the repurchase date to a date more than one year after the original repurchase agreement date. The debtor’s trustee sued to avoid and recover payments the debtor made after the extension agreement. Section 546(f) protects from avoidance any payment made to a “repo participant ... in connection with a repurchase agreement.” A “repurchase agreement” is an agreement providing for repurchase within one year. Courts should construe “in connection with” in section 546(f) broadly. Although the extension agreement provided for repurchase outside of one year, the transfer was still in “connection with” the repurchase agreement and was not avoidable. Sher v. JP Morgan Chase Funding Inc. (In re TMST, Inc.), 518 B.R. 329 (Bankr. D. Md. 2014).
- 2.1.qqq Extension agreement is not an obligation that the trustee may avoid. The debtor financed mortgage backed securities with repurchase agreements. The counterparty issued substantial margin calls, which the debtor could not meet. They negotiated an agreement to defer further margin calls and delay the repurchase date. The debtor’s trustee sued to avoid the debtor’s obligations under the extension agreement and the resulting payments the debtor made under the agreement. Section 548(a)(1)(B) permits a trustee to avoid an obligation the debtor incurs for less than reasonably equivalent value if the debtor was then insolvent. The effect of an obligation the debtor incurs without reasonably equivalent value is to increase its liabilities and potential claims against the debtor’s assets without adding other assets to satisfy the new liabilities. An extension agreement does not by itself increase the debtor’s liabilities. An extension obligation that merely reaffirms existing obligations does not incur an obligation. Therefore, the trustee may not avoid the extension agreement or the payments under the agreement. Sher v. JP Morgan Chase Funding Inc. (In re TMST, Inc.), 518 B.R. 329 (Bankr. D. Md. 2014).
- 2.1.rrr Section 546(a) trumps state statute of repose. The debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. The trustee sued under section 544(b) to avoid as fraudulent transfers payments to investors made within seven years before bankruptcy. Applicable nonbankruptcy law imposed a four-year statute of limitation on a creditor’s right to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer and a statute of repose that extinguishes the creditor’s claim after seven years. The trustee filed his complaint within two years after the petition date but more than seven years after some of the transfers. Section 546(a) limits the time within which a trustee may bring an avoiding power action to two years. It preempts nonbankruptcy statutes of limitations that apply to claims under section 544(b), giving the trustee two years to bring an action if a creditor could have brought the action as of the petition date, furthering the bankruptcy policy to allow the trustee sufficient time to marshal the estate’s assets. The same policy applies to a state statute of repose. The trustee may bring an avoiding power action after the statute of repose has expired, as long as it had not expired as of the petition date. Rund v. Bank of America Corp. (In re EPD Inv. Co, LLC), 523 B.R. 680 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2015).

- 2.1.sss LLP is a corporation for Bankruptcy Code purposes. The debtor law firm was a limited liability partnership under state law, which provides that partners are not liable for any obligations of the partnership, except that a partner is liable for “negligent or wrongful conduct committed by him or her or by any person under his or her direct supervision or control while rendering professional services” on behalf of the partnership. Section 101(9) defines “corporation” as including “a partnership association organized under a law that makes only the capital subscribed responsible for the debts of such association.” The general liability limitation qualifies the debtor partnership as a “corporation” under the Bankruptcy Code. The exception does not make a partner liable for the partnership debts generally and, therefore, the debtor is a “corporation.” Jacobs v. Altorelli (In re Dewey & LeBoeuf LLP), 518 B.R. 766 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 2.1.ttt Partnership distributions to working partners are not for value. The debtor law firm was a limited liability partnership. The partners were practicing lawyers who received distributions before bankruptcy while the partnership was insolvent. Section 548 permits the trustee to avoid a transfer made for less than reasonably equivalent value while the debtor was insolvent. Generally, services provided to a debtor are “value” in exchange for compensation. However, under partnership law, partners are not entitled to compensation, because they are expected to devote their efforts to the partnership business and receive the firm’s profits. Therefore, the services that the partners provided do not constitute value to the partnership debtor, and the distributions are avoidable. Jacobs v. Altorelli (In re Dewey & LeBoeuf LLP), 518 B.R. 766 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 2.1.uuu Court determines whether a fraudulent transfer action is for the benefit of the estate as of the petition date. Before bankruptcy, the debtor settled litigation against its insurer. The state court approved the settlement. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sued the insurer to avoid the settlement as a fraudulent transfer. The debtor confirmed a plan that paid all creditors, other than asbestos claimants, in full. The plan created a trust for the benefit of the asbestos claimants and assigned the fraudulent transfer action to the trust. Section 550(a) permits the debtor in possession to recover an avoided transfer “for the benefit of the estate.” The estate is broader than the interests of unsecured creditors. It includes all interests in the case. The court must determine whether a fraudulent transfer claim is for the benefit of the estate as of the petition date, not after confirmation, because the claim’s potential value often factors into a plan. Here, where the plan did not fully fund the asbestos claimants’ trust, the fraudulent transfer action is for the benefit of the estate. In addition, the state court order approving the settlement does not prevent a fraudulent transfer action. Mt. McKinley Ins. Co. v. Lac D’Amiante Du Quebec Ltee (In re Asarco LLC), 513 B.R. 499 (S.D. Tex. 2014).
- 2.1.vvv Ponzi scheme interest payments to net winners are recoverable under UFTA. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme in which it issued certificates of deposit with fixed interest rates to innocent investors. The SEC obtained the appointment of a federal district court receiver, who sued net winners under UFTA to recover the amount they received that exceeded their investments. UFTA permits a creditor to recover a transfer that the debtor made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, but the transferee may retain the transfer to the extent that the transfer was received for value and in good faith. Because the debtor’s principals dominated and controlled the debtor against the debtor’s interest, the court deems the principals as the transferor for UFTA purposes and the debtor the creditor, thereby giving the receiver standing to bring the actions on the debtor’s behalf. Proof of a Ponzi scheme creates an irrebuttable presumption that the transfer was made with actual intent to defraud creditors. A promise to pay interest, rather than profits on an investment, might create a claim against the debtor, thereby supporting a “for value” defense. However, enforcing the claim would not result in payment from the debtor’s assets but would decrease the recovery of other, less fortunate investors. Therefore, the interest claim is unenforceable as against public policy, and the interest payments are avoidable under UFTA. Janvey v. Brown, 767 F.3d 430 (5th Cir. 2014).

2.1.www In a SIPA case, lack of good faith under section 548(c) requires actual knowledge of or willful blindness to fraud. The debtor stockbroker ran a Ponzi scheme and was being liquidated under SIPA. The trustee brought fraudulent transfer actions against both initial and subsequent transferees to avoid and recover withdrawals of principal. Section 548(c) gives an initial transferee a defense to the extent that the transferee took for value and in good faith; section 550(b) gives a subsequent transferee essentially the same defense. In the bankruptcy law, courts generally construe “good faith” as meaning a lack of information that would require a prudent person to investigate. SIPA incorporates the Bankruptcy Code “to the extent consistent with the provisions” of SIPA. Where SIPA and the Code are in conflict, the Code must yield. SIPA is part of the securities laws and its construction should be informed by the securities laws. “Good faith” in the securities laws implies a lack of fraudulent intent. The securities laws do not impose a burden on an investor to investigate a stockbroker. Therefore, in a SIPA proceeding, a transferee is not liable unless the transferee had actual knowledge of the fraud or was willfully blind to it. The Bankruptcy Code sets out the defense as an affirmative defense. But requiring the defendant to plead and prove good faith would undercut SIPA’s goals of maintaining market stability and encouraging investor confidence. Therefore, the trustee has the burden of pleading and proving a lack of good faith. Securities Investor Protection Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Investment Securities LLC (In re Bernard L. Madoff Investment Securities LLC), 516 B.R. 18 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).

2.1.xxx Return of fraudulently transferred property provides a defense to an avoiding power claim. The debtor transferred real property to his brother-in-law, who transferred it back to him about one year later. The debtor later sold the property for reasonably equivalent value. Circumstances suggested that the debtor might have made the initial transfer with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. The trustee sued under section 544(b) to avoid the transfer to, and to recover the real property or its value from, the brother-in-law. Under section 544(b), the trustee may avoid an actual or constructive fraudulent transfer of property of the debtor under applicable nonbankruptcy fraudulent transfer law, in this case the Pennsylvania Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act. The UFTA’s and section 544(b)’s purpose is to preserve estate assets for creditors’ benefit. To that end, the trustee’s remedy is recovery from the transferee of fraudulently transferred property or its value. If the estate has already recovered the property’s value, a judgment against the transferee would allow the estate double recovery. Therefore, where the transferee returns the property to the debtor before bankruptcy, the trustee may not recover the property or its value. Finkel v. Polichuk (In re Polichuk), 506 B.R. 405 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2014).

2.1.yyy Section 544(b) does not apply to a postconfirmation transfer. The debtor’s plan provided for revesting property of the estate in the debtor upon confirmation. After revesting, the debtor sold the property (a house) for about 2½ times the value listed on the schedules. The debtor transferred the proceeds to a newly formed corporation owned by the debtor’s principal. About five months later, the court converted the case to chapter 7. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid a “transfer of an interest of the debtor in property ... that is voidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an unsecured claim that is allowable under section 502(a)” Section 544(b) does not include a temporal limitation, but it applies only to an interest of the debtor, not of the estate. Section 549 addresses transfers of property of the estate that occur postpetition. Section 549 and other avoiding power sections, including section 544(a), which operate “as of the commencement of the case,” and the section 546(a) statute of limitations that runs from the order for relief, suggest that section 544(b) applies only to prepetition transfers. The transfer here to the buyer occurred postpetition but was not a transfer of property of the estate. Therefore, the trustee may not avoid the transfer under section 544(b). Casey v. Rotenberg (In re Kenny G Enterps., LLC), 512 B.R. 628 (C.D. Cal. 2014).

2.1.zzz Court may collapse fraudulent transfer transactions to the last transaction for statute of limitations purposes. At the end of 2002, the debtor's former parent corporation divided its assets into two corporations, one with and one without legacy environmental and tort liabilities. However, the former parent did not complete the separation until 2005, by a series of agreements that documented the terms of the separation, "as of December 31, 2002." The former parent then spun off the encumbered corporation to its shareholders in March 2006, which filed chapter 11 in January 2009. The debtor in possession sued the former parent corporation under section 544(b) for an intentional and constructive fraudulent transfer in connection with the separation and spinoff, alleging in detail the parent's motivation and the steps it took to insulate the remaining corporation from the legacy liabilities. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to use the rights under applicable nonbankruptcy law of a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim to avoid a debtor's prepetition transfer. The Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act requires that an action to avoid a fraudulent transfer be commenced within four years after the transfer. Under section 546(a), a bankruptcy trustee may bring such an action within two years after the order for relief if the four-year period has not then expired. The courts examine transactions under fraudulent transfer law for their substance, not their form. They may collapse many steps of an integrated transaction, even steps that occur over a substantial period, to determine the transactions' true nature. Here, the transactions from 2002 through 2006 were all part of a single, integrated effort to insulate the former parent corporation's valuable assets from the debtor's legacy liabilities. Therefore, even though the key transfer that shielded the former parent's assets occurred more than four years before the debtor's bankruptcy, the court may collapse the transactions to the date they became fully effective, in 2005-06, which was within four years before bankruptcy. Therefore, the statute of limitations does not bar the debtor in possession's fraudulent transfer action. Tronox Inc. v. Kerr McGee Corp. (In re Tronox Inc.), 503 B.R. 239 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

2.1.aaaa Trustee may not recover estimated tax payment from IRS where the IRS had refunded the payment. The debtor LLC made an estimated income tax payment to the IRS for its sole member. The LLC had no income for that year, so the member requested and received a refund from the IRS. The debtor later filed a bankruptcy case. The trustee sought to recover the estimated tax payment from the IRS as a fraudulent transfer. The trustee may recover a fraudulent transfer from the initial transferee but not from a recipient of the payment who had no control over the asset, served as a mere conduit and acted in good faith as an innocent participant in the fraudulent transfer. When a recipient receives a payment as a deposit with an attendant obligation to the transferor to return the payment upon request, the recipient does not have control over the funds and is not an initial transferee. The same rule applies where the payment is a deposit on a contingent future obligation that does not materialize, because the recipient remains under an obligation to return the funds, even though the recipient may use them for its own purposes in the interim. Avoiding powers permit a trustee to equalize distribution among creditors. They should not apply to conduits, because it would be inequitable to require a party who did not benefit from a transfer to contribute to the estate, especially where, as here, the recipient already returned the funds to a different party. Therefore, the trustee may not recover the payment from the IRS. Menotte v. U.S. (In re Custom Contractors, LLC), 745 F.3d 1342 (11th Cir. 2014).

2.1.bbbb Section 546(e) safe harbor does not prohibit non-estate, nonbankruptcy law avoiding power actions. An acquirer purchased the debtor's publicly traded stock through an LBO. The debtor's chapter 11 plan provided that any fraudulent transfer action that the estate could bring under section 544(b) was abandoned, and the creditors that held state law fraudulent transfer claims "shall contribute" them to a creditor trust to prosecute. The creditor trustee brought a fraudulent transfer action under applicable nonbankruptcy law against the former public shareholders to recover what they received in the LBO. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a settlement payment or a payment in connection with a securities contract. The payments to the former shareholders were such transfers. By its terms, section 546(e) applies only to the trustee, not to creditors. An assignee takes whatever rights the assignor had. If a creditor could bring the fraudulent transfer action, then the creditor trustee as the creditors' assignee could bring it as well. Section 546(e) would prohibit a creditor from bringing the action only if it preempted applicable nonbankruptcy law. Congress's purpose is the touchstone of a preemption analysis, and federalism requires the assumption that Congress does not preempt historic state police powers unless preemption is the statute's clear and manifest purpose. Courts find such purpose under three analyses: express preemption, field preemption and conflict preemption. Express preemption requires an express statement, which is not present here. Field preemption requires that Congress occupy the field in a manner so pervasive as to require the conclusion that Congress left no room for the states to act. Here, Congress did not show an intent to occupy the field, as Congress has always allowed state fraudulent transfer laws to co-exist with bankruptcy law and incorporated it into bankruptcy law under section 544(b) and its predecessor. Conflict preemption results either if a party cannot comply with what both federal and state law require or if state law stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment of the federal law's purpose. Neither federal nor state law requires participation in an LBO, and the fraudulent transfer laws do not regulate conduct, so impossibility preemption does not apply. The federal safe harbor's purpose is to protect financial markets, not market participants. But Congress had other purposes in enacting the Bankruptcy Code, including equality of distribution, priority of creditors over equity holders and protection against fraudulent transfers. Congress did not clearly elevate one policy or purpose over the others in enacting section 546(e), and Congress's express prohibition of even non-bankruptcy fraudulent transfer actions to recover charitable contributions shows by contrast that Congress had no similarly clear intent that section 546(e)'s purpose takes precedence over or preempts nonbankruptcy fraudulent transfer laws. Therefore, the creditor trust may bring the fraudulent transfer action against the former shareholders. Weisfelner v. Fund 1 (In re Lyondell Chemical Co.), 503 B.R. 348 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).

2.1.cccc Trustee may use Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act statute of limitations under section 544(b). At the end of 2002, the debtor's former parent corporation divided its assets into two corporations, one with and one without legacy environmental and tort liabilities. However, the former parent did not complete the separation until 2005, by a series of agreements that documented the terms of the separation, "as of December 31, 2002." The former parent then spun off the encumbered corporation to its shareholders in March 2006, which filed chapter 11 in January 2009. The United States asserted substantial environmental claims against the debtor. Before bankruptcy, it entered into tolling agreements with the debtor that extended its statute of limitations to a date beyond the petition date. The debtor in possession sued the former parent corporation under section 544(b) for an intentional and constructive fraudulent transfer in connection with the separation and spinoff, alleging in detail the parent's motivation and the steps it took to insulate the remaining corporation from the legacy liabilities. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to use the rights under applicable nonbankruptcy law of a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim to avoid a debtor's prepetition transfer. Under the Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act, the United States may avoid a fraudulent transfer that the debtor made within six years before the United States commences the avoidance action. The FDCPA is an applicable law, which the trustee may use if the United States has an allowable unsecured claim in the case. The trustee therefore may also rely on the FDCPA's statute of limitations. Tronox Inc. v. Kerr McGee Corp. (In re Tronox Inc.), 503 B.R. 239 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

2.1.dddd Good faith defense requires both objective and subjective showings. The bank opened a warehouse credit line to a mortgage originator, not knowing that the originator was creating fraudulent mortgages. The originator was slow in providing loan documents to the bank for each advance but always promptly provided the original mortgage note. During the 2007-08 market slowdown, the originator had trouble selling loans in the market to secondary purchasers. When the originator failed to pay the bank on time, the bank, through experienced bank officers, pressed for payment, met with the originator and his counsel, who both assured the bank that the mortgages were genuine, and inspected both documentation and the underlying properties. As a result of the bank's actions, the originator repaid a substantial portion of the credit line, but a substantial portion remained unpaid when the originator filed bankruptcy. The trustee asserted that the payments were actual fraudulent transfers. Under section 548(c), a fraudulent transferee is not liable to the extent the transferee took for value and in good faith. "Good faith" under section 548(c) has both subjective and objective elements, the same as "good faith" under section 550. Subjective good faith requires honesty in fact and an innocent state of mind. Objective good faith is absent where the transferee fails to comply with ordinary business practices in taking the transfer and knew or should have known of the fraud, taking into account customary industry practices. The transferee need not present evidence that every action was objectively reasonable, as long as its overall conduct was. Here, the bank's conduct was normal for the banking industry, and the bank inquired and received assurances that the mortgages were not fraudulent. The market slowdown plausibly, though incorrectly, explained the originator's difficulty selling the mortgages. Therefore, the bank did not have reason to believe that the originator engaged in a fraudulent scheme. Gold v. First Tenn. Bank N.A. (In re Taneja), 743 F.3d 423 (4th Cir. 2014).

2.1.eeee "Collapsing" allows application of the section 546(e) safe harbor. Duke indirectly owned 100% of Crescent. Duke formed Holdings and contributed its interests in Crescent to Holdings. Crescent borrowed $1.2 billion from a bank syndicate and distributed the loan proceeds to Holdings, who distributed them to Duke. A third party purchased 49% of Holdings from Duke for $414 million. Holdings issued 2% of its stock to its CEO under an employment contract. The result is that Duke spun off 51% of Crescent. Crescent filed bankruptcy within three years. The trustee sought to recover the $1.2 billion payment to Duke as a fraudulent transfer. Section 544(b), effectively incorporating state fraudulent transfer law, permits the trustee to avoid a transfer within four years before bankruptcy of an insolvent debtor's property for less than reasonably equivalent value. However, section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer, by or to a financial institution, that is a settlement payment or made in connection with a securities contract. "Settlement payment" is broadly defined to include any payment that settles a securities transaction. A securities contract is a contract for the purchase or sale of a security. In this case, the Crescent distribution to Duke was part of a series of integrated transactions in which securities in Crescent were purchased and sold. Crescent would not have made the distribution but for the securities transactions. Therefore, the distribution was a payment made to settle a securities transaction. In addition, it was made in connection with a securities contract, the purchase and sale of the Crescent securities. Therefore, the court dismisses the trustee's claim. Crescent Resources Litigation Trust v. Duke Energy Corp., 500 B.R. 464 (W.D. Tex. 2013).

2.1.ffff "Collapsing" is a two-way street, and an auction produces reasonably equivalent value. The U.K. debtor operated a global business. All its subsidiaries guaranteed its principal secured debt. It filed administration proceedings in the U.K., and the secured lender appointed a receiver in Ireland. The administrator and the receiver conducted an extensive marketing program for the debtor's global business, identifying several serious bidders. They ultimately sold the entire business in a single transaction, though using a separate agreement for the U.S. business because the U.S. assets were not being administered in the administration or receivership. The agreements did not allocate the purchase price between the two agreements, except for tax purposes, because the total purchase price was less than one-third of the secured debt, and the proceeds were all paid to the secured lender. The U.S. debtors later filed a bankruptcy case. The trustee sought to avoid and recover the transfer to the buyer of the U.S. assets as a fraudulent transfer. Section 548(a) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer of property of an insolvent debtor for less than reasonably equivalent value. A court may collapse separate transactions into a single transaction for legal analysis purposes if the separate transactions are steps in a single integrated transaction. Although courts collapse separate transactions in a leveraged buyout to find a fraudulent transfer, the doctrine is not limited to that context or to finding a fraudulent transfer. It applies in analyzing any transaction so that form will not prevail over substance. Here, the separate agreements were so related that they should be collapsed and treated as a single transaction. Therefore, the value analysis must look to the entire sale, not only to the U.S. assets sale. Reasonably equivalent value does not require a “penny for penny” exchange if the values are roughly equivalent. Courts give marketplace values significant deference, and a winning bid at an auction is equivalent to fair market value. The value received here after the robust marketing process was reasonably equivalent value, so the court dismisses the trustee’s claim. Pereira v. WWRD US, LLC (In re Waterford Wedgwood USA, Inc.), 500 B.R. 371 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

2.1.gggg The automatic stay prohibits a creditor fraudulent transfer action if the trustee has sued to avoid the same transfer. The debtor failed after an LBO. The bankruptcy court gave the committee authority to sue the former shareholders under section 548(a)(1)(A) to avoid the payments for the shares as actual fraudulent transfers. The bankruptcy court conditionally lifted the stay to permit individual creditors to bring constructive fraudulent transfer claims against the former shareholders but limited its decision by not making any finding whether the creditors had standing. The individual creditors sued, and their actions were consolidated with the committee’s action. Section 362(a)(1) stays the commencement of any action to recover a prepetition claim against the debtor. It therefore stays creditor state law fraudulent transfer actions. The stay generally terminates upon discharge. It also specifically terminates as to a creditor fraudulent transfer action if the trustee does not bring the action within section 546(a)’s two-year statute of limitation, because such an action would no longer interfere with the trustee’s right to bring such claims. At that point, any preexisting creditor state law claims revert to creditors. However, if the trustee brings a fraudulent transfer action, then the stay continues against creditor action on the same transfer, even if the creditor action asserts a different legal theory, because the Code does not permit division of avoiding power claims. If the trustee seeks to avoid a transfer, the creditors may no longer do so. Because the committee here brought an actual fraudulent transfer claim on the estate’s behalf, the stay prevents the creditors from pursuing the same transfers. In re Tribune Company Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, 499 B.R. 310 (S.D.N.Y. 2013).

2.1.hhhh Section 546(e) does not preempt creditors’ constructive fraudulent transfer actions. The debtor failed after an LBO. The bankruptcy court gave the committee authority to sue the former shareholders under section 548(a)(1)(A) to avoid the payments for the shares as actual fraudulent transfers. The bankruptcy court conditionally lifted the stay to permit individual creditors to bring constructive fraudulent transfer claims against the former shareholders but limited its decision by not making any finding whether the creditors had standing. The individual creditors sued, and their actions were consolidated with the committee’s action. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee and only a trustee from avoiding a settlement payment except as an actual fraudulent transfer under section 548(a)(1)(A). A federal statute preempts state law that directly obstructs accomplishing Congress’s purposes in enacting the statute. Congress enacted section 546(e) to protect the securities markets, but it also enacted the Bankruptcy Code to improve creditor recoveries. In section 544(b), Congress prohibited creditors from avoiding certain fraudulent transfers but did not do so in section 546(e). Therefore, Congress does not appear to have intended to prohibit creditors from avoiding settlement payments under state law, so section 546(e) does not prohibit the creditors’ actions. In re Tribune Company Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, 499 B.R. 310 (S.D.N.Y. 2013).

2.1.iiii Section 546(e) safe harbor protects stockbroker fees and commission and margin interest payments. The Ponzi scheme debtor directed its customers to deposit their securities directly into the debtor’s account at a stockbroker. The debtor directed the stockbroker to transfer the securities to other accounts and liquidate them. The debtor also made some cash transfers into the account, and the stockbroker withdrew fees and commissions and margin interest that the debtor owed from the account. The trustee sought recovery from the stockbroker of the fees and commissions. Under section 546(e), a trustee may not avoid a transfer, except as an actual fraudulent transfer under section 548(a)(1)(A), of an interest of the debtor in property that is a settlement payment or a margin payment to a stockbroker. “Settlement payment” includes “any other similar payment commonly used in the securities trade.” One of the purposes of section 546(e) is to preserve the stability of settled securities transactions. Courts should construe the definition of settlement payments broadly to carry out that goal. A commission is a payment commonly used in the securities trade as part of the settlement of a transaction. Therefore, section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding the commission payments. “Margin payment” is defined broadly and includes a “payment or deposit of cash ... that is commonly known to the securities trade as original margin, initial margin, maintenance margin, or variation margin.” It also includes a payment to reduce a deficiency in a margin account. The interest accrual increased the deficiency in the debtor’s margin account, so the payment of margin interest reduces the deficiency. It was therefore a margin payment that section 546(e) protects from avoidance. Grayson Consulting, Inc. v. Wachovia Secs., LLC (In re Derivium Cap. LLC), 716 F.3d 355 (4th Cir. 2013).

- 2.1.jjjj Direct customer deposits to the debtor’s stockbroker are not avoidable transfers of property of the debtor. The Ponzi scheme debtor directed its customers to deposit their securities directly into the debtor’s account at a stockbroker. The debtor directed the stockbroker to transfer the securities to other accounts and liquidate them. The debtor also made some cash transfers into the account, and the stockbroker withdrew fees and commissions from the account. The trustee sought recovery from the stockbroker of the customer transfers. A trustee may avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer of an interest of the debtor property. The debtor did not acquire an interest in the customer securities until the stockbroker received them. The stockbroker acquired an interest at the same time. Therefore, the debtor did not have an interest in the customer securities until the stockbroker did, so the transfer to the stockbroker was not a transfer of the debtor’s interest in the property. Grayson Consulting, Inc. v. Wachovia Secs., LLC (In re Derivium Cap. LLC), 716 F.3d 355 (4th Cir. 2013).
- 2.1.kkkk A stockbroker that does not exercise dominion and control over the debtor’s account is not an initial transferee. The Ponzi scheme debtor directed its customers to deposit their securities directly into the debtor’s account at a stockbroker. The debtor directed the stockbroker to transfer the securities to other accounts and liquidate them. The debtor also made some cash transfers into the account, and the stockbroker withdrew fees and commissions from the account. Except for deducting its fees and commissions, which were small relative to the amounts in the account, the stockbroker moved assets in and out of the account only at the debtor’s direction. The trustee sought to avoid and recover from the stockbroker the cash transfers. The trustee may recover from an initial transferee. An initial transferee is one who has and exercises dominion and control over the property that the debtor transferred. Whether or not the stockbroker had dominion and control, it did not exercise it. It was therefore not the initial transferee of the cash payments. Grayson Consulting, Inc. v. Wachovia Secs., LLC (In re Derivium Cap. LLC), 716 F.3d 355 (4th Cir. 2013).
- 2.1.iiiii Bankruptcy court’s bar order in a fraudulent transfer action settlement is limited to claims over which the court has jurisdiction. After confirmation, the liquidating trustee sued three defendants to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers. The trustee settled with one defendant, who conditioned the settlement on a bar order prohibiting the other defendants from asserting any claim against the settling defendant, “including claims for indemnity or contribution, arising out of or reasonably flowing from the facts or allegations or claims” in the avoidance action. The parties agreed that the defendants did not have any contribution or indemnity claims against each other; the claims, if any, were based on other grounds. To grant the requested bar order, the court must first have jurisdiction over the barred claims, which it has only if the claims are related to the bankruptcy case. It is not sufficient that the settlement agreement requires the bar order; the underlying claims must be related to the case. Otherwise, the settlement would grant jurisdiction by consent. The court must also determine whether it has power to issue the order under section 105(a). A bar order in post-confirmation litigation operates differently from a third-party release under a plan, so section 524(e) does not restrict the court's power. The appeals court remands for the district court's determination of these issues. Papas v. Buchwald Cap. Advisors, LLC (In re Greektown Holdings, LLC), 728 F.3d 567 (6th Cir. 2013).

2.1.mmmm Foreseeable harm to creditors may constitute actual intent to defraud, even without a bad motive. The debtor was required by commodity trading regulations to keep customer property segregated from its own assets. Despite this requirement, it used customer-segregated assets to secure its obligations arising from its own proprietary trading activities. Financial reverses prevented the debtor from covering all of its loans from the bank and therefore restoring customer funds to the segregated accounts. Instead, the debtor took more customer assets out of segregation to secure the bank loans in an apparently sincere, but ultimately hopeless and desperate, attempt to prevent collapse. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the secured bank lender, who had accepted customer-segregated assets to secure the debtor's credit line to the bank, to avoid the debtor's transfer of the assets to the bank as an actual fraudulent transfer. Section 548(a)(1)(A) permits a trustee to avoid a transfer that a debtor made with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. The trustee need not show that the debtor's primary purpose was to hinder, delay or defraud. Rather, a person "is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his acts." Therefore, despite the debtor's apparent good-faith intent to prevent collapse, it should have seen the collapse as the natural consequence of its commingling, thereby showing actual intent to defraud creditors. In re Sentinel Mgmt. Group, Inc., 728 F.3d 660 (7th Cir. 2013).

2.1.nnnn Forum state choice of law rules should apply to a section 544(b) fraudulent transfer action. The Georgia bankruptcy trustee sued a Louisiana investor under section 544(b) to recover as a fraudulent transfer a payment the Georgia Ponzi scheme debtor made from its Georgia bank account. Supreme Court cases require application of the forum state's choice of law rules in a diversity action, of federal choice of law rules in a proceeding for allowance under equitable principles of a claim in a bankruptcy case, and of state law in an FDIC receiver's action against the bank's law firm for malpractice. These precedents establish the principle that the court should apply forum state choice of law rules unless a significant federal interest requires otherwise. A fraudulent transfer action under section 544(b) depends wholly on state law. The only federal aspects are that the action is brought within the context of a bankruptcy case, that the Bankruptcy Code grants the trustee the right to bring an action that creditors could have brought under state law, and that the trustee is subject to a two-year statute of limitations under section 546(a). The trustee may enforce only state law claims; the Bankruptcy Code does not grant any additional rights. Therefore, a compelling federal interest is absent, and the court chooses Georgia's choice of law rules. Those rules do not specify whether contract or tort choice of law rules apply in a fraudulent transfer action. Because the action permits a creditor to avoid as fraudulent a transfer that is contractually valid, the action is more like a tort action, and the tort choice of law rules should apply. Georgia tort choice of law rules look to the state where the last event necessary to make the defendant liable occurred. In this case, it was the debtor's transfer from its Georgia bank account. Therefore, Georgia law applies to the fraudulent transfer. Perkins v. Champagne (In re Int'l Mgmt. Assocs., LLC), 495 B.R. 96 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 2013).

2.1.oooo Pennsylvania UFTA permits punitive damages for outrageous conduct. The debtor's ex-wife obtained a judgment against him for alimony and child support. The debtor wrote to his ex-wife that she would never recover anything, and he threatened his ex-wife's lawyer. When he remarried, he transferred his property to his new wife. The ex-wife sued under the Pennsylvania UFTA to avoid and recover the transfers. The court granted judgment for the property and punitive damages. PUFTA permits a court, upon determining that a transfer is fraudulent, to avoid the transfer, grant an attachment and, “subject to applicable principles of equity,” enjoin further disposition of the property, appoint a receiver for the property or grant “any other relief the circumstances may require.” PUFTA authorizes recovery based on the value of the asset transferred and includes “Supplementary Provisions,” which supplement PUFTA, except to the extent inconsistent with PUFTA, with “the principles of law and equity, including ... fraud” The provision allowing the court to grant “any other relief” “subject to applicable principles of equity” and the supplementary provisions stand independently of the statute’s other provisions and therefore provide independent sources of authority for punitive damages. Equity and the common law of fraud permit punitive damages in egregious cases. Therefore, the court may award punitive damages in an egregious case. Klein v. Weidner, 729 F.3d 280 (3d Cir. 2013).

2.1.pppp Subchapter S corporation’s dividend is not a fraudulent transfer. The debtor corporation agreed with a shareholder in 1991 that if the shareholder became liable for the corporation’s taxes, the corporation would declare a dividend in the amount of the shareholder’s resulting tax liability. In 2005, the debtor made a Subchapter S election and in 2006 issued a dividend to the shareholder in the amount of his resulting tax liability. The debtor was insolvent at the time and filed bankruptcy within two years. The trustee may avoid a transfer made while the debtor was insolvent within two years before bankruptcy if the debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange. The shareholder’s agreement to pay the corporation’s taxes provided reasonably equivalent value to the debtor. Therefore, the dividend is not an avoidable transfer. Crumpton v. Stephens (In re Northlake Foods, Inc.), 715 F.3d 1251 (11th Cir. 2013).

2.1.qqqq Section 546(g) preempts state law fraudulent transfer claims. The debtor transferred a large commodities derivatives portfolio shortly before bankruptcy. The debtor’s chapter 11 plan established a litigation trust, to which certain creditors transferred all of their claims, including claims under nonbankruptcy fraudulent transfer law to avoid the debtor’s prebankruptcy transfers. More than two years after bankruptcy, the litigation trustee, as the creditors’ assignee, brought an action against the portfolio transferee to avoid and recover the portfolio under nonbankruptcy constructive fraudulent transfer law, relying on the creditors’ claims, not the estate’s claims under section 544(b). Section 546(g) provides that a trustee may not avoid “a transfer, made by or to ... a swap participant under or in connection with any swap agreement.” A federal law impliedly preempts a state law if, among other things, there is a conflict so that the application of the state law would be an obstacle to accomplishing Congress’s purposes and objectives. Section 546(g)’s purpose is to protect financial markets from the disruptive effects of unwinding settled transactions. Permitting creditors to assign their nonbankruptcy law avoiding power claims to a trustee would undercut section 546(g) and render it a nullity. Therefore, section 546(g) preempts the nonbankruptcy law fraudulent transfer claim. Whyte v. Barclays Bank plc, 494 B.R. 196 (S.D.N.Y. 2013).

2.1.rrrr Incurrence and payment of a tax penalty is not a fraudulent transfer. The debtor failed to pay withholding and employment taxes. The IRS assessed penalties. The debtor paid some of the taxes and some of the penalties. The debtor later filed a chapter 11 case and confirmed a plan that provided for the debtor to retain avoiding power claims. The reorganized debtor sued the IRS to recover the penalty payments as fraudulent transfers. A transfer or obligation may be avoidable under section 548 or under the UFTA if made or incurred for less than reasonably equivalent value while the debtor was insolvent. “Value” includes satisfaction or securing of an antecedent debt. Payment of an antecedent debt is voidable as a fraudulent transfer only if the debt is avoidable as a fraudulent obligation. A debtor might not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange for the imposition of a noncompensatory tax penalty obligation. However, nothing in section 548 or UFTA suggests that they were intended to permit avoidance of such obligations, and their purpose to discourage creditors from gaining unfair advantage during the debtor's slide into insolvency would not be served by permitting avoidance of tax penalty obligations. Moreover, the impact of a decision to permit avoidance would be enormous, spawning litigation reaching to all kinds of penalties. Therefore, neither the obligations nor their payment is avoidable. Southeast Waffles, LLC v. U.S. (In re Southeast Waffles, LLC), 702 F.3d 850 (6th Cir. 2012).

2.1.ssss Dissolving law firm partners' Jewel v. Boxer waiver is a transfer of property of the debtor. Under Jewel v. Boxer, 156 Cal. App. 3d 171 (1994), a partner in a law firm undergoing dissolution owes a fiduciary duty to the partnership and the other partners to account for profits on any unfinished business that the partner completes after leaving the firm. Here, law firm partners entered into an agreement to dissolve the firm. The agreement contained a waiver of the partnership's Jewel rights to facilitate the movement of partners and unfinished business to new law firms, which in turn facilitated movement of associates and staff, reduction of WARN Act and malpractice liability and an increase in the firm's ability to collect receivables from its former clients. The law firm filed bankruptcy within a few months. Before it filed bankruptcy, it continued to incur debts, which it was able to pay from current cash flow, but it had substantial prior unliquidated liabilities that it was no longer able to pay. A trustee may avoid as a fraudulent transfer a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property if made within two years before the bankruptcy for less than reasonably equivalent value when the debtor was insolvent or was incurring debts beyond its ability to repay. Unfinished business was property of the law firm as of the dissolution date. Therefore, the partners' waiver of a right to claim the profits from completion of the unfinished business was a transfer of property of the law firm. In the absence of proof by the defendants of the value that the law firm received in exchange for the Jewel waiver, the court may conclude that the law firm did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange for the waiver. A debtor incurs debts beyond its ability to pay as they become due even when it can pay new obligations if as a result of paying the new obligations, it is unable to pay its prior obligations. Therefore, the trustee may avoid the Jewel waiver. Heller Ehrman LLP v. Jones Day (In re Heller Ehrman LLP), 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 889 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. Mar. 11, 2013).

2.1.tttt Departing law firm partners are initial transferees of Jewel v. Boxer waiver; hiring law firms are subsequent transferees. Under Jewel v. Boxer, 156 Cal. App. 3d 171 (1994), a partner in a law firm undergoing dissolution owes a fiduciary duty to the partnership and the other partners to account for profits on any unfinished business that the partner completes after leaving the firm. Here, law firm partners entered into an agreement to dissolve the firm. The agreement contained a waiver of the partnership's Jewel rights to facilitate the movement of partners and unfinished business to new law firms, which in turn facilitated movement of associates and staff, reduction of WARN Act and malpractice liability and an increase in the firm's ability to collect receivables from its former clients. New law firms hired departing partners who brought their unfinished business from the old law firm. The new law firms did not compensate the partners for the unfinished business that they brought with them, but some of them knew of the waiver. The law firm filed bankruptcy within a few months. The trustee avoided the Jewel waiver as a fraudulent transfer. Section 550(a) allows the trustee to recover the property transferred or its value from the initial transferee or from a subsequent transferee, unless it took for value, in good faith and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. The departing partners were the initial transferees of the Jewel waiver, because the waiver gave the partners the right to complete the unfinished business free of the duty to account for the profits. The partners were also the initial transferees of the unencumbered unfinished business, and the law firms were the subsequent transferees only because they hired the departing partners. "Takes for value" requires the subsequent transferee to give value to the initial transferee, not necessarily the debtor. Here, the law firms did not provide any value in exchange for the unfinished business, so they lose on the first element of the defense. Courts construe "good faith" to mean the same as lack of knowledge of voidability. An objective standard, what a reasonable person would or should know under the circumstances after inquiry, determines lack of knowledge; actual (subjective) knowledge is not required. A defendant's knowledge of the waiver and that it is potentially avoidable is adequate to defeat the second element of the defense, even though the waiver's legal effect as a fraudulent transfer had not yet been determined. However, lack of knowledge of the waiver satisfies the requirement to sustain the defense. Heller Ehrman LLP v. Jones Day (In re Heller Ehrman LLP), 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 889 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. Mar. 11, 2013).

2.1.uuuu Wisconsin law does not permit a creditor with an execution returned unsatisfied to avoid a fraudulent transfer. The debtor transferred funds more than four years before the petition date with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. Section 544(a)(2) grants the trustee the rights and powers of a judgment creditor with an execution returned unsatisfied. Under common law, a creditor with an unsatisfied execution could seek equitable remedies under supplemental proceedings in the form of a creditor's bill, which could permit the creditor to discover and reach property that could not be levied upon at common law, such as property that the debtor had fraudulently transferred. Accordingly, under a creditor's bill, a creditor with an execution returned unsatisfied could discover and recover from a fraudulent transferee. However, here, Wisconsin law had repealed the creditor's bill procedure by a statute that dictated the scope of supplemental proceedings. The statute does not permit discovery against a non-debtor third party or the right to pursue fraudulently transferred property. Therefore, section 544(a)(2), applying Wisconsin law, does not permit the trustee to recover a fraudulent transfer. In re Archdiocese of Milwaukee, 483 B.R. 855 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2012).

2.1.vvvv Safe harbor does not protect a stockbroker's transferee who knew of the fraud but does protect subsequent transferees of a protected initial transferee. The stockbroker debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. It accepted deposits into customer accounts, produced false account statements that showed consistently profitable securities trading in the accounts and honored withdrawal requests as they were made, until it ran out of money. Some accounts were held by feeder funds, which had their own investors. The feeder funds withdrew funds from their accounts to satisfy, in part, redemption requests from their investors. The debtor's SIPA trustee sued account holders and feeder fund investors as initial and subsequent (immediate and mediate) transferees to avoid and recover withdrawals as preferences and fraudulent transfers. The section 546(e) safe harbor protects from avoidance a stockbroker's transfer that is a settlement payment or that is made in connection with a securities contract. The court had previously ruled that the customers' account agreements qualified as securities contracts and that withdrawals constituted settlement payments and so exempted the withdrawals from recovery. However, the trustee also alleged that some of the customers knew of the fraud and that they knew that the withdrawals were not settlement payments or made in connection with a securities contract. The safe harbor's purpose is to minimize market displacements that a major bankruptcy might cause, which can be achieved by protecting investors who had reasonable expectations they were signing securities contracts, but not by protecting those who had no such expectations. Therefore, the safe harbor does not shelter those who knew of the fraud. Similarly, a subsequent transferee may raise as a defense that the safe harbor protects the initial transfer, unless the subsequent transferee knew of the fraud. Finally, the safe harbor applies to a settlement payment made by or to a financial institution. The securities contract definition is not limited to a contract with the debtor. Therefore, if the financial institution withdrew funds from the debtor to satisfy its own obligation to its customer "in connection with a securities contract" between the financial institution and the customer, then the safe harbor protects both the financial institution and the customer. Secs. Investor Protection Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC, ___ B.R. ___ (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 15, 2013).

2.1.wwww Safe harbor permits trustee to bring breach of fiduciary duty claim, but not fraudulent transfer claim, against LBO corporate shareholder-directors. The trustee sued to avoid and recover LBO payments to the shareholder-directors of a closely held corporation as constructive fraudulent transfers. The trustee also alleged that the defendants were unjustly enriched by the receipt of money from the LBO and breached their fiduciary duties to the corporation by saddling it with debt that they knew it could not repay to facilitate the payout for their shares. The trustee sought damages for unjust enrichment and for the breach of fiduciary duty. Section 546(e) precludes the avoidance as a fraudulent transfer of a payment through a financial institution for the purchase of shares, so the court dismisses the trustee's fraudulent transfer claim. It also dismisses the state law unjust enrichment claim as preempted by section 546(e), because allowing recovery would implicate the same concerns as section 546(e) and would frustrate its purpose. However, the fiduciary duty claim seeks damages from the directors rather than avoidance or recovery of payments from the shareholders and thus does not implicate the same concerns. Accordingly, the court denies the motion to dismiss the fiduciary duty claim. AP Servs. LLP v. Silva, 483 B.R. 63 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

2.1.xxxx Creditor who participated in, ratified or knew of a fraudulent transfer may not act as a triggering creditor under section 544(b). The parent arranged a transaction to spin off a division to the parent's shareholders. It created a new subsidiary corporation and transferred the division's assets, including the stock in an existing subsidiary, to the new subsidiary. On the same day, the new subsidiary issued notes to the parent for $7.2 billion and issued 145 million of its shares to the parent, which the parent distributed to its shareholders. It also paid the parent $2.4 billion in cash, including $2.0 billion in cash borrowed from banks and in the bond market. The bank credit agreement required that the subsidiary use the cash to pay the parent. The parent distributed the shares to its shareholders and transferred the notes to two lenders, which transferred to the parent $7.1 billion of the parent's debt that the lenders had acquired in the open market in exchange for the new subsidiary's debt. The subsidiary prospered for over a year, but filed bankruptcy about 30 months after the transaction. The trustee sought to avoid the subsidiary's payments to the parent. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer that is avoidable by a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim. The Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act permits a creditor with a claim at the time of the transfer and, in some cases, future creditors, to avoid a fraudulent transfer. However, a creditor who participates in or ratifies the transfer may be estopped from avoiding it. Here, the bank lenders funded the subsidiary's payment to the parent and required the subsidiary to use the cash to pay the parent. As such, they are estopped from avoiding the transfer and cannot serve as the "triggering" creditors. The original bondholders also participated in the transaction, but many bonds had traded before bankruptcy, so some of the bondholders did not participate. However, the transfer was public, so they knew (or should have known) about the transfer. They also cannot act as the triggering creditors, because the fraudulent transfer laws were designed to protect creditors from secret transactions. U.S. Bank N.A. v. Verizon Commc'ns Inc., 479 B.R. 405 (N.D. Tex. 2012).

2.1.yyyy Subsidiary's creditor may act as triggering creditor under section 544(b) where plan does not adequately separate debtor and its subsidiaries. The parent arranged a transaction to spin off a division to the parent's shareholders. It created a new subsidiary corporation and transferred the division's assets, including the stock in an existing subsidiary, to the new subsidiary. On the same day, the new subsidiary issued notes to the parent for $7.2 billion and issued 145 million of its shares to the parent, which the parent distributed to its shareholders. It also paid the parent $2.4 billion in cash, including $2.0 billion in cash borrowed from banks and in the bond market. The subsidiary prospered for over a year, but filed bankruptcy about 30 months after the transaction. At the petition date, an individual had a wrongful termination claim against the debtor's subsidiary, which also filed bankruptcy and whose case was administratively consolidated with the debtor's case. The debtors filed a joint plan that did not observe the corporate distinctions between the debtors. The trustee sought to avoid the subsidiary's payments to the parent. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer that is avoidable by a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim. The Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act permits a creditor with a claim at the time of the transfer and, in some cases, future creditors, to avoid a fraudulent transfer. Generally, a creditor may avoid a transfer only if made by his debtor. Here, the individual may serve as the triggering creditor, because of the lack of separateness under the debtors' plan. U.S. Bank N.A. v. Verizon Commc'ns Inc., 479 B.R. 405 (N.D. Tex. 2012).

2.1.zzzz Trustee may not recover property under section 550 upon the avoidance of an obligation. The parent arranged a transaction to spin off a division to the parent's shareholders. It created a new subsidiary corporation and transferred the division's assets, including the stock in an existing subsidiary, to the new subsidiary. On the same day, the new subsidiary issued two notes to the parent for $7.2 billion and issued 145 million of its shares to the parent, which the parent distributed to its shareholders. It also paid the parent $2.4 billion in cash, including $2.0 billion in cash borrowed from banks and in the bond market. The parent transferred the notes to two lenders, which transferred to the parent $7.1 billion of the parent's debt that the lenders had acquired in the open market in exchange for the new subsidiary's debt. The subsidiary prospered for over a year, but filed bankruptcy about 30 months after the transaction. The trustee sought to avoid the subsidiary's issuance to the parent of the two notes and recover from the parent under section 550(a). Section 544(b), in combination with applicable nonbankruptcy fraudulent transfer law, permits a trustee to avoid a transfer of property or incurrence of an obligation. Section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover property (or its value) from an initial transferee or, in certain circumstances, from a subsequent transferee. Section 550(a), however, does not provide for recovery of an obligation that the debtor incurred. An obligation is not property of the debtor whose transfer the trustee can avoid. Where the trustee avoids an obligation, it is canceled, and there is no property to recover. Payment of the obligation may constitute an avoidable and recoverable transfer, but not the issuance of the obligation itself. U.S. Bank N.A. v. Verizon Commc'ns Inc., 479 B.R. 405 (N.D. Tex. 2012).

2.1.aaaa Ponzi scheme presumption does not apply in the absence of the debtor's actual fraud. The debtor was required by commodity trading regulations to keep customer property segregated from its own assets. Despite this requirement, it used customer-segregated assets to secure its obligations arising from its own proprietary trading activities. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the secured bank lender, who had accepted customer-segregated assets to secure the debtor's credit line to the bank, to avoid the debtor's transfer of the assets to the bank as an actual fraudulent transfer. A trustee may prove actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors by showing the badges of fraud, but proof of the badges is not required where other proof is available. However, a debtor's genuine belief that paying one creditor in preference to another might prevent collapse does not by itself constitute actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud other creditors, nor does the illegality of the transaction, even where the transferee negligently did not know of the illegality. Nor, where the debtor is not running a Ponzi or other fraudulent scheme, may the court impose a "Ponzi scheme presumption" that a debtor's knowledge of imminent collapse irrebuttably implies that the debtor made each transfer with actual intent to defraud. Under the circumstances, the debtor did not transfer customer-segregated funds to the bank with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud, and the bank is not liable for a fraudulent transfer. In re Sentinel Mgmt Group, Inc., 689 F.3d 855 (7th Cir. 2012).

2.1.bbbbb A debtor's payment of interest on notes issued in a fraudulent transfer and then sold does not benefit the initial note recipient. The parent arranged a transaction to spin off a division to the parent's shareholders. It created a new subsidiary corporation and transferred the division's assets, including the stock in an existing subsidiary, to the new subsidiary. On the same day, the new subsidiary issued notes to the parent for $7.2 billion, issued 145 million of its shares to the parent and paid the parent $2.4 billion in cash (including $2.0 billion in borrowed cash) by wire transfer from the subsidiary's account to the parent's account at the same bank. The parent distributed the shares to its shareholders and transferred the notes to two lenders, which transferred to the parent $7.1 billion of the parent's debt that the lenders had acquired in the open market in exchange for the new subsidiary's debt. The subsidiary prospered for over a year, but filed bankruptcy about 30 months after the transaction. The trustee sought to avoid the subsidiary's interest payments on the new debt and recover them from the parent. Section 548 permits a trustee to avoid a transfer or obligation made within two years before bankruptcy under certain circumstances; section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover an avoided transfer from "the initial transferee of such transfer or the entity for whose benefit such transfer was made." The parent may have benefited by receiving the notes from the subsidiary and using them to retire its own debt and by the subsidiary's undertaking the obligation to pay interest on the notes. However, if the subsidiary did not make the interest payments, the parent would not have been affected. Moreover, whether or not the parent caused the subsidiary to issue the notes, it did not cause the subsidiary to make the interest payments, because the subsidiary was then independent. Therefore, the interest payments were not for the benefit of the parent. U.S. Bank Nat'l Assoc. v. Verizon Commc'ns Inc., 892 F. Supp. 2d 805 (N.D. Tex. 2012).

2.1.ccccc Intra-bank payment for securities is a settlement payment that is subject to section 546(e). The parent arranged a transaction to spin off a division to the parent's shareholders. It created a new subsidiary corporation and transferred the division's assets, including the stock in an existing subsidiary, to the new subsidiary. On the same day, the new subsidiary issued notes to the parent for $7.2 billion, issued 145 million of its shares to the parent and paid the parent $2.4 billion in cash (including $2.0 billion in borrowed cash) by wire transfer from the subsidiary's account to the parent's account at the same bank. The parent distributed the shares to its shareholders and transferred the notes to two lenders, which transferred to the parent $7.1 billion of the parent's debt that the lenders had acquired in the open market in exchange for the new subsidiary's debt. The subsidiary prospered for over a year, but filed bankruptcy about 30 months after the transaction. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a "settlement payment" made by, to or for the benefit of a "financial institution". A payment to purchase securities is a settlement payment, and a bank is a financial institution. Section 546(e) and the definition of settlement payment are not limited to payments that occur in the securities market settlement process or system. Nor are they limited to payments in which the financial institution is not acting as an intermediary or a conduit. The subsidiary paid cash, debt and stock to the parent to purchase the division, including the stock in the existing subsidiary. Therefore, the cash payment was a settlement payment, even though it did not implicate the securities market settlement process and even though the payment was simply an intra-bank transfer. U.S. Bank Nat'l Assoc. v. Verizon Commc'ns Inc., 892 F. Supp. 2d 805 (N.D. Tex. 2012).

2.1.ddddd Section 546(e) safe harbor prohibits intentional fraudulent transfer avoidance under section 544(b) and applicable state law. The debtor purchased securities and paid the seller through its bank in cash, notes and its own stock. After bankruptcy, the trustee claimed that the transfer of the consideration to the seller was an intentionally fraudulent transfer that was avoidable under section 544(b) and section 5(a) of the applicable state Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a settlement payment made by, to or for the benefit of a financial institution, "except under section 548(a)(1)(A)". Section 548(a)(1)(A), in language essentially identical to UFTA section 5(a), permits the trustee to recover a transfer that is made "with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud" any creditor of the debtor. Although Congressional intent was clear to except intentional fraudulent transfers from the section 546(e) settlement payment safe harbor, the exception is limited to avoiding power actions under section 548(a)(1)(A), not to all intentional fraudulent transfers. Therefore, the trustee may not avoid the transfer under section 544(b). However, section 546(e) applies only to transfers, not to the incurrance of obligations. Therefore, it does not bar the unlawful dividend to recover the notes. U.S. Bank Nat'l Assoc. v. Verizon Commc'ns Inc., 892 F. Supp. 2d 805 (N.D. Tex. 2012).

- 2.1.eeeee Section 546(e) safe harbor applies to a claim to recover an illegal cash dividend that was also a protected fraudulent transfer. The debtor purchased securities from its parent corporation and paid the parent through its bank in cash, notes and its own stock. After bankruptcy, the trustee claimed that the transfer of the consideration to the parent was an avoidable intentionally fraudulent transfer and that the payments constituted an unlawful dividend under state law. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a settlement payment made by, to or for the benefit of a financial institution and so bars the trustee's fraudulent transfer claim. Permitting the trustee to recover the cash payment under the state's unlawful dividend statute would render section 546(e)'s prohibition meaningless. Therefore, the trustee may not pursue the unlawful dividend claim against the parent for the cash. However, section 546(e) applies only to transfers, not to the incurrence of obligations. Therefore, it does not bar the unlawful dividend to recover the notes. U.S. Bank Nat'l Assoc. v. Verizon Commc'ns Inc., 892 F. Supp. 2d 805 (N.D. Tex. 2012).
- 2.1.fffff Granting a lien to secure a borrowing to pay an affiliate's creditor is a fraudulent transfer to the affiliate's creditor. The debtor was a housing developer. Its subsidiary had entered into a joint venture to develop houses. The joint venture borrowed heavily and then failed. The debtor had guaranteed the loans. A default on the loans would have cross-defaulted the debtor's bonds and its bank revolving credit line, both of which were guaranteed by its other subsidiaries, who were not liable on the joint venture's obligations. After the joint venture failed, the debtor and its other subsidiaries borrowed from different lenders to pay the joint venture's lenders. The other subsidiaries granted security interests in substantially all their assets to secure the new loans. The borrowed funds, less fees incurred, were disbursed through another of the debtor's (nondebtor) subsidiaries to the joint venture lenders. The new loans increased the subsidiaries' liabilities above the value of their assets and prevented them from accessing needed additional capital as their markets and businesses continued to decline. But the transaction prevented the cross-default and might have given the debtor and the other subsidiaries the chance to avert a bankruptcy. Despite the momentary respite, the housing market was collapsing both before and after the transaction, and the debtor could not recover. The debtor and the subsidiaries filed bankruptcy seven months after the transaction. A transfer is fraudulent and avoidable if the debtor had unreasonably small capital or was insolvent at the time of or was rendered insolvent by the transfer and did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange. A bankruptcy court has wide latitude to determine what constitutes reasonably equivalent value, which is a question of fact. The chance to avert bankruptcy is not an unqualified benefit for which a company may pay any price; its value must be weighed against the alternative. Here, the benefit was not reasonably equivalent to the value the other subsidiaries transferred. The other subsidiaries did not receive any direct or indirect benefit from the transfers because they were not liable on preexisting obligations to the joint venture lenders, they did not receive the borrowed funds and the payments did not preserve value for the corporate group. Therefore, the payments to the old lenders were avoidable as constructive fraudulent transfers. Sr. Transeastern Lenders v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 680 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2012).
- 2.1.ggggg Proceeds of loan that is transferred directly to third party is a transfer of property of the debtor. As part of an acquisition and leveraged recapitalization, the debtor borrowed enough not only to buy the target corporation but also to pay a dividend to its shareholders. All of the debtor's subsidiaries (as well as the target) guaranteed the loan and granted security interests in their assets to secure the guarantees. A second tier subsidiary (which became a debtor) declared the dividend to the debtor's first tier subsidiary, which declared a dividend to the debtor, which declared a dividend to its nondebtor parent. The loan agreement provided that a portion of the funds equal to the dividend amount would be paid directly to the nondebtor parent, and at closing, funds were disbursed as provided in the loan agreement. The trustee sought recovery from the nondebtor parent of the dividend payment as a fraudulent transfer. The trustee may recover a transfer of property of the debtor if the transfer is actually or constructively fraudulent.

Property of the debtor includes property that would have become property of the estate if it had not been transferred. Despite the lender's direct transfer to the nondebtor parent, the funds were property of the second tier subsidiary, because the funds would have remained with the debtor second tier subsidiary if the transfer had not been made. Therefore, the complaint adequately states a claim that the debtor transferred property of the debtor. Michaelson v. Farmer (In re Appleseed's Intermediate Holdings, LLC), 470 B.R. 289 (D. Del. 2012).

2.1.hhhhh Trustee may recover property that the debtor held in trust only for the benefit of the trust beneficiaries. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme through a loan servicing business. It maintained an operating account and a servicing account. It paid its operating expenses only from the operating account. It used the servicing account to receive and disburse loan funds and also to fund the Ponzi scheme. A lender transferred funds to the debtor to fund a loan, who, at the lender's direction, deposited the funds directly into a servicing account and later paid the funds to the borrower. The debtor received payments from the borrower, which, at the lender's direction, the debtor also deposited into the servicing account and paid out to the lender. The debtor followed the same procedure for other lenders and borrowers. A trustee may avoid a transfer of property as a fraudulent transfer if, among other things, the property was property of the debtor. Property was property of the debtor if it would have become property of the estate upon the filing of the petition had it not been transferred. The debtor holds only legal title, not an equitable interest, in property that the debtor holds in trust for another. Based on applicable nonbankruptcy law, the debtor held the servicing account funds in trust for the lenders, because, even though the debtor skimmed funds from the servicing account to perpetuate the Ponzi scheme, the parties' expressed their intention that the lender's funds be used solely to fund the specific loan to the borrower and that the borrower's funds be used solely to repay the lender. However, the lender may defend against avoidance only to the extent that the lender can trace its own funds into and out of the servicing account. It may not assert that funds were not property of the debtor on the ground that the debtor held them in trust for another. Where the debtor holds bare legal title to trust funds, a trustee's avoidance action may recover only legal title to, not an equitable interest in, the funds, and any recoveries from lenders would still be held in trust for the benefit of lenders, not for the benefit of the estate or the general creditors. Notinger v. Migliaccio (In re Fin. Res. Mortgage, Inc.), 468 B.R. 487 (Bankr. D.N.H. 2012).

2.1.iiiii Court applies state limited partnership law to determine fraudulent transfer reach-back period. The Delaware limited partnership debtor agreed with an investor that he could receive a refund of his limited partnership investment if the debtor's president left the debtor's employ. The president left 3-1/2 years before bankruptcy, and the debtor promptly refunded the investment. The debtor conducted business only in California, but the debtor's limited partnership agreement had a Delaware choice of law provision. The trustee sued the investor to recover the payment under section 544(b) as a fraudulent transfer and under the Delaware Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act as an unlawful distribution. The statute of limitations for a fraudulent transfer action depends on the choice of law. A federal court with exclusive jurisdiction over an action, such as in bankruptcy, should apply federal choice of law rules, which follow the Restatement. Restatement section 6(1) requires a court to apply its own state's statutory choice of law rules. Here, state law points to the law of the partnership's organization. Restatement section 187(1) points to the parties' contract if the matter at issue could have been resolved by an express contract provision. Therefore, Delaware law applies to disputes regarding the transfer. A statute of limitations differs from a statute of repose in that the former is procedural, while the latter is substantive and defeats the cause of action after its expiration. DRULPA section 17-607(c) provides that a limited partner who receives a distribution from the partnership "shall have no liability under this chapter or under applicable law for the amount of the distribution after the expiration of 3 years from the date of the distribution." It is a statute of repose, because it cuts off liability after 3 years. Moreover, because it precludes liability "under other applicable law", it therefore precludes liability under Delaware's fraudulent transfer statute, which otherwise would have a four-year statute of limitations. Because the choice of law rules apply Delaware law to the action to avoid and recover the transfer, the trustee is barred from recovering it. Diamond v. Friedman (In re Century City Doctors Hosp., LLC), 466 B.R. 1 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2012).

- 2.1.jjjjj Estate representative may pursue avoiding power action even after unsecured claims are paid in full. The debtor in possession brought a fraudulent transfer action against a lender. The debtor confirmed a plan that provided for full payment of unsecured claims and the vesting of avoiding power actions in an asset recovery corporation, which succeeded as plaintiff to the fraudulent transfer action. The estate's right to avoid a transfer vests as of the petition date. Section 550 permits recovery "for the benefit of the estate". The estate is not synonymous with unsecured creditors. Therefore, despite the payment in full of unsecured claims, an avoiding power action persists until it no longer benefits the estate, and the asset protection corporation has standing to pursue the claim. The court does not provide any guidance on when an action will no longer benefit the estate. MC Asset Recovery LLC v. Commerzbank A.G. (In re Mirant Corp.), 675 F.3d 530 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 2.1.kkkkk Legal title is not required for property to be property of the debtor. A group of related companies conducted a fraudulent investment scheme. All investors deposited their funds into a bank account that was titled in the name of a Curaçao bank that was an affiliate of the debtors and had no business operations of its own. One of the debtors completely controlled all withdrawals from the account; the Curaçao bank had no authority over the account. The debtor directed transfers to its insiders with actual intent to defraud creditors. The trustee may avoid a fraudulent transfer of property of the debtor. Property ownership depends on the individual facts of each case, not merely on legal title to the property. Control may constitute ownership even where the control party does not have legal title. Where evidence of fraud and the debtor's strict control are strong, legal title is a less compelling factor. Based on the facts here, the funds in the account were property of the debtor, and the transfers to insiders from the account were avoidable in the debtor's bankruptcy case. Stettner v. Smith (In re IFS Fin. Corp.), 669 F.3d 255 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 2.1.lllll Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act is not "applicable nonbankruptcy law" for purposes of section 544(b). The estate representative sought to avoid a guarantee under section 544(b), relying on the Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act (FDCPA) as applicable law and the United States' claim as the triggering allowable claim. The FDCPA has a long statute of limitations for recovery of a fraudulent transfer. 28 U.S.C. § 3003(c) provides that the FDCPA "shall not be construed to supersede or modify the operation of title 11". Therefore, it may not be used to apply section 544(b). MC Asset Recovery LLC v. Commerzbank A.G. (In re Mirant Corp.), 675 F.3d 530 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 2.1.mmmmm Payment of noncompensatory tax penalties is not a fraudulent transfer. Before bankruptcy, the debtor became delinquent on its withholding taxes. The IRS assessed the taxes and penalties. The debtor paid some of the amounts owing. The IRS applied the payments first to the penalties. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession filed an action to avoid the payments that the IRS applied to penalties as fraudulent transfers. A debtor in possession may avoid a transfer as a constructively fraudulent transfer if the transfer was made for less than reasonably equivalent value while the debtor was insolvent. "Value" includes satisfaction or securing of an antecedent debt. A dollar-for-dollar reduction in debt in exchange for a payment is reasonably equivalent value. Although the penalties were not in compensation for actual pecuniary loss and their payment did not reduce the debtor's tax liability, the IRS gave reasonably equivalent value in exchange for the payments because they reduced the debtor's liability for the penalties, which were valid, pre-existing debts. Southeast Waffles, LLC v. U.S. (In re Southeast Waffles, LLC), 460 B.R. 132 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

2.1.nnnnn Fraudulent transfer law of state with most significant relationship to transaction applies under section 544(b). In a bankruptcy case pending in Texas, the debtor in possession brought an action under section 544(b), relying on New York fraudulent transfer law, to avoid a prepetition guarantee that was negotiated and executed in New York. The debtor's headquarters were in Georgia. New York's fraudulent transfer law permits the avoidance of a guarantee. Unlike all other states' fraudulent transfer laws, Georgia's law in effect at the time of the action did not, though it later amended its law to permit avoidance. A fraudulent transfer avoidance action sounds in tort. Texas applies the "most significant relationship" test to determine choice of law in a tort action. Sections 6 and 145 of the Restatement (Second) of Conflicts describe the most significant relationship. Section 145(b) requires that the contacts to be taken into account in applying section 6 include the places where the injury and the conduct causing the injury occurred, the domicile or residence of the parties and the place where their relationship is centered. Where an injury, such as a fraudulent transfer, is intangible, it is difficult to assign a location, and the facts here make it impossible to define what conduct caused the injury or where it occurred. The relevant parties are in both New York and Georgia, and there is no one location where their relationship is centered. Therefore, these contacts are of limited importance in applying section 6. Section 6 looks to the needs of the interstate system, the relevant policies of the interested states and the basic policies underlying the law, among other things. Here, the fraudulent transfer law's basic policy is creditor protection. Applying the approach taken by the overwhelming majority of states best serves the needs of the interstate system. Finally, Georgia does not have a strong interest in applying its now-repealed law, because its citizens would not benefit from it in this case. Therefore, New York law should apply. MC Asset Recovery LLC v. Commerzbank A.G. (In re Mirant Corp.), 675 F.3d 530 (5th Cir. 2012).

2.1.ooooo Court may collapse bridge and permanent LBO financing to permit a fraudulent transfer action against the permanent lender. A buyer was unable to arrange permanent financing for a leveraged buyout and so acquired the debtor with bridge financing. Within a month after the acquisition, the buyer and debtor replaced the bridge financing with permanent financing. The debtor failed within two years and filed bankruptcy. The trustee may avoid a lien granted to secure a loan used to finance a leveraged buyout if the debtor was rendered insolvent by the transaction. Though the lender gives reasonably equivalent value for the lien by making the loan to the debtor, the debtor uses the loan proceeds to pay its shareholders, who do not give reasonably equivalent value to the debtor in exchange. The fraudulent transfer laws apply to such a transaction because the court collapses the steps in the transaction and views the combined transactions as encumbering the debtor's assets to permit a payment to shareholders. Similarly, where the LBO buyer arranges bridge financing and then permanent financing, the court may collapse those transactions as well to permit an LBO fraudulent transfer action to proceed against the permanent lender. Official Ctte. Of Unsecured Creditors v. CIT Group/Business Credit Inc. (in re Jevic Holding Corp.), 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 3553 (Bankr. D. Del. Sept. 15, 2011).

2.1.ppppp Collapsing requires reconveyance of the consideration received from the first transaction and the transferee's knowledge of the fraud. The individual debtor and his law firm, also a debtor, maintained two banking relationships: one of the banks held the account from which the law firm conducted a Ponzi scheme. The law firm borrowed from the other bank and granted it additional collateral. The firm transferred the loan proceeds to the first bank and from there repaid a Ponzi scheme investor. The trustee sues the lending bank to avoid the grant of the security interest in the additional collateral as a fraudulent transfer. To prevail, the trustee must collapse the two transactions—the loan and the payoff of the investor. Multiple transactions may be collapsed for purposes of applying the fraudulent transfer laws if they are steps in an integrated transaction, where none of the transactions would occur unless they all did. In addition, the debtor must transfer the consideration from the first transaction with actual intent to defraud or for less than fair consideration and the initial transferee must have actual or constructive knowledge of the fraudulent scheme. In this case, the Ponzi scheme presumption satisfies the actual fraud alternative of the first of these elements. The trustee does not satisfy the second element, however, because the law firm did not run the Ponzi scheme through accounts at the lending bank. Therefore, the trustee's complaint fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted. Gowan v. Wachovia Bank, N.A. (In re Dreier LLP), 453 B.R. 499 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

2.1.qqqq UFCA actual fraudulent transfer action does not require that the transferee intended to defraud. The debtor attorney perpetrated a Ponzi scheme by soliciting investors in interest bearing notes purportedly issued by a client. The investors advanced the money to purchase the notes to an account that the attorney characterized as a client escrow account. In reality, the attorney forged the notes, commingled the money in the escrow account with other client funds and firm operating funds and used the money for his own purposes and to repay interest and principal on earlier investors' notes. After bankruptcy, the trustee sought to recover payments of principal and interest under New York's version of the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act (NY DCL § 276; UFCA § 6), which permits avoidance of a transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. The Ponzi scheme presumption establishes the debtor's actual intent to defraud creditors. Nothing more is required. Prior case law had determined that a trustee could avoid an actually fraudulent transfer only if the transferee also was guilty of fraudulent intent. Those decisions were based primarily on a decision, later corrected, that had misread pre-UFCA law. However, a careful reading of section 276, which addresses only the transferor's intent, and of section 276-a, which applies only when both the transferor and the transferee both intended to defraud, shows that the trustee need not plead the transferee's intent to survive a motion to dismiss an actual fraudulent transfer complaint under the UFCA. Gowan v. The Patriot Group, LLC (In re Dreier LLP), 452 B.R. 391 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

2.1.rrrr Debtor does not receive fair consideration for Ponzi scheme interest payment on notes the debtor did not issue. The debtor attorney perpetrated a Ponzi scheme by soliciting investors in interest bearing notes purportedly issued by a client. The investors advanced the money to purchase the notes to an account that the attorney characterized as a client escrow account. In reality, the attorney forged the notes, commingled the money in the escrow account with other client funds and firm operating funds and used the money for his own purposes and to repay interest and principal on earlier investors' notes. After bankruptcy, the trustee sought to recover payments of principal and interest under New York's version of the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act (NY DCL § 273; UFCA § 3), which permits avoidance of a transfer made without "fair consideration" while the debtor was insolvent or undercapitalized. "Fair consideration" requires an exchange of property or discharge of an antecedent debt for fair equivalent value, given in good faith. Return of principal to a Ponzi scheme victim discharges the debtor's obligation to the victim for restitution arising from the fraud. Unless the transferee is an insider or participated in the fraud, a transferee who takes in discharge of the debt for principal is in good faith. Otherwise, application of the avoiding power would have the effect of a preference statute, contrary to the UFCA's intent not to disturb legitimate payments to satisfy debts. A payment of interest on a note might also be for value, if the debtor is obligated to pay interest (rather than, say, an equity return). Here, however, the debtor did not issue the notes and did not commit to pay interest. The notes were purportedly issued by the debtor's client. Therefore, the debtor's payment of interest to the investors did not discharge the debtor's obligation for interest and was not for fair consideration. Gowan v. The Patriot Group, LLC (In re Dreier LLP), 452 B.R. 391 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

2.1.ssss An equity investor gives value in exchange for return of principal from a Ponzi scheme debtor. Investors bought equity interests in a Ponzi scheme debtor and later received transfers from the debtor, representing returns of principal or purported profits on their investments. Section 548(a)(1)(A) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. Under the Ponzi scheme presumption, any transfer that a Ponzi scheme operator makes is presumed to be made with such intent. Under section 548(c), a transferee “takes for value and in good faith” may retain the transfer. “Value” includes satisfaction of an antecedent debt. Ordinarily, return of an equity investment to a shareholder does not satisfy an antecedent debt and provides no value to the transferor. In a Ponzi scheme, however, where the investor bought the equity interest after the fraud began, the investor has a fraud claim against the debtor in the principal amount of the investment. The debtor’s transfer to the investor of the invested principal satisfies that debt and therefore is for value. Perkins v. Haines, 661 F.3d 623 (11th Cir. 2011).

2.1.ttttt An avoiding power defendant does not have standing to argue that the transferred property was trust property rather than property of the debtor. The debtor attorney perpetrated a Ponzi scheme by soliciting investors in interest bearing notes purportedly issued by a client. The investors advanced the money to purchase the notes to an account that the attorney characterized as a client escrow account. In reality, the attorney forged the notes, commingled the money in the escrow account with other client funds and firm operating funds and used the money for his own purposes and to repay interest and principal on earlier investors’ notes. After bankruptcy, the trustee sought to recover payments of principal and interest as actual fraudulent transfers under section 548(a)(1)(A) and New York’s version of the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act (NY DCL § 276; UFCA § 6). A trustee may recover a transfer only of property of the debtor. Property that the debtor holds in an express trust is not property of the debtor for this purpose. An express trust requires a designated beneficiary, a designated trustee, a designated trust fund and actual delivery with intent to vest title in the trustee. Only the beneficiary has standing to assert the trust. Here, even if the client trust account were properly maintained, it existed for the benefit of the attorney’s clients, not the investors, as there was no express agreement that the attorney serve as trustee for the investors. Thus, they did not have standing to argue that the funds that they advanced were held in trust and therefore not property of the debtor. Moreover, where the debtor commingles funds in an account, there is a presumption for purposes of applying the avoiding powers that the transfers were made from property of the debtor, and the burden is on the defendant to prove otherwise. Therefore, the court denies a motion to dismiss based on defendants’ argument that the transfers were not made from property of the debtor. Gowan v. The Patriot Group, LLC (In re Dreier LLP), 452 B.R. 391 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

2.1.uuuuu Rooker-Feldman does not prohibit a fraudulent transfer action challenging a consensual divorce property division. The debtor divorced her husband. They agreed on a division of their property, which was approved as a consensual division without evaluation of its fairness. The trustee sued the husband to avoid and recover the property division and the debtor’s obligations as a fraudulent transfer and obligations, alleging that the transfer was made and the obligations were incurred for less than reasonably equivalent value in exchange. Rooker-Feldman prohibits an action in federal court that challenges a state court judgment, though not an action that raises the same issues on which a state court has already ruled, which might be barred by ordinary claim preclusion rather than by Rooker-Feldman. Here, the state court did not rule on fairness or the value of the division of property and obligations, so Rooker-Feldman does not bar the trustee’s fraudulent transfer suit. Samson v. Blixseth (In re Blixseth), 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 2953 (Bankr. D. Mont. Aug. 1, 2011).

2.1.vvvvv Section 546(e) safe harbor does not apply to small, local LBO. The debtor’s shareholder acquired the debtor in a leveraged buyout for $1,500,000 from its prior shareholders with the cash proceeds of a loan secured by the debtor’s assets. The debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value for undertaking its obligation on the loan or granting a security interest to secure its obligation, was rendered insolvent by the transaction and filed bankruptcy 15 months later. The transfer of the security interest to the lender for the benefit of the former shareholders was a constructively fraudulent transfer under section 548(a)(1)(B). Section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding a transfer under section 548(a)(1)(B) “that is a ... settlement payment as defined in section 101 or 741 of this title, made by or to ... [a] financial institution ... or in connection with a securities contract, as defined in section 741”. The definition of settlement payment is circular and therefore ambiguous, requiring the court to review the legislative history to determine section 546(e)’s scope. The defined terms are used in the stockbroker liquidation subchapter, the “settlement payment” definition refers to “any other payment commonly used in the securities trade”, and the legislative history focuses on preserving stability in the securities and financial markets. Therefore, it is reasonable to conclude that the safe harbor should apply only to a transaction that might affect the securities markets. Although line drawing may be difficult, this transaction is clearly far from the line and far removed from Congress’ intent in protecting settlement payments. Therefore, the safe harbor does not apply, and the trustee may avoid the transfers to the former shareholders. Geltzer v. Mooney (In re MacMenamin’s Grill Ltd.), 450 B.R. 414 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

2.1.wwwww Section 546(e) safe harbor does not apply to constructively fraudulent obligation.

The debtor’s shareholder acquired the debtor in a leveraged buyout for $1,500,000 from its prior shareholders with the cash proceeds of a loan secured by the debtor’s assets. The debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value for undertaking its obligation on the loan or granting a security interest to secure its obligation, was rendered insolvent by the transaction and filed bankruptcy 15 months later. The incurrence of the obligation to the lender for the benefit of the former shareholders was a constructively fraudulent obligation under section 548(a)(1)(B). Section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding “a transfer [under section 548(a)(1)(B)] that is a ... settlement payment as defined in section 101 or 741 of this title, made by or to ... [a] financial institution ... or in connection with a securities contract, as defined in section 741”. The trustee brought an action against the lender to avoid the debtor’s obligation to the lender. The safe harbor applies only to transfers, not obligations. Therefore, it does not protect the lender from the trustee’s action here. Geltzer v. Mooney (In re MacMenamin’s Grill Ltd.), 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 1461 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Apr. 21, 2011).

2.1.xxxxx Preservation of viability and strengthening of a corporate group may constitute reasonably equivalent value for an upstream guarantee.

The debtor’s subsidiary had entered into a joint venture that borrowed heavily and then failed. The debtor had guaranteed the loans. The debtor’s other subsidiaries were not liable on the joint venture’s obligations, but were co-borrowers on the debtor’s revolving credit facility and had granted security interests in all their assets to secure their obligations under the facility. If the debtor defaulted on the joint venture loan, it would have cross-defaulted the revolver, which neither the debtor nor the subsidiaries would have been able to pay. After the joint venture failed and the joint venture lenders sued the debtor, the debtor borrowed from different lenders to pay the joint venture’s lenders. The debtor’s other subsidiaries became co-borrowers on the new loans and granted security interests in substantially all their assets to secure their new obligations. The debtor and the subsidiaries filed bankruptcy seven months after the new loans, due in large part to the collapse of the debtor’s markets during the time between the new loans’ funding and the bankruptcy. A transfer of the debtor’s property is fraudulent and avoidable if the debtor had unreasonably small capital or was insolvent at the time of or rendered insolvent by the transfer and did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange. The Code defines “value” to mean “property, or satisfaction or securing of an antecedent debt” but does not define “reasonably equivalent value”. “Property” is broadly defined in the Bankruptcy Code, and therefore “value” may include tangible or intangible indirect benefits to a debtor, including the opportunity to receive an economic benefit in the future. The opportunity to avoid default and foreclosure, even if ultimately unavailing, may therefore constitute value for fraudulent transfer purposes, based on the totality of the circumstances, including whether the transaction was at arms’ length and in good faith. Here, the subsidiaries’ incurrence of the obligation under the new loan and the grant of security interests to the new lenders gave the subsidiaries the opportunity to prevent default under the revolver and preserve their viability. In addition, the strengthening of the corporate group's viability provided value to the subsidiaries. Therefore, the subsidiaries' transfers were not avoidable. 3V Cap. Master Fund Ltd. v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 444 B.R. 613 (S.D. Fla. 2011).

2.1.yyyyy Co-borrower does not transfer its property where the loan agreement requires direct disbursement, rather than payment by the co-borrower, to pay off an affiliate's prior loan. The debtor's subsidiary had entered into a joint venture that borrowed heavily and then failed. The debtor had guaranteed the loans. The debtor's other subsidiaries were not liable on the joint venture's obligations. After the joint venture failed and the joint venture lenders sued the debtor, the debtor borrowed from different lenders to pay the joint venture's lenders. The debtor's other subsidiaries became co-borrowers on the new loans. The new lenders disbursed the borrowed funds to another subsidiary of the debtor, who was not liable on the joint venture loan or the new loan, and who disbursed the loan proceeds directly to the joint venture lenders in full satisfaction of their claims. The loan documents required this disbursement method. The debtor and the subsidiaries filed bankruptcy seven months after the new loans. A transfer of the debtor's property is fraudulent and avoidable if the debtor had unreasonably small capital or was insolvent at the time of or rendered insolvent by the transfer and did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange. The payment of the joint venture lenders was not a fraudulent transfer by the subsidiaries to the joint venture lenders because the new loan proceeds were never the subsidiaries' property. Although the subsidiaries became liable as co-borrowers on the new loans, they never had an interest in the cash because the new loans agreement's requirement for direct disbursement, without the subsidiaries' involvement, deprived the subsidiaries of any control over the cash. 3V Cap. Master Fund Ltd. v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 444 B.R. 613 (S.D. Fla. 2011).

2.1.zzzzz Court uses tort analysis to determine fraudulent transfer choice of law. The debtor issued a guarantee that rendered it insolvent without receiving reasonably equivalent value. The parties negotiated, documented and closed the transaction in New York, and New York law governed the documents. But the debtor made the decision to issue the guarantee at its headquarters in Georgia. The debtor in possession commenced an action against the guaranteed creditors to avoid the guarantee as a constructively fraudulent obligation. Federal choice of law principles apply. They require the court to apply a most-significant-relationship test, which is reflected in the Second Restatement of Conflict of Laws. Fraudulent transfer actions arise in tort. Therefore, sections 6 and 145 of the Restatement apply. Section 145 looks to where the injury and the injury-causing conduct occurred, the parties' location and where the parties' relationship is centered. In a fraudulent transfer action, the injury is the degradation of the debtor's economic condition. It occurs where the debtor is located. The injury-causing conduct is the debtor's decision to issue the guarantee, which also occurred at headquarters, not where the guarantee was documented. In a business or financial interest case, the parties' place of business is the more important consideration in determining the third factor, although the location of creditors plays a role as well. It would be unusual if the injury, the injury-causing conduct and the location of the parties differed from the center of their relationship. Section 6 sets forth policy considerations in applying section 145 but should not take precedence over section 145. Importantly, a policy of adding value to a bankruptcy estate should not be the focus of the section 6 analysis. Based on these factors, the court determines that Georgia fraudulent transfer law applies. MC Asset Recovery, LLC v. Commerzbank AG, 441 B.R. 791 (N.D. Tex. 2010).

2.1.aaaaa Section 544(b) does not incorporate the Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act. The debtor issued a guarantee more than one year before bankruptcy that rendered it insolvent without receiving reasonably equivalent value. The debtor in possession commenced an action under section 544(b) against the guaranteed creditors to avoid the guarantee as a constructively fraudulent obligation, relying on the U.S. as a creditor and on the Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 3304(a)–(b), 3306(a) ("FDCPA"). FDCPA permits the U.S. to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer or obligation “as to a debt to the United States”. The FDCPA is a remedy for the exclusive use of the United States and is therefore not available to a trustee under section 544(b). MC Asset Recovery, LLC v. Commerzbank AG, 441 B.R. 791 (N.D. Tex. 2010).

2.1.bbbbbb Liquidating trustee may pursue avoiding power actions even if creditors have been paid in full. The debtor issued a guarantee before bankruptcy that rendered it insolvent without receiving reasonably equivalent value. The debtor in possession commenced an action under section 544(b) against the guaranteed creditors to avoid the guarantee as a constructively fraudulent obligation. The plan transferred the action to a liquidating trust. The plan provided for satisfaction of creditors’ claims in stock, which the bankruptcy court determined was worth enough to satisfy creditors’ claims in full. An avoiding power cause of action arises as of the petition date and is to be exercised for the benefit of the estate, which is the injured party. Moreover, section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover “for the benefit of the estate”. Therefore, where the recovery will enhance the reorganized debtor’s value, the liquidating trustee has standing despite the plan’s full satisfaction of claims. The court notes the result might differ if creditors were paid in full in cash. MC Asset Recovery, LLC v. Commerzbank AG, 441 B.R. 791 (N.D. Tex. 2010).

2.1.cccccc A transfer of property directly from the debtor’s customer to the debtor’s account is not avoidable. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme by offering loans to customers against their stock. In a typical transaction, the customer would transfer his or her stock directly to the debtor’s account at a stock brokerage. The debtor then sold the stock and misappropriated the proceeds, using proceeds from future stock sales to purchase and return stock to customers when they repaid their loans. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the broker to recover the transfers of stock from the customers to the broker as fraudulent transfers. Section 548(a)(1)(A) permits a trustee to avoid a transfer of property of the debtor that was made with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. Property was property of the debtor if it would have become property of the estate if it had not been transferred, so as to permit recovery of property that would have been available to creditors. Here, if the stock had not been transferred, it would not have become property of the estate. Therefore, the stock was not property of the debtor, and the trustee may not avoid the transfers to the broker. Grayson Consulting, Inc. v. Wachovia Secs., LLC (In re Derivium Cap., LLC), 437 B.R. 798 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2010).

2.1.dddddd In determining solvency, a court must include contingent assets as well as contingent liabilities and not discount asset value for its stock’s illiquidity or for the debtor’s tax shields. The debtor hospital made transfers three years before bankruptcy that the trustee sought to avoid as constructive fraudulent transfers. At the time, the debtor had defrauded Medicare, but though the debtor’s conduct was under investigation, the fraud had not yet been discovered. Its later discovery led in part to the debtor’s bankruptcy. The debtor’s owner was behind the fraud but had sufficient wealth that he ultimately repaid the government the amount that was charged against the debtor. The debtor was a subchapter S corporation and so paid no taxes. A trustee may avoid a constructively fraudulent transfer if the debtor was insolvent when it made the transfer. The court may not use hindsight in valuing the debtor. Thus, the liability to Medicare should be discounted based on the probability, as of the time the debtor made the transfer, that it would be fixed. In addition, the court must also include the contingent asset—the owner’s liability either to the government for the fraud or the debtor for the damage the owner caused the corporation—and the owner’s ability to pay. Solvency is measured by the fair market value of assets against liabilities. In determining the value of assets, the court may not confuse the value of the corporation’s stock with the value of its assets, although in many cases, the stock value may indicate asset value. In this case, the court should not discount the value of the corporation’s assets based on the possibility that a buyer of its stock would be a taxpaying entity and would discount itself the value of the corporation by the expected taxes that it would pay. Paloian v. LaSalle Nat'l Bank Assoc., 619 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 2010).

- 2.1.eeeee UFCA's good-faith-for-value transferee liability limitation applies in an action under section 544(b). When the California debtor urgently needed funding, its chairman purchased real property from the debtor more than two years before the debtor's bankruptcy. The trustee sued other participants in the transaction, including attorneys and directors, to recover the transfer to the chairman as a constructively fraudulent transfer. The other defendants settled. After trial, the bankruptcy court found that the transfer was a constructively fraudulent transfer because it was not made in exchange for reasonably equivalent value. However, the chairman received the transfer in good faith, and the amount that the chairman underpaid was less than the amount for which the other defendants settled. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer that is avoidable by a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim, thereby incorporating state fraudulent transfer law. Under California's version of the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act, a transferee that takes for value and in good faith is entitled to a credit against fraudulent transfer liability to the extent of value actually given. Although section 544(b) grants the trustee the power to avoid transfers, the good faith limitation is imported into the avoiding power, so that it applies to protect a good faith transferee for two reasons. First, the UFCA's language imports the limitation into the avoiding power itself. Second, this construction makes application of section 544(b) congruent with section 548, which contains a similar good-faith-for-value limitation in section 548(c). California permits a tortfeasor a credit in liability for any amount for which joint tortfeasors have settled with the plaintiff. Construing a fraudulent transfer as a tort, the court permits the chairman a credit for the amount of the other defendants' settlement, reducing the chairman's liability to zero. The court does not address the single satisfaction limitation of section 550(c). Decker v. Tramiel (In re JTS Corp.), 617 F.3d 1102 (9th Cir. 2010).
- 2.1.fyyyyy Section 546(a) limitation is not jurisdictional. The trustee filed a fraudulent transfer complaint on the two-year anniversary of the order for relief. Section 546(a) provides that an avoiding power action "may not be commenced ... after ... two years after the order for relief". Two years after the order for relief is the second anniversary of the order for relief. The statute prohibits commencement of an action after, not on, that date. In addition, Rule 9006(a) provides that "in computing any time period specified ... in any statute", the day triggering the period is excluded. As a result, the end of the period would be the second anniversary of the filing date. However, Rule 9006(a) applies only where the statutory period is not jurisdictional. Section 546(a) is simply a statute of limitations and is not jurisdictional. Therefore, the complaint was timely. Myers v. Raynor (In re Raynor), 617 F.3d 1066 (8th Cir. 2010).
- 2.1.gyyyyy Actual fraudulent transfer complaint need not plead badges of fraud. The debtor's former parent corporation divided its assets into two corporations, one with and one without legacy environmental and tort liabilities, then spun off the encumbered corporation, which filed chapter 11 three years later. The debtor in possession sued the former parent corporation for an intentional fraudulent transfer in connection with the separation and spinoff, alleging in detail the parent's motivation and the steps it took to insulate the remaining corporation from the legacy liabilities. Under the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act, an actual fraudulent transfer is a transfer made with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. Because intent is difficult to plead and prove, a fraudulent transfer plaintiff may allege "badges of fraud", from which intent may be inferred. However, pleading badges of fraud is not required where the plaintiff pleads sufficient facts, as it did here, that give rise to an inference of actual intent. Moreover, because a constructive fraudulent transfer claim need not allege fraud, the heightened pleading requirements of Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 9(b) do not apply to a such a claim. Tronox Inc. v. Anadarko Petroleum Corp. (In re Tronox Inc.), 429 B.R. 73 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

- 2.1.hhhhhh Only inquiry notice of insolvency or of a transfer’s fraudulent purpose defeats the fraudulent transfer good faith defense. The debtor operated a Ponzi-scheme hedge fund. Several investors redeemed their entire investments upon learning about litigation against the debtor that accused it of mismanagement and possible illegal activities, about irregularities in calculation of the fund’s Net Asset Value or about a background investigation of the fund’s principal that showed questions about its management’s integrity. None of the investors conducted an investigation into the fund after learning adverse news and before redeeming their investments. A Ponzi scheme debtor’s transfer to a redeeming investor is a transfer with actual intent to defraud creditors as a matter of law, because each transfer is designed to prevent detection and perpetuate the scheme. Under section 548(c), the trustee may not avoid a fraudulent transfer to the extent the defendant took the transfer for value and in good faith. A Ponzi scheme investor takes for value to the extent of the investment, but not to the extent of fictitious profits. A transferee does not take in good faith if it had information that put it on inquiry notice that the debtor was insolvent or that the transfer might have been made with a fraudulent purpose (such as perpetuating the Ponzi scheme), if a diligent investigation would have uncovered the debtor’s insolvency or the transfer’s fraudulent purpose and if the transferee either did not conduct such an investigation or if it conducted one and laid to rest its concerns. Thus, the transferee satisfies the defense if an investigation would have been futile, even if the transferee was on the requisite inquiry notice. Knowledge of mismanagement, fraud or lack of integrity unrelated to the Ponzi scheme or evasiveness in responding to investor inquiries alone are not sufficient to put an investor on inquiry notice of insolvency or a of transfer’s fraudulent purpose. In this case, none of the facts provided inquiry notice, nor suggested that an investigation would not have been futile, as a matter of law. The transferee defendants were entitled to a trial on all the elements of the defense. The district court therefore reverses the bankruptcy court’s summary judgment and sends the matter back for trial. Christian Bros. High School Endowment v. Bayou No Leverage Fund, LLC (In re Bayou Group, LLC), 439 B.R. 284 (S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 2.1.iiiii Section 544(b) does not permit a claim for aiding and abetting a fraudulent transfer or for punitive damages. The debtor’s former parent corporation divided its assets into two corporations, one with and one without legacy environmental and tort liabilities, then spun off the encumbered corporation, which filed chapter 11 three years later. The debtor in possession sued under section 544(b) for aiding and abetting an actual fraudulent transfer by the separation and spinoff. Under section 544(b), a trustee may avoid a transfer to the extent that a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim could have avoided the transfer as of the petition date. Under section 550, the trustee may recover a transfer or its value from the transferee or the entity for whose benefit it was made. Because these sections authorize only avoidance and recovery, the debtor in possession may not sue for aiding and abetting a fraudulent transfer. Moreover, because section 550 specifies the remedy for avoidance of a fraudulent transfer and does not include punitive damages, they are unavailable in a fraudulent transfer action under the Bankruptcy Code, even though they might be available under state law. Tronox Inc. v. Anadarko Petroleum Corp. (In re Tronox Inc.), 429 B.R. 73 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 2.1.jjjjjj Statute of limitations for fraudulent transfer action expires on the second anniversary of the petition date. On the second anniversary of the petition date, the trustee sued to recover a fraudulent transfer. Section 546(a) provides that such an action “may not be commenced after ... 2 years after the entry of the order for relief”. Two years after the order for relief is the second anniversary (that is, the same day of the year, two years later). Section 546(a) prohibits commencement of the action after that date. Therefore, an action on the second anniversary is timely. In addition, Rule 9006(a) provides that in computing a time period specified “in any statute that does not specify a method of computing time ... exclude the day of the event that triggers the period ... and include the last day of the period”. The event that triggered the period was the petition. Excluding that day and including the date two years later, two years expires on the petition’s second anniversary. Rule 9006(a) applies only to a statute of limitation, not to a jurisdictional limit. Section 546(a) is a statute of limitations, so Rule 9006(a) applies and provides the same result as the plain language of section 546(a). Therefore, the trustee may bring the action on the petition's second anniversary. Myers v. Raynor (In re Raynor), 617 F.3d 1065 (8th Cir. 2010).

2.1.kkkkkk Creditor's prepetition fraudulent transfer action becomes property of the estate.

Before bankruptcy, a creditor sued the debtor, his wife and two corporations owned by his wife under fraudulent transfer, reverse veil-piercing and constructive trust theories, to recover a judgment against the debtor. After bankruptcy, the creditor, who held 86% of the unsecured claims against the debtor, funded the trustee's continued pursuit of the action. The trustee sought court approval under Rule 9019 of a settlement with the defendants. The creditor objected and offered substantially more to buy the claims from the estate. Section 363(b) permits the trustee to sell only property of the estate. Under Texas law, a debtor may assert alter ego claims against its shareholders. The claims therefore are property of the estate. A reverse veil-piercing claim is the same for this purpose and is also property of the estate. Under section 544(b), the trustee steps into the shoes of a creditor who has brought a prepetition fraudulent transfer action, which thereby becomes property of the estate. The creditor's constructive trust claim is a remedy that follows the underlying actions. Therefore, all the claims are property of the estate, which the trustee may sell. The Cadle Co. v. Mims (In re Moore), 608 F.3d 253 (5th Cir. 2010).

2.1.llllll Severance payment to insider after termination is avoidable as a fraudulent transfer. Six years before bankruptcy, the debtor entered into an employment contract with its CEO that provided for a specified salary and an unspecified severance payment without regard to the cause of termination. Within two years before bankruptcy, the debtor terminated the CEO, although he remained on the debtor's board of directors, and negotiated the severance payment amount. He resigned from the board upon reaching the severance agreement. The debtor made the severance payment four months later, within one year before bankruptcy. Section 548(a)(1)(B)(ii)(IV) permits a trustee to avoid a transfer made or an obligation incurred within two years before the petition date if the debtor received less than reasonably equivalent value for the transfer or obligation and "made such transfer to or for the benefit of an insider, or incurred such obligation to or for the benefit of an insider, under an employment contract and not in the ordinary course of business." Here, the debtor incurred the obligation under the severance agreement when it reached agreement on the severance payment amount, and the former CEO was an insider (as a director) at that time. The debtor received less than reasonably equivalent value for the obligation. The prior employment contract requiring the debtor to pay severance did not provide consideration for the later severance amount agreement, because when the CEO entered into that agreement, he was already under a continuing obligation to serve as CEO, and the salary under that agreement was adequate consideration for his future service. The debtor received nothing at the time in exchange for its agreement to pay severance upon a future termination. Although the debtor's actual severance payment was supported by consideration—the severance amount agreement—the trustee may avoid that agreement under section 548(a)(1)(B)(ii)(IV), voiding the consideration for the payment and thereby making the payment avoidable. TSIC, Inc. v. Thalheimer (In re TSIC, Inc.), 428 B.R. 103 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).

2.1.mmmmmm A severance payment to the CEO to settle termination under a disputed employment contract is a fraudulent transfer.

The debtor's CEO had an employment contract that entitled him to a severance payment of $3 million if he were terminated without cause, $1.5 million if he were terminated with cause and nothing if he resigned. The debtor's counsel advised the board that there were grounds to terminate for cause, but termination would likely lead to litigation, the outcome of which would be uncertain. Ultimately, the board terminated the CEO, and the debtor negotiated a settlement agreement to pay him $3 million in installments in exchange for his resignation. One month later, the debtor obtained a directors' and officers' liability policy that covered the CEO for any "Loss". The debtor filed bankruptcy eight months later, after having paid the CEO $2.2 million. Under section 548(a)(1)(B), a trustee may avoid a transfer made or obligation incurred within two years before bankruptcy if the debtor received less than reasonably equivalent value in exchange and made the transfer or incurred the obligation for the benefit of an insider under an employment contract and not in the ordinary course of business. The CEO was an insider when the debtor incurred the obligation to pay him, so it was irrelevant that he was not an insider when the debtor made the payments. A court must determine reasonably equivalent value by judging the consideration the debtor received from the standpoint of creditors. Because of the possibility that the debtor could have terminated the CEO for cause, the debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value for the agreement to pay the full amount to which the CEO would have been entitled if he were terminated without cause. Therefore, the trustee may avoid the payments. Under the insurance policy, "Loss" does not include restoration of an ill-gotten gain or restitution. An obligation to repay a fraudulent transfer is both. Therefore, the insurance policy did not cover the judgment against the former CEO. Stanley v. U.S. Bank N.A. (In re TransTexas Gas Corp.), 597 F.3d 298 (5th Cir. 2010).

2.1.nnnnnn Secured borrowing to pay an affiliate's obligation may be a fraudulent transfer to both the new lender and the affiliate's creditor. The debtor's subsidiary had entered into a joint venture that borrowed heavily and then failed. The debtor had guaranteed the loans. After the joint venture failed, the debtor borrowed from different lenders to pay the joint venture's lenders. The debtor's other subsidiaries, who were not liable on the joint venture's obligations, were co-borrowers on the new loans and granted security interests in substantially all their assets to secure their obligations. The borrowed funds, less fees incurred, were disbursed directly to the joint venture lenders. The joint venture lenders and the new lenders were aware or should have been aware of debtor's and the subsidiaries' precarious financial condition before the new loans were made. The new loans increased the subsidiaries' liabilities above the value of their assets and prevented them from accessing needed additional capital as their markets and businesses continued to decline. The debtor and the subsidiaries filed bankruptcy seven months after the new loan. A transfer is fraudulent and avoidable if the debtor had unreasonably small capital or was insolvent at the time of or rendered insolvent by the transfer and did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange. The subsidiaries did not receive any direct or indirect benefit from the transfers because they were not liable on preexisting obligations to the joint venture lenders, they did not receive the borrowed funds and the payments did not preserve value for the corporate group. Therefore, the transfers of security interests to the new lenders were avoidable as constructive fraudulent transfers. A fraudulent transferee that takes for value and in good faith may retain a lien to secure value given. If the transferee knew or should have known that the transfer would be fraudulent, however, the transferee does not take in good faith. Because the new lenders knew of the subsidiaries' precarious financial condition and that the borrowed funds would be used to pay obligations for which the subsidiaries were not liable, the new lenders did not take their security interests in good faith and could not retain a lien to secure any value that they gave. As co-borrowers on the new loans, each of the subsidiaries had an interest in the borrowed funds. Thus, payment of the borrowed funds to the joint venture lenders was a transfer of the subsidiaries' property. The subsidiaries did not receive any direct or indirect benefit from the transfers because they were not liable on obligations to the joint venture lenders, and the payments did not preserve value for the corporate group. Therefore, the payments are avoidable and may be recovered from the joint venture lenders. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Citicorp N. Am., Inc. (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 2009 Bankr. LEXIS 3311 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. Oct. 13, 2009).

2.1.oooooo Fraudulent transfer savings clause in loan documents is not enforceable. The debtor's subsidiaries were co-borrowers with the debtor and granted security interests in substantially all their assets to secure their obligations. The loans rendered the subsidiaries insolvent, and the subsidiaries did not receive reasonably equivalent value for the obligations and the grant of the security interests. The debtor and its subsidiaries filed bankruptcy seven months after the new loan. The new loan agreement had a fraudulent transfer savings clause, which provided, “if such Borrower’s joint and several liability hereunder ... would, but for the application of this sentence, be unenforceable under applicable law, such joint and several liability ... shall be valid and enforceable to the maximum extent that would not cause such joint and several liability ... to be unenforceable under applicable law, and such joint and several liability ... shall be deemed to have been automatically amended accordingly at all relevant times”. A transfer or obligation is fraudulent and avoidable if the debtor was insolvent at the time of or rendered insolvent by the transfer or the obligation and did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange. The savings clause was not effective to shield the lenders from fraudulent transfer liability. An interest in property becomes property of the estate, despite any contractual provision to the contrary conditioned upon the debtor’s insolvency or financial condition. The savings clause is conditioned upon insolvency and effects a forfeiture of the estate’s cause of action for a fraudulent transfer. In addition, efforts to contract around the Bankruptcy Code are unenforceable. The savings clause would apply only if the transaction were otherwise avoidable, so its purpose is to nullify section 548. Therefore, the savings clause is not enforceable. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Citicorp N. Am., Inc. (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 2009 Bankr. LEXIS 3311 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. Oct. 13, 2009).

2.1.pppppp Court collapses and avoids asset sale LBO as fraudulent transfer. The shareholders of old Crown agreed to sell its assets to new Crown for $3.1 million in cash and a $2.9 million junior secured note, with 8% contingent interest. New Crown received a $500 investment from its owner plus a $3.1 million senior secured loan from a bank. Just before closing, old Crown dividended $600,000 to its shareholders. At closing, it received the note and the cash, which it promptly paid to its shareholders. New Crown made two annual interest payments on the junior note, which were transferred to the old Crown shareholders. New Crown failed and filed bankruptcy three and one-half years after the sale, in part due to business mistakes the new owner made. In the bankruptcy, the trustee sued the old Crown shareholders to avoid the transaction as a fraudulent transfer. The trustee may avoid a transfer of the debtor’s property made in exchange for less than reasonably equivalent value if the debtor was insolvent or had unreasonably small capital at the time of the transfer. Although the debtor new Crown purchased old Crown’s assets rather than its stock, as in a more classic LBO, the transaction form does not save the transaction from fraudulent transfer attack, because the proceeds were distributed to the old Crown shareholders. In effect, although not formally, the court collapses the transaction steps. A company has unreasonably small capital when it has “such meager assets that bankruptcy is a consequence both likely and foreseeable”. The transaction overencumbered new Crown’s assets and, by the preclosing dividend and new interest payment obligations, voided the company of cash, reducing its ability to borrow on favorable terms or weather financial storms. The new owner’s business errors do not provide a defense, because mistakes are part of business, and their possibility creates the need for adequate capital. The three-and-one-half-year delay before failure also does not provide a defense, although it is relevant evidence of capital adequacy, because the court must determine whether capital is reasonable as of the time of the transaction. Here, the evidence showed that the debtor could not have survived indefinitely, because it was cash-starved from its inception. Therefore, the court avoids the transaction, including the promissory note, the two interest payments and the pre-closing dividend. Boyer v. Crown Stock Dist., Inc., 587 F.3d 787 (7th Cir. 2009).

2.1.qqqqqq Settlement payments include any payments for the purchase of stock. The debtor acquired several privately-owned corporate businesses in leveraged buyouts. It paid for the shares in the acquired companies by wire transfer from its bank. Its bankruptcy trustee sought to recover the payments from the selling shareholders as fraudulent transfers. Section 546(e) protects against avoidance a “settlement payment ... made by or to ... a ... financial institution”.

Section 101 defines “settlement payment” to include “a final settlement payment, or any other similar payment commonly used in the securities trade”. The definition is not limited to payments made through the public securities trading system of intermediaries and guarantees. Rather, it focuses on the common meaning of the term “settlement payment” in the securities trade, which includes any payment to complete a transfer of securities. Therefore, section 546(e) protects from avoidance the acquisition payments that the debtor made in this case. Brandt v. B.A. Cap. Co., LP (In re Plassein Int'l Corp.), 589 F.2d 605 (3d Cir. 2009).

2.1.rrrrrr Federal choice of law rules apply to a section 544(b) fraudulent transfer action. A Texas incorporated debtor’s Texas bankruptcy trustee sued an Ohio limited partnership whose principal place of business was in Texas under section 544(b) for recovery of the debtor’s fraudulent transfer to the limited partnership of Ohio real property. The statute of limitations would have run on the action under Ohio fraudulent transfer law but not under Texas fraudulent transfer law. The court first must determine whether federal or state choice of law rules apply. Bankruptcy jurisdiction is federal question jurisdiction, so the requirement to use the forum’s choice of law rules in a diversity case do not apply. Federal choice of law rules should apply if there is a compelling federal bankruptcy interest in the proceeding. An action under section 544(b), even though it incorporates state law as the rule of decision, is part of the administration of the bankruptcy law and implicates the federal interest in a uniform bankruptcy law. That is, the choice of law in determining whether a transfer is avoidable under section 544(b) should not depend on the state in which the bankruptcy case or avoidance action is pending. Therefore, federal choice of law rules apply. Federal choice of law rules require determination of the state with the most significant contacts or most significant relationship, as prescribed by the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws. The Restatement applies different considerations depending on the nature of the underlying action, whether contract, property or tort. Here, the action does not involve the validity of the contract by which the debtor transferred the real property or of the transferee’s property interest but whether the transfer was fraudulent as to creditors. Indeed, the trustee need not recover the property transferred but may recover its value under section 550(a). Thus, the central focus of an action under section 544(b) is to redress harm to the estate and to creditors. Therefore, the action sounds in tort, so the court must determine choice of law based on the place where the conduct and the injury occurred and the locations of the parties and their relationship. Tow v. Rafizadeh (In re Cyrus II P’shp), 413 B.R. 609 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2008).

2.1.ssssss Partners’ waiver of rights to future partnership profits is a fraudulent transfer. State partnership law provides a dissolved law firm partnership owns profits accruing to a partner or his new law firm from the partner’s post-dissolution work on the old law firm’s unfinished business. Shortly before the law firm’s failure, while the law firm was insolvent, the partners amended the partnership agreement to waive the partnership’s right to any such profits generated by any partner. The law firm later filed bankruptcy. A trustee may avoid a transfer of property of a debtor that the debtor transferred while the debtor was insolvent for less than reasonably equivalent value within two years before bankruptcy. Nonbankruptcy law determines what is property; bankruptcy law determines whether it is property of the debtor to which the trustee’s avoiding powers apply. The rights to profits from unfinished business were property of the debtor when the partners amended the partnership agreement to waive the rights. The waiver effected a transfer of the rights to each partner who took unfinished business to a new firm. The agreement among the partners to waive any rights to the profits may have provided value to each partner who took unfinished business, but it did not provide value to the dissolving partnership. Nor did the partners’ agreement to assist in the winding up and the collection of receivables provide value to the partnership, as the partners were already under a duty to do so. Therefore, the waiver is an avoidable fraudulent transfer. However, the burden remains on the trustee to show the value, if any, in the profits generated by the unfinished business that the partners took. Greenspan v. Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP (In re Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison LLP), 409 B.R. 318 (Bankr. N.D. Calif. 2009).

2.1.ttttt Trustee may not avoid an LBO payment to a privately held corporation's shareholders.

The privately held debtor was the target of a leveraged buyout. The buyer made its payment for the debtor's shares to a bank that served as the buyer's exchange agent. The bank paid the debtor's shareholders. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, the trustee sought to avoid and recover the payment from the former shareholders as a fraudulent transfer. Section 546(e) excepts from the trustee's avoiding powers a "settlement payment ... made by or to ... a financial institution". The "settlement payment" definition is circular, but its important provision is "payment commonly used in the securities trade". Whether or not Congress intended the settlement payment exception to protect the public financial markets, the settlement payment definition is not limited to payments for the purchase of publicly traded securities. Therefore, the payment to the shareholders qualifies as a settlement payment. The bank was a financial institution, and the payment was made to the bank. The statute does not require that the financial institution receive a beneficial interest in the transfer for the exception to apply. Therefore, even though the bank acted only as an exchange agent, section 546(e) excepts the transfer from the trustee's avoiding powers. QSI Holdings, Inc. v. Alford (In re QSI Holdings, Inc.), 571 F.3d 545 (6th Cir. 2009).

2.1.uuuuuu An ordinary commodity supply contract may be a swap agreement.

The debtor was in the business of selling natural gas (a commodity) to end users. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor sold at below market prices to defraud its lender. The trustee sued to recover from the buyers the value shortfall as a fraudulent transfer. Sections 546(g) and 548(c) and (d) limit the trustee's ability to avoid transfers under a "commodity contract", a "forward contract" or a "swap agreement". "Commodity contract" includes only a futures contract traded on a contract market or board of trade and related agreements. "Forward contract" includes a contract for the future purchase of a commodity but specifically excludes a "commodity contract". "Swap agreement", however, is defined more broadly to include "a spot, same day-tomorrow, tomorrow-next, forward, or other foreign exchange, precious metals, or other commodity agreement" and a "a commodity swap, option, future, or forward agreement" (emphasis added). A "commodity forward agreement" need not be traded (or of a kind traded) on an exchange to qualify for the financial contract protections. Nor does the Code require that a commodity forward agreement be financially settled to qualify. Four principles guide whether a supply contract qualifies for financial contract treatment. First, the agreement's subject must be a commodity, with substantially all performance costs attributable to the commodity cost, as distinguished from other supply contracts that include costs attributable to packaging, marketing, transportation or service. Second, the agreement must be "forward", that is, for delivery more than two days hence. Third, the agreement must fix not only the price, but also the time and quantity of deliveries. Finally, even though financial market trading is not required for an agreement to qualify, there must be some relationship between the agreement and the financial markets, so that the Code's financial contract protection provisions subordinate the Code's overarching equal distribution policy only when necessary to serve Congress's policy, embodied in the financial contract provisions, of protecting financial markets. Although the agreements here were simple supply agreements that were to be physically settled, they also had hedging elements, because they involved prices and quantities specified at the time of contracting and so were similar to forward contracts that are financially settled as hedges. The hedging elements made these contracts sufficiently similar to those financial markets contracts that Congress intended to protect. Hutson v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours and Co., Inc. (In re Nat'l Gas Distr's, LLC), 556 F.3d 247 (4th Cir. 2009).

2.1.vvvvvv Trustee may recover prejudgment interest in a fraudulent transfer action at the applicable state law rate.

The court granted the trustee judgment for recovery of a fraudulent transfer under section 544(b), based on a state law cause of action. The trustee is entitled to interest on the judgment from the time of demand on the defendant. 28 U.S.C. § 1961 provides for the allowance of interest at the federal rate "on any money judgment in a civil action recovered in a district court". Because the bankruptcy court is a unit of the district court, section 1961 governs postjudgment interest. The substantive law under which the trustee brings the claim governs prejudgment interest. Here, section 544(b) gives the trustee the right to sue, and section 550 specifies the parties against whom the trustee may recover. But the claim arises under state fraudulent transfer law. Therefore, the applicable state law interest rate applies to prejudgment interest. Lassman v. Keefe (In re Keefe), 401 B.R. 520 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2009).

2.1.wwwww Undercapitalization differs from insolvency and should be characterized instead as excessive leverage. The newly formed debtor purchased an aluminum smelting plant, including an existing contract with the local electric utility to provide the large amounts of electricity the plant needed at a favorable price. Because of an electricity shortage when the debtor acquired the plant, the utility agreed to make a large curtailment payment to the debtor in exchange for the debtor's agreement not to operate the plant for 14 months. The debtor financed the purchase in large part with the payment. At the time, the debtor intended to begin operations at the end of the curtailment period. However, electricity prices rose and aluminum prices fell, making operation uneconomical, so the debtor never began operations and filed bankruptcy. The shutdown fixed various liabilities that were contingent when the debtor purchased the plant, such as termination and severance expenses. As a result, the debtor was insolvent when it filed bankruptcy. The trustee sought to avoid as fraudulent transfers several payments made during the curtailment period. The trustee may avoid a transfer for less than reasonably equivalent value made while the debtor was insolvent (fair value of assets are less than liabilities) or had an unreasonably small capital. In evaluating the debtor's liabilities, the court must discount a contingent liability based on the likelihood of its becoming fixed, not based on the likelihood that the debtor will be able to pay it assuming that it becomes fixed. Similarly, the court may not consider the risk that the debtor's costs would increase and thereby render the debtor insolvent, because all businesses are at risk of future changes that cannot be predicted with adequate certainty. That does not make them insolvent. Finally, analyzing whether a debtor has unreasonably small capital differs from analyzing whether a debtor is insolvent. Undercapitalization should be analyzed as excessive leverage. Here, the curtailment meant that the debtor would not have revenues for at least the curtailment period, requiring that it have sufficient capital to survive that period. Because it had planned for reopening, its balance sheet showed that it was adequately capitalized at the time of the purchase. Baldi v. Samuel Son & Co., Ltd., 548 F.3d 579 (7th Cir. 2008).

2.1.xxxxx Payments within the fraudulent transfer reachback period on a guarantee given before that period may be avoidable as fraudulent transfers. The debtor's shareholder sold the stock in the debtor to a purchaser and guaranteed the shareholder's note given in payment for the purchase. The debtor (rather than the stockholder) made regular payments on the note until it filed bankruptcy more than four years later. The trustee may avoid a transfer that is avoidable by creditors. The state's Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act (UFTA) permits a creditor to avoid a transfer made or obligation incurred within four years for less than reasonably equivalent value while the debtor was insolvent. It defines "value" to include satisfaction or securing of an antecedent obligation and defines "transfer" to mean "every direct or indirect ... method of disposing of or parting with an asset or an interest in an asset, and includes payment of money ...". It therefore includes incurring an obligation as well as payment on the obligation. Therefore, each payment on the note and the guarantee was a transfer that is avoidable under the UFTA. The court does not discuss whether the definition of "value" protects the payments or the potentially limiting effect on whether incurring an obligation is included in the definition of "transfer" of the UFTA's language that permits avoidance of a transfer or an obligation. Belfance v. Buonpane (In re Omega Door Co., Inc.), 399 B.R. 295 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

2.1.yyyyy LBO resulted in a fraudulent conveyance where the debtor overpaid for assets and was unable to keep trade debt reasonably current. The debtor was formed to acquire the assets of three businesses in the same industry in a leveraged buyout. The acquired assets' value was less than the amount paid by about 10%. At the closing of the transaction, the debtor's projections showed sufficient liquidity and capital to pay interest and maturing principal on its long-term debt. However, the debtor did not have enough liquidity or credit facility availability to pay its trade debts on industry standard terms either at closing or for at least 12 months after closing. The debtor filed bankruptcy 29 months after the acquisition. A trustee may avoid a fraudulent transfer under the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act if the debtor received less than “fair consideration” and the transfer was made when the debtor was about to engage in a business for which it had unreasonably small capital. Fair consideration requires that the value the debtor receives is at least the amount paid. The value the debtor received here was not fair consideration. The court suggests that a value deficiency of even 2% would fail as fair consideration. For a business not to have unreasonably small capital, the debtor need not have sufficient capital to ensure that equity holders recover their investments or that long-term debt holders can be paid, as they may agree to extended terms based on unforeseen circumstances that may compromise the debtor’s ability to pay. Rather, a business has unreasonably small capital “whenever it cannot reasonably anticipate resources needed to effect the timely payment of its trade obligations”. A business may choose to accelerate receivables and stretch payables as a business strategy, but the business has unreasonably small capital when such practices arise from necessity. It does not matter that the debtor was able to survive for 29 months, as the test is applied only as of the time of the transfer. CNB Int’l, Inc. v. Kelleher (In re CNB Int’l, Inc.), 393 B.R. 306 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 2008).

- 2.1.zzzzzz Dividend notes payable only out of funds legally available for a dividend are not contingent claims for insolvency determination purposes. The debtor issued dividend notes to its parent corporation which were expressly “payable only out of funds legally available for the payment of dividends”. Valued at face, the notes rendered the debtor insolvent. The trustee sought to recover interest payments on the notes as fraudulent transfers made for less than reasonably equivalent value while the debtor was insolvent. To determine insolvency, a bankruptcy must value contingent liabilities at face multiplied by the probability that the contingency will occur. Although payment on the notes might have been contingent on availability of funds, the obligation was absolute, as evidenced by the debtor’s regular interest payments on the notes. Therefore, the court must include the notes at their face amount in determining the debtor’s solvency. Freeland v. Enodis Corp., 540 F.3d 721 (7th Cir. 2008).
- 2.1.aaaaaa Margin payments to further a Ponzi scheme are not exempt from avoidance. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. It maintained securities accounts with a stockbroker, which issued numerous margin calls in the year before bankruptcy on the debtor’s short positions. Section 546(e) exempts from the trustee’s avoiding powers any margin payments to a financial institution such as a stockbroker, except a transfer avoidable under section 548(a)(1)(A), because such a transfer is made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. These margin payments would qualify for the stockbroker exemption, except that any payment made to further a Ponzi scheme is by definition made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, because it is made to perpetuate the fraud inherent in a Ponzi scheme. Payments to investors are intended to further the Ponzi scheme by creating an impression of success that attracts new investors. The margin payments, even though not to investors, were required to maintain the debtor’s trading position and continue the scheme. Therefore, the margin payments are made with actual intent to defraud and are not exempt from avoidance. Bear, Stearns Sec. Corp. v. Gredd (In re Manhattan Inv. Fund Ltd.), 397 B.R. 1 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).
- 2.1.bbbbbb Ponzi scheme fraudulent transfer defendant may have “value” defense. The debtor collected limited partnership investments in a Ponzi scheme. The trustee sued one investor for fraudulent transfer liability for return of “principal” and of “interest”. A Ponzi scheme operator’s payments to investors are made with actual intent to defraud creditors, so an investor has a defense to fraudulent transfer recovery only if the investor took for value in good faith. “Value” includes satisfaction of an antecedent debt. He took the principal return for value because he had a restitution claim for the amount invested for limited partnership interests, which was satisfied by the return of the amount he invested. He did not, however, give value for the interest payment. Because the case is a fraudulent transfer action, the court concludes the probable subordination of the investor's restitution claim under section 510(b) does not negate the "value" argument. Barclay v. Mackenzie (In re API Holding, Inc.), 525 F.3d 700 (9th Cir. 2008).

- 2.1.cccccc Fraudulent transfer plaintiff must show avoidance will benefit creditors. A postconfirmation creditor recovery trust for the debtor parent corporation sought to avoid bank claims against the debtor's unconsolidated subsidiaries, whose creditors had been paid in full under the plan and retained no interest in the reorganized debtor or the recovery trust. Under Whiteford Plastics Co. v. Chase Nat'l Bank, 179 F.2d 582 (2d Cir. 1950), a transfer or obligation may be avoided as fraudulent only when avoidance would benefit creditors, not just the debtor. The Whiteford rule remains good law under the Bankruptcy Code. Therefore, the recovery trust lacks standing to bring the fraudulent transfer claims against the banks. Adelphia Recovery Trust v. Bank of Am., N.A., 390 B.R. 80 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).
- 2.1.dddddd A court may use market value to determine insolvency. Motorola developed the idea of a global satellite telephone system in 1987 and formed a subsidiary, Iridium, to develop, market, and operate the system. Motorola spun off Iridium but continued to provide development and other services, for which Iridium paid Motorola $3.7 billion in the four years before Iridium's bankruptcy. During the same period, Iridium raised billions of dollars in the capital markets to fund its development and operation costs. Despite Iridium's thoroughness and care in developing financial projections, which were vetted as well by outside consultants and financial underwriters, the projections were overly optimistic. Iridium had completely misjudged the market for a system with the technical limitations that a satellite-based system imposed. Iridium filed bankruptcy nine months after starting commercial operation. In deciding whether the transfers the Motorola could be avoided as constructively fraudulent, the court must use a going-concern or market price valuation to determine whether a going-concern debtor such as Iridium was insolvent. It must determine whether the debtor had adequate capital based on whether the debtor's capital needs projections were reasonable and prudent when made, not in hindsight. The court may consider the market value of the debtor's equity and the willingness of investors to lend or invest in the debtor, even if those indicators were based on projections that, though reasonable when made, were wrong or based on market exuberance or a bubble. Such market indicators are preferable to post-hoc projection revisions, which impermissibly interject hindsight into the valuation. A company's subsequent failure is irrelevant to the analysis absent concealment or later discovery of highly relevant information. Contemporaneous evidence, including market data, carries more weight. Statutory Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Motorola, Inc. (In re Iridium Operating LLC), 373 B.R. 283 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).
- 2.1.eeeeeee Payment to further a Ponzi scheme is made with actual fraudulent intent. When the SEC sued a Ponzi scheme operator in district court, the court froze the operator's assets. The operator asked a business associate to fund the operator's legal fees, which an affiliate of the operator immediately reimbursed. The SEC brought a similar action against the affiliate three years later, and the court determined that the affiliate had simply perpetuated the operator's fraudulent scheme. The affiliate's receiver sought recovery of the reimbursement payment from the business associate under the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act as an actual fraudulent transfer. Only the transferor's intent is relevant in determining whether a transfer is made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Operating a Ponzi scheme invests actual intent to defraud creditors in every transfer. In addition, reasonably equivalent value must be measured from the perspective of preservation of the debtor's net worth or utility to creditors. Legal services to defend the SEC's action did not benefit creditors and therefore did not provide reasonably equivalent value for the transfer. SEC v. Res. Dev. Int'l, LLC, 487 F.3d 295 (5th Cir. 2007).

- 2.1.ffffff Reduction in working capital may result in unreasonably small capital. A successful company's shareholders sold their shares to a buyer, who financed the purchase with a loan that was secured by the company's assets. After the transaction, the company's working capital decreased from an average over the prior five years of 27% of net sales and 30% of total assets to 2.1% and 1.0%, respectively. The company had to borrow under its line of credit to pay the transaction's closing costs. Under the circumstances, the company was left with unreasonably small capital. Neither the reasonableness of the financial projections at the time of the sale nor the availability of a line of credit to fund the company's working capital needs affects the analysis. In addition, the court may conclude that the shareholder defendants, who were the company's prior management, intended or believed that the company would become unable to pay its debts as they matured. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Lattman (In re Norstan Apparel Shops, Inc.), 367 B.R. 68 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2007).
- 2.1.ggggggg Direct payment to LBO shareholders is not a safe harbor settlement payment. A company's shareholders sold their shares to a buyer, who financed the purchase with a loan that was secured by the company's assets. The loan proceeds were paid directly from the lender bank to the shareholders. The payment is not a "settlement payment" that section 546(e) protects from avoidance. Section 741(8)'s "settlement payment" definition includes "settlement payment ... or any other similar payment commonly used in the securities trade". To give the latter phrase meaning, the definition must be limited to the "securities trade", which refers to the public securities markets, not merely to any transaction in securities. Such a reading is consistent with the safe harbor's purpose "to prevent the ripple effect created by the insolvency of one commodity or security firm from spreading to other firms and possibly threatening the collapse of the affected industry". (internal quotes omitted). Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Lattman (In re Norstan Apparel Shops, Inc.), 367 B.R. 68 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2007).
- 2.1.hhhhhhh Section 546(e)'s safe harbor prevents avoidance of a debtor's payments to its principal's stockbroker. The debtor corporation made numerous payments into its president's margin account at Morgan Stanley Dean Witter in the three years before bankruptcy, at times when the margin account had debit balances. MSDW applied the deposits to reduce margin debt, to purchase securities, and to fund withdrawals from the account. The trustee may not avoid the transfers under section 544(b) or 548. Section 546(e) prohibits avoidance under those sections of "a margin payment ... or settlement payment ... made by or to ... [a] stockbroker". Section 101(38) defines "margin payment" broadly and therefore includes a payment into a margin account. MSDW is a "stockbroker", even though it was not acting as the debtor's stockbroker in these transactions. The "stockbroker" definition is not limited to a situation in which the stockbroker is acting in that capacity for the debtor. Hays v. Morgan Stanley DW Inc. (In re Stewart Fin. Co.), 367 B.R. 909 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 2007).
- 2.1.iiiiiii Bankruptcy petition does not affect fraudulent transfer statute of limitations. The trustee brought a fraudulent transfer action under section 544(b) and applicable state law to avoid an obligation entered into four years and 20 days before the filing of the complaint, but less than a year after the bankruptcy petition filing. The state fraudulent transfer statute of limitations was four years. The court measures the running of the statute of limitations from the complaint's filing date, rather than allowing the trustee two years under section 546(a) to bring the action. Adv. Telecomm. Network, Inc. v. Allen (In re Adv. Telecomm. Network, Inc.), 490 F.3d 1352 (11th Cir. 2007).
- 2.1.jjjjjjj LBO lender is not a necessary party to a fraudulent transfer action. A successful company's shareholders sold their shares to a buyer, who financed the purchase with a loan that was secured by the company's assets. The company later filed bankruptcy. The committee brought an action on the estate's behalf to recover the payments to the shareholders. Although an LBO may be viewed as an integrated transaction, under which the lender may be liable for any resulting fraudulent transfer, an action to avoid or recover any assets transferred may be brought independently against each possible defendant. Rule 19, which governs joinder of parties, requires joinder only if a complete adjudication among the parties to the action (here, the committee and the former shareholders) is not possible without joinder of a third person, or if a party would be subject to inconsistent adjudications in another action with a nonjoined party. Neither of those possibilities is present in a fraudulent transfer action against fewer than all of the transferees. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Lattman (In re Norstan Apparel Shops, Inc.), 367 B.R. 68 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2007).

2.1.kkkkkkk Margin payments to further a Ponzi scheme are not exempt from avoidance. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. It maintained securities accounts with a stockbroker, which issued numerous margin calls in the year before bankruptcy on short positions that the debtor maintained. Section 546(e) exempts from the trustee's avoiding powers any margin payments to a financial institution such as a stockbroker, except a transfer avoidable under section 548(a)(1)(A) because it is made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. These margin payments would qualify for the exemption, except that any payment made to further a Ponzi scheme is by definition made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, because it is made to perpetuate the fraud inherent in a Ponzi scheme. Therefore, the margin payments are not exempt from avoidance. The trustee may not recover, however, from a mere conduit for the payments, that is, one who does not have dominion or control over the transferred funds. A stockbroker is required under SEC Rule 15c3-3 to maintain customer funds, such as margin, in segregation from the stockbroker's own assets and is limited in how the stockbroker may use or apply the funds. However, the stockbroker takes a security interest in margin funds and may apply them to the customer's obligations in connection with securities transactions, for which the stockbroker would be liable to the customer's counterparty if the customer did not provide adequate funds. The segregation limitation on the stockbroker's use of the funds therefore does not deprive it of sufficient dominion or control to make it a conduit. It is the initial transferee, and the trustee may recover the transfers from the stockbroker. Finally, section 548(c)'s good faith defense does not apply in this case, because the stockbroker had negative financial information about the debtor that should have led it to investigate the debtor's true financial condition. Gredd v. Bear, Stearns Sec. Corp. (In re Manhattan Inv. Fund Ltd.), 359 B.R. 510 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

2.1.iiiii An ordinary commodity supply contract is not a swap agreement. The debtor was in the business of selling natural gas (a commodity) to end users. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor sold at below market prices to defraud its lender. The trustee sued to recover from the buyers the value shortfall as a fraudulent transfer. Sections 546(g) and 548(c) and (d) limit the trustee's ability to avoid transfers under a "swap agreement," which, under section 101(53B), means, among other things, "a commodity swap, option, future, or forward agreement." Although the debtor's sales agreements provided for future (forward) delivery of a commodity, they are not swap agreements. Section 101(53B)(A)(ii)(I), which includes within the swap agreement definition similar agreements "of a type that has been ... the subject of recurrent dealings in the swap or other derivatives markets" suggests that the definition is intended to encompass financial (that is, swap) market transactions, not ordinary commercial supply agreements. Moreover, the legislative history excludes "[t]raditional commercial arrangements, such as supply agreements" from the definition. Otherwise, the swap agreement exception would do more than protect against financial market disruption; it would defeat the Bankruptcy Code's equal distribution principle in a wide range of transactions, which Congress did not appear to intend. Hutson v. Smithfield Packing Co. (In re Nat'l Gas Distribrs., LLC), 369 B.R. 884 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2007).

2.1.mmmmmmm A court may use stock market value to determine "reasonably equivalent value." Campbell spun off to its shareholders its Vlastic Foods division, but only after the division borrowed $500 million to pay Campbell for the division's assets. Vlastic failed three years later. The market value of Vlastic's publicly traded stock for at least the first nine months after the spinoff was at least $1 billion. The court may rely on the stock market value to determine the value of the spun-off assets and whether the $500 million Vlastic paid to Campbell was “reasonably equivalent value” for the acquired assets. VFB LLC v. Campbell Soup Co., 482 F.3d 624 (3d Cir. 2007).

- 2.1.nnnnnnn Payment of secured claims is not a fraudulent transfer. A lender provided a warehouse financing line to a sub-prime mortgage lender, who was found to have engaged in fraudulent sales practices to the detriment of sub-prime borrowers. The warehouse line was secured by the debtor’s mortgages. The bankruptcy trustee sought to avoid the debtor’s prepetition payments to the warehouse lender as fraudulent transfers, because it provided the line and collected the payments at a time when it knew or reasonably should have known of the debtor’s fraud in securing the mortgages. Although the debtor may have attempted to defraud its own borrowers and the warehouse lender was found to have aided and abetted the fraud by providing the warehouse line with knowledge of the debtor’s misconduct, the repayments of the lender’s secured loans are not fraudulent transfers. The debtor’s borrowers were not initially its creditors, and the lender’s providing the warehouse line did not defraud the borrowers; the debtor’s fraud was direct and independent of its lender’s loans. The fraudulent transfer laws address fraud in removing (or hiding) assets from the debtor to prevent paying creditors, not the repayment of secured debt. Henry v. Lehman Comm’l Paper, Inc. (In re First Alliance Mortgage Co.), 471 F.3d 977 (9th Cir. 2006).
- 2.1.ooooooo LBO share purchase through a financial institution insulates the transaction from fraudulent transfer attack. The debtor was acquired through a leveraged buyout. The cash to pay for the shares was obtained from a bank loan that was secured by the debtor’s assets. The cash was paid to another bank as a disbursing agent. The payments to the selling shareholders are “settlement payments” eligible for safe harbor protection under section 546(e), because they are payments for securities. The safe harbor applies because the payments were made to the sellers by a financial institution, that is, the disbursing agent bank. It does not matter that the bank, as disbursing agent, never acquired a beneficial interest in the funds. As long as the payments pass through the bank’s hands, they are insulated. The court notes the unfairness of the result and expresses the hope that Congress will revisit section 546(e), because of the ability of LBO participants to insulate themselves completely from fraudulent transfer risk. QSC Holdings, Inc. v. Alford (In re Quality Stores, Inc.), 355 B.R. 629 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2006).
- 2.1.ppppppp Termination of prepaid services contract may be a fraudulent transfer. The debtor prepaid for online advertising services under a long-term contract. Shortly before the debtor filed bankruptcy, the other party terminated the contract in accordance with a contract term that allowed termination upon the debtor’s insolvency. The termination might be a fraudulent transfer. The debtor’s contract rights to advertising services for which the debtor had prepaid was property of the debtor, which was transferred. The contract termination may be subject to avoidance even though it was made in accordance with and was authorized by the contract. Fraudulent transfer law by its nature permits a trustee to avoid otherwise legal transactions if they deprive a debtor of value during a limited period before bankruptcy. EBC I, Inc. v. America Online, Inc. (In re EBC I, Inc.), 356 B.R. 631 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).
- 2.1.qqqqqqq Fraudulent transfer statute does not have extraterritorial application. The Barbados debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. It transferred funds from its London bank account to a foreign exchange trader. The trader initially deposited the funds in a New York bank account but promptly moved them to its own London bank account. From the funds, the debtor paid the trader fees and spread on foreign exchange transactions. Although section 541(a)(1) applies to all interests in property of the debtor, wherever located, and although “property of the debtor” in section 548(a) is generally construed as property that would have become property of the estate if it had not been transferred, it cannot be construed to expand section 548’s territorial application. Transfers avoided under section 548 or recovered under section 550 become property of the estate only after recovery. Because a debtor does not have any interest in transferred property, the transferred property is not initially included in property of the estate under section 541(a)(1). Therefore, the court cannot import section 541's extraterritorial reach into section 548, and the trustee may not avoid the transfer as actually fraudulent under section 548. Barclay v. Swiss Fin. Corp. (In re Midland Euro Exchange Inc.), 347 B.R. 709 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2006)

2.1.rrrrrr Constructively fraudulent transfer is partially avoided based on a preponderance of the evidence that the debtor had unreasonably small capital. The debtor transferred several real estate parcels to his wife for no consideration, based in part on estate planning advice to equalize his and his wife's estates. At the time, the debtor faced a large note obligation. The wife sold several of the parcels to fund their living expenses and pay some of the debtor's debts. After bankruptcy, the debtor's trustee sued the wife under the UFTA to recover the transfers as constructively fraudulent. The trustee must prove the elements of a constructively fraudulent transfer by a preponderance of the evidence. Unlike avoidance of an actually fraudulent transfer, which requires clear and convincing evidence, avoidance of a constructively fraudulent transfer does not impose a stigma on the debtor but is aimed solely at assessing injury to creditors. That the assets were sold to pay living and business expenses and pay business debts and were the sole available source of such payments showed the debtor had unreasonably small capital at the time of the transfers. The UFTA authorizes recovery of the value of the property transferred "subject to adjustments as the equities may require." The court reduces the recovery amount by the amount of living and business expenses that the wife paid from the asset sale proceeds, because had the debtor retained the assets, he would have expended about the same amount for the same purposes, so recovery of the entire value of the property transferred would result in a windfall to the estate. Dahar v. Jackson (In re Jackson), 459 F.3d 117 (1st Cir. 2006).

2.1.ssssss Bank account to bank account transfer may qualify as a "settlement payment." A holding company owned the debtor; an ESOP and the debtor's and holding company's directors and officers owned the holding company. To take advantage of a change in the tax law, the holding company redeemed the directors' and officers' shares, leaving the holding company solely the ESOP's hands. The debtor dividended the funds to the holding company to pay for the shares. The holding company made the payments to the bank that held most of the directors' and officers' shares in their IRA's. The payments were settlement payments protected from avoidance as "settlement payments" by section 546(e), even though the stock was privately held and the payments did not go through the securities clearing system or involve any intermediaries such as clearing houses, disbursing agents or stock brokers. In evaluating whether the payment from the debtor were settlement payments, the defendants could argue for collapsing the two transactions – the payment from the debtor to the holding company and the payment from the holding company to the shareholders. The payments were part of an integrated, single transaction and should be viewed as such. Because the payments were made by a financial institution – from the holding company's bank to the IRA bank – they were protected. The settlement payment safe harbor in section 546(e) permits avoidance under section 548(a)(1)(A). This exception incorporates only the bankruptcy actual fraudulent transfer provision, one made within two years before bankruptcy, but does not apply to an action under section 544(b) incorporating the actual fraudulent transfer provisions of nonbankruptcy law, such as the UFTA. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Clark (In re Nat'l Forge Co.), 344 B.R. 340 (W.D. Pa. 2006).

2.1.tttttt Pension plan amendment was a fraudulent transfer. While in financial trouble, the debtor adopted a KERF. In addition, it amended its management pension plan to increase benefits to about 400 employees. Because the plan was ERISA-qualified, the increased benefits could not later be revoked. The company incurred a cash cost to fund the benefits increase, although the precise amount was not determined, and the company lost any surplus that would have been in the plan if the amendment had not been made. The liquidating trustee sued to recover the benefits increase as a fraudulent transfer. The amendment was a “transfer,” because of the loss of the surplus and because the company incurred an increased obligation. The company received something of value in exchange, because the amendment was designed to help retain employees for a going-concern sale. However, the value received was uncertain and small, and although the amendment’s precise cost was not determined, the benefit was not reasonably equivalent to the cost. Precision is not required for a determination of “reasonably equivalent value,” which is a determination that can be made based on the totality of the circumstances. Pension Transfer Corp. v. Beneficiaries Under the Third Amendment to Fruehauf Trailer Corp. Ret. Plan No. 003 (In re Fruehauf Trailer Corp.), 444 F.3d 203 (3d Cir. 2006).

2.1.uuuuuuu Section 548 reaches a foreign real property transfer. Many years before bankruptcy, while the debtor and her children were all in Maryland, the debtor deeded Bahamian real property to her children. The children did not record the deed, because of high Bahamian transfer taxes, until shortly before bankruptcy. For purposes of section 548(d)(1), the transfer was not made until the deed was recorded in the Bahamian land records, and the transfer is avoidable, despite the real property’s Bahamian location. Application of section 548(a) to this transfer does not involve extraterritorial application of the bankruptcy laws, because the debtor, her creditors, and the transferees were all located in the U.S., the debtor’s insolvency occurred in the U.S., and the debtor’s decisions to transfer and the transferees’ decision to record the transfer were made in the U.S. However, the property’s Bahamian location may involve extraterritorial application. The general presumption against extraterritorial application of U.S. laws does not apply to the fraudulent transfer laws, because Congress clearly intended bankruptcy laws to apply to property “wherever located.” Comity does not interfere with avoiding the transfer, even though the action involves real property located in the Bahamas, because the transaction was primarily U.S.-based and because avoiding the transfer does not interfere with Bahamian real property laws but is intended only to adjust the relations between a U.S. debtor and her U.S. creditors. French v. Liebmann (In re French), 440 F.3d 145 (4th Cir. 2006).

2.1.vvvvvvv Debtor’s purchase of related party’s notes is a settlement payment that is exempt from avoidance. The debtor established a collateralized loan obligation (CLO) entity structure to sell interests in loan portfolios that it owned. The CLO issued notes, whose sole source of repayment was collections on the loan portfolios. When the loan portfolios declined in value, the debtor purchased the CLO notes in the market, paying for them through accounts of a stockbroker. Because the loan portfolios had declined in value, the CLO notes were worth less than par. The debtor nevertheless paid par for the notes to protect its credit rating. The debtor in possession sought to recover the payments as constructively fraudulent transfers. Section 546(e)’s safe harbor protects the debtor’s payments for the CLO notes from avoidance, because the payments were settlement payments. In this case, there was no allegation of anything out of the ordinary other than paying more than market value for the notes. That does not come within the safe harbor’s actual fraud exception, nor is it so unusual that the payments are not within the “settlement payment” definition of “payments commonly used in the securities trade.” Therefore, the complaint is dismissed. Enron Corp. v. Int’l Fin. Corp. (In re Enron Corp.), 341 B.R. 341 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

2.1.wwwwww Cross-stream guarantee was not a fraudulent transfer. A New York restaurant corporation debtor invested heavily in its new sister restaurant corporation’s business premises construction and guaranteed its lease. The debtor did not benefit from any synergy with the new restaurant nor derive any other benefit from the guarantee. Although keeping the new restaurant alive would have enabled the debtor to recover its prior large investment in the new restaurant, that alone does not provide reasonably equivalent value. The survival of the other entity might provide reasonably equivalent value only if it would have enhanced the debtor’s value substantially. Therefore, the debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value for the guarantee.

However, in this case, the debtor was not “insolvent,” as defined in the UFCA, in effect in New York. In addition, under the UFCA, the “unreasonably small capital” test applies only to a transfer, not to an obligation. Therefore, the trustee could avoid the obligation only by meeting the third financial condition test, that the debtor “intends or believes that he will incur debts beyond his ability to pay as they mature.” The test requires proof of the debtor’s subjective intent or belief. Because the trustee did not introduce any evidence of intent or belief, the guarantee was not a fraudulent obligation. Silverman v. Paul’s Landmark, Inc. (In re Nirvana Restaurant, Inc.), 337 B.R. 495 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

- 2.1.xxxxxxx Ponzi scheme receiver may recover repayments as fraudulent transfers. The Ponzi scheme operator’s receiver brought an action for actual fraudulent transfer under the UFTA against investors who were paid back their investments before the scheme collapsed. A transfer from a Ponzi scheme to an investor, as a matter of law, is a transfer with actual intent to defraud creditors. Under the UFTA, a recipient of an actual fraudulent transfer may defend if he took in good faith and gave reasonably equivalent value in exchange. In a Ponzi scheme, an investor and, in this case, a broker who aided the scheme, does not give reasonably equivalent value in exchange for any payments that he receives. Warfield v. Byron, 436 F.3d 551 (5th Cir. 2006).
- 2.1.yyyyyyy Bankruptcy court may not order partial avoidance of a fraudulent transfer. The debtor and her husband granted the bank a mortgage on their tenancy by the entirety house to prevent the IRS from obtaining a tax lien on it. When the debtor filed chapter 11 some years later, she sought to avoid the mortgage as an actual fraudulent transfer. The bankruptcy court found actual intent to hinder or delay the IRS and ordered the transfer avoided, but only to the extent necessary to pay administrative expenses in the chapter 11 case, with the bank retaining the mortgage for any excess value. Such an order is improper. Section 544(b) provides for avoiding (that is, making void) a transfer. It does not grant the court discretion, under its equitable powers or otherwise, to limit the avoidance. Section 550 authorizes recovery of an avoided transfer “for the benefit of the estate.” That limitation is not present in section 544(b) and may not be imposed by the bankruptcy court. Coleman v. Cmty Trust Bank (In re Coleman), 426 F.3d 719 (4th Cir. 2005).
- 2.1.zzzzzzz Substitution of one stock warrant for another may be a fraudulent transfer. The debtor issued a stock warrant. The debtor later accepted the warrant from the holder in exchange for another warrant that had a lower strike price. The holder exercised the warrant and sold the stock for a profit. Bankruptcy followed. The liquidating trustee sued the holder under section 544(b) and the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act, alleging that the exchange of a warrant for another warrant that had less value to the debtor was a transfer of the debtor’s property that was for less than reasonably equivalent value. Whether the debtor’s interest in the warrant is property for purposes of section 544(b) is a question of federal law. The phrase in section 544(b) is co-extensive with the phrase “interest of the debtor in property” in section 541(a)(1), which is to be broadly construed. The warrant is an option that is an executory contract in which the warrant issuer (the debtor) has a property interest because of its right to receive the purchase price if the holder exercises. When the debtor exchanged the warrant, its loss of the right to receive the strike price as a condition for issuing any shares was a transfer. Lehtonen v. Time Warner, Inc. (In re PurchasePro.com, Inc.), 332 B.R. 417 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2005).
- 2.1.aaaaaaa Inadequate disclosure of corporate transaction that benefits insiders may imply actual fraudulent intent. The debtor’s board approved a corporate acquisition involving payments to the debtor’s stockholders and directors that ultimately resulted in the debtor’s financial troubles. The trustee sued the directors on a theory of actual fraudulent transfer. Some of the inside directors benefited from the transaction by reason of their employment and stock option contracts with the debtor. As a result, they may have been “interested” directors. They did not completely disclose all of the transaction details to the other directors, there was no special committee of independent directors, and the board had recently increased their severance packages. From these facts, a trier of fact could infer actual fraudulent intent, resulting in a finding of liability for an actual fraudulent transfer. Liquidation Trust v. Fleet Retail Fin. Group (In re Hechinger Inv. Co.), 327 B.R. 537 (D. Del. 2005).

2.1.bbbbbbbb Concealed transfer may toll statute of limitations. The debtor and its principal engaged in an intricate, international money laundering scheme to remove assets from the debtor for the benefit of the principal when the debtor was under litigation attack for its business activities. When the trustee sued to recover, the defendants continued a pattern of fraudulent concealment through discovery. The trustee could not obtain enough information to bring an action within the two-year statute of limitations, so the court extended the statute to a time based on when the information finally became available. Section 546(a) is a true statute of limitation, not a jurisdictional bar or statute of repose. Therefore, it may be extended by court order based on these facts, and it may be extended by the defendants' actions under the equitable tolling doctrine. Here, both principles apply. IBT Int'l, Inc. v. Northern (In re Int'l Admin. Servs., Inc.), 408 F.3d 689 (11th Cir. 2005).

2.1.cccccccc Change in form of ownership interest may result in lack of reasonably equivalent value. Before bankruptcy, the general partners in a partnership debtor had transferred their assets to family limited partnerships, at least in part to shield their assets from creditors. The transfers were therefore likely to be actually fraudulent transfers. In dictum, the court states they might also be constructively fraudulent transfers. Although the partners received limited partnership interests in the family limited partnerships, those interests did not provide reasonably equivalent value for the assets transferred, and the transfers rendered them insolvent, because creditors could no longer reach the transferred property to satisfy the partners' debts. Bezanson v. Thomas, 402 F.3d 257 (1st Cir. 2005).

2.1.dddddddd Forgiveness of note may be a fraudulent transfer. The debtor forgave $200,000 owing on a $561,000 note. Although the forgiveness agreement stated that the forgiveness was in settlement of disputes between the debtor and the note's maker, there was no evidence of any dispute or any claims that the maker had against the debtor. The forgiveness constituted a "transfer" for purposes of section 548, because it disposed of an interest of the debtor in property—the claim against the maker—that would have become property of the estate if the debtor had not forgiven it. Grochocinski v. Reliant Interactive Media Corp. (In re General Search.com), 322 B.R. 836 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2005).

2.1.eeeeeeee Knowledge of the debtor's fraud to a third party does not defeat "good faith" for purposes of determining "fair consideration." When the lender suspected that the debtor was engaged in fraudulent accounting practices, inflating sales, receivables and inventory, and that the principals were looting the company, it did not call a default or accelerate the loan, but it put pressure on the debtor to refinance. The debtor did so, but ultimately failed. Although the new lenders asked the old lender for information about the debtor, the old lender did not respond. After bankruptcy, the new lenders sued the old lender under New York's Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Law for recovery of the repayment as a constructively fraudulent transfer. The UFCA allows avoidance of a transfer that was not made for "fair consideration," which requires that the transfer be an exchange of a fair equivalent value, which must be made in good faith. Knowledge of the transferor's fraudulent conduct toward third parties (the new lenders) does not defeat the good faith of the old loan repayment, because a preference as between outsider creditors does not constitute bad faith. Sharp Int'l Corp. v. State St. Bank & Trust Co. (In re Sharp Int'l Corp.), 403 F.3d 43 (2d Cir. 2005).

2.1.fffffff Section 548 reaches a foreign real property transfer. Many years before bankruptcy, while the debtor and her children were all in Maryland, the debtor deeded Bahamian real property to her children. The children did not record the deed, because of high Bahamian transfer taxes, until shortly before bankruptcy. The court determines that the transfer was not made for purposes of section 548(d)(1) until the deed was recorded in the Bahamian land records and concludes that it is avoidable, despite the real property's location in the Bahamas. The court concludes that the presumption against extraterritorial application of U.S. laws does not apply to the fraudulent transfer laws, especially where the transfer was arranged and executed in the United States among U.S. parties. It also concludes that comity does not interfere with avoiding the transfer, because principles of comity require deference to the location of the primary insolvency proceeding, here, the U.S. French v. Liebmann (In re French), 320 B.R. 78 (D. Md. 2004).

2.1.gggggggg Civil forfeiture order precludes fraudulent transfer claim. One of the debtor's shareholders was indicted for Medicaid fraud. The government seized the shareholder's shares in a civil forfeiture action related to the criminal indictment. So as not to be involved in the civil forfeiture action, the debtor entered into an agreement with the shareholder and the government under which it would repurchase the shares, and the cash purchase price would be substituted for the stock in the forfeiture action. The forfeiture court approved the agreement. Shortly before the debtor filed bankruptcy, the forfeiture court ordered forfeiture of the assets and, after publication notice and in accordance with federal forfeiture statutes which allow third parties with an interest in the assets to appear and be heard to protect their rights, extinguished the rights of all third parties in the assets. The trustee did not appear or file a claim for the assets. Shortly thereafter, the trustee brought a fraudulent transfer action, seeking to recover the amounts paid to repurchase the debtor's stock. The forfeiture judgment determined all rights in the forfeited property, so the government had clear title. The fraudulent transfer action was an effort to reestablish the debtor's interest in the transferred property, contrary to the forfeiture judgment. The fraudulent transfer action is therefore barred as an impermissible collateral attack on the forfeiture judgment. Uecker & Assocs., Inc. v. L.G. Hunt & Assocs. (In re American Basketball League, Inc.), 317 B.R. 121 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2004).

2.1.hhhhhhhh Grupo Mexicano does not preclude an asset-freezing injunction in conjunction with a fraudulent transfer or equitable action. The debtor's principal appeared to have diverted substantial assets to himself before bankruptcy. The trustee brought an action against him to recover the transfers as fraudulent, to impose a constructive trust, and to impose a permanent injunction and sought a preliminary injunction freezing the principal's assets pending the litigation on the merits. Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo S.A. v. Alliance Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308 (1999), prohibited an asset-freezing injunction to prevent preferences in connection with an action to recover on defaulted bond principal. However, that case excepted fraudulent conveyance actions and equitable claims from the prohibition. Therefore, it did not preclude an asset-freezing preliminary injunction in this case. Rubin v. Pringle (In re Focus Media Inc.), 387 F.3d 1077 (9th Cir. 2004).

2.1.iiiiiii Indirect benefit may constitute reasonably equivalent value. The debtor's shareholders issued a note to the lender for a loan under which the lender deposited the loan proceeds directly in the debtor's account. The debtor granted the lender a security interest in its assets to secure repayment of the loan. The trustee argued that the grant was a fraudulent transfer, because it satisfied the shareholders', not the debtor's obligation to the lender. However, because the debtor received the loan proceeds, the lender provided reasonably equivalent value to the debtor in exchange for the security interest, even though the value to the debtor did not come directly from the lender but only indirectly through the shareholders. Frontier Bank v. Brown (In re Northern Merch., Inc.), 371 F.3d 1056 (9th Cir. 2004).

2.1.jjjjjjj Well-capitalized leveraged buyout does not give rise to fraudulent transfer claim. In a typical multi-step leveraged buyout, the buyer's contributed equity capital constituted about 47% of the purchase price. Because of the high equity contribution, the court refused to collapse the several steps in the transaction for fraudulent transfer analysis purposes. Collapsing is an equitable doctrine, and collapsing in this case would have been inequitable: Avoidance of the transaction as a fraudulent transfer would have harmed the lender, who had thought it was lending into a well-capitalized company, and benefited only general unsecured creditors, all of whom extended credit after the transaction and were (or could have been) aware of the leveraged buyout. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors of Grand Eagle Cos. v. Asea Brown Boveri, Inc., 312 B.R. 219 (N.D. Ohio 2004).

2.1.kkkkkkkk Debtor's settlement of claims does not moot fraudulent transfer action. The debtor made fraudulent transfers, which the chapter 7 trustee pursued. Before the claims went to trial, the debtor settled with all of its creditors, so that the fraudulent transfer recoveries would not have benefited them at all. The trustee still pursued the avoidance claims and trustee's counsel filed an application for the fees incurred in pursuing the action. The debtor objects, arguing that the avoidance would not be "for the benefit of the estate." The court awards the fees. It reasons that the estate is not synonymous with "unsecured creditors," that the estate encompasses other interests as well, such as administrative claimants. This was not a case where the trustee pursued the claims only to generate fees or where there would be no net benefit to the estate, because the unsecured claims had not been settled when the claims were brought, and the claims may have pressured the settlement. The debtor's settlement may not thwart the professionals' efforts to collect fees for their work to administer the estate. Stalaker v. DLC, Ltd., 376 F.3d 819 (8th Cir. 2004).

2.1.iiiiiii UFTA is not the exclusive remedy for recovering fraudulently transferred property. More than a year before bankruptcy, the debtor transferred his over-encumbered residence to his son for no consideration. A short time later, the bank recorded a judgment lien against all of the debtor's real property located in that county. After the debtor later filed bankruptcy, two junior lienors released their liens on the property, which would have created equity for the judgment creditor if the debtor had still owned the property. Some years later, the debtor's son reconveyed the property to the debtor for no consideration, and the debtor attempted to sell the property. As a condition to release of its judgment lien, the judgment creditor demanded that the proceeds be placed into escrow pending resolution of its right to the proceeds. After the sale concluded, the debtor moved for an order reopening the bankruptcy case and directing payment of the escrow funds to the debtor. The bank cross-moved for turnover of the escrow proceeds. The court of appeals concludes that the Rhode Island Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act is not the exclusive remedy for a creditor to recover fraudulently transferred property. Recognizing that the judgment creditor could not have avoided the transfer under the UFTA because the debtor had no equity in the property at the time of the transfer, the court holds that, as an alternative remedy, the debtor's son held the property in a resulting trust for the debtor, because a resulting trust occurs when a transfer has been made with an implied intent that the beneficiary retain an equitable interest in the property. The court here recognizes that the judgment creditor's execution created a lien on that equitable interest. Fleet National Bank v. Valente (In re Valente), 360 F.3d 256 (1st Cir. 2004).

2.1.mmmmmmm The debtor's stock is not property of the debtor. The trustee sued under the fraudulent transfer statute to recover from a stockholder who had converted preferred stock into common stock, according to the terms of the preferred, while the debtor was insolvent. The issuance of the common stock to the defendant was not a transfer of property of the debtor, because the debtor's equity is not property of the debtor. It is only a unit of ownership interest in the debtor and has no value to the debtor itself. Decker v. Advantage Fund Ltd., 362 F.3d 593 (9th Cir. 2004).

2.1.nnnnnnn Transferee's knowledge of fraud does not defeat good faith defense to recovery of a fraudulent conveyance. Although the lender knew that the corporation was insolvent and that its owners were engaged in a fraudulent scheme to loot the company, the company's repayment of the lender's debt was not constructively fraudulent under the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act. That Act exempts from recovery a transfer made for "fair consideration," which requires that property be received or an antecedent debt be satisfied in good faith. A preference is not a fraudulent transfer, and the creditor's knowledge of fraud on third parties does not defeat good faith, because the fraud was not in the transfer but was rather in the company's other conduct. Sharp Int'l Corp. v. State Street Bank and Trust Co. (In re Sharp Int'l Corp.), 302 B.R. 760 (E.D.N.Y. 2003).

2.1.00000000 Debtor in possession may avoid fraudulent transfer only to the extent required to pay creditors. To prevent the IRS from seizing her property, the debtor granted a security interest in her residence to her bank. After she filed chapter 11, she sought to avoid the lien as a fraudulent transfer. The court permitted avoidance only to the extent necessary to pay creditors. That is, the bank would retain its lien to the extent that the property was not required to pay the claims of the IRS and other creditors. The court imported the language of section 550(b), that "the trustee may recover, for the benefit of the estate," into section 544(b), construed "benefit of the estate" to include only creditors, and accordingly limited the avoidance and recovery. Coleman v. Community Trust Bank, N.A. (In re Coleman), 299 B.R. 780 (W.D. Va. 2003).

2.1.pppppppp Creditors committee may bring avoiding power action in the name of the trustee. The Third Circuit, in an en banc decision, rules that the bankruptcy court may authorize an unsecured creditors committee to bring an action on behalf of the estate. The court concludes that the Supreme Court's narrow construction of "the trustee may" in section 506(c) in Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Union Planners Bank, N.A. 530 U.S. 1 (2001), does not restrict the authority of the bankruptcy court to authorize the committee to bring an action in the name of the estate. Section 506(c) is not an analogous context, chapter 11 as a whole contemplates committee derivative actions, pre-Code practice supports derivative actions, and derivative standing advances Congress' goals for chapter 11. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of Cybergenics Corp. v. Chinery, 330 F.3d 548 (3d Cir. 2003).

2.1.qqqqqqqq Debtor's fraudulent conduct is not imputed to the trustee under section 548. The debtor's president and sole shareholder fraudulently obtained loans from the creditor. The shareholder diverted the loan proceeds to his own personal use, but caused the corporate debtor to repay some of the loans. The trustee brought an action to recover the payments as fraudulent transfers under section 548, arguing that the payments were not in satisfaction of the corporation's debt to the creditor, because the president's fraudulent conduct precluded corporate liability. The creditor argues that the "sole actor exception" applies, so that even though the corporation's agent was acting fraudulently, the corporation should be liable for the loans. The court rejects that defense, concluding that the trustee, when acting under his avoiding powers, is not bound or affected by the debtor's prepetition conduct. Accordingly, it did not matter that the debtor was in pari delicto with the agent; the trustee could treat the debt obligation as fraudulently incurred and therefore the payments as recoverable fraudulent transfers under section 548. McNamara v. PFS (In re Personal and Business Ins. Agency), 334 F.3d 239 (3d Cir. 2003).

2.1.rrrrrrrr Res judicata may indirectly bar trustee's fraudulent transfer suit. A creditor brought an action before bankruptcy to set aside a fraudulent transfer but lost. After bankruptcy, the trustee relied on that creditor's claim under section 544(b) to pursue the same fraudulent transfer action. The transferee's res judicata defense against the creditor does not bind the trustee, because the trustee is not in privity with the creditor. Nevertheless, if the creditor could not have brought the action, then an essential element of the trustee's cause of action is missing, namely, that the transfer could have been avoided by this creditor holding an allowed unsecured claim. Interestingly, the trustee was able to recover based on another creditor's allowable unsecured claim, even though it had been settled and paid by the time of the trial of the action, because the existence of the claim is determined as of the petition date. Finally, the full amount recovered created a surplus in the estate, which would be returned to the debtor under section 726(a)(6). Although the court did not expressly address whether a transfer avoidance could benefit the debtor, it applied Moore v. Bay, 284 U.S. 4 (1931), to hold that the entire transfer could be recovered for the benefit of the estate. Stalnakar v. DLC, Ltd. (In re DLC, Ltd.), 295 B.R. 593 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).

2.1.ssssssss Ponzi scheme interest payments are not fraudulent transfers. Recognizing a deep split in the courts that have considered the issue, the District Court rules that payments of interest to Ponzi scheme investors are not recoverable as fraudulent transfers. The court focuses on each individual payment to determine that the debtor received reasonably equivalent value - the use of the money - in exchange for the interest payment. The court disagrees with those cases that hold that the interest should be recoverable because the payments were part of an overall illegal scheme, noting that under such a rationale, repayment of principle would likewise be recoverable. Daley v. Debtua (In re Carrozzella & Richardson), 286 B.R. 480 (D. Conn. 2002).

2.1.tttttttt Fraudulent transfer solvency analysis includes liabilities that are unliquidated at the time of the transfer. In an action for a fraudulent transfer that occurred four years before trial, the court determines that an analysis of the debtor's solvency at the time of the transfer must take into account all claims that existed at the time of the transfer, even though they were unliquidated and even unasserted and even though many of them remained unliquidated and unasserted at the time of trial. The court determines that it must make its best estimate of the unliquidated claims in the aggregate and does not need to try each one. The court rejects the defendant's argument that the debtor's reasonable belief in its solvency at the time of the transfer has any relevance, holding that the "insolvent" prong of the fraudulent transfer test does not take into account reasonableness or the debtor's beliefs. Official Committee v. Sealed Air Corp. (In re W.R. Grace & Co.), 281 B.R. 852 (D. Del. 2002).

2.1.uuuuuuuu Ponzi scheme employees were not precluded from raising good faith defense. The trustee sued sales personnel and other employees who worked for a Ponzi scheme, to recover as fraudulent transfers payments they had received. The employees defended under section 548(c) on the ground that they had given value in good faith in exchange for the payments. The court of appeals allows the defense, holding that even though all of their efforts deepened the debtor's insolvency, that did not preclude them from showing that they provided value to the debtor by their services. Orlick v. Kozyak (In re Financial Federated Title & Trust, Inc.), 309 F.3d 1325 (11th Cir. 2002).

2.1.vvvvvvvv Fraudulent transfer liability requires diminution of the estate. The debtor had engaged in a Ponzi scheme that involved short selling of securities through its broker Bear Stearns. The trustee sought recovery from the broker under section 548(a)(1) on the grounds that the debtor had made the transfers to the broker with actual intent to hinder, delay, and defraud other creditors. The broker defended on the grounds that the transferred property would not, in any event, have been available to the debtor's other creditors if the transfers had not been made. Relying on Begier v. IRS, 496 U.S. 53 (1990), for the meaning of "an interest of the debtor in property" in section 548(a), the court concludes that the trustee may avoid a transfer only when, but for the transfer, the property would have been available to at least one of the debtor's creditors. The court thus criticizes and distinguishes the Fourth Circuit's recent decision, Tavener v. Smoot, 257 F.3d 401 (4th Cir. 2001), which rejected an "actual harm to creditors" test. The court concludes, however, that the trustee should not be required to bear the burden of an addition showing of "diminution of the estate" and so makes that the burden of the defendant. Bear, Stearns Securities Corp. v. Gredd, 275 B.R. 190 (S.D.N.Y. 2002).

- 2.1.wwwwwwww Use of NOL in consolidated tax return is not a “transfer.” The debtor’s corporate parent used the debtor’s NOL’s in preparing a consolidated tax return for pre-petition years. The debtor sought to recover from the parent the value to the parent of the use of the debtor’s NOL’s. The court rules that the parent’s use of the NOL’s was not a transfer of property of the debtor, because the Internal Revenue Code required application of the NOL’s at the parent level, so the debtor did not have a property interest. Rather, the NOL’s are merely hypothetical and do not constitute property. Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc. v. MAFCO Holdings, Inc. (In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc.), 273 B.R. 58 (D. Del. 2002).
- 2.1.xxxxxxxx Casino liable for fraudulent transfer. The debtor was a lawyer who was conducting a Ponzi scheme and was taking clients money out of trust, all to support his excessive gambling. The bankruptcy court found that he transferred the money to the casino with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. The casino defended under section 548(c) on the ground that it received the funds in good faith. Because the casino did not adequately comply with applicable state law in investigating the debtor’s creditworthiness before extending him credit on gambling markers, the casino was not in good faith, and the transfer could be avoided and recovered. Meeks v. Red River Entertainment (In re Armstrong), 285 F.3d 1092 (8th Cir. 2002).
- 2.1.yyyyyyyy Reasonable estimate of solvency at the time of a transaction may provide fraudulent transfer defense. In an asbestos-driven chapter 11 case, the creditor’s committee brought an action against the debtor’s affiliates who received dividends from the debtor approximately 20 months before the chapter 11 filing. The parties stipulated to the value of the company at the time of the transfers but disputed the amount of future asbestos claims. The court rules that the claims analysis must be made as of the time of the transfer, without benefit of hindsight, and that future unasserted claims must be considered in determining solvency for the purposes of the fraudulent transfer laws. The court rejects, however, the plaintiff’s argument that it must determine the actual amount of the debtor’s then-future asbestos liabilities. It accepts the testimony of one of the experts that the debtor’s estimate of its liabilities at the time of the transaction was “not unreasonable,” “and applying an objective standard, the court cannot find that [the debtors’] estimate of future liability was so unreasonable [the debtor] was insolvent” at the time. The court concludes it can determine the amount of future liabilities only by determining whether the contemporaneous predictions were reasonable under the circumstances existing at the time they were made. Official Asbestos Claimants’ Committee v. Babcock & Wilcox Co. (In re Babcock & Wilcox Co.), 274 B.R. 230 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2002).
- 2.1.zzzzzzzz Partnership’s tax payment to the IRS may be a fraudulent transfer. At a time when it was insolvent, a partnership debtor made tax payments to the IRS on behalf of its partners. Ultimately, the IRS refunded the tax payments to the partners based on subsequent losses. The bankruptcy court ruled that the IRS is not a mere conduit for the payments to the partners but is the initial transferee of the payments, so that the trustee may recover the payments directly from the IRS, if all of the elements of a fraudulent transfer are proven. Liebersohn v. Internal Revenue Service (In re C.F. Foods, L.P.), 265 B.R. 71 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2001).
- 2.1.aaaaaaaa Transfer of exempt property may be a recoverable fraudulent transfer. Shortly before bankruptcy, and while the debtor was in financial trouble, he transferred over $200,000 to a family owned corporation. The cash was the proceeds of a settlement of a Federal Employer’s Liability Act claim and was therefore exempt. In an action by the trustee to recover the transferred property as a fraudulent transfer, the Fourth Circuit rejects a “no harm, no foul” rule and holds that a transfer of exemptible property may be avoided as a fraudulent transfer. The court reasons that property is not exempt until the debtor makes a claim of exemption after the filing of the bankruptcy and also that section 522(g) permits a trustee to avoid a transfer of exemptible property. So as not to reward the debtor’s wrongdoing, the court also rejects the debtor’s argument that the transfers cannot be characterized as fraudulent because the creditors were never entitled to the property in the first place. Finally, the Court rules that the debtor should be denied his discharge because of the transfer. Tavener v. Smoot, 257 F.3d 407 (4th Cir. 2001).

2.1.bbbbbbbbbb Prepetition creditor avoiding power action does not bar trustee's action. Before bankruptcy, the debtor's ex-wife unsuccessfully brought a state court action to recover property that the debtor had fraudulently transferred to his son. After bankruptcy, the trustee brought a similar action under section 544(b) on behalf of all creditors. Under the section 544(b) avoiding power, the trustee cannot rely on the rights of an unsecured creditor (the ex-wife) who would be collaterally estopped to avoid the transfer or against whom the transferee would have any other valid defense. However, although one creditor may be collaterally estopped or subject to the defense of res judicata, the trustee may still use section 544(b) through the existence of some other unsecured creditor who is able to avoid the transfer under the applicable nonbankruptcy law, because the creditors whom the trustee represented under section 544(b) were not in privity with the single creditor who brought the prepetition action. Therefore the trustee's action was not barred by the doctrine of res judicata. In what appears to be a partial repudiation of Moore v. Bay, however, the Eighth Circuit rules, on equitable grounds, that the bankruptcy court should ensure that the none of the recovery directly or indirectly is used to satisfy the ex-wife's claim in the bankruptcy case. Williams v. Marlar (In re Marlar), 267 F.3d 749 (8th Cir. 2001).

2.1.ccccccccc Payment of criminal fine and restitution is not avoidable as a fraudulent transfer. To settle criminal charges brought against it prepetition, the debtor agreed to pay reimbursement, restitution, and a substantial fine. In a case of apparent first impression, the court rules that the debtor received reasonably equivalent value for the settlement of the criminal prosecution, finding that the termination of the criminal prosecution, which allowed the debtor to stay in business, provided the necessary value. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Florida (In re Tower Environmental, Inc.), 260 B.R. 213 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1998).

2.1.ddddddddd Foreign law does not apply to a fraudulent transfer of real property. A Japanese debtor transferred real property in Colorado shortly before its bankruptcy. The Japanese administrator commenced an ancillary case under section 304 and sought to recover the real property under the Japanese fraudulent transfer statute. Although the Court of Appeals recognized the importance of comity in dealing with a request by a foreign representative under section 304 to administer property located in the United States, it rules that the particularly local nature of real estate requires application of local law. Therefore, the court required analysis of the transaction under the Colorado Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act rather than under Japanese fraudulent transfer law. In so doing, it concluded, following In re BFP, 511 U.S. 531 (1994), that a regularly conducted, non-collusive tax foreclosure sale was conclusively for reasonably equivalent value and therefore not a fraudulent transfer as long as the tax sale involved a public competitive bidding procedure. Kojima v. Grandote International LLC, 252 F.3d 1146 (10th Cir. 2001).

2.1.eeeeeeeee Bankruptcy court may not grant creditors standing to bring avoiding power action. Dissatisfied with the trustee's pursuit of a fraudulent transfer action, a creditor sought authority to file suit to recover the transfers. The court denied standing, holding under a strict, literal reading of section 548, only the trustee may bring a fraudulent transfer action and that the bankruptcy court could not grant standing to a creditor to do so. The court relied in part on Norwest Bank Worthington N.A. v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197 (1988), for the proposition that the bankruptcy court's equitable powers under section 105 could not expand upon the authority granted by specific statutory sections. SurfNSun Apts., Inc. v. Dempsey, 253 B.R. 490 (M.D. Fla. 1999).

2.1.fffffff FCC C-block license auction did not impose enforceable obligation. For purposes of determining fraudulent transfer liability, the debtor's obligation to pay for C-block licenses did not arise at the conclusion of the FCC auction. The auction entitled the debtor only to apply for the license and obligated the debtor only to pay a penalty if the licensee was not qualified. Because the licensee was qualified, the debtor never became obligated for a penalty and became obligated to pay for a license only upon approval of the license application. United States v. GWI PCS One, Inc. (In re GWI PCS One, Inc.), 230 F.3d 788 (5th Cir. 2000).

- 2.1.ggggggggg Prepetition creditor avoiding power action does not bar trustee's action. Before bankruptcy, the debtor's ex-wife unsuccessfully brought a state court action to recover property that the debtor had fraudulently transferred to his son. After bankruptcy, the trustee brought a similar action under section 544(b) on behalf of all creditors. Although the ex-wife would be benefited as a creditor by the trustee's action, the creditors whom the trustee represented under section 544(b) were not in privity with the single creditor who brought the prepetition action. Therefore the trustee's action was not barred by the doctrine of res judicata. Williams v. Marlar (In re Marlar), 246 B.R. 606 (Bankr. W.D. Ark. 2000).
- 2.1.hhhhhhhhh Election to forego an NOL carryback may be a fraudulent transfer. The debtors incurred a large tax NOL, entitling them to a refund of taxes for prior years. Instead of taking the refund, they made an irrevocable election under IRC section 172(b)(3) to waive the carryback and carry the NOL forward to be applied against future years' income. They filed bankruptcy a few months later. The Ninth Circuit permits the trustee to avoid the election as a fraudulent transfer, holding that the irrevocability of the election only prevents the right to the NOL from becoming property of the estate under section 541 but does not prevent a trustee from recovering if the transfer was made for less than reasonable equivalent value. The government conceded the value question. The court also rules that the right to the refund was "property" for purposes of section 548, relying on Segal v. Rochelle, 382 U.S. 375 (1966). United States v. Simms (In re Feiler), 218 F.3d 948 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 2.1.iiiiiii LBO settlement payments are not avoidable. The settlement payment exception to avoidability of section 546(e) applies to payments made to a financial institution and by the institution to selling shareholders in a leveraged buyout, even though the payments do not go through the clearing system. Lowenschuss v. Resorts International, Inc. (In re Resorts International, Inc.), 181 F.3d 505 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 2.1.jjjjjjj Property transferred was not "property of the debtor" and therefore not recoverable. Under the plan, the reorganized debtor was entitled to receive the property of one of its former shareholders, as a result of a settlement of an SEC action against the shareholder. The shareholder transferred a portion of that property before bankruptcy. The transferred property was not "property of the debtor" at the time of the transfer and so was not recoverable as a fraudulent transfer under section 544(a) by the reorganized debtor under the plan. Trinity Gas Corp. (Reorganized) v. IRS (In re Trinity Gas Corp.), 242 B.R. 344 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 1999).
- 2.1.kkkkkkk Revocation of subchapter S status may be a fraudulent transfer. The closely-held corporate debtor revoked its subchapter S status shortly before its bankruptcy petition, with the result that the capital gains tax liability that it would incur upon sale or foreclosure of its assets in its bankruptcy case would be the liability of the corporate estate, not of the individual shareholder. The revocation was a fraudulent transfer and could be set aside by the corporation's trustee in bankruptcy. Parker v. Saunders (In re Bakersfield Westar, Inc.), 226 B.R. 227 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1994).
- 2.1.iiiiiii Indirect benefits to a guarantor may prevent fraudulent transfer attack. One company guaranteed the bank debt of its sister corporation. In dicta, the Seventh Circuit describes at length how an indirect benefit to the guarantor might provide reasonably equivalent value to prevent the guarantee from being attacked as a fraudulent obligation. In this case, however, no indirect benefit was shown, and the guarantee was set aside as a fraudulent obligation. Leibowitz v. Parkway Bank and Trust Co. (In re Image Worldwide, Ltd.), 139 F.3d 574 (7th Cir. 1998).

2.1.mmmmmmmmm Law firm retainer is not a fraudulent transfer. Knowing that he was about to be attacked by his creditors, the debtor paid a non-refundable retainer to his law firm under a retainer agreement which stated, “we wish to reduce or eliminate the risk of retainer funds being garnished or levied upon by potential or existing judgment creditors.” Because the transfer was not of all or substantially all of the debtor’s assets, because there was no special relationship between the debtor and the transferee, and because the debtor did not retain possession of any of the property, the transfer was not made with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. National Credit Union Administration Board v. Johnson, 133 F.3d 1097 (8th Cir. 1998).

2.1.nnnnnnnnn Loss of redemption right to a pawnbroker may be a fraudulent transfer. The debtor pawned an object and before bankruptcy forfeited her redemption right to the pawnbroker for nonpayment. The court refused to apply BFP v. Resolution Trust Corp., 511 U.S. 531 (1994), which held that a regularly conducted, noncollusive foreclosure sale of real property was not avoidable as a fraudulent transfer. Instead, the court determines that the loss of the right of redemption constituted a second transfer (the first being the pawn itself), for which the pawnbroker must give reasonably equivalent value. Carter v. H & B Jewelry and Loan (In re Carter), 209 B.R. 732 (Bankr. D. Ore. 1997).

2.1.oooooo Check-kiting scheme does not create fraudulent transfer liability for the bank. In denying fraudulent transfer liability of the debtor’s bank, the district court rules (i) the security interest created under UCC section 4-210 in a check in favor of the collecting bank is an equitable interest in the check, while the depositor/debtor retains the legal interest in the check; (ii) the validity of the section 4-210 security interest in a fraudulent transfer action does not depend on the bank’s good faith under section 548(c) (iii) the creation of the security interest under section 4-210 is not a transfer for purposes of the Bankruptcy Code, despite the breadth of the definition of “transfer” in section 101, because the depositor/debtor continues to have the right to withdraw the funds and the assets available to the debtor have not changed (iv) whether there was a “diminution of the estate” should be considered in determining whether there was a fraudulent transfer. Pioneer Liquidating Corporation v. San Diego Trust & Savings Bank (In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortgage Entities), 211 B.R. 704 (S.D. Cal. 1997).

2.1.ppppppppp Loan commitment fee avoided as fraudulent transfer. A loan commitment that had little chance of closing did not provide reasonably equivalent value for the loan commitment fees that the debtor paid while insolvent, which were attacked as a fraudulent transfer. In affirming the judgment of the bankruptcy court avoiding the fees, the Third Circuit held that the opportunity to receive an economic benefit constitutes value as long as there is some chance that the disputed transfer will generate a positive return. Mellon Bank, N.A. v. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of R.M.L., Inc. (In re R.M.L. Inc.), 92 F.2d 139 (3d Cir. 1996).

2.2 Preferences

2.2.a Transfer under a wage garnishment order is made when money is paid. The creditor obtained a wage garnishment order more than 90 days before the debtor’s bankruptcy and received payments within the 90-day period. The trustee may avoid a transfer of the debtor’s property made within 90 days before bankruptcy if certain other conditions are met. Under prior circuit precedent, state law determined when a transfer was made, and a garnishment effected a transfer, even before money was paid. Barnhill v. Johnson, 503 U.S. 393 (1992), held that federal law governs and that a transfer by a check, which is an order to pay money, is made only when the money is paid. It effectively overrules prior circuit precedent. Therefore, the transfer under the garnishment was made only when the employer paid the creditor. Warsco v. Creditmax Collection Agency, Inc., ___ F.4th ___, 2023 U.S. App. LEXIS 447 (7th Cir. Jan. 9, 2023). 0

- 2.2.b Postpetition claim payment under section 503(b)(9) does not defeat subsequent new value preference defense. The debtor purchased and, within 90 days before the petition date, paid for goods from a supplier. At the petition date, some of the supplier's invoices remained unpaid, including for shipments the debtor received within 20 days before the petition date. The supplier filed an administrative expense claim under section 503(b)(9) for those invoices. Section 547(b) allows the trustee to avoid payments made within 90 days before the petition date as a preference if various other conditions are met, but section 547(c)(4) gives a preference defendant a defense to the extent the defendant, after the preference, provided new value to the debtor "not secured by an otherwise unavoidable security interest" and for which the debtor "did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit" of the creditor. First, in this context, "otherwise unavoidable" means unavoidable under a provision other than section 547(c)(4), not generally under section 547. Thus, if a transfer to the creditor is avoidable for any reason, including as a preference, the creditor may rely on the subsequent new value defense with respect to the new value for which the debtor made the transfer. Second, the subsequent new value defense does not specify whether the "otherwise unavoidable transfer" must have been made pre- or postpetition. The first two uses of the word "transfer" in section 547(b) and 547(c)(4) apply only to prepetition transfers. The third use, in section 547(c)(4)(B), should similarly be read to apply only to prepetition transfers. The section's title, "Preferences," suggests that it applies only in the 90-day prepetition period. If only prepetition "new value" provides a defense, then (B) should similarly be read to apply only to prepetition transfers. Therefore, the unavoidable postpetition claim payment under section 503(b)(9) is not an "otherwise unavoidable transfer" that defeats the supplier's subsequent new value defense. Auriga Polymers Inc. v. PMCM2, LLC, 40 F.4th 1273 (11th Cir. 2022).
- 2.2.c Pleading the due diligence prerequisite for a preference complaint. The debtor in possession analyzed transfers to a creditor, including days-to-pay information for each transfer and for pre-avoidance period transfers and any unusual collection activity, and included that information in a preference avoidance and recovery demand letter to the creditor. When the creditor did not respond, the DIP sued to avoid and recover the preferences. In the complaint, the DIP recited that it had conducted an analysis of the transfers and whether they were protected from avoidance by any applicable defense. The complaint also referred to, but did not attach, the demand letter. Section 547(b) permits a trustee or DIP to avoid a preference, "based on reasonable due diligence in the circumstances of the case and taking into account a party's known or reasonably knowable affirmative defenses." On a motion to dismiss, the court may consider a document the complaint references. Combined with the complaint's allegation that the DIP conducted an analysis, the letter satisfied the statutory prerequisite for bringing the complaint, whether or not the prerequisite is an element of the preference claim. Center City Healthcare, LLC v. McKesson Plasma & Biologics LLC (In re Center City Healthcare, LLC), 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 1638 (Bankr. D. Del. June 13, 2022).
- 2.2.d Ear-marking doctrine requires satisfaction of the dominion/control and diminution of the estate tests. The closely held debtor owed money to an insider on a note that was to receive no payments until a separate series of notes was paid in full. The debtor's principal loaned money to the debtor specifically to make payments on the insider note and the other notes. Upon the debtor's bankruptcy, the trustee sued to avoid and recover the payments on the insider notes as preferences. A preference is a transfer of property of the debtor that meets certain additional conditions. If a new creditor loans money to a debtor to pay an old creditor, the payment might be protected by the ear-marking doctrine, which deems the money not to have been property of the debtor. To satisfy the ear-marking doctrine, the new money must not be subject to the dominion or control of the debtor—that is, the debtor must be under a binding agreement to use the new money to pay the old creditor and not for any other purpose—and the transaction must not result in the diminution of the estate—that is, the reduction in the amount of assets available to pay creditors. The doctrine's application is clearer when the new creditor pays the money directly to the old creditor and the money does not pass through the debtor's account, but that is not required. Here, the new lender (the principal) required the debtor (controlled by the principal) to use the new loan to pay the insider note, so the debtor did not have dominion and control over the funds. However, the insider note payments resulted in the diminution of the estate, because it replaced subordinated debt with general unsecured debt. Therefore, the court concludes, the transfer was of property of the debtor and avoidable. Montoya v. Goldstein (In re Chuza Oil Co.), 639 B.R. 586 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2022).

- 2.2.e PPP loan rescission and return is not a preference. The debtor applied for a Payroll Protection Program loan on April 24, 2020. It signed the note on May 5 and received the funds on May 8. It held the funds aside, pending a decision whether to revoke the loan and return the funds, which it did on May 13, under a “safe harbor,” no-questions-asked provision in the PPP program policy, which permitted return of the funds and cancellation of the loan by May 14. The debtor filed a bankruptcy case on May 27. The trustee sued the lender to avoid the funds’ return as a preference. A preference is a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property for or on account of an antecedent debt. Upon rescission of a contract, the contract become void ab initio, and the rescinding party must restore anything of value received. The court may impose a resulting trust to effectuate that result. Therefore, under the circumstances, the funds the debtor had held aside were subject to a resulting trust and were not property of the debtor. Moreover, because of the rescission, the transaction was cancelled, and there was no antecedent debt. Therefore, there was no avoidable preference. Brady v. United States, SBA (In re Specialty’s Café & Bakery, Inc.), 639 B.R. 548 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2022).
- 2.2.f First cousins are “relatives.” The trustee sued a first cousin of the debtor’s principal to avoid as a preference a transfer made more than 90 days before the petition date. Section 547(b) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer to a “relative” made within one year before the petition date. The Bankruptcy Code defines “relative” as one within the third degree of affinity or consanguinity as determined by the common law. Courts have generally used state, not federal, law, but are divided on whether to use state common or civil law. Because of the ambiguity in the definition, the court may look to legislative history. The definition derives from the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 with no meaningful revision. The legislative history of that act shows that Congress intended reference to the common law of England, and case law supports that interpretation. Using English common law rather than state law also promotes uniformity. Under English common law, relation is defined by distance from a common ancestor. For first cousins, the common ancestor is the grandparent. The cousins are each two degrees removed from a common grandparent and so come within the third degree. Ehrenberg v. Halajyan (In re Victory Entm’t, Inc.), 634 B.R. 90 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2021).
- 2.2.g Critical vendor order does not vitiate preference liability. Early in the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession was authorized but not required to pay certain amounts to critical customers to be able to continue to receive necessary services from the customers. The liquidating trustee under the confirmed chapter 11 plan sued one customer to avoid and recover a preference. The customer order does not vitiate the trustee’s preference claim. The debtor made the payments before the customer order and so, absent specific protection, could not have been protected by authorization to make future payments. Moreover, the order was permissive, not mandatory, and did not specifically identify the customer or require that its claims be paid. Therefore, the order does not protect the prepetition payments from preference attack. Insys Liquidation Trust v. McKesson Corp. (In re Insys Therapeutics, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 1923 (Bankr. D. Del. July 21, 2021).
- 2.2.h New lenders’ direct payment to creditor is not a preference. The debtor owed a law firm money. The debtor’s mother agreed to loan the debtor sufficient sums to pay his debt to the law firm on the condition that the funds be used only for that purpose. The debtor executed a promissory note to his mother, who wrote a check to the law firm and delivered it directly to the law firm. A few days later, the debtor filed his bankruptcy petition. A preference is a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property that enables a creditor to recover more than other similarly situated creditors. The debtor has an interest in property if the debtor has dominion or control over the property or if the transfer of the property would diminish property that would have become property of the estate if it had not been transferred. Under these facts, the debtor did not exercise dominion or control over the loan proceeds: his mother controlled them at all times, and he had no ability to direct their distribution. And the loan proceeds did not diminish the estate, because the mother transferred the funds directly to the law firm, the funds never passed through the debtor's hands, and the debtor had no interest in the funds. Therefore, the payment was not a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property. Walters v. Stevens, Littman, Biddison, Tharp & Weinberg, LLC (In re Wagenknecht), 971 F.3d 1209 (10th Cir. 2020).

- 2.2.i Creation of a joint check agreement among a contractor, the debtor, and the debtor's subcontractor is a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property. The debtor subcontractor further subcontracted some of its work. Within 90 days before bankruptcy, when the debtor had encountered financial difficulty, the subsubcontractor entered into a joint check agreement among the contractor, the debtor, and the subsubcontractor. Under the agreement, the contractor issued a joint check payable to the debtor and the subsubcontractor for material the subsubcontractor agreed to release to the contractor. The debtor endorsed the check and returned it to the contractor, who forwarded it to the subsubcontractor. The trustee may avoid as a preference a transfer of a debtor's property to or for the benefit of a creditor made within 90 days before the petition date, if certain other conditions are also met. Under a joint check agreement, the debtor is deemed to hold the funds represented by the check in trust for the other payee, so the funds are not property of the debtor. The joint check agreement created the subsubcontractor's interest in the funds otherwise owing to the debtor within the 90-day preference period, resulting in a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property. Therefore, the trustee may avoid the transfer. Myers Controlled Power, LLC v. Gold (In re the Truland Group, Inc.), 604 b.r. 258 (E.D. Va. 2019).
- 2.2.j Subsequent new value defense does not require that new value remain unpaid. The supplier shipped the debtor product during the 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor issued nonordinary course payments to the supplier after each group of shipments. Section 547(b) allows the trustee to avoid a payment on account of an antecedent debt that enables a creditor to receive more than in a chapter 7 case, but section 547(c)(4) gives the creditor a defense to the extent that after the payment, the creditor provided new value that is "not secured by an otherwise unavoidable security interest and ... on account of which new value the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of such creditor." The defense does not address whether the new value must remain unpaid, only whether the debtor made an otherwise unavoidable transfer on account of the payment. Where the debtor makes a payment that is avoidable as a preference but for section 547(c)(4)'s new value defense, the payment is avoidable and, therefore, not "otherwise unavoidable." That is, "otherwise unavoidable" applies only to avoidability under section 547(c)(4), not the entire preference section. Therefore, the debtor's later payments for the new value do not prevent application of the new value defense. The creditor receives credit against preference liability for each new value shipment, despite payment for that shipment, as long as the shipment is made after the payment. Kaye v. Blue Bell Creameries, Inc. (In re BFW Liquidation, LLC), 899 F.3d 1178 (11th Cir. 2018).
- 2.2.k Mandatory Victims Restitution Act does not preempt trustee's preference avoiding power as to pre-conviction payments. The debtor embezzled from his employer. During negotiations for a federal criminal conviction, the debtor made an initial restitution payment to the employer. Within 90 days after making the initial payment, the debtor filed a chapter 7 bankruptcy case. The debtor later entered into a plea agreement that provided for full restitution, subject to credit for the amount already paid. After the court imposed the sentence, the trustee sued the employer to recover the partial restitution payment as a preference. The federal Mandatory Victims Restitution Act (MVRA) requires a criminal sentence to impose a full restitution obligation on the defendant and permits the United States to enforce the judgment, notwithstanding any other federal law, against all the defendant's property. The automatic stay does not apply to such enforcement. Ordinarily, that would permit the United States to enforce against the debtor's property that became property of the estate. However, in this case, the debtor no longer had an interest in the property paid to the employer, either at the time of bankruptcy or the later time the criminal judgment issued and the government's lien arose. Therefore, the MVRA does not prevent the trustee's avoidance of the pre-bankruptcy, pre-conviction payment to the employer. Under section 541(a)(3), the payment becomes property of the estate when the trustee recovers it, not before. The government may trace the debtor's property into the estate and enforce the restitution obligation against it after bankruptcy. But in this case, the property was not the debtor's as of the bankruptcy date, so the government may not enforce its claim against it. Spero v. Community Chevrolet, Inc. (In re Grooms), 572 B.R. 559 (W.D. Pa. 2017).

- 2.2.l Transfers between New York bank correspondent bank accounts are not extraterritorial transfers. The debtor Bahraini bank filed a chapter 11 case in New York. Before bankruptcy, the debtor transferred funds to two other foreign banks' New York correspondent accounts to purchase investments. The foreign banks refused to return the funds upon maturity, offsetting the amounts against their claims against the debtor. The creditors' committee sued to recover the amounts under sections 362, 542, 547, and 550. International comity is the respect the courts of one country give to another country. Comity among courts depends on the existence of a proceeding in a court in the foreign country and does not apply here. Legislative or prescriptive comity is the respect a court gives to the laws of another country, based on factors that are similar to choice of law factors. In this case, the foreign banks' choice of New York correspondent accounts to receive the debtor's investment from New York and the United States' interest, including under the Bankruptcy Code, in regulating conduct among parties transacting business in the United States, militates against dismissal of the action based on international comity. To determine whether the presumption against extraterritorial application of U.S. statutes applies, the court examines whether Congress intended extraterritorial application. If so, the inquiry is complete. If not, the court determines whether the litigation involves an extraterritorial application of the statute. The transfer between two New York bank accounts created sufficient contacts with the United States that the application of section 547 to the transfer would not involve its extraterritorial application. Nor does the application of section 362 or section 542 involve extraterritorial application, because they both operate on the premise that the bank accounts are property of the estate. Moreover, because those sections apply to property of the estate, which includes property "wherever located," Congress intended that those sections apply extraterritorially. Accordingly, the court denies the banks' motion to dismiss on comity and extraterritoriality grounds. Official Comm. v. Bahrain Islamic Bank (In re Arcapita Bank B.S.C.(c)), 575 B.R. 229 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 2.2.m Trustee may recover an insider preference under FDCPA. The debtor repaid a director's loan to the debtor about 13 months before bankruptcy. The IRS had substantial allowed unsecured claims against the debtor. The Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act permits a federal governmental creditor to avoid an insider preference made within two years before the avoidance action. Section 544(b) gives the trustee the rights and powers of a creditor holding an allowed unsecured claim to avoid a transfer under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Here, under the FDCPA, the IRS could have avoided the payment to the director. The trustee may do so under section 544(b). Gordon v. Rogich (In re Alpha Protective Servs., Inc.), 570 B.R. 888 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 2017).
- 2.2.n Debtor's deposit to cover final bank account overdrafts is a preference. The debtor maintained two accounts with the bank. Within the 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor overdrew its checking account multiple times. The bank provisionally settled the overdrafts pending the midnight deadline (midnight of the next business day), and the debtor often covered the intraday overdraft before the midnight deadline. But several times, it did not, and the provisional settlement became final. The debtor then covered the final overdrafts later. A preference is a transfer of property of the debtor within 90 days before bankruptcy to or for the benefit of a creditor for or on account of an antecedent debt that enables the creditor to receive more than it would have received in a chapter 7 case if the transfer had not been made. A debt is liability on a claim. A claim is a right to payment. Under the U.C.C., a final overdraft is considered an unsecured loan or extension of credit. Therefore, the debtor's deposits to cover final overdrafts were for or on account of an antecedent debt to the bank. A transfer is "to" a creditor only if the creditor is not a mere conduit. A creditor that has dominion and control over the transferred property is not a mere conduit. Once the debtor made deposits into its account, the bank had already honored the check and paid the payee, so the bank had full dominion and control over the new funds. Sarachek v. Luana Sav. Bank (In re AgriProcessors, Inc.), 859 F.3d 599 (8th Cir. 2017).

- 2.2.o Unplanned overdrafts that increased in frequency during the preference period were not debts incurred in the ordinary course. The debtor maintained two accounts with the bank. During the period beginning one year before bankruptcy and ending 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor overdrew its checking account four times, including three times within five months before bankruptcy. Within the 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor overdrew its checking account on nine days. The overdrafts were unplanned, and the bank discouraged them. The bank provisionally settled the overdrafts pending the midnight deadline (midnight of the next business day), and the debtor often covered the intraday overdraft before the midnight deadline. But several times, it did not, and the provisional settlement became final. The debtor then covered the final overdrafts later. A preference is a transfer of property of the debtor within 90 days before bankruptcy to or for the benefit of a creditor for or on account of an antecedent debt that enables the creditor to receive more than it would have received in a chapter 7 case if the transfer had not been made. Under section 547(c)(2), the trustee may not avoid a preference if the debt was "incurred by the debtor in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee." The "ordinary course" test under this provision is the same as under the "ordinary course" test for when a transfer is made in the ordinary course, which depends on the consistency with which the debtor and creditor transacted business. Business practices before the debtor's slide into bankruptcy are more relevant than during the months leading to bankruptcy. Because the overdrafts were unplanned and increased in frequency during the 90-day preference period, they were not in the debtor's and bank's ordinary course of business. Sarachek v. Luana Sav. Bank (In re AgriProcessors, Inc.), 859 F.3d 599 (8th Cir. 2017).
- 2.2.p In applying the greater amount test in a preference action, a court may conduct a hypothetical preference analysis within a hypothetical chapter 7 case. The bank's claim was secured by a security interest in the debtor's deposit account and the bank's setoff right against the account. The debtor sold its real property. On the same day, it paid its bank lender $190,000 and deposited the remaining sale proceeds of $550,000 into its account with the bank. Before the deposit, the account had $170,000. By the petition date five weeks later, the debtor had spent about $135,000 from the account. The trustee sued to recover the payment as a preference. A preference is a transfer of property of the debtor to or for the benefit of a creditor, for or on account of an antecedent debt, within 90 days before bankruptcy, that enabled the creditor to receive more than it would have received if the transfer had not been made and the creditor "received payment of such debt to the extent provided by the provisions of this title." In determining whether the bank received more, the court may conduct a hypothetical preference analysis in the chapter 7 case as if the loan payment had not been made. In this case, if the payment had not been made before bankruptcy, the debtor would have deposited the entire amount into its bank account. The bank would have had a security interest and a setoff right in the account on the petition date. Therefore, the deposit was a transfer that enabled the bank to receive more than if the loan payment had not been made, and the deposit would have been an avoidable preference to the extent of the amount of the loan. Therefore, the loan payment enabled the bank to receive more than if the payment had not been made. Schoenmann v. Bank of the West (In re Tenderloin Health), 849 F.3d 1231 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 2.2.q Section 547 does not apply to a transfer from the debtor's Israeli bank account to its Israeli creditor. The debtor was a New York corporation headquartered in Israel. Within 90 days before its New York bankruptcy, it paid its Israeli lawyer from its Israeli bank account. The bankruptcy trustee sought to avoid the transfer as a preference under section 547. In Morrison v. Nat'l Australia Bank Ltd., 561 U.S. 247 (2010), the Supreme Court established a two-step approach to determine whether the presumption against a statute's extraterritorial application applies to a claim. First, the court must inquire whether "the statute gives a clear, affirmative indication that it applies extraterritorially." If not, the court must determine if the litigation involves a domestic or extraterritorial application of the statute by looking at the statute's focus to determine whether the conduct relevant to the statute's focus occurred within or outside the United States. Section 547 does not contain a clear statement that it applies extraterritorially. Some courts have construed section 547's reference to a transfer of "an interest of the debtor in property" to be co-extensive with the same phrase's reach in section 541(a)(1) and so imported section 541(a)(1)'s reference to "wherever located" into section 547's reference, based on the statement in Begier v. IRS, 496 U.S. 53 (1990), that the phrase includes property that would have become property of the estate if it had not been transferred. However, Begier was intended to limit, not expand, the trustee's avoiding powers, so its reasoning should not stretch section 547's reach to extraterritorial transfers. Turning to the second step, the court concludes that section 547's focus is the initial transfer of property from the debtor. In this case, because that transfer occurred in Israel, section 547 does not reach it, so the court dismisses the complaint. Spizz v. Goldfarb Seligman & Co. (In re Ampal-American Israel Corp.), 562 B.R. 601 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y., 2017).

2.2.r Preference defendant may offset judgment against allowed administrative claim. The creditor received voidable preferences from the debtor. The creditors committee obtained a judgment to avoid and recover the preferences. It continued to supply the debtor in possession after bankruptcy but did not receive full payment for its post-petition supply. It filed and was allowed an administrative expense claim. Setoff requires mutuality. Claims that both arise post-petition are mutual. A preference may be asserted only after bankruptcy, so a preference claim arises post-petition. Therefore, it satisfies mutuality with an administrative expense claim. Section 502(d) requires disallowance of a claim of an entity that is a transferee of a voidable transfer unless the entity pays the amount for which it is liable. However, section 502(d) does not apply to administrative claims. (If trade creditors feared that a preference claim would defeat an administrative expense, they would likely stop supplying on credit post-petition.) Therefore, the preference defendant may offset its liability against its allowed administrative claim. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Tyson Foods, Inc. (In re Quantum Food, LLC), 554 B.R. 729 (Bankr. D. Del. 2016).

2.2.s Funds passing through a lockbox account and re-advanced to the debtor remain subject to a security interest. The debtor granted its inventory supplier a perfected first priority security interest in its accounts and its lender a second priority security interest in the accounts as well as a blanket security interest on other assets. The lender required the debtor to establish a lockbox account, into which the debtor's customers paid their invoices, and in which the lender took a security interest. The lender swept the lockbox daily and advanced funds to the debtor from the debtor's credit line upon the debtor's request. The debtor used the advances to pay the supplier's invoices, among other things. If a debtor transfers to a creditor property in which the creditor has a perfected security interest, there is no preference, because the transfer fails the greater percentage test of section 547(b)(5). The supplier maintained its security interest in the accounts receivable when the customers paid them into the lockbox account, because a perfected security interest continues in identifiable proceeds of collateral, and the funds in the account were proceeds of the receivables. U.C.C. section 9-332(b) provides that "a transferee of funds from a deposit account takes the funds free of a security interest in the deposit account." This provision protects the supplier's security interest in the funds from the lender's security interest in the account, though it does not protect the lender from the supplier's security interest in the funds. Therefore, the supplier's security interest in the funds continues after they are transferred to the lender. U.C.C. section 9-315(b)(2) provides that commingled proceeds "are identifiable proceeds

... to the extent that the secured party identifies the proceeds” by a reasonable tracing measure. While the U.C.C. places that burden on the secured party, section 547(g) places the burden of proof in a preference action on the trustee. Therefore, the trustee needs to show that the lockbox sweep and the lender’s commingling of the funds before being re-loaned to the debtor did not make the proceeds unidentifiable. Because the trustee did not do so here, section 9-315(b) leads to the conclusion that the re-loaned funds that the debtor used to pay the supplier remained subject to the supplier’s security interest. As a result, the supplier payments were not preferences. Garner v. Knoll, Inc. (In re Tusa-Expo Holdings, Inc.), 811 F.3d 786 (5th Cir. 2016).

- 2.2.t Provisional credit does not create an antecedent debt. The debtor did not have sufficient funds in its bank account to cover checks that were presented for payment. The bank provisionally honored the checks and contacted the debtor to deposit funds necessary to cover, which the debtor did the next day. Under U.C.C. section 4-301(1), a bank may provisionally settle a check presented during the day and may still return the check before midnight on the next day. If it does not return by the “midnight deadline,” the settlement is final. A transfer is not a preference unless it is for or on account of an antecedent debt. The bank’s provisional honoring of the check does not create a debt from the debtor to the bank, because the bank can reverse the transaction the next day without any liability to the bank or the debtor. The debt arises only when the bank does not return the check by the midnight deadline. Therefore, the debtor’s deposits into the bank account to cover the provisionally honored checks is not a transfer for or on account of an antecedent debt. Sarachek v. Luana Sav. Bank (In re Agriprocessors, Inc.), 547 B.R. 292 (N.D. Iowa 2016).
- 2.2.u Terminated executive is not an insider. The debtor’s board told its president it was terminating his service on February 1 but for public relations reasons asked him to resign. He did not have an employment or severance agreement. That night, he sent an email from his office with his proposal of what the company should pay upon his resignation, he cleaned out his office and he never returned. The next day, his successor began performing his duties. The board agreed to most of his requests and embodied the agreement in a document signed February 13 and modified in May. The agreement stated his resignation date was March 1. Over the next year, the debtor made numerous payments under the agreement. The debtor filed its bankruptcy petition on February 15 of the next year. Section 548(a)(1)(B)(ii)(IV) permits recovery of certain transfers made or incurred to or for the benefit of an insider. Section 101(31) defines “insider” to include an officer or person in control of the debtor (statutory), and the courts have included anyone who has a sufficiently close relationship such that his conduct should be subject to greater scrutiny (nonstatutory). The debtor’s informing the president that it wished to terminate him and its request for his resignation, combined with his exit that day, terminated his role as an officer. His initial proposal of separation terms did not render him a person in control, even though the board accepted most of the terms. Therefore, he was neither a statutory nor a nonstatutory insider when the agreement was reached or when he received the payments. Weinman v. Walker (In re Adam Aircraft Indus., Inc.), 805 F.3d 888 (10th Cir. 2015).
- 2.2.v Payment to new supplier may qualify for ordinary course of business defense. The debtor mined coal by the “continuous mining” process. It concluded that it could increase production by switching to the “long wall” process. It ordered long-wall mining equipment from a supplier with whom it had never previously done business, agreeing to pay the supplier in installments as the equipment was produced, installed, and tested. It paid an invoice two days before its due date but within 90 days before creditors filed an involuntary petition against it. A trustee may avoid and recover a payment to a creditor on account of an antecedent debt, made while the debtor was insolvent within 90 days before bankruptcy, unless the creditor can show that the debt was incurred and the payment was made in the ordinary course of business of the debtor and creditor. Because the preference exception applies to payments made in the ordinary course of business of the debtor and the creditor, not the ordinary course between the debtor and the creditor, a payment in connection with a new business relationship qualifies for the exception. The test looks at the parties' ordinary course of business in general, not solely the course of business between them. Here, the debtor incurred the debt in operating and trying to improve its business and in the supplier's ordinary course of providing mining equipment to mining companies. The debtor paid the invoice according to its terms, which is in the ordinary course of business. Therefore, the exception applies. Jubber v. SMC Electrical Prods., Inc. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 798 F.3d 983 (10th Cir. 2015).

- 2.2.w DePrizio waiver insulates insider guarantor from preference liability. The debtor's principal guaranteed the debtor's secured loan. In the guarantee, the principal waived all indemnification rights against the debtor that might arise from his payment on the guarantee. When the debtor encountered financial trouble, it sold its assets and turned over the proceeds to the lender. The principal paid the balance under his guarantee. The debtor filed bankruptcy more than 90 days but less than one year later. The trustee sued the principal to recover as a preference the amount the debtor paid the lender from the sale proceeds. Preference liability requires a transfer to or for the benefit of a creditor. Under In re DePrizio, 874 F.2d 1186 (7th Cir. 1989), the debtor's payment of an insider-guaranteed debt within one year before bankruptcy is a preference to the insider because the insider ordinarily has a reimbursement claim against the debtor on account of the payment, making the insider a creditor. If the insider waives any reimbursement claim against the debtor, then the insider would not be a creditor and is not liable for a preference. Some courts have refused to enforce such a "DePrizio waiver" on the ground that it does not effectively waive the claim, because instead of paying on the guarantee, the insider can purchase the full claim from the lender, effectively satisfying the guarantee obligation and preserving a claim against the debtor. In the first court of appeals decision on the enforceability of a DePrizio waiver, the court upholds the waiver's effectiveness in a 2-1 decision, relying on what actually happened in this case, rather than on the policy question based on what could happen. Stahl v. Simon (In re Adamson Apparel, Inc.), 785 F.3d 1285 (9th Cir. 2015).
- 2.2.x Debtor's payment of payroll taxes for its clients identified funds as held in trust and not as property of the debtor. The debtor operated a payroll service. It debited its clients accounts for wages, withholding taxes, and employment taxes under an agreement that required it to hold the tax payments in a tax account until they were due and then remit them to the appropriate taxing authority. However, the debtor transferred funds from the tax account to an operating account and another account that it used for its principals' personal expenditures. Still, it paid some taxes from the various accounts, not just from the tax account. The trustee sought to avoid tax payments made within 90 days before bankruptcy as preferences. A preference is a transfer of property of the debtor. The debtor does not have an equitable interest in property that the debtor holds in trust for another. State law determines the extent of the debtor's property interest and whether the debtor holds property in trust. Under applicable state law here, even though the agreement did not use the word "trust," the debtor and its clients created a trust relationship by their agreement that the debtor would hold the tax funds until the taxes were due and then pay them to the taxing authority; the agreement did not permit the debtor to use the funds for its own purposes. Under applicable state law, the debtor's commingling of the funds did not defeat the trust, and the debtor's payment to the taxing authority identified the funds as trust funds, as the Supreme Court found in Begier v. IRS, 496 U.S. 53 (1990). Therefore, without contrary proof, the law presumes that the funds were held in trust. The debtor lacked an interest in the funds, and they were not property of the debtor, so the payments were not avoidable preferences. Wolff v. U.S. (In re FirstPay, Inc.), 773 F.3d 583 (4th Cir. 2014).
- 2.2.y Settlement agreement's delayed payment provision defeats section 547(c)(1) defense. The debtor settled with a customer by agreeing to accept a return of goods and in exchange to pay the bank's lien and a settlement payment to the customer "no sooner than 15 days after [debtor] receives the lien waiver confirming" the bank's lien release. Five days after the bank issued the lien release, the customer executed a bill of sale to the debtor; seven days later he sent title documents, and 19 days later the debtor sent him a check. The debtor filed bankruptcy within 90 days. The trustee may not recover a transfer as a preference if the transfer was intended to be a contemporaneous exchange for new value and was in fact substantially contemporaneous. Here, the settlement agreement provision for payment “no sooner than 15 days” after the lien release defeated the contemporaneous intent requirement. The transfer was avoidable. Dietz v. Caladrillo (In re Genmar Holdings, Inc.), 776 F.3d 961 (8th Cir. 2015)

2.2.z Payment to senior mortgagee is preference to unsecured junior mortgagee. The debtor was behind on payments to his senior mortgagee. The junior mortgagee was undersecured. Within 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor made 10 payments totaling over $40,000 to the senior mortgagee. Section 547(b) permits a trustee to avoid a transfer of property of the debtor to or for the benefit of a creditor, for or on account of an antecedent debt, made while the debtor was insolvent within 90 days before bankruptcy, that “(5) enables such creditor to receive more than such creditor would receive if (A) the case were a case under chapter 7 of this title, (B) the transfer had not been made, and (C) such creditor received payment of such debt to the extent provided by the provisions of this title.” Although referred to as the liquidation value test, paragraph (5) does not use the word “liquidation.” If the trustee liquidated the house and distributed the sale proceeds, the junior mortgagee would have a smaller secured claim and a larger unsecured claim and would therefore receive more in the chapter 7 case than if the transfers had not been made. However, a chapter 7 trustee rarely liquidates an overencumbered asset; the trustee abandons it. In that case, the junior mortgagee would receive more from the foreclosure sale than if the transfers had not been made, but would not receive it in the chapter 7 case. Instead, in the chapter 7 case, the junior mortgagee would have a smaller unsecured claim and would receive less. The preference law’s purpose is to promote equal treatment and equality of distribution. From that perspective, the transfer diverted more than $40,000 from unsecured creditors to the junior mortgagee. Therefore, the better interpretation of paragraph (5) is the former (liquidation) analysis because it allows the trustee to remedy the harm to other creditors that the preference law addresses. Gladstone v. Bank of America, N.A. (In re Vassau), 499 B.R. 864 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 2013).

2.2.aa Payment of proceeds of bailed property is not a preference. Under an agreement with the creditor, the debtor regularly sold livestock for the creditor, received payment from the buyer, commingled the funds in its general account and was required to pay the creditor. The debtor was slow in paying but ultimately paid all that it owed. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the creditor to avoid the payments as a preference. The trustee may avoid a transfer as a preference if, among other things, the transfer is of an interest of the debtor in property and enables the creditor to receive more than in a liquidation case. Nonbankruptcy law determines what is property of the debtor. “A bailment is the delivery of property for some purpose upon a contract ... that after the purpose has been fulfilled, the property shall be redelivered to the bailor, or otherwise dealt with according to his directions.” In a bailment, the bailee acquires only a possessory interest in the property, so the bailee’s return of the property to the bailor is not a preference, because it does not transfer an interest of the debtor in property. However, because cash is fungible, when the property is converted to cash and commingled with the debtor’s other cash, the bailor must establish a constructive trust to defeat the debtor’s interest in the cash. A constructive trust is a restitution remedy, where a person has obtained money to which he is not entitled and, to prevent unjust enrichment, ought not to retain it. State law determines whether to impose a constructive trust. But the court should measure unjust enrichment of the estate and therefore of the debtor’s other creditors, not of the debtor. The estate might have defenses that the debtor would not have, for example, if the bailor had unclean hands or if the bailor allowed the debtor to appear to own the property. The lowest intermediate balance rule applies to determine how much cash the debtor holds in constructive trust and to limit a restitution claim. The court remands to the bankruptcy court to resolve these issues. In re Miss. Valley Livestock, Inc., 745 F.3d 299 (7th Cir. 2014).

- 2.2.bb Postpetition critical vendor payments do not reduce a creditor's subsequent new value defense under section 547(c)(4)(B). The debtor paid a vendor $80,000 within 90 days before bankruptcy. After the payment, the vendor provided $100,000 of additional services to the debtor for which the debtor did not pay the vendor before bankruptcy. After bankruptcy, the court authorized the debtor in possession to pay the vendor $70,000 for the unpaid prepetition services. Section 547 permits the trustee to avoid a transfer to or for the benefit of a creditor within 90 days before bankruptcy if it enables the creditor to receive more than the creditor would have received in the bankruptcy if the payment had not been made. Section 547(c)(4) allows the creditor a defense to a preference action "to the extent that, after such transfer, the creditor gave new value to or for the benefit of the debtor (A) not secured by an otherwise unavoidable security interest; and (B) on account of which new value the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of such creditor." The court must interpret the Code holistically, based on a broader contextual view, not just on single words or phrases. Thus, section 547(c)(4)'s reference twice to "debtor" rather than estate is not dispositive on whether the section denies the defense for a postpetition payment. Instead, the context shows that section 547(c)(4)(B) relates only to prepetition payments. The section's title, "Preferences," suggests that it concerns only prepetition transactions. The hypothetical liquidation test's application as of the petition date suggests that date as the cutoff for new value determinations. Section 546(a)'s statute of limitations begins to run on the order for relief date. Section 547(c)(5)'s improvement in position test runs only to the petition date. All these factors point to the petition date as a cutoff for applying otherwise unavoidable payments to reduce the creditor's subsequent new value defense. The court also addresses numerous policy considerations in favor of such a reading. Therefore, the trustee may not avoid any of the $80,000 transfer. Friedman's Liquidating Trust v. Roth Staffing Cos. LP (In re Friedman's Inc.), 738 F.3d 547 (3d Cir. 2013).
- 2.2.cc New value defense applies in a tripartite relationship. The debtor provided utility management services to its customers. Among other things, it collected customers' monthly electric utility payments to pay the customers' utilities bills. It contracted with customers to pay within two days after receiving a customer's payment. The debtor used only a single bank account for the payments, but it contracted with its customers that it would have no legal or equitable interest in the customer funds. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor began a Ponzi and check-kiting scheme to conceal diversion of funds and to keep customers advancing their utility payments. The debtor began depleting the bank account every day and no longer paid utilities directly from customers' payments within two days after receipt. After the debtor made payments to the utilities, they provided additional electric service to the debtor's customers, and the customers made additional payments to the debtor. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the utilities to avoid as preferences payments to the utilities made after the debtor had started diverting funds from the accounts. The trustee may avoid a transfer to or for the benefit of a creditor. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel ruled that the utilities were creditors, either as beneficiaries of a trust, where the debtor's depletion of the bank account breached the trust and turned the utilities into general unsecured creditors, or as third-party beneficiaries of the contracts between the debtor and its customers. The parties did not dispute the ruling, so the Court of Appeals accepted it for purposes of this case but said that the ruling should not be relied on. A trustee may not avoid as a preference a payment to a creditor to the extent that "such creditor" provides new value to the debtor after the payment. In a tripartite relationship, however, new value can come from the primary creditor (the customers) by their continuing payments to the debtor, even if the transferee (the utility) is a creditor in its own right, did not provide new value directly to the debtor, and is the sole preference defendant. Therefore, the new value defense protects the utilities to the extent of the additional payments from the customers. Stoebner v. San Diego Gas & Elec. Co. (In re LGI Energy Solutions, Inc.), 746 F.3d 350 (8th Cir. 2014).

- 2.2.dd Section 546(e)'s safe harbor protects an investment advisor's payment to customers of the proceeds of a securities sale. The debtor was both an investment advisor (IA), registered with the SEC, and a futures commission merchant (FCM), registered with the CFTC. Regulations under both regimes require that customer property be segregated from the house's own funds. The debtor invested the funds in segregated common securities pools, rather than in segregation for each customer, from which the debtor bought and sold securities. As it sunk into financial trouble, the debtor breached its segregation requirements and diverted segregated customer funds to its own lender. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor transferred a large pool of securities from the IA seg account to the FCM seg account and sold them to a third party. It used the proceeds and other cash to pay FCM customers. The trustee sought to avoid the payment to those customers as preferences. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a "settlement payment" or a "transfer ... in connection with a securities contract." Exchanging shares for money is a settlement payment. Though the customer did not have a right to a specific security, the debtor's payment settled the customer's securities account with the debtor. Therefore, it was a settlement payment. A securities contract includes a contract for the purchase or sale of a security. The customer's agreement with the debtor authorized the debtor to purchase and sell securities consistent with specified guidelines and was therefore a securities contract. Therefore, the payment was in connection with a securities contract. Congress enacted the section 546(e) safe harbor to insulate legitimate securities and commodities transactions from the potentially destabilizing effect of later avoidance, especially when a debtor buys or sells a security right before bankruptcy. Congress chose finality over equity for prepetition securities industry transactions not involving actual fraud. Thus, section 546(e) applies and protects the payment from avoidance as a preference. Grede v. FCStone, LLC, 746 F.3d 244 (7th Cir. 2014).
- 2.2.ee The filing of a lis pendens is not a transfer. The creditor sued the debtor to reform a mortgage on the debtor's property that mistakenly named the debtor's principal as the mortgagor. Within 90 days, the debtor filed bankruptcy. It sought to avoid the lis pendens as a preference. A preference requires a transfer of an interest in property of the debtor. Section 101(54) defines "transfer" as each mode of disposing of or parting with property or an interest in property. Federal law thus defines what constitutes a transfer, but state law defines property and interests in property. Under applicable state law, a lis pendens provides only notice to the world of the plaintiff's claimed interest in the property and permits the plaintiff's ultimate judgment, once obtained, to rank ahead of all intervening interest holders, but grants no interests in the property to the plaintiff. Therefore, the filing of the lis pendens is not a preferential transfer. Ute Mesa Lot 1, LLC v. First-Citizens Bank & Trust Co. (In re Ute Mesa Lot 1, LLC), 736 F.3d 947 (10th Cir. 2013).
- 2.2.ff Debt is incurred in the ordinary course if the transaction is ordinary, whether or not common. A coal mining debtor purchased on account a longwall electric system to construct a longwall mining operation, which differed from the continuous mining operation that the debtor had previously conducted, from a supplier who regularly sells such systems. The trustee sought to avoid the debtor's payment to the supplier as a preference. Section 547(c)(2) provides an avoidance defense "to the extent that the transfer was in payment of a debt incurred in by the debtor in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee" and the payment was in the ordinary course. A debt is incurred in the ordinary course if the transaction is an arm's-length, commercial transaction that occurred in the marketplace, rather than, for example, an insider transaction. Whether the debtor has incurred similar debt or debt for a similar purpose is not relevant. "The transaction need not have been common; it need only be ordinary." Therefore, this debt was incurred in the ordinary course of the debtor's business. Rushton v. SMC Electrical Prods., Inc. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 500 B.R. 635 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2013).
- 2.2.gg Posting loan proceeds to secured letter of credit to secure new contract is not a preference. As a government contractor, the debtor needed to post surety bonds to secure its performance obligations. Its surety refused an additional bond the debtor needed for a new contract unless it received collateral for the new bond and for the debtor's contingent obligations under the existing bonds. The debtor obtained a letter of credit in favor of the surety and borrowed cash to cash collateralize the letter of credit. Once the debtor posted the letter of credit, the surety issued the bond and the debtor received the new contract. The debtor filed bankruptcy within 90 days. The trustee may avoid as a preference a transfer of property of the debtor for or on account of an antecedent debt, made within 90 days before bankruptcy, that enables the creditor to a greater percentage than if the transfer had not been made. However, under the "earmarking doctrine," if the property passes from a new creditor to the transferee creditor, whether or not through the debtor's hands first, the transfer is not a preference. The theory is that the property never became property of the debtor but was used by the new creditor to "buy" the old creditor's claim, although the court here says that the transfer is not avoidable because it "does not diminish the estate." Here, the cash went from the new lender, through the debtor, to the surety, but not to satisfy an antecedent debt owing to the surety. Therefore, the earmarking defense does not apply. Rather, the court looks to the contemporaneous exchange defense (which the court refers to as the "new value" defense). Under section 547(c)(1), the trustee may not avoid a transfer to the extent it was intended to be a contemporaneous exchange for new value given to the debtor and in fact was a substantially contemporaneous exchange. "New value" means "money or money's worth in goods, services, or new credit, or release ... of property previously transferred" The defense applies even where a third party provides the debtor the new value, as long as it offsets the loss in value to the estate resulting from the transfer of property of the debtor. The debtor received the new government contract, which the court valued as worth at least as much as the transferred property. Therefore, the defense applies. A dissent argues that a contract confers only the right to receive money in the future and therefore should not count as new value, as that term is defined. The majority rules that the contract is an asset that has inherent value. Campbell v. The Hanover Ins. Co. (In re ESA Enviro. Specialists, Inc.), 709 F.3d 389 (4th Cir. 2013).

- 2.2.hh An insurance premium payment to an insurance agent who was contingently liable to the insurer was to and for the benefit of the agent. The debtor purchased insurance through an insurance agent. The agent's contract with the insurer required the agent to hold all premiums that it collected in a segregated trust account for the insurer, but if the insured failed to pay, the agent remained liable to the insurer for the premiums. The debtor made several past-due payments to the agent within 90 days before bankruptcy. Among the elements of a preference is that the debtor's transfer be made to or for the benefit of a creditor. The holder of a contingent claim is a creditor. The agent was contingently liable to the insurer if the debtor did not pay the premium, and through subrogation, had a contingent claim against the debtor for any premium that the agent paid to the insurer. In addition, the debtor's payment to the agent, in trust for the insurer, relieved the agent of its contingent liability to the insurer. Therefore, the agent was a creditor. The debtor's payments were both to and for the benefit of the agent. Therefore, the payments met that preference element. Guttman v. Construction Program Group (In re Railworks Corp.), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95627 (D. Md. July 8, 2013).
- 2.2.ii Honoring a check before the midnight deadline is not a preference. When a payee presents a check to its own bank, the bank passes the check through the clearinghouse system, which provisionally credits the payee bank and provisionally debits the payor bank. The payor bank has until midnight on the next banking day to determine whether to honor the check or return it. Under U.C.C. 4-215, payment of the check is final when the payor bank pays it in cash, irrevocably settles it or fails to revoke the provisional settlement before the midnight deadline. In this case, the debtor's bank received numerous provisionally settled checks from the clearinghouse when the debtor did not have sufficient funds in the account to cover them. Each day, before the midnight deadline, the bank contacted the debtor to advise how much was needed to fund the checks that had been presented. On most days, the debtor funded the account, and its bank did not dishonor the checks by the midnight deadline and allowed them to clear. On some days, however, when the debtor did not fund the account, the bank dishonored the checks. The trustee sued the bank to avoid the debtor's deposits to cover the "intraday" overdrafts as preferences. The trustee may avoid a transfer as a preference if the transfer is for or on account of an antecedent debt. A debt is a liability on a claim, and a claim is a right to payment. Under U.C.C. 4-215, the bank did not have a claim against the debtor until it had honored a check. The provisional settlement, which is automatic in the banking system, did not amount to honoring a check. Therefore, until the midnight deadline, the bank did not have a claim, and the debtor's transfers to fund the account were not for or on account of an antecedent debt. Sarachek v. Luana Sav. Bank (In re Agriprocessors, Inc.), 490 B.R. 852 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 2013).

- 2.2.jj Private placement note purchase is exempt under section 546(e) from preference avoidance. The debtor's finance subsidiary issued private placement notes under a note purchase agreement. The agreement permitted prepayment by the issuer and purchase by its affiliates, two of whom had guaranteed the notes. Once the notes were paid in full, the holders were required to surrender the notes to the issuer for cancellation. Within 90 days before bankruptcy, a guarantor sent notice to the holders of purchase of the notes. The guarantor transferred the purchase price to the notes trustee, which was a bank. The notes trustee wired the funds to the noteholders, who then sent the notes to the guarantor for cancellation. Section 546(e) exempts from avoidance as a preference a transfer in connection with a securities contract to or for the benefit of a financial institution. Section 741(7) defines securities contract as "a contract for the purchase ... of a security" Section 101(49)(A)(i) defines security to include a note. The note purchase agreement provided for the initial sale and for the affiliate to purchase the notes. The payment was a transfer to purchase the notes and therefore was made in connection with a securities contract. The transfer was made to a financial institution, even though the notes trustee did not have a beneficial interest in the notes or the payment and was a mere conduit. Such a construction furthers section 546(e)'s purpose, because unwinding a payment made through a bank could be as disruptive to the financial markets as a payment for the bank's benefit. Therefore, the payment is exempt from avoidance as a preference. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Am. U. Life Ins. Co. (In re Quebecor World (USA) Inc.), 719 F.3d 94 (2d Cir. 2013).
- 2.2.kk Payment of proceeds of bailed property is not a preference. Under an agreement with the creditor, the debtor regularly sold livestock for the creditor, received payment from the buyer, commingled the funds in its general account and was required to pay the creditor. The debtor was slow in paying but ultimately paid all that it owed. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the creditor to avoid the payments as a preference. The trustee may avoid a transfer as a preference if, among other things, the transfer is of an interest of the debtor in property and enables the creditor to receive more than in a liquidation case. Nonbankruptcy law determines what property of the debtor is. "A bailment is the delivery of property for some purpose upon a contract ... that after the purpose has been fulfilled, the property shall be redelivered to the bailor." In a bailment, the bailee acquires only a possessory interest in the property. Commingling of funds does not defeat a bailment. Here, because the debtor and the creditor agreed that the debtor was selling the creditor's livestock only as an accommodation for the creditor, the debtor did not acquire any interest in the livestock or its proceeds. Therefore, the payment was not a transfer of an interest in property of the debtor and was not avoidable as a preference. Miss. Valley Livestock, Inc. v. J & R Farms, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14865 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 18, 2013).
- 2.2.ll Exchange Act definitions do not apply in determining insider status in bankruptcy. An investment bank financed an LBO through multiple entities. Four funds that the bank managed acquired 19.8% of the stock of a holding company that acquired 75% of the debtor. A bank affiliate appointed one director of the debtor, and another affiliate had a management contract with the debtor. At one point, the debtor refinanced an unsecured bridge loan that had financed the LBO with a secured loan and used some of the secured loan proceeds to repay a bank affiliate about five months before bankruptcy. The LBO failed, and the target filed bankruptcy. The debtor confirmed a plan, which vested in the reorganized debtor certain avoiding power claims against the bank's affiliates. The reorganized debtor sought to recover the payment to the bank affiliate as an insider preference. A corporation's insider is an entity that is a director, officer or person in control of the debtor or an "affiliate, or an insider of an affiliate as if such affiliate were the debtor". An affiliate is an entity that holds or controls 20% or more of the debtor's equity securities. The bank lenders were not the debtor's affiliates, nor were the funds, which held only 19.8% of a 75% equity interest in the debtor. Rules issued under section 13 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, which aggregate share holdings of persons who agree to act together for purposes of applying section 13, by their terms do not apply in applying Bankruptcy Code definition. State, rather than federal, veil-piercing law may apply in determining whether more than one related entity should be combined to apply the Code's insider definition, but veil-piercing law requires not only complete dominion and control and disregard of corporate separateness, but also that the corporate form was used to perpetrate some form of fraud or injustice. The facts alleged in the complaint here do not support any grounds for treating the bank lenders as insiders, so the court dismisses the complaint. Capmark Fin. Group Inc. v. Goldman Sachs Credit P'ners L.P., 491 B.R. 335 (S.D.N.Y. 2013).

2.2.mm Section 546(e) does not apply to customer withdrawals from its FCM account with the debtor. The statutes and regulations governing futures commission merchants and investment advisors require that they segregate customer funds. The debtor was both. It provided investment services for other FCM's, who sent their own customer funds to the debtor for investment. The debtor invested the funds in segregated common securities pools, rather than in segregation for each customer, from which the debtor bought and sold securities. As it sunk into financial trouble, the debtor breached its segregation requirements and diverted segregated customer funds to its own lender. Shortly before bankruptcy, it transferred some of the remaining segregated funds to a customer. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a transfer that is a "settlement payment" or a "transfer ... in connection with a securities contract". Congress enacted the section 546(e) safe harbor to insulate legitimate securities and commodities transactions from the potentially destabilizing effect of later avoidance, especially when a debtor buys or sells a security right before bankruptcy. Where a debtor is a financial institution that buys or sells securities on behalf of third parties, especially other financial institutions, application of the safe harbor could have a destabilizing effect itself, because it could permit the debtor's arbitrary, unpredictable actions to prevent equal treatment of its customers. Although the court does not address directly the question of whether the transfer was a settlement payment or a transfer in connection with a securities contract, it notes that the relevant securities transaction here was between the debtor and a third party, not the customer, that the legislative history does not suggest that the safe harbor was intended to govern the debtor's distribution of proceeds of a securities transaction to a third party, and that customer deposits and withdrawals with the debtor did not affect the settlement payments chain. Grede v. FCStone, LLC, 485 B.R. 854 (N.D. Ill. 2013).

2.2.nn Payment of liquidation sale proceeds to a lender with an unperfected security interest is avoidable. The bank perfected its security interest in inventory and receivables shortly after the debtor agreed to conduct a going-out-of-business sale. The debtor fully paid the bank's claim from the sale proceeds, leaving a small amount remaining for the debtor. An involuntary petition was filed against the debtor 90 days after the bank perfected its security interest. The trustee sued to avoid the payments to the bank as preferences. A trustee may avoid a transfer of property of the debtor to or for the benefit of a creditor for or on account of an antecedent debt made within 90 days before bankruptcy if it enabled the creditor to receive more than it would have received in a liquidation case. Section 547(c)(5) provides a defense for "creation of a perfected security interest in inventory or a receivable or the proceeds of either, except to the extent that the aggregate of all such transfer ... caused a reduction, as of the date of the filing of the petition [of the amount by which the creditor was undersecured] ... 90 days before the date of the filing of the petition". The test applies from the beginning of the preference period. A creditor who enters the preference period unperfected is deemed to be fully unsecured at the beginning of the period, so that any transfer of inventory, receivables or their proceeds to the creditor reduces the amount by which the creditor is undersecured. Because the bank's security interest was unperfected at the beginning of the 90-day period, the defense does not apply. Section 547(c)(2) provides a defense for a transfer made in the ordinary course of business or according to ordinary business terms. Payments from a going-out-of-business sale are not in the ordinary course or according to ordinary business terms, so this defense does not apply either. Velde v. Border State Bank (In re Hovdebray Enterps.), 483 B.R. 187 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

- 2.2.oo An interim trustee appointment does not extend section 546(a) statute of limitation. The court converted the chapter 11 case to chapter 7, and the U.S. trustee appointed an interim chapter 7 trustee under section 701, one day short of two years after the petition date. The creditors did not elect a permanent trustee under section 702, so the interim trustee became the permanent trustee by operation of section 702 after the section 341 meeting, about six weeks later. Section 546(a)'s avoiding power action statute of limitation runs on the later of two years after the petition date or "1 year after the appointment or election of the first trustee under section 702". An interim trustee is appointed under section 701, not section 702. Therefore, the statute of limitations reference to section 702 limits the one-year extension to circumstances in which the permanent trustee is appointed or elected within the two-year period after the petition date. Section 702 provides for election of a trustee, not appointment, but also provides that if creditors do not elect a trustee, then the interim trustee becomes the permanent trustee. The section 546(a) reference to section 702 should be read to include the automatic appointment of the permanent trustee, or else an elected trustee could be disadvantaged, and creditors might have an incentive not to elect a trustee, contrary to section 702's election authorization. Fogel v. Shabat (In re Draiman), 714 F.3d 462 (7th Cir. 2013).
- 2.2.pp Liquidating trustee has standing to pursue claims after confirmation only if the plan or disclosure statement identifies the defendants and the claims. The debtor's plan provided for distributions on unsecured claims from a litigation trust. The plan vested the trust with the debtor in possession's avoiding power claims, referencing all avoiding power claims "that may exist against any party identified on Exhibits 3(b) and (c) of the Debtor's statements of financial affairs", excluding any claim released under the plan. After confirmation, the liquidating trustee brought numerous avoiding power claims. After confirmation, the debtor in possession loses its status and its standing to pursue avoiding power claims unless the plan provides for retention of the claims, and the plan or disclosure statement contains a specific and unequivocal reservation of the claims. It is sufficient (though not necessarily a requirement) that the prospective defendants and the natures of the claims are identified. It is not necessary that the plan state that the defendants will be sued, only that they may be sued. The plan here met the requirements, so the liquidating trustee has standing to proceed. Compton v. Anderson (In re MPF Holdings US LLC), 701 F.3d 449 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 2.2.qq A trust beneficiary becomes a creditor for preference purposes when the debtor breaches the trust. The debtor provided utility management services to its customers. Among other things, it collected customers' monthly electric utility payments to pay to the customers' utilities bills. It contracted with customers to pay within two days after receiving the customer's payment. The debtor used only a single bank account for the payments, but it contracted with its customers that it would have no legal or equitable interest in the customer funds. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor began a Ponzi and check-kiting scheme to conceal diversion of funds and to keep customers advancing their utility payments. The debtor began depleting the bank account every day and no longer paid utilities directly from customers' payments within two days after receipt. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the utilities to avoid as preferences payments to the utilities made after the debtor had started diverting funds from the accounts. A trustee may avoid as a preference only a payment to a creditor that is for or on account of an antecedent debt owed to that creditor. The utilities were originally beneficiaries of a trust, but the debtor's depletion of the bank account breached the trust and turned the utilities into general unsecured creditors. Alternatively, the utilities were creditors as third-party beneficiaries of the contracts between the debtor and its customers. A claim against a debtor (and therefore the debtor's debt to the creditor) arises as soon as the creditor would have a right to payment, even if the payment is not immediately due. Thus, the utilities were creditors of the debtor during the two-day delay between the customer's payment to the debtor and the debtor's obligation to pay the utilities. Thus, the debtor's payments to the utilities were for or on account of an antecedent debt and avoidable as preferences. Stoebner v. San Diego Gas & Elec. Co. (In re LGI Energy Solutions, Inc.), 482 B.R. 809 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

2.2.rr Claimant may not use tracing fictions in a futures commission merchant bankruptcy to identify "out of seg" property as trust property. The debtor was both an investment advisor (IA), registered with the SEC, and a futures commission merchant (FCM), registered with the CFTC. Regulations under both regimes require that customer property be segregated from the house's own funds. The debtor created separate segregation accounts for separate customer groups, based on the types of securities in which they invested. Consistent with applicable regulations, the debtor pooled each group's securities for all customer accounts in that group. Predictably, however, when the debtor encountered financial trouble, it went "out of seg" (segregation), and as its financial condition worsened, in increasing amounts. Shortly before bankruptcy, it transferred a large pool of securities from an IA seg account to an FCM seg account and sold them to a third party. It used the proceeds and other cash both before and after bankruptcy to pay the FCM customers. The trustee sought to avoid the payment to the customers as preferences and as avoidable postpetition transfers. The trustee may avoid such payments only if the property that the debtor transferred was "property of the debtor" (preference) or "property of the estate" (postpetition transfer). Property is property of the debtor if it would have become property of the estate in the absence of the transfer. Section 541(a) includes as property of the estate all of the debtor's interests in property as of the commencement of the case. State law determines what interest the debtor has in property, unless federal interests require application of federal law. Here, federal securities regulation expresses a strong federal interest in enforcing regulatory segregation requirements, so federal law should determine ownership. Property that the debtor holds in trust is not property of the estate. IA and CFTC regulations create statutory trusts over customer funds. However, it is not a floating trust on funds that the debtor holds. Therefore, to establish the trust, the customer must trace the funds. Where the trust property has been commingled, the customer becomes merely a creditor. The customer may use tracing fictions (such as the lowest intermediate balance rule), but only to determine what property is the debtor's and what is the customer's, not to determine ownership claims between competing claimants. Here, the dispute is between the IA and FCM customers, so neither may use tracing fictions. Because the customers were not able to trace the funds without the use of tracing fictions, the property that the debtor transferred was property of the debtor or of the estate, allowing the trustee to avoid the transfers. Grede v. FCStone, LLC, 485 B.R. 854 (N.D. Ill. 2013).

2.2.ss New value defense applies in a tripartite relationship. The debtor provided utility management services to its customers. Among other things, it collected customers' monthly electric utility payments to pay the customers' utilities bills. It contracted with customers to pay within two days after receiving a customer's payment. The debtor used only a single bank account for the payments, but it contracted with its customers that it would have no legal or equitable interest in the customer funds. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor began a Ponzi and check-kiting scheme to conceal diversion of funds and to keep customers advancing their utility payments. The debtor began depleting the bank account every day and no longer paid utilities directly from customers' payments within two days after receipt. After the debtor made payments to the utilities, they provided additional electric service to the debtor's customers. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the utilities to avoid as preferences payments to the utilities made after the debtor had started diverting funds from the accounts. A trustee may not avoid as a preference a payment to a creditor to the extent that "such creditor" provides new value to the debtor after the payment. In a tripartite relationship, however, new value can come from the primary creditor (the customers) by their continuing payments to the debtor, even if the transferee (the utility) is a creditor in its own right and did not provide new value directly to the debtor. Therefore, the new value defense protects the utilities to the extent of the additional electric service to the customers, not only to the extent of the customers' payments to the debtor after the debtor's payments to the utilities. Stoebner v. San Diego Gas & Elec. Co. (In re LGI Energy Solutions, Inc.), 482 B.R. 809 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

2.2.tt Ordinary course preference defense is based on the entire relationship between the debtor and the supplier. The debtor purchased goods from the supplier for about 27 months before bankruptcy. It regularly paid the supplier's invoices from 31 to 41 days after issuance. The debtor encountered a liquidity event about one year before bankruptcy. It then started paying invoices regularly from 44 to 51 days after issuance. The trustee sought to avoid payments within the 90 days before bankruptcy as preferences. A trustee may not avoid a payment made in the debtor's ordinary course of business according to ordinary business terms. The court should review the entire payment history between the debtor and the creditor, not just the prior 12 months' history. Here, the longer payment terms reflected the debtor's worsened financial condition, not a new "ordinary" course. Therefore, the payments on longer terms were not made in the ordinary course of business and were avoidable. Siegel v. Russellville Steel Co., Inc. (In re Circuit City Stores, Inc.), 479 B.R. 703 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2012).

2.2.uu Private placement note prepayment is exempt under section 546(e) from preference avoidance. The debtor had issued private placement notes under a note purchase agreement, which permitted prepayment. Upon prepayment, the holders were required to surrender the notes to the debtor for cancellation. An event of default under the notes occurred, which would have permitted the debtor's principal lender to call a cross-default under the debtor's credit line. To prevent the cross-default, within 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor borrowed under its bank credit line and transferred the funds to another bank, which was the notes trustee. The trustee wired the funds to the noteholders, who then sent the notes to the debtor for cancellation. Section 546(e) exempts from avoidance as a preference a transfer that is a settlement payment to or for the benefit of a financial institution. A settlement payment is a transfer of cash to complete a securities transaction. Section 101(49)(A)(i) defines security to include a note. The definition of settlement payment is not limited to payments made through a settlement process, such as a clearing house or other central intermediary, but includes payments made to a financial institution as indenture trustee for the notes. In addition, section 546(e) exempts a transfer made in connection with a securities contract. A securities contract is a contract providing for the purchase, sale or loan of a security. The debtor made the prepayment in accordance with the prepayment provisions in the original note purchase agreement, which is a securities contract. Therefore, the payment is exempt from avoidance as a preference. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Am. U. Life Ins. Co. (In re Quebecor World (USA) Inc.), 480 B.R. 468 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

2.2.vv Section 546(e) safe harbor does not protect an investment advisor's payment to customers of the proceeds of a securities sale. The debtor was both an investment advisor (IA), registered with the SEC, and a futures commission merchant (FCM), registered with the CFTC. Regulations under both regimes require that customer property be segregated from the house's own funds. The debtor created separate segregation accounts for separate customer groups, based on the types of securities in which they invested. Consistent with applicable regulations, the debtor pooled each group's securities for all customer accounts in that group. Predictably, however, when the debtor encountered financial trouble, it went "out of seg" (segregation), and as its financial condition worsened, in increasing amounts. The result prevented customers from identifying the property as customer trust property. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor transferred a large pool of securities from the IA seg account to the FCM seg account and sold them to a third party. It used the proceeds and other cash to pay FCM customers. The trustee sought to avoid the payment to those customers as preferences. Section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding a "settlement payment" or a "transfer ... in connection with a securities contract". The transfer is not a transfer "in connection with a securities contract" because it was not directly tied to the purchase or sale of securities, but was a redemption from the general pool of customer property. The transfer is not a "settlement payment", because it did not "settle" the sale of the securities. More generally, Congress did not intend to protect this kind of transfer, because it is one step removed from the systemic risks concerns that animated the safe harbor. Grede v. FCStone, LLC, 485 B.R. 854 (N.D. Ill. 2013).

- 2.2.ww Contractual arbitration clause does not apply to avoiding power actions. The debtor's engagement agreement with its accountant contained a broad arbitration clause. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the accountant to avoid preferences. The Federal Arbitration Act requires enforcement of a contractual arbitration clause, but does not otherwise substitute arbitration for traditional means of adjudication. A trustee's ability to avoid certain prepetition transfers does not exist before bankruptcy; it vests solely in the trustee, not in the debtor. An arbitration clause in the debtor's prepetition agreement applies only to disputes between the debtor and the counterparty. Therefore, the arbitration clause here does not apply to the trustee's avoiding power action against the accountant. Kelley v. Eide Bailly, LLP (In re Petters Co., Inc.), 480 B.R. 346 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2012).
- 2.2.xx A payment on an electricity supply contract is exempt from preference avoidance. The debtor contracted with a power supply company to purchase "full electric requirements" for two years at a fixed price. After falling behind on payments, the debtor made a catch-up payment within 90 days before bankruptcy. The trustee sued to recover the payment as a preference. Section 546(e) exempts from preference avoidance "a settlement payment ... made by or to [a] ... forward contract merchant ... in connection with ... a forward contract." Section 101(25) defines "forward contract" as "a contract ... for the purchase, sale, or transfer of a commodity." The definition is not limited to a contract that specifies a specific quantity or delivery date. Therefore, the electricity supply contract in this case qualifies as a forward contract, and the payment is exempt from avoidance as a preference. Lightfoot v. MXEnergy Electric, Inc. (In re MRS Mgmt. Servs., Inc.), 690 F.3d 352 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 2.2.yy Reimbursement of a letter of credit draw that was used to redeem bonds is not a settlement payment. The debtor was indirectly liable on industrial revenue bonds. The bank had issued an annually renewable letter of credit to the bond indenture trustee, which the indenture trustee could draw if the debtor defaulted on its obligations or if the bank refused to renew the LC. The bank gave the indenture trustee notice of non-renewal. The debtor then directed the indenture trustee to redeem the bonds and deposited the amount of the redemption payment in its account at the bank. The indenture trustee sent bondholders a redemption notice, and when they tendered the bonds, drew on the LC for funds to redeem the bonds. After the draw, the bank debited the debtor's account to reimburse itself for the LC draw. The debtor filed bankruptcy less than 90 days later. The trustee sued the bank to avoid the debtor's deposit into its account and the bank's account debit as a preference. Section 546(e) prohibits the trustee from avoiding as a preference a "settlement payment" or a "payment in connection with a securities contract". "Settlement payment" is broadly defined as a payment to complete a securities transaction. The court must examine each transaction in a series to determine whether it is a settlement payment, even if the series results in a securities transaction. Here, the debtor's payment to the bank was to fulfill an obligation to reimburse the bank for the LC draw, which is a transaction that was independent from the bond redemption. Therefore, neither the deposit nor the debit was a settlement payment. EPLG I, LLC v. Citibank, N.A. (In re Qimonda Richmond, LLC), 467 B.R. 318 (Bankr. D. Del. 2012).

2.2.zz Court may extend time for service of preference complaint until after plan confirmation.

The debtor in a complex chapter 11 case needed more time to develop a plan. The bankruptcy court, after notice to all potential defendants, granted the debtor in possession authority to file an omnibus preference complaint against over 400 defendants and to delay service of the summons and complaint until after plan confirmation. The debtor hoped that a 100% plan might obviate the need for preference actions, and it did not want the preference litigation to interfere with the plan process. The debtor in possession filed the complaint within the two-year statute of limitations. Consistent with the court's order, the creditors trust, which succeeded to the avoiding power actions, did not serve the complaint on each defendant until after plan confirmation, nearly three years after the statute of limitations had expired. After service, the court authorized bifurcation of the complaint for administrative convenience, and the trustee filed amended complaints against the defendants. Rule 7004, incorporating Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 4(m), requires service of the complaint within 120 days. Rule 9006 authorizes the court to enlarge a time period set by the Rules for cause. The court did so here by its original order authorizing the omnibus complaint and the delay in service. The effort to develop and confirm a plan that would have obviated the need for preference actions provided good cause for the delay. Therefore, the statute of limitations did not bar the action. U.S. Bank Nat'l Assoc. v. SMF Energy Corp. (In re Interstate Bakeries Corp.), 460 B.R. 222 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

2.2.aaa A prepetition real property foreclosure sale may result in an avoidable preference.

The debtor's lender foreclosed on real property within 90 days before bankruptcy in a regularly conducted, noncollusive foreclosure sale. The lender purchased the property for a credit bid of about half of the debt. The debtor in possession brought an action to avoid the foreclosure as a preference, alleging that the property's fair market value was substantially higher than the debt. The creditor filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. A preference is a transfer of the debtor's property to or for the benefit of a creditor within 90 days before bankruptcy on account of an antecedent debt that enables the creditor to receive more than it would receive in a chapter 7 liquidation case if the transfer had not been made. The foreclosure sale is a transfer that may meet all of these elements. In re BFP, Inc., 511 U.S. 531 (1994), ruled that a regularly conducted, noncollusive foreclosure sale produced "reasonably equivalent value" for purposes of section 548(a)(1)(B), recognizing that a foreclosure sale seldom produces a fair market value purchase price, in part to prevent a cloud on titles of real estate that had gone through foreclosure. Section 547 differs, and the statutory language controls. Section 547 does not use "reasonably equivalent value". Rather, the test is whether the creditor received more than it would have received in a hypothetical chapter 7 case. A trustee is more likely to conduct a more measured, better-marketed sale if there is equity in the property, so it may be possible that a creditor foreclosing on valuable property received more through the foreclosure sale. The potential cloud on title is limited, because the preference reach-back period is only 90 days, and the trustee may not recover from a third party buyer, only from the creditor. Therefore, the motion to dismiss is denied. Whittle Dev. Inc v. Branch Banking & Trust Co. (In re Whittle Dev. Inc.), 463 B.R. 796 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2011).

2.2.bbb Court may extend time for service of preference complaint until after plan confirmation.

2.2.ccc Bailed property becomes property of the debtor if it is commingled and untraceable. The debtor provided utility management services to its customers. Among other things, it collected customer's monthly electric payments to pay to their utilities, usually within two days after receiving a customer's payment. The debtor used only a single bank account for the payments and contracted with its customers that it would have no legal or equitable interest in the customer funds. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor began a Ponzi and check-kiting scheme to conceal diversion of funds and to keep customers advancing their utility payments. The debtor no longer paid utilities directly from customers' payments within a day or two after receipt. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the utilities who received payments to avoid the payments as preferences. A preference is a transfer of property of the debtor. For this purpose, "property of the debtor" is property that would have become property of the estate if the transfer had not been made. Property that the debtor holds in trust does not become property of the estate. Money that the debtor holds as an agent or bailee does not become property of the estate. However, the debtor holds property as a bailee only if the property is specifically identifiable as the bailor's property. If the debtor commingles the property and treats it as its own, even if in breach of an agreement with the bailor, it become property of the debtor. Therefore, if the bailor (or, in this case, the preference defendants) could not trace the source of the money used to pay the defendants, then the property was property of the debtor, and the payments are subject to avoidance and recovery as preferences. Stoebner v. Consumers Energy Co. (In re LGI Energy Solutions, Inc.), 460 B.R. 720 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

2.2.ddd Excluded LLC member remains an insider. The controlling member of the LLC debtor caused the debtor to deny access to its business records to a member of the LLC and of its board of managers. The member sued for access. The board then formally voted to suspend the member's access pending an investigation. The member and the board settled their dispute, with the member resigning from the board and the LLC paying the member $200,000 on the same day. The LLC filed bankruptcy four months later. The trustee may recover a transfer as a preference if the debtor made the transfer to an insider within a year before bankruptcy. The Code defines "insider" to include a director or person in control of the debtor. Courts have construed "insider" to include others, not listed in the definition, under a "similarity" approach and a "control" approach. Under the former approach, an individual is an insider if he holds a position similar to one of the listed positions. The member of an LLC board of managers holds a position similar to a director of a corporation, in that each is statutorily authorized to manage the affairs of the LLC or corporation, although the individual's title is not dispositive if the individual does not in fact have the legal rights to manage the entity. Here, though the LLC denied the member access to its business records, the member remained a member of the board until after he received the $200,000 payment. Therefore, he was an insider when the debtor made the transfer. In re Longview Aluminum, L.L.C., 657 F.3d 507 (7th Cir. 2011).

- 2.2.eee Private placement note prepayment is exempt from preference avoidance under section 546(e). The debtor had issued private placement notes, which permitted prepayment. Upon prepayment, the holders were required to surrender the notes to the debtor for cancellation. An event of default under the notes occurred, which would have permitted the debtor's principal lender to call a default under the debtor's credit line. To prevent the cross-default, within 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor borrowed under its bank credit line and transferred the funds to another bank, which was the notes trustee. The trustee wired the funds to the noteholders, who then sent the notes to the debtor for cancellation. Section 546(e) exempts from avoidance as a preference a transfer that is a settlement payment to or for the benefit of a financial institution. Section 546(e) does not distinguish among the possible capacities in which the financial institution might receive the payment. A settlement payment is a transfer of cash to complete a securities transaction. The definition of settlement payment is not limited to payments made through a settlement process, such as a clearing house or other central intermediary. Section 101(49)(A)(i) defines security to include a note. Whether or not the notes trustee was a mere conduit for the payment, the debtor made the transfer to the bank. Therefore, the payment is expressly exempt from avoidance as a preference. In addition, because of the size of the payments and because the notes were issued in the active private placement market, the exemption is consistent with Congress's intent in section 546(e) to protect the securities markets broadly. Official Comm. Of Unsecured Creditors v. Am. U. Life Ins. Co. (In re Quebecor World (USA) Inc.), 453 B.R. 201 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 2.2.fff The definition of "new value" in section 547(c)(2) does not depend on the debtor's use of the funds. The individual debtor and his law firm, also a debtor, maintained two banking relationships: one of the banks held the account from which the law firm conducted a Ponzi scheme. The law firm borrowed from the other bank and granted it additional collateral. The firm transferred the loan proceeds to the first bank and from there repaid a Ponzi scheme investor. The trustee sued the lending bank to avoid the granting of the lien on the additional collateral as a preference. The trustee may not avoid a preference if the debtor and the transferee intended the transfer to be, and the transfer in fact was, a substantially contemporaneous exchange for new value. The definition of "new value" does not depend on the debtor's use of the funds. Thus, the fact that the debtor used the funds to pay an antecedent unsecured debt to another creditor does not prevent the lending bank from using the defense that it gave new value to the debtor. Gowan v. Wachovia Bank, N.A. (In re Dreier LLP), 453 B.R. 499 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Aug. 3, 2011).
- 2.2.ggg Floating lien preference exception does not apply to unperfected security interest. The creditor's loans to the debtor were secured by a security interest in the debtor's accounts receivable. The creditor did not properly file a financing statement to perfect the security interest until 27 days before the debtor's bankruptcy. The loan amount exceeded the receivables' value 90 days before the bankruptcy. Section 547(c)(5)(A) provides a floating lien secured creditor with a defense to preference avoidance to the extent that the transfer of a security interest in receivables during the 90-day period did not cause "a reduction, as of the date of the filing of the petition ... of any amount by which the debt secured by such security interest exceeded the value of all security interests for such debt on the later of" 90 days before bankruptcy, that is, to the extent that the creditor did not improve its position during the 90 days before bankruptcy. If the debt does not exceed the value of the collateral, then there can be no such reduction, and the creditor's security interest in the receivables (or, more precisely, the transfer of a security interest in new receivables to the creditor) is not avoidable. However, if the creditor's security interest in receivables is not perfected, and is therefore avoidable, as of the 90th day before bankruptcy, then the creditor's perfection of its security interest during the 90-day period is a transfer that results in a reduction in the creditor's deficiency claim, that is, the creditor improves its position by perfecting during the 90-day period. Section 547(c)(5) therefore does not protect a creditor who perfects a prior secured claim during the 90-day pre-bankruptcy period. Lange v. Inova Cap. Funding, LLC (In re Qualia Clinical Serv., Inc.), 652 F.3d 933 (8th Cir. 2011).

- 2.2.hhh Ordinary course of business defense requires the credit to have been extended in the ordinary course. The parents of the debtor’s principals lent the debtor funds on a revolving credit basis. They received repayments during the preference period. The trustee sought to avoid the repayments as preferences. Section 547(c)(2) permits a transferee to retain a preference “to the extent that such transfer was in payment of a debt incurred by the debtor in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee, and such transfer was (A) made in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee; or (B) made according to ordinary business terms”. Here, because the parents were not in the lending business and had not previously made business loans, the debt was not incurred in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the transferee and was avoidable. Shubert v. Mull (In re Frey Mech. Group, Inc.), 446 B.R. 208 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2011).
- 2.2.iii Subsequent new value defense applies to a revolving credit line. The parents of the debtor’s principals lent the debtor funds on a revolving credit basis. They received repayments during the preference period and made re-advances, which they sought to apply under the subsequent new value rule of section 547(c)(4) to reduce preference liability. Section 547(c)(4) provides an affirmative defense to preference avoidance “to the extent that, after such transfer, such creditor gave new value to or for the benefit of the debtor (A) not secured by an otherwise unavoidable security interest; and (B) on account of which new value the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of such creditor”. The defense applies equally to a revolving credit lender as it does to a supplier. The defense does not require that all advances remain unpaid, only that the debtor not have made “an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of such creditor”. In this case, the subsequent advances under the credit line were not repaid, so the creditor was entitled to the benefit of the defense. Shubert v. Mull (In re Frey Mech. Group, Inc.), 446 B.R. 208 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2011).
- 2.2.jjj Settlement payment safe harbor protects redemption of commercial paper. Within 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor retired its commercial paper. The transaction occurred through Depository Trust Company by a debit to a broker-dealer’s DTC account, a corresponding credit to the noteholder’s account, a credit of the commercial paper to the broker-dealer’s account for further credit to the debtor’s issuing and paying agent, whereupon the commercial paper was extinguished in the DTC system. The debtor in possession sought to recover the payment to the noteholder as a preference. Section 546(e) prohibits avoidance of a preference that is a settlement payment made by or to or for the benefit of a financial institution. “Settlement payment” is defined as “a preliminary settlement payment, a partial settlement payment, an interim settlement payment, a settlement payment on account, a final settlement payment, or any other similar payment commonly used in the securities industry”. The definition is very broad. The grammatical structure of the definition requires that “commonly used in the securities industry” be read to modify only “similar payment”, not all of the other terms in the definition. Thus, whether the payment was ordinary is not relevant to a determination of whether the safe harbor applies. The definition is not limited to the purchase or sale of a security but applies to any securities transaction that involves a settlement, including a redemption or retirement of the security. Finally, the definition does not require that a financial intermediary take title to or a beneficial interest in the security in the settlement process. Therefore, the safe harbor applies, and the payments are protected from avoidance. Enron Creditors Recovery Corp. v. Alfa, S.A.V. de C.V., 651 F.3d 329 (2d Cir. 2011).
- 2.2.kkk Payment for electricity under a requirements supply contract is not subject to avoidance as a preference. The debtor contracted with an electricity supplier to deliver all the debtor’s electricity requirements for two years at a fixed price, commencing seven days after the contract date. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued to avoid contract payments as preferences. Section 546(e) exempts from avoidance a payment by or to a forward contract merchant in connection with a forward contract. A forward contract is one for the purchase, sale or transfer of a commodity with a maturity date more than two days after the contract date. The contract here was for the sale of electricity, which is a commodity, and for delivery on a date more than two days after the contract date. The forward contract definition does not require that the contract be for a fixed quantity nor that delivery be on a specified date. Therefore, the contract qualifies, and the payments are not subject to avoidance as a preference. Lightfoot v. MXenergy, Inc., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54546 (E.D. La. May 19, 2011).

2.2.iii Section 547(c)(5) improvement in position preference exception does not apply to an unperfected security interest. The debtor granted a security interest in its receivables to a lender. The lender perfected its security interest within 90 days before bankruptcy and after the lender last gave new value to the debtor. The receivables' value exceeded the amount the debtor owed to the lender during the entire 90 days before bankruptcy. Section 547(c)(5) excepts from preference avoidance a transfer "that creates a perfected security interest" in accounts receivable during the 90 days before bankruptcy if the lender did not improve its position during the 90-day period. Section 547(c)(5) does not apply here, because the lender was not perfected at the beginning of the 90-day period. Lange v. Inova Cap. Funding, LLC (In re Qualia Clinical Serv., Inc.), 441 B.R. 325 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

2.2.mmm Criminal restitution payment may be recoverable as a preference. The debtor pleaded nolo contendere to a charge of defrauding the state's workers' compensation system and agreed to pay restitution. The debtor paid the restitution within 90 days before bankruptcy. The trustee sought to avoid the payment to the state as a preference. Section 547(a) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer of property of the debtor for or on account of an antecedent debt, to or for the benefit of a creditor, made within 90 days before bankruptcy, while the debtor was insolvent. That enabled the creditor to receive a greater percentage than it would receive in a chapter 7 case. The state challenged only section 547's applicability in general to a criminal restitution payment and whether the payment was to or for the benefit of a creditor. Although Kelly v. Robinson, 479 U.S. 36 (1986), renders a criminal restitution payment nondischargeable, nothing in section 547 excepts a criminal restitution payment from avoidance as a preference. Caselaw does not reflect a judicial exception for preference avoidance, as it did for dischargeability. Permitting avoidance does not interfere with the administration of the state's criminal justice system, because the restitution obligation is nondischargeable and therefore remains payable even after avoidance and recovery. Permitting an exception would frustrate the preference statute's equal distribution purpose. Finally, the restitution payment is to or for the benefit of a creditor. A restitution order requires the offender to pay the victim and so is for the victim's benefit, even though the payment is also for the benefit of society as a whole. Here, the victim was the state, so the payment to the state was to or for the benefit of a creditor. State Comp. Ins. Fund v. Zamora (In re Silverman), 616 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2010).

2.2.nnn Fixed-price electricity supply requirements contract may be a forward contract. The debtor entered into a two-year fixed-price electricity supply requirements contract. The supplier was a market maker or middleman for sales of electric power between producer and end user. The trustee sued the supplier to avoid a preference. Section 546(e) exempts payment under a "forward contract" from preference liability. Section 101(25) defines "forward contract" as a contract (other than a commodity contract as defined section 761(4)) for the purchase or sale of a commodity with a maturity date of more than two days after the contract date. By excluding commodity contracts, the definition excludes contracts that are subject to the rules of a board of trade or exchange. The definition is not limited only to true hedging or financial markets contracts nor does it expressly exclude ordinary supply contracts. The safe harbor is intended to cover hedging or forward transactions. This contract did not provide for delivery of a specified quantity. But if the primary risk associated with the commodity is price, then a contract that fixes price may qualify as a hedging transaction, even if it does not fix a quantity. Lightfoot v. MXEnergy Elec., Inc. (In re MBS Mgmt. Servs.), 430 B.R. 750 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2010), and 432 B.R. 570 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2010).

- 2.2.000 Creditor may not use new value defense claim if estate pays for the new value under section 503(b)(9). The debtor received goods from the supplier on July 11 and July 22 with an invoiced value of $302,512. The debtor made two payments to the supplier totaling $279,910 on July 10 and July 23 that were designated as payments on prior invoices. The debtor filed its chapter 11 petition on July 27. The court granted the supplier administrative expense priority for its $302,512 claim, and funds were set aside to pay it, pending outcome of preference litigation. The debtor in possession sued the supplier to avoid a preference. Section 547(c)(4) provides a defense to preference avoidance where, after the preference, the creditor gave new value to the debtor that “was not secured by an otherwise unavoidable security interest [and] on account of which new value the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of the creditor.” Payment of a section 503(b)(9) claim is not a transfer by the debtor. However, the effect of a section 503(b)(9) payment is the same as reclamation of the goods the debtor received that gave rise to the section 503(b)(9) claim. Caselaw denies the new value preference defense to a transfer to the debtor that the creditor recovers under a reclamation claim, because the estate is not enhanced by the goods. In addition, it would be inequitable to allow the creditor to use the new value defense where the creditor has been paid in full for the new value from the estate. Therefore, the creditor may not use goods for which it is paid under section 503(b)(9) for the new value defense. TI Acq., LLC v. Southern Polymer, Inc. (In re TI Acq., LLC), 429 B.R. 377 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2010).
- 2.2.ppp Transfer arranged while the creditor was an insider but not made until later is not subject to one-year reach-back. The debtor’s CEO entered into a severance agreement providing for a severance payment, which was paid shortly after the CEO resigned. The debtor filed bankruptcy more than 90 days but less than one year after the payment date. Its estate representative brought an action against the former CEO to avoid the payment as a preference. Section 547(b) permits a trustee to avoid a transfer to a creditor made “between ninety days and one year before the date of the filing of the petition, if such creditor at the time of such transfer was an insider”. The statute applies only to a transfer “made” within one year if the creditor was an insider “at the time of such transfer”, not to a transfer arranged while the creditor was an insider. Therefore, the transfer was not avoidable as a preference. Zucker v. Freeman (In re Netbank, Inc.), 424 B.R. 568 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2010).
- 2.2.qqq LLC manager is an “insider”. One of the limited liability company debtor’s managers, who had a 12% interest in the debtor, got into a dispute with the majority owner. Under a settlement, the debtor paid the manager $200,000. Upon receiving the payment, the manager forfeited his LLC interest and resigned as a manager. The debtor filed bankruptcy five months later. A trustee may recover a preference to an insider made more than 90 days and less than one year before bankruptcy. An insider “includes” an officer, director or person in control of the debtor. The insider definition does not list an LLC manager, but the definition is illustrative and not limiting. An LLC manager is the legal equivalent for an LLC to a corporate director for a corporation. Therefore, the manager was an insider when the debtor paid the settlement amount. Brandt v. Tabet, Vito & Rothstein, LLC (In re Longview Aluminum, L.L.C.), 419 B.R. 351 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2009).
- 2.2.rrr Release of surety and of right to file a mechanics lien is not “new value”. The debtor subcontractor rented equipment to use on the construction job. The debtor obtained a bond for the job from a surety, who had the right to receive payments from the general contractor if required to pay on the bond. The rental company had the right under nonbankruptcy law to file a mechanics lien and the right to claim under the debtor’s surety bond, but it did neither before it received a payment on the rental invoices. The debtor filed bankruptcy within 90 days after the payment. A trustee may avoid a payment as a preference if, among other things, the payment enables the creditor to receive more than it would have received if the payment had not been made and the creditor received payment on the claim to the extent provided under the Bankruptcy Code. The hypothetical payment under this test is a payment from the estate in the bankruptcy case, not a payment from a third party, such as a surety. The trustee may not avoid a transfer that was intended to be a contemporaneous exchange for new value and was in fact substantially contemporaneous. The creditor could have obtained a mechanics lien if it had not been paid or could have claimed against the surety, with the result that the surety would have received payments from the general contractor that the debtor otherwise would have received. The creditor released those rights upon receiving payment, and the debtor received the payment from the general contractor. However, application of the exception requires a showing that the parties intended the exchange to be contemporaneous and that it was in fact contemporaneous. There was no showing here that the parties so intended or that the payment from the general contractor was in fact substantially contemporaneous. In addition, the release of a right to file a mechanics lien, rather than of a lien itself, does not transfer an interest in property to the debtor. Therefore, the trustee may avoid the payments. United Rentals, Inc. v. Angell, 592 F.3d 525 (4th Cir. 2010).

- 2.2.sss Section 503(b)(9) administrative claim does not reduce availability of subsequent advance defense. The debtor in possession sued a supplier to avoid a preference. The debtor had received goods from the supplier after the preference and within 20 days before bankruptcy, for which the supplier filed an administrative expense claim under section 503(b)(9). Section 547(c)(4) provides a preference defense to the extent that the creditor “gave new value to or for the benefit of the debtor ... not secured by an otherwise unavoidable security interest [and] on account of which the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of the creditor”. Section 547(c)(4) refers only to the debtor, not the estate. The subsequent new value defense therefore applies only to prepetition transfers from the debtor. A section 503(b)(9) administrative expense claim arises only upon the filing of the petition and entitles the supplier to payment by the estate after bankruptcy. The filing, allowance or even payment of such a claim therefore does not fit within either of the “otherwise unavoidable transfer” limitations on use of the subsequent new value defense. The supplier’s administrative expense claim differs from a reclamation claim, which arises upon the debtor’s receipt of the goods and allows the supplier to keep a “string” on the goods, and results from the supplier’s enhancing the debtor’s value before bankruptcy, which is the period that the subsequent new value defense addresses. Commissary Ops., Inc. v. Dot Foods, Inc. (In re Commissary Operations, Inc.), 421 B.R. 873 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 2010).
- 2.2.ttt DePrizio waiver does not protect guarantor against preference exposure. The debtor’s parent corporation had guaranteed the debtor’s debt to its principal secured lender but had waived any claim against the debtor for contribution, reimbursement, indemnity, subrogation or otherwise if it had to pay on the guarantee. A trustee may recover as a preference a transfer to a “creditor” under specified circumstances. A guarantor has a contingent claim against the debtor that becomes fixed when the guarantor pays on the guarantee. Under In re DePrizio Constr. Co., 874 F.2d 1186 (7th Cir. 1989), the contingent claim makes the guarantor a creditor for purposes of section 547. The attempted waiver of any claims is merely an attempt to evade by contract a bankruptcy policy reflected in the DePrizio rule. It is therefore unenforceable to protect the guarantor from preference liability. In any event, the guarantor may be liable under section 550(a) for recovery of the transfer as an entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. Miller v. Greystone Bus. Credit II, L.L.C. (In re USA Detergents, Inc.), 418 B.R. 533 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).
- 2.2.uuu Court measures “insolvency” for a registered limited liability partnership the same as for a corporation. Section 101(32) of the Bankruptcy Code defines “insolvent” differently for a corporation than for a partnership. For a general partnership, insolvency is determined by including the assets of the general partners in addition to the assets of the partnership. The Code defines “corporation” to include a “partnership association organized under a law that makes only the capital subscribed responsible” for its debts. New York law authorizes the creation of a “registered limited liability partnership”, in which only licensed professionals may be partners. A partner, unlike a general partner, is not liable for any debts of the partnership, except for professional negligence that the partner or any person under the partner’s direct supervision or control commits while rendering professional services. Although the debtor is a partnership, so the partnership definition of “insolvent” applies, there are no “general partners”, because the partners are not generally liable for the partnership’s obligations. So there are no general partner assets to include in the insolvency calculation. Thus, the effect is the same as if the corporate insolvency definition applies. Wallach v. Douglas (In re Promedica Health Group, LLP), 416 B.R. 389 (Bankr. W.D.N.Y. 2009).

2.2.vvv Transfer of security interest in tax refund occurs only at end of taxable year. In July, the debtor granted its lenders a security interest in general intangibles, which included any right to a tax refund. After suffering substantial losses that year, the debtor became entitled upon the close of the year to a tax refund based on a carryback of its losses to prior years. The debtor filed its petition in January. A preference is avoidable if made within 90 days before bankruptcy. A transfer is “made” when it takes effect between the parties. The security interest took effect between the debtor and the lenders in July, before the petition date. But a transfer does not occur until the debtor has rights in the property. The debtor does not have rights in a tax refund until the close of the taxable year. Therefore, the debtor obtained rights in the tax refund on January 1, which was within 90 days before the petition, and the preference is avoidable. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Citicorp N. Am., Inc. (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 2009 Bankr. LEXIS 3311 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. Oct. 13, 2009).

2.2.www “Subsequent new value” defense applies only to value transfers that are not avoidable. Within 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor paid the supplier, who shipped goods after the payments. The supplier asserted a defense under section 547(c)(4) to a preference action, which provides that a transfer may not be avoided as a preference “to the extent that, after such transfer, such creditor gave new value ... on account of which new value the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of such creditor”. The Circuits have apparently split on the interpretation of this provision between the “remains unpaid” and “subsequent advance” rules, but the Third Circuit’s rulings have been only dicta. The statute’s plain language requires the court to determine the extent to which the creditor received payments that are otherwise unavoidable rather than how much of a subsequent transfer to the debtor remains unpaid. That is, if the trustee may avoid the debtor’s later transfer, then the creditor should receive credit for the creditor’s transfer to the debtor. If the trustee may not avoid the debtor’s later transfer, then the creditor has been satisfied for its transfer to the debtor and should not be permitted to use it as a defense against an earlier preference. “Remains unpaid” therefore is an inaccurate shorthand to describe the defense’s extent, and the court follows the “subsequent advance” interpretation. Wahoski v. Am. & Efrid, Inc. (In re Pillowtex Corp.), 416 B.R. 123 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).

2.2.xxx Settlement payment exception protects commercial paper prepayment from avoidance. The debtor issued uncertificated commercial paper electronically through The Depository Trust Company (DTC). The debtor prepaid the paper within 90 days before bankruptcy at par plus accrued interest, though the note was trading at a discount at the time. To effect the prepayment, the debtor transferred funds to DTC, who credited the holder’s DTC account and debited the debtor’s commercial paper from the holder’s account. DTC then credited the debtor’s account with the commercial paper, which extinguished the commercial paper. Under section 546(e), a “settlement payment” is exempt from preference avoidance and recovery. “Settlement payment” is defined in a circular way as “a preliminary settlement payment, a parties settlement payment, an interim settlement payment, a settlement payment on account, a final settlement payment, or other similar payment commonly used in the securities trade”. The rule of the last antecedent requires that the clause “commonly used in the securities trade” be read to modify only the last antecedent, “other similar payment”. Therefore, a settlement payment need not be made in the ordinary course or be commonly made to qualify for the exemption. All five courts of appeals that have addressed the question agree that Congress intended that the definition be read broadly as reaching beyond ordinary course or common transactions. Courts generally restrict the term’s application to securities transactions. However, “transaction” is not limited to a purchase or sale but encompasses any dealing in securities. Under the Bankruptcy Code’s definition of “security”, which is broader than the Securities Act’s definition, commercial paper is a security. Therefore, section 546(e)’s exemption applies to the debtor’s early redemption of its commercial paper through the clearing system. Alfa, S.A.B. de C.V. v. Enron Creditors Recovery Corp. (In re Enron Creditors Recovery Corp.), 422 B.R. 423 (S.D.N.Y. 2009).

2.2.yyy Debtor does not acquire rights in a carryback tax refund until the end of the tax year.

The debtor granted its lender a security interest in general intangibles six months before its January bankruptcy. The debtor suffered a substantial tax loss in the tax year before bankruptcy, which entitled it to a tax refund resulting from carryback of the loss to prior profitable years. The debtor’s refund right arises under federal tax law only at the end of the tax year. A tax refund is a general intangible, so the refund was subject to the lender’s security interest. The trustee may avoid a transfer of property of the debtor to a creditor on account of an antecedent debt if the transfer occurs within 90 days before bankruptcy and enables the creditor to receive a greater recovery than if the transfer had not been made. Under section 547(e)(3), a transfer of property does not take place until the debtor has rights in the property. The transfer to the lender of the security interest in the tax refund did not occur until the end of the taxable year on midnight, December 31, because the debtor did not have rights in the tax refund until then. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Citicorp N. Am., Inc. (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 406 B.R. 421 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2009).

2.2.zzz Commercial paper prepayment is a preference that is not protected by the settlement payment exception.

The debtor issued uncertificated commercial paper electronically through the Depository Trust Company. The debtor prepaid the paper within 90 days before bankruptcy at par plus accrued interest, though the note was trading at a discount at the time. To effect the prepayment, the debtor transferred funds to DTC, who credited the holder’s DTC account and debited the debtor’s commercial paper from the holder’s account. It then credited the debtor’s account with the commercial paper, which extinguished it. Under section 546(e), a “settlement payment” is exempt from preference avoidance and recovery. “Settlement payment” is defined in a circular way but by reference to “any other payment commonly used in the securities trade”. A settlement payment occurs only upon a purchase and sale. Commercial paper is a note evidencing a debt. When a commercial paper issuer pays off the note, it does not purchase the note but simply repays the debt. Therefore, the payment is not a settlement payment and is not exempt from preference attack. Enron Creditors Recovery Corp. v. J.P. Morgan Secs., Inc. (In re Enron Creditors Recovery Corp.), 407 B.R. 17 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

2.2.aaaa Award of prejudgment interest in a preference action is discretionary. The trustee prevailed against a preference defendant after a trial involving facts that were disputed in good faith. Neither party delayed the litigation. As a matter of federal law, bankruptcy courts may award prejudgment interest in a preference action. Any such award must be equitable, and a reasonableness standard applies. Thus, failure to award prejudgment interest after a reasonable dispute is not an abuse of discretion. Carrier Corp. v. Buckley (In re Globe Mfg. Corp.), 567 F.3d 1291 (11th Cir. 2009).

2.2.bbbb “Insider” may include anyone not dealing at arms’ length with the debtor. The debtor and a supplier entered into a strategic partnership agreement, under which the supplier would become the debtor's exclusive telecommunications equipment and software supplier and would provide the debtor with substantial financing to make purchases from the supplier. The financing agreement permitted the supplier to call its loan if the debtor's capital expenditures or the loan balance exceeded specified amounts and required, among other things, that the debtor use any increase in its bank facility to pay down the supplier's credit line. The supplier used the debtor "as a mere instrumentality to inflate [the supplier's] own revenues [W]hat began as a 'strategic partnership' ... degenerated into a relationship in which the much larger company bullied and threatened the smaller into taking actions that were designed to benefit the larger at the expense of the smaller ... to prop up its own revenue ... in the form of purchases ... of unneeded equipment". The supplier used its position as lender to ensure the debtor's cooperation by repeated threats to stop the funding. Eventually, the debtor sought to increase its bank credit line by $200 million. Though it was in default with the supplier, caused in part by the supplier's requiring unnecessary equipment purchases, the supplier delayed issuing the refinancing notice so as not to default the debtor before it obtained the increased bank loan and refused to allow the debtor to use the loan proceeds for any purpose other than paying the supplier, 131 days before bankruptcy. A payment made between 90 days and one year before bankruptcy is recoverable as a preference only if the creditor is an "insider". The Bankruptcy Code defines "insider" to include an officer, director and "person in control of the debtor", but the definition is open-ended. A person not listed in the definition of "insider" may be a non-statutory insider. The statutory term "person in control" requires actual control. However, actual control is not necessary to qualify as a non-statutory insider. Otherwise, "person in control" would virtually eliminate the concept of nonstatutory insider. Rather, a nonstatutory insider includes anyone not dealing at arms' length with the debtor, such that its conduct should be subject to closer scrutiny. In this case, the supplier's ability to coerce the debtor into unnecessary and disadvantageous transactions showed that the parties were not dealing at arms' length, making the supplier a nonstatutory insider, even though the supplier had the right under its credit agreement to call its loan or require payment of the bank loan increase to itself. Therefore, the loan payment was recoverable as an insider preference. Schubert v. Lucent Techs. Inc. (In re Winstar Comm'ns, Inc.), 554 F.3d 382 (3d Cir. 2009).

2.2.cccc Lease termination payment is made on account of an antecedent debt. The debtor paid its landlord a termination payment within 90 days before bankruptcy in full satisfaction of all of the debtor's remaining obligations under the lease. The trustee may recover a transfer as a preference if, among other things, the transfer is made "for or on account of an antecedent debt". The Code defines "debt" as co-extensive with "claim", which is defined to include a claim that is unmatured, unliquidated or contingent. Under applicable state law, the landlord could not collect or sue for the rent until it became due each month under the lease, and the rent might never be owing if the premises were destroyed or the landlord constructively evicted the debtor. These factors made the debtor's obligation to the landlord unmatured and contingent, but unmatured or contingent obligations are within the Code's definition of "debt". Because the obligations were incurred at lease signing, they were antecedent to the debtor's lease termination payment, which the trustee could therefore recover as a preference. Midwest Holding #7, LLC v. Anderson (In re Tanner Family, LLC), 556 F.3d 1194 (11th Cir. 2009).

2.2.dddd Bank to bank credit card transfer is a preference. The debtor used a check drawn on one credit card account to pay down another card account within 90 days before bankruptcy. The trustee sued the payee bank to avoid the payment as a preference. A payment may be avoided as a preference only if the payment is of property of the debtor. Where a new creditor requires that the funds it is advancing be used to pay a particular old creditor, the funds are earmarked for the old creditor and, because the debtor did not have full control over the funds, are not property of the debtor. Although the funds here came from the payor bank, the debtor had control over whom to pay with the funds. As such, the funds were property of the debtor and were not earmarked for the old creditor. Therefore, the earmarking doctrine does not apply, and the old creditor is liable for a preference. Yoppolo v. MBNA Am. Bank, N.A. (In re Dilworth), 560 F.3d 562 (6th Cir. 2009); accord MBNA Am. Bank, N.A. v. Meoli (In re Wells), 561 F.3d 633 (6th Cir. 2009).

2.2.eeee BAPCPA's fix to the DePrizio repeal applies retroactively to pending actions. The creditors committee had brought an action to recover as a preference a mortgage that the debtor had granted more than 90 days before bankruptcy to a bank that had a guarantee from an insider. Under In re DePrizio, 874 F.2d 1186 (7th Cir. 1989), the mortgage grant was avoidable and recoverable as to the bank, because the 1994 amendment to section 550 to overrule DePrizio did not overrule it as to the granting of a preferential lien. However, BAPCPA fixed that oversight and applied the fix to pending cases. Such application to pending cases is constitutional. A plaintiff does not have a property right for purposes of the Fifth Amendment Takings Clause in pending litigation that has not been reduced to judgment. Similarly, the committee does not have a property interest in the unencumbered real property, because the avoiding powers do not grant such an interest until after judgment, and the mortgage cannot be said to have an implied clause incorporating preference law, such that the committee or the estate had a vested property interest despite the mortgage. Finally, retroactive application does not violate due process, because Congress had a rational purpose in applying the amendment to pending litigation. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Bank of America, N.A. (In re ABC-NACO, Inc.), 402 B.R. 816 (N.D. Ill. 2009).

2.2.ffff Debtor's direct payment of a credit card debt with an advance from another credit card is a preference. In a balance transfer transaction, the debtor directed one of its credit card companies to pay another credit card company. The debtor filed bankruptcy within 90 days. The trustee sought recovery of the payment amount from the transferee company as a preference. A preference involves a transfer of property of the debtor, that is, property that would have become property of the estate if it had not been transferred. Here, "[t]echnology masks the processes involved". Although the funds flowed electronically from the transferor company to the transferee and never actually passed through the debtor's hands, the debtor actually drew on its credit line at the transferor company and used the loan proceeds, not the untapped credit line, to pay the transferee. Thus, the loan proceeds became property of the debtor, even if only for a nanosecond. The earmarking doctrine requires at a minimum that the new lender require the loan proceeds be paid to the old creditor. Here, the transferor company imposed no such requirement. Parks v. FIA Card Servs., N.A. (In re Marshall), 550 F.3d 1251 (10th Cir. 2008).

2.2.gggg A loan made as an exception to a lender's lending policy is not made in the ordinary course. The bank gave the debtor an emergency, short term loan to make payroll and prevent evictions as a bridge to an SBA-guaranteed loan. The bridge loan was unsecured but guaranteed by the debtor's principal and was at an interest rate below prime. The bank's internal documents noted the loan "was made on a non-conforming basis" and "was approved as a policy exception out of margin". Section 547(c)(2) provides an exception to preference avoidance for a transfer made in payment of a debt "incurred by the debtor in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee" if the payment was also in the ordinary course or according to ordinary business terms. The fact that the loan was made to prevent a financial emergency for the debtor did not render the loan made out of the ordinary course of business. If it did, it would condemn and therefore discourage new dealings with a troubled debtor, making it excessively difficult for a distressed debtor to recover financial health. Similarly, the fact that the loan was a bridge loan, to be paid from proceeds of a later loan rather than from cash flow or earnings, does not make the loan out of the ordinary course, because such loans are consistent with bank policy. However, because the loan admittedly was not in compliance with the lender's loan policy, the loan was not in the ordinary course of business of the transferee (the bank), so the ordinary course exception does not apply. Caillouet v. First Bank & Trust (In re Entringer Bakeries, Inc.), 548 F.3d 344 (5th Cir. 2008).

- 2.2.hhhh Lease termination is a payment on account of an antecedent debt. The debtor paid the landlord in exchange for the landlord's early termination of the lease and a release from future liability. Section 547(b) permits avoidance of a "transfer for or on account of an antecedent debt owed by the debtor before such transfer was made". The Bankruptcy Code defines debt as "liability on a claim". "Claim" means a right to payment, whether matured or unmatured, fixed or contingent. A lessee's future liability for rent is therefore a debt. Where a lessee receives only a liability release in exchange for the termination payment, the payment is for or on account of an antecedent debt. Midwest Holding #7, LLC v. Anderson, 387 B.R. 892 (N.D. Ga. 2008).
- 2.2.iii Equitable subrogation may perfect a new mortgage before recording. The debtor refinanced his house 122 days before bankruptcy. After the federally required three business days (which was 5 calendar days because of an intervening weekend) after the closing, the new lender delivered a check to the old lender and sent its mortgage to the county clerk for recording, who recorded it 28 days later, which was 89 days before bankruptcy. The county clerk recorded the cancellation of the old mortgage 74 days before bankruptcy. Under applicable state law, a lender who pays off a prior mortgage is equitably subrogated to the prior mortgage, and a bona fide purchaser takes subject to the new mortgage, even though the new mortgage is not recorded until later, as long as the new mortgage is recorded before the old mortgage is released. Under section 547(e)(2), a transfer is made when it takes effect between the parties if it is perfected within 10 days (pre-BAPCPA). Under section 547(e)(1)(A), a transfer of real property is perfected when a bona fide purchaser "cannot acquire an interest that is superior to the interest of the transferee". Because of the state's law on equitable subrogation, a bona fide purchaser could not have obtained a superior interest to the new lender's mortgage. The new lender subrogated to the old lender's rights when it paid off the old lender, 5 days after the transfer took effect between the debtor and the new lender. Therefore, the transfer was "made" when it took effect between the parties 122 days before bankruptcy, outside the preference period. The Bankruptcy Code's non-recognition of equitable liens does not apply here, because equitable subrogation affects only priority, not the creation of the new lender's lien. Gordon v. Novastar Mortgage, Inc. (In re Hedrick), 524 F.3d 1175 (11th Cir. 2008).
- 2.2.jjjj Earmarking does not save a late-perfected refinancing mortgage. The debtor refinanced his mortgage with the same lender. The lender issued a discharge of the prior mortgage 25 days later. The new mortgage was recorded 72 days after the refinancing transaction, and the discharge was recorded 30 days after that. The debtor filed bankruptcy 77 days after the new mortgage was recorded. Under section 547(e), a real property transfer is made when it is perfected, unless perfected within 10 days (pre-BAPCPA) after the transfer takes effect between the parties. It is perfected "when a bona fide purchaser ... cannot acquire an interest that is superior to the interest of the transferee" Here, a bona fide purchaser could acquire a superior interest to the new mortgage, despite the continued recordation of the discharged mortgage. Therefore, the transfer was not perfected until it was recorded, and the transfer was therefore on account of an antecedent debt. The earmarking doctrine prevents preference liability if a new creditor agrees to lend the debtor money to pay a specific antecedent debt, the agreement is performed according to its terms, and the transaction does not diminish the estate, because the new loan proceeds do not become property of the debtor for purposes of section 547(b). Here, the lender was not a "new creditor", but was refinancing its own loan. More important, the property transferred to secure the new loan was an interest in the debtor's real property, not the new loan funds the creditor advanced. Therefore, the property was property of the debtor, and the earmarking doctrine does not provide a preference defense. The court refuses to collapse the advance of new funds, the granting of the new mortgage, and the payoff and discharge of the old debt and mortgage into a single transaction to prevent preference attack, because it would ignore the Bankruptcy Code's plain transfer definition as including the mortgage. Chase Manhattan Mortgage Corp. v. Shapiro (In re Lee), 530 F.3d 458 (6th Cir. 2008).

2.2.kkkk Creditor owning 10.6% of the debtor’s stock, whose CEO is on the debtor’s board, is not an insider. The debtor agreed to serve as the creditor’s exclusive distribution company in the United States. In exchange, the creditor invested cash and obtained a 10.6% interest in the debtor’s stock and designated its CEO as one of the debtor’s 10 directors. The director did not exert any undue influence over the debtor and conducted all business between the two companies on an arm’s-length basis. The director recused himself from any deliberations relating to the debtor’s relations with the creditor. The trustee sued to recover payments that the creditor received from the debtor more than 90 days but less than one year before bankruptcy on the ground that the stock ownership and the director relationship made the creditor a nonstatutory insider. A close business relationship over a period of years does not alone make a creditor an insider. Rather, a creditor becomes a nonstatutory insider only when it exercises control to gain an advantage in a manner that strays from an arm’s-length relationship. Moreover, applying insider status to any company whose executive officer sits on the debtor’s board would impermissibly expand the statutory “insider” definition. In this case, the creditor did not exercise any improper control and therefore is not an insider. Anstine v. Carl Zeiss Meditec AG (In re U.S. Medical, Inc.), 531 F.3d 1272 (10th Cir. 2008).

2.2.iii “Substantially contemporaneous” is not a bright-line rule measured by section 547(e)(2)’s relation-back time period. The debtor refinanced his house 29 days before bankruptcy. After the federally required three business days (which was 8 calendar days because of an intervening holiday weekend) after the closing, the new lender mailed a check to the old lender and sent its mortgage to the county clerk for recording, who recorded it 13 days later, which was 5 days before bankruptcy. The county clerk recorded the cancellation of the old mortgage after bankruptcy. Under applicable state law, a lender who pays off a prior mortgage is equitably subrogated to the prior mortgage, and a bona fide purchaser takes subject to the new mortgage, even though the new mortgage is not recorded till later, as long as the new mortgage is recorded before the old mortgage is released. Section 547(c)(1) provides a transferee a preference liability defense for a transfer that the debtor and a transferee intend to be contemporaneous for new value and that is in fact a substantially contemporaneous exchange. This defense operates independently of section 547(e)(2)’s 10-day (pre-BAPCPA) relation back provision, so “substantially contemporaneous” is not measured by that 10-day period. If it were, it would render section 547(e)(2)(B) superfluous. “Substantially contemporaneous” is not a bright-line test but rather is based on all relevant facts, including the nature of the transaction, the objective reasonableness of the time taken to perfect, the normal course of business or affairs, the transferee’s diligence, and the reasons for the delay. Moreover, section 547(e)(2)’s purpose is to move promptly perfected transfers that occur between 80 (pre-BAPCPA) and 90 days before bankruptcy outside of the preference period; section 547(c)(1) is not so limited. Here, the new lender acted diligently, did not attempt to obtain a secret lien, and acted in good faith, so the 8-day delay in perfection was reasonable and therefore substantially contemporaneous. The court does not address why section 547(e)(2)’s relation-back provision for transfers perfected within 10 days would not have taken this transfer entirely out of the “antecedent debt” preference requirement. Gordon v. Novastar Mortgage, Inc. (In re Hedrick), 524 F.3d 1175 (11th Cir. 2008).

2.2.mmmm Prejudgment attachment for breach of a swap is subject to financial contract safe harbor. The debtor entered into a swap agreement with the creditor. The creditor made its payment under the swap but the debtor did not. The creditor promptly sued and obtained a prejudgment attachment on the debtor’s bank account. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case within 90 days and sued to set aside the attachments as a preference. Section 546(g) provides that “a trustee may not avoid a transfer, made by or to (or for the benefit of) a swap participant or financial participant, under or in connection with any swap agreement and that is made before the commencement of the case”. The attachment is a transfer, but it is not made “under” the swap agreement, because it was not accomplished according to the procedure stated in the swap agreement. However, it is “in connection with” the swap because it arises from the failure of the swap transactions. Casa de Cambio Majapara S.A. de C.V. v. Wachovia Bank, N.A. (In re Casa de Cambio Majapara S.A. de C.V.), 380 B.R. 595 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2008).

2.2.nnnn Preference claims are not subject to arbitration. The debtor's contracts with the creditor contained a broad arbitration clause that required arbitration of "[a]ny and all differences and disputes of whatsoever nature arising out of" the contract. A liquidating trustee sued the creditor to recover as a preference a payment under the contract made within 90 days before bankruptcy. An arbitration clause is generally enforceable between the parties to the contract. A preference action is a statutory claim that vests in the estate for the benefit of creditors and is not based on the contract between the debtor and the counterparty. Therefore, the arbitration clause does not bind the estate or its representatives in bringing an action to avoid a preference. Bethlehem Steel Corp. v. Moran Towing Corp. (In re Bethlehem Steel Corp.), 390 B.R. 784 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2008).

2.2.0000 Earmarking doctrine does not protect a payment by a credit card convenience check. The debtor used credit card "convenience checks" to pay another credit card company debt within 90 days before bankruptcy. The check issuer did not direct the debtor's use of the funds. The debtor had complete dominion and control over the funds and could have used them for any purpose. A transfer of property of the debtor within 90 days before bankruptcy while the debtor was insolvent may be avoidable as a preference. The transferred funds were property of the debtor and became such at the moment the check issuer extended credit to the debtor by honoring the checks. The earmarking doctrine does not apply to protect the recipient because the lender did not direct their use. The court relies on cases reaching the same result in the context of kited checks, in which the bank extends provisional credit to the debtor upon deposit of the kited check, even though the check has not cleared. The court rejects the idea that the credit that the check issuer extends to the debtor is not property of the debtor on which creditors could realize any recovery and rejects any "diminution of the estate" analysis. Meoli v. MBNA Am. Bank, N.A. (In re Wells), 382 B.R. 355 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

2.2.pppp Greater percentage test is applied as of the petition date. The debtor financed its insurance premiums. It made two payments within 90 days before bankruptcy. At the time of each payment and at the petition date, the unearned premium that secured the debtor's premium obligation exceeded the remaining unpaid premium. However, if the payments had not been made, the unearned premium would have been less than the remaining unpaid premium as of the petition date. The trustee claimed that as a result, the transfers met section 547(b)(5)'s greater percentage test requirement that the transfers "enabled the creditor to receive more than such creditor would receive if (A) the case were a case under chapter 7 of this title; (B) the transfer had not been made; and (C) such creditor received payment of such debt to the extent provided by the provisions of this title." Palmer Clay Prods. v. Brown, 397 U.S. 227 (1936), requires the court to conduct this hypothetical analysis as of the petition date, not the transfer date. Subparagraph (B) then requires the court to add back the transfers to the creditor's remaining petition date claim and compare it to the creditor's petition date collateral value. Here, the hypothetical petition date claim exceeded the petition date collateral value, so the transfers enabled the creditor to receive more than if the transfers had not been made. These provisions apply equally to secured and unsecured claims, except that for a secured claim, a payment typically releases collateral of equal value. That would provide a fully secured creditor with a section 547(c)(1) contemporaneous exchange for new value defense, but it is important analytically to keep the preference elements and defenses clear. The court rejects application of a hypothetical analysis of what a secured creditor might have done, such as canceling the insurance policy, if the transfer had not been made. Falcon Creditor Trust v. First Ins. Funding (In re Falcon Prods., Inc.), 381 B.R. 543 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

- 2.2.qqqq Transfer to a creditor secured by leased property is not a preference. The debtor paid a creditor $100,000 as partial payment for maintenance of an airplane the debtor leased and filed bankruptcy within 90 days after the payment. The trustee sought to recover the payment as a preference. The creditor had a perfected possessory lien on the airplane, which was senior to the rights of the lessor and to the debtor's possessory interest in the airplane. Because the creditor's lien was valid, the trustee could not show that the payment enabled the creditor to receive more than it would have received in a hypothetical chapter 7 case. The court apparently applies the greater percentage test as of the transfer date and does not address the value, if any, of the creditor's possessory lien as against the debtor. Triad Int'l Maint. Corp. v. So. Air Transport, Inc. (In re So. Air Transport, Inc.), 511 F.3d 526 (6th Cir. 2007).
- 2.2.rrrr Preference return under a settlement revives guarantee liability. The debtor guaranteed the obligations of its insurance company affiliate. Before the insurance company entered conservation, it paid the guaranteed creditor in full under a settlement agreement among the debtor, the insurance company, and the creditor, which provided that the guarantee would be released and that if the payment were avoided as a preference, the creditor could enforce the guarantee. In the insurance company conservatorship, the creditor settled with the conservator and agreed to return part of the preference. It then filed a claim against the debtor in its bankruptcy case. Under general principles of suretyship and guarantees, a guarantor's obligation to a creditor revives when the creditor performs an obligation to surrender a preference. The result is the same when the creditor settles a preference, because a lawsuit removes any element of voluntariness from the payment. The guarantee release in the initial settlement agreement does not affect the result, as that agreement also contained the revival provision, both of which are consistent with the general rule. Centre Ins. Co. v. SNTL Corp. (In re SNTL Corp.), 380 B.R. 204 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007); aff'd, 571 F.3d 826 (9th Cir. 2009).
- 2.2.ssss Trustee may recover preferences to pay administrative expense claims. After the debtor's chapter 11 case failed and was converted to chapter 7, the trustee borrowed from the prepetition secured lenders to pay certain administrative expense claims required to administer the case. The trustee secured the loan with recoveries under avoiding power actions and ultimately agreed with the creditor to distribute recoveries first to litigation expenses and chapter 7 trustee fees, then 2/3 to the creditor and 1/3 to the estate to pay unpaid chapter 11 administrative expense claims. The trustee may bring preference actions to pay these amounts, even though none of the proceeds will inure to the benefit of holders of general unsecured prepetition claims. Section 550(a) permits recovery "for the benefit of the estate", which represents all potentially interested parties, not just general unsecured prepetition claims. The loan and the preference recoveries benefit the estate by allowing it to satisfy priority claims, as well as a secured loan whose proceeds were used to pay administrative claims. Gonzales v. Conagra Groc. Prods. Co. (In re Furr's Supermarkets, Inc.), 373 B.R. 691 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).
- 2.2.tttt Trustee may recover preference from creditor with only a contingent claim that receives collateral. A surety company issued surety bonds for the debtor's business. The debtor indemnified the surety for any loss on the bonds. When the debtor's financial condition deteriorated, the surety company demanded collateral, which the debtor provided, to secure the debtor's indemnity obligation to the surety if the bonds, none of which had yet been called, were later called. Bankruptcy followed within 90 days, as did calls on the bonds. The surety had a claim against the debtor under the indemnity agreement, even though the bonds had not been called, contingent on a bond beneficiary making demand on the surety. The debtor's collateral transfer to the surety was therefore to a creditor on account of an antecedent debt and, if the other preference elements were present, was avoidable. Hutson v. Greenwich Ins. Co. (In re E-Z Serve Conv. Stores, Inc.), 377 B.R. 491 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. 2007).

2.2.uuuu Tenth Circuit BAP construes ordinary course defense narrowly. In the months before bankruptcy, the debtor paid the creditor irregularly, holding checks, voiding and reissuing them later, having daily internal meetings to decide which suppliers to pay, and sending payments by overnight delivery rather than regular mail. The creditor frequently contacted the debtor for payment of specific invoices, placed the debtor on credit hold and withheld orders until it was brought current. The conduct did not meet pre-BAPCPA section 547(c)(2)(B)'s ordinary course of business subjective test ("made in the ordinary course of business between the debtor and the transferee"). The Tenth Circuit construes the ordinary course exception narrowly. Four factors determine compliance with the subjective test: (1) the time the parties were engaged in the transaction; (2) whether the payment amount or form differed from past practices; (3) whether the parties engaged in unusual payment or collection activity; and (4) the payment circumstances. The third factor dooms the payments here, because the course of dealing differed substantially from the payment and collection practices before the debtor encountered financial difficulty. The conduct also fails section 547(c)(2)(C)'s objective test ("made according to ordinary business terms") under Tenth Circuit precedent, because it did not comport with terms that creditors use when debtors are financially healthy. Gonzales v. Conagra Groc. Prods. Co. (In re Furr's Supermarkets, Inc.), 373 B.R. 691 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

2.2.vvvv Reclamation right defeats subsequent advance defense. The creditor supplied the debtor almost daily with fresh inventory. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, the creditor sent a reclamation notice, which the court recognized and allowed. As part of a critical vendor order, the debtor in possession paid the creditor the entire amount of the reclamation claim, but the order did not waive preference claims. In response to the liquidating trustee's preference action, the creditor asserted section 547(c)(4)'s subsequent advance defense. The defense requires that the new value given after the preference not be "secured by an otherwise unavoidable security interest" and "on account of which new value the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of such creditor." The postpetition payments were not such an "otherwise unavoidable transfer," because the preference analysis stops at the petition date and therefore does not take into account postpetition payments to the creditor. (Tied more closely to the statutory language, the postpetition payment was a transfer by the estate, not by the debtor.) However, the creditor's reclamation right defeated the subsequent advance defense. The reclamation right acted as a "string" on the post-preference shipments that prevented them from being new value to the debtor or the estate. Phoenix Restaurant Group, Inc. v. Proficient Food Co. (In re Phoenix Restaurant Group, Inc.), 373 B.R. 541 (M.D. Tenn. 2007).

2.2.wwww Improvement in position exception does not necessarily protect a creditor with a blanket security interest in all assets. The debtor operated a service business that used substantial equipment but little inventory. The creditor had a blanket security interest in all the debtor's assets, including inventory and accounts receivable, which increased in value during the 90-day preference period. Each creation of a new item of inventory or account receivable (except to the extent the receivable was proceeds of inventory) was a transfer of property of the debtor that could enable the creditor to receive more than in a liquidation for purposes of section 547(b)(5), because under section 547(e)(3), a secured creditor's lien does not attach until the debtor obtains rights in the asset. The creditor's blanket security interest might defeat the greater percentage analysis of section 547(b)(5) if the new assets were proceeds of the creditor's other collateral. Here, however, "proceeds" should be construed consistently with section 552(b), which allows a security interest to attach to property the estate acquires postpetition only if the property is proceeds of the creditor's petition-date collateral. Because the debtor was in a service business, the new inventory and accounts did not appear to be proceeds of the creditor's other collateral. (Query, however, whether, to the extent cash proceeds of existing accounts were used to purchase new inventory and to pay for operating expenses, the new accounts were proceeds.) The creditor does not benefit from the improvement in position exception of section 547(c)(5) for the same reason. The improvement appears to have been "to the prejudice of creditors holding unsecured claims,” because the accounts and inventory that were transferred to the creditor upon creation would have otherwise been available for unsecured claims. The court examines only the increase in the value of inventory and accounts, not the entire collateral package. The court expressly departs from In re Castletons, Inc., 990 F.2d 551 (10th Cir. 1993). Qmect, Inc. v. Burlingame Cap. P’ners II, L.P. (In re Qmect, Inc.), 373 B.R. 100 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2007). See also Qmect, Inc. v. Burlingame Cap. P’ners II, L.P. (In re Qmect, Inc.), 373 B.R. 682 (N.D. Cal. 2007), infra (affirming bankruptcy court’s determination that secured creditor’s lien extend to assets generated postpetition).

2.2.xxxx Earmarking is not an affirmative defense. The trustee sued a creditor to recover a preference. The creditor first raised an earmarking defense in its opposition to the trustee’s summary judgment motion. Under Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 8, failure to raise an affirmative defense in an answer waives the defense. The earmarking defense is an argument that the transferred property was not property of the debtor when transferred and so goes to the trustee’s affirmative case to establish an avoidable preference under section 547(b). The creditor therefore did not waive the defense by failing to raise it in its answer. The burden of proof still remains on the creditor. Once the trustee introduces evidence that the property was property of the debtor, the burden of persuasion shifts to the creditor to show that the funds were earmarked. Metcalf v. Golden (In re Adbox, Inc.), 488 F.3d 836 (9th Cir. 2007).

2.2.yyyy Creditor owning 10.6% of the debtor’s stock, whose CEO is on the debtor’s board, is not an insider. The debtor agreed to serve as the creditor’s exclusive distribution company in the United States. In exchange, the creditor invested cash and obtained a 10.6% interest in the debtor’s stock and designated its CEO as one of the debtor’s 10 directors. The director did not exert any undue influence over the debtor and conducted all business between the two companies on an arms’ length basis. The director recused himself from any deliberations relating to the debtor’s relations with the creditor. The trustee sued to recover payments that the creditor received from the debtor more than 90 days but less than one year before bankruptcy on the ground that the stock ownership and the director relationship made the creditor a nonstatutory insider. A close business relationship over a period of years does not alone make a creditor an insider. Rather, a creditor becomes a nonstatutory insider only when it exercises control to gain an advantage in a manner that strays from an arms’ length relationship. In this case, the creditor did not exercise any such control and therefore is not an insider. Carl Zeiss Meditec AG v. Anstine (In re U.S. Medical, Inc.), 370 B.R. 340 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

2.2.zzzz A director emeritus is not a per se insider. The debtor resigned as a director of a bank in 1990. He received the title “director emeritus”, $400 monthly compensation, and a listing in the bank’s annual report. He attended board meetings only occasionally and did not vote at the meetings. The debtor paid the bank a substantial amount on an unsecured loan between 90 days and one year before he filed bankruptcy in 2001. The trustee sued the bank for recovery of the payments as avoidable preferences, on the ground that the bank was an insider at the time of the transfers. The debtor’s status as director emeritus did not make the bank a per se insider. “Director” in the insider definition refers to one actually serving on the board of directors. As a director emeritus, the debtor did not necessarily have the control that a director would ordinarily have and to which the statute is directed. It is a question of fact, however, relating to the degree of control that the director exercised over the bank at the time of payment, whether the bank is an insider by reason of the bank’s relationship to or control of the debtor. Rupp v. United Sec. Bank (In re Kunz), 489 F.3d 1072 (10th Cir. 2007).

2.2.aaaa Replacement check qualifies for contemporaneous exchange for new value exception. The debtor grain elevator paid for grain received from its customer with a bad check. The debtor replaced the check within 90 days before bankruptcy with a good check, payable to both the customer and the customer’s bank, to obtain a release of the bank’s security interest in the grain. The debtor's customer's receipt of the bad check did not release the customer's bank's security interest in the grain; only the replacement check did. Although a replacement check for goods previously sold free and clear to the debtor is not typically a contemporaneous exchange, because the bad check converts the transaction to a credit transaction, here the security interest release was a substantially contemporaneous exchange for the replacement check payment, and it was intended to be contemporaneous. Therefore, the replacement check payment qualifies for the section 547(c)(1) contemporaneous-exchange-for-new-value exception to preference avoidance. Velde v. Reinhardt, 366 B.R. 894 (D. Minn. 2007); Velde v. Kirsch, 366 B.R. 902 (D. Minn. 2007), aff'd, 543 F.3d 469 (8th Cir. 2008).

2.2.bbbbb A credit transaction may result in a contemporaneous exchange for new value.

When the debtor's financial condition deteriorated after its 15-year relationship with a supplier, the supplier imposed new, substantially tighter credit terms of 1%, 7 days, net 8, required wire transfer payments, and substantially reduced the debtor's credit limit. Within five months, the debtor filed bankruptcy. During the five-month period, the debtor paid within credit terms, wiring funds in many cases on the day it received the goods. In response to the trustee's preference action, the supplier argued that the payments were excepted from preference recovery under section 547(c)(1) because they were intended by the debtor and the supplier to be a contemporaneous exchange for new value. A credit transaction may qualify as one intended to be "a contemporaneous exchange for new value". Although by its nature a credit transaction involves a delay between delivery and payment, section 547(c)(1) applies only if section 547(b) applies, which requires a finding that the payment was for an antecedent debt, hence a credit transaction. Therefore, section 547(c)(1) does not categorically exclude credit transactions from its coverage. The bankruptcy court must examine the parties' intent in establishing the relationship, in which payments were generally made contemporaneously with receipt of goods, to determine whether the transaction was in fact intended to be a contemporaneous exchange for new value. Hechinger Inv. Co. of Del., Inc. v. Univ. Forest Prods., Inc. (In re Hechinger Inv. Co. of Del., Inc.), 489 F.3d 568 (3d Cir. 2007).

2.2.ccccc Is a loan repaid within 15 days a substantially contemporaneous exchange for new value?

The debtor ran out of cash. Its president advanced $100,000, to be repaid as soon as the debtor had funds. The debtor repaid 15 days later and filed bankruptcy a few months after that. In response to the trustee's preference claim, the president argued that section 547(c)(1) insulated the payment from avoidance because the repayment was intended to be a contemporaneous exchange for new value (the loan) and was in fact substantially contemporaneous. The court denied the president's motion for summary judgment, because an intent to repay when funds become available differs from an intention of contemporaneity. In addition, although "substantially" is a flexible term that is subject to examination in each case, the evidence here was insufficient to support summary judgment on the question of whether the repayment was substantially contemporaneous. The trustee apparently did not argue case law or the legislative history, which say that section 547(c)(1) is intended to apply only to a cash transaction, not to a credit transaction, no matter how short. Tomsic v. Stockard (In re Salience Assocs., Inc.), 371 B.R. 571 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2007).

2.2.ddddd Change in credit terms may take on-time payments out of the ordinary course of business defense.

When the debtor's financial condition deteriorated after its 15-year relationship with a supplier, the supplier imposed new, substantially tighter credit terms of 1%, 7 days, net 8, required wire transfer payments, and substantially reduced the debtor's credit limit, in a manner that was "extreme" and "out of character with the long historical relationship between these parties". Within five months, the debtor filed bankruptcy. During the five-month period, the debtor paid nearly all invoices within the new credit terms, wiring funds in many cases on the day it received the goods. In response to the trustee's preference action, the supplier argued that the payments were excepted from preference recovery under section 547(c)(2) because they were made within the new credit terms. However, compliance with credit terms is not enough by itself to bring payments within the defense that the payments were “made in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee”. The change in credit terms, method of payment, and credit limit imposed when the debtor began exhibiting financial trouble were enough to take all of the payments out of the lengthy historical ordinary course of business between the parties. Hechinger Inv. Co. of Del., Inc. v. Univ. Forest Prods., Inc. (In re Hechinger Inv. Co. of Del., Inc.), 489 F.3d 568 (3d Cir. 2007).

2.2.eeeee Earmarking doctrine does not save a late-filed mortgage. The debtor refinanced her house within 90 days before bankruptcy. The new lender recorded its mortgage 14 days after the refinancing; the old lender did not release its old mortgage until several weeks after that. The late-recorded mortgage was not filed within section 547(e)(2)(B)'s then-applicable 10-day grace period. Thus, the transfer of the interest in the debtor's property occurred when the new lender recorded the mortgage. The earmarking doctrine does not save the transaction, even though the old lender's mortgage was still recorded, because the mortgage interest was transferred to the new lender by the debtor, not through the debtor from the old lender to the new lender. Finally, section 547(c)(2)(B)'s “substantially contemporaneous” defense does not override section 547(e)(2)(B)'s express grace period requirement. Therefore, the late-recorded mortgage was a preference. Collins v. Greater Atl. Mortgage Corp. (In re Lazarus), 478 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2007).

2.2.fffff Prepetition return of mistakenly deposited check is not a preference. The debtor received and deposited a check addressed and payable to another business located in the same building. The debtor and the other business had no other connections or business between them. When notified of the error, the debtor paid the amount to the other business. The debtor filed bankruptcy days later. The funds were not property of the debtor, because the debtor held them in constructive trust for the other business. State law determines whether there is a constructive trust and when it arises. Here, Illinois law imposes a constructive trust when a party receives funds, either wrongfully or mistakenly, to which it has no claim, whether under contract or otherwise, so the debtor did not have any legal or equitable claim to the funds. The debtor's payment to the other business before bankruptcy therefore did not transfer an interest of the debtor in property. In addition, the other business was not a “creditor,” because it did not have a “right to payment” from the debtor under a consensual or other relationship imposed by law (such as a tort claim) but rather a right to a return of its property. Finally, a transfer did not occur, because under section 547(e)(3), “a transfer is not made until the debtor has acquired rights in the property.” Here, the debtor did not have any rights in the property. The trustee therefore could not avoid the payment as a preference. For the same reasons, the trustee's strong arm power under section 544(a) did not defeat the other business's interest in the funds. A hypothetical judicial lien creditor would have taken subject to the other business's beneficial interest under the constructive trust. Claybrook v. Consol. Foods, Inc. (In re Bake-Line Group, LLC), 359 B.R. 566 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007).

2.2.ggggg The first time may be in the ordinary course. The debtor contracted for product development services with a developer with whom the debtor had never previously done business. Alleging that the debtor owed for work already performed, the developer obtained a settlement agreement from the debtor that provided for a lump sum payment and monthly payments for 12 months. After eight payments, the debtor filed bankruptcy. The trustee sued for recovery of the last two payments as preferences. Section 547(c)(2) excepts a transfer from preference avoidance if, among other things, “(A) [the] debt [is] incurred by the debtor in the ordinary course of business of financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee.” Although “ordinary course” case law generally focuses on the prior dealings between the debtor and the creditor, a first-time debt may also be incurred “in the ordinary course” if it is of the kind that would be expected as part of the debtor's and creditor's ordinary business operations, that is, if it is similar to this particular debtor's and this particular creditor's past practices in dealing with other, similarly situated parties. If one of the parties has never engaged in similar transactions, the court may still consider whether similarly situated parties would engage in this kind of transaction as part of normal business practices. Wood v. Stratos Prod. Dev., LLC (In re Ahaza Sys., Inc.), 482 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2007).

- 2.2.hhhhh Determining whether a debt is incurred in the ordinary course requires evaluation of the underlying obligation. The debtor contracted for product development services with a developer. Alleging that the debtor owed for work already performed, the developer obtained a settlement agreement from the debtor that provided for a lump sum payment and monthly payments for 12 months. After eight payments, the debtor filed bankruptcy, and the trustee sued for recovery of the last two payments as preferences. Section 547(c)(2) excepts a transfer from preference avoidance if, among other things, “(A) [the] debt [is] incurred by the debtor in the ordinary course of business of financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee.” “Debt” includes any payment obligation. The settlement agreement only restructures an existing debt; it does not create or incur a debt. The court therefore must determine whether the original debt was incurred in the ordinary course with reference to the original product development agreement and the obligations it imposed on the debtor, not simply with reference to whether the settlement agreement was in the ordinary course. Wood v. Stratos Prod. Dev., LLC (In re Ahaza Sys., Inc.), 482 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2007).
- 2.2.iiiii Forbearance is not “new value.” The debtor purchased software from a Microsoft reseller. Microsoft retained the right to revoke the software license if the debtor did not complete its installment payments to the reseller. The debtor fell behind in payments but eventually made them up, shortly before bankruptcy. The reseller’s failure to notify Microsoft of the payment defaults and the resulting forbearance did not provide new value, that is, the debtor’s ability to continue to use the software despite the payment defaults was not new value. First, it was Microsoft, not the reseller, who had the authority to revoke the license; the reseller therefore did not provide new value by not exercising a right it did not have. Second, the sale agreement differs from lease or a license, which requires periodic payments to retain the underlying asset. In that case, the asset retention without payment might provide the debtor with new value. Here, the sale was completed, and the debtor’s payment obligation was not in exchange for on-going use of the license. In re ABC-NACO, Inc., 483 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2007).
- 2.2.jjjjj Satisfaction of an existing contractual obligation does not provide “new value.” The debtor contracted to purchase manufacturing equipment. It agreed to make 10 payments for the equipment over the course of a year, the last of which was due after installation and operation. After the debtor made the ninth payment, the supplier started machine delivery and would have completed delivery had the debtor not instructed it to stop because of financial troubles. Within 90 days after the ninth payment, the debtor filed bankruptcy. The supplier did not provide “new value” to the debtor before the bankruptcy so as to have a valid defense to the trustee’s preference claim. Under section 547(a)(2), “new value” does not include “an obligation substituted for an existing obligation.” Because the supplier was contractually obligated to deliver the machine under a single unified contract, the value it provided was not new—it was an existing obligation. “The fact that the parties structured both payment and delivery obligations under the contract to extend over a period of time does not transform each payment, or each delivery of goods, into an independent transaction,” unlike delivery under an installment contract. Gouveia v. RDI Group (In re GlobeBldg. Materials, Inc.), 484 F.3d 946 (7th Cir. 2007).
- 2.2.kkkkk Superior bargaining position does not make a counterparty an insider. The debtor’s supplier loaned it money under an agreement that required half of the loan proceeds to be used to purchase the supplier’s product, in part to cross-promote the debtor’s and supplier’s goods and services. The debtor misused the note proceeds. When the supplier found out, it called a default, which it promptly withdrew at the debtor’s request pending further negotiations, so that the debtor would not have to make public disclosure of the default. The negotiations resulted in the debtor's making a settlement payment to the supplier. The debtor filed bankruptcy more than 90 days later. The supplier was not a "non-statutory" insider. The strategic relationship between the debtor and the supplier was strictly to enhance both companies' businesses and did not give the supplier too close a relationship with the debtor or control over the debtor's business. The withdrawal of the default notice was not evidence to the contrary. The supplier's ability to apply financial pressure and its superior bargaining power did not make it an insider. MCA Fin. Group, Ltd. v. Hewlett-Packard (In re Fourthstage Techs., Inc.), 355 B.R. 155 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2006).

2.2.IIIII First cousin once removed is a "relative." "Insider" includes "relative" if the debtor is an individual. Under section 101(45), "relative" means "individual related by affinity or consanguinity within the third degree as determined by the common law." Canon law measures degrees by counting steps to the individuals from the common ancestor. Civil law measures steps by counting up from one individual to the common ancestor and then back down to the other. The common law determines degrees under the canon law method. Moreover, using the common law method is more consistent with preference law principles, which require particular scrutiny of transfers to insiders who may have unfair influence over the debtor. A relationship as close as cousin (second degree under canon law but fourth degree under civil law) is likely to influence a debtor unfairly as compared to other creditors. Therefore, a first cousin once removed is related in the third, not the fifth, degree. The cousin's wife is related in the same degree, because the "relative" definition includes "affinity," which describes a marital relationship the same as a blood relationship. O'Neal v. Arnold (In re Gray), 355 B.R. 777 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2006).

2.2.mmmmm "Insider" may include a person who is not a per se insider. The debtor's director's son was the sole member of an LLC that provided the debtor professional services. The director and his son were per se insiders, under the "insider" definition for a corporation in section 101(31)(B): "(i) director of the debtor ... or (vi) relative of a ... director." The LLC was not a per se insider. However, beyond the Code's definition, which uses the non-exclusive word "includes," "insider" status may be based on a sufficiently close business or personal relationship to permit the person to gain an advantage based solely on affinity. The relationship here qualifies under the broader, nonstatutory concept. In re Fortune Nat. Res. Corp., 350 B.R. 693 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2006).

2.2.nnnnn BAPCPA gives "ordinary business terms" preference defense new meaning. Before BAPCPA, a creditor could defeat a preference claim under section 547(c)(2) by showing that the transfer was both "made in the ordinary course of business of the debtor and the transferee" and "made according to ordinary business terms." Under BAPCPA, the creditor may defeat a preference by showing either one. Changing the conjunctive to a disjunctive effectively changed the meaning of the phrases. Previously, "ordinary business terms" provided an objective test, based on the practice in the creditor's industry, while "ordinary course of business" required a subjective analysis, based on the practice between the debtor and the creditor. The former test prevented a creditor from relying on a payment pattern with a debtor that would not be so unusual as to be outside industry norms, but the "ordinary course of business" test was the more important, if the debtor and the creditor had a significant history of dealing. If not, the "business terms" test became more important on a sliding scale to the extent the parties' dealings provided less of a guide. By separating the tests, they take on equal importance, requiring the creditor to make a thorough evidentiary showing, not merely conclusory allegations at a high level of generality, about the practice in the creditor's industry, to sustain this defense. In this case, the debtor paid the bank's notes, which were guaranteed by the principal, shortly before the notes' due dates. The bank had not pressed for payment and was willing to extend the notes' maturity. Because the payments were near year-end, the bank believed the debtor's explanation that the notes were being paid in full as part of year-end personal financial planning. In fact, the debtor was winding down its business and paying off guaranteed debt. The payments were not according to ordinary business terms, as there was no evidence that such conduct is consistent with sound business practice or continuation of a business and therefore is not the kind of transfer that new section 547(c)(2)(B) is designed to protect. Hutson v. Branch Banking & Trust Co. (In re Nat'l Gas Distribs., LLC), 346 B.R. 394 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2006).

- 2.2.00000 Payments to a health insurance administrator may be avoidable preferences. The debtor provided a health insurance plan to its employees, which was funded in part by employee withholding and in part by employer contributions. An administrator administered the plan for the debtor, for which it charged a fee. It paid employee health care claims and then requested reimbursement from the debtor for the amounts paid. To the extent that a payment within 90 days before bankruptcy was made from funds withheld from employees, it is not avoidable as a preference, because the funds are trust funds from the moment they are withheld from an employee's compensation and are never property of the debtor. The portion of the payment from the employer's contribution is, however, from property of the debtor and may therefore be recoverable. The administrator is not a mere conduit of the payments to employees, because the payments reimbursed the administrator for payments that it had already made to employees, making it a creditor of the debtor. Golden v. Guardian (In re Lenox Healthcare, Inc.), 343 B.R. 96 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).
- 2.2.ppppp Debtor's obligation to pay for fuel was an antecedent debt. The debtor ordered fuel through its affiliate, which had good credit, and agreed to pay the affiliate the cost of the fuel and the applicable taxes by wire transfer before the fuel supplier debited the affiliate's account for the charges. In fact, the debtor paid late. The payments to the affiliate were on account of an antecedent debt. Even though the debtor was supposed to pay before the affiliate was required to pay the supplier, the affiliate extended credit to the debtor, because the debtor became obligated to pay the affiliate for the fuel from the moment the debtor obtained the fuel from the supplier. Callahan v. Petro Stopping Center #72 (In re Lambert Oil Co.), 347 B.R. 173 (W.D. Va. 2006).
- 2.2.qqqqq Trustee may not use state receiver's preference statute to avoid a preference. Wisconsin permits a receiver or assignee to recover a preference that a debtor made within four months before the filing of a receivership petition. The trustee in the debtor's subsequent bankruptcy tried to use this right as successor to creditors under section 544(b) to recover a preference that the debtor made more than 90 days before bankruptcy but within four months before the receivership. The trustee may not do so, because section 544(b) permits the trustee to invoke only the rights of a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim. Under Wisconsin law, only a receiver or assignee, not an unsecured creditor, may recover the preference, and the trustee does not succeed to the rights of a receiver. Dubis v. B.W. Supply (In re Delta Group), 336 B.R. 405 (E.D. Wis. 2004).
- 2.2.rrrrr Earmarking doctrine applies to a late-filed mortgage. The debtor refinanced her home shortly before bankruptcy. The new lender paid the loan proceeds to the old lender but did not record the new mortgage until over two weeks later. The old lender's mortgage was not released from the property until two weeks after that. The case was governed by the pre-BAPCPA version of section 547(e)(2), which gave a lender only a 10-day grace period to perfect. Under these circumstances, where it was clear that the new loan was intended to repay the old loan, and the property records never showed the property as unencumbered, the transactions are treated as an integrated whole, and the delay in perfection, which would ordinarily constitute a transfer on account of an antecedent debt, did not result in a preference, because the three elements of the earmarking doctrine were present: the debtor agreed that the new funds would pay the old creditor, the agreement was performed, and the transaction did not diminish the estate. Collins v. Greater Atl. Mortgage Corp. (In re Lazarus), 334 B.R. 542 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2005).

2.2.sssss A director emeritus is not necessarily an insider. The debtor resigned as a director of the bank in 1990 and after his resignation attended board meetings only occasionally. He did not vote at the meetings. He received the title “director emeritus,” $400 monthly compensation, and a listing in the bank’s annual report. The debtor paid the bank a substantial amount on an unsecured loan between 90 days and one year before he filed bankruptcy in 2001. The trustee sued the bank for recovery of the payments as avoidable preferences, on the ground that the bank was an insider at the time of the transfers. The debtor’s status as director emeritus did not necessarily make the bank an insider. It was a question of fact, relating to the amount of control that the director exercised over the bank at the time of payment, that was not appropriate for summary judgment in favor of the trustee. Rupp v. United Sec. Bank (In re Kunz), 335 B.R. 170 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2005).

2.2.ttttt Subsequent new value defense is not cumulative with ordinary course of business defense. The creditor defended against preference litigation on the grounds that the payments were in the ordinary course of business and were protected by subsequent new value advances. The court rejects the ordinary course defense and upholds the subsequent new value defense, in part. It notes, however, that if the ordinary course defense were successful, the defenses would not be cumulative. That is, a payment protected by the ordinary course defense would vitiate a subsequent advance defense as applied to a prior payment, because the subsequent advance defense applies only if “the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of such creditor.” A payment protected by the ordinary course defense is “otherwise unavoidable.” However, if the debtor, after it receives a subsequent advance that offsets a prior preference, returns the goods because they were damaged or out of date, the return does not diminish the subsequent new value defense, because the goods were worthless. The court does not address whether the creditor should receive subsequent new value credit for worthless goods. G.H. Leidenheimer Baking Co. v. Sharp (In re SGSM Acq. Co.), 439 F.3d 233 (5th Cir. 2006).

2.2.uuuuu Payments for purchase of natural gas are forward contract settlement payments. The debtor produced plastic resins. It purchased large quantities of natural gas as a raw material for the production process under a long-term contract from a gas supplier. The liquidating trustee under the chapter 11 plan sued the supplier for recovery of a preference. The contract was a “forward contract,” because it provided for the sale of natural gas, which is a “commodity,” as defined under the Commodity Exchange Act, for delivery more than two days in the future. Although the long-term nature of the contract had a hedge quality to it, it is not relevant to the forward contract determination that the debtor entered into the contract to purchase a commodity for use in its business, rather than as a financial hedge or transaction. A contract for the ordinary purchase and sale of goods used in a debtor’s business still qualifies as a commodity contract. The legislative history confirms that Congress intended the definition to be extremely broad to provide maximum protection to forward contract merchants. The supplier was a “forward contract merchant,” because its business consisted largely of entering into contracts to supply natural gas. Finally, the prepetition payment was a settlement payment, because, like the definition of “commodity contract,” that definition is intended to be broad. It includes all kinds of payments in wide use in the forward contract markets. BCP Liquidating LLC v. Bridgeline Gas Mktg. LLC (In re Borden Chems. and Plastics Operating Ltd. P’ship), 336 B.R. 214 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).

2.2.vvvvv Preference to foreign creditor is recoverable. The debtor contracted with a Taiwan company to import goods manufactured in China. The Taiwan company ordered the goods and arranged for their shipment to the United States, including completing all customs forms. Title did not pass to the debtor until the debtor inspected the goods on delivery in the United States. The debtor wire transferred payment for the goods to the Taiwan company from a U.S. bank to a Taiwan bank within 90 days before bankruptcy. The payment was a preference to which section 547 applied. Whether or not section 547 has extraterritorial reach, this transfer occurred in the United States. The goods were ordered from and delivered in the United States, and title passed in the United States. The location of the creditor, who sought business in the United States, and of the receiving bank did not affect the result. In addition, comity does not require deference to the laws of Taiwan, which does not provide for avoidance of preferences. Comity becomes important in this context only where there are bankruptcy proceedings in both jurisdictions, which there are not. Florsheim Group Inc. v. USAsia Int'l. Corp. (In re Florsheim Group Inc.), 336 B.R. 126 (Bankr. E.D. Ill. 2005).

2.2.wwwww BAPCPA's fix to the DePrizio repeal applies retroactively to pending actions. The creditors committee had brought an action to recover as a preference a mortgage that the debtor had granted more than 90 days before bankruptcy to a bank that had a guarantee from an insider. Under In re DePrizio, 874 F.2d 1186 (7th Cir. 1989), the mortgage grant was avoidable and recoverable as to the bank, because the 1994 amendment to section 550 to overrule DePrizio did not overrule it as to the granting of a preferential lien. However, BAPCPA fixed that oversight and applied the fix to pending cases. Such application to pending cases is constitutional. A plaintiff does not have a property right for purposes of the Fifth Amendment Takings Clause in pending litigation that has not been reduced to judgment. Similarly, the committee does not have a property interest in the unencumbered real property, because the avoiding powers do not grant such an interest until after judgment, and the mortgage cannot be said to have an implied clause incorporating preference law, such that the committee or the estate had a vested property interest despite the mortgage. Finally, retroactive application does not violate due process, because Congress had a rational purpose in applying the amendment to pending litigation. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Bank of America, N.A. (In re ABC-NACO, Inc.), 331 B.R. 773 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2005).

2.2.xxxxx Settlement of lease dispute is not payment of an antecedent debt. The debtor offered to buy out a tenant's lease. When it could not reach agreement, it claimed the tenant was in breach, sent a termination letter, and brought eviction proceedings. The debtor and the tenant ultimately settled, the tenant vacated, and the debtor paid the settlement amount within 90 days before bankruptcy. The trustee sued to recover the payment as a preference. The court should look behind the settlement to determine the nature of the claim and the payment. On that basis, there was no preference. The debtor's termination letter did not constitute an anticipatory breach, which would have given rise to a claim against the debtor. Therefore, the debtor's payment was not on account of an antecedent debt. In addition, under state law, the tenant had an interest in real property, which the debtor purchased with the settlement payment. Peltz v. Vancil, Inc. (In re Bridge Info. Sys., Inc.), 327 B.R. 382 (Bankr. 8th Cir. 2005); aff'd, Peltz v. Edw. C. Vancil, Inc. (In re Bridge Info. Sys., Inc.), 474 F.3d 1063 (8th Cir. 2007).

2.2.yyyyy "Greater percentage test" does not require tracing of security interest proceeds. The creditor provided floor plan financing for the car dealership debtor. The debtor had repaid some of the amounts owing in the 90 days before bankruptcy. The trustee sued to recover a preference. The creditor argued that the trustee did not meet the greater percentage test because the payments were car proceeds. The trustee argued that the creditor had to trace the proceeds of car sales to the payments to the creditor to establish a valid security interest in the proceeds and show that it would have received as much in a chapter 7 case as if the payments had not been made. The Fourth Circuit rules that tracing is irrelevant, because UCC § 9-306(4) provides the rules for determining the extent of a perfected security interest in proceeds "in the event of insolvency proceedings instituted by or against a debtor." It provides that the secured party has a perfected security interest in identifiable proceeds and in non-identifiable cash proceeds received by the debtor within the 10-day period before the insolvency proceeding, less any payments to the secured party during that period. The court remands for a determination under this standard. Hall v. Chrysler Credit Corp. (In re JKJ Chevrolet, Inc.), 412 F.3d 545 (4th Cir. 2005).

- 2.2.zzzzz Trustee avoids involuntary gap payment as a preference in a subsequent bankruptcy. Three creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The debtor paid off the creditors, and the court dismissed the case. Within 90 days, the debtor filed a voluntary bankruptcy. The trustee sued one of the creditors for recovery of a preference. The court carefully describes the similarities and differences between “antecedent debt” and “contemporaneous exchange for new value” analyses. Although a particular transfer may be one, both, or neither, in this case, the transfer was only on account of an antecedent debt. Even though it obtained the dismissal of the involuntary case, the debt existed before the payment, and the payment was in satisfaction of that obligation. The dismissal did not provide new value, because “new value” is “money or money’s worth, in goods, services, or release by a transferee of property previously transferred to such transferee” and must be “given to the debtor” to qualify for the preference exception in section 547(c)(1). Although the dismissal provided value to the debtor, it was only a secondary or tertiary benefit, not a part of a contemporaneous exchange that the statute requires. In addition, the creditor argued that the payment satisfied a statutory lien and therefore met the exception in section 547(c)(6). However, section 547(c)(6) applies only to the fixing of a statutory lien, not the satisfaction, which must be tested under the greater percentage test of section 547(b)(5). Here, the creditor’s lien was not perfected and so did not qualify. Baker Hughes Oilfield Operations, Inc. v. Cage (In re Ramba, Inc.), 416 F.3d 394 (5th Cir. 2005).
- 2.2.aaaaa Estate representative may not rescind contract assumption to pursue preference action. The plan transferred avoiding power claims to an estate representative, who sued the debtor’s health insurer for recovery of prepetition payments. When the insurer defended on the ground that the insurance contract had been assumed under the plan, thereby immunizing the prepetition payment from preference attack, the representative moved under Rule 60(b)(6) to vacate the order approving assumption. Because the representative succeeded to the estate’s right, it was bound by the estate’s action in assuming the contract and was estopped by its predecessor-in-interest’s action in assuming the contract. In addition, Rule 60(b)(6) permits relief only in extraordinary circumstances or extreme and undue hardship. The possibility of reduced recovery to unsecured creditors is not such a circumstance. Unsecured Claims Estate Representative v. Cigna Healthcare, Inc. (In re Teligent, Inc.), 326 B.R. 219 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).
- 2.2.bbbbbb Manufacture of specialty goods does not constitute “new value.” The debtor provided purchase orders to the supplier for the manufacture of specialty goods that were unique to the debtor. The supplier manufactured the goods but did not ship them to the debtor before bankruptcy. It claimed that the manufacturing, at the debtor’s order, constituted “new value” that could be offset under section 547(c)(4) against potential preference liability. The court rules that “new value” requires that the debtor receive something of direct material benefit or that the creditor in some fashion “replenish the estate” for the preference received. Moltech Power Sys., Inc. v. Truelove & Maclean, Inc. (In re Moltech Power Sys., Inc.), 326 B.R. 179 (Bankr. N.D. Fla. 2005).
- 2.2.cccccc “New value” exception requires “otherwise unavoidable transfer,” not payment. The debtor made payments to the creditor during the preference period, but the creditor sold new product after the payments, for which it was not paid, and claimed the “new value” defense in response to the trustee’s preference action. The new value defense does not require that the creditor not have been paid for the new value. It requires that the creditor gave new value “on account of which new value the debtor did not make any otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of such creditor.” The issue is therefore not whether there was a payment, but whether it is “otherwise unavoidable.” It does not become so simply because the trustee allows the statute of limitations in section 546(c) to lapse. Hall v. Chrysler Credit Corp. (In re JKJ Chevrolet, Inc.), 412 F.3d 545 (4th Cir. 2005).

2.2.ddddd Payments on illegal securities contracts are not “settlement payments.” The debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. The investment interests were issued in violation of the securities laws. Shortly before bankruptcy, one of the investors withdrew a significant portion of his investment. The investor defended against the trustee’s preference action by arguing that the payment was a “settlement payment.” The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel concludes the payment does not meet the definition of “settlement payment.” The definition lists various kinds of settlement payments and concludes, “or any other similar payment commonly used in the securities trade.” That phrase defines the scope of the definition. Payments on illegal securities are not commonly used in the securities trade. Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Code’s settlement payments provisions to protect the proper functioning of the securities markets, to assure their integrity, and to enhance enforcement of the securities laws. Recognizing payments on illegal securities as settlement payments would undermine that purpose. The payment here was not made on a public market and did not involve the process of clearing trades. Therefore, the payments are not protected. Kipperman v. Circle Trust F.B.O. (In re Grafton Partners, L.P.), 321 B.R. 527 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).

2.2.eeeee Financial contract safe harbor does not protect illegal transaction. The debtor had entered into a contract in the form of a swap, on an ISDA form, to purchase its own shares at a fixed price at a future date. The contract could be settled in cash or in kind. The debtor was insolvent at the time. The transaction was illegal under Oregon law, which prohibits a corporation from purchasing its own shares while insolvent, and makes the directors liable to the corporation for the amount paid. The debtor filed bankruptcy within a year after the purchase, and the trustee sought recovery as a fraudulent transfer or illegal dividend of the payment to the counterparty, who moved to dismiss on the ground that the payment was protected by the settlement payment provision in section 546(e) and the financial contract safe harbor in section 546(g). Although those sections are designed to protect settlement payments and swaps to ensure the smooth functioning of the financial markets, they do not protect an illegal transaction. Protecting such a transaction does not protect the financial markets; it does just the opposite. The payment was therefore not a “settlement payment,” and the defendant’s motion to dismiss is denied. Enron Corp. v. Bear, Stearns Int’l, Ltd. (In re Enron Corp.), 323 B.R. 857 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).

2.2.fffff Bankruptcy Code preempts preference provision in state assignment for the benefit of creditors statute. The debtor made an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Applicable law gave the assignee the power to avoid pre-assignment preferences under standards very similar to those set forth in section 547. The federal bankruptcy law is pervasive and so dominant as to preclude enforcement of state laws on the same subject, except in those areas in which the Bankruptcy Code incorporates state law, such as in determining property rights, allowability of claims, or avoidability of certain transfers under section 544(b) by a creditor holding an unsecured claim. The Bankruptcy Code embodies the two policies of fresh start and equitable distribution. The fresh start provision preempts state discharge laws; so do the equitable distribution provisions. Similarly, the Code preempts the state’s attempt to foster equitable distribution by a preference statute. The federal system is so complete a system for the adjustment of debtors’ and creditors’ rights that use of the state law system creates improper intrusion into the use of the federal system. The same rule would not, however, prevent application of a state preference law under which a creditor (rather than an assignee) had the right to recover, because section 544(b) accommodates such claims. Sherwood Partners, Inc. v. Lycos, Inc., 394 F.3d 1198 (9th Cir. 2005).

2.2.ggggg Critical vendor order does not provide preference defense. When the debtor in possession sued to recover a preference, the creditor defended on the ground that debtor in possession could not satisfy the greater percentage test of section 547(b)(5), because the creditor was a critical vendor who would have been paid under the court’s first-day critical vendor order if it had not been paid on the eve of filing. However, because the critical vendor order gave the debtor in possession discretion to pay and did not require payments to certain vendors, the creditor was unable to show that it would have been paid under the order. Moreover, even though the creditor argued that its goods were critical to the debtor in possession's operation and it would not have shipped had it not been paid, the court cannot conclude that it would have granted the critical vendor order if the creditor's large unpaid balance had been included in the debtor in possession's request. Zenith Indus. Corp. v. Longwood Elastomers, Inc. (In re Zenith Indus. Corp.), 319 B.R. 810 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).

- 2.2.hhhhhh Insider of a relative is not an insider. More than 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor granted a security interest to a creditor that was a wholly owned professional corporation of the wife of an officer and director of the debtor. The professional corporation is not liable for the preference, because it is not an insider. "Insider" includes a relative of an officer or director (§ 101(31)(B)(vi)). It also includes an "insider of an affiliate as if such affiliate were the debtor" (§ 101(31)(E)). But it does not specifically include an insider of a relative of an insider. The professional corporation is an insider of the relative, not an insider of an affiliate. Therefore, the trustee could not avoid the security interest. Miller Ave. Prof'l and Promo'l Servs., Inc. v. Brady (In re Enterprise Acquisition Partners, Inc.), 319 B.R. 626 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).
- 2.2.iiiii Attorney's fee payment as part of settlement is subject to preference recovery. Before bankruptcy, the debtor settled an action under the ADA. The settlement required the debtor to make physical modifications to its properties and to pay the plaintiff's attorney's fees. The obligation to pay fees became fixed only when the court approved the settlement agreement. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sued the attorney for recovery of the fees as a preference. The definitions of "claim," "debt," and "creditor" in section 101 apply to determine when a claim becomes an "antecedent debt" and whether the holder is a "creditor." The claim for fees arose when the claim was asserted under the ADA, even though the claim was contingent and disputed and did not become fixed until settlement. Therefore, the fee payment was on account of an antecedent debt, and the holder of the claim was a creditor. Phoenix Restaurant Group, Inc. v. Fuller, Fuller & Assocs., P.A. (In re Phoenix Restaurant Group, Inc.), 316 B.R. 671 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 2004).
- 2.2.jjjjjj Payment under a single transaction with a vendor may qualify for ordinary course exception to preference. The debtor ordered a capital asset from a vendor with whom it had not previously done business. The vendor installed the asset and invoiced the debtor on 20-day terms. The debtor refused to pay because of defective installation. The vendor adjusted the installation, and the debtor paid 6 days later. The payment qualifies for the ordinary course of business exception to preference recovery. In a case of first impression, the court rules that the parties need not previously establish a course of business to qualify. Here, the invoice was paid promptly after installation was properly completed. Even though it was paid substantially after the original invoice date, that is not the controlling date when other factors dictate otherwise, as the improper installation did here. USOP Liquidating LLC v. Service Supply, Ltd., Inc. (In re US Office Products Co.), 315 B.R. 37 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004).
- 2.2.kkkkkk Valueless returned goods do not diminish new value defense. In the 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor made numerous payments to the supplier, but the supplier also shipped a substantial amount of product to the debtor, some of which went stale before the debtor sold it. The debtor returned the stale product to the supplier and received credit for the original invoice amount of the returned product. The supplier asserted that the value of the product shipped should give rise to a new value defense to preference recovery. The trustee asserted that the invoice price of the returned goods should be deducted from the amount allowable as new value, because the debtor did not retain the goods or their value. The court rules that the supplier is entitled to the defense, because the return of valueless goods to the supplier did not constitute an otherwise avoidable transfer that would take the goods out of the new value defense available to the supplier. Gonzales v. Nabisco (In re Furr's Supermarkets, Inc.), 317 B.R. 423 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2004).

2.2.IIIII Debtor's issuance of convertible debt may constitute a transfer. After the creditor received repayment of a $20 million loan, the creditor loaned the debtor $30 million on a convertible subordinated note. The trustee sought recovery of the $20 million payment; the creditor defended under section 547(c)(4), arguing that the $30 million loan constituted subsequent new value for which "the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer." The issuance of a note would not be a transfer, but the convertibility feature, constituting a call option on the debtor's stock, was a transfer of something of value from the debtor to the creditor. The court focuses on "whether the transactions in question have in some way negatively impacted the debtor's financial condition." Because the debtor could have sold the call option and because the presence of the call option diluted the debtor's ability to raise capital through the issuance of equity, the grant of the call option was a potentially avoidable transfer that diminished the creditor's subsequent new value defense. Peltz v. Welsh, Carson, Anderson & Stowe VII, L.P. (In re Bridge Info. Sys., Inc.), 311 B.R. 781 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2004).

2.2.mmmmm Payment of assigned lease proceeds is not a preference. The debtor agreed to sell three leases. The buyer gave the debtor a license to use the leased premises after the sale for two months to liquidate its inventory, and the buyer held the sale proceeds until the debtor vacated. The debtor granted a security interest in the lease proceeds to its lender. The lender perfected its lien under the U.C.C., but not under the real property recording statutes. The sale closed more than 90 days before the debtor's bankruptcy petition, but the debtor vacated the premises and the lender received the sale proceeds less than 90 days before the petition date. The lender did not receive a preference, because it received a perfected security interest in the proceeds, which is all that the debtor owned once the sale had closed, more than 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor no longer owned the leases themselves, so it did not matter that the lender had not perfected under the real property recording laws. Biase v. Congress Fin. Corp. (In re Tops Appliance City, Inc.), 372 F.3d 510 (3d Cir. 2004).

2.2.nnnnn Permissive critical vendor order does not insulate against preference recovery. A critical vendor order that permits but does not require the debtor in possession to pay prepetition claims of critical vendors does not prevent the recovery from the vendor of prepetition payments as preferences. The preferences were made before the critical vendor order and were not litigated at the time of the order, so the order does not by itself protect them. In addition, because the order was not mandatory, it was not a determination that all payments for prepetition balances should be protected. HLI Creditor Trust v. Export Corp. (In re Hayes Lemmerz Int'l, Inc.), 313 B.R. 189 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004). Contra Official Comm. v. Medical Mut. (In re Primary Health Sys., Inc.), 275 B.R. 709 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002), aff'd, C.A. No. 02-301 (D. Del. Feb. 27, 2003).

2.2.ooooo Subsequent new value rule does not require unpaid advances. The subsequent advance (or new value) preference defense of section 547(c)(4) requires that for any qualifying subsequent advance, "the debtor did not make an otherwise unavoidable transfer to or for the benefit of the creditor." This language does not require that the subsequent new advance be unpaid to qualify. Any unavoidable transfer will render the defense unavailable; conversely, unpaid advances or advances for which the debtor made avoidable transfers qualify for the defense. The district court remands for determination of whether the subsequent repayments, including some postpetition payments, disqualify subsequent advances as an affirmative defense. Chrysler Credit Corp. v. Hall, 312 B.R. 796 (E.D. Va. 2004).

2.2.ppppp Trustee has burden of proof on tracing commingled collateral proceeds. The debtor commingled the lender's collateral proceeds with its general funds and made several payments to the lender within 90 days before bankruptcy. At all times, the creditor was undersecured. The trustee sought preference recovery. The lender argued that the trustee did not satisfy the greater percentage test of section 547(b)(5), because the payments came from the lender's collateral. The court could not determine whether they did without tracing. Section 9-315 of the U.C.C. requires a secured creditor to trace its collateral into commingled accounts to show priority of its security interest in proceeds. But in a preference action, section 547(g) places the burden on the trustee to prove all elements of the preference. So the burden was on the trustee to trace to show that the lender was not paid from proceeds of its collateral. Chrysler Credit Corp. v. Hall, 312 B.R. 796 (E.D. Va. 2004).

2.2.qqqqqq Ohio preference statute does not apply to payments. Only four states have general preference statutes, Ohio, Kentucky, Maryland, and New Mexico. Ohio's statute, enacted in 1898, permits a receiver to recover a preferential "sale, conveyance, transfer, mortgage, or assignment." The Ohio Supreme Court construed the statute in 1903 to exclude payments from its reach. Nevertheless, the debtor in possession sued to recover a payment as a preference under this statute. Rejecting the argument that the bankruptcy court is not bound to follow a 100-year-old decision, the court dismisses the debtor in possession's complaint. Roberds, Inc. v. Broyhill Furniture (In re Roberds, Inc.), 313 B.R. 732 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2004).

2.2.rrrrrr Property that debtor received as an agent is not "property of the debtor" for preferences. The debtor was a purchasing cooperative, which acted as an agent for each of its members to make bulk purchases for the members. At the end of each year, the suppliers issued a rebate check to the debtor for distribution to the members, based on the amount of their purchases. The debtor placed the refund check in a special bank account and promptly distributed the amounts owing to each of its members. Because of the agency relationship, the debtor held the property in a resulting trust and held only legal title, not any beneficial interest. As such, the funds were not the property of the debtor for purposes of determining whether their payment to the members within 90 days before bankruptcy was a preference. Weiner v. A.G. Minzer Supply Corp. (In re UDI Corp.), 301 B.R. 104 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2003).

2.2.ssssss Lender who exercises control may be an insider. Where a secured lender had sufficient influence to cause the placement of a new chief financial officer from a turnaround management firm and initiate an acquisition transaction that would provide the lender with additional collateral, the lender may have sufficient control to qualify as a "person in control," as used in the definition of "insider" in section 101(31)(B)(iii). Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Credit Suisse First Boston (In re Exide Technologies, Inc.), 299 B.R. 732 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003).

2.2.tttttt Claim settlement does not preclude subsequent preference recovery. In the early days of this chapter 11 case, the debtor entered into a settlement agreement with a creditor over the allowable amount of the creditor's claims, in order to facilitate a sale of the debtor's assets. Later in the case, the debtor sued the creditor to recover a preference. The creditor argued that the claims settlement barred preference recovery, because section 502(d) precludes claims allowance until a creditor has returned a preference. So allowance of the claims constituted a determination that the creditor had not received a preference. The bankruptcy court rejects this argument. It holds that section 502(d) is available after the claims allowance process "to coerce creditors to comply with judicial orders." Rhythms NetConnections Inc. v. Cisco Systems Inc. (In re Rhythms NetConnections Inc.), 300 B.R. 404 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003).

2.2.uuuuuu Contract assumption bars preference recovery. Once the debtor in possession assumes an executory contract, the subsequent chapter 7 trustee may not recover as a preference any payments made before bankruptcy. The payments do not meet the "greater percentage" test of section 547(b)(5), because the assumption of the contract means that the preference defendant was no longer an unsecured creditor. Kimmelman v. Port Authority of New York and New Jersey (In re Kiwi Int'l Airlines, Inc.), 344 F.3d 311 (3d Cir. 2003).

- 2.2.vvvvvv Provisional check credit is not an extension of credit for preference purposes. When a drawer's check is presented to a bank, the bank has until midnight of the next day (the midnight deadline) to determine whether to honor the check. The bank may contact the drawer to advise the drawer that it needs to deposit additional funds to cover the check, failing which the bank may dishonor. In this case, the depositor deposited the additional funds before the midnight deadline, so the bank did not dishonor the check for insufficient funds. This process did not involve the extension of credit by the bank to the drawer, because the bank had advanced no funds of its own and was not liable for payment of the check until the midnight deadline. Jacobs v. State Bank of Long Island (In re Apponline.com, Inc.), 296 B.R. 602 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2003).
- 2.2.wwwwww Potential preference defendant is not entitled to a declaratory judgment. The Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201-2202, was intended to provide a potential defendant with a forum to resolve a potential dispute that could affect the defendant's conduct. It was not intended to permit a potential defendant to force a determination of liability for past conduct. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court dismisses a declaratory judgment action by recipients of potentially avoidable transfers for a determination of the avoidability of the transfers. Allen v. Official Employment-Related Issues Committee (In re Enron Corp.), 297 B.R. 382 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003).
- 2.2.xxxxxx In re Shared Technologies Cellular, Inc., 281 B.R. 804 (Bankr. D. Conn. 2002) (February 2003, paragraph 2.2.c), affirmed by 293 B.R. 89 (D. Conn. 2003).
- 2.2.yyyyyy Stolen funds, paid through escrow, are recoverable as a preference. The debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. Two investors deposited funds in escrow for the debtor, which the debtor improperly withdrew. The debtor defrauded another investor and used the other investor's funds to replenish the escrow, which was then repaid to the initial investor. The trustee sought recovery of the funds from the initial investor of the funds as a preference. The court rules the funds recoverable. Even though the debtor obtained the funds through fraud, they were property of the debtor under Utah law and under the Bankruptcy Code, because they would have become property of the estate had the bankruptcy been filed while the debtor still held the funds. Moreover, the creditor, not the escrow company, was the initial transferee, while the escrow company was a mere conduit. In the Tenth Circuit, to be an initial transferee, the transferee must actually receive the funds and have full dominion and control for its own account, as opposed to receiving the funds in trust or as agent. Mere physical control is not adequate; the transferee must have the right to use the funds for its own purpose. The escrow company here did not. Bailey v. Big Sky Motors, Ltd. (In re Ogden), 314 F.3d 1190 (10th Cir. 2002).
- 2.2.zzzzzz Client of Qualified Like-kind Exchange Intermediary has preference liability for payments made to property seller. The debtor was a Qualified Intermediary for like-kind exchange transactions under section 1031 of the Internal Revenue Code. M&H used the debtor for a like-kind exchange under which M&H sold property and subsequently was to acquire raw land on which a facility was to be built. The debtor received the proceeds of the sale, commingled it with its other funds (as it was permitted to do), acquired the new land, and made payments to the builder of the new facility within 90 days before its bankruptcy. The trustee sought recovery of the payments from M&H as the entity for whose benefit the payments were made. The court determines that the property transferred was property of the debtor and the transfer was on account of an antecedent debt owed to M&H. The court also determines that the debtor did not receive new value in exchange for the transfers and that the transfer was not in the ordinary course of business of M&H and the debtor, because this was an unusual transaction for M&H. Accordingly, the court grants judgment to the trustee. On M&H's motion, however, the court requires the trustee to transfer the new property and facility to M&H. Manty v. Miller & Holmes, Inc. (In re Nation-Wide Exchange Services), 291 B.R. 131 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2003).

2.2.aaaaaa Replacement of NSF check does not constitute new value. The debtor paid a subcontractor, who released its lien on the contractor's bond. The check bounced. The debtor replaced the check with a cashier's check a few days later. The bankruptcy appellate panel holds that because the subcontractor unconditionally released the lien on the bond before it received the cashier's check, the cashier's check was not a contemporaneous exchange for new value and that the preference defense of section 547(c)(1) did not apply. The B.A.P. also holds that, to the extent the construction bond is less than the remaining subcontractor claims against the debtor, a payment by the debtor in exchange for a release of a lien on the bond might not constitute a contemporaneous exchange for new value. Janas v. Marco Crane and Rigging Co. (In re JWW Contracting Co., Inc.), 287 B.R. 501 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).

2.2.bbbbbbb Ordinary course defense of section 547(c)(2)(C) does not require compliance with industry averages. Adopting the reasoning of In re Tolona Pizza, 3 F.3d 1029 (7th Cir. 1993), the Ninth Circuit rules that a debtor's payments that are within the broad range of terms that encompass the practices employed by debtors and creditors, including those that are ordinary for those under financial distress is consistent with ordinary business term. The creditor need not prove that the payment occurred within the industry average time. Ganis Credit Corp. v. Anderson (In re Jan Weilert R.V., Inc.), 315 F.3d 1192 (9th Cir. 2003).

2.2.cccccc Section 546(c) governs prepetition reclamation. The creditor had shipped goods to the debtor before bankruptcy, discovered that the debtor was insolvent, and demanded reclamation under U.C.C. section 2-702. The debtor returned the goods. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the creditor for receiving a preference. The creditor claimed that because U.C.C. 2-702 permitted reclamation, there was no preference. The court holds under the terms of section 546(c), the creditor has a valid defense to preference recovery only if the creditor complies with section 546(c), even pre-petition. In this case, the reclamation demand was not in writing, so it did not comply with section 546(c). Zeta Consumer Products Corp. v. Equistar Chemical, LP (In re Zeta Consumer Products Corp.), 291 B.R. 336 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2003).

2.2.dddddd Assumption of contract validates preference. The debtor had entered into a merger agreement before bankruptcy. The merger agreement provided for deferred payment of a portion of the purchase price. The deferred portion was paid before bankruptcy within the preference period. The confirmed plan provided that all contracts not rejected were assumed. Under this provision, the court holds that the merger agreement was assumed and that as a result, the creditor did not receive a greater percentage than it would have received in a chapter 7 liquidation. The court ruled that the greater percentage test is applied taking into account the effect of assumption, even though in a chapter 7 case, the contract would not have been assumed. Philip Servs. Corp. v. Luntz (In re Philip Servs. (Delaware), Inc.), 284 B.R. 541 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).

2.2.eeeeeee How to determine whether payments are "according to ordinary business terms." A creditor who has received a preference may defend on the ground that the payment was of a debt incurred in the ordinary course of business, made in the ordinary course of business between the debtor and creditor, and "made according to ordinary business terms." Section 547(c)(2)(C). Following the Seventh Circuit's decision in In re Tolona Pizza Products Corp., 3 F.3d 1029 (7th Cir. 1993), the Fifth Circuit rules that subparagraph (C) expresses an objective standard for the relevant industry. It does not require compliance with specific business terms but only that the dealings between the parties not be so far out of line as to what others in the industry do, that it is not according to ordinary business terms. The Fifth Circuit requires the creditor to "provide evidence of credit arrangements of other debtors and creditors in a similar market, preferably both geographic and product.” Gulf City Seafoods, Inc. v. Ludwig Shrimp Co., Inc. (In re Gulf City Seafoods, Inc.), 296 F.3d 363 (5th Cir. 2002).

- 2.2.ffffff Preference litigation in dueling bankruptcies. The liquidating trustee under the plan of debtor 1 objected to the creditor’s claim and sued to recover a preference. Before the preference issue was decided, the creditor became debtor 2 in a different bankruptcy court. The liquidating trustee sought relief from the stay in debtor 2’s case to pursue the preference action against debtor 2 in debtor 1’s case. The debtor 2 court grants relief from the stay on the condition that debtor 1’s liquidating trustee not use any preference determination as an objection to debtor 2’s proof of claim in debtor 1’s case under section 502(d), which requires disallowance of the claim of a transferee of an avoided transfer, unless the transferee “has paid the amount” for which it “is liable under section” 550. The court suggests (but does not hold) that the liquidating trustee’s recovery in debtor 2’s case of the preference at the dividend rate may satisfy section 502(d), on the theory that the debtor 2 estate is liable only for the percentage of the preference that is equal to the dividend percentage payable on unsecured claims. Golden Associates, L.L.C. v. Shared Technologies Cellular, Inc. (In re Shared Technologies Cellular, Inc.), 281 B.R. 804 (Bankr. D. Conn. 2002).
- 2.2.ggggggg Allowance of claim bars preference recovery. After the trustee’s objection to a creditor’s claim had been sustained and the claim allowed for a lesser amount than filed, the trustee commenced a preference action against the creditor. The court rules that section 502(d) bars the trustee’s claim for recovery of a preference. Section 502(d) prohibits allowance unless the creditor has turned over any avoidable transfers. Thus, allowance constitutes a determination that there are no avoidable transfers. LaRoche Industries, Inc. v. General American Transportation Corp. (In re LaRoche Industries, Inc.), 284 B.R. 406 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).
- 2.2.hhhhhhh Receipt of unreturned preference precludes allowance of administrative claim. Section 502(d) requires disallowance of any claim of an entity that received a voidable transfer who has not returned the transfer. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. rules that this disallowance provision applies as well to administrative claims. Even though the provision is in section 502, which deals only with pre-petition claims, the provision uses the word “claim” which is not limited to pre-petition claim. The B.A.P. dismisses any argument that the ruling will discourage pre-petition creditors from providing post-petition goods or services to a debtor-in-possession, on the theory that the pre-petition creditor would be liable for the preference in any event, but does not discuss whether the preference liability and the administrative claim may be offset. MicroAge, Inc. v. Viewsonic Corp. (In re MicroAge, Inc.), 284 B.R. 914 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).
- 2.2.iiiiiii Casino markers create “antecedent debt.” The debtor received casino chips in exchange for his marker, which acts like a check under the Uniform Commercial Code. However, the casino agreed not to deposit the marker against the debtor’s bank account for a period of time, in this case, 30 days. As such, the marker was not a concurrent transaction in which the debtor exchanged a check for chips. Rather, it was a credit transaction, much like a post-dated check, in which the casino extended credit to the debtor. Accordingly, the marker created an antecedent debt, the satisfaction of which was a preference. It was also not a contemporaneous exchange that meets the exception of section 547(c)(1). Harrah’s Tunica Corp. v. Meeks (In re Armstrong), 291 F.3d 517 (8th Cir. 2002).
- 2.2.jjjjjjj Gambling chips did not constitute “subsequent new value.” The debtor paid off a gambling debt to a casino. About a month later, the casino made a new loan of gambling chips to the debtor. The gambling chips did not qualify for the subsequent new value exception of section 547(c)(4), because the chips provided the debtor only with entertainment, not with valuable currency that could be used outside the casino. The new chips did not replenish the estate, and the creditor should not be permitted to improve its position against other creditors by the advance of such intangible value. Harrah's Tunica Corp. v. Meeks (In re Armstrong), 291 F.3d 517 (8th Cir. 2002).

2.2.kkkkkkk Ninth Circuit states preference rules for floating lien creditors. The creditor's claim was secured by a floating lien on inventory. The debtor paid the claim from its general funds each time an item of inventory was sold; the creditor paid inventory suppliers directly for additions to inventory. Within the 90 days before bankruptcy, the debtor paid the creditor $12 million. At the date of bankruptcy, the creditor liquidated its remaining collateral for slightly more than was owed at that date. The trustee did not prove that the creditor was undersecured at any time during the 90-day period, arguing that the $12 million in payments made during the preference period should be added back to the bankruptcy-date claim amount to apply the "greater amount" test of section 547(b)(5). The Ninth Circuit disagrees. It rules that unless the trustee proved that a floating lien secured creditor was undersecured at some point during the preference period, the payments were effectively presumed to come from the creditor's own collateral, negating the possibility of a preference. The court does not require the trustee to trace collateral proceeds, holding that the burden on the creditor to trace applies only in the context of a lien on proceeds under U.C.C. Section 9-315. A strong dissent argues that the elements that the majority requires the trustee to prove are actually elements of the creditor's defense under sections 547(c)(1) and (5). Both the majority and the dissent entirely miss the concept that the additions to inventory during the preference period constitute additional potentially preferential transfers. Batland v. TransAmerica Comm. Fin. Corp. (In re Smith's Home Furnishings, Inc.), 265 F.3d 959 (9th Cir. 2001).

2.2.lllllll Prepetition foreclosure on oversecured claim may constitute a preference. The creditor foreclosed on real property within 90 days before bankruptcy, bid in its claim, and acquired the property at the foreclosure sale. The creditor was substantially oversecured. Because the foreclosure enabled the creditor to receive "more" than it would have received in a chapter 7 liquidation, the foreclosure was subject to avoidance as a preference. Andrews v. Norwest Bank Minnesota, N.A. (In re Andrews), 262 B.R. 299 (Bankr. M.D. Pa. 2001).

2.2.mmmmmmm Payment of an unperfected statutory lien is not an avoidable preference. Under section 547(c)(6), the trustee may not avoid a preference "that is the fixing of a statutory lien that is not avoidable under section 545." In this case, the debtor paid off the statutory lien in the time between when the lien attached and the lien creditor would have been required to perfect the lien. The trustee argued that the exception did not apply, because the lien had not been perfected. The bankruptcy court rules otherwise, following the decision of the district court in Cimmaron Oil Co. v. Cameron Consultants, Inc., 71 B.R. 1005 (N.D. Tex. 1987), while explaining at length why the court disagrees with the decision it is bound to follow. Rand Energy Co. v. Strata Directional Technology, Inc. (In re Rand Energy Co.), 259 B.R. 274 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2001).

2.2.nnnnnnn Non-return of avoided preference does not require disallowance of administrative expense claim. The debtor in possession avoided preferences to a prepetition creditor who had also provided postpetition services. The debtor sought to disallow the creditor's administrative expense claim under section 502(d), which requires disallowance of a claim by an entity that has received and not returned a voidable transfer. The bankruptcy court rules that section 506(d) does not apply to the allowance or disallowance of administrative expense claims, which are creatures of the bankruptcy law that are unique and differ from prepetition claims dealt with by section 502. Camelot Music, Inc. v. MHW Advertising and Public Relations, Inc. (In re CM Holdings, Inc.), 264 B.R. 141 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001).

2.2.ooooooo Rule 9006(a) does not apply to 90-day preference period. A transfer was made on a Friday, 91 days before the date of the filing of the petition. The trustee argued that, applying Bankruptcy Rule 9006(a), the 90-day period ended on a Saturday, so the counting should continue to the next [preceding] business day, the Friday on which the transfer was made. The Ninth Circuit rejected the argument, ruling that the 90-day rule of section 547(b)(4)(A) was not an “applicable statute” to which Rule 9006(a) applied, and that the 90-day period was substantive, not procedural. As a result, under the Rules Enabling Act, the rules could not extend the 90-day period. MBNA America v. Locke (In re Greene), 223 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2000).

- 2.2.pppppp Late-perfected security interest may meet “substantially contemporaneous” preference exceptions. The debtor granted the creditor a security interest in exchange for a new loan. Because of a service bureau’s error, the financing statement was not filed until 16 days after the date of the loan. The court agrees that the transfer, which occurred for purposes of section 547 upon the filing of the financing statement, was substantially contemporaneous with the creditor’s giving of new value to the debtor. The court rejects the trustee’s argument that the automatic 10-day relation back rule of section 547(e)(2)(A) should be read into the substantially contemporaneous requirement of section 547(c)(1). Lindquist v. Dorholt (In re Dorholt, Inc.), 224 F.3d 871 (8th Cir. 2000).
- 2.2.qqqqqq Earmarking doctrine expanded. At the debtor’s request, the bank advanced funds to the debtor specifically to pay a particular creditor. The Ninth Circuit finds all of the elements of the earmarking defense present. Although the debtor had the power to break its agreement with the bank and use the money for other purposes, it did not have the right to do so, and it actually complied with the agreement in this case. Moreover, it did not matter that the debtor requested the loan for the specific purpose of paying off the creditor rather than the bank proposing the loan for the benefit of the creditor. Adams v. Anderson (In re Superior Stamp & Coin Co., Inc.), 223 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 2.2.rrrrrr State court determination of mortgage validity does not bind the trustee. In a foreclosure proceeding, the state court had determined that a mortgage was valid as between the mortgagee and the debtor, but not as to third parties. In his action to set aside the foreclosure as a preference, the trustee was not bound by the state court’s ruling, because the trustee, acting on behalf of creditors, was not in privity with the debtor in the state court action. Boberschmidt v. Society National Bank (In re Jones), 226 F.3d 917 (7th Cir. 2000).
- 2.2.ssssss A foreclosure cannot result in a preference. Affirming the Bankruptcy Court’s decision, the District Court holds that for preference purposes, solvency is measured immediately before the time of the transfer and, relying on BFP v. Resolution Trust Corp., 511 U.S. 531 (1994), that the amount the creditor bids at the foreclosure sale is “reasonably equivalent value,” negating the possibility of the creditor receiving more than it would receive in a chapter 7 liquidation case. In re Fibsa Forwarding, Inc., 244 B.R. 94 (S.D. Tex. 1999).
- 2.2.tttttt “Earmarking” doctrine does not apply to redirected funds. The debtor instructed its principal customer to make payments to a bank escrow account for the benefit of one of its suppliers. The Eighth Circuit B.A.P. rejected the application of the earmarking doctrine as a defense to preference recovery on these facts, because the debtor retained full control over the redirected funds and there was no real substitution of a new lender for a former lender. Stingley v. AlliedSignal, Inc. (In re Libbey Int’l, Inc.), 247 B.R. 463 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2000).
- 2.2.uuuuuu Administrative expenses are included in calculation of “greater percentage” test. In determining what a creditor would have received in a hypothetical chapter 7 liquidation case for the purpose of applying the “greater percentage” test in a preference action, the court should take into account the actual expenses of administration incurred in the chapter 7 case, at least up to the point of judgment in the preference action. Dakmak v. United States (In re Lutz), 241 B.R. 172 (E.D. Mich. 1998); 241 B.R. 179 (E.D. Mich. 1999).

- 2.2.vvvvvvv New value preference exception measured from date of tender of check. Where a debtor makes a preference by tender of a check to the creditor, the measurement of the creditor's subsequent new value defense under section 547(c)(4) runs from the date of tender of the check, not the date the check is honored. Brandt v. Sprint Corp. (In re Sonicraft, Inc.), 238 B.R. 409 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1999).
- 2.2.wwwwwww Use of post-dated checks does not defeat subsequent advance rule. The debtor paid for each of 54 shipments during the 90-day preference period with a post-dated check. The trustee and the creditor stipulated that each payment was made when the check cleared. Nevertheless, the creditor could take advantage of the subsequent advance defense under section 547(c)(4) based on the dates of the shipments and the date the checks were honored. Williams v. Agama Systems, Inc. (In re Micro Innovations Corp.), 185 F.3d 329 (5th Cir. 1999).
- 2.2.xxxxxxx An extinguished unperfected security interest does not defeat a subsequent new value defense. The creditor retained a security interest in goods sold to the debtor during the preference period, but did not perfect the security interest. The security interest was extinguished by subsequent payment. Nevertheless, the security interest was not an "otherwise unavoidable security interest" so as to defeat the application of the subsequent new value exception of section 547(c)(4). Williams v. Agama Systems, Inc. (In re Micro Innovations Corp.), 185 F.3d 329 (5th Cir. 1999).
- 2.2.yyyyyyy Subsequent new value may be applied to all prior preferences. Adopting the majority rule, the Fifth Circuit holds that a subsequent advance of new value may be applied against all prior preference payments under the subsequent new value defense of section 547(c)(4) to reduce preference liability. Williams v. Agama Systems, Inc. (In re Micro Innovations Corp.), 185 F.3d 329 (5th Cir. 1999).
- 2.2.zzzzzzz A prepetition foreclosure is not a preference. The creditor foreclosed on real property worth $50,000 by bidding in its claim of $20,000 and soon resold the property for $28,000. BFP v. RTC, 511 U.S. 531 (1994), prohibits the foreclosure sale from being treated as a fraudulent transfer, but the debtor challenged the foreclosure as a preference. The court rules that, even though the loss in value to the debtor rendered the debtor insolvent, the transfer was not made "while" the debtor was insolvent, as required by section 547. Although the creditor received more than it would have in a liquidation, the court applied the rationale of BFP to rule that the policy of protecting regularly-conducted non-collusive real property foreclosure sales outweighs the policy of the preference section and validated the transfer. Newman v. Fibsa Forwarding, Inc. (In re Fibsa Forwarding Inc.), 230 B.R. 334 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 1999).
- 2.2.aaaaaaa Payment of a debt secured by a letter of credit may be preferential. The debtor paid a supplier's invoices, which were backed by a letter of credit from a bank whose reimbursement obligation was fully secured by the debtor's assets. The payments nevertheless could be preferential, even though the payments "release" the collateral securing the bank's letter of credit reimbursement claim. Krafsur v. Scurlock Permian Corporation (In re El Paso Refinery, LP), 171 F.3d 249 (5th Cir. 1999).
- 2.2.bbbbbbb Intercreditor lien subordination agreement does not affect preference analysis. The supplier had a first lien on inventory and receivables; the bank had a second. Their intercreditor agreement provided for pro rata sharing but stated that the agreement was not for the benefit of the debtor. The supplier defended a preference claim on the ground that the payments were proceeds of its collateral. The Court of Appeals agreed, overruling the trustee's argument that the supplier's collateral sharing agreement with the bank did not make the payments proceeds of the banks collateral, ruling that the agreement was a subordination rather an assignment agreement and that the third party beneficiary clause in the agreement prevented the trustee from taking advantage of it during the litigation. Krafsur v. Scurlock Permian Corporation (In re El Paso Refinery, LP), 171 F.3d 249 (5th Cir. 1999).

- 2.2.ccccccc Imposition of a constructive trust may constitute a preference. The debtor was enjoined to transfer a patent to the plaintiff in pre-bankruptcy district court litigation. Finding that the order imposed a constructive trust on the patent in favor of the plaintiff, the bankruptcy court concluded that under applicable Illinois law, the constructive trust arose only upon the district court's order, which was entered within 90 days before bankruptcy, transferring the debtor's interest in the property. In addition, in a detailed and thoughtful analysis of constructive trust claims in bankruptcy, the court concludes that the plaintiff would have had only a general unsecured claim in the bankruptcy case if the transfer had not occurred. CRS Steam, Inc. v. Engineering Resources, Inc. (In re CRS Steam, Inc.), 225 B.R. 833 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1998).
- 2.2.dddddddd Late payments were not in the ordinary course of business. Although the debtor regularly made payments to the creditor approximately 30 days later than invoice terms required, the payment terms extended significantly in the 90 days before bankruptcy. The payments that were later than normal were not in the ordinary course of business for preference exception purposes under section 547(c)(2)(B) and were avoidable. Official Plan Committee v. Expeditors Int'l of Washington, Inc. (In re Gateway Pacific Corp.), 153 F.3d 915 (8th Cir. 1998).
- 2.2.eeeeeeee Wire transfers were not in the ordinary course of business. On the eve of bankruptcy, the debtor contacted the creditor to inquire whether checks had been cashed. When the debtor learned they had not, the debtor wire transferred the payment to the creditor. The payment was not in the ordinary course of business for preference exception purposes under section 547(c)(2)(B) even though the creditor had no part in any aggressive collection action. Central Hardware Co., Inc. v. Sherwin-Williams Co. (In re Spirit Holding Co., Inc.), 153 F.3d 902 (8th Cir. 1998).
- 2.2.ffffff Transferred collateral is valued at the transfer, not the petition date. If a partially secured creditor receives a transfer of collateral in satisfaction of a portion of its claim, the collateral is valued as of the transfer date, rather than as of the petition date. Otherwise, the court states, a prepetition transfer of depreciating collateral would always result in a preference. Telesphere Liquidating Trust v. Galesi (In re Telesphere Communications, Inc.), 229 B.R. 173 (Bankr. M.D. Ill. 1999).
- 2.2.gggggggg Same day reimbursement payments under a letter of credit are preferences. The bank issued a letter of credit to the debtor's supplier and entered into an agreement with the debtor that the debtor would pay the bank the amount of any L/C draw at or before presentation of the draw. The supplier drew, and, on the same day, the debtor transferred funds to the bank, which wired funds to the supplier under the draw. Because the bank became obligated directly to the supplier upon the draw and the debtor became indebted to the bank at the same time, and based on the principle of independence governing letters of credit, the debtor's transfer to the bank of the amount needed to pay the letter of credit was a transfer of property of the debtor for or on account of an antecedent debt, even though the transfers were all made on the same day. P.A. Bergner & Co. v. Bank One, Milwaukee, N.A. (In re P.A. Bergner & Co.), 140 F.3d 1111 (7th Cir. 1998).
- 2.2.hhhhhhhh A merger after a preference does not affect preference liability. The debtor corporation made preferences and then, before bankruptcy, merged into another corporation. The successor filed bankruptcy. For purposes of section 547(b), the property transferred was "property of the debtor," based on Begier v. IRS, 496 U.S. 53, 58 (1990) ("property of the debtor" subject to the preferential transfer provision is best understood as that property that would have been part of the estate had it not been transferred before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings."). However, insolvency is determined by the transferor's assets and liabilities, not the assets and liabilities of the merged companies. Payne v. Clarendon National Ins. Co. (In re Sunset Sales, Inc.), 1998 Bankr. Lexis 683 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).

2.2.iiiiiii Preference earmarking doctrine protects unperfected lien. The bank paid certain mechanics lienors directly but did not record its mortgage until three days before bankruptcy. The court overrules the trustee's preference attack against the bank, holding that the earmarking doctrine permits the bank to step into the shoes of the mechanics lienors, who could have perfected their liens even after bankruptcy. Kaler v. Community First National Bank (In re Heitkamp), 137 F.3d 1087 (8th Cir. 1998).

2.2.jjjjjjj How to value a going concern for preference insolvency purposes. The assets of a going concern must be valued based on their liquidation over a hypothetical reasonable time, balancing "not so short a period that the value of goods is substantially impaired via a forced sale," against "not so long a time that a typical creditor would receive less satisfaction of its claim, as a result of the time value of money and typical business needs." In this case, 12 to 18 months was held reasonable. Liabilities are valued at face amount, not their market trading value, although the court reaches this conclusion to a degree based on its "going concern" assumption about the business rather than the language of section 101(32)(B). Because the valuation was of a going concern, the contingent costs of dissolution and wind-down plus contingent liabilities that would arise upon going out of business should not be included as liabilities. Travelers International AG v. TransWorld Airlines, Inc. (In re TransWorld Airlines, Inc.), 134 F.3d 188 (3d Cir. 1998).

2.2.kkkkkkk Bankruptcy preference grace period for enabling loans preempts state law. Section 547(c)(3)(b) provides a 20-day grace period to perfect a security interest that secures an enabling loan. This grace period trumps any otherwise applicable state law grace period under which a perfection relates back an earlier date. Fidelity Financial Services, Inc. v. Fink, 522 U.S. 211 (1998).

2.2.iiiii Levy on trust fund taxes avoided. In Begier v. IRS, 496 U.S. 53 (1990), the Supreme Court held that a voluntary payment of trust fund taxes would establish a reasonable nexus between funds withheld and funds paid. In this case, however, where the IRS levied on the debtor's bank account, the transfer was involuntary and no such reasonable nexus could be made, therefore, the levy 20 days before bankruptcy constituted an avoidable preference. United States v. Borock (In re Ruggeri Electrical Contracting, Inc.), 214 B.R. 481 (E.D. Mich. 1997).

2.2.mmmmmmm Payments to an employee benefit fund are held non-preferential. Five months before bankruptcy, the debtor switched from monthly employee benefit fund payments to a weekly. The benefit fund was given the benefit of the contemporaneous exchange and subsequent new value exceptions to preference recovery. The payments were held to be intended as contemporaneous and in fact, substantially contemporaneous, and the new value to the debtor was not required to come directly from the creditor (the benefit plan). Alternatively, each weekly payment (except the last) was followed by new value to the debtor in that the employees continued working for that following week. However, Section 1113(f), which prohibits a trustee from altering a collective bargaining, does not prevent preference recovery. Jones Truck Lines, Inc. v. Central States, Southeast and Southwest Areas Pension Fund (In re Jones Truck Lines, Inc.), 130 F.3d 323 (8th Cir. 1997).

2.2.nnnnnnn Bank account withdrawal as a transfer. An individual debtor withdrew funds from a bank account to hinder an attaching creditor and stash the cash under the mattress. Departing from the ruling of the Seventh Circuit in In re Agnew, 818 F.2d 1284 (7th Cir. 1987), the Ninth Circuit holds that the withdrawal from the account was a "transfer" for purposes of the fraudulent transfer grounds for denial of discharge under section 727(a)(2). Bernard v. Sheaffer (In re Bernard), 96 F.3d 1279 (9th Cir. 1996).

2.2.00000000 Provisional credits on uncollected checks do not create antecedent debt. The Eighth Circuit rules that the withdrawal by a depositor/debtor of funds represented by uncollected checks/provisional credits do not create a debt from the depositor to the bank, except that in a check-kiting scheme of which the bank becomes aware and which does not discontinue, an inference might be drawn that the bank agreed to extend credit. The court also rules that the bank retains a security interest in the checks and their proceeds, based on section 4-210(a)(1) of the Uniform Commercial Code. Thus, the trustee's preference attack on the repayment of the provisional credit (ledger overdraft) fails, because the bank did not receive more than it would have received in a liquidation, as required for preference avoidance under section 547(b)(5). Laws v. United Missouri Bank of Kansas City, N.A., 98 F.3d 1047 (8th Cir. 1996).

2.2.pppppppp Late payments qualify for "ordinary business terms" preference exception. The debtor, a commercial customer of the gas company, routinely made late payments on its gas bills, as did approximately ten percent of other commercial gas customers. The Sixth Circuit, joining a clear consensus among other Circuits, holds that "ordinary business terms" in section 547(c)(2)(C) "means that the transaction was not so unusual as to render it an aberration in the relevant industry," that the transactions, therefore, qualify under the objective test of section 547(c)(2)(C), and that the transfers are "made according to ordinary business terms." Luper v. Columbia Gas of Ohio, Inc. (In re Carled, Inc.), 91 F.3d 811 (6th Cir. 1996).

2.2.qqqqqqqq Bankruptcy Code perfection period preempts state law relation back period. Section 547(c)(3)(B) exempts from preference attack a security interest that is perfected within twenty days after the granting of an enabling loan. State law provides that perfection of a purchase money security interest within a longer specified time relates back to the date of the purchase. Nevertheless, the twenty-day provision in the Bankruptcy Code preempts State law, preventing relationback of the later perfection, and rendering the subsequent perfection subject to preference attack. Pongetti v. General Motors Acceptance Corp. (In re Locklin), 101 F.3d 435 (5th Cir. 1996); Fink v. Fidelity Financial Service, Inc. (In re Beasley), 102 F.2d 334 (8th Cir. 1996).

2.2.rrrrrrrr Payments to a brokerage account are not avoidable. Adopting an extremely broad construction of "margin payment" and "settlement payment" under section 546(e), the bankruptcy court rules that virtually any payment into a brokerage account at a stock broker constitutes a margin payment or a settlement payment and therefore falls within the exception to avoidance of a preference contained in section 546(e). Biggs v. Smith Barney, Inc. (In re David), 193 B.R. 935 (Bankr. C.D. Calif. 1996).

2.3 Postpetition Transfers

2.3.a Filing a C corporation tax return is a transfer of property of the estate. After the chapter 11 C corporation case was converted to chapter 7, the shareholders caused the corporation to file, without the chapter 7 trustee's approval, tax returns for the chapter 11 years. Section 549 permits a trustee to avoid a postpetition transfer of property of the estate that was not authorized. The filing of a corporate tax return has a significant effect of the estate's net assets and therefore fits within the broad definition of estate property and therefore is a transfer because it disposes of an estate asset or results in the disposing of or parting with an interest in property. Accordingly, the court denies the shareholders' motion to dismiss the trustee's complaint under section 549 to avoid the filing of the returns as unauthorized postpetition transfers. Harker v. GYPC, Inc. (In re GYPC, Inc.), 639 B.R. 739 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2022).

2.3.b Prepetition payment by check that clears postpetition is subject to avoidance under section 549. On the petition date but before the commencement of the case, the debtor's CFO gave the debtor's attorney a cashier's check drawn on the CFO's personal account and issued a reimbursement check from the debtor to himself, which he deposited. The debtor's check to the CFO cleared four days after the petition. The trustee sued under section 549 to avoid the transfer. Under Barnhill v. Johnson, 503 U.S. 393 (1992), a transfer by check is made when the check clears the debtor's bank. Because the transfer cleared after bankruptcy, it was a postpetition transfer to which section 549 applies. Section 547(b) permits the trustee to avoid a prepetition transfer. Section 547(c)(1) creates an exception for an exchange for new value if the transfer was intended to be contemporaneous and was in fact substantially contemporaneous. Thus, a transfer by check that the recipient promptly cashes may qualify under the "date of delivery" rule. But where the check clears postpetition, the transfer itself is made postpetition, so the section 547 date of delivery rule does not apply. Accordingly, the trustee may avoid the transfer. Lewis v. Kaelin (In re Cresta Tech. Corp.), 583 B.R. 224 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2018).

- 2.3.c Retroactive substantive consolidation without notice does not permit avoidance of preconsolidation transfer. An individual debtor managed and sold assets of his LLC in an arms'-length transaction during the debtor's chapter 12 case. The case was later converted to chapter 7. Without notice to the asset purchaser, the trustee successfully moved for substantive consolidation of the debtor's estate with the LLC, retroactive to the petition date. The trustee sought to avoid the sale under section 549(a), which permits the trustee to avoid a transfer of property of the estate that was made without court approval. Section 549(a) does not include a good faith exception for personal property transfers, as it does for some real property transfers. A party who did not receive notice of an order that affects him may later challenge the order. And substantive consolidation is an equitable doctrine, so one seeking to enforce it must do equity by at least giving notice to one whose rights could be affected by the retroactive consolidation order. Under the circumstances, it would be inequitable and a denial of due process to allow the trustee to avoid the assets sale. Gugino v. Kerslake (In re Clark), 543 B.R. 16 (Bankr. D. Ida. 2015).
- 2.3.d Section 544(b) does not apply to a postconfirmation transfer. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan that provided for payments from rental income on real estate valued at $1.2 million. Shortly after confirmation and revesting of the property in the debtor, the debtor sold the property for $3.2 million and diverted most of the proceeds to his personal use. The bankruptcy court converted the case to chapter 7. The trustee sued the purchaser to avoid the transfer as a fraudulent transfer under section 544(b), which provides, "the trustee may avoid any transfer of an interest of the debtor in property ... that is voidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an unsecured claim that is allowable under section 502" Because the property had revested in the debtor, the transfer was a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property. Section 544(b) does not include any limitation on the trustee's power based on when a transfer is made. However, section 544(a) grants the trustee's strong-arm power "as of the commencement of the case." Although subsection (b) might have a different temporal limitation, its placement in the same section as subsection (a) and section 549's express postpetition transfer avoiding power suggest that subsection (b) is limited to prepetition transfers. Section 544(b)'s statute of limitation runs from the petition date, unlike section 549's, which runs from the transfer date. Therefore, section 544(b) applies only to prepetition transfer of the debtor's property. Casey v. Rotenberg (In re Kenny G Enterps., LLC), 512 B.R. 628 (C.D. Cal. 2014).
- 2.3.e Section 549(a) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer of the debtor's foreign land to a foreign buyer. The debtor purchased an interest in Mexican land. The seller sued the debtor for disputes arising out of the sale. While the action was pending, the debtor purchased a shell corporation and transferred the land interest to the shell without consideration. Despite the transfer, the debtor controlled the land interest and received all rental income. After the seller prevailed in the lawsuit, the debtor filed bankruptcy. Six months later, the corporation sold the land interest to a Mexican national in a transaction that the debtor controlled. The debtor lowered the purchase price on account of a debt he owed the purchaser, who was instructed to pay most of the purchase price to entities other than the corporation. In addition, the corporation did not observe corporate requirements for the sale, and the purchaser knew of the debtor's bankruptcy and the possibility of litigation over the transfer to the corporation. The court determined the corporation to be the debtor's alter ego and substantively consolidated the corporation with the debtor effective as of the petition date. The local action rule bars a federal court from exercising jurisdiction over an action directly affecting land in a different state or country. But the Code preempts the rule. Section 541(a)(1) creates an estate comprising all of the debtor's interest in property, wherever located, and section 1334(e) gives the court exclusive jurisdiction over property of the debtor and property of the estate, wherever located. The land interest here was property of the estate because of the court's consolidation order, so the court had exclusive jurisdiction, and the local action rule did not apply. Section 549(a) permits the trustee to avoid a postpetition transfer of property of the estate that is not authorized by the Code or the court. A court may not apply a federal statute extraterritorially unless Congress clearly expresses such intent. If not, the statute applies only if the action concerns acts that implicate the focus of Congressional concern. Here, Congress intended extraterritorial application as it applies to property of the estate. Therefore, the court may avoid and order recovery of the land interest that the corporation transferred to the purchaser. Kismet Acquisition, LLC v. Icenhower (In re Icenhower), 757 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2014).

- 2.3.f No remedy for unauthorized postpetition transfer where there is no harm. The bank held a security interest in the debtor's certificate of deposit to secure three separate, cross-collateralized loans. After bankruptcy, the bank liquidated the CD and applied the proceeds to two of the loans in partial satisfaction of its claims. Section 549 permits the trustee to avoid an unauthorized postpetition transfer, and section 550 permits the trustee to recover from the transferee. Section 502(h) requires the court to determine and allow (or disallow) a claim arising from the avoidance or recovery of a transfer the same as if the claim had arisen prepetition. There is no legitimate reason to avoid the transfer and recover the property, because the result would be to return the collateral to the bank, which would have a claim secured by the collateral. Jubber v. Bank of Utah (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 749 F.3d 895 (10th Cir. 2014).
- 2.3.g Recoupment defense defeats action to avoid a postpetition transfer. The debtor produced milk and sold it to a customer. As was the custom in the industry, to insure a steady supply of milk, the customer advanced a portion of the purchase price for one month's milk supply under an agreement that the debtor would continue to supply milk and the customer would deduct the advance amount, plus interest, in equal amounts from the amount owing for the debtor's next 12 months of milk supply. The debtor filed a chapter 12 petition in the ninth month. The debtor continued to supply the customer, who continued to deduct the previously agreed amounts for the next three months. The case later converted to chapter 7. The trustee sued the customer under section 549 to avoid and recover the postpetition transfer of milk for which the customer had not paid the estate. Recoupment permits netting of a debt arising from a single transaction. A single transaction arises out of the same set of operative facts but does not include multiple occurrences in any continuous commercial relationship. Courts permit recoupment only when it would be inequitable for the debtor to enjoy the benefits of a transaction without meeting its obligations. Recoupment is a defense to an avoidance action under section 549. Here, the agreement between the debtor and the customer for milk supply and recovery of the customer's advance makes each milk shipment and deduction part of a single transaction. Allowing recoupment is equitable because the transaction fostered the debtor's reorganization efforts, and disallowing it would discourage others from providing similar financing. Therefore, the court dismisses the trustee's action. Rainsdon v. Davisco Foods Int'l, Inc. (In re Azevedo), 497 B.R. 590 (Bankr. D. Ida. 2013).
- 2.3.h Sections 549(a) and 542(a) are not mutually exclusive. The debtor was engaged in the business of buying, rehabilitating and selling houses through sham business entities. Typically, she transferred house sale proceeds to a different entity, which would then use the proceeds to repeat the process. She filed a chapter 11 case. A trustee was appointed about four months later, and the case was soon converted to chapter 7. While the debtor remained in possession, she sold 10 properties titled in the name of sham entities. A law firm and a title company that it owned handled the closings. Both knew that the debtor was in bankruptcy. Four years later, the trustee brought an action against the law firm, the title company and their principal for turnover or an accounting of property of the estate that was in their possession, custody or control. Section 542(a) provides that “an entity ... in possession, custody, or control, during the case, of property that the trustee may use, sell, or lease ... shall deliver to the trustee, and account for, such property or [its] value.” Section 549(a) provides “the trustee may avoid a transfer of property of the estate ... that occurs after the commencement of the case ... [and] is not authorized under this title or by the court,” but the action must be brought within two years after the transfer. The two sections are not mutually exclusive. The trustee’s ability to avoid a postpetition transfer does not affect the obligation of an entity that is in possession, custody or control of property of the estate to turnover or account for property of the estate that it held at any time during the case, and the trustee need not move only under section 549 when it is available. In this case, the law firm and title company possessed the proceeds of the 10 houses that the debtor in possession sold. They are liable to the trustee to account, and the two-year statute of limitations applicable to avoiding a postpetition transfer does not apply. Although they disposed of the proceeds in accordance with the debtor in possession’s instructions, they knew of the bankruptcy and therefore knew or should have known, especially in light of the debtor’s criminal activities, that disposition required compliance with bankruptcy law. Therefore, the court denies the motion to dismiss, noting that the defendants may assert the affirmative defense relating to disposition in accordance with the debtor in possession’s instructions at a later time during the proceeding. Rosen v. Gemini Title & Escrow, LLC (In re Hoang), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38478 (D. Md. March 15, 2013).

- 2.3.i No remedy for unauthorized postpetition transfer where there is no harm. The bank held a security interest in the debtor’s certificate of deposit to secure three separate, cross-collateralized loans. After bankruptcy, the bank liquidated the CD and applied the proceeds to two of the loans in partial satisfaction of its claims. Section 549 permits the trustee to avoid an unauthorized postpetition transfer, and section 550 permits the trustee to recover from the transferee. Section 502(h) requires the court to determine and allow (or disallow) a claim arising from the avoidance or recovery of a transfer the same as if the claim had arisen prepetition. Therefore, there is no legitimate reason to avoid the transfer and recover the property, because the result would be to return the collateral to the bank, which would have a claim secured by the collateral. Moreover, section 550(a) permits recovery only “for the benefit of the estate”. That phrase should be construed broadly to include not just general unsecured creditors. But here, the estate would not receive any benefit from avoidance and recovery, because the collateral would then revert to the bank under section 502(h). Rushon v. Bank of Utah (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 477 B.R. 176 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).
- 2.3.j Recipient of an avoidable transfer is not a mere conduit if it has previously paid the purported initial transferee. The debtor engaged a law firm to register its trademark in Europe. The law firm retained a French firm to file the registration. The French firm billed the law firm for its services. The law firm billed the debtor, including the French firm’s bill as a “disbursement”. The law firm then paid the French firm, and the debtor later filed a chapter 11 case. Around the plan’s effective date, the debtor in possession paid the law firm its entire invoice amount, including the “disbursement” amount. The confirmed plan provided for a liquidation trust. The liquidation trustee sued the law firm to avoid and recover the postpetition transfer. A recipient of an avoidable transfer is not liable if it was a mere conduit, rather than a transferee. A conduit does not have dominion or control over the transferred asset and must not be able to redirect the transfer to its own use. Here, the transfer did not flow through the law firm. Rather, the law firm met its obligation to the French firm before bankruptcy and was free to use the debtor in possession's payment in any way it chose. Therefore, it was not a mere conduit but was a transferee who was liable to the liquidating trustee. Dembsky v. Frommer, Lawrence & Haug, LLP (In re Lambertson Truex, LLC), 458 B.R. 155 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

- 2.3.k Automatic stay does not apply to a postpetition transfer unless the transfer is avoidable under section 549. An indirect equity owner of the debtor transferred an interest of the estate in property while the chapter 11 case was pending. Section 362(a)(3) stays any act to exercise control over property of the estate, but section 362(b)(24) excepts "any transfer that is not avoidable ... under section 549". Section 362(b)(24) is not limited to transfers by the debtor nor to transfers to which section 549 does not apply in the first instance, but includes transfers to which section 549 does not apply at all, whether due to an exception to avoidance under section 549(c) or otherwise. Therefore, if the transfer is avoidable under section 549, the automatic stay does not apply; otherwise, it does. Morton v. Kievit (In re Vallecito Gas, LLC), 440 B.R. 460 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2010).
- 2.3.l Section 549 allows trustee to avoid the debtor's postpetition mortgage on property of the estate. Shortly after filing bankruptcy, the debtors refinanced their house, granting a lien to the lender, without notice to the trustee or the court or court approval. Section 549(a) permits the trustee to avoid a postpetition transfer of property of the estate that is not authorized by the Code or the court. Prior caselaw held that the debtor's creation of a lien was not a transfer for purposes of section 549(a). However, the 2005 Amendments specifically overruled that caselaw by expanding the definition of transfer. Now, "transfer" includes creation of a lien. Section 362(a)(4) stays any act to create a lien on property of the estate. An action in violation of the stay is void. Therefore, section 549 is not necessary to avoid a creditor-created lien, because it is void under section 362. Section 549 allows a trustee to avoid the debtor's creation of a lien, which the trustee here may do. Hopkins v. Suntrust Mortgage, Inc. (In re Ellis), 441 B.R. 656 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2010).
- 2.3.m Trustee may recover cash collateral that was used without authorization. The debtor in possession operated for three weeks after the petition date without court authorization or secured creditor approval under section 363(c)(2) to use cash collateral. During its operation, the debtor in possession purchased and paid for petroleum products with cash that was subject to a secured creditor's security interest. Section 549(a) permits a trustee to avoid a postpetition transfer of property of the estate "that is not authorized under this title or by the court". The debtor in possession's payment of the cash collateral was not authorized by either. Therefore, even though the supplier to whom the debtor in possession paid the cash provided present value to the estate, the trustee may avoid the cash transfers to the supplier. Marathon Petroleum Co., LLC v. Cohen (In re Delco Oil, Inc.), 599 F.3d 1255 (11th Cir. 2010).
- 2.3.n Trustee may recover from the debtor postpetition payments from the debtor's bank account. After bankruptcy, the debtor's bank honored several prepetition checks. The funds in the bank account on the petition date were property of the estate. Section 542(a) requires an entity (including the debtor) that is in possession, custody or control of property of the estate to turn over the property to the trustee. Section 542(c) permits a bank that does not have notice or knowledge of the case to honor checks presented after bankruptcy. Section 549(a) authorizes the trustee to avoid a transfer that is authorized only under section 303(f) or 542(c). Section 362(b)(11) excepts from the automatic stay the presentment of a negotiable instrument but does not except or authorize the honoring of a negotiable instrument. Therefore, the honoring of the checks was not authorized under section 362(b)(11) but only under section 542(c), so the bank's transfers of property of the estate to the checks' payees were avoidable. However, the amounts were small, so the trustee sought recovery from the debtor instead. Because the debtor had an obligation to turnover the funds in the account at the petition date, the trustee may recover the amounts from the debtor. Yoon v. Minter-Higgins, 399 B.R. 34 (N.D. Ind. 2008).

- 2.3.o Bankruptcy Code does not preempt real property race notice recording statute. The debtors sold their house after bankruptcy without notifying the trustee and without advising the buyer that they were in bankruptcy. The buyer promptly recorded the deed and the new lender promptly recorded the new mortgage. The trustee had not recorded a copy of the petition in the land records office. Under California's race notice statute, the buyer and new mortgagee, as bona fide purchasers, took priority over the trustee. The Bankruptcy Code preempts state law if its essential goals and purposes are inconsistent with the state law. The Code's essential goals and purposes are to provide the debtor with protection from creditors and a fresh start and to promote equality of treatment among creditors. California's recording statute does not conflict with either of those goals. The payoff in the sale of the prior mortgage is consistent with the Code's treatment of secured claims, and trustee may still obtain the balance of house's value from the debtor. In addition, section 549 contains a similar rule, providing protection to a bona fide purchaser without knowledge of the bankruptcy. Therefore, the Code does not preempt the recording statute, and the buyer and new mortgagee may retain their interests in the house. Burkhart v. Coleman (In re Tippett), 338 B.R. 82 (9th Cir. 2008).
- 2.3.p Postpetition transferee who acted inequitably is liable for property transferred, even though he had paid for it. The debtor in possession sought authority for DIP financing, which the court granted in only a limited amount. The DIP then separately sold (factored) accounts receivable to the DIP lender for cash at a 7% discount to face amount. The lender collected about 81% of the receivables' face amount. After the case was converted to chapter 7, the trustee sought recovery from the lender of an unauthorized postpetition transfer. Section 549 permits avoidance of an unauthorized postpetition transfer without regard to whether the estate was diminished or depleted. Section 550 permits the court to determine the measure of recovery: the property transferred or its value. Neither section 549 nor section 550 authorizes a transferee to offset against any recovery liability any amount he may already have paid to the estate. Here, the equities favored the estate, because the lender factored the receivables with full knowledge of the bankruptcy case and of the court's denial of the DIP's request to borrow more. Therefore, the trustee may recover from the lender the full amount of collections on the accounts, despite the lender's earlier payment to the estate of the purchase price for the accounts. Aalfs v. Wirum (In re Straightline Invs., Inc.), 525 F.3d 870 (9th Cir. 2008).
- 2.3.q Transfer made between case dismissal and order vacating the dismissal order may be avoidable. Under a settlement agreement with a major creditor, the debtor sought ex parte dismissal of its chapter 11 case, which the court granted. When the creditor learned of the dismissal, it promptly moved to vacate the dismissal order on the ground that the debtor had not complied with the settlement agreement and had not given notice of the motion to the creditor. The court vacated the dismissal order. While the case was dismissed, but after the debtor and its counsel had notice of the motion to vacate, the debtor, with counsel's assistance, sold a valuable asset. A dismissal order is subject to reconsideration under Rule 9024 (F.R. Civ. P. 60(b)). A Rule 60(b) order may be conditioned on "such terms as are just", which imports equitable considerations such as whether prejudice would result from granting the relief. Here, the debtor and its counsel had notice of the motion to vacate and proceeded with the sale anyway. Under the circumstances, equitable considerations did not require the court to protect the transfer. The court could vacate the dismissal retroactively, with the effect that the asset was property of the estate when sold and the sale was avoidable under section 549 as an unauthorized postpetition transfer. Woods & Erickson, LLP v. Leonard (In re AVI, Inc.), 389 B.R. 721 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).
- 2.3.r Transfer of the debtor's disputed assets that were ultimately disallowed is not a postpetition transfer of property of the estate. The debtor had a disputed partnership interest. After bankruptcy, the other partners sued him in state court to declare the interest invalid, and the debtor counterclaimed for the interest and related claims. To fund the litigation, the debtor transferred one-third of the interest and of any other claims to Rabe in exchange for his agreement to pay the debtor's attorney's fees in cash. The debtor then amended his schedules to disclose the disputed interest. The state court determined that the debtor had no partnership interest and no valid claims. The debtor's chapter 7 trustee sued Rabe and the debtor's attorney on the theory that the partnership interest and claims were property of the estate, the cash that Rabe paid was proceeds of that property, and that Rabe's payments were therefore unauthorized and voidable postpetition transfers of property of the estate. However, because the state court determined that the debtor did not have any partnership interest or claims at all, the cash that Rabe paid could not have been proceeds of the non-existent interest. Therefore, there was no improper postpetition transfer of property of the estate. Reed v. Rabe (In re Grotjohn), 376 B.R. 496 (N.D. Tex. 2007).

- 2.3.s BFP* foreclosure sale value rule does not apply to a sale that violates section 549(a). The debtor failed to list his homeowners' association as a creditor and did not file a copy of his bankruptcy petition in the real property records office. The association foreclosed on the debtor's home. The purchaser paid only the amount of the debtor's past due dues to purchase the home. Section 549(c) permits a trustee to avoid a postpetition sale of estate property, such as the foreclosure sale here, "to a good faith purchaser without knowledge of the commencement of the case and for present fair equivalent value." BFP, Inc. v. Resolution Trust Corp., 511 U.S. 531 (1994), held that a regularly conducted, non-collusive mortgage foreclosure sale establishes the value of real property for purposes of the fraudulent transfer statute's "reasonably equivalent value" requirement. By contrast, section 549(c) requires "present fair equivalent value," not "reasonably equivalent value," which is a lower standard. BFP applies only to mortgage foreclosures, not other kinds of foreclosures, such as tax sales. Therefore, the foreclosure sale here does not establish the value of the property for purposes of section 549(c). In determining that value, the court should deduct the amount of any prior existing liens. Although the purchaser may not be bound by prior liens that he does not assume, they reduce the equity value of the property that the purchaser acquires. Miller v. NLVK, LLC (In re Miller), 454 F.3d 899 (8th Cir. 2006).
- 2.3.t Section 549 applies to property transferred in violation of the automatic stay. The debtor owned a partial interest in real property, which passed to her trustee. While the trustee still held the interest in the real property, the sheriff conducted a tax sale of the entire parcel. Although the sale violated the automatic stay, the remedy lies in section 549, which authorizes the trustee to avoid a postpetition transfer that is not authorized by the Code, not in section 362, which contains no provision for avoiding a transfer. The court does not address whether the violation of section 362 renders the sale void. Herrington v. Grant (In re Paxton), 440 F.3d 233 (5th Cir. 2006).
- 2.3.u Debtors' postpetition sale of their residence does not violate the automatic stay. The debtors claimed their house as exempt, having placed an artificially low value on it in their schedules. While the trustee was considering selling the property, the debtors consummated a sale without notifying the trustee and without advising the buyer that they were in bankruptcy. The trustee sought to set aside the sale by arguing that the sale violated the automatic stay and was therefore void. Such a reading, however, would render section 549(a) meaningless: section 549 permits avoidance of a transfer that is not authorized. If the debtor's transfer violated the stay and was void, there would be no need for section 549(a). In the course of reaching this conclusion, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel reviews prior Ninth Circuit case law discussing the issue, but not deciding it in the context of a case that presented facts that required the issue's resolution. Relying on other Ninth Circuit case law, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel concludes that where a court of appeals has fully considered an issue and made a pronouncement on it, even though it was not directly necessary for the court's conclusion, the pronouncement would be considered binding circuit precedent. Irwin Mortgage Co. v. Tippett (In re Tippett), 338 B.R. 82 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

- 2.3.v A policy loan is not a “transfer”; an interest payment is. The debtor maintained whole life insurance policies on its executives to fund their supplemental retirement benefits. After bankruptcy, without court approval, the debtor in possession borrowed the entire loan values under the policies and thereafter paid interest to the insurance company on the loan amounts. The trustee sued the insurer for recovery of both transfers as unauthorized postpetition transfers. The policy loan was not a “transfer,” because it was only an advance to the policyholder of the reserve value to which the policyholder was absolutely entitled. The interest payments, however, were transfers, because they decreased the value of the estate and disposed of the estate’s property in favor of the insurer and allowed the insurer to earn a return on the policy’s cash value. The court did not consider whether the insurer had a valid defense or offset to the recovery to the extent that the interest payment increased the cash surrender value of the policy. Devan v. Phoenix Am. Life Ins. Co. (In re Merry-Go-Round Enters., Inc.), 400 F.3d 219 (4th Cir. 2005).
- 2.3.w Section 549(c) is not an exception to the automatic stay. The Ninth Circuit brushes aside dicta in several prior decisions to rule that section 549(c), which protects a good faith purchaser of real estate in a post-petition transaction, is not an exception to the automatic stay. The court rules that section 549(c) applies only to transfers by the debtor, not to a foreclosure sale that violates the automatic stay, because a transfer in violation of the automatic stay is void, not merely voidable. The effect is that the property interests remain the same as if no transfer had been attempted. The court follows the recent decision of the Ninth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel reaching the same conclusion. In re Mitchell, 279 B.R. 839 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002). 40235 Washington Street, Corporation v. Lusardi, 329 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 2.3.x Shareholders’ post-petition use of Subchapter S corporation’s NOL is not recoverable. The debtor was originally formed as a Subchapter S corporation. In the taxable year before bankruptcy, it incurred substantial losses, which the shareholders applied to obtain refunds of the taxes that they had paid for the two prior taxable years. They did not, as the IRC permits, waive the right to carry back the losses and instead apply them to future years. The trustee sought recovery as an invalid postpetition transfer of the shareholders election not to waive the loss carry backs. The court rules that the NOL of a subchapter S corporation is not property of the debtor’s estate and that the failure of the shareholders to waive the loss carry back did not constitute a transfer that could be recovered. The court distinguishes In re Bakersfield Westar, Inc., 226 B.R. 227 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998), on the ground that it dealt only with the right to revoke subchapter S corporation status, not with the use of an NOL. The court also rejects an unjust enrichment argument that the trustee asserted against the shareholders. Official Committee v. Forman (In re Forman Enterprises, Inc.), 281 B.R. 600 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2002).
- 2.3.y Post-petition increase in pre-petition lien on debtor- guarantor’s asset does not require court approval. Before bankruptcy, the debtors guaranteed the credit line of their wholly owned corporation and secured it with a lien on their personal assets. After bankruptcy, the lender continued making advances, thereby increasing the amount of the lien on the debtors’ assets. The Court of Appeals, over a vigorous dissent, rules that the advances and consequent increase in the amount of the lien against the debtors’ property do not violate the automatic stay, because the lien was created and perfected before bankruptcy. Similarly, the advances do not require court approval under section 364(c), because the debtors incurred the secured debt before bankruptcy, and the additional advances did not constitute additional secured debt. Although the court notes that the priority of the post-petition advances is an open question for the bankruptcy court on remand, the court does not mention the trustee’s strong-arm power under section 544(a), under which the trustee has the rights of a bona fide purchaser of real property as of the petition date and of a judicial lien creditor as of the petition date, nor does it consider that the increase in debt constitutes non-recourse debt, which is allowable as a claim against the debtor under section 102(2). Beeler v. Jewell (In re Stanton), 303 F.3d 939 (9th Cir. 2002) (285 F.3d 888 superseded).

- 2.3.z Debtor golfer loses hole-in-one prize to trustee. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor agreed with the other members of his foursome that if any one of them won the hole-in-one prize at the tournament, they would share it equally. Naturally, the debtor won the $43,000 car, but the prize was not awarded until after bankruptcy. When he received it, he sold it and divided the proceeds among the four players, claiming his share as exempt. The trustee sued his golf partners for recovery of an invalid post-petition transfer. The court rules that the oral agreement, though enforceable, did not give his golfing partners any interest in the prize winnings. It created only unsecured claims. Therefore the court would not impose either a constructive trust or an equitable lien. Allard v. Ackhoff (In re Ackhoff), 281 B.R. 889 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2001).
- 2.3.aa Advances to a non-debtor secured by a lien on a debtor's property are not avoidable. A factor entered into a lending agreement with a corporation. The corporate shareholders guaranteed the loans and secured the guaranty by a lien on their house. The shareholders filed chapter 11, and the factor continued advances to the non-debtor corporation. After the case converted to chapter 7, the trustee sought to avoid the factor's lien on the house to the extent of post-petition advances. The Ninth Circuit rejects the trustee's claim, on the ground that the debtor did not incur new debt under 364 that would have required prior court approval. In addition, the automatic stay did not apply, because the lien existed and was perfected before the shareholders' chapter 11 case. However, because the subsequent advances were optional, as a matter of state law, the priority of the lien to secure those subsequent advances was junior to any intervening liens on the property (such as the trustee's hypothetical petition date judicial lien under section 544(a)(1)). The Ninth Circuit remand for resolution of that issue. Importantly, the court stresses that approval under section 364 of the advances was not required, so as not to require "the bankruptcy of a corporation's shareholder to clog the going business of the corporation and its creditors." Beeler v. Jewell (In re Stanton), 285 F.3d 888 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 2.3.bb Trustee may recover only debtor's equity in property transferred in a voidable post-petition transfer. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sold his residence, which was subject to a mortgage, and turned over the equity value to the chapter 7 trustee. The purchaser knew of the pendency of the chapter 11 case and did not obtain bankruptcy court approval of the sale. The trustee sued the purchaser (actually, its title insurance company) to recover the property or its value. The Second Circuit rules that the property of the estate that the trustee can recover includes only the debtor's equity in the property, which the trustee already received by turnover from the debtor. Therefore the trustee could not recover anything from the purchaser. McCord v. Agard (In re Bean), 252 F.3d 113 (2d Cir. 2001).
- 2.3.cc Court permits post-petition perfection of security interest in chattel paper proceeds. The bank perfected its interest in the debtor's chattel paper by possession, and gave notice to the trustee under section 546(b) of a claim to the post-petition payments that the trustee received under the chattel paper. The notice was adequate to perfect the security interest under section 9-306(3) of the UCC, which provides that a creditor maintains a continuously perfected security interest in proceeds of collateral of which the creditor takes possession within ten days after the debtor receives it. Marine Midland Bank v. Breeden (In re The Bennett Funding Group, Inc.), 255 B.R. 616 (N.D.N.Y. 2000).
- 2.3.dd Punitive avoiding power action is dismissed. If the trustee brings an otherwise valid avoiding power action but the action would not result in any benefit to the estate and its purpose is only to punish either the debtor or the transferee, the action should be dismissed. Here, the debtor in possession sold his house for fair market value after the petition date and turned over the cash proceeds to the subsequently appointed trustee. The trustee's action to set aside the transfer was dismissed for abuse of discretion. McCord v. Agard (In re Bean), 251 B.R. 196 (E.D.N.Y. 2000).

- 2.3.ee Mailing of a cashier's check does not constitute delivery. The Ninth Circuit rules that the mailing of a cashier's check does not constitute delivery, because the check is not irretrievably out of the sender's control. Therefore, the trustee may avoid as a post-petition transfer under section 549 a payment made by a cashier's check that was mailed before the petition date but received by the creditor after the petition date. Mora v. Vasquez (In re Mora), 199 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 1999).
- 2.3.ff "Date of honor" rule applies to post-petition transfers. The debtor's lessor received a check for current rent the day before an involuntary petition was filed. The debtor's bank honored the check the day after the involuntary was filed. For purposes of section 549(a), the transfer occurred on the date of honor, following the rule for preferences in Barnhill v. Johnson, 503 U.S. 393 (1992). Guinn v. Oakwood Properties, Inc. (Oakwood Markets, Inc.), 203 F.3d 206 (6th Cir. 2000).
- 2.3.gg Whether post-petition value is "given" is viewed from the perspective of the creditor. The debtor paid post-petition rent under a long term lease immediately after the filing of the petition. The debtor's assets were all sold under an execution sale (stay relief had been granted) within days after that. Nevertheless, the landlord gave post-petition value by allowing the debtor to stay in the premises for the month following the involuntary. The value was given post-petition, not at the time the lease was signed, and even though the debtor did not benefit from the use of the premises for the entire month, the question of whether value was given must be viewed from the prospective of the giver. Guinn v. Oakwood Properties, Inc. (Oakwood Markets, Inc.), 203 F.3d 206 (6th Cir. 2000).
- 2.3.hh Lien securing post-petition advances is not avoidable. The individual debtors guaranteed the debt of their non-debtor corporation and secured the guarantee by a lien on their house. After they filed bankruptcy, the corporate lender made subsequent advances to the corporation, which increased the amount of guarantee secured by the lien on the house. The B.A.P. rules that the post-petition increase in the amount of the lender's claim secured by the lien on the debtor's house is not avoidable because it is not a post-petition transfer of the debtor's property, relying on Thompson v. Margen (In re McConville), 110 F.3d 47 (9th Cir. 1997). The B.A.P. also rules that authorization under section 364 is not required for the creditor to increase the amount of its lien against the debtors, distinguishing TransAmerica Commercial Fin. Corp. v. Citibank, N.A. (In re Sun Runner Marine, Inc.), 945 F.2d 1089 (9th Cir. 1991), on the ground that the loan was not made to the debtors does. The B.A.P. suggests that the lien might be limited by section 506(b), which operates as of the date of the filing of the petition. Jewell v. Beeler (In re Stanton), 248 B.R. 823 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2000).
- 2.3.ii Cashier's check is delivered when received. Before bankruptcy, the debtor mailed a cashier's check to the creditor. The creditor received the check after bankruptcy and credited it to the debtor's account. The trustee sought return of the funds from the creditor, on the ground that the payment was an avoidable post-petition transfer under section 549(a). The B.A.P. orders of the return of the funds, holding that a transfer by delivery of a mailed cashier's check occurs when the check is received, not when it is mailed. Vasquez v. Mora (In re Mora), 218 B.R. 71 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).
- 2.3.jj Lender of invalid post-petition loan retains lien to the extent of value given. The lenders advanced funds to the debtor after the filing of a chapter 11 case and received a lien on the real property the debtors purchased at the time of the loan. The loan was not authorized by the court. The subsequent chapter 7 trustee sought to avoid the lien. The Ninth Circuit originally ruled that the granting of a lien was not a transfer of property for purposes of Section 549(a) or (c), which protects a good faith purchaser of real property from the debtor after the filing of the case, 84 F.3d 340 (9th Cir. 1996), but then amended its opinion to limit that holding to transfers of real property, which is all that Section 549(c) protects. 97 F.3d 316 (9th Cir. 1996). The court then withdrew those opinions and ruled that the loan violated section 364(c)(2) but that the lenders could retain a lien to the extent of the value given because they were in good faith. Thompson v. Morgan (In re McConville), 110 F.3d 47 (9th Cir. 1997).

- 2.3.kk Involuntary gap employment contracts may be avoided. During the involuntary gap, the corporate debtor entered into long-term employment contracts with its officers at their then-existing salaries, plus significant bonuses in the event of termination without cause. Because the contracts were entered on the eve of the consent to an order for relief, the bankruptcy judge “collapsed the gap” to find that the contracts were effectively entered into after the order for relief. The Ninth Circuit reversed, but held that the agreements were enforceable only to the extent of the salaries earned for services performed before the officers’ termination some months after the order for relief. Hamilton v. Lumsden (In re Geothermal Resources International, Inc.), 93 F.3d 648 (9th Cir. 1996).

2.4 Setoff

- 2.4.a Creditor may not offset claim against breach of fiduciary duty claim against the creditor. The debtor’s director loaned the debtor money. When he learned that the debtor had failed to disclose substantial other debts, he called the loan and sued to collect. The debtor brought a breach of fiduciary duty action against him. The jury found in favor of both claims. The debtor later filed bankruptcy. The director sought to offset the two judgments. Section 553(a) preserves the right to offset mutual debts and claims, subject to equitable considerations. A claim arising from a breach of fiduciary duty is not a mutual claim against a contract debt, because the liability on the claim arises from the defendant’s acts in a fiduciary capacity. Moreover, allowing such a creditor to offset of judgment for breach of fiduciary duty would allow the creditor to benefit from his own wrongdoing. Therefore, the court denies setoff. In re E. Coast Custom Coaches, Inc., 624 B.R. 390 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2020).
- 2.4.b Mutuality requirement defeats contractual triangular setoff. The debtor sold goods to the counterparty and contracted with the counterparty’s affiliate to perform marketing services for the debtor. The sale contract provided that amounts owing to the counterparty could be offset against any amounts the counterparty or any of its affiliates owed to the debtor. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, it owed the affiliate $7 million, and the counterparty owed the debtor $9 million. The counterparty sought permission to offset the debts so it would pay only $2 million to the estate. Section 553(a) provides the Code “does not affect any right of a creditor to offset a mutual debt owing by such creditor to the debtor ... against of claim of such creditor against the debtor,” subject to three enumerated exceptions, which do not include an exception for non-mutual debts. The mutuality requirement is embedded in the statutory authorization and does not require a separate exception to make it effective. Mutuality requires that the creditor and debtor owe each other directly, not through a third party. A contractual right to a triangular setoff enforceable under state law does not create mutuality; more generally, parties may not contract around the mutuality limitation. Here, the debts were not owing between the same parties, so the setoff was denied. However, the court notes some alternatives the counterparty could have used to preserve a setoff right, including joint and several liability among the parties or the granting of a security interest in the accounts receivable. In re Orexigen Therapeutics, Inc., 990 F. 3d 748 (3d Cir. 2021).
- 2.4.c Federal interest in equality of distribution supersedes any state law right of triangular setoff. The debtor owed a prepetition creditor $6.9 million. The creditor’s affiliate owed the debtor $9.2 million. The debtor’s and the creditor’s prepetition agreement authorized the creditor and its affiliates to offset any amounts owed by one or more of them to the debtor or its affiliates. Section 553(a) permits setoff of mutual debts between a debtor and a creditor. Mutuality requires that the debts be between the same parties in the same capacities. Nonbankruptcy law governs property rights and obligations between the debtor and its creditors, unless a federal interest requires otherwise. The federal interest in equality of distribution among creditors supersedes any nonbankruptcy law that would enforce a contract between the debtor and a creditor that permits triangular setoff, whether directly or by treating the affiliate as a third-party beneficiary of the contract. In re Orexigen Therapeutics, Inc., 596 B.R. 9 (Bankr. D. Del. 2018).

- 2.4.d Plan provision for “substantive consolidation for voting and distribution” does not combine debtors to create setoff mutuality. The state paid the debtor the amount of tax credit certificates shortly after the order for relief but before it had audited the credits. The debtor’s parent, also in chapter 11, had separate tax credit certificates, which the state had not paid. The debtors’ plan provided for “substantive consolidation for voting and distribution purposes only.” It also prohibited the assertion of any setoff or recoupment. The court confirmed the plan. After confirmation, the state sought to audit the debtor’s tax credits and to offset any overpayment amount against the tax credit certificates the debtor’s parent owned. Section 553(a) provides that the Bankruptcy Code does not affect the right of a creditor to offset mutual prepetition debts and credits, but setoff requires mutuality. Section 1141(d) provides a chapter 11 confirmation order discharges all prepetition debts. Section 553(a)’s broad language permits a creditor to use a prepetition setoff defensively, despite the broad discharge in section 1141(d). The plan provision providing for substantive consolidation did not actually consolidate the debtor and its parent; it provided for consolidation only for voting and distribution purposes and was not a true consolidation. Therefore, the debtor and its parent remained separate entities. Accordingly, the state’s claim against the debtor and its debt to the parent are not mutual and not subject to offset. In re Cook Inlet Energy, LLC, 580 B.R. 842 (Bankr. D. Alaska 2017).
- 2.4.e Recoupment is not subject to equitable limitations. The debtor collected under his disability policy, which permitted the disability insurer to recover from the debtor any payments that the debtor later recovered in Social Security disability payments. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor received a Social Security disability payment, which the insurer recovered from the debtor. The trustee asserted a preference avoidance claim against the insurer, which the insurer satisfied. The insurer then reduced the debtor’s disability payments, as permitted under the policy, to recoup the preference amount. The debtor challenged the recoupment as violating the discharge injunction. The recoupment doctrine permits a creditor to recoup from the debtor a payment arising out of the same transaction, not just out of the same contract. Recoupment is an equitable doctrine: a creditor may recoup if both debts “arise out of a single integrated transaction so that it would be inequitable for the debtor to enjoy the benefits of that transaction without also meeting its obligations.” Thus, the equitable analysis applies in determining whether both debts meet the “same transaction” requirement. Once a court determines that they do, the court may not impose further equitable considerations in determining whether recoupment is appropriate. In this case, the debt arose from the same transaction—the disability insurance payments and the Social Security disability payment. Therefore, the insurer was entitled to recoupment. Terry v. Std. Ins. Co. (In re Terry), 687 F.3d 961 (8th Cir. 2012).
- 2.4.f Disability insurance carrier may recoup the debtor’s prepetition obligation from postpetition payments owing to the debtor. The debtor received disability payments from an insurance carrier. The policy provided that any Social Security disability payments that the debtor received would reduce the insurer’s obligation and that the insurer was entitled to reimbursement for any such payments. The debtor received a Social Security disability payment, paid it to the insurer and filed bankruptcy shortly thereafter. Upon the trustee’s demand, the insurer turned over the payment to the trustee as a preference. It then sought to reduce the debtor’s future monthly disability payments to recoup the amount paid to the trustee. The insurer did not file a claim in the case, and the debtor received a discharge. Section 502(h) provides that a claim arising from avoidance and recovery of a transfer is allowed as a prepetition claim, but it does not limit the creditor’s rights to allowance of a general unsecured prepetition claim. Recoupment is an equitable doctrine that applies only where the right asserted arises out of the same contract as the debtor's claim against the creditor. The insurer's right to repayment arises from the same contract as its payment obligation to the debtor. The court must therefore determine whether recoupment would be equitable based on the facts and circumstances of the case. Terry v. Std. Ins. Co. (In re Terry), 443 B.R. 816 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

- 2.4.g Court denies setoff and recoupment against damages arising from rejection of a supply contract. The debtor accepted a purchase order from its customer. The purchase order provided the terms of the debtor's sale of goods to the customer. The customer issued periodic releases specifying quantities. At the time of the debtor's bankruptcy, the debtor had an account receivable from the customer. The debtor in possession sold all of the estate's assets, including the accounts receivable, free and clear of all claims and interests, and rejected the customer's purchase order contract. The customer asserted a damage claim arising from the rejection. The buyer sued the customer to collect the receivable. A sale of receivables free and clear of claims and interests does not defeat the account debtor's recoupment rights or any setoff rights that the account debtor exercised before bankruptcy. Although the damage claim arising from the contract rejection is treated as a prepetition claim, it does not actually arise until postpetition, when the contract is rejected. Therefore, it could not be offset before bankruptcy, and it cannot be used to offset the customer's liability to the asset purchaser. Recoupment is a right arising from the same transaction that gives rise to the receivable, such as a claim for overpayment, damage-in-transit or late delivery for the same goods. Recoupment should be construed narrowly, because its application to rejection damages would frustrate the purpose of section 365 and permit one creditor to defeat the statutory priorities. Because each release, not the purchase order, was the single transaction, damages arising from rejection against the purchase order could not be recouped against the customer's payable owing for goods shipped under each release. Therefore, the customer could neither offset nor recoup the rejection damages against the receivable. HHI FormTech, LLC v. Magna Powertrain USA, Inc. (In re FormTech Indus., LLC), 439 B.R. 352 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).
- 2.4.h Safe harbor provisions do not eliminate mutuality requirement. The debtor entered into several ISDA Master Agreements with a bank where the debtor maintained an account. The Agreements were automatically defaulted upon the filing of the debtor's chapter 11 petition. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession made additional deposits into the account, which the bank froze to offset against amounts the debtor owed under the Agreements. Section 553 does not establish a right to setoff, but only recognizes a preexisting right to offset mutual debts and credits. The safe harbor provisions provide that "any contractual right ... to offset ... shall not be stayed, avoided, or otherwise limited by operation of any provision of this title". They do not expressly address section 553's mutuality requirement and do not implicitly override them. Because the mutuality requirement restricts the setoff right in bankruptcy and because mutuality was lacking between the bank's debt to the estate arising from the postpetition deposits and the debtor's debt to the bank under the Agreements, the bank may not offset the debts. Although the court recognizes that section 553 only preserves and does not grant a setoff right, it does not explicitly reach the question of whether the debts could be offset under applicable nonbankruptcy law. In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc., 433 B.R. 101 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010), aff'd Swedbank AB v. Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 445 B.R. 130 (S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 2.4.i Bank may offset guarantor subsidiary's deposit against bank's claim against the parent principal obligor. The bank entered into a loan agreement with a parent holding company but advanced all funds under the loan to the holding company's two subsidiaries. One subsidiary gave the bank a deed of trust on its real property to secure repayment and agreed, in the deed of trust, to pay all indebtedness owing to the bank. All three entities filed bankruptcy. The court ordered substantive consolidation of all three debtors. The subsidiaries had funds on deposit with the bank, which the bank sought leave to offset. Section 553(a) preserves the right of setoff of mutual prepetition debts and claims. The consolidation order occurred postpetition, so any setoff right as to the subsidiaries' funds on deposit with the bank against the parent's debt to the bank did not meet section 553's requirement that both claims and debts arise before bankruptcy. However, the subsidiary's guarantee of the bank's debt arose prepetition and created the requisite mutuality to allow the bank to offset the subsidiary's deposit account against the guarantee claim. In re England Motor Co., 426 B.R. 178 (Bankr. N.D. Miss. 2010).

- 2.4.j Financial contract safe harbors do not permit setoff of non-mutual debts. The debtor in possession deposited funds with a bank after bankruptcy. The bank asserted a claim against the debtor under a swap agreement and asserted a right to offset the postpetition deposit against its claim. Section 553 permits setoff of "a mutual debt owing by the creditor to the debtor that arose before the commencement of the case against a mutual claim of the creditors that arose before the commencement of the case". In this case, mutuality is lacking because the deposits were made postpetition. In addition, the debt to the debtor arising from the postpetition deposits does not meet the express requirement of section 553(a) that the debt arise before the commencement of the case. Section 560(a) provides that the exercise of a contractual setoff right "shall not be stayed ... or otherwise limited by operation of any provision of this title". Section 560(a) does not directly address section 553's requirements, and its language is narrower than the more commonly used, "notwithstanding any other provision of this title", and is thereby limited to the automatic stay's application. Section 553(a)'s requirements therefore apply to a setoff under a swap agreement, and section 560(a) does not protect the setoff. In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc., 2010 Bankr. LEXIS 1260 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. May 5, 2010).
- 2.4.k Setoff is not permitted against an intrabank transfer that was not credited to the debtor's account until postpetition. On Friday afternoon, after the cut-off time for same-day intrabank transfers, one of the debtor's subsidiaries with an account at the bank initiated a transfer to the debtor's account at the same bank. The bank's terms and conditions for intrabank transfers specified that a transfer after the cut-off time would be credited to the transferee account on the next business day, but that the transferor could revoke the transfer instructions until 10:00 AM on the next business day. The debtor filed bankruptcy Sunday night. The debtor owed the bank under a credit agreement, but the subsidiary did not. Section 553 permits setoff of a mutual debt and credit that each arose prepetition if applicable law permits the setoff. Here, applicable law paralleled section 553. A bank account represents a debt from the bank to the account holder. The debt arises when funds are finally and irrevocably credited to the account. Because the bank's terms and conditions provided for transfer only on the next business day (Monday) and the subsidiary could revoke the instructions until 10:00 AM on Monday, even though it did not, the transfer was not credited to the debtor's account until after the petition was filed Sunday night. Therefore, the debt from the bank to the debtor arose postpetition and could not be offset against the bank's claim against the debtor. In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc., 404 B.R. 752 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).
- 2.4.l Court disallows triangular setoff among substantively consolidated debtors. The debtors owned and operated retail stores. One debtor owned the stores, the management company employed all the officers and employees and the limited partnership operated the stores and paid the management company for the use of the employees. The management company hired a vice president and entered into an employment contract that provided severance pay of $250,000. In connection with the contract's relocation expense reimbursement provisions, the vice president issued a note in the same amount. The management company terminated the vice president before bankruptcy. The debtors confirmed a plan that substantively consolidated the debtors' estates. The Bankruptcy Code permits setoff of mutual debts. The management company's severance debt to the vice president was not mutual with the vice president's debt to the operating company, because the obligations were not owing to and from the same entities in the same capacities. Substantive consolidation does not affect rights arising before consolidation and therefore cannot create mutuality for setoff purposes that did not already exist. Ferguson v. Garden Ridge Corp. (In re Garden Ridge Corp.), 399 B.R. 135 (D. Del. 2008).

- 2.4.m Triangular setoff violates the Bankruptcy Code. A supplier had entered into numerous petroleum products trading contracts with three affiliated counterparties, each of which later filed bankruptcy. Bilateral master agreements governed each of the contracts. Each of the master agreements contained a broad version of a cross-affiliate setoff provision permitting the supplier to offset any amounts owing to any one of the debtors against any amounts owing by any of the other debtors. The supplier sought stay relief to effect a “triangular setoff” of the amount owed to one debtor against amounts the other debtors owed to the supplier. Section 553 preserves any setoff right existing under non-bankruptcy law, but it does not create or augment a setoff right, and it imposes restrictions that might not apply under nonbankruptcy law, the most important of which is the requirement that debts to be offset must be “mutual”. The Bankruptcy Code does not define “mutual”. Case law is clear that debts are “mutual” only when “they are due to and from the same persons in the same capacity”. The mutuality requirement thus appears to prohibit triangular setoff. Existing case law has not actually permitted triangular setoff, despite general discussions of a potential exception to the mutuality requirement. Contractual netting provisions do not make debts owing among different parties “mutual”, and section 553’s mutuality requirement does not contain a contractual exception. This reading is “consistent with the purpose of section 553 and the broader policies of the [Bankruptcy] Code [that] similarly-situated creditors are treated fairly and enjoy an equality of distribution By allowing parties to contract around the mutuality requirement of section 553, one creditor or a handful of creditors could unfairly obtain payment from a debtor at the expense of other creditors, thereby upsetting the priority scheme of the Code and reducing the amount available for distribution to all creditors”. Therefore, the court disallows stay relief. In re SemCrude, L.P., 399 B.R. 388 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009), aff’d Chevron Prods. Co. v. SemCrude, L.P. (In re SemCrude, L.P.), 428 B.R. 590 (D. Del. 2010).
- 2.4.n Debtor may offset a prepetition claim against a supplier’s section 503(b)(9) administrative expense claim. The debtor received goods from a supplier within 20 days before bankruptcy, entitling the supplier to an administrative expense priority claim under section 503(b)(9). The debtor asserted various prepetition claims against the supplier. The debtor may offset the claims against the supplier’s section 503(b)(9) claim. Even though that section grants the supplier’s claim administrative expenses priority, it remains a prepetition claim and thus retains the requisite mutuality for section 553 to permit setoff. Brown & Cole Stores, Inc. v. Assoc. Grocers, Inc. (In re Brown & Cole Stores, Inc.), 375 B.R. 873 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).
- 2.4.o Charges for services are subject to setoff recovery. The debtor communications provider overcharged its customer for toll free telephone number services. The debtor and the customer agreed that the customer could apply the overpayment amount to other telecommunications services that the debtor continued to supply to the customer, including toll free number services. The application of the overcharge credit to the toll free services that the debtor provided after the overcharge agreement was a recoupment that is insulated from avoidance under section 553(b). The application to other services, however, is an avoidable setoff. Jahn v. U.S. Xpress, Inc. (In re Transcommunications Inc.), 355 B.R. 668 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2006).
- 2.4.p Creditor may offset subordinated claim against debt to the estate. The debtor’s principal borrowed extensively from the debtor. He also guaranteed the debtor’s debts and granted a security interest in his property to secure the guarantee. After bankruptcy, the guaranteed creditor foreclosed on the principal’s property, giving the principal a claim against the debtor by way of subrogation or reimbursement, both of which are subordinated under section 509. Despite the subordination, the principal may offset the claim against the amount he owed the estate for his borrowings. Although setoff of a subordinated claim might not be permitted where the subordination is contractual, it will be permitted where, as here, the claim was not subordinated immediately before the commencement of the case but is subordinated only by the Bankruptcy Code. Lambert v. Callahan (In re Lambert Oil Co.), 347 B.R. 508 (W.D. Va. 2006).

- 2.4.q A creditor may not set off rejection damage claim against prepetition debt to the debtor. The debtor in possession rejected its lease with the creditor. The creditor sought stay relief to set off its rejection damage claim against its prepetition debt to the debtor. The court denies stay relief. Section 553(a) provides that the Bankruptcy Code does not affect any setoff right. Therefore, the creditor may set off mutual debts and claims only if the right exists under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Under section 365(g), “rejection ... constitutes a breach ... immediately before the date of the filing of the petition.” Under section 502(g), a rejection claim “shall be allowed or disallowed the same as if such claim had arisen” prepetition. Neither section actually converts the rejection claim to a prepetition claim for all purposes nor grants a setoff right for such a claim. Besides, section 553(a) would negate any such grant (“this title does not affect any right”). Nonbankruptcy law does not permit setoff of a contingent claim for possible future breach (rejection) of a contract, so as of the petition date, the creditor did not have any setoff right, and stay relief would be denied. In re Delta Air Lines, Inc., 341 B.R. 439 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).
- 2.4.r Plan provision prohibiting setoff is effective. A mutual insurer insured the debtor in possession during the chapter 11 case. The insured asset was sold during the case, and a plan was confirmed some months later. Shortly after confirmation, the buyer obtained insurance elsewhere and cancelled the insurance policy. As a mutual insurer, the insurer asserted a claim against the estate for a “release” premium, representing potential future retrospective premiums for which the insured would be liable if it remained a member of the mutual society. It failed, however, to file a proof of claim within the administrative bar date. Instead, it attempted to offset its liability to the estate for insured losses against the release premium. The liquidating plan did not discharge the debtor, but the plan enjoined any creditor from asserting a setoff against the debtor or the estate. Although section 553(a) provides that title 11 does not affect any setoff right, these facts did not call into question whether section 1141(d)'s discharge takes precedence over section 553(a) and extinguishes a setoff right, because the plan itself and the administrative claims bar date both prohibited the setoff. Therefore, the insurer was in contempt for asserting the setoff and refusing to pay the insured claim. In re SunCruz Casinos LLC, 342 B.R. 370 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2006).
- 2.4.s Court denies setoff based on creditor’s prepetition opportunistic behavior. The debtor had entered into a bond financing under which the indenture trustee held the bond proceeds in trust as collateral for the bonds, to be disbursed to the debtor upon the debtor’s certification that it had incurred specified construction expenses. Days before bankruptcy, when the debtor’s imminent bankruptcy was widely reported in the press, the debtor submitted such a certification. The indenture trustee withheld payment, in large part because of the risk of bankruptcy. The debtor in possession submitted another request shortly after bankruptcy for expenses incurred before bankruptcy. The bankruptcy filing defaulted the bonds, and the indenture trustee then claimed a right of setoff as to both requests. The indenture trustee is permitted to offset the funds requested under the debtor’s postpetition certification but not the prepetition certification. The court distinguishes the two certifications based on the bankruptcy default on the bonds. It reasons (somewhat questionably) that the debt from the debtor to the indenture trustee was not in default until the bankruptcy filing, so there was no debt that could be offset owing from the debtor to the indenture trustee until bankruptcy. The opposite was true for the postpetition certification. The court stresses the importance of not permitting a counterparty to gain advantage because of an impending bankruptcy by opportunistic behavior such as withholding contractually required payments. It also reasons (also somewhat questionably) that the bondholders did not have a security interest in the funds until the default. Therefore, it rejects the argument that the indenture trustee should be permitted to offset to permit it to fulfill its fiduciary duty to bondholders at the expense of its contractual duty to the debtor. The court does not analyze the obligations in terms of mutuality: once the indenture trustee's payment obligation matured, the funds were no longer subject to the trust in favor of the bondholders, and the indenture trustee no longer owed the construction reimbursement to the debtor in its capacity as trustee, but rather in its capacity as a contract counterparty to the debtor. As such, it could not offset. As to the postpetition certification, the funds remained subject to the trust of the indenture as of the petition date and could be offset. U.S. Bank Nat'l. Assoc. v. United Air Lines, Inc. (In re United Air Lines, Inc.), 438 F.3d 720 (7th Cir. 2006).

- 2.4.t Setoff of different kinds of claims permitted. The debtor provided physician services to an HMO, which paid for the services monthly in advance, and the debtor paid the HMO for services provided by third-party specialists arranged by the HMO. When the debtor fell behind in the payments to the HMO, the HMO loaned the debtor cash, repayable over time. Before the debtor had completed repayment, it filed a chapter 11 case. The HMO sought stay relief to offset the loan amounts the debtor owed against amounts that it owed the debtor for physician services. The debtor argued that because the parties were acting as lender and borrower with respect to the HMO's loan and as reimbursing and provider with respect to the physician services, the debts were not owed in the same capacity. The court rejects the argument and permits the setoff. "Capacity" does not relate to the nature of the obligation owing but to the legal capacity in which the parties act. Meyer Med. Physicians Group, Ltd. v. Health Care Serv. Corp., 385 F.3d 1039 (7th Cir. 2004).
- 2.4.u Chapter 11 plan may not eliminate setoff right. The debtor's chapter 11 plan provided for allowance of the IRS's tax claim and payment over six years, without acknowledging the IRS's claimed setoff right. Despite the plan's language, and recognizing the split in the case law on this issue, the court permits the IRS to offset a tax debt it owes the debtor in partial satisfaction of the allowed claim. Section 553(a) preserves the right of setoff, "except as otherwise provided ... in sections 362 and 363." Therefore, the discharge, which is found in section 1141, does not trump the preserved setoff right. In re Ronnie Dowdy, Inc., 314 B.R. 182 (Bankr. E.D. Ark. 2004).
- 2.4.v Bank is liable to trustee for setoff of directed deposit. Before bankruptcy, the debtor arrived at the bank with two cashier's checks, with directions to the teller that they be applied to her home equity line of credit. The bank accepted the checks, credited them to the debtor's checking account, and then applied the funds to the equity line. A week later, the bank reversed the entries and applied the funds to two unsecured lines of credit for the debtor's businesses. The trustee sought recovery of the funds as either a preference or an improper setoff. Tracing the history of section 553, the bankruptcy court rules that the bank's application of the funds contrary to the specific purposes for which they were deposited strips the bank of the protections of section 553 and makes the bank liable for a preference. The court does not award the funds to the debtor under section 522(h) (exemption avoiding power) or in equity and expressly leaves open the question of whether the debtor would have a claim against the bank, in addition to the trustee's claim, for damages resulting from the improper application of the funds. Davis v. Wells Fargo & Co. (In re Haynes), 309 B.R. 576 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2004).
- 2.4.w Section 553 applies only to creditor setoffs, not estate setoffs. A Canadian receiver had filed a proof of claim in the U.S. bankruptcy court for an administrative expense. The debtor in possession filed a counter-claim for prepetition amounts owing to the debtor and sought to offset the postpetition administrative claim against the debtor's prepetition claim against the Canadian entity. After reviewing in detail the theoretical underpinnings of the doctrines setoff and recoupment, the court concludes that those concepts are not applicable in this case. Rather, it concludes that because the debtor in possession pursued the counter-claim, section 553 does not apply. By its terms, section 553 applies only where the creditor attempts to assert an offset.

Accordingly, even though the estate's claim arose prepetition and the creditor's claim arose postpetition, the two amounts could be offset. In re ABC-NACO, Inc., 294 B.R. 832 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2003).

- 2.4.x Court disallows set-off of post-petition credit against avoidable transfer. The creditor attempted to reduce the amount for which he was liable to the estate upon avoidance of a fraudulent transfer by the amount of goods that the creditor had shipped to the estate post-petition. The Second Circuit disallows the set-off. First, it concludes that section 553 does not apply to post-petition debts and credits. Second, the set-off would be inappropriate because the transfer was fraudulent and the transferee did not act in good faith. Finally, section 502(d) requires disallowance of a claim of an entity that has not paid over an avoided transfer, and set-off should not be permitted against a claim that has not been allowed. Glinka v. Murad (In re House Craft Industries U.S.A., Inc.), 310 F.3d 64 (2d Cir. 2002).
- 2.4.y Account receivable may be sold free of claim of set-off. In a sale of assets free and clear of liens and other interests, the sale of the debtor's accounts receivable were free and clear of any right of set-off by the account debtor, but the account debtor's right of set-off attached to the proceeds of the sale and could be asserted against the estate. In addition, the account debtor could assert its right of recoupment against the estate, but the sale was not free and clear of the right of recoupment, which could be asserted against the buyer. MBNA America Bank, N.A. v. TransWorld Airlines, Inc. (In re TransWorld Airlines, Inc.), 275 B.R. 712 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).
- 2.4.z Reconciliation of accounts may constitute a transfer. Shortly before bankruptcy, after making appropriate adjustment entries, the debtor's affiliates "reconciled" their books and records to show that amounts previously thought to be owing to the debtor were in fact not owing. The reconciliation constitutes a "transfer," as defined in section 101(54). It may have effected a setoff of debts among the debtor and the affiliates or eliminated a debt owed by the affiliates to the debtor. The elimination of the debt was a transfer. Because nearly the same definition of transfer is used under the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act, the reconciliation constitutes a transfer for that purpose as well. Official Committee v. Lozinski (In re High Strength Steel, Inc.), 269 B.R. 569 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001).
- 2.4.aa Sale free and clear of "interests" does not include defenses. The estate sold all of its assets, including accounts receivable, under section 363(f), free and clear of all "interests." In an action to collect a receivable, the account debtor asserted a right of recoupment for breach of contract under which the receivable arose and a right of setoff arising under other contracts with the debtor. The Third Circuit holds that the defense of recoupment is not an "interest" that is extinguished upon a sale free and clear because it is a defense, not an affirmative claim. It suggests, however, that a right of setoff would be extinguished if it had not clearly been exercised before bankruptcy. Folger Adam Security, Inc. v. DeMatteis/MacGregor, JV, 209 F.3d 252 (3d Cir. 2000).
- 2.4.bb Recoupment denied on equitable grounds. The debtor breached the long term supply contract shortly before bankruptcy. The creditor/purchaser under the contract owed the debtor for prepetition deliveries, but asserted a damage claim for the debtor's failure to deliver shortly before and during its chapter 11 case and asserted recoupment, paying over to the debtor only the net amount owing. The court denies the recoupment claim on the grounds that the debtor received no post petition value from the contract and that there was no inequitable benefit or enrichment to the debtor that would allow the purchaser to rely on the equitable doctrine of recoupment. The purchaser, who was a net debtor to the estate, did not file a proof of claim and was therefore excluded from any recovery and required to pay the full amount owing for prepetition purchases. Herod v. Southwest Gas Corp. (In re Gasmark Ltd.), 193 F.3d 371 (5th Cir. 1999).

- 2.4.cc A non-recourse debt is not subject to set-off. Section 553 permits set-off only of “mutual” debts. The debtor’s obligation under a non-recourse mortgage is not mutual with the creditor’s obligation to the debtor and therefore may not be offset. In re Allen v. Main Assocs., L.P., 233 B.R. 631 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1999).
- 2.4.dd Only the creditor may assert a right of setoff. In a case of apparent first impression, the bankruptcy court concludes, based on standing grounds, that only the creditor that owes a debt to the debtor may assert a right of setoff or recoupment. The debtor may not assert it on the creditor’s behalf. In re Gosnell Development Corp., 221 B.R. 776 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 1998).
- 2.4.ee Bank account withdrawal restrictions do not defeat mutuality for purposes of set off. The debtor deposited funds at the bank. A portion were designated as collateral for the loan, and the debtor was permitted to withdraw from the account only once every three months and not below the collateral amount. The withdrawal restrictions did not automatically defeat mutuality for purposes of set off. Based on the totality of the circumstances, which courts must consider, the account was still sufficiently general and not a trust account. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Manufacturers and Traders Trust Co. (In re The Bennett Funding Group, Inc.), 146 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 1998).
- 2.4.ff Recoupment defined narrowly. The state labor department attempted to offset prepetition overpayments of unemployment compensation against postpetition liability to the debtor for unemployment compensation. The Second Circuit denied the application of the recoupment doctrine, holding that the attempt was a set off that is stayed under the automatic stay. In doing so, the Second Circuit adopts a narrow definition of “same transaction” so as to qualify for recoupment. Malinowski v. New York State Department of Labor (In re Malinowski), 156 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 1998).
- 2.4.gg Application of a prepetition utility deposit is a recoupment, not a setoff. In a narrow opinion that the court restricts only to the special circumstances of a utility deposit, the Second Circuit rules that application of a prepetition utility deposit against a prepetition utility bill is a recoupment, not a setoff that is subject to the automatic stay. More generally, the court describes the doctrine of recoupment as applying only in the event of “a single contract or transaction or a single set of transactions,” which is defined by state law, and says that it should be narrowly construed “in light of the Bankruptcy Code’s strong policy favoring equal treatment of creditors and bankruptcy court supervision over even secured creditors.” New York State Electric and Gas Corp. v. McMahon (In re McMahon), 129 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 1997).
- 2.4.hh For setoff purposes, a secured creditor does not owe a debt to the debtor. The debtor secured its obligation to the creditor with a cash collateral account on deposit at a bank. The creditor was given a security interest in the account and the right to exercise “sole dominion and control” over the account, although the debtor retained ownership of the funds. Such a relationship does not create a debt from the creditor to the debtor: “a creditor cannot create a right of offset for its claim against the debtor by refusing to reconvey security [and] cannot create the effect of cross-collateralization by refusing to reconvey collateral for a fully paid secured debt and claiming the right of offset against [its] unsecured debt owing from the same debtor.” Biggs v. Stovin (In re Luz Intl., Ltd.), 219 B.R. 837 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).
- 2.4.ii A right of set-off may not be determined on a motion for relief from stay. The creditor filed a motion for relief from stay to permit setoff. At the hearing, the bankruptcy court granted relief and authorized the setoff. The B.A.P. reverses, holding that a determination of the right of setoff must be brought in a separate proceeding. The B.A.P. suggests an adversary proceeding for the complicated facts of this case, but does not require one. Biggs v. Stovin (In re Luz Intl., Ltd.), 219 B.R. 837 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).

- 2.4.jj Set-off right extinguished by plan confirmation. Although a creditor had a right of setoff against the debtor, the chapter 11 plan provided for extinguishment of the right. The creditor did not object to that provision in the plan. In an action brought after confirmation, the creditor was not permitted to offset, because the provisions of the confirmed plan bound the creditor. United States v. Continental Airlines, Inc. (In re Continental Airlines, Inc.), 218 B.R. 324 (D. Del. 1997), affd. 134 F.3d 536 (3d Cir. 1997).
- 2.4.kk United States is a unitary creditor for set-off purposes. The Tenth Circuit holds that the United States is a unitary creditor for purposes of section 553 (governing set-off) and that mutuality exists between the debtor on the one hand and various agencies and departments of the United States on the other hand (in this case, the SBA and ASCS). As a result, the avoidance power of section 553 applied to the prepetition set-off in this case, rather than the preference avoidance power of section 547. Turner v. Small Business Administration (In re Turner), 84 F.3d 1294 (10th Cir. 1996).

2.5 Statutory Liens

- 2.5.a Section 108(c) does not toll the period for giving notice under section 546(b). A creditor recorded a notice of mechanics lien prepetition. State law required that the creditor file an action to enforce the lien within 90 days after recordation. The debtor filed its petition during the 90-day period. The creditor gave notice under section 546(b) more than 90 days after the recordation date. Section 546(b) provides that in lieu of seizing property or commencing an action required under nonbankruptcy law to continue or maintain perfection of a lien, the creditor may continue or maintain the lien “by giving notice within the time fixed by such law for such seizure or such commencement,” and giving such notice does not violate the automatic stay. Section 108(c) tolls the limitations period for a creditor to commence an action until the later of the end of such period or 30 days after notice of termination of the automatic stay. Because section 546(b) gives an alternative—giving notice—that does not violate the stay, section 108(c) does not toll the period for giving notice. Therefore, the creditor’s notice was late, and his lien terminated. Philmont Mgmt., Inc. v. 450 Western Ave., LLC (In re 450 Western Ave., LLC), 633 B.R. 894 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2021).
- 2.5.b A municipal revenue pledge is not a statutory lien. A municipal authority issued bonds secured by a pledge of its revenues under a statute that authorized (but did not require) the authority to pledge assets to secure the bonds. The authority’s resolution authorizing the issuance of the bonds provided for a pledge of the authority’s revenues. The Code divides liens into three types: security interest, judicial lien, and statutory lien. A statutory lien is “a lien arising solely by force of a statute on specified circumstances or conditions ... whether or not such ... lien is provided by or is dependent on a statute” The statute’s empowerment of the authority to grant a lien does not cause the lien to arise on specified circumstances or conditions. A revenue pledge from the authority does not attach automatically when the authority issues bonds, but only upon the authority’s pledge under the bond resolution. Because a statutory lien is mutually exclusive with a security interest, which is a lien that arises by agreement, the authority’s agreement in its resolution is not a triggering event that suffices as a “condition or circumstance.” Peaje Investments LLC v. The Financial Oversight & Mgmt. Bd. For Puerto Rico, 899 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2018).
- 2.5.c Trustee may not avoid a statutory tax lien perfected within 90 days before bankruptcy. The IRS issued a notice of tax assessment against the debtor about eight months before bankruptcy but did not file the notice that would perfect the lien against later judicial lien creditors until six weeks before bankruptcy. Under section 547, the trustee may avoid certain transfers made within 90 days before bankruptcy as a preference but may not avoid “the fixing of a statutory lien that is not avoidable under section 545”. The IRS’s tax lien is a statutory lien as defined in section 101(53). Section 545 permits the trustee to avoid only statutory liens that become effective on insolvency or a distressed financial condition. “Fixing” includes all steps in making the lien effective, including perfection. Thus, if the IRS perfects the lien before bankruptcy, it is not avoidable under section 545. A statutory lien that is not avoidable under section 545 is not avoidable as a preference. Therefore, the trustee may not avoid the lien. Spicer v. U.S. (In re Motion Marketing Solutions, Inc.), 403 B.R. 403 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2009).

2.5.d Wage lien under statute that permits retroactive perfection remains subject to avoidance.

The state’s wage lien statute grants a lien that “takes precedence over all other debts, judgments, decrees, liens or mortgages against the employer ... that originate before the lien ... takes effect.” Section 546(b)(1)(A) makes the trustee’s statutory lien avoiding power rights “subject to any generally applicable law that permits perfection of an interest in property to be effective against an entity that acquires rights in such property before the date of perfection” The wage lien statute does so, but the statutory lien avoiding power of section 545(2) permits avoidance of any lien that “is not perfected or enforceable [upon bankruptcy] against a bona fide purchaser” The wage lien statute does not protect the lien against a bona fide purchaser. Therefore, its application against prior perfected liens does not protect it under section 546(b)(1)(A). In re Globe Bldg. Materials, Inc., 463 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 2006).

2.5.e A statutory lien may be avoided only under section 545. The trustee challenged the validity of a state statutory tax lien under the bona fide purchaser avoiding power of section 544(a)(3). The court rejected the challenge, ruling that section 545 was the only basis on which a statutory lien could be challenged. In re Sullivan, 254 B.R. 661 (D.N.J. 2000).

2.5.f A trustee is not a bona fide purchaser as against the IRS tax lien. Section 545 of the Bankruptcy Code gives the trustee the status of a bona fide purchaser as against statutory liens, including the federal tax lien. Under section 6323 of the Internal Revenue Code, the tax lien is not valid on certain kinds of property against a purchaser “who, for adequate and full consideration in money or money’s worth acquired an interest (other than a lien or security interest) in property which is valid under local law against subsequent purchasers without actual notice.” The Ninth Circuit rules that section 545 does not give the trustee the status required under IRC section 6323 to defeat the tax lien. Battley v. United States (In re Berg), 121 F.3d 535 (9th Cir. 1997); Accord, In re Linn, 212 B.R. 169 (S.D. Fla. 1997).

2.5.g Trustee’s bona fide purchase status under section 545(2) does not defeat IRS lien. Following the Sixth and Ninth Circuits, which are the only two circuits to have addressed the issue, the Eighth Circuit B.A.P. holds that the definition of “purchaser” in section 6323(h)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code prevents the trustee’s status as a bona fide purchaser under section 545(2) of the Bankruptcy Code from defeating the IRS’ lien on cash and securities. Janssen v. United States (In re Janssen), 213 B.R. 558 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).

2.6 Strong-arm Power

2.6.a State registry’s use of nonstandard search logic makes abbreviated debtor’s name in financing statement seriously misleading. The creditor filed its financing statement with an abbreviation of one word in the debtor’s proper name. Under Florida’s financing statement search procedures, a search returns a list of 20 names, starting with the name that most closely resembles the searched name, which permits the searcher to navigate forward and backward through all names indexed. UCC section 9-506 provides “a financing statement that fails sufficiently to provide the name of the debtor is seriously misleading” unless a search using “standard search logic” would disclose a financing statement for the debtor with an error in the debtor’s name. Standard search logic produces an unambiguous list of hits. Florida’s search method does not. Therefore, it is not standard search logic, and the exception in section 9-506 does not apply. The financing statement with the abbreviation in the debtor’s name is seriously misleading and is ineffective to perfect the security interest. 1944 Beach Blvd., LLC v. Live Oak Banking Co. (In re NRP Lease Holdings, LLC), 50 F.4th 979 (11th Cir. 2022).

- 2.6.b Section 544(b) permits reliance only on filed or listed claims. In its first-day motions, the debtor in possession obtained authority to pay prepetition withholding and employment taxes to the IRS. The debtor did not list the claims on its schedule of liabilities, and the IRS did not file a proof of claim. Under the Internal Revenue Code, the IRS fraudulent transfer avoiding power has a ten-year reachback. Section 544(b) permits a trustee to avoid any transfer “by the debtor that is voidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an unsecured claim that is allowable under section 502.” Section 502 authorizes the filing of a proof of claim, and unless a party in interest objects, the claim is deemed allowed. Section 1111(a) deems allowed in a chapter 11 case any claim that is listed on the debtor’s schedules as undisputed, liquidated, and not contingent. If a claim is not listed and the creditor does not file a proof of claim, the claim cannot be allowed. Therefore, the trustee may not rely on such a claim under section 544(b). Because the IRS did not file a proof of claim, and the debtor did not list the IRS’s claim on its schedules, the trustee may not rely on the IRS as the triggering creditor under section 544(b). Miller v. Fallas (In re J & M Sales Inc.), 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 434 (Bankr. D. Del. Feb. 22, 2022).
- 2.6.c Trustee may not avoid unrecorded mortgage that does not transfer an interest in property. The bank failed to record the Puerto Rico mortgage. Under Puerto Rico law, recording a mortgage is a “constitutive act,” and an unrecorded mortgage does not transfer any interest in the mortgaged property but gives the mortgagee only an unsecured claim. Under section 544(a)(3), a trustee may avoid “a transfer of property of the debtor ... that is voidable” by a bona fide purchaser. Because the failure to record the mortgage prevented the transfer of any interest in the property, there was no transfer for the trustee to avoid. The court does not address the consequence, which would appear to be that the real property becomes unencumbered property of the estate, the same as if the mortgage had been avoided. Miranda v. Banco Popular de Puerto Rico (In re Lopez Cancel), 7 F.4th 23 (1st Cir. 2021).
- 2.6.d Strong-arm power may be asserted defensively after expiration of statute of limitations. A creditor filed a claim alleging it was secured by real property. However, the creditor had not properly recorded the mortgage. More than two years after the order for relief, the trustee objected to the claim as secured and sought a declaration that the real property was free and clear of the mortgage. Section 544(a)(3) gives the trustee the rights and powers of, and permits the trustee to avoid a transfer that is avoidable by, a bona fide purchaser of real property of the debtor. Section 546(a) prohibits the trustee from commencing an action under section 544 more than two years after the order for relief. However, section 546(a) does not place a time limit on the trustee’s status as holding the rights and powers of a bona fide purchaser. In addition, section 546(a), as a statute of limitations, only bars the commencement of an action; it does not bar the assertion of a claim as an affirmative defense. An objection to claim, even when pursued in an adversary proceeding, is a defense to the claim. Accordingly, the trustee may assert his rights as a bona fide purchaser of the property in the objection to claim, despite the expiration of the statute of limitations. Because the improperly recorded mortgage would not bind a bona fide purchaser of the real property, the court sustains the trustee’s objection to the secured status of the claim. Miller v. New Penn Fin., LLC (In re Miller), ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. N.D. Ga. Apr. 21, 2020).
- 2.6.e Section 544(b) does not require that a triggering creditor hold the same claim at the time of the transfer and at the petition date. The debtor purchased assets nearly four years before the petition date. The trustee claimed the purchase price was inflated and sued under state fraudulent transfer law to avoid the purchase as a fraudulent transfer. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer that is avoidable under applicable nonbankruptcy law by a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim. The applicable nonbankruptcy law permits a creditor who was a creditor at the time of the transfer or within a reasonable time thereafter to avoid a fraudulent transfer. Although the trustee has the burden to allege and prove the existence of such a creditor who could avoid the transfer and that the creditor was also a creditor at the petition date, the creditor's claim need not be the same at both times. Katchadurian v. NGPO Energy Cap. Mgmt., LLC (In re Northstar Offshore Group, LLC), ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Apr. 20, 2020).

- 2.6.f Reference in financing statement to collateral description in the security agreement adequately indicates the collateral. The lender's financing statement described the collateral as "[a]ll Collateral described in First Amended and Restated Security Agreement dated March 9, 2015 between Debtor and Secured Party." To perfect a security interest by filing, the financing statement must "indicate the collateral covered by the financing statement." It may do so by, among other ways, "any other method, if the identity of the collateral is objectively determinable." "Indicate" means to serve as a signal, point out, or direct attention to. Because the financing statement is only an abbreviation of the security agreement, it adequately indicates the collateral by referencing the security agreement, even if the security agreement is not filed with the financing statement, because it gives third parties notice of the secured party's interest. First Midwest Bank v. Reinbold (In re I80 Equip., LLC), ___ F.3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 30436 (7th Cir. Sept. 11, 2019).
- 2.6.g Incorporation by reference to an outside document is insufficient as a UCC-1 collateral description. The UCC-1 financing statement described the collateral as "the Pledged Property described in the Security Agreement attached as Exhibit A hereto and by reference made a part hereof." The Security Agreement did not define the "Pledged Property" but said defined terms have the meaning given to them in the Bond Resolution, which was not attached to the UCC-1. The Bond Resolution was a publicly available document that could be found at the issuer's website and in its official records. To serve the public notice function the UCC promotes, the UCC requires that a financing statement contain a description of the collateral. Requiring a searcher to look elsewhere undercuts that purpose, and a searcher cannot be sure that outside documents have not been amended or superseded. Accordingly, the description must reside in the financing statement, else the financing statement does not perfect the security interest. Altair Global Credit Opp. Fund (A), LLC v. Fin. Oversight & Mgmt. Bd. (In re Fin. Oversight & Mgmt. Bd.), 914 F.3d 694 (1st Cir. 2019).
- 2.6.h Court limits rights of holders of municipal special revenue bonds. The municipal debtor had pledged special revenues (primarily highway tolls) to an indenture trustee to secure revenue bonds. After the debtor filed a municipal bankruptcy case, the bond insurer, as the bondholders' subrogee, sought to require the debtor to continue to turn over the special revenue. Section 552(a) cuts off a prepetition security interest on postpetition revenues. However, section 928(a) provides, "Notwithstanding section 552(a) . . . , special revenues acquired by the debtor after the commencement of the case shall remain subject to any lien resulting from" a prepetition security agreement. Section 928(a) does not require the debtor to continue to turn over postpetition revenues; it only negates section 552(a)'s effect and preserves the security interest on postpetition revenues. Section 922(d) provides the automatic stay does not stay the application of pledged special revenues to payment of debt secured by those revenues. However, it does not provide blanket stay relief to permit bondholders secured by special revenues to collect special revenues nor require the debtor to turn them over. Assured Guaranty Corp. v. Financial Oversight & Mgmt. Board (In re Financial Oversight & Mgmt. Board), ___ F.3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 8981 (1st Cir. Mar. 26, 2019).
- 2.6.i Trustee has the rights and powers of a "third person" under section 544(a). To settle litigation over a minerals lease, the lessor agreed to ratify the lease, and the debtor agreed to pay the lessor substantial sums over a number of years. The lessor filed the ratification with the land records office, but the recordation recited only that it was in exchange for "consideration received." The debtor filed a chapter 11 case two years later and, as debtor in possession, brought an action under section 544(a)(3) to avoid the lessor's interest in the lease. The lessor claimed that the debtor's nonpayment of its obligations entitled the lessor to terminate the lease.

Section 544(a)(3) grants a trustee (or a debtor in possession) the rights and powers of a bona fide purchaser of real property from the debtor. The “rights and powers” are not limited to the power to avoid a transfer but encompass all the purchaser’s rights. Nonbankruptcy law determines what those rights and powers are. For purposes of applying the nonbankruptcy law, the trustee is treated as a third party, unrelated to the debtor. Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, a bona fide purchaser of the debtor’s rights in this mineral lease would take free and clear of the debtor’s payment obligations. Accordingly, the debtor in possession avoided the lessor’s payment right. Fallon Family, L.P. v Goodrich Petroleum Corp. (In re Goodrich Petroleum Corp.), 894 F.3d 192 (5th Cir. 2018).

- 2.6.j A state’s non-uniform U.C.C. automatic security interest perfection rules apply only to a debtor incorporated in that state. The debtors were incorporated in Delaware and Oklahoma. They purchased oil from producers in Texas and Kansas and sold it to end users. In non-uniform amendments to the U.C.C., Texas and Kansas law provide that an oil producer has an automatic, automatically perfected security interest in the oil in favor of the producer to secure the purchaser’s payment obligation to the producer, and the security interest continues in the oil when the buyer sells it to the end user. Here, the producers brought a claim against the end users, relying on the security interest. All four states adopted the same U.C.C. choice of law provision. It provides that perfection is determined by the law of the debtor’s state of incorporation. Delaware and Oklahoma did not adopt the automatic perfection rules benefiting oil producers that Texas and Kansas adopted, so perfection under Delaware and Oklahoma law requires filing a UCC-1 financing statement with the secretary of state. Relying on Texas and Kansas law, the producers did not file financing statements. Therefore, their security interests were not perfected, and the debtors properly sold the oil to the end users free and clear of the security interests. Arrow Oil & Gas, Inc. v. J. Aron & Co. (In re Semcrude L.P.), 864 F.3d 281 (3d Cir. 2017).
- 2.6.k Article 9 does not apply to a claim payment under an insurance policy. The lender took a security interest in “all accounts and other rights to payment (including payment intangibles)” and timely filed a UCC-1 financing statement in the proper filing office. The debtor suffered a catastrophic loss that resulted in business interruption and its chapter 11 filing. The trustee asserted a claim against the debtor’s business interruption insurance carrier, which he settled. The lender asserted a claim to the proceeds. U.C.C. Article 9 applies to any transaction, “regardless of its form, that creates a security interest in personal property” but excludes “the transfer of an interest in or an assignment of a claim under a policy of insurance.” The exclusion applies broadly to any rights under an insurance policy (with specific statutory exceptions). The lender’s various attempts to distinguish the claim payment here from Article 9’s exclusion do not succeed. Therefore, the UCC-1 filing does not perfect the lender’s security interest in the claim payment. Applicable nonbankruptcy law, here Maine’s, requires something more than just the security agreement to perfect the lender’s interest against the trustee and judicial lien creditors. The lender did nothing other than file the UCC-1. Therefore, its security interest is not perfected, and the trustee is entitled to the claim payment. Wheeling & L.E. Ry. Co. v. Keach (In re Montreal, Me. & Atl. Ry., Ltd.), 799 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2015).
- 2.6.l Trustee avoids unperfected interest of buyer of debtor’s accounts. The debtor sold specific accounts to a buyer. The buyer did not perfect its interest in the accounts by filing a UCC-1 financing statement. The buyer collected some but not all of the accounts before the debtor’s bankruptcy. Section 544(a)(1) grants the trustee the rights of a hypothetical judicial lien creditor as of the commencement of the case. Under U.C.C. section 9-318(1), a debtor that has sold an account does not retain any legal or equitable interest in the account. Section 9-318(2) provides that for purposes of determining creditors’ rights, the debtor is nevertheless deemed to have rights and title to the accounts (that is, treated the same as if the debtor had not sold the account, even though it had sold) while the buyer’s interest is unperfected. Section 9-317 subordinates the right and title of an unperfected purchaser of an account to the right and title of a judicial lien creditor. Therefore, the trustee may avoid the buyer's interest in the accounts. However, a judicial lien creditor does not obtain any interest in assets that the debtor does not own as of the petition date. Therefore, the trustee does not have any rights under section 544(a)(1) to payments that the purchaser received on the accounts from the debtor's customers before bankruptcy. Jubber v. Defendants re C.W. Mining Co. Coal Proceeds (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 530 B.R. 878 (Bankr. D. Utah 2015).

- 2.6.m Assigned financing statement retains vitality after loan payoff. The debtor was an asset-based commercial lender. It obtained a secured bank loan in 2001. The bank filed a UCC-1 financing statement to perfect its security interest. The debtor paid off the loan in 2004. In 2006, the debtor obtained another loan from the bank and a second bank, naming the first bank as administrative agent for the two banks in the second loan. The first bank amended the UCC-1 financing statement to name itself, as agent, and assigned the financing statement to itself, as agent, to perfect its security interest for the second loan. It also filed a new UCC-1 financing statement for the security interest for the second loan. It allowed the new financing statement to lapse before bankruptcy but timely and properly filed continuation statements for the 2001 financing statement. After the 2006 financing statement lapsed, the debtor sold true participations in a loan to one of its customers. Under the UCC, a loan participation is treated as a secured transaction, because it is the sale of a payment intangible. Under section 9-309(3), the participant's interest was automatically perfected without the need to file a financing statement. Under the UCC, a financing statement is effective as of the filing date, even long before the security interest attaches to the collateral. The effectiveness of an amendment of the secured party or an assignment of a financing statement to a different secured party is not limited to transactions after the amendment or assignment. Nor does it matter that the original loan for which the financing statement was filed was paid or that the original lender assigned only the financing statement and not the underlying security interest to the new lender. The UCC's filing system is to provide notice. Even an old financing statement does that, and a new lender is charged with whatever knowledge the UCC filing system yields. Therefore, the security interest of the bank, as agent, has priority over the participant's interest in the debtor's loan to its customer. In re Oak Rock Financial, LLC, 527 B.R. 105 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 2.6.n Unintentionally authorized UCC-3 terminates a financing statement. The debtor borrowed under a synthetic lease facility, secured by specified assets, and under a general facility, secured by equipment and other assets at most of the debtor's manufacturing locations. The same bank acted as agent for both facilities. The bank filed two UCC-1 financing statements for the synthetic lease and a third UCC-1 for the other facility. The debtor arranged to pay off the synthetic lease and instructed its counsel to prepare the necessary documents, including a UCC-3 termination statement to release the security interest. Counsel prepared a UCC-3 that mistakenly listed the UCC-1 file number for the general facility. Neither the debtor, debtor's counsel, the bank, nor the bank's counsel caught the error. The bank's counsel signed off on the closing and related escrow instructions, and the mistaken UCC-3 was filed. The debtor later filed bankruptcy. The creditors committee challenged the perfection of the bank's security interest. Under UCC section 9-510(a), a termination statement is effective only if its filing is authorized under section 9-509. Under section 9-509(d), only the secured creditor (or the debtor, if the secured creditor fails to do so) may authorize the filing. Under section 9-513(d), an authorized filing terminates the financing statement. The secured creditor's intent in filing a termination statement is irrelevant if it has authorized the filing. Here, even though the bank did not know the termination statement was mistaken and never intended to terminate the financing statement for the general loan, the bank authorized the filing of the termination statement. Therefore, it was effective to terminate the general security interest. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. JP Morgan Chase Bank, N.A. (In re Motors Liquidation Co.), 777 F.3d 100 (2d Cir. 2015).

- 2.6.o Relation back does not prime a tax lien, but equitable title does. The debtor borrowed money from the bank and gave the bank a mortgage on its Maryland real property on January 4. The bank recorded the mortgage on February 11. The IRS filed notice of its tax lien against the debtor on January 10. Under Maryland law, a mortgage recordation relates back to the date of delivery, becoming effective once recorded against an intervening judicial lien creditor. Internal Revenue Code section 6323(a) provides that a tax lien is not “valid as against any ... holder of a security interest ... until notice thereof ...has been filed by the [Treasury] Secretary.” Section 6323(h)(1) defines security interest as “any interest in property acquired by contract for the purpose of securing payment or performance of an obligation,” and provides “a security interest exists at any time—(A) if, at such time, the property is in existence and the interest has become protected under local law against a subsequent judgment lien arising out of an unsecured obligation.” The verb tenses in the statute determine the provision’s interpretation. Although the mortgage recordation relates back, it was not protected against a subsequent judgment lien creditor at the time the IRS recorded its lien notice. Therefore, it was not then a “security interest,” as defined, and it does not take priority over the tax lien as a result of Maryland’s relation back doctrine. However, Maryland law also provides that delivery of a real property transfer instrument gives the transferee equitable title that is good immediately as against later judicial liens. The tax lien is protected only to the extent that a later judicial lien arising out of an unsecured credit extension would be protected. Therefore, the mortgage has priority over the tax lien. Susquehanna Bank v. U.S. (In re Restivo Auto Body, Inc.), 772 F.3d 168 (4th Cir. 2014).
- 2.6.p Creditor may not use parol evidence against a trustee to save a defective security interest. The security agreement secured a note dated December 15 “in the principal amount of $_____.” The debtor’s note was dated December 13. The lender and the debtor agreed that the date in the security agreement was an error; there was no note dated December 15, and they intended to secure the note dated December 13. Section 544(a)(1) gives the trustee the rights of a hypothetical judicial lien creditor. Although the lender might have been able to use parol evidence against the debtor to reform the security interest, a later creditor is entitled to rely on the face of the documents and need not investigate whether parol evidence or other documents would vary their terms. Such a rule promotes certainty in commercial transactions. Therefore, the trustee’s rights are unaffected by parol evidence, and the trustee may avoid the security interest. State Bank of Toulon v. Covey (In re Duckworth), 776 F.3d 453 (7th Cir. 2014).
- 2.6.q Postpetition UCC continuation statement is not required to maintain perfection. The secured creditor’s financing statement expired six weeks after the petition date. The creditor did not file a continuation statement. After the financing statement expired, the creditor filed a proof of secured claim and sought adequate protection and stay modification. Section 544(a) gives the trustee the status of a hypothetical judicial lien creditor as of the commencement of the case. State law determines a lien’s validity. Under UCC section 9-317(a)(2), a judicial lien that arises before a security interest is perfected takes priority, implying that a judicial lien that arises after perfection does not. UCC section 9-515(c) provides that upon a financing statement’s lapse, the security interest becomes unperfected and is treated as never having been perfected against a purchaser for value, but not as against a judicial lien creditor. The omission from the statute compels the conclusion that a lapsed financing statement does not give a judicial lien that arose before the lapse priority over the security interest. American Bank, FSB v. Miller Bros. Lumber Co., Inc. (In re Miller Bros. Lumber Co., Inc.), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 152176 (M.D.N.C. Oct. 23, 2013).
- 2.6.r A radiologist’s accounts receivable are not proceeds or product of a medical imaging device. The debtor radiologist granted the bank a security interest in a medical imaging camera and the proceeds and product of the camera. In his practice, the debtor used the camera and generated accounts receivable. The record did not indicate whether the receivables were solely for the use of the camera or whether they included amounts owing for the debtor’s services.

Under Article 9, proceeds includes, among other things, “whatever is collected on, or distributed on account of, collateral.” Without a showing of the extent, if any, to which the receivables arose from the use of the camera, the court could not conclude that the receivables were proceeds of the camera. Even to the extent that the receivables were for the use of the camera, they were not “collected on” the camera or “distributed on account of” the camera and so were not proceeds of the camera in any event. Article 9 does not contain a definition of “product.” Using a general definition, product is yield, income, receipts or return. The receivables do not meet this definition, because the debtor receives no yield, income, receipts or return on the camera from the receivables themselves, only when he collects the receivables. Therefore, they are not product. Swope v. Comm’l Sav. Bank (In re Gamma Center, Inc.), 489 B.R. 688 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2013).

- 2.6.s Supplier’s retained title in corn that was delivered to the debtor was only a security interest. The debtor ethanol producer contracted with a corn supplier to provide the debtor’s entire corn requirements. The contract provided that delivery of the corn was complete when it arrived at the debtor’s site. It also provided that it would be stored in bins on the debtor’s site that the debtor leased to the supplier and that the supplier would retain ownership until the corn passed from the bins through the weigh station on its way into the ethanol plant. The supplier controlled the electricity to the bins and conveyor belts so that it could prevent the debtor and anyone else from removing the corn from the bins, but until the debtor ceased operations and the supplier locked the bins, the debtor removed corn as needed to feed plant operations. The bins did not exhibit any signs or other evidence that the supplier owned the corn in the bins, and the supplier did not file a UCC-1 financing statement. U.C.C. section 2-401(1) provides, “Any retention or reservation of title (property) by the seller in goods shipped or delivered to the buyer is limited in effect to a reservation of a security interest.” The section thus makes any title retention after delivery to the buyer subject to Article 9. Despite the parties’ intention that ownership not transfer until the corn passed through the weigh station, section 2-401 made title pass, subject to the retention of a security interest, upon delivery, which the contract defined as complete upon arrival at the debtor’s site. The supplier did not perfect its security interest by filing. Perfection by possession requires unequivocal, absolute, notorious dominion or control that puts third parties on notice. The supplier’s ability to lock down the corn, without more, such as notice on the bins, was insufficient. Therefore, the corn is property of the debtor, and the trustee avoids the unperfected security interest. Clean Burn Fuels, LLC v. Perdue Bioenergy, LLC (In re Clean Burn Fuels, LLC), 492 B.R. 445 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. 2013).
- 2.6.t Postpetition turnover may defeat possessory lien. The bank had a possessory security interest in the debtor’s bank account, which held over $900,000 on the petition date. The trustee demanded turnover. The bank agreed, withholding $50,000 to cover returned checks and other chargebacks. The chargebacks ultimately exceeded $500,000. The bank sought repayment from the trustee and adequate protection about six months after turnover. Section 542(a) requires turnover to the trustee of property of the estate but does not automatically provide for adequate protection of a creditor’s lien in the property. Just as with setoff, unless the creditor requests adequate protection, it loses its possessory lien when it surrenders possession. Therefore, the trustee may retain the funds. N. Am. Banking Co. v. Leonard (In re WEB2B Payment Solutions, Inc.), 488 B.R. 387 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2013).
- 2.6.u UCC-3 termination statement is effective only if authorized. A lender syndicate financed a series of synthetic leases for the debtor. The agent for the syndicate filed UCC-1 financing statements to perfect the lenders’ security interests in the underlying property. Separately, another lender syndicate, using the same agent, issued a secured loan to the debtor secured by substantially all of its assets. The agent also filed a UCC-1 financing statement. When the leases expired, the debtor and the agent prepared documentation, including UCC-3 termination statements, to reflect the final payoff and release of security interests in the leased property. One of the UCC-3 termination statements referenced the UCC file number for the secured loan financing statement, without either the debtor or the counsel to the agent for the lease syndicate (which was different from the counsel for the loan syndicate) realizing that the file number related to the loan rather than to the lease. Under UCC section 9-513(d), upon the filing of a termination statement, the related financing statement ceases to be effective but, under UCC section 9-510(d), only if filed by a person authorized to file it under section 9-509(d). Under that section, a person may file a termination statement only if the secured party authorizes the filing. Ordinary agency principles determine authority. Based on the facts here, the agent for the loan syndicate had not authorized the filing of the termination statement for the loan security interest. Therefore, the erroneous termination statement was not effective. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A. (In re Motors Liquidations Co.), 486 B.R. 596 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

- 2.6.v Arbitration clause between debtor and creditor does not bind trustee in avoiding power litigation. An art owner consigned artwork to the debtor. The owner did not file a financing statement. The consignment agreement provided for arbitration of any disputes. The owner filed a proof of claim. The liquidating trustee challenged the owner's ownership of the artwork and objected to the claim on the ground, among others, that the owner's interest in the artwork was avoidable under the trustee's strong-arm power, section 544(a). The owner sought stay relief to pursue arbitration of the dispute. Whether a court must order arbitration under the Federal Arbitration Act depends first on whether the parties agreed to arbitrate. The arbitration agreement between the owner and the debtor does not bind the trustee when the trustee is asserting creditors' rights, such as under the strong-arm power, rather than the debtor's rights under section 541(a). In addition, if the arbitration agreement is binding, the bankruptcy court has discretion not to order arbitration in a core proceeding if arbitration would inherently conflict with Bankruptcy Code provisions or necessarily jeopardize the Bankruptcy Code's objectives. The determination of what constitutes property of the estate, the allowance of a proof of claim and the adjudication of a strong-arm power challenge to a lien are all core proceedings. The Bankruptcy Code's policy of centralizing resolution of disputes relating to such matters to promote efficient estate administration overcomes the Arbitration Act's policy favoring arbitration. Therefore, the bankruptcy court properly denied stay relief to pursue arbitration. Kraken Invs. Ltd. v. Jacobs (In re Salander-O'Reilly Galleries, LLC), 475 B.R. 9 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).
- 2.6.w Section 544(a) does not permit the trustee to bring claims on behalf of creditors for aiding and abetting the debtor's fraud. The trustee brought an action against a third party for aiding and abetting the debtor's fraud. The debtor could not have brought such an action, because the in pari delicto doctrine would have barred it. So the trustee sued on behalf of all creditors, asserting that section 544(a) gave him authority to do so. Section 544(a) provides that the trustee "shall have, as of the commencement of the case ... the rights and powers of, or may avoid any transfer of property ... that is voidable by (1) a creditor that extends credit to the debtor at the time of the commencement of the case, and that obtains, at such time and with respect to such credit, a judicial lien on all property on which a creditor on a simple contract could have obtained such a judicial lien". A creditor that extends credit to the debtor at the time of the commencement of the case could not assert any claim, such as one for prepetition fraud, that accrued before then, nor could such a creditor bring claims on behalf of other creditors. Moreover, such a reading would obviate any need for section 544(b), because it would give the trustee all rights to avoid transfers under state fraudulent transfer laws, and would effectively overrule Caplin v. Marine Midland Grace Trust Co., 406 U.S. 416 (1972), which prohibited a trustee from asserting claims belonging solely to creditors. Therefore, the court dismisses the trustee's action. Picard v. JPMorgan Chase & Co. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs.), 460 B.R. 84 (S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 2.6.x Section 544(a) does not apply to a postpetition transfer. An indirect equity owner of the debtor transferred an interest of the estate in property while the chapter 11 case was pending. Section 544(a) permits a trustee to "avoid any transfer of property of the debtor". By contrast, section 549(a) permits a trustee to “avoid a transfer of property of the estate”. The distinction is critical. Property of the debtor becomes property of the estate under section 541(a) upon the filing of the petition. Therefore, section 544(a) does not apply to a postpetition transfer, which is a transfer of property of the estate. Morton v. Kievit (In re Vallecito Gas, LLC), 440 B.R. 460 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2010).

- 2.6.y Trustee may avoid consignors’ interests in consigned goods. The debtor antique dealer dealt in consigned goods but did not mark the goods as such in his shop. Other antique dealers delivered goods worth more than $1,000 to the debtor for sale. Under U.C.C. section 9–391, goods received on consignment are treated as the debtor’s property for purposes of determining creditors’ and purchasers’ rights. Section 9–102(a)(20) defines “consignment” as a transaction in which a person delivers non-consumer goods worth less than $1,000 per delivery for sale to a merchant who deals in goods of that kind, is not an auctioneer and is not generally known by its creditors to deal substantially in others’ goods. Here, the consignors were all dealers, so the goods were inventory in their hands, not consumer goods. The debtor was not known to deal substantially in others’ goods, because there was no indication that the goods were delivered by others. Section 544(a) gives the trustee the rights of a hypothetical ideal judicial lien creditor. With such rights, the trustee may avoid the consignment interests and recover the consigned goods for the estate. In re Niblett, 441 B.R. 490 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2009).
- 2.6.z Trustee may disregard the debtor’s funding affiliate for purposes of section 544(a) if the affiliate is not sufficiently separate. The debtor established a funding affiliate to whom it transferred its accounts receivable for no apparent consideration, except that the affiliate took a small percentage of each collection to fund its minimal operating expenses. The affiliate borrowed against the receivables and gave the lender a security interest. The affiliate operated as if it were a department of the debtor. It had no office, phone number or checking account. All its correspondence was on the debtor’s stationery. It did not prepare financial statements or file tax returns. The debtor continued to carry the receivables on its own books and told other creditors that the lender had a security interest in the receivables. Under section 544(a), a trustee may avoid a transfer that a hypothetical judicial lien creditor could avoid. For this purpose, the trustee may disregard the affiliate as a separate entity. Paloian v. LaSalle Nat’l Bank Assoc., 619 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 2010).
- 2.6.aa Trustee avoids unrecorded real property equitable interest asserted by trustee in prior bankruptcy case. Parents bought real property for their daughter, while she was struggling financially, with the apparent intent that she be the owner once she could take out a mortgage on it. Seven years later, still struggling, she filed bankruptcy. She did not list the real property in her schedules, she received her discharge and her case was closed quickly. One year later, the father filed bankruptcy. By then, the father and his ex-wife had separated and divided their property, and the father owned a 50% interest in the real property. The daughter’s trustee learned of her claim of an equitable interest in the real property and moved to reopen the daughter’s case to claim her equitable interest in the property. Section 544(a)(3) gives a trustee the rights of a hypothetical bona fide purchaser of real property, without regard to the trustee’s knowledge. Under state law, a bona fide purchaser of real property without knowledge of an equitable interest defeats the interest if it is unrecorded. Therefore, the father’s trustee avoids the interest in the real property asserted by the daughter’s trustee. Collins v. Duda (In re Duda), 422 B.R. 339 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2010).
- 2.6.bb Filing with the petition of schedules that list an unrecorded mortgage does not defeat the trustee’s strong-arm power. The creditor refinanced the debtor’s home mortgage and filed a release of the prior mortgage, but failed to record the new mortgage. The debtor filed bankruptcy two years later and filed her schedules, which listed the mortgage, with the petition. Section 544(a)(3) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer of real property that is avoidable by “a bona fide purchaser of real property ... from the debtor, against whom applicable law permits such transfer to be perfected, that obtains the status of a bona fide purchaser and has perfected such transfer at the time of the commencement of the case” and “without regard to any knowledge of the trustee”. The trustee is charged with knowledge of the schedules. However, the schedules cannot be filed until the case is filed, and the avoiding power operates as of the filing of the petition. At that instant, the trustee does not have knowledge of the schedule’s contents. Moreover, the trustee’s avoiding power operates “without regard to any knowledge of the trustee”. Therefore, the trustee may avoid the mortgage. Chase Manhattan Bank, N.A. v. Taxel (In re Deuel), 594 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2010).

- 2.6.cc Suppliers failed to prove that deliveries of goods were not consignments. Several suppliers provided the debtor jewelry for resale at “trunk shows” but did not file UCC-1 financing statements. After the order for relief, the suppliers sought to recover the goods as common law bailments, rather than consignments. The U.C.C. defines “consignment” in section 1-201(a)(20) as “a transaction, regardless of its form, in which a person delivers goods to a merchant for the purpose of sale and ... the merchant ... is not generally known by its creditors to be substantially engaged in selling the goods of others ...”. If the transaction is a consignment, that is, if the merchant’s creditors do not generally know it to sell others’ goods, then the transaction creates a security interest that must be perfected under the U.C.C. to withstand the trustee’s strong-arm power under section 544(a)(1). The consignor has the burden of proof of showing that creditors generally know that the merchant’s creditors generally know that it is selling others’ goods and therefore that the consignor need not file a financing statement to perfect its interest, because it creates an incentive for the consignor to file a financing statement simply out of an abundance of caution. To meet the “generally known” requirement, the alleged consignor must show that a majority in number of the consignee’s creditors know. General industry practice or knowledge does not suffice. Because the suppliers here did not provide the necessary evidence, the court grants judgment avoiding the suppliers’ interests in the goods. French Design Jewelry, Inc. v. Downey Creations, LLC (In re Downey Creations, LLC), 414 B.R. 463 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. 2009).
- 2.6.dd “Perfection” means effective against a later interest. The creditors sued the debtor before bankruptcy, obtained an order for attachment of real and personal property and levied the attachments on real property and intangible personal property. Before the creditor obtained a judgment, the debtor filed bankruptcy. Applicable nonbankruptcy law in this state grants priority to a creditor levying on real property against later purchasers, but the judicial lien on the real property is not enforceable unless the creditor obtains a judgment in the underlying action. The state law does not similarly grant retroactive priority to an attachment of intangible personal property. The trustee’s strong-arm power under section 544(a) permits the trustee to avoid an interest in real property that is not perfected against a bona fide purchaser of the real property as of the petition date. The applicable nonbankruptcy law here does not use the term “perfected” to describe the priority of the attaching creditor over a later purchaser. However, the strong-arm power should be so construed, so that the trustee could not here use the strong-arm power to avoid the creditor’s judicial lien. Ivester v. Miller, 398 B.R. 408 (M.D.N.C. 2008).
- 2.6.ee Perfection by possession requires actual possession, not through the debtor as agent; a surety bond is not an instrument. The debtor leased equipment to various lessees. The debtor obtained surety bonds to guarantee the lessees’ payments. The debtor granted the bank a security interest in the lease receivables and in the underlying leases and equipment, in the surety bonds and in the lease files and other related documents. The bank did not file a financing statement, relying on perfection of its interest in the receivables as payment intangibles that the debtor sold to the bank. In addition, the bank appointed the surety as servicer for the obligations, and the servicer appointed the debtor as sub-servicer. The servicing agreements required the surety to hold the documents, including the leases, as servicer and the debtor to hold the documents as sub-servicer. However, the bank held direct possession of the surety bonds. In an earlier decision, the court determined that the debtor did not sell the lease receivables but granted a security interest. The bank argues in this case that it has perfected its security interest in the lease payments by perfection in the underlying leases by possession. A secured party or its agent must have actual possession of the collateral to perfect. However, the agent may not be the debtor, because the purpose of possession is to put third parties on notice that the debtor does not have unfettered control of the collateral. Therefore, the bank did not have sufficient possession to perfect its security interest in the leases or in the lease receivables. The bank also did not perfect its security interest in the surety bond, despite actual possession. A secured party may perfect a security interest in an instrument by possession. Under U.C.C. §9-102(1)(tt), an instrument is a “writing that evidences a right to payment of a monetary obligation ... and is of a type that in ordinary course of business is transferred by delivery with any necessary endorsement or assignment.” Although the surety bond is assignable, a surety bond is not of a type transferred in the ordinary course of business, because there is no market for surety bonds. In addition, it does not evidence a monetary obligation, because it acts only as a guarantee, not as a fixed right to payment, and does not stand independent of the underlying obligation. F.D.I.C. v. Kipperman (In re Comm'l Money Ctr., Inc.), 392 B.R. 814 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

- 2.6.ff Strong-arm power does not apply to sold mortgage loans. The debtor originated mortgage loans and sold them to a buyer. The buyer took possession of the loans and the mortgages but did not record its interest in the land records office and did not file a UCC-1 against the debtor. The trustee sought to avoid the buyer’s interest in the mortgages under the strong-arm power, which gives the trustee the rights and powers, as of the petition date, of a hypothetical judicial lien creditor. The strong-arm power does not apply, however, to a sale. In addition, section 541(d) insulates the buyer’s interest in the purchased loans and prevails over the strong-arm power. Stallord v. Lion Fin., LLC (In re Lancaster Mortgage Bankers, LLC), 388 B.R. 106 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2008).
- 2.6.gg Trustee may rely on triggering creditor who has different claims as of the petition date than as of the transfer date. The debtor transferred property nearly four years before bankruptcy, while it was insolvent, had unreasonably small capital and had incurred debts beyond its ability to pay as they matured. At the time of the transfer, the debtor had several specified creditors with open account trade claims, who were paid in full shortly after the transfer. The same creditors had open account trade claims as of the petition date based on later sales to the debtor. The trustee sued as successor to these creditors to recover the transfer as fraudulent under the New York Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act. Section 544(b) authorizes the trustee to avoid any transfer that is avoidable by a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim. These creditors hold allowable unsecured claims, though different claims than they held at the time of the transfer. Section 544(b) requires only that the triggering creditor be able to avoid the transfer, not that the triggering claim be the same. Therefore, the trustee may use these creditors as triggering creditors to avoid the claim. The court does not discuss the provision of the New York UFCA that makes a transfer made without fair consideration by a debtor with unreasonably small capital or that has incurred debts beyond its ability to pay voidable as to both present and future creditors. Silverman v. Sound Around, Inc. (In re Allou Distributors, Inc.), 392 B.R. 24 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2008).
- 2.6.hh Strong-arm power is ineffective against a security interest in an asset on which a judicial lien creditor could not obtain a lien. The FCC sold C-block and F-block spectrum licenses for the buyer’s promissory note secured by the licenses. The FCC perfected its security interest by a UCC-1 filing, but the filing lapsed before the petition date. The federal statute authorizing the licenses and the installment payments for their purchase, as well as the FCC regulations, provide that the licenses do not create any right beyond their terms and conditions, are “conditioned upon the full and timely payment of all monies due”, and are not transferable without FCC approval. Section 544(a)(1)’s strong-arm power gives the trustee the rights and powers of a hypothetical judicial lien creditor as of the petition date. Under the U.C.C., such a creditor's lien would take priority over an unperfected security interest. But if federal law governs the FCC's rights as a secured creditor, then the U.C.C. priority rules do not apply. Here, unlike state-created property rights on which a debtor grants a federal lien under a general federal lending programs, the license is created under federal law, which therefore defines the extent of the debtor's interest. That interest is conditioned upon full payment of the purchase price, and the license is not transferable without FCC approval. Therefore, a hypothetical judicial lien creditor could not obtain a lien on the licenses that is superior to the FCC's lien, so the trustee's strong-arm power is ineffective to avoid the FCC's lien. Airadigm Comm'ns, Inc. v. Fed. Comm'ns Comm'n (In re Airadigm Comm'ns, Inc.), 519 F.3d 640 (7th Cir. 2008).

- 2.6.ii LLC agreement requiring prior consent to transfer is enforceable against a secured creditor. The debtor agreed to grant a security interest in his interests in various LLC's to his secured creditor. The LLC agreements prohibited assignment or transfer of all or any part of the LLC interests without the LLC manager's prior consent. The debtor signed a security agreement and a UCC-1 financing statement but did not obtain the LLC manager's prior consent. The security interests are invalid, because the anti-assignment provisions in the LLC agreements are enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy (here, Illinois) law, because "a business's organizational agreement may control the procedure for creating a valid assignment of an interest in that business." In re Weiss, 376 B.R. 867 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007).
- 2.6.jj Schedules do not impart constructive notice to trustee. The debtor financed and then later refinanced her house with the same lender. The lender recorded the mortgage for the first financing, but failed to record the second mortgage. The first mortgage did not remain of record. The debtor filed a voluntary petition. Her schedules, filed with the petition, listed the debt secured by her house. The listing did not give the trustee constructive notice of the lien so as to defeat his status as a hypothetical ideal bona fide real estate purchaser under section 544(a)(3). Section 544(a)(3) gives the trustee that status "as of the commencement of the case." Under section 301, a voluntary petition commences the case. The schedules are filed after the petition, even when they are filed in the same package with the petition, because they are separate documents, filed on separate Official Forms, and they cannot be filed until there is a case in which to file them. Notice of a lien in the text of an involuntary petition might provide constructive notice, because the notice there is in the petition itself, not in a later-filed document. But in a voluntary case, the schedules (as distinguished from the petition) cannot give the trustee constructive notice of the lien "as of the commencement of the case" to defeat his hypothetical bona fide purchaser status. Taxel v. Chase Manhattan Bank, USA, N.A. (In re Deuel), 361 B.R. 509 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).
- 2.6.kk Preference section's relation-back provisions do not apply to the strong-arm power. The creditor loaned the debtor money the day before an involuntary bankruptcy petition was filed but did not file its financing statement until five days later. The trustee may avoid the security interest under the strong-arm power of section 544(a). The relation-back provisions of section 547(e) by their own terms apply only to preferences, and the relation-back exceptions to avoidance in section 546(b) encompass only "generally applicable [relation-back] law," which does not include bankruptcy relation-back provisions. Finally, the involuntary case was "commenced" under section 303(a) on the date of the filing of the petition, not on the date of the entry of the order for relief. Ostrander v. Gardner (In re Millivision, Inc.), 474 F.3d 4 (1st Cir. 2007).
- 2.6.ll Debtor may separate payment streams from chattel paper in granting a security interest. The debtor leased equipment to subprime lessees. To enhance creditworthiness, the debtor obtained surety bonds that guaranteed the lessees' payments to the debtor. The debtor financed the equipment and leases by borrowing from a bank, to whom it granted a security interest in the leases, the payment streams due under the leases, and the surety bonds, but it separated the security interest in the payment streams from the security interest in the leases. The payment streams are payment intangibles, not chattel paper. The leases are chattel paper, which evidence a payment obligation and a security interest. The debtor may strip the payment streams from the leases and grant a separate security interest in them. Revised Article 9's definitions and other provisions make the distinction between chattel paper and payment intangibles. The court acknowledges but does not address the difficult perfection and priority issues that arise when the payment streams and chattel paper are separated in this manner but concludes that Revised Article 9's direct language controls, despite the difficulty in implementing the effects of the ruling. Netbank, FSB v. Kipperman (In re Commercial Money Ctr., Inc.), 350 B.R. 465 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

- 2.6.mm Creditor may re-perfect its security interest by filing continuation financing statement. The bank loaned the debtor money in January 1999. It took a security interest and filed a financing statement signed by the debtor. Under the security agreement, the debtor "irrevocably appoints Lender as its attorney-in-fact for the purpose of executing any documents necessary to perfect or to continue the security interest." In January 2004, the security interest filing lapsed. The bank filed a continuation statement in October 2004. The bank was authorized to do so by the security agreement and by Old Article 9, § 9-402(b)(3). After Revised Article 9 became effective, it was equally authorized to do so by new section 9-509 and because Revised Article 9 eliminated the requirement of the debtor's signature on a financing statement. Bank One v. Bononi (In re Aliquippa Mach. Co.), 343 B.R. 145 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2006).
- 2.6.nn Landlord has a perfected security interest in a CD deposited with its predecessor. The debtor leased office space from a bank. The lease required the debtor, "as security and collateral for Tenant's performance under this Lease [to] deposit [funds] with the Landlord which will be held by Landlord in an interest bearing certificate of deposit account Upon any material default ... Landlord ... may use, apply, or retain all or any portion of such deposit for the payment of any Rent" The language, although missing words of grant, is sufficient to create a security interest, because it evidences the parties' intent to create a security interest by giving the landlord an interest in the CD to secure the debtor's performance and describes the CD as security for that performance. The CD was not evidenced by a transferable certificate. Therefore, the deposit is not an instrument that requires perfection by filing but a deposit account that requires perfection by control. The bank here, as both landlord/secured party and the depository bank, had control as defined in U.C.C. § 9-104. The bank later sold the real property and assigned its security interest in the CD to the buyer. U.C.C. § 9-310(C) provides that a filing is not required to perfect an assignee's security interest to continue the assignor's perfection against the debtor's creditors. Because the original landlord's security interest was perfected, it remained perfected in the hands of the assignee, even though the assignee did not have control over the CD, as the bank did. In re Verus Inv. Mgmt., LLC, 344 B.R. 537 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2006).
- 2.6.oo "One year" does not necessarily mean 365 days. Section 546(a)(1)(A) requires that certain avoiding power actions be brought within "2 years after the entry of the order for relief." In this case, the order for relief was entered on July 22, 2003. The trustee filed the avoiding power action on July 22, 2005. The two-year period included a leap-year, that is, a year with 366 days. Under the "anniversary date rule," which the court adopts, a year is measured as 12 calendar months, not 365 days, so the complaint was timely. Callahan v. Moore (In re Gen. Creations, Inc.), 343 B.R. 548 (Bankr. W.D. Va. 2006).
- 2.6.pp The Archbishop of Portland in Oregon (defined under Oregon law as a corporation sole) held record title to all of the real property on which the churches and schools of the Archdiocese were located but claimed that it held title in trust for the parishes and schools. The court had previously determined that the parishes and schools were not legal entities separate from the Archdiocese. The Tort Claimants Committee, moving on behalf of the estate, sought to avoid the beneficial interests in the real property that the parishes and schools claimed, using the powers under section 544(a)(3) of a hypothetical bona fide purchaser of real estate from the debtor as of the commencement of the case. Section 541(d) excludes from the estate property in which the debtor holds only legal title and not an equitable interest. It does not, however, supersede the avoiding power in section 544(a)(3). The Committee could therefore use section 544(a)(3) to avoid the unrecorded beneficial interests. A hypothetical bona fide purchaser is subject, under applicable nonbankruptcy law, to inquiry notice as well as to recorded notice of an adverse interest. The listing of the adverse interest on the debtor's bankruptcy schedules that were not filed with the petition does not give notice sufficient to put a hypothetical purchaser on inquiry notice as of the commencement of the case of the adverse interest, although the listing on schedules filed with the petition might. Tort Claimants Comm. v. Roman Catholic Archbishop of Portland in Oregon (In re Roman Catholic Archbishop of Portland in Oregon), 335 B.R. 868 (Bankr. D. Ore. 2005).

- 2.6.qq Reclaiming creditors takes priority over unperfected secured creditor. The debtor, a used car dealer, bought three cars and financed them with a secured creditor, who failed to perfect its security interest by properly recording the certificate of title. The debtor's check to the seller failed to clear. Before bankruptcy, the seller properly and timely demanded reclamation, and the debtor returned the cars. UCC section 2-702 makes a seller's reclamation rights subject to the claims of a good faith purchaser, which the courts have construed to include a secured creditor. However, to qualify, the secured creditor must observe "reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade." Failure to perfect is not consistent with reasonable commercial standards. Therefore, the unperfected secured creditor did not qualify as a good faith purchaser, and the reclaiming seller's rights were superior. Davis v. Par Wholesale Auto, Inc. (In re Tucker), 329 B.R. 291 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2005).
- 2.6.rr Lender is not liable for not warning take-out lender of debtor's fraud. When the lender suspected that the debtor was engaged in fraudulent accounting practices, inflating sales, receivables and inventory, and that the principals were looting the company, it did not call a default or accelerate the loan, but it put pressure on the debtor to refinance. The debtor did so, but ultimately failed. Although the new lenders asked the old lender for information about the debtor, the old lender did not respond. After bankruptcy, the new lenders sued the old lender for aiding and abetting the fraud and sought recovery of the amount of their new loan plus the amount that the principals had looted after the new loan was made. A claim for aiding and abetting under New York law requires that the defendant had actual knowledge of a fiduciary's breach of obligations and actively induced or participated in the breach. Here, the mere knowledge or suspicion of the breach, even coupled with the pressure to refinance the old loan, did not amount to active inducement or participation in the breach. The breach had existed before old lender learned of it and continued thereafter. The old lender therefore did not induce. In addition, the old lender had no duty to the new lenders, and it did not make any misrepresentations to the new lenders. It merely refused to reveal what it knew. It was fully entitled to protect its own interests in seeing its loan repaid and is not liable for aiding and abetting. Sharp Int'l Corp. v. State St. Bank & Trust Co. (In re Sharp Int'l Corp.), 403 F.3d 43 (2d Cir. 2005).
- 2.6.ss Lender is not liable for not warning the banking regulator or other creditors of the debtor's fraud. The debtor's principal embezzled substantial funds from the debtor. Its bank lender suspected a problem, stopped advancing, and collected all of its outstanding loans, without advising either its banking regulators or the debtor's other lenders of its suspicions of the crimes afoot or of the potential uncollectability of the loans. Because the bank was under no duty to warn other lenders and neither participated in the borrower's embezzlement nor made any fraudulent statements to its regulators or to any of the other lenders, it is not liable to the other lenders for their losses. It received a preference, no more, which is not recoverable outside of bankruptcy. B.E.L.T. Inc. v. Wachovia Corp., 403 F.3d 474 (7th Cir. 2005).

- 2.6.tt Settlement proceeds are payment intangibles or, alternatively, proceeds. The debtor's dairy cows were destroyed by a faulty electric fence. The debtor sued and recovered a settlement payment from the fencing company. The bank had a security interest in the cows and in all after-acquired property, including payment intangibles. The debtor argued that that action against the fencing company sounded in tort and therefore was not subject to the bank's security interest. Under UCC Revised Article 9 § 9-204(b)(2), an after-acquired property clause cannot reach a future commercial tort claim, which is not a general intangible under UCC Revised Article 9 § 9-102(a)(42). However, once the action settles and the defendant becomes contractually obligated to pay, the obligation becomes a payment intangible that is subject to the bank's after-acquired property clause. Alternatively, the settlement payment was collateral proceeds, which includes rights arising from loss or damage to collateral, under UCC § 9-102(a)(64)(D). Wiersma v. O.H. Kruse Grain & Milling (In re Wiersma), 324 B.R. 92 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).
- 2.6.uu Trustee does not have rights of hypothetical tax creditor. In United States v. Craft, 535 U.S. 274 (2002), the Supreme Court held that under the Internal Revenue Code, the IRS has authority to obtain a lien against property held in tenancy by the entirety, even though only one spouse owed the taxes. Under section 544(a)(2), the trustee has the rights and powers of a hypothetical "creditor that extends credit to the debtor at the time of the commencement of the case." The trustee here argues that he has the rights of the IRS as a hypothetical credit extender, but the court rules that the phrase "extends credit" in section 544(a)(2) does not include an involuntary extension of credit such as taxes. It notes that to rule in the trustee's favor would essentially eliminate the tenancy by the entirety exemption from the Bankruptcy Code, which Congress clearly did not intend. Schlossberg v. Barney, 380 F.3d 174 (4th Cir. 2004).
- 2.6.vv Only the trustee may pursue an alter ego claim against a corporate parent. Section 544(a)(2) grants a trustee all "the rights and powers of . . . a creditor that . . . obtains . . . an execution against the debtor that is returned unsatisfied . . ." Because a corporation's creditors may sue its shareholder as the corporation's alter ego, so may the trustee. And because the trustee may sue under an avoiding power, the creditors may not, as that right vests exclusively in the trustee. Doctors Hosp. of Hyde Park, Inc. v. Desnick (In re Doctors Hosp. of Hyde Park, Inc.), 308 B.R. 311 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2004).
- 2.6.ww Filing a financing statement to perfect a security interest in proceeds of a real estate sale contract must be at the debtor's executive offices. Revised Article 9 of the UCC requires perfection of a security interest in a general intangible by filing a financing statement in the State of the debtor's chief executive office. However, section 9-104(j) excludes interests in real property, leases, or rents from the requirements of Article 9. In this case, the lender took a security interest in a contract for sale of real property and filed its financing statement in the State where the real property was located, not in the State of the debtor's chief executive office. Because the secured creditor's interest was an interest in proceeds of the sale contract, rather than in the real property itself, the filing did not perfect the security interest. The opinion letter from debtor's counsel that the State where the real property is located was the correct place to file did not change the outcome. Fleet National Bank v. Whippany Venture I, LLC (In re The IT Group, Inc, Co.), 307 B.R. 762 (D. Del. 2004).
- 2.6.xx Assignment of expected tort recovery creates a security interest. After they had filed an action to recover for injury suffered in an automobile accident, the debtors borrowed money and gave an assignment of the proceeds of the action to the lender to secure repayment of the loan. The transaction is subject to Revised Article 9, because the assignment was intended to secure repayment of the loan, rather than "in full or partial satisfaction of a pre-existing indebtedness." (UCC Section 9-109(4)(g).) Perfection of the security interest required filing, because the asset was a "general intangible" rather than a "payment intangible." Under UCC Section 9-102 and Section 9-109, the obligation was not a monetary obligation until it was reduced to judgment or settled. Therefore, the transaction did not qualify for any of the automatic perfection provisions of Revised Article 9 applicable to an account or to payment intangibles. Houston v. Eiler (In re Cohen), 305 B.R. 886 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).

- 2.6.yy Trustee's rights as bona fide purchaser defeats resulting trust. The bankruptcy court had previously determined that real property of the debtor was subject to a resulting trust in favor of a creditor. The debtor in possession sought to defeat the resulting trust by use of the bona fide purchaser avoiding power of section 544(a)(3). The court avoided the interest because, under state law, an unrecorded interest is not effective "in law or equity" against a subsequent purchaser for value and without notice. In re Loewen Group Int'l, Inc., 292 B.R. 522 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003).
- 2.6.zz Statute of limitations does not apply to defensive use of avoiding powers. The bankruptcy court had previously determined that the creditor was the beneficiary of a resulting trust on property of the estate. After the property was sold, the creditors sought recovery of its share of the proceeds. The trustee defended on the grounds that the creditors' resulting trust interest was avoidable under section 544(a)(3), but the defense was asserted after expiration of the statute of limitations of section 546(a). Nevertheless, the court permits avoidance of the transfer to defeat the creditors claim. Although the action was to recover property from the estate, the court characterized the action as a claim and analogized the defense to a defense under section 502(d) under which a claim may not be allowed unless the creditor returns any avoided transfers. In re Loewen Group Int'l, Inc., 292 B.R. 522 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003).
- 2.6.aaa UCC filing governs perfection of security interest in unregistered copyright. The Copyright Act does not have a mechanism for perfection of a security interest in an unregistered copyright, only in a registered copyright. The UCC steps back to federal law only where federal law provides for a means of perfection, which it does not do for unregistered copyrights. Nor does federal law preempt state law on perfection. Accordingly, UCC filing perfects a security interest in an unregistered copyright. At the same time, the Ninth Circuit recognizes the correctness of In re Peregrine Entertainment, Ltd., 116 B.R. 194 (C.D. Cal 1990), which held that the Copyright Act governs perfection of a security interest in a registered copyright. Aerocon Engineering, Inc. v. Silicon Valley Bank (In re World Auxiliary Power Co.), 303 F.3d 1120 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 2.6.bbb Bank's security interest in general intangible does not extend to rabbi trust. The debtor's rabbi trust prohibited the debtor from creating a security interest in the assets of the trust. For that reason, and because the debtor did not have legal title to the corpus of the trust, the debtor's grant of a security interest in general intangibles did not encompass the corpus of the trust. (The court reaches this result under the pre-revision version of the anti-assignment provision of Article 9; because of the debtor's lack of legal title to the corpus of the trust, the result might be the same under revised Article 9.) Bank of America, N.A. v. Moglia (In re Outboard Marine Corp.), 278 B.R. 778 (N.D. Ill. 2002).
- 2.6.ccc Perfection of security interest in a patent requires Article 9 filing. Affirming the decision of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel, the Ninth Circuit rules that perfection of a security interest in a patent is governed by Article 9, rather than by the Lanham Act, which governs registration of patents. In a lengthy analysis of the language of the Lanham Act, the Ninth Circuit concludes that its registration provisions apply to registration of only a transfer of title to a patent, not of a security interest, and that the provisions of Article 9 do not defer to such a federal statute. Moldo v. Matsco, Inc. (In re Cybernetic Services, Inc.), 252 F.3d 1040 (9th Cir. 2001).
- 2.6.ddd Unsigned security agreement created a valid security interest. The debtor signed a financing statement and a security agreement, which provided that it did not become effective until accepted by the bank. The bank never signed the agreement. A junior secured creditor challenged the validity of the bank's security agreement in the debtor's chapter 11 case. The debtor-in-possession did not challenge the validity of the agreement. The Seventh Circuit holds that the junior creditor could not challenge the grant of the security interest, because it was not a party to the agreement. Moreover, imputing intent to the parties despite the absence of signature, the court holds that the parties clearly intended that the agreement be binding on both the debtor and the bank. Falconbridge U.S., Inc. v. Bank One Illinois, N.A. (In re Vic Supply Co., Inc.), 227 F.3d 928 (7th Cir. 2000).

- 2.6.eee Perfection of a security interest in a trademark requires UCC filing. Unlike the Copyright Act, which expressly applies to the filing of security interests in the Copyright Office, the Lanham Act does not require the filing with the Patent and Trademark Office of any notice of the grant of a security interest in a trademark. Accordingly, the filing rules of the UCC apply to perfection of a security interest in a trademark. Trimarchi v. Together Development Corp., 255 B.R. 606 (D. Mass. 2000).
- 2.6.fff UCC governs perfection of unregistered copyright. Finding that In re Peregrine Entertainment, Ltd., 116 B.R. 194 (C.D. Cal. 1990), required perfection by recordation in the Copyright Office only of registered copyrights, the bankruptcy court rules that the UCC governs perfection of a copyright that has not been registered with the Copyright Office. Thus, the trustee could not avoid the bank's lien on the copyright where the lien was perfected by the filing of a financing statement under the UCC. Aerocon Engineering, Inc. v. Silicon Valley Bank (In re World Auxiliary Power Co.), 244 B.R. 149 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 1999)
- 2.6.ggg Security interest in healthcare receivables upheld. The secured creditor took a security interest in healthcare receivables, including Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement payments, payments from private insurers, and state "insurance claims." The creditor perfected by filing a UCC-1 statement. The court holds the security interest valid, perfected, and unavoidable, ruling that the UCC filing perfects security interests in these assets as the best notice available under the circumstances, even though Article 9 might not literally apply to security interests in these assets. The court also rules that the Federal Medicare and Medicaid anti-assignment statutes do not prohibit the grant of a security interest in Medicare or Medicaid payments. The court notes the possible difficulty the secured creditor might have in collecting, because the anti-assignment statutes prohibit payment to anyone other than the healthcare provider. The court does not address the general Federal anti-assignment statutes, however, which may be broader than the Medicare and Medicaid statutes. Official Unsecured Creditors' Committee v. Chittenden Trust Co. (In re East Boston Neighborhood Health Center Corp.), 242 B.R. 562 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1999).
- 2.6.hhh Security interest in a patent is perfected by UCC recording. The language of section 261 of the Patent Act, governing an "assignment" of patents and recordation of assignments with the Patent Office, does not cover the grant of a security interest in a patent. Accordingly, perfection of a security interest in a patent is governed by Article 9, and the security interest must be filed in the manner dictated by Article 9 to be perfected. Moldo v. Matsco, Inc. (In re Cybernetic Services, Inc.), 239 B.R. 917 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1999).
- 2.6.iii Perfection of security interest in aircraft does not require re-filing after five years. The creditor recorded a security interest in the aircraft with the F.A.A. but did not, under UCC Section 9-403(2), re-record after five years. The Fourth Circuit holds that the re-recording was not necessary, as section 9-403 applies only to a recordation that is required under the UCC. Blair v. Crestar Bank (In re Brice), 188 F.3d 576 (4th Cir. 1999).
- 2.6.jjj "All debtor's income" is not a sufficient financing statement description. The debtor granted the FmHA a security interest in its contract rights, accounts receivable, and general intangibles, but the financing statement filed with the Secretary of State described the collateral as “all debtor’s income.” The financing statement was ineffective to perfect the security interests. Cottage Grove Hospital v. Glickman (In re Cottage Grove Hospital), 233 B.R. 493 Bankr. D. Ore. 1999).

2.6.kkk Mortgage avoided because of break in chain of title. The debtor transferred real property to her 50%-owned corporation, who sold it to a third party, who financed the purchase with a mortgage on the property. The corporation did not record a deed (if the debtor indeed ever delivered one) from the debtor, so even after the sale to the third party, record title remained in the debtor. The trustee could avoid the mortgage under section 544(a)(3), holding: (1) whether or not the debtor’s bare legal title is impressed with a constructive trust in favor of the mortgagee, section 541(d) is subject to the trustee’s avoiding powers; and (2) The trustee’s strong-arm avoiding power under § 544(a)(3) gives the trustee the rights and powers of a bona fide purchaser, independent of whether there was a transfer by the debtor of the property. However, the trustee’s rights are determined by state law, and the rights of a hypothetical bona fide purchaser were subject to the mortgagee’s rights of corporation to a prior lien that had not been released as of the petition date. Mayer v. United States (In re Reasonover), 236 B.R. 219 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1999).

2.6.iii Criminal restitution lien does not attach after bankruptcy. 18 U.S.C. § 3613 grants the United States a lien to secure a criminal restitution debt. It provides that the lien is perfected against third parties when recorded, but that “a lien filed as prescribed by this section shall not be voided in a bankruptcy proceeding.” The United States recorded the lien against the debtor’s real property after bankruptcy. The trustee prevailed against the lien under section 544(a)(3), because the trustee had the rights of a hypothetical bona fide purchaser of the real property. As a result, the trustee did not “void” the lien; the lien simply never attached to the interest at the time it was recorded. Mayer v. United States (In re Reasonover), 236 B.R. 219 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1999).

2.6.mmm Possession by a bailee may be adequate for attachment of a security interest. UCC section 9-305 permits perfection of a security interest by a bailee of the secured party. UCC section 9-203 permits attachment of a security interest without a written agreement if “the collateral is in the possession of the secured party pursuant to agreement.” The Sixth Circuit holds that possession by the bailee is adequate for attachment, as it is for perfection. Marlow v. Rollins Cotton Company (In re The Julien Co.), 146 F.3d 420 (6th Cir. 1998).

2.6.nnn Trustees’ strong-arm power is subject to inquiry notice. The rights of a trustee as a bona fide purchaser of real estate under section 544(a)(3) of the Bankruptcy Code are subject to such notice as the trustee would receive under state law inquiry notice requirements. In this case, the purchaser at a foreclosure sale under a mortgage failed to record his deed before the debtor filed bankruptcy. The Fifth Circuit rules that, under Texas law, a bona fide purchaser would be on notice of the existence of the mortgage because the mortgage had been previously recorded, and the purchaser would be required to inquire as to the status of the mortgage. Upon inquiry, the purchaser would have learned of the foreclosure, thereby defeating the purchaser’s bona fide purchaser status. Realty Portfolio, Inc. v. Hamilton (In re Hamilton), 125 F.3d 292 (5th Cir. 1997).

2.7 Recovery

2.7.a DIP may not use turnover order to collect judgment. The debtor in possession obtained a judgment against a third party and sought a turnover order under section 542(b) against the judgment debtor to turnover its property to pay the judgment. Section 542(b) requires an entity that owes a matured debt to the debtor that is property of the estate to pay the debt to the trustee. Although the judgment is property of the estate, the judgment debtor’s property is not. The proper way to enforce a bankruptcy court judgment is through a writ of execution and, if necessary, supplemental proceedings, as provided under Bankruptcy Rule 7069. Therefore, the court denies the motion. In re J and M Supply of the Carolinas, LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 3469 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. Dec. 8, 2022).

- 2.7.b Good faith under sections 548(c) and 550(b)(1) is measured by an inquiry notice standard. The broker-dealer debtor ran a Ponzi scheme and was liquidated under the Securities Investor Protection Act. The SIPA trustee sued under section 550(a) to recover customer property from subsequent transferees of the debtor's account holders who withdrew funds within two years before the liquidation. A SIPA trustee has the same avoiding powers as a bankruptcy trustee. Section 550(a) authorizes the trustee to recover an avoided transfer from the initial transferee or from subsequent transferees, but section 550(b) prohibits a trustee from recovering from a subsequent transferee who took for value, in good faith, and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. "Good faith" is based on inquiry notice, that is, what the transferee should have known, even in a SIPA stockbroker case. However, the test is not purely objective or a negligence standard. "[W]hat the transferee should have known depends on what it actually knew, and not what it was charged with knowing on a theory of constructive notice." The test requires a three-step analysis: what did the transferee actually know; do those "facts put the transferee on inquiry notice of the fraudulent purpose behind a transaction—that is, whether the facts ... would have led a reasonable person in the transferee's position to conduct further inquiry into possible fraud," and if so, whether "diligent inquiry would have discovered the fraudulent purpose." Picard v. Citibank, N.A. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 12 F.4th 171 (2d Cir. 2021).
- 2.7.c Court permits recovery from subsequent transferees of proceeds of sale of the debtor's fraudulently issued stock. The debtor issued controlling stock to its 3% shareholder, who was also its CEO, under his scheme to sell the stock as a way of monetizing his investment in the company. He then colluded with some friends, who raised money from investors into a fund, which then purchased the stock from the CEO. The friends received a large commission from the fund. The CEO promptly transferred portions of the cash to his children. The debtor filed bankruptcy soon thereafter, and the trustee sought to recover from the children and the friends as subsequent transferees of a fraudulent transfer from the debtor. Under section 550(a), "to the extent a transfer is avoided ... the trustee may recover ... the property transferred ... from the initial transferee of such transfer ... or any immediate or mediate transferee of such initial transferee." Section 550(b) gives a defense to a subsequent transferee who took in good faith, for value, and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. The phrase "to the extent a transfer is avoided" does not limit a trustee's recovery to transfers that have actually been avoided, as long as the court finds the transfers are avoidable. The phrase's purpose is to limit the recovery by the limiting provisions in the avoidance sections. Only a transfer of property of the debtor is avoidable. Although the debtor's stock represents an interest in the debtor, rather than an interest of the debtor in property, the stock had value which the debtor could have captured by issuing it directly to buyers, and therefore constitutes property of the debtor. Finally, section 550(a) applies to any transferee of an initial transferee, not only to a transferee of the initially transferred property. Therefore, the cash proceeds the defendants received were recoverable. Cage v. David (In re Giant Gray, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 2980 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Oct. 22, 2020).
- 2.7.d Federal law governs prejudgment interest on a section 544(b) fraudulent transfer avoiding action. The trustee sued the transferee under section 544(b), applying state fraudulent transfer law to avoid the debtor's transfers, and under section 550(a) to recover the avoided transfers. Governing law on prejudgment interest follows the law governing the substantive claim. Although state law governed the trustee's avoidance action, federal law, section 550(a), governed recovery. As such, federal law governs prejudgment interest on the recovery. Kelley v. Boosalis, 974 F.3d 884 (8th Cir. 2020).
- 2.7.e Transfer to bank account to support a loan is not a transfer to the bank. While insolvent, the debtor transferred money from its account at the bank to affiliates' accounts at the bank without consideration as collateral to secure bank loans to the affiliates. The trustee may avoid a transfer for less than reasonably equivalent value made while the debtor was insolvent. A transfer into a bank account is not a transfer to the bank unless the bank has sufficient dominion and control over the account. A security interest in the account does not amount to sufficient dominion and control to permit the bank to withdraw the funds for its own use. However, if the affiliate overdrew the account and the bank finally honored the overdraft, the bank would be a subsequent transferee of a transfer by the debtor into the affiliate's account to replenish the balance. Scott v. Sun Trust Bank, N.A. (In re Runnymede Cap. Mgmt.), 616 B.R. 67 (Bankr. W.D. Va. 2020).

- 2.7.f Trustee may not recover proceeds of fraudulently transferred property from a subsequent transferee. The debtor contracted with an investor to develop wind power projects. The contract required the investor, upon commercial operation, to pay 75% of the projects' purchase price to the debtor and 25% to an advisor. The debtor transferred the development contract to an affiliate without consideration. It later filed bankruptcy. After litigating with the investor, the transferee collected the payments and paid a portion of the cash to two law firms. The trustee avoided the transfer to the affiliate then sought to recover from the law firms as subsequent transferees. Section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover fraudulently transferred property or its value from "the initial transferee of such transfer" or from "any immediate or mediate transferee of such initial transferee," except one who takes for value, in good faith, and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. In this case, the fraudulently transferred property was the contract. Although the law firms received proceeds of that property, neither firm was a transferee of the contract. Section 550 does not provide for recovery of proceeds, and section 541(a)(6)'s inclusion of proceeds in property of the estate does not apply to section 550. Section 550 permits recovery of the value of the property transferred, but only from "the initial transferee of such transfer" or any subsequent transferee. The law firms were neither. Therefore, the trustee may not recover from the law firms. Rajala v. Spencer Fane LLP (In re Generation Res. Holding Co, LLC), ___ F.3d ___, 2020 U.S. App. LEXIS 21454 (10th Cir. July 10, 2020).
- 2.7.g Trustee may not recover fraudulently transferred property that the transferee returned to the debtor. Before bankruptcy, the debtor fraudulently transferred funds to his sister-in-law. Before long, the sister-in-law transferred the funds to the debtor. The trustee sued to avoid the initial transfer, which the sister-in-law conceded. The trustee also claimed a right to recover the transferred funds under section 550(a), which permits a trustee "to recover, for the benefit of the estate, the property transferred, or, if the court so orders, the value of such property." To "recover" means to get back or regain. Once the property has been returned to the debtor, it can no longer be recovered. Therefore, the trustee may not recover the property transferred to the sister-in-law. Whitlock v. Lowe (In re DeBerry), 945 F.3d 943 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 2.7.h Recovery action defendant has burden of proof of non-avoidability of initial transfer as defense to recovery. The trustee avoided a fraudulent transfer by a default judgment and then sued a subsequent transferee for recovery of the avoided transfer. The subsequent transferee defendant sought discovery on the avoidability of the initial transfers. Section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover a transfer "avoided under section 544, 545, 547, [or] 548 ... of this title." Section 550(b)(1) denies the trustee recovery from a subsequent transferee "that takes for value ..., in good faith, and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer avoided." If the recovery action defendant was not a party to the avoidance action and if the trustee need not prove the avoidability of the transfer in the recovery action, the recovery action defendant could be denied due process in the determination of an essential element of the recovery cause of action. Still, because section 550(a) permits recovery of an "avoided transfer," the trustee need not prove the avoidability of the initial transfer as part of the cause of action for recovery under section 550(a). However, because one defense is that the subsequent transferee defendant did not have knowledge of the voidability of the initial transfer, the defendant may address the avoidability issue by showing the transfer was not avoidable. Thus, the burden of proof shifts from the trustee to the defendant to show non-avoidability, thereby preserving the defendant's due process rights. However, if the avoidance judgment was a default judgment, the trustee has the burden of proving the avoidability of the initial transfer. Yip v. Google, LLC (In re Student Aid Center, Inc.), 608 B.R. 583 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2019).

- 2.7.i Avoiding mortgage and recovering mortgage proceeds from transferee is not a double recovery. The debtor owned real property in tenancy by the entirety. After the order for relief, and with her husband's consent, she mortgaged the property for $250,000. She paid the $250,000 to three attorneys who were defending her in a criminal action. The trustee sued to avoid the mortgage and to avoid the transfers to one of the attorneys. The mortgagee settled with the trustee, agreeing to avoidance of the mortgage, which the trustee preserved for the benefit of the estate. The trustee then moved to sell the debtor's and her husband's real property under section 363(h), but the bankruptcy court denied the motion. After trial, the bankruptcy court ordered the avoidance and recovery of the payment to the attorney. Section 550(d) limits the trustee's recovery to a single satisfaction. Because the bankruptcy court denied the trustee's motion to sell the property, so that the trustee could not recover the value of the avoided mortgage, recovery of the mortgage proceeds from the attorney did not amount to more than a single satisfaction. Jones v. The Brand Law Firm, P.A. (In re Belmonte), 931 F.3d 147 (2d Cir. 2019).
- 2.7.j Trustee may recover proceeds of fraudulently transferred property from a subsequent transferee. The debtor fraudulently transferred property to a related entity, which sold the property for cash. The transferee paid a portion of the cash to two law firms. The trustee avoided the transfer to the related entity then sought to recover from the law firms as subsequent transferees. Section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover fraudulently transferred property or its value from the initial transferee or from any immediate or mediate transferee of the initial transferee, except one who takes for value, in good faith, and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. The absence of the word "proceeds" in section 550(a) is not dispositive, as the trustee could have recovered the value—which might be in the form of proceeds—from an initial transferee who sold the property or from a subsequent transferee. The broader reading is consistent with the statute's purpose to restore the estate to the position it would have been in if the transfer had not been made. Therefore, section 550(a) permits recovery of cash proceeds in the hands of a subsequent transferee. Rajala v. Husch Blackwell LLP (In re Generation Res. Holding Co, LLC), 604 B.R. 896 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2019), rev'd, Rajala v. Spencer Fane LLP (In re Generation Res. Holding Co, LLC), 964 F.3d 958 (10th Cir. 2020).
- 2.7.k Section 550(a)(2) applies to a foreign subsequent transfer. The Ponzi scheme debtor fraudulently transferred property to foreign investors, who transferred some of the property to their own investors. The trustee avoided the transfers under section 548(a)(1)(A) and sued under section 550(a)(2) to recover the subsequent transfers. There is a presumption against extraterritorial application of a statute. An action may proceed under a statute only if Congress clearly indicated its intent that the statute apply extraterritorially or if the action involved a domestic application of the statute. To determine whether an action involves a domestic application, the court must look at the statute's focus, which is the overriding purpose of the statute or the conduct it seeks to regulate and the parties it seeks to protect. Here, section 550(a)(2) works, and must be read, in tandem with section 548(a)(1) to regulate the harm to the estate and other creditors from the initial fraudulent transfer. Because the initial transfer was made in the United States by a domestic debtor, the application of section 550(a)(2) here involves a domestic application of the statute. In re Picard, 917 F.3d 85 (2d Cir. 2019).
- 2.7.l Under section 550(a), a payroll service is a conduit, not an initial transferee. The debtor, which conducted a fraudulent business, paid its payroll through a payroll service, which accepted funds from the debtor into an account that held only client payroll funds, not any of the service's own funds, and issued payments to employees solely at the debtor's direction, as required under the debtor-service contract. The trustee sued the service to avoid and recover payroll payments the debtor made to the service as fraudulent transfers. Section 550(a)(1) permits the trustee to recover an avoided transfer from an initial transferee but not from a mere conduit of a transfer. A conduit is one who does not have actual control over the transferred property and acted in good faith and as an innocent participant in the transfer. Here, the payroll service segregated client funds and, by contract, was required to use them only for the client's payroll. It did not have any control over the funds. As a payroll service that only issued payments at the client's express instructions and did not have any visibility into or control over the client's business, it was an innocent participant in the transfers. Therefore, it was a conduit, not an initial transferee that would be liable for recovery of the payments. Luria v. ADP, Inc. (In re Taylor, Bean & Whitaker Mortgage Corp.), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 3407 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. Nov. 1, 2018).

- 2.7.m Neither one who purchases a cashier's check nor an agent for the intended recipient is an initial transferee. The CEO of the debtor, which was engaged in a fraudulent scheme to defraud its customers, pledged to contribute funds to his alma mater's foundation. To fulfill the pledge, he embezzled funds from the debtor. At the debtor's bank, he presented a counter check on the debtor's bank account for a cashier's check payable to the university, not the foundation. When issuing a cashier's check, the bank debits the drawee account and credits its own internal account. Only the payee may negotiate the check, although the check may be returned to the bank, which will then credit the drawee account. The CEO delivered the check to the university. As required by an agreement with the foundation, the university endorsed the check to the foundation, which deposited the check in its own account. The transfer was avoidable as an actual fraudulent transfer and a constructive fraudulent transfer. Section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover an avoided fraudulent transfer from the initial transferee or from an entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. An initial transferee is one who has dominion and control over the transferred property. An agent of the intended recipient of the transferred property is not an initial transferee. Here, because the CEO could not negotiate the check for his own benefit, he did not have dominion or control over the funds represented by the check and was not the initial transferee. Under the agreement between the university and the foundation, the university was only an agent of the foundation and was not the initial transferee. Therefore, the trustee may not recover from the university. Bodenstein v. Univ. of N. Iowa (In re Peregrine Fin. Group, Inc.), 589 B.R. 360 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2018).
- 2.7.n Trustee may bring recovery action within one year after termination of avoidance action, whether or not the transfer is avoided. The debtor conducted a fraudulent scheme. In the course of the scheme, the debtor paid kickbacks to a purported customer. The customer had a single shareholder and officer, who caused the customer to pay himself from the debtor's payments to the customer. The trustee sued the customer to avoid the payments as fraudulent transfers but later dismissed the action after determining that the customer was defunct and could not answer a judgment. Within one year after dismissal, but more than two years after the petition date, the trustee sued the sole shareholder and officer to recover the transfers, alleging that the shareholder was an entity for whose benefit the initial transfers were made as well as a subsequent transferee of the transfers. Section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover an avoided transfer from the initial transferee or an entity for whose benefit the transfer is made. Section 550(d) requires the action to recover be commenced within one year after the transfer is avoided. If the trustee brings an avoidance action within section 546(a)'s two-year statute of limitation for avoidance actions but either settles the avoidance action without an admission of liability or dismisses the avoidance action where it is useless to pursue it, the trustee may commence a recovery action under section 550(a) within section 550(d)'s one-year period after the termination of the avoidance action. Any other result would require the trustee to continue to pursue a pointless avoidance action to enable recovery against an entity for whose benefit the transfer was made or a subsequent transferee. Because the trustee alleged the transfers were made for the benefit of the sole shareholder, the court permits the trustee to pursue the recovery action against him, despite having dismissed the initial recovery action. Geltzer v. ContinuityX, Inc. (In re ContinuityX, Inc.), 582 B.R. 124 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2018).
- 2.7.o Court determines trustee' remaining single satisfaction recovery limitation after a settlement by analyzing each underlying transfer. The trustee brought an action against the initial transferee and a subsequent transferee to avoid multiple transfers as fraudulent transfers and to recover their value. The initial transferee had transferred only some of the initial transfers to the subsequent transferee. The initial transferee and the trustee settled for an amount substantially less than the total value of all the transfers. The subsequent transferee sought to offset the full settlement amount against its potential liability. Section 550 permits the trustee to recover an avoided transfer from the initial transferee or a subsequent transferee, but section 550(d) limits the trustee to only a single satisfaction in the aggregate. Where the trustee recovers part of the fraudulent transfers' value from the initial transferee by settlement, the court must determine the settlement value's effect on the subsequent transferee's potential liability under the "single satisfaction" rule. The court rejects an allocation solely to the transfers that were not followed by a subsequent transfer as too favorable to the trustee and harsh to the subsequent transferee, rejects the opposite result for the opposite reason, and rejects a pro rata allocation of the settlement amount among all transfers as potentially unfair based on the nature of each transfer. The court also refuses to allocate the settlement based on the settling parties' agreement, because the subsequent transferee is not a party to those negotiations, and the settling parties have incentives that could result in an unfair result to the subsequent transferee. Instead, the court concludes that it must allocate the settlement amount among each of the challenged transfers based on such factors as strength of the claims, collectability, and other factors used in evaluating a settlement. In this case, the court determines those factors apply equally to all the settled transactions and so pro rates the settlement amount among all the transfers. Segner v. Ruthven Oil & Gas, LLC (In re Provident Royalties, LLC), 581 B.R. 185 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2017).

- 2.7.p Section 560 protects collateral liquidation and distribution upon termination of a swap with the debtor. The debtor entered into several transactions involving a credit default swap between the debtor and synthetic collateralized debt obligation SPVs (issuers), which issued notes under an indenture. The notes' proceeds were held as collateral for the issuers' obligations under both the notes and the swaps. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, the indenture trustee sent a notice of default and termination under the swaps, liquidated the collateral and distributed the proceeds to the noteholders. Section 560 exempts from the automatic stay and the avoiding powers "the exercise of any contractual rights of any swap participants ... to cause the liquidation, termination or acceleration of one or more swap agreements" based on an ipso facto clause. Courts interpret section 560 broadly to protect swap participants. The section protects not only the liquidation of the amount owing upon swap termination, which by itself would not provide security to a nondefaulting swap participant, but also the liquidation of the collateral and its distribution to the noteholders, which enables the swap participant to liquidate, that is, bring the transaction to a close. Therefore, the court dismisses the debtor in possession's complaint to avoid and recover the distributions. The section also applies to permit the indenture trustee to liquidate the swap, even though the trustee was not the "swap participant," because the indenture trustee was exercising the right "of" the swap participant, and the section does not require that the exercise be "by" the swap participant. Lehman Bros. Special Financing Inc. v. Bank of Am. N.A. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42548 (S.D.N.Y. March 14, 2018).
- 2.7.q Fraudulent transfer recovery is not limited to the amount of unpaid claims. The debtor failed after an LBO, which the buyer claimed resulted from the seller's fraudulent representations. The chapter 11 plan distributed equity in the reorganized debtor to the unsecured noteholders, which the court found satisfied 40% of their allowed claim, and established a litigation trust. The noteholders were entitled to 50% of the litigation trust recoveries, the buyer shareholder the other 50%. After the litigation trust sued the seller shareholder on actual and constructive fraudulent transfer theories, the reorganized debtor was sold for an amount substantially exceeding the value the court had placed on the stock the noteholders received under the plan. Sections 544(b) and 548 permit the trustee to avoid a fraudulent transfer; section 550 permits the trustee to recover from the transferee for the benefit of the estate. The estate comprises all interests, not just creditors' interests. The selling shareholders also had an interest in claims against the buyers and therefore in the litigation trust. Moreover, Moore v. Bay, 284 U.S. 4 (1931), held that a trustee could avoid the entirety of a fraudulent transfer, not limited to the triggering creditor's claim amount, for the benefit of the estate, not just for the benefit of the triggering creditor. The reorganized debtor's value appreciation after emerging from chapter 11 should not affect the trustee's recovery amount; the noteholders who received the stock took the risk of decline, which would not have affected recoveries, and so appreciation should not affect recoveries either. Therefore, the litigation trust's recoverable amount is not limited to the amount of the unpaid unsecured claims. PAH Litigation Trust v. Water St. Healthcare P'ners, L.P. (In re Physiotherapy Holdings, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2017 Bankr. LEXIS 3774 (Bankr. D. Del. Nov. 1, 2017).

- 2.7.r Recipient of misappropriated funds from the debtor's bank account is the initial transferee. The debtor's principal set up a secret bank account in the debtor's name to which the principal misdirected substantial payments made to the debtor. The principal misappropriated funds in the account for his personal expenses. The recipients of payments from the account were innocent outsiders, but the checks drawn on the account used the debtor's business name, even though the recipients had provided value only to the principal or one of his affiliated companies, but not the debtor. The trustee avoided the payments as fraudulent transfers and sought recovery from the recipients. Section 550(a)(1) permits the trustee to recover from the initial transferee or the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. Section 550(a)(2) permits recovery from a subsequent transferee, but not if the subsequent transferee received the transfer in good faith, for value, and without knowledge of the voidability of the initial transfer. An initial transferee is one who has dominion over the transferred property, that is, full legal authority to use or dispose of the property; control (that is, mere ability to direct the disposition of the property) over the property is insufficient. Here, the recipients of payments from the account, not the principal, were the initial transferees. The principal was the entity for whose benefits the transfers were made. Although the principal had control over the account, he never had legal authority to use it for his benefit, so he was not the initial transferee. Designating the recipients as the initial transferees furthers the Code's policing goals, since they are in a better position than the creditors or the misappropriating principal to know and police whether the payments are proper. In this case, the checks had the debtor's name as drawer, even though the payments were not for value to the debtor. Therefore, the trustee may recover from the recipients as initial transferees, and they do not have a good faith-value-without knowledge defense. Henry v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re Walldesign, Inc.), 872 F.3d 954 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 2.7.s Section 550(a) does not apply to foreign subsequent transfer. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. Numerous foreign feeder funds, who solicited investors from outside the United States, invested in the Ponzi scheme and received avoidable transfers from the debtor. The trustee sued numerous investors as subsequent transferees for redemptions of their shares in the feeder funds. Section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover an avoidable transfer from the initial transferee or from an immediate or mediate (subsequent) transferee of the initial transferee. Courts apply a presumption against extraterritorial application of a statute that can be rebutted by a showing that Congress intended extraterritorial application. If not, then the statute applies only if the conduct relevant to the statute's focus occurred in the United States. Although section 541(a)(1) makes property of the debtor, wherever located, property of the estate, the same broad language is absent from the avoiding power sections, and under section 541(a)(3), recovered property does not become property of the estate until after recovery. Therefore, section 550(a)(2) does not suggest Congress intended it to apply extraterritorially. Section 550(a)(2)'s focus is the transfer, not the parties. A transfer does not occur in the United States if the transferor did not maintain its principal operations in the United States and if the transferee is not a U.S. citizen or has a U.S. office used in connection with the transfer and does not use a U.S. bank account for the transfer (other than a correspondent account). The court dismisses the trustee's actions that do not allege these facts. Sec. Inv. Protection Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC, 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 4067 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Nov. 22, 2016).

- 2.7.t Comity prevents trustee from recovering subsequent transfers made by foreign transferor that is the subject of a foreign proceeding. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. Numerous foreign feeder funds, who solicited investors from outside the United States, invested in the Ponzi scheme and received avoidable transfers from the debtor. The trustee sued numerous investors as subsequent transferees for redemptions of their shares in the feeder funds. Some of the initial transferees were subject to liquidation proceedings in their home countries. The liquidators in those proceedings brought claims against the funds' investors to avoid and recover transfers under local law. Section 550(a) permits the trustee to recover an avoidable transfer from the initial transferee or from an immediate or mediate (subsequent) transferee of the initial transferee. Comity "is the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the legislative, executive or judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience, and to the rights of its own citizens or of other persons who are under the protection of its laws." Comity of courts defers to proceedings in foreign courts; comity of nations does not require parallel proceedings but defers to another country to execute its laws. Comity applies in bankruptcy cases and proceedings. The foreign courts have a greater interest in regulating the activities of their debtors that gave rise to the trustee's subsequent transfer claims. The United States has little or no interest in regulating those transfers. Permitting the trustee to sue investors in foreign entities whose own liquidators also asserted claims against them could interfere with the foreign courts' ability to enforce their own laws; it would allow the trustee to reach around the foreign laws and subject the defendants to duplicative claims. Therefore, the court dismisses the claims on the basis of comity. Sec. Inv. Protection Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC, 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 4067 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Nov. 22, 2016).
- 2.7.u Section 560 protects collateral distribution upon termination of a swap with the debtor. The debtor entered into several transactions involving a credit default swap between the debtor and synthetic collateralized debt obligation SPVs (issuers), which issued notes under an indenture. The notes' proceeds were held as collateral for the issuers' obligations under both the notes and the swaps. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, the indenture trustee sent a notice of default and termination under the swaps, liquidated the collateral and distributed the proceeds to the noteholders. Section 560 exempts from the automatic stay and the avoiding powers "the exercise of any contractual rights of any swap participants ... to cause the liquidation, termination or acceleration of one or more swap agreements" based on an ipso facto clause. Courts interpret section 560 broadly to protect swap participants. The section protects not only the liquidation of the amount owing upon swap termination, but also the liquidation of the collateral and its distribution to the noteholders. Therefore, the court dismisses the debtor in possession's complaint to avoid and recover the distributions. Lehman Bros. Special Financing Inc. v. Bank of Am., N.A. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 553 B.R. 476 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016).
- 2.7.v "Without knowledge of voidability" applies to the initial, not the subsequent, transfer. The debtor's principals engaged in a scheme to defraud creditors through a bogus equipment financing business. The principals diverted substantial funds from the debtor and used them to gamble at a casino. The principals gave the casino a false financial statement, which the casino learned about through a credit check. The casino still increased the principals' credit line. In addition, the principals acted erratically at the casino. After bankruptcy, the trustee sought to recover $8 million from the casino as a subsequent transferee of the fraudulent transfers from the debtor to the principals. Section 550(a)(2) permits a trustee to recover from a subsequent transferee to the extent that a transfer is avoided, but section 550(b)(1) gives a defense to a transferee "that takes for value, in good faith, and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer avoided." Under the statutory scheme, the trustee may avoid only the initial transfer and may only recover the transferred property from a subsequent transferee. Therefore, the "transfer avoided" is the initial transfer, not the subsequent transfer. The court must test the subsequent transferee's knowledge of the initial transfer, not of the subsequent transfer. In this case, the casino might have been suspicious of the principals' behavior, giving rise to inquiry notice, but only of the principals' transfers to the casino, not of the debtor's transfer to the principals. Therefore, the trustee may not recover from the casino. Brandt v. Horseshoe Hammond, LLC (In re Equip. Acq. Res., Inc.), 803 F.3d 835 (7th Cir. 2015).

2.7.w Defrauded seller is initial transferee of Ponzi scheme principal's purchase price payment.

The debtor's principal contracted to purchase real property with cash and third-party financing. The contract required the buyer to send the funds to an attorney to hold and distribute, with documents, upon closing. The debtor (not its principal) wired the cash to the attorney, who disbursed it to the seller in accordance with the contract. Unknown to the seller, the debtor was a Ponzi scheme; it filed bankruptcy within a year after the closing. A transfer by a Ponzi scheme debtor is presumed to be made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud, and therefore the trustee may avoid the transfer under section 548(a)(1)(A). The trustee may recover the transferred property or its value from the initial transferee or from a subsequent transferee, who has more defenses to recovery than an initial transferee. An initial transferee is one who has dominion of the transferred property, that is, one who has the right to put the money to his own purposes. In this case, the defrauding buyer was not the initial transferee, because once the attorney received the funds, the buyer had no right to direct the funds other than to pay the contract price, even though the debtor's payment to the attorney was made for the buyer's use and benefit. In reaching this result, the court rejects the "control" test, which some circuits use. Therefore, the innocent seller was the initial transferee. Field v. Mano-Y & M, Ltd. (In re The Mortgage Store, Inc.), 773 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2014).

2.7.x Recovery judgment brings fraudulently transferred property into the estate.

A corporate debtor in possession obtained a judgment against one of its former principals avoiding and recovering a cash payment fraudulent transfer. After the court entered judgment but before the debtor in possession collected, the principal transferred the cash to a Cook Islands asset protection trust. Before the corporate estate could collect on the judgment, the principal filed his own bankruptcy case, triggering the automatic stay against recovery of property of his estate. Property of the estate includes "the following property, wherever located and by whomever held (1) ... all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case ... (3) any interest in property that the trustee recovers under section ... 550" The circuits are split on whether fraudulently transferred property becomes property of the estate under paragraph (1) upon the commencement of the case or under paragraph (3) upon recovery. Under the latter view, the court must determine when the trustee recovers property. The trustee need not possess the property to have recovered it. Recovered property is property of the estate "wherever located and by whomever held." The recovery judgment entitled the trustee to the fraudulently transferred property, even though not in the trustee's possession, making it property of the corporate estate, not of the principal's estate. The principal's automatic stay therefore did not apply, and the debtor in possession could continue to pursue the property from the Cook Islands trust. In re Allen, 768 F.3d 274 (3d Cir. 2014).

2.7.y A conduit is never an entity for whose benefit a transfer is made.

An agency agreement between the insurance agent and the insurer required the agent to hold any premiums it received in a separate account, in trust for the insurer, but also made the agent liable to the insurer for all premiums for policies that it wrote, whether or not the insured paid the agent the premium. The debtor paid insurance premiums to the agent within 90 days before bankruptcy. The trustee sued to avoid and recover the payments. Section 550(a)(1) permits the trustee to recover an avoided transfer from the initial transferee or from an entity for whose benefit a transfer is made. A mere conduit—one who does not have legal control over transferred property—is not liable as an initial transferee. One who is contingently liable to a third party for the debtor's obligation is a beneficiary of the debtor's transfer to the third party to satisfy the obligation. A conduit who fails to pass on funds to the initial transferee is always contingently liable to the initial transferee and would therefore always be an entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. Adopting such a rule would effectively erase the conduit defense. Since that remains a good defense, the court concludes that a conduit is never liable as an entity for whose benefit a transfer is made and dismisses the action against the agent. Guttman v. Construction Program Group (In re Railworks Corp.), 760 F.3d 398 (4th Cir. 2014).

- 2.7.z Defendant in a recovery action may litigate avoidability only as an affirmative defense. The trustee obtained a default judgment avoiding a postpetition transfer under section 549 and then sued under section 550 for recovery from a subsequent transferee, who claimed that the trustee needed to plead and prove the initial transfer's avoidability. Avoidance and recovery are separate concepts and claims. Section 550(a) permits a trustee to recover an "avoided" transfer, making prior avoidance an element of the trustee's standing and recovery cause of action. Moreover, section 550(f) imposes on the trustee a statute of limitations of one year after avoidance. If a recovery defendant could defend on avoidability grounds, then he could assert any defense to avoidability, including the avoiding power statute of limitations, which would moot section 550(f). Rule 7019 requires joinder of a person if the court cannot grant complete relief among the existing parties in the person's absence or if the person claims an interest relating to the action and resolving the action in the person's absence may impair his ability to protect the interest or leave an existing party subject to a substantial risk of inconsistent obligations. The court may grant complete relief in an avoidance action between the trustee and the initial transferee without the subsequent transferee's presence or without subjecting either party to inconsistent obligations. Resolving the avoidance action does not impair the subsequent transferee's ability to protect his interest, because section 550(b) allows him to defend if he took for value, in good faith, and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. If he can show that the transfer was not avoidable, then he could not have had knowledge of voidability. Thus, non-avoidability is an affirmative defense, not part of the trustee's case in chief. Tibble v. Farmers Grain Express (In re Mich. Biodiesel, LLC), 510 B.R. 792 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2014).
- 2.7.aa Trustee may not sell homestead based on avoidance and preservation of first mortgage. The debtor claimed a homestead exemption in her home, which was subject to first and second mortgages. She was current on both mortgages. The home's value exceeded the sum of the two secured claims but was less than that amount plus the homestead exemption, leaving no equity for the estate. The trustee avoided the first mortgage on the debtor's home because the mortgagee did not properly record it. Under section 551, an avoided transfer is preserved for the benefit of the estate. The preservation does not give the trustee an ownership right in the underlying property. Rather, the trustee steps into the creditor's shoes, preserving the avoided mortgage for the estate, but not acquiring anything more. Accordingly, the trustee may not sell the home to realize the value of the mortgage but may sell only the mortgage. DeGiacomo v. Traverse (In re Traverse), 753 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2014).
- 2.7.bb Section 550(a)(2) does not apply to a transfer between foreign entities. The trustee had a judgment avoiding fraudulent transfers against a non-U.S. investment fund that was in liquidation in its home country. He sued the fund's non-U.S. transferees under section 550(a)(2) to recover the transfers that they received from the fund. The court must determine whether the case's circumstances require extraterritorial application of the statute and, if so, whether Congress intended it to apply extraterritorially. The court looks to the focus of the statute and Congressional concern in its enactment to determine whether the proposed application is domestic or foreign. The avoiding powers' focus is the debtor's transfers, not the debtor itself. Transfers occur extraterritorially based on the location of the transfers and their component events. Here, the subsequent transfers were foreign, even though they originated in the United States, because the foreign fund transferred assets abroad to its foreign investors. A court must presume a statute applies only domestically unless Congress clearly expresses an intention to the contrary. Nothing in section 550(a)(2) suggests extraterritorial application. Section 541(a)(1) includes as property of the estate the debtor's interests in property, "wherever located," but the avoiding powers and section 550 do not contain a similar reference. Section 541(a)(1)'s broad reference cannot be imported into the avoiding powers, because property recovered under the avoiding powers and section 550 becomes property of the estate only under section 5541(a)(3). Finally, comity counsels against extraterritorial application. The trustee's use of section 550 to recover from the fund's transferees might interfere with the fund liquidator's use of comparable local statutes to recover transfers the fund made before its liquidation. Securities Investor Protection Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC, 513 B.R. 222 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).

- 2.7.cc Section 550(a) does not require an avoidance judgment before the trustee may recover from a subsequent transferee. The trustee settled a fraudulent transfer avoiding power action against the defendant and within one year, brought subsequent transferee recovery actions against transferees from the defendant. In the settlement, the defendant did not admit liability, and the judgment did not state that the trustee avoided the transfer to the defendant. The judgment provided simply that the defendant would pay the trustee a sum of money. Section 550(a)(2) provides that, "to the extent that a transfer is avoided ..., the trustee may recover ... the property transferred, or, if the court so orders, the value of such property" from a subsequent transferee. Under section 550(f), the trustee must bring the recovery action within one year after the trustee avoids the transfer. The "to the extent" phrase is ambiguous because it does not specify the defendant against whom the trustee must bring the action and suggests a limitation on the portion of a transfer that is avoided, not a temporal limitation requiring prior avoidance. Construing the provision as requiring an actual avoidance judgment would allow transferees to shelter transfers by re-transferring assets and would discourage a trustee from reaching settlements. Moreover, triggering recovery on avoidance alone would deny due process to a recovery defendant by preventing the defendant from asserting defenses to the underlying avoidance action to which the recovery defendant was not a party. Finally, a settlement provides as much finality as a judgment to trigger the section 550(f) statute of limitation, so the statute is not open-ended. Therefore, section 550(a) does not require an actual judgment of avoidance to permit the trustee to recover from a subsequent transferee. Sec. Inv. Protec. Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC, 501 B.R. 26 (S.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 2.7.dd Bank was not liable under section 550 in ACH kiting scheme. The debtor payroll service used a data processing service to help process fund transfers, including withholding taxes that it handled for its employer clients, through the automated clearing house (ACH) system. After the debtor misappropriated funds and was short, it began "kiting" ACH transfers. It would issue a credit instruction, which would fund its account from the data processing service's bank account, and simultaneously issue a debit instruction to the service's bank account from another of its accounts. The debit instruction would fail, the service's bank would debit the service's account, the service would notify the debtor, and the debtor would wire funds to the service's bank account. The trustee sued to avoid the wires and to recover the transfers from the service's bank. Section 550 permits the trustee to recover an avoided transfer from an initial transferee, an entity for whose benefit a transfer is made or a subsequent transferee. An initial transferee is one who has dominion over the transferred property. The bank did not have dominion over the funds that the debtor wired to the service's account because the bank had not extended credit to the debtor. So the debtor did not make the payment to the bank, who therefore was not an initial transferee. For the same reason, the bank was not an entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. The bank's sole relationship was with its customer, the data processing service, who received the wired funds. Finally, the bank was not a subsequent transferee by reason of its debit of the service's account, because there was no direct correlation between the debtor's wire and the bank's debit of the service's account. Gugino v. Greater Rome Bank (In re Payroll America, Inc.), 498 B.R. 252 (D. Id. 2013).
- 2.7.ee Judgment creditor whose lien attaches automatically does not take for value. The debtor fraudulently transferred real property to one of its principals. The principal was subject to judgments in favor of third party creditors. Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, their judgments automatically became liens upon the real property when the principal acquired it. The trustee sued to avoid the transfer and recover the property. A company owned by the principal acquired the judgment liens from the third party creditors. Section 550(a) permits a trustee to recover fraudulently transferred property (or its value) from an initial or subsequent transferee. Under section 550(b), a subsequent transferee may assert as a defense that it acquired the property for value and in good faith. Value includes satisfaction or securing of an antecedent debt. The judgment lien creditors did not give anything in exchange for their judgment liens when they automatically attached. And the principal's company did not take the liens in good faith, because the series of transactions was simply an attempt to wash the fraudulent transfer through third parties. Therefore, the court awarded the trustee judgment against the principal. Infinity Real Estate Invs., LLC v. Roach (In re J.T. Real Estate Invs., LLC), 498 B.R. 869 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 2013).

- 2.7.ff ERISA does not prevent fraudulent transfer recovery from a 401(k) plan. A 401(k) retirement plan withdrew investments with a Ponzi scheme debtor. The debtor's trustee sued to recover the withdrawal as a fraudulent transfer. ERISA, 29 U.S.C. § 1056(d)(1), prohibits assignment or alienation of benefits under a plan. The purpose is to protect a plan beneficiary by not allowing the beneficiary to divest a legal right to receive benefit. A fraudulent transfer claim does not affect a beneficiary's legal right. Therefore, the anti-alienation provision does not block a fraudulent transfer avoiding power action. Wagner v. Galbreth, 500 B.R. 42 (D.N. Mex. 2013).
- 2.7.gg Avoiding a transfer as to the initial transferee is not a prerequisite to recovery from the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. The debtor conducted an insurance franchising business. It managed its franchisees' cash flow, including their operating expenses, by collecting all commissions that they earned, making payments of their operating expenses to their direct suppliers and creditors, deducting franchise fees and payments of franchise loans made by the debtor's affiliate, and remitting the balances to the franchisees. The debtor's affiliate sold participations in some of the franchise loans to a lender. In some instances, where a franchisee did not have sufficient cash flow from commissions to pay its suppliers and creditors currently, the debtor advanced the funds to the suppliers and creditors. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the participation owner to avoid the debtor's payments to the suppliers and creditors as constructively fraudulent transfers and to recover the amount of the payments from the participation owner as an entity for whose benefit the transfers were made. Section 550(a) permits the trustee, "to the extent that a transfer is avoided," to recover the property transferred or its value from the initial transferee, from "the entity for whose benefit such transfer was made" or from a subsequent transferee. The trustee must avoid the transfer before he may recover it from a subsequent transferee, but prior avoidance as to the initial transferee is not required for recovery from the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made, because such an entity stands in the same relation to the transfer as the initial transferee. Therefore, the trustee may seek recovery from the participation owner without having first avoided the debtor's transfers to the franchisees' suppliers and creditors. Redmond v. MCMIC Fin. Corp. (In re Brooke Corp.), 488 B.R. 459 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2013).
- 2.7.hh A trustee may recover an avoided transfer from the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made only if the entity actually received a quantifiable and accessible benefit. The debtor conducted an insurance franchising business. It managed its franchisees' cash flow, including their operating expenses, by collecting all commissions they earned, making payments of their operating expenses to their direct suppliers and creditors, deducting franchise fees and payments of franchise loans made by the debtor's affiliate, and remitting the balances to the franchisees. The debtor's affiliate sold participations in some of the franchise loans to a lender. In some instances, where a franchisee did not have sufficient cash flow from commissions to pay its suppliers and creditors currently, the debtor advanced the funds to the suppliers and creditors.

After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the participation owner to avoid the debtor's payments to the suppliers and creditors as constructively fraudulent transfers and to recover the amount of the payments from the participation owner as an entity for whose benefit the payments were made. Section 550(a) permits the trustee, "to the extent that a transfer is avoided," to recover the property transferred or its value from the initial transferee, "the entity for whose benefit such transfer was made" or a subsequent transferee. The "benefit" prong's purpose is to permit disgorgement of property that the debtor transferred before bankruptcy, so that value can be restored to the estate, not to allow the trustee to collect damages nor to impose liability for participation in any such transfers. Therefore, intent is not relevant, and the "benefit" prong applies only where the defendant has actually received a quantifiable and accessible benefit resulting from the transfer. The benefit must flow directly, not secondarily, from the avoided transfer. Here, the sole benefit the participation owner received from the debtor's payments to franchisees' suppliers and creditors was enhancement of the franchisees' ability to continue in business and make payments to the participation owner on the loans. Such a benefit is neither direct, nor quantifiable nor accessible by the participation owner. Therefore, the trustee may not recover the value of the transfers from the participation owner. Redmond v. MCMIC Fin. Corp. (In re Brooke Corp.), 488 B.R. 459 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2013).

- 2.7.ii A mere conduit may also be an entity for whose benefit a transfer was made. The debtor purchased insurance through an insurance agent. The agent's contract with the insurer required the agent to hold all premiums that it collected in a segregated trust account for the insurer, but if the insured failed to pay, the agent remained liable to the insurer for the premiums. The debtor made several past-due payments to the agent within 90 days before bankruptcy. If the payments are avoidable as preferences, they may be recovered from the initial transferee or from the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. A mere conduit is not an initial transferee. Because the agent acquired the payments in trust for the insurer, it was a mere conduit. However, because the payments relieved the agent from its contingent liability to the insurer, it was also an entity for whose benefit the transfer was made, and the payments were therefore recoverable from the agent. Guttman v. Construction Program Group (In re Railworks Corp.), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95627 (D. Md. July 8, 2013).
- 2.7.jj Lien preservation allows the estate to succeed to the avoided lien's distribution priority. The trustee avoided an unrecorded first mortgage that was not in default and sought to preserve the mortgage for the benefit of the estate. The debtor asserted that by preserving the mortgage for the benefit of the estate, the trustee stepped into the mortgagee's shoes and had only such rights as the mortgagee had, such as to foreclose only if there were a default. Under section 541(a), the debtor's fee interest in the real property became property of the estate. Preservation of the avoided mortgage allows the trustee to succeed to the mortgagee's claim in the order of distribution priorities that would have applied if the mortgage had not been avoided. DeGiacomo v. Traverse (In re Traverse), 485 B.R. 815 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2013).
- 2.7.kk Recovery from subsequent transferee does not require avoidance of transfer against initial transferee. The trustee sued the insolvent initial transferee to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer. The trustee settled with the initial transferee for a judgment, without reference to the avoiding of any transfer, and a payment of less than the amount sought. Less than one year later, but more than two years after bankruptcy, the trustee sued the subsequent transferee to recover the transfer. Section 550 permits the trustee to recover from a subsequent transfer "to the extent that a transfer is avoided" under the avoiding power sections. Section 550 should be construed flexibly so as not to require the trustee to pursue each initial transferee to judgment, rather than permitting settlement, to preserve a recovery claim against a subsequent transferee. Moreover, the estate should not be prejudiced as to a subsequent transferee where obtaining a judgment against the initial transferee is impossible or impractical, such as where the initial transferee has dissolved or where avoidance would require protracted expensive litigation against an insolvent entity. Therefore, the trustee may pursue a subsequent transferee where the initial transfer was avoidable and the trustee settled, not only where it has been avoided. Where the settlement does not involve a determination of avoidance, the trustee must still show that the transfer was avoidable. Section 550(f)'s statute of limitations is one year after avoidance. Where the initial transfer was not actually avoided, the one-year period should run from the settlement date. Picard v. Bureau of Labor Ins. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs.), 480 B.R. 501, (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

2.7.ii Section 550 applies to an extraterritorial subsequent transferee. An offshore hedge fund, with its principal place of business in the United States, invested substantially all its funds in a U.S. debtor. It solicited investments from foreign investors with materials that made clear that the funds would be invested in the United States. The fund's subscription agreement provided a New York choice of law provision and a submission of the parties to the New York courts' jurisdiction. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the initial transferee hedge fund to avoid a fraudulent transfer. After settling with the hedge fund for a judgment and a payment of less than the amount sought, the trustee sued a foreign subsequent transferee that had no contacts with the United States other than the investment in the offshore hedge fund. There is a presumption against extraterritorial application of a federal statute unless Congress affirmatively expresses an intention to give the statute extraterritorial effect. However, the presumption does not arise if the acts or objects on which the statute focuses are domestic. Here, the statute's focus is on the improper depletion of the U.S. debtor's assets, rather than on the initial or subsequent transferee, as the statute addresses only the transfers themselves, not the recipients. Therefore, the presumption against extraterritoriality does not apply. Even if it did, it is satisfied here. Section 548 permits the trustee to avoid a transfer of "property of the debtor." "Property of the debtor" is construed as property that would have become property of the estate if the transfer had not been made. Under section 541(a), property of the estate includes all property, "wherever located", evidencing that Congress intended section 541(a) to apply outside the United States. Therefore, section 548's reference to "property of the debtor" also applies to property that is outside the United States. Similarly, section 550 permits recovery of any transfer to the extent it is avoided. Because "transfer" refers to any transfer that the trustee may avoid under the avoiding powers, section 550 should also be read to apply to foreign subsequent transfers. Practical considerations dictate this result as well, to prevent parties from "washing" an otherwise avoidable and recoverable transfer through foreign entities. Picard v. Bureau of Labor Ins. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs.), 480 B.R. 501 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

2.7.mm Direct payee of proceeds of a secured loan to an affiliate is an entity for whose benefit the liens were transferred. The debtor was a housing developer. Its subsidiary had entered into a joint venture to develop houses. The joint venture borrowed heavily and then failed. The debtor had guaranteed the loans. A default on the loans would have cross-defaulted the debtor's bonds and its bank revolving credit line, both of which were guaranteed by its other subsidiaries, who were not liable on the joint venture's obligations. After the joint venture failed, the debtor and its other subsidiaries borrowed from different lenders to pay the joint venture's lenders. The other subsidiaries granted security interests in substantially all their assets to secure the new loans. The new loan agreements required that the loan proceeds be transferred to the joint venture lenders. The borrowed funds, less fees incurred, were disbursed through another of the debtor's (nondebtor) subsidiaries to the joint venture lenders. The debtor and the subsidiaries filed bankruptcy seven months after the transaction. The transfers of security interests to the new lenders and the payment of the borrowed funds to the joint venture lenders were avoided as constructive fraudulent transfers. Section 550 permits recovery of an avoided transfer from the initial transferee or from the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. The joint venture lenders received the proceeds of the loans. Therefore, they were the entities for whose benefit the initial transfers of security interests to the new lenders were made. They were not beneficiaries of a subsequent transfer of cash from the paying subsidiary, because the new loan agreements required that the paying subsidiary wire the proceeds directly to them, so the subsidiary never had control over the funds. Such a ruling does not put all recipients of payments from a distressed subsidiary at risk or impose a heavy due diligence duty on them. But it is not “a drastic obligation to expect some diligence from a creditor when it is being repaid hundreds of millions of dollars by someone other than its debtor.” Sr. Transeastern Lenders v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 680 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2012).

- 2.7.nn Recovery is not limited to the amount of allowed claims. The debtor was the remains of a larger corporation that had previously spun off substantial assets to its shareholders, in part to shield those assets from liability for environmental and tort claims that were substantially more than other general unsecured claims. The estate asserted a fraudulent transfer claim arising out of the spin-off. The debtor proposed a plan that provided for transferring the fraudulent transfer claim to a liquidating trust for the benefit of holders of the environmental and tort claims and the distribution of the reorganized debtor’s stock to the holders of other general unsecured claims. The holders of the environmental and tort claims were satisfied with that resolution and accepted the plan. Their acceptance of that recovery enabled the holders of other general unsecured claims to receive all of the reorganized debtor’s stock under the plan, which those holders also accepted. Section 550(a) provides that to the extent a transfer is avoided, the trustee “may recover for the benefit of the estate, the property transferred, or ... the value of such property”. Under section 550(a), “benefit of the estate” may be either direct or indirect, including increasing the possibility of a successful reorganization. Thus, the ability to assign an avoiding power action for valuable consideration may provide a benefit to the estate, independent of the actual recovery in the action. The “estate” is created under section 541(a) and consists of assets. The estate is not limited to the allowed claims amount. Benefit to the estate is similarly not limited. Here, the fraudulent transfer action’s availability and its transfer to the liquidating trust benefited the estate by making a plan agreement possible and benefited the general unsecured claims holders by removing from their claims pool the environmental and tort claims. Therefore, the amount of environmental and tort claims does not necessarily cap the trust’s recovery. However, equitable principles may dictate a cap once the court examines all the facts after trial. Tronox Inc. v. Anadarko Petro. Corp. (In re Tronox Inc.), 464 B.R. 606 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).
- 2.7.oo Lead bank who held a loan for participants was a conduit, not an initial transferee. The lead bank loaned the debtor money and sold participation interests in 95% of the loan to other banks. The participation agreements provided that the transactions were sales of interests in the loan. Each participant agreed to fund its portion of the loan, and the lead bank agreed to hold the loan documents, administer the loan as if it were the holder of the whole loan, hold all payments received from the debtor for the purchasers’ benefit (less a small servicing fee) and remit any payments within 10 days after receipt from the debtor. The participation agreements did not establish a trust relationship between the lead bank seller and the purchasers nor a debtor-creditor relationship, because they provided for a sale of interests in the loan. The debtor made a large repayment within 90 days before bankruptcy that the trustee avoided as a preference. The trustee may recover an avoided preference from the initial transferee but not from a recipient who is a mere conduit of the payment. A recipient is not an initial transferee unless it has both control over the transferred property and the legal right to use the property for its own purposes. The lead bank here was not a creditor as to 95% of the payment and was required to transfer the payments attributable to the participants and therefore did not have the legal right to use the funds for its own benefit. The ability of the lead bank to commingle the funds before payment to the participants did not make it an initial transferee. Commingling is part of ordinary banking practice, and the participation agreement did not require segregation of the funds. Northern Capital, Inc. v. Stockton Nat’l Bank (In re Brooke Corp.), 458 B.R. 579 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2011).
- 2.7.pp Knowledge of voidability depends on transferee’s sophistication. The real estate developer debtor paid money to the development’s condominium association. The association used part of the payments to pay the unaffiliated management company according to the terms of the management contract. The management company knew of the debtor's financial difficulties and that it had not paid all obligations to the association and was improperly using unit-owner capital contributions for operating expenses, but the management company did not know that the payments to the association might be avoidable. The trustee avoided the payments as preferences. The trustee may recover an avoided transfer from the initial transferee or from an immediate transferee of the initial transferee, unless the immediate transferee took for value, in good faith and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. Value need not be given to the debtor. The Code does not define good faith but, in this context, it suggests knowledge that something is awry, that a reasonable person would investigate whether the debtor is transferring assets out of the ordinary course of business. Mere knowledge of financial distress does not negate good faith. Knowledge of voidability requires actual knowledge, not constructive notice, of facts that would lead a reasonable person to believe that the property transferred was recoverable. A sophisticated lender is held to a higher standard of reasonableness than an ordinary trade supplier such as the management company here. In this case, the management company gave value to the association, was in good faith, despite its knowledge of the debtor's financial distress, and did not know sufficient facts for a trade supplier to be deemed to have knowledge of voidability. Therefore, the trustee may not recover from the management company. Von Kahle v. Greenacre Props., Inc. (In re Key Developers Groups, LLC), 449 B.R. 148 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2011).

- 2.7.qq A transferee that remains willfully ignorant of relevant facts does not take in good faith. Before bankruptcy, the debtor transferred real property to his brother, who transferred it to a friend's company. The deeds recited that the first transfer was for no consideration and the second transfer was for nominal consideration. Two days before it received a deed to the property, the company's principal met with a lender to obtain a loan against the property. In the meeting with the lender, as well as in the later loan documents, the principal was unclear on the correct name of the company. Though the lender obtained a certificate of good standing for the company, it did not update the certificate shortly before funding the loan (as is common practice in the industry), though the company had lost its good standing and was no longer authorized to do business. The lender did not examine the company's deed to the property or any title history. The lender funded the loan and took a mortgage on the property anyway. After bankruptcy, the trustee avoided the first two transfers of the real property and sought to recover from the lender under section 550(a)(2) as a subsequent transferee. Section 550(b) gives a subsequent transferee who takes for value, in good faith and without knowledge of the voidability of a transfer a defense against recovery. "Knowledge of voidability" requires actual, not constructive, notice, but only actual knowledge of facts that would lead a reasonable person to believe that the transfer was voidable. It does not impose a duty to investigate. However, "good faith" imposes an objective standard that examines what the transferee knew or should have known, based on what the transferee actually knew. A transferee who remains willfully ignorant in the face of facts that demand investigation does not take in good faith. Here, the lender did not have knowledge of voidability, because it did not know of the problems with title and with the borrower. However, it did not take in good faith, because the confusion of the principal and the loan documents about the borrower's correct name, the failure to obtain a good standing certificate shortly before closing and the failure to review the deed evidence the lender's willful ignorance of facts that demanded investigation. Therefore, the trustee may recover from the lender. Goldman v. Cap. City Mortgage Corp. (In re Nieves), 648 F.3d 232 (4th Cir. 2011).
- 2.7.rr Bank that received leveraged buyout loan proceeds was initial transferee. A corporation had guaranteed its parent's debt to the bank without any consideration and had secured the guarantee. The debtor was formed to acquire the corporation's assets in a leveraged buyout. The closing instructions for the transaction required that the proceeds of the loan to the debtor be used to pay the parent's obligation to the bank, which would then release its security interest in the acquired corporation's assets. On the acquisition's closing, the funds from the acquisition loan to the debtor were paid directly to the bank, which released its security interest in the target's assets. The debtor in possession avoided the transaction as a constructively fraudulent transfer. An avoided transfer may be recovered from the initial transferee or a subsequent transferee. A mere conduit of transferred property, that is, one who does not have dominion over the property with the right to put it to its own use, is not an initial transferee. Here, the corporation was not the initial transferee of the loan proceeds, even though the proceeds flowed through the corporation's account and were used to pay off the corporation's guarantee obligation, because the corporation had no right to direct the use of proceeds, which was fully dictated by the transaction's terms. Therefore, the bank was the initial transferee. CNB Int'l, Inc. v. Lloyds TSB Bank, plc (In re CNB Int'l, Inc.), 440 B.R. 31 (W.D.N.Y. 2010).

2.7.ss Section 550s' "benefit" prong applies only where the benefit is the initial transfer's direct result. The debtor's subsidiary had entered into a joint venture that borrowed heavily and then failed. The debtor had guaranteed the loans. The debtor's other subsidiaries were not liable on the joint venture's obligations, but were co-borrowers on the debtor's revolving credit facility and had granted security interests in all their assets to secure their obligations under the facility. If the debtor defaulted on the joint venture loan, it would have cross-defaulted the revolver, which neither the debtor nor the subsidiaries would have been able to pay. After the joint venture failed and the joint venture lenders sued the debtor, the debtor borrowed from different lenders to pay the joint venture's lenders. The debtor's other subsidiaries became co-borrowers on the new loans and granted security interests in substantially all their assets to secure their new obligations. The debtor and the subsidiaries filed bankruptcy seven months after the new loans, due in large part to the collapse of the debtor's markets during the time between the new loans' funding and the bankruptcy. A transfer of the debtor's property is fraudulent and avoidable if the debtor had unreasonably small capital or was insolvent at the time of or rendered insolvent by the transfer and did not receive reasonably equivalent value in exchange. If the trustee avoids the transfer, the trustee may recover from an initial or (in some cases) a subsequent transferee of the transfer or from the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. These three categories are mutually exclusive. Further, the "benefit" test applies only where the benefit is the direct result of the initial transfer and not where the benefit is not the immediate and necessary consequence of the initial transfer, such as where the benefit flows from the use to which the transfer is put, rather than from the transfer itself. Because the joint venture lenders were subsequent transferees of the new loan proceeds, which were backed by the subsidiaries' security interests, they were subsequent transferees of the proceeds of the security interests and do not qualify as entities for whose benefit the subsidiaries granted the security interests. 3V Cap. Master Fund Ltd. v. Official Comm. Of Unsecured Creditors (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 444 B.R. 613 (S.D. Fla. 2011).

2.7.tt REMIC trustee is the initial transferee of avoidable transfers. The debtor's affiliate borrowed against the real estate the debtor leased from the affiliate. The rent was equal to the loan payments and was well above fair market rental value. As security for the debt, the affiliate mortgaged the real property and assigned the lease to the lender. The loan documents provided for the debtor/lessee to pay rent directly to the lender. The rent payments were then applied to the loan. The lender transferred the note and related collateral to a REMIC, which is a trust that holds loans for the trust's beneficial certificate holders. The trustee is fully responsible for administering the trust. The bankruptcy court determined that the debtor's rent payments were fraudulent transfers. The bankruptcy trustee sought recovery under section 550(a) from the REMIC trustee. Section 550(a) permits the bankruptcy trustee to recover an avoided transfer from the initial transferee. An initial transferee is one who has dominion and control over the funds, not one who is a "mere conduit". A transferee may have dominion and control even if it does not have unfettered use of the funds, as long as it has the freedom to use the funds for its own purposes. In this case, the trustee, rather than the REMIC certificate holders, had legal title to the trust assets and therefore to the payments and so was the initial transferee. Paloian v. LaSalle Nat'l Bank Assoc., 619 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 2010).

- 2.7.uu Stock broker who does not exercise control over a margin account is not an initial transferee. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme by offering loans to customers against their stock. In a typical transaction, the customer would transfer his or her stock directly to the debtor's account at a stock brokerage. The debtor then sold the stock and misappropriated the proceeds, using proceeds from future stock sales to purchase and return stock to customers when they repaid their loans. The debtor made cash deposits into its margin account with the broker. The broker never applied the cash to any obligation the debtor owed to the broker, except for deduction for fees, commissions and margin interest payments. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the broker to avoid and recover the cash transfers. Section 550(a) permits recovery of an avoided transfer from the initial transferee. An initial transferee is one who has and actually exercised dominion and control over the property that was transferred. Because the broker did not exercise control over the margin account to sell securities or offset amounts in the account against deficiencies, and despite the deduction of fees, commissions and interest, the broker does not qualify as an initial transferee of the cash deposits. The court does not address the nature of the deduction of fees, commissions and interest as a setoff, rather than a transfer. Grayson Consulting, Inc. v. Wachovia Secs., LLC (In re Derivium Cap., LLC), 437 B.R. 798 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2010).
- 2.7.vv Recovery under section 550(a) is not required when avoidance and preservation of a lien returns the estate to its pretransfer position. The debtor purchased a vehicle and granted the seller a security interest, which the creditor failed to perfect. The trustee avoided the security interest and sought recovery of its value. Section 550(a) provides, "the trustee may recover ... the property transferred, or, if the court so orders, the value of such property". Section 550(a) is permissive, so the court is not required to award the trustee a recovery. Section 551 preserves the avoided lien for the benefit of the estate, allowing the trustee to be placed in the position in which the estate would have been if the transfer had not been made. Section 550(a) is available in the case of an avoided lien to put the trustee in that position if mere avoidance and preservation do not do so, such as where the lien property has been sold or foreclosed before bankruptcy. The trustee also is not entitled to recovery based on depreciation in the property's value, because the estate would have suffered the same depreciation if the lien had not been granted. Rodriguez v. Drive Fin. Servs., L.P. (In re Trout), 609 F.3d 1106 (10th Cir. 2010).
- 2.7.ww Court may order unperfected secured lender to pay the estate the loan amount only if there is adequate evidence of the value of the unperfected lien. The debtor bought a car within 90 days before bankruptcy. The car lender recorded its security interest 21 days after the purchase. The bankruptcy court avoided the security interest as a preference and ordered the lender to pay the trustee the amount of the loan, allowing the lender to preserve its lien against the car, its claim against the debtor and a general unsecured claim against the estate. Section 550 permits the court to order the recovery of the property transferred or its value at the time of the transfer, even when a lien is preserved under section 551. The court may order recovery of the value of a security interest but should order recovery of the security interest itself when the security interest's value at the time of the transfer is not readily determinable. Because of the time between the transfer and the judgment and the lack of evidence of value of the security interest at the time it was granted, the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in ordering the lender to pay the estate the amount of the loan. USAA Fed. Sav. Bank v. Thacker (In re Taylor), 599 F.3d 880 (9th Cir. 2010).
- 2.7.xx Trustee may not recover punitive damages for a fraudulent transfer. The trustee avoided transfers as fraudulent under section 544(b) and the Oklahoma Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act. Section 550 permits a trustee to recover the property transferred or its value from the transferee or the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made, but it does not authorize recovery of punitive damages. Section 550 takes priority over any applicable state fraudulent transfer law under which the trustee brings the action that permits recovery of punitive damages and limits the trustee's recovery. Miller v. Dow (In re Lexington Oil & Gas Ltd.), 423 B.R. 353 (Bankr. E.D. Okla. 2010).

2.7.yy Court orders unwinding to the extent possible of multi-party transaction, with interest, fees and recoupment of decline in property value, as remedy for fraudulent transfer. The debtor's subsidiary had entered into a joint venture that borrowed heavily and then failed. The debtor had guaranteed the loans. After the joint venture failed, the debtor borrowed from different lenders to pay the joint venture's lenders. The debtor's other subsidiaries, who were not liable on the joint venture's obligations, were co-borrowers on the new loans and granted security interests in substantially all their assets to secure their obligations. The borrowed funds, less fees incurred, were disbursed directly to the joint venture lenders. The debtor and the subsidiaries filed bankruptcy seven months after the new loan. The transfers of security interests to the new lenders and the payment of the borrowed funds to the joint venture lenders were avoided as constructive fraudulent transfers. Section 550 permits recovery of an avoided transfer from the initial transferee or from the entity for whose benefit the transfer was made. It is designed to restore the estate to the financial condition in which it would have been if the transfers had not been made. To do so here requires not only avoidance of the liens to the new lenders but also recovery of the payments from the joint venture lenders, as well as recovery of all transaction costs, litigation costs, and decline in value of the collateral from the transfer date until the recovery. However, the estate is entitled to only a single satisfaction, and it would be inequitable to order recovery from only one set of defendants. Therefore, the court determines to unwind the transactions to the extent possible. It orders the joint venture lenders to repay to the subsidiaries' estates the portion of the borrowed funds attributable to the subsidiaries, with interest from date of payment. From those funds, the subsidiaries are to retain an amount required to recover the decline in collateral value between the transaction date and the recovery date and transaction and litigation costs and then remit the balance of the proceeds to the new lenders. Finally, the new lenders must repay the estate all adequate protection and other payments made during the case on account of their claims. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Citicorp N. Am., Inc. (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 2009 Bankr. LEXIS 3311 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. Oct. 13, 2009).

2.7.zz Selling LBO shareholders are liable for all consideration received, including interest payments, but may recover any surplus after creditors are paid in full. The shareholders of old Crown agreed to sell its assets to new Crown for $3.1 million in cash and a $2.9 million junior secured note, with 8% contingent interest. New Crown received a $500 investment from its owner plus a $3.1 million senior secured loan from a bank. Just before closing, old Crown dividended $600,000 to its shareholders. At closing, it received the note and the cash, which it promptly paid to its shareholders. New Crown made two annual interest payments on the junior note, which were transferred to the old Crown shareholders. New Crown failed and filed bankruptcy three and one-half years after the sale, in part due to business mistakes the new owner made. In the bankruptcy, the trustee sold new Crown's assets for $3.7 million and successfully sued the old Crown shareholders to avoid the transaction as a fraudulent transfer. A trustee may recover property transferred in an avoided transfer from the immediate transferee or from a subsequent transferee that does not take in good faith, for value or with knowledge of the transfer's voidability. The court does not collapse the transaction steps and determines that old Crown was the initial transferee and the shareholders were the subsequent transferees. They gave no value to old Crown, so they are liable to the trustee for the cash, the dividend and the interest payments, and their note and lien are unenforceable. The resulting surplus money in the estate is paid to the debtor under section 726(a)(6). When the estate is closed, the federal bankruptcy interest in proceeds distribution ceases, so state law governs the distribution of the surplus. The fraudulent transfer avoidance unravels the sale, so any money received from the trustee's sale of the company's assets belongs to the original shareholders. In other words, the trustee may avoid the transfer only as to or for the benefit of creditors, not as to the selling shareholders. Boyer v. Crown Stock Distribution, Inc., 587 F.3d 787 (7th Cir. 2009).

2.7.aaa Avoidance and preservation of a lien may prevent recovery of the property or its value.

The creditor perfected its security interest in the debtor's vehicle within 90 days before bankruptcy. The trustee successfully sued to avoid the preference and sought recovery of the value of the lien from the creditor. Section 551 automatically preserves an avoided transfer, such as a lien. The lien become property of the estate under section 541(a)(4). The trustee thereby recovers all that was transferred and puts the estate in the same position it would have been in if the transfer had not been made. Section 550(a) is permissive: "the trustee may recover ... the property transferred, or, if the court so orders, the value" of the property. Where an avoided lien is preserved, the trustee has recovered the property transferred, and it would be inappropriate for the court to order an additional recovery under section 550(a). Rodriguez v. Daimlerchrysler Fin. Servs. Americas LLC (In re Bremer), 408 B.R. 355 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2009).

2.7.bbb REMIC trustee is the initial transferee of avoidable transfers. The debtor's affiliate borrowed against the real estate the debtor leased from the affiliate. The rent was equal to the loan payments and was well above fair market rental value. As security for the debt, the affiliate mortgaged the real property and assigned the lease to the lender. The loan documents provided for the debtor/lessee to pay rent directly to the lender. The rent payments were then applied to the loan. The lender transferred the note and related collateral to a REMIC, which is a trust that holds loans for the trust's beneficial certificate holders. The trustee is fully responsible for administering the trust. The bankruptcy court determined that the debtor's rent payments were fraudulent transfers. The bankruptcy trustee sought recovery under section 550(a) from the REMIC trustee. Section 550(a) permits the bankruptcy trustee to recover an avoided transfer from the initial transferee. An initial transferee is one who has dominion and control over the funds, not one who is a "mere conduit". A transferee may have dominion and control even if it does not have unfettered use of the funds, as long as it has the freedom to use the funds for its own purposes. In this case, the trustee, rather than the REMIC certificate holders, was the initial transferee because of its powers to administer the trust. LaSalle Nat'l Bank Assoc. v. Paloian, 406 B.R. 299 (N.D. Ill. 2009).

2.7.ccc Person to whom debtor's principal diverted corporate funds is an "initial transferee". The corporate debtor's principal wrote checks on the corporation's bank accounts to satisfy his obligations to his ex-wife. The corporation was insolvent at the time and received no consideration, so the transfers were fraudulent transfers and recoverable. The trustee's right to recover from an initial transferee of a fraudulent transfer is absolute, but a subsequent transferee has defenses to a recovery action. A recipient of the transfer is an initial transferee if it has "dominion over the money or other asset, the right to put the money to one's own purposes". A corporate debtor's principal does not have such dominion, despite the principal's power to allocate corporate funds, because the principal may not do so as a matter of right. Accordingly, even though the corporation accounted for the transfers as distributions to a shareholder, because the checks were issued directly to the ex-wife, she was the initial transferee and is absolutely liable to the trustee for the fraudulent transfers. Richardson v. Preston (In re Antex, Inc.), 397 B.R. 168 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

2.7.ddd Creditor may file avoiding power action derivatively with trustee's consent and without prior bankruptcy court approval. Five days before the avoiding power statute of limitations expired, a creditor asked the trustee to pursue a preference action and gave the trustee a draft complaint. The trustee declined. The creditor filed the complaint and later sought bankruptcy court approval to prosecute the action on behalf of the estate. The trustee stated no objection as long as the action was pursued for the benefit of all creditors. The Eighth Circuit joins the other circuits who have ruled on derivative standing to rule that generally, a creditor or committee may bring an action derivatively with the bankruptcy court's approval. To obtain approval, the creditor must show that it asked the trustee to act, the trustee unjustifiably refused and the claim is colorable. Whether a refusal is justifiable is based on the facts and circumstances and may include considerations of the probabilities of financial success, the proposed fee arrangement and any possible delay or expense to the estate. Where the trustee consents to the creditor's derivative standing, the creditor must show that derivative standing is in the best interest of the estate and is necessary and beneficial to the fair and efficient resolution of the case. Such a showing will be rare, because a trustee should ordinarily pursue an action that would be in the best interest of and beneficial to the estate. Finally, the bankruptcy court may authorize derivative standing after the creditor files the action; prior approval is not required. PW Enterps., Inc. v. N. Dakota Racing Comm'n (In re Racing Servs., Inc.), 540 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 2008).

2.7.eee Trustee may not recover a fraudulent transfer from an entity that did not receive it as an "entity for whose benefit the transfer was made". The debtor had a consolidated cash management system with its parent and grandparent corporations. It issued a dividend note to its parent. Its grandparent took interest payments directly for itself from the consolidated cash account. The payments were fraudulent transfers, because the debtor was insolvent when it issued the note and made the interest payments. A trustee may recover an avoided transfer "from the initial transferee of such transfers or the entity for whose benefit the transfers were made". Fraudulent transfer recovery is a form of disgorgement, so to recover from an entity for whose benefit a transfer is made, the entity must have received an actual benefit. Although the debtor had issued the notes to the parent, the parent did not receive the transfers and therefore was not the entity for whose benefit the transfers were made. Freeland v. Enodis Corp., 540 F.3d 721 (7th Cir. 2008).

2.7.fff Bank that participated in a fraudulent conveyance LBO is not a good faith subsequent transferee. The debtor was formed to acquire the assets of three businesses in the same industry in a leveraged buyout. The debtor in possession avoided the transfer of the purchase price to one of the three businesses. That business had guaranteed its parent's debt to the bank without any consideration and had secured the guarantee. On the acquisition's closing, the debtor paid the guarantor business, which immediately paid the bank on the guarantee. The bank participated in the LBO planning and even funded part of the purchase price, for which it was repaid at the closing. Section 550(a) permits a trustee to recover property transferred in an avoided transfer or its value from the initial transferee or from an immediate transferee from the initial transferee if the immediate transferee took for value, in good faith and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. The trustee is limited to a single satisfaction. A transferee can be treated as an initial transferee if the initial recipient of the transfer is a mere conduit. However, the initial recipient becomes a mere conduit only if its transferee exercised dominion and control over the recipient and the conduit structure is established at the transferee's behest. Here, the bank's participation in the transaction, even the bank's expectation of reducing its exposure, did not rise to the level of sufficient dominion and control to make the first recipient a mere conduit and the bank the initial transferee. An immediate transferee does not take "in good faith" if it violates "reasonable standards of fair dealing and with the intent to seek unconscionable advantage over general unsecured creditors". A creditor may properly seek advantage over other creditors. However, because the bank actively participated in planning and funding the transaction with the purpose of transferring risk from the bank, which was not a creditor of the debtor, to the debtor's unsecured creditors, it did not act in good faith. A transferee has knowledge of the voidability of a transfer if it knows sufficient facts to put it on actual or inquiry notice of a basis of voidability. The bank's internal analysis showed the price the debtor would pay exceeded the value of the acquired assets and that the debtor would therefore be insolvent, giving it knowledge of voidability. In a multi-party fraudulent transfer, allocation of liability may be difficult. Here, however, the debtor overpaid for only one of the three businesses' assets. The transfer was avoidable only to the extent the debtor overpaid for the assets. The debtor in possession may therefore recover only that amount from the bank, minus what the debtor in possession recovered from other defendants, so that it is limited to a single satisfaction. Finally, the UFCA by its terms does not permit recovery of a money judgment. A creditor may set aside the conveyance or disregard it and attach or levy execution on the transferred property. However, judicial decisions under the UFCA permit a money judgment. Under section 544(b), a trustee acquires only a creditor's right to avoid a transfer, not to obtain a money judgment. Section 550(a) gives the trustee the right to recover the property or its value. Value includes time value of money for the time the estate was deprived of the property. Therefore, the debtor in possession may recover prejudgment interest on the judgment from the date of the filing of the complaint. CNB Int'l, Inc. v. Kelleher (In re CNB Int'l, Inc.), 393 B.R. 306 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 2008).

2.7.ggg Stockbroker is initial transferee of margin payments. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. It maintained securities accounts with a stockbroker, which issued numerous margin calls in the year before bankruptcy on short positions that the debtor maintained. The stockbroker deposited the margin payments into a segregated account under SEC Rule 15c3-3, which requires a stockbroker to maintain customer funds, such as margin, in segregation from the stockbroker's own assets and is limited in how the stockbroker may use or apply the funds. However, the stockbroker took a security interest in margin funds and could apply them to the customer's obligations in connection with the customer's securities transactions, for which the stockbroker would be liable to the customer's counterparty if the customer did not provide adequate funds. The court had separately determined that payment of the margin calls were transfers made with actual intent to defraud creditors and are therefore recoverable as fraudulent transfers under section 548(a)(1)(A). Under section 550(a), the trustee may recover only from the "initial transferee", that is, one who has dominion and control of the transferred property, and not from a mere conduit. "Dominion" is a technical test that determines whether the transferee is able to put the transferred property to its own purposes, while the "control" test looks to which entity in fact controlled the property and permits equitable considerations. The dominion test does not require that the recipient have full discretion over the funds, and regulatory or contractual restrictions on the recipient's use of the property does not deprive it of dominion if the property is ultimately for the recipient's benefit. A mere conduit simply facilitates the transfer of funds from the debtor to a third party, such as a financial intermediary does. An entity may be more than a mere conduit and yet not have dominion or control over the transferred property, and there are situations in which there is not a conduit at all, where the debtor transfers directly to the initial transferee. Rule 15c3-3's segregation limitation on the stockbroker's use of the funds does not deprive the stockbroker of sufficient dominion or control to qualify it as the initial transferee because the funds were placed for the stockbroker's benefit. Therefore, the trustee may recover the transfers from the stockbroker. Bear, Stearns Sec. Corp. v. Gredd (In re Manhattan Inv. Fund Ltd.), 397 B.R. 1 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

2.7.hhh The trustee need not avoid a transfer to recover from a subsequent transferee. The trustee sued a buyer to avoid an unauthorized postpetition sale. The trustee and the buyer settled, but the buyer did not admit liability. The trustee also sued the debtor's law firm, to whom the debtor paid a portion of the sale proceeds, under section 550, which permits recovery from the initial or a subsequent transferee "to the extent a transfer is avoided". Although the present tense phrasing of the introductory clause suggests that the transfer must be avoided as a condition to recovery, the "to the extent that" phrase suggests that the introductory clause is intended only to limit recovery where a transfer can be avoided only in part. Avoidance and recovery are separate concepts. Requiring the trustee to avoid a transfer before permitting recovery might foster unnecessary litigation to determine avoidability and discourage settlement such as occurred in this case or to attempt to prevent a subsequent transferee from litigating avoidability once the trustee has an avoidability judgment against the initial transferee. Therefore, section 550 requires only that the trustee show avoidability, not avoidance. The B.A.P. notes the split between the 10th and 11th Circuits on this issue. Woods & Erickson, LLP v. Leonard (In re AVI, Inc.), 389 B.R. 721 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

- 2.7.iii Bankruptcy court may reduce fraudulent transfer recovery by amount repaid to the debtor before bankruptcy. The debtors made an actual fraudulent transfer to a relative, who repaid some of the funds before bankruptcy and some of the funds after. Bankruptcy courts must do equity. Although a court may refuse to credit repayments of money that has been transferred with actual fraudulent intent, it is not required to do so. Granting a credit only for prepetition payments and not for postpetition repayments is within the bankruptcy court's equitable discretion. Bakst v. Wetzel (In re Kingsley), 518 F.3d 874 (11th Cir. 2008).
- 2.7.jjj A chapter 7 trustee may not bring avoidance actions reserved solely to a chapter 11 creditors committee. In the DIP financing order, the court barred the debtor in possession from bringing actions against a secured creditor but permitted the creditors committee to do so. After conversion to chapter 7, the trustee sought to bring the action. The committee's rights to bring the actions were derivative from the estate, but the debtor in possession could no longer assert the rights. The trustee succeeds only to the rights that the DIP had. When the committee dissolved upon conversion to chapter 7, the trustee did not succeed to the rights, because they were not rights that the DIP had. Hill v. Akamai Techs., Inc. (In re MS55, Inc.), 477 F.3d 1131 (9th Cir. 2007).
- 2.7.kkk State fraudulent transfer law does not limit the amount of the trustee's recovery. The debtor transferred real property more than two years before bankruptcy. The trustee sought recovery under section 544(b) and the state's Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act. The state's Act limits a creditor's avoidance and recovery to the lesser of the amount of the creditor's claim and the debtor's nonexempt unencumbered interest in the property at the time of the transfer. The Bankruptcy Code separates recovery from avoidance. Section 544(b) authorizes avoidance. Once the trustee demonstrates the right to avoid a transfer, section 550 authorizes recovery, which limits recovery only to the extent that the recovery be "for the benefit of the estate." Section 550 permits the trustee to recover the property transferred or its value. The trustee therefore may recover the value of the property at the time of the recovery action, as that gives the estate the benefit of the amount that it would have had if the debtor had not transferred the property. Joseph v. Madray (In re Brun), 360 B.R. 669 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2007).
- 2.7.iii Federal allocation rule governs application of section 550(d)'s "single satisfaction" limitation. The trustee settled a fraudulent transfer action against initial transferees to avoid and recover 377 transfers. The trustee brought a recovery action against a subsequent transferee to recover 11 of the transfers. Under section 550(d), "the trustee is entitled to only a single satisfaction." In determining how to allocate the recovery under the initial settlement among the transfers so as to limit the trustee to only a single satisfaction, a federal rule for allocating the settlement proceeds among the 377 transfers applies. Settlement allocation is a rule of judicial process, which state law may not govern in federal courts. The single satisfaction rule is a federal rule, which state law should not be permitted to frustrate. Finally, application of a federal rule will not disturb any pre-bankruptcy commercial relations or expectations, because the rule applies only to recovery of transfers that are avoided as a result of bankruptcy. Under the federal rule, the court should make allocation decisions only if the trustee pursues an additional defendant after settlement with other defendants, rather than at the time of the settlement, to conserve judicial resources. The court should not simply adopt the allocation on which the settling parties agree in the settlement agreement, as the settling defendants typically do not care how the proceeds are allocated, and the plaintiff has an interest in preserving claims against future potential defendants who are not present and therefore cannot be heard on the fairness of the allocation. Dzikowski v. N. Trust Bank of Fla., N.A. (In re Prudential of Fla. Leasing, Inc.), 478 F.3d 1291 (11th Cir. 2007).

- 2.7.mmm Interim trustee appointment does not extend section 546(a) statute of limitations. Section 546(a) imposes a statute of limitations on an avoiding power action of two years after the order for relief, but the statute may be extended to one year “after the appointment or election of the first trustee under section 702, 1104, 1163, 1202, or 1302” if the election or appointment occurs before the expiration of the two-year period. In this case, the chapter 11 case was converted to chapter 7 shortly before the two-year period expired. The U.S. trustee immediately appointed an interim chapter 7 trustee under section 701, and the creditors elected a permanent trustee under section 702, but only after the two-year period had expired. Neither the appointment of the interim trustee nor the election of the permanent trustee extends the statute of limitation. The extension applies only to a trustee appointed or elected under section 702, not to an interim trustee appointed under section 701, and the permanent trustee’s election occurred after the two-year period had expired. Therefore, the trustee’s avoiding power actions are barred. Singer v. Frontier Commc’ns. of Am. Inc. (In re Am. Pad & Paper Co.), 478 F.3d 546 (3d Cir. 2007).
- 2.7.nnn Trustee may pursue a separate recovery action after avoiding and preserving a lien. The trustee brought an action to avoid a mortgage as a preference and for recovery of a money judgment. The defendant mortgagee defaulted, and the trustee took a default judgment avoiding the mortgage and preserving it for the benefit of the estate. The trustee then brought another action against the same mortgagee for recovery of the value of the avoided transfer. The requisites for claim preclusion—identity of the parties and causes of action and a final judgment on the merits—are present here, but an exception to the doctrine permits a second action if the statutory scheme permits a plaintiff to split the cause of action. Section 550 permits recovery separate from avoidance and imposes a separate statute of limitations for the recovery action. Indeed, an action for avoidance does not necessarily result in a recovery judgment, which must be requested separately, even if in the same action. Therefore, the statutory scheme permits splitting of the cause, and the trustee may pursue the recovery action. The court does not address the effect of either of preservation of the lien in the first action on section 550’s “single satisfaction” rule or of the inclusion of the claim for recovery of a money judgment that was pleaded but not pursued in the first action. Maxwell v. Mich. Fid. Acceptance Corp. (In re Maestas), 354 B.R. 844 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2006).
- 2.7.ooo Recovery from funds transferred to a minor’s UTMA account is limited to the amount in the account. A corporation owned by a husband and wife received an insurance payment, which they deposited into custodial accounts for their children. The wife, who was the custodian, then transferred the proceeds to two other corporations that the husband and wife formed and controlled. The initial corporation’s bankruptcy trustee sought recovery of the insurance payment from the husband, the wife, the children, and the other two corporations as a fraudulent transfer. A custodian under the Uniform Transfers to Minors Act, unlike a true trustee, does not have title to the account assets but simply controls them. Therefore, the custodian is not the “initial transferee.” But the custodian wife exercised dominion over the funds by transferring them to the other two corporations, so she is liable as an initial transferee for whose benefit the transfer was made. The children did not have any control over the assets, but they were the transferees for whose benefit the transfer initially was made. However, UTMA § 17 provides that the minor’s personal liability for obligations for which the minor is not personally at fault is limited to the amount in the custodial account. The limitation shelters the children’s personal liability to the trustee for the fraudulent transfer. Boyer v. Belavilas, 474 F.3d 375 (7th Cir. 2007).
- 2.7.ppp Payee whose use of preference payments is heavily regulated and restricted is still an “initial transferee.” Federal law requires telecommunications providers to collect a “Universal Service Fund (USF) Fee” from its customers, which they must pay to the Universal Service Administrative Company (USAC), a Delaware non-profit corporation. USAC, under strict FCC regulatory supervision, pays the USF collections to other telecommunications providers to provide support for schools, libraries, and rural hospitals. A chapter 11 creditors’ committee sued USAC to recover as a preference the USF fees that the debtor had paid to it within 90 days before bankruptcy. USAC claimed it was a mere conduit, not a transferee of the funds. Under the “dominion test,” a payee is not a transferee unless the payee has the legal right to use the funds for its own purposes or as it sees fit. The “dominion test” differs from the “control test,” which focuses more broadly on the transaction as a whole to determine who actually controls the funds. Under the more restrictive “dominion test,” USAC had dominion over the funds. Even though its use of the funds was severely restricted by tight FCC regulation, it actually received and took legal title to the funds, had the legal right to determine how to use them (though subject to regulation), and disposed of them in accordance with its budgets and management decisions. It was not a mere conduit for the debtor’s payments to the other telecommunications providers. Therefore, it was the initial transferee of the payments. Universal Serv. Admin. Co. v. Post-Confirmation Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re Incomnet, Inc.), 463 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2006).

- 2.7.qqq Recovery requires prior avoidance. The debtor in possession brought an action against a mediate transferee alleging a constructively fraudulent transfer and seeking recovery from the transferee. The debtor in possession had not previously avoided the transfer, nor did it seek avoidance in this action. The court dismisses the recovery action, because section 550(a) permits recovery only “to the extent that a transfer is avoided” under one of the avoiding power sections. Unlike section 502(d), section 550(a) does not depend only on whether the transfer is “avoidable.” In addition, the statute of limitations in section 550(f) runs from “avoidance of the transfer on account of which recovery under this section is sought.” Thus, without a prior avoidance requirement, there would be no effective statute of limitations on a recovery action, and a trustee could circumvent section 546(a)’s two-year statute of limitations on avoiding power actions simply by not bringing such an action and suing only for recovery. To conserve judicial resources, a trustee may seek avoidance and recovery in the same action, as long as avoidance is determined before recovery. Enron Corp. v. Int’l Fin. Corp. (In re Enron Corp.), 343 B.R. 75 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006); rev’d, 388 R.R. 489 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).
- 2.7.rrr Trustee is not limited to avoiding a lien but may recover its value. The debtor transferred the assets of one of its operating divisions to a subsidiary. Five years later, it issued bonds and granted a lien on the assets to secure the bonds. Shortly thereafter, it filed bankruptcy. The trustee brought an action to avoid the transfer to the subsidiary as a fraudulent transfer and sought recovery of the property or its value from the bondholders as the mediate transferees of the avoidable transfer. The court denies the bondholders’ motion to dismiss the claim for recovery of the value of the lien. Once a transfer is avoided, a court has discretion whether to order return of the property transferred or its value. The court is not limited as a matter of law to avoiding the lien, even though the value of the lien may be difficult to determine. Although the bondholders do not establish a mediate transferee’s good faith defense under section 550(b), the trustee may proceed to trial on the recovery issue. Official Comm. of Asbestos Claimants v. Bldg. Materials Corp. (In re G-I Holdings, Inc.), 338 B.R. 232 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2006).
- 2.7.sss Insurance agent’s trust account was not initial transferee of an avoidable preference. To be an initial transferee for purposes of section 550, a transferee must be able to exercise legal control over transferred funds and may use the funds for its own purposes. In this case, the debtor sent the agent a check for insurance premiums. State law required the agent to keep all client funds for insurance premiums in a client trust account. The agent deposited the check in the trust account and immediately wrote a check from the trust account to the insurance company. The debtor’s check bounced. The debtor later wired funds to the trust account to replace the bounced check. The trustee avoided the wire as a preference but could not recover from the agent as the initial transferee. Even though the agent became the debtor’s creditor when it wrote a check on the trust account against the debtor’s bounced check, the agent did not have full control over replacement funds wired into its trust account. The agent did not intend to become the debtor’s creditor, had every expectation that the check would clear when it deposited it, and charged no interest or fees for the “loan.” In addition, the replacement funds were “earmarked” for the client trust account, not as payment of a debt. Finally, as the funds were wired into the trust account, the agent did not have full control over them, but held them in trust subject to the limitations and requirements of state law. Andreini & Co. v. Pony Express Delivery Servs. Inc. (In re Pony Express Delivery Servs. Inc.), 440 F.3d 1296 (11th Cir. 2006).

- 2.7.ttt Section 546(a)(1) does not extend the statute of limitations for a plan liquidating trustee. Section 546(a)(1) requires that an avoiding power claim be brought within the later of two years after the order for relief or one year after the appointment of a trustee under section 702, 1104, 1163, 1202, or 1303 if the appointment occurs before the expiration of the two-year period. A plan liquidating trustee is appointed under section 1123(b), which authorizes a plan to provide for the appointment of an estate representative to pursue claims belonging to the estate. Therefore, the statute of limitations extension to a trustee does not apply to a plan liquidating trustee. Alberts v. Arthur J. Gallagher & Co. (In re Greater SE. Cmty. Hosp. Corp.), 341 B.R. 91 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2006).
- 2.7.uuu Section 546(a)(1) does not extend the statute of limitations for an interim chapter 7 trustee. Section 546(a)(1) requires that an avoiding power claim be brought within the later of two years after the order for relief or one year after the appointment of a trustee under section 702, 1104, 1163, 1202, or 1303 if the appointment occurs before the expiration of the two-year period. An interim chapter 7 trustee is appointed under section 701. Therefore, despite the appointment of an interim trustee before the expiration of the two-year period, and even though the interim trustee may become the permanent trustee under section 702, the statute of limitations expires two years after the order for relief if the appointment of the permanent trustee occurs more than two years after the order for relief. Georgia-Pacific Corp. v. Burtch (In re Allied Digital Techs. Corp.), 341 B.R. 171 (D. Del. 2006).
- 2.7.vvv Trustee is entitled to recover the value to the debtor, not to the creditor, of preferentially returned goods. After the debtor ceased operations, it returned yarn to its yarn supplier. An involuntary case was filed within 90 days thereafter, and after the order for relief, the debtor in possession sued to avoid the transfer as a preference and to recover its value under section 550. It could recover only its value in the hands of the debtor, that is, liquidation value, not the amount for which the creditor could resell the yarn. That value includes the creditor’s expertise, time, goodwill, and selling expense, which do not reflect the amount that the preference harmed the debtor’s estate. Active Wear, Inc. v. Parkdale Mills, Inc., 331 B.R. 669 (W.D. Va. 2005).
- 2.7.www A trustee may bring an action to recover a transfer before it is avoided. Section 550(a) permits a trustee to recover property transferred “to the extent that a transfer is avoided.” The language does not require the trustee to have avoided the transfer before bringing the action to recover; the actions can be brought together. The quoted phrase serves the purpose of limiting the extent to which the trustee may recover property, for example, if the transfer is avoided only in part, not the time in which the trustee may bring the action. Leonard v. Optimal Payments Ltd. (In re Nat’l Audit Defense Network), 332 B.R. 896 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2005).
- 2.7.xxx Avoidance is not a prerequisite to recovery. The debtor and its principal engaged in an intricate, international money laundering scheme to remove assets from the debtor for the benefit of the principal when the debtor was under litigation attack for its business activities. The trustee sued to recover some of the transferred funds from the ultimate (mediate) transferee, but did not first seek avoidance of the transfers. Avoidance under section 544(b) is not required for recovery under section 550, despite the language of section 550 that permits recovery “to the extent a transfer is avoided.” The phrase is sufficiently ambiguous, and the policy considerations in permitting the last in a chain of fraudulent transferees to rely on that defense are sufficiently compelling, that the court concludes that the phrase applies only to limit recovery when a transfer is avoidable in part and not avoidable in part. Therefore, the trustee may recover from the subsequent transferee alone. IBT Int'l, Inc. v. Northern (In re Int'l Admin. Servs., Inc.), 408 F.3d 689 (11th Cir. 2005).

2.7.yyy Recovery liability may not be offset against resulting section 502(h) claim. The creditor received a transfer that the debtor in possession avoided under section 549. The debtor obtained a judgment under section 550 for the value of the property transferred. Upon paying the judgment, the creditor would have had a claim under section 502(h) that would have been treated as a prepetition claim. The creditor was not entitled to equitable recoupment of that claim against its liability to the estate for recovery of the postpetition transfer. Even though the two claims arose out of the same transaction and therefore might be appropriate for recoupment, the nondebtor party must have a present claim against the debtor. The creditor's claim here is a future claim that does not exist during and accrues only after the avoidance action. What's more, to permit recoupment in these circumstances would effectively nullify any avoiding and recovery power. Rochez Bros. v. Sears Ecological Applications Co.. (In re Rochez Bros.), 326 B.R. 579 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2005).

2.7.zzz Section 550(a)(1) requires direct benefit for liability. The debtors sold their assets to a financing entity. The proceeds were used to pay off existing loans and to buy out one of the shareholders for $100,000. A new entity, 100% owned by the other shareholder, leased the assets back from the financing entity. After the debtors later filed bankruptcy, the trustee sought recovery of the $100,000 as a fraudulent transfer from the new entity's shareholder on the ground that by becoming the sole shareholder of the new entity, which controlled the debtor's former assets and business, the sole shareholder had received a benefit from the debtor's $100,000 transfer to the selling shareholder. The benefit was, however, indirect, incidental, and unquantifiable, unlike the paradigm case of the benefit to a guarantor when a debtor pays a guaranteed loan. The transfer could not be recovered from the sole shareholder, because it was not direct, ascertainable, and quantifiable. Reily v. Kapila, 399 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2005).

2.7.aaaa A trustee may recover an LLC's payment of estimated taxes for individual members. Before bankruptcy, the LLC debtor made estimated income tax payments to the taxing authorities on behalf of the LLC's individual members. The trustee may recover the payments, which were made from property of the LLC, because the LLC was a separate entity, and its funds were not the funds of the individual members. (It was not clear whether the trustee sought turnover of the funds or recovery under one of the avoiding powers.) Gilliam v. Speier (In re KRSM Props., LLC), 318 B.R. 712 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).

2.7.bbbb Mediate transferee protection does not require that value be given to the debtor. The debtor fraudulently transferred machinery and equipment to an affiliate. The affiliate failed and left the machinery and equipment with its landlord. The landlord transferred the machinery and equipment to a former employee of the affiliate, who agreed to remove from the landlord's premises the equipment with hazardous waste and to dispose of it properly. The landlord was the immediate transferee of the initial transfer, and the former employee was the mediate transferee. A mediate transferee is protected against recovery under section 550(a)(2) if he takes for value, in good faith, and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. In this case, the mediate transferee gave value to the landlord by agreeing to remove and treat the hazardous waste that the affiliate had left on the landlord's premises. The value need not be given to the debtor for this protection to apply. Williams v. Mortillaro (In re Resource, Recycling & Remediation, Inc.), 314 B.R. 62 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2004).

2.7.cccc Lender gets credit against postpetition avoidance action for unauthorized postpetition loans. Prepetition, the debtor had an accounts receivable financing agreement with a lender. The debtor did not notify the lender of the chapter 11 case. Postpetition, the lender advanced $192,000 against new receivables and collected $163,000 in receivables against which it had previously advanced. After the case converted to chapter 7, the trustee sought recovery under section 549(a) of $163,000 from the lender. Although the court finds the transfers of $163,000 avoidable, it denies the trustee recovery under sections 550(d) and 105(a). Section 550(d) limits a trustee to a single satisfaction. Because the lender had advanced more fresh cash to the estate than it had collected, any further recovery would constitute a double recovery. The court also supported its ruling under section 105(a), reasoning that it would be inequitable to require the lender to pay over the collections when it had already advanced funds to the estate in excess of what it had received and that such an order was consistent with the Code, particularly section 550(d). Dobin v. Presidential Fin. Corp. (In re Cybridge Corp.), 312 B.R. 262 (D.N.J. 2004).

- 2.7.dddd Recovery from a secured creditor revives the creditor’s secured claim. During the involuntary gap, the alleged debtor paid the fully secured creditor a portion owing on its loan. After the order for relief, the debtor confirmed a plan that provided for a revesting of assets free and clear of all liens. After confirmation, the liquidating agent prevailed in an action against the creditor for recovery of the gap transfers under section 549(a). The creditor asserted a secured claim under section 502(h), which would fully cancel the trustee’s recovery. Because section 502(h) requires allowance and determination of the claim the same as if the claim had arisen before the date of the filing of the petition, the section 502(h) claim was secured, just as the original claim had been secured. Fleet Nat’l Bank v. Gray, 375 F.3d 52 (1st Cir. 2004).
- 2.7.eeee Creditor may not bring derivative avoiding power action. Refusing to follow the decision of the Third Circuit in Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of Cybergenics Corp. v. Chinery, 330 F.3d 548 (3d Cir. 2003) (en banc), the Tenth Circuit B.A.P. instead relies on the literal reading of Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1 (2000), to rule that a creditor does not have and may not be granted derivative standing to bring an avoiding power action in the name of the trustee. Because the Tenth Circuit has not yet ruled on this issue, the B.A.P. concludes that it must select between the Cybergenics and the Hartford Underwriters’ approaches and chooses the latter. United Phosphorous, Ltd. v. Fox (In re Fox), 305 B.R. 912 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).
- 2.7.ffff Secured creditor may pursue preference actions. As part of its adequate protection agreement, the debtor in possession transferred to its secured lenders up to $30 million of recoveries under preference claims. Two preference defendants argued that the secured creditors’ preference litigation was not “for the benefit of the estate,” as required under section 550(a) and so should be dismissed. The Seventh Circuit rules that using the prospect of preference recovery before the commencement of preference litigation to secure a benefit for the estate (here, debtor in possession financing) was sufficiently “for the benefit of the estate” to qualify under section 550(a). Moreover, Hartford Underwriters v. Union Planters Bank, 530 U.S. 1 (2000), does not prevent a direct assignment of claims that belong to the estate. Mellon Bank, N.A. v. Dick Corp., 351 F.3d 290 (7th Cir. 2003).
- 2.7.gggg “Knowledge of voidability” requires more than inquiry notice. After the case was converted to chapter 7, the debtor’s wife paid fees to the debtor’s bankruptcy lawyer and the debtor’s criminal lawyer. Before the fees were paid, the trustee advised the attorneys that he was investigating whether the source of the funds might be recoverable under one of the avoiding powers. After the fees were paid and the trustee completed his investigation, the trustee sought recovery from the attorneys of the fees paid on the grounds that they came from property of the estate. He claimed that they were paid by a Cook Islands asset protection trust, which the debtor had established more than one year before bankruptcy, to the wife, who paid them to the attorneys. Despite the advice from the trustee that he was investigating the source of the funds used to pay the fees, the Third Circuit rules that the attorneys did not have “knowledge of the voidability of the transfers.” Reading “knowledge” narrowly, the court rules that notice or inquiry notice is not the same as knowledge. Wasserman v. Bressman (In re Bressman), 327 F.3d 229 (3d Cir. 2003).

- 2.7.hhhh Collateral escrow agent is not an “initial transferee.” The debtor issued preferred stock to a special purpose subsidiary of an investment bank, which had borrowed from Dow Chemical. The subsidiary pledged the preferred shares to an escrow agent, to whom the debtor paid preferred stock dividend payments and who then paid them on to Dow as interest payments on the subsidiary’s note. The escrow agent was not the “initial transferee” for purposes of section 550. What is more, the court looks through the transaction to determine that Dow may have had a direct equity interest in the debtor and therefore denies summary judgment to Dow on the underlying fraudulent transfer action. Pereira v. Dow Chemical Co. (In re Trace International Holdings, Inc.), 287 B.R. 98 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2002).
- 2.7.iii Trustee need not recover avoided mortgage. The trustee sued to avoid a mortgage on the debtor’s property on the grounds that it was invalidly executed under Ohio law. Upon avoidance, the trustee preserved the mortgage for the benefit of the estate under sections 551 and 541(a)(4) and did not need to recover the property transferred. As a result, the transferee did not have the defenses of section 550(b) and section 550(e) available. The court also suggests that preservation of the transfer was not necessary, because upon avoidance of the mortgage the property automatically became property of the estate. Suhar v. Burns (In re Burns), 322 F.3d 421 (6th Cir. 2003).
- 2.7.jjjj Person who does not have dominion over a cashier’s check is not an initial transferee. The husband settled litigation. The wife purchased a cashier’s check with her separate property, identifying the husband as the “remitter” on the cashier’s check. The husband delivered it to the creditor. The wife filed bankruptcy within a year, and her trustee sought recovery of the funds from the creditor as a fraudulent transfer. On a very close reading of Article 3 of the U.C.C., the Ninth Circuit rules that the identification of the husband as the remitter on the cashier’s check was irrelevant. He had only such rights as the wife could transfer. Only the bank, as drawer and drawee of the check, and the creditor as payee, could enforce the check. Therefore the husband did not have dominion over the funds. Affirming that it followed the “dominion” rather than “control” test for identifying who is the initial transferee, the Ninth Circuit concludes that the creditor was the initial transferee and is therefore liable for the fraudulent transfer, even though it accepted the check in good faith and without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer. For these purposes, “dominion” means legal dominion and control, rather than mere control in fact. Abele v. Modern Financial Plans Services, Inc. (In re Cohen), 300 F.3d 1097 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 2.7.kkkk By transferring claim, creditor loses right to reinstated claim after transfer avoidance. The debtor made transfers to its secured lender during the involuntary gap period. The trustee later avoided the transfers under section 549, and the lender asserted a claim under section 502(h), which it claimed was secured by its original collateral. However, the lender had sold its claim to a third party. Because of the sale, the lender could not assert a reinstated claim after the avoidance of the transfer. Bankvest Capital Corp. v. Fleet Boston (In re Bankvest Capital Corp.), 276 B.R. 12 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2002).
- 2.7.iiiii Preference recovery is not subject to PACA trust. The trustee sought preference recovery from PACA suppliers who were paid before bankruptcy. The suppliers settled. The settlement proceeds were not subject to the PACA trust, even though the payments to suppliers may have come from PACA trust funds, because the funds paid to settle the preference actions were not traceable to PACA proceeds. In re Churchfield, 277 B.R. 769 (Bankr. E.D. Cal.).

- 2.7.mmmm The trustee need not “recover” an avoided transfer. The trustee avoided a mortgage under the strong-arm power of section 544(a)(3). The avoided mortgage is automatically preserved for the benefit of the estate under section 551, and the preserved mortgage becomes property of the estate under section 541(a)(4). Once it does, the mortgage and the fee merge, and the trustee effectively owns the property free and clear of the mortgage. As such, the trustee does not need to invoke the recovery powers under section 550, which are independent of the avoiding power sections of the Bankruptcy Code, and the transferee does not have any of the benefits of the “takes for value” protection of section 550(b)(1), the “good faith immediate or mediate transferee” protection of section 550(b)(2), or the “improvements” lien of section 550(e). Suhar v. Burns (In re Burns), 369 B.R. 20 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).
- 2.7.nnnn Proceeds of preference recovery are not subject to prepetition liens against the debtor. The taxing agency filed a statutory tax lien for unemployment taxes against the debtor before the petition. In the debtor’s chapter 7 case, the trustee recovered substantial funds from preference actions. The state taxing agency sought to impose its lien on the recovery. The Sixth Circuit rules that the proceeds recovered are property of the estate, not of the debtor, so that the state taxing lien never attached to the recovered property. Frank v. Michigan State Unemployment Agency (In re Thompson Boat Co.), 252 F.3d 852 (6th Cir. 2001).
- 2.7.oooo Avoidance, preservation, and recovery of transfers are separate and independent concepts. The debtor sought to avoid an unrecorded lease under section 544(a) and to preserve the lease for the benefit of the estate under section 551. The debtor did not, however, seek recovery of the leasehold interest under section 550(a), because avoidance and preservation would merge the leasehold and fee interest, resulting in the estate recovering unencumbered title to the real property. The court rules that the debtor may avoid the transfer even though it does not seek recovery under section 550(a), because the two concepts are separate and independent. Moreover, the section 550(a) requirement of a “benefit to the estate” as a condition to recovery does not apply to the avoiding powers. Dunes Hotel Assocs. v. Hyatt Corp., 245 B.R. 492 (D.S.C. 2000).
- 2.7.pppp Court denies avoidance of transfer on equitable grounds. Characterizing the case as unique, the court denies the use of the avoiding powers against a clearly avoidable transfer where the transferee was the debtor’s sole creditor and the avoidance would benefit only the debtor and its equity holder. The court found that such a course of conduct would violate the debtor in possession’s fiduciary duty of loyalty by favoring the debtor’s interest rather than the interest of creditors and would be contrary to the purposes of the avoiding powers. Dunes Hotel Assocs. v. Hyatt Corp., 245 B.R. 492 (D.S.C. 2000).
- 2.7.qqqq Subsequent transferee is liable for funds flowing through bank accounts. In settlement of a proxy contest, Southmark paid a dissident shareholder $3.3 million. The shareholder paid a portion of it to another member of its group, who paid the amount to the group’s lawyer. Apparently ignoring the nature of the bank account, the court holds that the flow of funds through each of the three bank accounts rendered the law firm a “subsequent transferee” under section 550(a) of the property transferred by Southmark to the initial shareholder. Southmark Corp. v. Schulte, Roth & Zabel, L.L.P., 242 B.R. 330 (N.D. Tex. 1999).
- 2.7.rrrr Unsuspecting payee of cashiers check is “initial transferee” for avoidance purposes. The corporate debtor’s principal drew a cashiers check on the debtor’s bank account, naming a car dealership as the payee and the principal’s son as the remitter. The son used the check to buy a car. Although the car dealership had no idea of the source of the funds, it was the initial transferee under section 550(a)(1) for purposes of avoiding the fraudulent transfer of the debtor’s funds. The court conducts a thorough analysis of UCC Article 3 in reaching its conclusion that only the car dealership had the sufficient dominion over the funds to qualify as the initial transferee of the debtor's property. Perrino v. Salem, Inc., 243 B.R. 550 (D. Me. 1999).

- 2.7.ssss Subsequent transferee is denied a good faith defense. Because the subsequent transferee of a preference knew of the source of the funds and “knew facts that would lead a reasonable person to believe that the transfer could be avoided as a preferential transfer if [the debtor] filed bankruptcy,” the subsequent transferee had “knowledge of the voidability of the transfer” as required under section 550(b) and was liable. Southmark Corp. v. Schulte, Roth & Zabel, L.L.P., 242 B.R. 330 (N.D. Tex. 1999).
- 2.7.tttt An avoided lien on sold property is preserved for the benefit of the estate. The bankruptcy court holds that the automatic lien preservation provision of section 551 operates even on liened property that is sold before the petition. In this case, the debtor sold receivables that were subject to the unperfected lien. The recovery of the receivables upon the avoidance of the lien brought them back into the estate, despite the subsequent sale, subject to the avoided lien that was preserved for the benefit of the estate. In re Greater Southeast Community Hospital Foundation, Inc., 237 B.R. 518 (Bankr. D.D.C. 1999).
- 2.7.uuuu Postconfirmation avoidance action must benefit the estate. The successor to the debtor under the plan issued a note to creditors that was not contingent on the successor's recovery under avoiding power actions. Accordingly, the successor corporation could not proceed to recover transfers under section 550, which requires that the recovery be “for the benefit of the estate.” Burlington Motor Carriers, Inc., v. MCI Telecommunications (In re Burlington Motor Holdings, Inc.), 231 B.R. 874 (Bankr. D. Del. 1999).
- 2.7.vvvv Chapter 7 trustee may transfer avoiding power rights. The Ninth Circuit affirms the bankruptcy court's approval of the trustee's sale of avoiding power actions. Duckor Stradling & Metzger v. Baum Trust (In re P.R.T.C., Inc.), 177 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 1999).
- 2.7.wwww Indirect benefit to creditors will support an avoiding power action. Case law has required that a post-confirmation avoiding power action benefit the estate or creditors. In this case, the recovery in the action would accrue solely to the reorganized debtor, but the equity of the reorganized debtor was owned solely by prepetition unsecured creditors. Thus, the court holds, the recovery benefits creditors adequately to satisfy the requirement of section 550. P.A. Bergner & Co. v. Bank One, Milwaukee, N.A. (In re P.A. Bergner & Co.), 140 F.3d 1111 (7th Cir. 1998).
- 2.7.xxxx A recipient of funds from the debtor is not necessarily a “transferee.” The debtor paid its insurance broker a premium that was to be transferred to the insurance company to purchase coverage. Following other circuits, the Second Circuit rules that the broker was merely a recipient or a conduit of the payment, not a transferee, because the broker passed the funds to the insurance company. To qualify as a transferee, the recipient must have dominion over the asset. Christy v. Alexander and Alexander of New York, Inc. (In re Finley, Kumble, Wagner, Heinie, Underberg, Manley, Myerson & K.C. Casey), 130 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1997).

3. BANKRUPTCY RULES

- 3.1.a A claims agent may not adjudge the validity of a claim transfer. The court ordered the allowance of a rejection damages claim and required the claimant to file a proof of claim within 30 days. The claimant did not do so. Shortly before the order, the claimant transferred the claim to a claim dealer. The dealer filed evidence of transfer under Rule 3001(e)(1), which addresses transfers of claims before a proof of claim is filed. Because no proof of claim had been filed, the claims agent, in accordance with Rule 3001(a)(1), did not send notice of the transfer, but because no proof of claim had been filed, it paused processing the transfer on the claims register. Later, when reconciling the claims register, the claims agent sent a Notice of Defective Transfer to the transferor and transferee. The claimant then filed a proof of claim, but naming its affiliate. It later withdrew that claim and filed on behalf of the proper entity. After that, the claims agent sent notice of transfer to the transferor and transferee. Neither objected to the transfer, and the claims agent updated the register accordingly. When the transferee's subsequent transferee objected to the claims agent's notice of subsequent transfer, the claims agent reversed both transfers. The claims agent is appointed under 28 U.S.C. § 156(c), which authorizes the clerk to contract claims processing, and has only the authority the clerk would have. The clerk does not have the authority to adjudge the validity of the claim transfer; nor does a claims agent. Therefore, the court orders the claims agent to record the claim transfer. In re LATAM Airlines Grp. S.A., 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 2528 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Sept. 13, 2022).

- 3.1.b Court denies ex parte motion to extend statute of limitations. The debtor refused to cooperate with the trustee's investigation of avoidable transfers. As a result, the trustee was delayed in learning the identity of transferees and other potential defendants. With the two-year statute of limitations approaching, the trustee filed an ex parte motion to extend the statute on equitable tolling grounds. Bankruptcy Rule 9006 governs extensions of time but does not permit extension of a congressionally mandated time period, such as the statutes of limitations in section 546 or 549. Equitable tolling may excuse a late-filed complaint. A defendant may contest the late filing and challenge whether equitable tolling applies. But an unknown defendant is unable to do so in response to an ex parte motion to extend the statute on equitable grounds. And an ex parte order would not bind a future defendant who had no notice of the motion because due process requires that the defendant have notice and an opportunity to be heard. Therefore, the court denies the motion as ineffective and seeking only an advisory ruling. In re Cramer, 636 B.R. 830 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Feb. 8, 2022).
- 3.1.c Failure to follow local rule requiring motion to withdraw reference waives jury trial right. The bankruptcy court's local rules provide that a party waives the right to a jury trial unless the party files a motion to withdraw the reference at least 14 days before the initial status conference in the adversary proceeding. Although the defendant demanded a jury trial in the answer, she did not timely file a motion to withdraw the reference. The local rule implements, rather than overrides, Bankruptcy Rule 7038, because without consent, the bankruptcy court may not try a case before a jury. Only the district court may do so, which requires a motion to withdraw the reference. Therefore, by failure to follow the required procedure, the defendant waived the right to a jury trial. Welt v. Bumshteyn (in re Bumshteyn), 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 90 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. Feb. 1, 2022).
- 3.1.d Failure to move to apply Rule 23 to a putative class claim does not constitute excusable neglect to file late proofs of claims. The claimants began a class action against the debtor before bankruptcy, which stayed the action. The court fixed a claims bar date, confirmed a plan, and granted the class representatives stay relief to pursue the class action. The class representatives and some putative class members filed proofs of claim. After stay relief, the class action court found the class action improper and dismissed the case. The remaining claimants then sought leave to file late individual claims in the bankruptcy court, nearly three years after the bar date. A court may permit late filing upon a showing of excusable neglect, considering four factors: prejudice to the estate, length of delay, reason for the delay (including whether it was within the claimant's reasonable control), and good faith. No factor is more important than any of the others. Prejudice requires substantive prejudice, which was not present here, not merely litigation costs and delay, especially because the debtor was aware of the pending claims. However, the nearly three-year long delay was too long, and the delay could significantly affect the resolution of the litigation and the bankruptcy. The reason for the delay—awaiting the outcome of the class action litigation—did not constitute excusable neglect. Several individual claimants filed proofs of claim before the bar date, so the delay was within the claimants' reasonable control. Finally, the claimants' and their counsel's failure to move under Rule 9014 for application of Rule 7023 to the purported class proof of claim evinced a lack of diligence and a misunderstanding of the Bankruptcy Rules and showed lack of good faith. As a result, the court denies the motion to file late claims. W. Wilmington Oil Field Claimants v. Nabors Corp. Servs., Inc. (In re CJ Holding Co.), 27 F. 4th 1105 (5th Cir. 2022).

- 3.1.e Bankruptcy Rule 3002.1 does not authorize punitive sanctions. The mortgagee added additional charges to the debtor's account statement without compliance with Bankruptcy Rule 2002.1, which requires a mortgagee to provide notice of any such charges to the trustee and the debtor. The mortgagee ignored the trustee's requests to delete the charges, after which the trustee brought a motion for contempt and sanctions. The mortgagee then removed the charges and opposed the sanctions motion. Rule 3002.1 provides remedies for noncompliance. If the creditor fails to give the required notice, the court may preclude the creditor from presenting evidence in support of the charge and "award other appropriate relief, including reasonable expenses and attorney's fees caused by the failure." "Other appropriate relief" should be construed consistent with the other terms in the same provision. Expenses and fees are compensatory, suggesting that other relief is limited to non-punitive sanctions. PHH Mortgage Corp. v. Sensenich (In re Gravel), 6 F.4th 503 (2d Cir. 2021).
- 3.1.f Bankruptcy Rules apply in a related-to action in the district court. A tort plaintiff sued a defendant that it claimed was responsible with the debtor for the plaintiff's injuries. The state court action was removed to federal district court on the ground that it was related to the debtor's bankruptcy case and transferred to the district where the debtor's case was pending. Among other reasons, because the case was a personal injury tort claim, the district court did not refer it to the bankruptcy court. The defendant moved to dismiss on jurisdictional grounds. The court granted the motion. The plaintiff moved for reconsideration 28 days later. The court denied reconsideration, and the plaintiff appealed. Bankruptcy Rule 1001 provides that the Rules "govern procedure in cases under title 11." Although the phrase is ambiguous as to whether it includes related-to proceedings, practicalities require it to be read that way. Otherwise, a district court handling both core and non-core proceedings in a single case would have to apply two different sets of Rules. Bankruptcy Rule 9023 requires that a motion for reconsideration be filed within 14 days after the order or judgment. It applies here. Therefore, the filing 28 days after the order was late. Under Rule 9023, a timely-filed motion tolls the time period for filing a notice of appeal. Because the motion did not toll the time period for filing a notice of appeal, the notice of appeal was late, and the court of appeals lacks jurisdiction to hear it. Roy v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co. (In re Lac-Mégantic Derailment Litig.), 999 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 2021).
- 3.1.g Email service of a bar date notice is not adequate. The claims agent mailed the bar date notice to the creditor's address shown on the schedules, which the parties stipulated was not the creditor's last known address. It also emailed the notice to the creditor's email address, which the creditor regularly used, including for communications relating to the case. The parties stipulated that the creditor did not receive the mail notice, and the creditor claimed he did not see the email notice. Due process requires at a minimum notice reasonably calculated to inform. While due process is necessary, it might not be sufficient. Bankruptcy Rule 2002(a)(7) requires that notice of a bar date be sent by mail. Because the parties stipulated that the address to which the notice was sent was not the creditor's last known address, the notice did not comply with Rule 2002(a)(7). Bankruptcy Rule 9005 incorporates Fed. R. Civ. P. 61, which requires the court to disregard errors and defects that do not affect substantial rights—the harmless error doctrine. To show harmless error here in the absence of properly mailed notice, the debtor would have to show the creditor had actual knowledge of the bar date. Because the debtor could not show that, the court denies the bar date objection to the claim. In re Cyber Litigation Inc., ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. D. Del. Oct. 21, 2021).
- 3.1.h Certified mail is not adequate for service of process. The plaintiff served the complaint and summons on the defendant by certified mail but did not receive a receipt of delivery from the defendant. Bankruptcy Rule 7004 permits service by first class mail. Certified mail imposes additional requirements on the Postal Service and on the recipient. Because certified mail differs from ordinary first class mail, service was ineffective. Ratliff v. Dept. of Educ. (In re Ratliff), ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 599 (Bankr. S.D.W. Va. Mar. 15, 2021).

- 3.1.i Court denies Rule 2004 examination request by a plaintiff in a nonbankruptcy court action. A plaintiff in state court litigation against a third party purchased a $650 claim against the chapter 7 debtor and promptly sought production under Rule 2004 of documents from the estate, which would be used in the nonbankruptcy litigation. Rule 2004 is not available once litigation has commenced, even litigation in a nonbankruptcy court. Granting the request might incentivize parties to purchase small claims solely to pursue outside litigation having no relation to the estate and could impose unnecessary costs and expenses on an estate. The court denies the request. In re Cambridge Analytica LLC, 600 B.R. 750 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2019).
- 3.1.j Bankruptcy Rule does not authorize transfer of an unassignable claim. The debtor breached a contract with a land buyer. The buyer filed a claim in the debtor's chapter 11 case for breach of contract and for related torts. The buyer later sold the land and assigned the claim to the second buyer, giving the notice required by Bankruptcy Rule 3001. The contract prohibited the assignment of rights or delegation of duties under the contract without the debtor's consent, which it had not given. The reorganized debtor objected to the claim. A creditor's standing to assert a claim depends on whether the creditor suffered injury, not on whether the creditor has a right to assert the claim. The second buyer here suffered injury by buying the claim and therefore has standing to assert it, even if, on substantive grounds, it may not do so. Section 502(b)(1) disallows a claim that is unenforceable under nonbankruptcy law, which allows the trustee to object based on any defense to a claim that would be available outside bankruptcy. Bankruptcy rules are strictly procedural and do not affect any substantive rights. Bankruptcy Rule 3001 does not authorize assignment of a filed claim that may not be assigned under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Under the nonbankruptcy law applicable to the contract, a tort claim is not assignable. The tort claim is unenforceable in the hands of an assignee and is therefore disallowed. The claimant relied only on Bankruptcy Rule 3001 to support the contract claim's assignability and did not challenge the debtor's argument that the contract barred the assignment. Therefore, the claimant waived any defense to the debtor's argument, resulting in the claim's disallowance. In re Caesars Entertainment Op. Co., Inc., 588 B.R. 32 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2018).
- 3.1.k Court disapproves class settlement without compliance with Bankruptcy Rule 7023. The debtor completed a section 363 sale and then confirmed a plan that provided for a general unsecured creditors trust, from which unsecured claims would be satisfied. If prepetition unsecured claims exceeded a trigger amount, the 363 sale buyer would contribute an additional amount of its common stock to the trust. Several years after the sale and plan confirmation, the buyer revealed significant defects in the product the debtor, and later the buyer, manufactured, causing economic loss to about 11 million of the debtor's and buyer's customers and personal injuries to many. The plan discharged prepetition personal injuries, but the buyer had assumed liability for postpetition injuries, though not for economic losses resulting from pre- or postpetition defects. When the defect was revealed, numerous class actions were filed against the buyer, and additional claims were filed against the trust. The plaintiffs agreed to settle with the trust by giving notice to all potential claimants, waiving the claimants' right to recover from anything other than the additional common stock and, if successful, claims against the buyer, and proceeding under section 502(c) to estimate the aggregate amount of claims to determine whether the trigger amount was exceeded, and they sought approval of the settlement under Bankruptcy Rule 9019. Rule 9019 permits the bankruptcy court to approve a settlement, focusing on the best interest of the estate. Bankruptcy Rule 7023 permits class action procedures in bankruptcy cases, including for a class proof of claim, through application of Rule 7023 under Rule 9014. A Rule 9019 settlement may apply to a class of claims only if the court certifies the class under Rule 7023, which establishes strict requirements for class certification, focusing on (among other things) the protection of class members, and may not supersede the certification requirements. A class proof of claim is not deemed filed for all class members unless the court has permitted the filing of the class proof of claim by certifying the class. Although a discharge under section 1141(d)(1) binds all creditors, a settlement outside of a plan does not bind all class members unless the court has certified the class. Unless the certification requirements are met independently of a settlement, a settlement may not include class certification. Section 502(c) applies only to filed claims. Courts estimate future claims not for purposes of allowance but, based on the aggregate amount of future claims, to establish the size of a required trust or to determine plan feasibility or voting rights. Because the court had not certified the class for settlement purposes, the claims were not deemed filed, and the court could not estimate their aggregate amount. The court may approve this settlement only if the class claims meet Rule 7023's requirements. Because they don't, the court refuses to approve the settlement. In re Motors Liq. Co., ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 2902 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Sept. 24, 2018).

- 3.1.l Court approves post-confirmation Rule 2004 examination. The chapter 11 plan created two trusts. The corporate trust, for the benefit of unsecured creditors, received all the debtor's claims against third parties. The lenders' trust was for the benefit of consenting lenders, who assigned their own third-party claims to the trust. The trusts had the same trustee. After confirmation, the trustee sought a Rule 2004 examination of the debtor's accountant and certain lenders. Rule 2004 permits the court to order the examination of an entity about "the acts, conduct, or property ... of the debtor ... and any other matter relevant to the case." The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a proceeding "arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11." A proceeding arises in a case if, by its nature, it could arise only in a bankruptcy case. Rule 2004 applies only in a bankruptcy case, so a proceeding concerning a Rule 2004 examination arises in the case. Limits on post-confirmation jurisdiction apply only to "related to" jurisdiction, not core proceedings, so jurisdiction retention language in the plan does not govern post-confirmation core jurisdiction, and the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to grant a post-confirmation Rule 2004 motion. Rule 2004's scope is broad. It covers anything that might lead to a claim for the estate. Any claims the corporate trust might discover and pursue would be for the benefit of the estate, but the lenders' trust claims would not. Therefore, the trustee may take Rule 2004 discovery for the corporate trust, but not for the lenders' trust. The fact that the trustee is the same for both does not prevent discovery, because Rule 2004 does not prohibit use of information in collateral litigation. In re Millennium Lab Holdings II, LLC, 562 B.R. 614 (Bankr. D. Del. 2016).
- 3.1.m Court denies motion to seal Rule 7007.1 corporate ownership statement. Bankruptcy Rule 7007.1 requires a party to an adversary proceeding to file a statement of corporate ownership, identifying any entity that owns 10% or more of the party's equity interests. Section 107(a) provides that all documents filed in a bankruptcy case are public records, but section 107(b)(1) permits a court to protect an entity with respect to a trade secret or confidential commercial information by permitting a document to be filed under seal. The defendant in an adversary proceeding sought a court order permitting the filing of its corporate ownership statement under seal, on the ground that its owners were investors, and their identity was confidential for their own protection and to protect the defendant from competitors' attempts to lure away the investors. Section 107(a) embodies a strong public policy of transparency, and section 107(b)(1) does not create a haven for those who seek privacy for its own sake. Rule 7007.1 permits the court to avoid a conflict of interest by informing the court who interested parties are, but it also permits the public to know to promote public confidence in the judiciary's integrity. Absent a clear showing of commercial harm from disclosure of a party's owners, section 107(b) does not permit sealing a corporate ownership statement. Motors Liquidation Co. Avoidance Action Trust v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A. (In re Motors Liquidation Co.), 561 B.R. 36 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016).
- 3.1.n "Fair and equitable" requirement does not apply to post-chapter 11 liquidating trustee's settlement. The chapter 11 plan created a liquidating trust to pursue the estate's claims. The trust required the trustee to exercise good faith judgment in the best interest of the trust and to maximize recoveries and to obtain a bankruptcy court approval for all settlements above a specified amount. The trustee sued a transferee to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer. The trustee and the transferee settled. A court may approve a settlement by a chapter 11 trustee during the case only if the settlement is, among other things, fair and equitable. A post-confirmation trustee is not subject to the same restrictions as a chapter 11 trustee. Rather, the plan and the trust agreement establish the standards for approval. Therefore, the court may approve the settlement without consideration of whether it is fair and equitable. Greif & Co. v. Shapiro (In re Western Funding Inc.), 550 B.R. 841 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2016).

- 3.1.o Lack of notice denies due process if the claimant is unable to participate in bankruptcy negotiations for a better deal. The debtor manufactured products with a serious defect, which it concealed. It filed a chapter 11 case, gave publication notice and extensive direct notice, but not direct notice to its customers who bought the defective product, and sold its assets under section 363 to a newly formed entity free and clear of all claims and interests, including successor liability claims. The product defect was revealed several years later, and people injured by the defect sued the buyer under a successor liability theory. The buyer relied on the sale order. The bankruptcy court found that, addressing objections from other parties in the original sale hearing, it had ruled on all the legal objections the injured plaintiffs now raised to the breadth and scope of the sale order's free and clear provision and determined that despite the lack of direct notice, the plaintiffs were not legally prejudiced. The court of appeals reversed. Due process requires actual notice to known creditors. Whether or not a denial of due process claim requires a showing of prejudice, the lack of notice here was the defect's concealment. That prejudiced the plaintiffs by preventing them from participating in the case and thereby negotiating a better deal for themselves. Therefore, the bar provision in the sale order did not bar the plaintiffs' claims. Elliott v. General Motors LLC, 829 F.3d 135 (2d Cir. 2016).
- 3.1.p Privileges might apply to litigation funder communications. The creditor funded its litigation and collection efforts, including an involuntary petition, against the debtor under an agreement with a litigation funding company. The debtor interposed a bad faith defense and sought discovery of communications among the creditor, his counsel and the litigation funding company to support its theory. Attorney-client communications are privileged and not subject to discovery but lose their privilege if disclosed to a third party. However, if the third party has a common interest with the client, then the privilege survives. Some courts use a narrower common legal interest test, others use a broader common commercial interest test, to determine common interest. The latter requires both necessity of the disclosure to obtain legal advice to assist the parties' common purpose, which would not be made outside the privilege, and an intention to keep the contents of the disclosure confidential. A litigation funding arrangement meets all these tests. A communication may also be privileged under the "agency exception," whose application requires that communication with the third party be in furtherance of the rendition of legal services. Communication with a litigation funder also meets this test. Attorney work product is also privileged and not subject to discovery unless the information involves only facts, not mental impressions, conclusions, opinions or theories, and cannot be obtained elsewhere. Counsel's communications with the litigation funder over litigation strategy and risks qualifies as privileged work-product to which the exceptions do not apply. The litigation funding agreement's terms are work product but are at issue in the debtor's bad faith defense and so are subject to disclosure except to the extent of attorney mental impressions and opinion and payment terms. In re Int'l Oil Trading Co., LLC, 548 B.R. 825 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2016).
- 3.1.q Bankruptcy Rules apply to withdrawn proceeding in the district court. The bankruptcy court dismissed an involuntary petition but retained jurisdiction to hear claims under section 303(i)(1) for costs and attorneys' fees and section 303(i)(2) for actual and punitive damages. The alleged debtor filed an adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy court under both provisions against the petitioning creditor, who demanded a jury trial in the district court and moved to withdraw the reference. The district court withdrew the section 303(i)(2) claim for damages, but not the section 303(i)(1) claim for costs and fees. The bankruptcy court awarded damages, and in a separate jury trial, the jury found the petitioning creditor liable for emotional distress, loss of reputation and loss of wages damages and for punitive damages. The petitioning creditor filed a motion under Fed. R. Civ. Proc 50(b) for judgment as a matter of law 28 days after the district court entered a final judgment. Rule 50(b) allows the movant 28 days after entry of judgment to file the motion; Bankruptcy Rule 9015 makes Rule 50(b) apply "in cases and proceeding, except [any motion] shall be filed no later than 14 days after the entry of judgment." Bankruptcy Rule 1001 provides the Bankruptcy Rules "govern procedure in cases under title 11." The Advisory Committee Note confirms that they apply in proceedings in the district court. Therefore, the Rule 50(b) motion was untimely. The bifurcation of the adversary proceeding by the withdrawal of the reference only as to the damages portion severs the two proceedings, so the district court's action was independent of the bankruptcy court's action. As a result, the petitioning creditor could not rely on the bankruptcy court's later entry of judgment in the costs and fees proceeding as a trigger date for the Rule 50(b) motion. Rosenberg v. DVI Receivables XIV, LLC, 818 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2016).

- 3.1.r Single publication in Wall Street Journal and debtor's local newspaper 39 days before the bar date did not provide adequate notice to customers. The mortgage originator debtor operated nationwide and had more than a million borrowers. It published 39 days' notice of the bar date in the Wall Street Journal and in its local newspaper, the Orange County Register. The liquidating trustee objected to a claim by a borrower who was an unknown creditor on the ground that it was filed after the bar date. Due process requires notice reasonably calculated under all the circumstances to apprise parties of the action and afford them an opportunity to protect their rights. The Wall Street Journal is directed at a sophisticated audience, and the Orange County Register does not have nationwide reach. The publication period was short, and notice was published only once. Such notice is not adequate to advise unknown creditors who were the debtor's customers of the bar date. Therefore, the court denies the trustee's timeliness objection. White v. Jacobs (In re New Century TRS Holdings, Inc.), 528 B.R. 251 (D. Del. 2014).
- 3.1.s Administrative bar date may bar unknown claimant's claim by publication notice. The claimant alleged that the debtor, at one of its Texas locations, served alcohol during its chapter 11 case to an underage driver who injured the claimant in an automobile accident. The state alcohol beverage control board investigated the incident, interviewing the debtor's employees several times, but the claimant never notified the debtor of her claim or communicated with the debtor about the claim until he filed an action against the debtor after the plan effective date. The debtor's records and the investigator's records did not reflect any information about a possible claim as a result of the accident. The debtor confirmed its plan, which set an administrative claim bar date and which discharged all administrative claims that were not timely filed. The debtor published notice of the bar date in The Wall Street Journal, national edition, and in the local Virginia newspaper where the case was pending, and mailed notice to all known creditors. A plan may discharge a claim only if the holder is given constitutionally adequate notice. The debtor may give notice to unknown claimants by publication. A creditor is known if its identity is reasonably ascertainable from the debtor's books and records. This creditor was not known to the debtor. Therefore, publication notice was adequate, and the plan discharged her claim. Broad v. AMF Bowling Worldwide, Inc. (In re AMF Bowling Worldwide, Inc.), 520 B.R. 185 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2014).
- 3.1.t Inadequately-noticed DIP settlement stipulation does not bind chapter 7 trustee. The debtor in possession sold assets in which a creditor claimed a security interest. The DIP stipulated with the creditor, the buyer, and the creditors committee that the proceeds would be segregated pending resolution of the creditor's claim. The creditor later moved for enforcement of the stipulation, claiming that the DIP had not segregated the proceeds. The DIP listed the motion on the hearing agenda filed two days before the hearing and served on parties in interest, but the parties settled on the hearing day. The DIP filed and served another agenda the same day stating that the matter had been settled and filed a certificate of counsel with the settlement stipulation, which the court approved the next day. The stipulation released the creditor from all claims relating to the debtor or the chapter 11 case. After the case was converted to chapter 7, the trustee sued the creditor to avoid prepetition transfers as preferences. Rule 9019 permits a bankruptcy court to approve a settlement under case-law standards on notice to creditors, among others. Here, there was no notice of the settlement, and the bankruptcy court did not find that it complied with the standards for approval of a settlement. Therefore, the settlement's broad release did not bind the chapter 7 trustee. Burtch v. Avnet, Inc., 527 B.R. 150 (D. Del. Jan. 16, 2015).

- 3.1.u Court seals “candid” report on attorney conduct. The bankruptcy court ordered a bankruptcy lawyer's counsel to file a report, “written candidly and not as an advocate for any party,” on problems with the lawyer's conduct, which counsel did. As a result, the report contained statements that would not likely have been included in a report for publication. The bankruptcy lawyer asked that the report be filed under seal. Section 107(a) requires that a paper filed in a case is a public record open to inspection, but the court may seal it if it contains confidential commercial information or scandalous material. Confidential commercial information includes information whose disclosure could cause commercial injury. Here, the report's publication would put the lawyer in a worse competitive position in attracting and retaining clients and would serve no purpose for another law firm than to compete. Moreover, how a lawyer organizes his practice is his stock-in-trade and part of the lawyer's service. Therefore, the report contains confidential commercial information. In addition, though the paper was filed in a case, it addressed attorney discipline, not a pending bankruptcy case. State bar attorney discipline proceedings are confidential. Therefore, the court seals the report. Robbins v. Tripp, 510 B.R. 61 (E.D. Va. 2014).
- 3.1.v Rule 2019 statements are judicial records subject to public access. In several asbestos chapter 11 cases, the court ordered that Rule 2019 statement exhibits that listed plaintiff law firm clients be filed only with the clerk, under seal, and not placed on the electronic docket. An asbestos debtor in an unrelated chapter 11 case sought access to the exhibits for use in the proceeding in its case to determine aggregate asbestos liability. A Rule 2019 statement is a judicial record because it is filed with the court. Filing with the clerk is the same as filing with the court, as all judicial records are filed with the clerk. There is a presumptive right of public access to judicial records. A party opposing access has the burden of proof to show that disclosure will work a clearly defined and serious injury. Neither the availability of an alternative means of obtaining the information, nor the fact that the purpose for which the information is sought differs from the purpose for which it was filed with the court, nor the fact that the party seeking access is not a member of the press affects the application of any of these principles. Any member of the public who faces an obstacle to obtaining a judicial record has standing to challenge a protective order, and, for the same reason, has standing to appeal. Therefore, the other asbestos debtor may have access to the information. In re Motions for Access of Garlock Sealing Techs., 488 B.R. 281 (D. Del. 2013).
- 3.1.w Court rejects “no seal-no deal” request to seal settlement agreement. The trustee and the defendants settled an adversary proceeding. The settlement agreement provided that the defendants would proceed with the settlement only if the court authorized the settlement agreement and any related documents to be filed under seal. Section 107 provides that all papers filed in a bankruptcy case are open to public inspection, except that the court must protect a party with respect to a trade secret, confidential commercial information or scandalous or defamatory matter. Confidential commercial information is limited to information that would harm a party's competitive position. Material is scandalous only if it is grossly offensive, irrelevant and submitted for an improper purpose, unnecessarily reflects on moral character, is in repulsive language or detracts from the court's dignity and is irrelevant. Mere embarrassment is not sufficient. Material is defamatory only if it is untrue. Here, neither the complaint nor the settlement agreement met these high bars. Section 107 expresses Congress's policy of open access; no other public policy arguments take precedence over section 107, including the interest of the estate in securing a favorable settlement under a "no seal-no deal" provision in the agreement. Otherwise, such provisions would become self-fulfilling, without regard to section 107. Therefore, the court denies the motion to seal but leaves open the possibility of redaction of particular information that might meet one or more of the requirements of section 107(b). Togut v. Deutsche Bank AG, Cayman Islands Branch (In re Anthracite Capital, Inc.), 492 B.R. 162 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

- 3.1.x Fifth Circuit states standards for class certification under Rule 7023. A creditor filed a WARN Act class action adversary proceeding and a class proof of claim on behalf of 130 former employees, none of whom filed proofs of claim. The trustee objected to class certification in the adversary proceeding. Bankruptcy Rule 7023, which incorporates Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 23, establishes the requirements for class certification in an adversary proceeding. Rule 7023 applies in a claim objection proceeding, which is a contested matter, only if the bankruptcy court makes it applicable under Rule 9014. In a class claim, therefore, the bankruptcy court must make a preliminary determination, based on whether the class was certified prepetition, whether members of the class received notice of the bar date and whether class certification may adversely affect case administration, among other factors. But in applying Rule 7023 in an adversary proceeding, only the Rule 23 requirements apply, which are whether the class is too numerous to permit joinder of all members, there are common questions of law or fact, the representative's claims or defenses are typical of the class and the representative will fairly represent and protect the class's interests. In addition, the common questions must predominate over questions affecting only individual members, and the class action must be superior to other available methods. The numerosity determination is not based on numbers alone but on practical factors, such as geographical dispersion, ease of identifying members, the size of members' claims, and judicial economy. A court may consider the bankruptcy claims process as an alternative in considering whether the number of class members favors class certification. However, failure of class members to file proofs of claim is not relevant, because the filing of a class proof of claim suspends the bar date for class members, who may rely on the class claim until the court determines whether to certify a class. Whether a class action is a superior procedure is based in part on members' interests in controlling the prosecution of their own claims, the extent of pre-class action litigation, the desirability of concentrating the litigation and potential difficulties in managing a class action. A bankruptcy court may consider the simple bankruptcy claims process as the alternative as well as the costs to the estate of class certification, which could reduce recoveries for all creditors, including class members. But the court must also consider the nature of the claims and defenses, as they may affect whether the claimants will require attorneys and therefore incur cost. Here, the bankruptcy court did not adequately explain its reasons for denying class certification, so the court of appeals remands for findings consistent with the standards it states. Teta v. Chow (In re TWL Corp.), 712 F.3d 886 (5th Cir. 2013).
- 3.1.y Rule 9019 does not apply in a chapter 9 case. The municipal debtor settled a pending lawsuit and sought a court order that the settlement did not require court approval. Bankruptcy Rule 9019 provides, "On motion by the trustee ..., the court may approve a compromise or settlement." The Rule derives from pre-Code rules that expressly did not apply in municipal bankruptcy cases. The change in format in the rules under the Code did not change the prior inapplicability of Rule 9019 in a municipal bankruptcy case. In addition, section 904 prohibits the court from interfering with a municipal debtor's property. The power to approve a compromise includes a power to disapprove, which could interfere with the debtor's unfettered ability to use its property. Therefore, the court refuses to rule on the settlement. It notes, however, that the number and amount settlements that the debtor makes before confirmation might affect the court's consideration of whether a plan of adjustment is fair and equitable. In re City of Stockton, 486 B.R. 194 (Bankr. E.D. Calif. 2013).

- 3.1.z Section 341 meeting adjournment sine die concludes the meeting. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case on March 18, 2009. The case converted to chapter 7 on May 19, 2010. An interim chapter 7 trustee was appointed under section 701 on May 20, 2010. She commenced the section 341 meeting of creditors and adjourned it several times to September 23, 2010, when she adjourned it sine die. The court granted an extension of time to file a preference action on May 3, 2011; the last extension expired on March 20, 2012. The trustee commenced a preference action against the defendant on March 2, 2012. Section 546(a) permits an avoiding power action only within the later of two years after the order for relief or one year after the appointment or election of the first trustee under section 702 if the appointment occurs within the initial two-year period. An interim trustee becomes the permanent trustee under section 702 if no trustee is elected by the conclusion of the section 341 meeting. At the time, Rule 2003(e) provided that the “meeting may be adjourned from time to time by announcement at the meeting of the adjourned date and time.” A December 2011 amendment added the requirement that the trustee promptly file a written notice of the date and time of the adjourned meeting, to prevent an indefinite adjournment. Case law also prohibited an indefinite adjournment and provided two alternative tests for determining whether a meeting had been concluded: a bright line test and a case-by-case approach. The bright line test holds that a meeting is concluded if it is adjourned sine die. The case-by-case approach holds that the meeting is concluded if the delay’s length, the estate’s complexity, the debtor’s cooperativeness and the existence of any ambiguity over whether the trustee intended to continue or conclude the meeting are unreasonable. Under either test, the meeting was concluded on September 23, 2010, when the trustee adjourned it sine die, because the trustee did not provide a specific date or time for a continued meeting, and because the delay’s length and ambiguity were unreasonable. Therefore, the interim trustee became the permanent trustee under section 702 on September 23, 2010, and the commencement of the preference action on March 2, 2012 was timely. Rentas v. Puerto Rico Elec. & Power Auth. (In re PMC Marketing Corp.), 482 B.R. 74 (Bankr. D.P.R. 2012).
- 3.1.aa Rule 9006(a)’s time computation rules do not apply to an order that fixes an exact date. The court issued an order extending the time for filing an objection to discharge to April 30, 2011, which was a Saturday. The trustee filed the complaint the following Monday, May 2, 2011. Rule 9006(a)(1) governs time computation. It provides that when “a period is stated in days ... include the last day of the period, but if the last day is a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday, the period continues to run until the end of the next day that is not a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday.” Here, the order did not specify a “period stated in days” but fixed a specific date. Therefore, Rule 9006(a)(1) does not apply, and the complaint is untimely. Dillworth v. Obregon, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111832 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 9, 2012).
- 3.1.bb Fourth Circuit establishes procedures for class proofs of claim. Before bankruptcy, the debtor was subject to an uncertified class action on behalf of several hundred former employees for overtime pay. After bankruptcy and before the bar date, the putative class representatives filed a class proof of claim. After the trustee objected, the claimants filed a motion under Rule 9014 to make Rule 7023 (Class Actions) apply. Rule 3001(a) requires a creditor or the creditor’s authorized agent to file a proof of claim. In an ordinary class action, before class certification, the class representative is the class members’ putative agent. If the court certifies the class, the class representative’s agency relates back to the date of the filing of the action. Similarly, when a creditor files a class proof of claim, it acts as putative agent for class members, and a later certification of the class and designation of the representative will relate back to the claim filing date. Therefore, Rule 3001(a) does not prohibit a class proof of claim. The court may certify the class only under rule 7023, which, under Rule 9014, applies in a contested matter only if the court so orders. A proof of claim does not initiate a contested matter, but an objection to claim does. The claimant may move under Rule 9014 to apply Rule 7023 to the contested matter only once an objection is filed. If the court grants the Rule 9014 motion, then Rule 7023 procedures would apply, and the court would then have to determine whether to certify the class. If the court denies the Rule 9014 motion, the court should give class members who did not file a proof of claim a reasonable time to file, because the commencement of a class action, and therefore the filing of a class proof of claim, tolls the statute of limitations, and therefore the bar date, for filing a claim. In determining whether to grant the Rule 9014 motion, the bankruptcy court may consider both systemic concerns and specific facts. In general, the bankruptcy process permits all claims to be consolidated in a single forum, permits filing claims without counsel at almost no cost, provides established mechanisms for notice and for managing large numbers of claims, centralizes proceedings in one court and prevents a race to judgment by competing class members. By contrast, class action procedures are cumbersome and protracted. Therefore, systemic concerns may counsel against applying Rule 7023. In this case, because the class members numbered only in the hundreds (compared with 15,000 other proof of claims filed), requiring class members to file individual proofs of claim would not unduly complicate the claims resolution process. Therefore, the bankruptcy court properly denied the Rule 9014 motion to apply Rule 7023. Gentry v. Siegel, 668 F.3d 83 (4th Cir. 2012).

- 3.1.cc A retroactive change in the law can prevent effective notice of a claims bar date. A consumer purchased the debtor's product before the debtor filed its chapter 11 case. The product manifested a defect three years after plan confirmation. The debtor in possession mailed notices of the claims bar date, of the disclosure statement hearing and of the confirmation hearing to all known claimants and published the notices widely to reach unknown claimants. When the court confirmed the plan, the applicable law under In re M. Frenville & Co., 744 F.2d 332 (3d Cir. 1984), was that the consumer did not have a claim, because the product defect had not yet become manifest. In re Grossman's Inc., 607 F.3d 114 (3d Cir. 2010), overruled Frenville four years after plan confirmation in this case, stating the rule that a claim arises upon prepetition exposure to a product or upon conduct that gives rise to an injury, so the consumer's claim against the debtor would have been a cognizable claim in the chapter 11 case. To discharge a claim requires that the claimant be given due process, which includes adequate notice to permit the claimant to participate meaningfully in the bankruptcy case. Because of Frenville, the consumer did not have a cognizable claim during the chapter 11 case. So despite the broad notice, the consumer could not participate meaningfully in the case. Thus, where a claim arises from retroactive application of a change in the law, the claim is not discharged when the notice is given based on the understanding that the claimant does not have a claim. Wright v. Owens Corning, 679 F.3d 101 (3d Cir. 2012).
- 3.1.dd Due process may require the debtor to give notice of the nature of the creditor's claim. Law enforcement raids exposed the debtor's participation in an anti-trust conspiracy shortly after the debtor confirmed its plan. The creditor later brought an anti-trust action against the reorganized debtor, who pleaded the chapter 11 discharge as a defense. The debtor had given the creditor notice of the chapter 11 case but not of any possible anti-trust claims. A chapter 11 discharge operates on all claims that arise before plan confirmation. The Code defines "claim" broadly to include contingent, disputed and unliquidated claims. A claim arises when there is a relationship between the debtor and the creditor that allowed them to contemplate contingencies that might result in a claim. Here, the debtor and the creditor had a pre-confirmation relationship—the creditor was the debtor's customer—but not in a manner that allowed the creditor to contemplate the existence of a claim. Still, the creditor admitted that the discharge by its terms would apply to its claim. However, due process principles limit the discharge's scope. Due process requires reasonable notice of a proceeding in which a creditor's rights will be affected. Given chapter 11's broad discharge and fresh start policy, what is practicable and fairness to claimants affect what notice is reasonable. A debtor need not provide notice of the nature of the creditor's claim if the creditor knew or should have known of its claim once it has notice of the chapter 11 case or if the debtor is unable to discover through reasonably diligent effort the nature of the creditor's claims. Here, the debtor was aware of the alleged conspiracy, and the creditor could not have known of it, because it was secret. Therefore, the debtor did not give the creditor sufficient notice so as to bring the creditor's anti-trust claim within the discharge's scope. DPWN Holdings (USA), Inc. v. United Air Lines, Inc., 871 F. Supp. 2d 143 (E.D.N.Y. 2012), remanded on other grounds, 747 F.3d 145 (2d Cir. 2014).

- 3.1.ee The burden of proof of the extent of a secured claim under section 506(a) ultimately lies with the creditor. Section 506(a) allows a claim for which the creditor has collateral as a secured claim to the extent of the collateral's value and as unsecured for the balance. Under Rule 3001(f), a proof of claim is prima facie valid. To challenge a proof of claim, an objector must come forward with sufficient evidence to overcome its prima facie validity. Once the objector does so, the burden of persuasion then shifts to the creditor to establish the validity and amount of the claim. The same process applies in determining the amount of an allowed secured claim under section 506(a). Thus, where the creditors committee (on behalf of the estate) introduced an appraisal that showed the collateral's value was less than the amount of the first lien debt, the second lien creditor bore the burden of producing evidence that the property was worth more. Because it did not, the court properly found that the second lien creditor was wholly unsecured. In re Heritage Highgate, Inc., 679 F.3d 132 (3d Cir. 2012).
- 3.1.ff Court denies motion to seal settlement agreement as contrary to open access policy. The chapter 11 plan liquidating trust settled a claim that the debtor had against a customer. The settlement agreement required that it be filed with the bankruptcy court under seal. There is a strong federal public policy favoring public access to court records, even more so when one of the parties is acting as a fiduciary. Section 107 implements that policy in a bankruptcy case. Ordinarily, a civil action settlement is a private matter. But where a bankruptcy estate (or its successor) is a party and requires court approval of the settlement, the open access public policy applies. Settlements are not entitled to any greater protection against disclosure than any other court-filed information. Because the parties did not present any reason sufficient to overcome the open access policy, the court denies the motion to seal. In re Oldco M Corp., 466 B.R. 234 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).
- 3.1.gg Information in a document is scandalous if it is disgraceful, offensive or shameful or brings discredit. Claimants in a case involving child sexual abuse sought public disclosure of a report filed under seal in the bankruptcy court that included the identity of two alleged perpetrators who were not parties to the case or any claim or adversary proceeding in the case. Section 107(a) provides for public access to all documents filed in a bankruptcy case, subject only section 107(b)'s exceptions. Section 107(b) requires a court, on request of a party in interest, to "protect a person with respect to scandalous or defamatory matter contained in a" filed document. Section 107 completely displaces the common law rule requiring public access to court proceedings and files, because it addresses the same question as the common law rule in a manner that differs from the common law rule. Therefore, common law precedents are of no assistance in interpreting section 107, and courts must interpret "scandalous" according to its ordinary meaning. Dictionaries define "scandalous" as "bringing discredit" and as "offensive to a sense of decency or shocking to the moral feelings of the community; shameful". Disclosure of information about alleged child sexual abuse, whether or not true and whether or not filed with the court for a purpose unrelated to the litigation, would bring discredit on the individuals. It is therefore scandalous and should not be made public. Father M v. Various Tort Claimants (In re Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Portland In Oregon), 661 F.3d 417 (9th Cir. 2011).
- 3.1.hh U.S. Trustee may conduct examination related to a proof of claim, but only of matters arising in the case. The bank filed a proof of claim secured by a mortgage, without copies of the promissory note or mortgage, claiming the documents had been lost. In response to a motion from the U.S. Trustee, the bank amended its proof of claim to attach copies of the note and the mortgage and to reduce the amount owing by about 15%. The U.S. Trustee then sought an examination of the bank under Rule 2004 about matters related to the proof of claim, the previously lost documents and the bank's policies and procedures addressing preparation and filing of proofs of claim and lost documents. Rule 2004 permits the court to order an examination on "motion of any party in interest". The Code is ambiguous on whether the U.S. Trustee is a "party in interest". Section 307 provides that the U.S. Trustee "may raise and may appear and be heard on any issues in any case or proceeding" under the Code. This broad language provides the U.S. Trustee standing to request an examination under Rule 2004. In addition, the U.S. Trustee is a party in interest for purposes of protecting bankruptcy rules and procedures, for which the U.S. Trustee is the Congressionally appointed watchdog, and to prevent abuse of the bankruptcy law. However, a Rule 2004 examination may relate only to the particular case and to the debtor-creditor relationship. It does not permit a nationwide examination into a creditor's policies and procedures, and it may not be used as a regulatory tool. Therefore, the U.S. Trustee may take the examination, but only concerning matters relating to this case. Bank of America, N.A. v. Landis, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140868 (D. Nev. Dec. 7, 2011).

- 3.1.ii Court may approve settlement that pays the debtor's bankruptcy attorney from non-estate funds. The real property on which the debtor operated its business was titled in the name of one of the debtor's principals, who were in the middle of a divorce during the bankruptcy. To settle disputes about the ownership of the property and its division in the divorce, the trustee and the principals agreed that the estate would receive 50% of the property's sale proceeds, each principal would receive 25% and the two principals would pay debtor's bankruptcy attorney a portion of their shares. An unpaid administrative creditor objected to the settlement as violating the Code priority scheme. The payment to the debtor's bankruptcy attorney came only from the principals' shares, not from the bankruptcy estate, and so did not implicate the distribution of property of the estate. Disapproval of the settlement would not necessarily bring the portion that was to be paid to the attorney into the estate. Therefore, the priority scheme does not apply, and the bankruptcy court properly approved the settlement. In re Holly Marine Towing, Inc., 669 F.3d 796 (7th Cir. 2011).
- 3.1.jj Only a note's holder or one entitled to enforce it has standing to seek stay relief or file a proof of claim. The debtors issued a note secured by a mortgage. The holder negotiated the note and assigned the mortgage. The new holder assigned the mortgage but not the note. The new mortgagee appointed a servicing agent for the note and mortgage, and the debtors made payments to the agent. When the debtors filed chapter 13, they scheduled the servicer as a secured creditor holding an undisputed secured claim. The mortgagee sought stay relief to foreclose, and the servicer filed a proof of secured claim as agent for the mortgagee. A party seeking stay relief or claim allowance on a negotiable instrument such as a note must have both constitutional and prudential standing to do so and, under Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 17, must be the real party in interest. The party may meet the requirements by showing that it is the holder of the note or the party entitled to enforce it. Under U.C.C. Article 3, a person may become a holder by negotiation of the note or by a transfer, which requires delivery for the purpose of giving the transferee the right to enforce the note. Standing to seek stay relief requires only a colorable claim to the underlying obligation, because a stay relief proceeding does not determine rights in the obligation. Here, the mortgagee could not show such a colorable claim. The transfer of a mortgage without the transfer of the underlying note that it secures does not give the mortgagee any rights in the note either as a holder or as a transferee entitled to enforce the note. Therefore, the mortgagee did not have standing to seek stay relief. A party may file a proof of claim only if the party is the holder of the claim or its agent. A proof of claim is prima facie evidence of its validity under Rule 3001(f) only if the claim is executed by the creditor or its authorized agent as required by Rule 3001(b). The debtor's sworn schedules are evidence but not conclusive evidence of the status or right of a listed creditor. In this case, the servicer was the authorized agent of the mortgagee, but the mortgagee was not a creditor, and the debtor's schedules, because they were susceptible to several interpretations, did not change the analysis. Therefore, the servicer did not adequately show that it had standing to file the proof of claim. Veal v. Am. Home Mortgage Serv., Inc. (In re Veal), 449 B.R. 542 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

3.1.kk Court denies motion to seal transcript that reveals settlement amount for stay violation.

The debtor's telephone and internet service provider violated the stay by multiple disconnect notices, despite having received notice of the petition and contact from the debtor's counsel. The debtor moved for sanctions. The debtor and the service provider settled for a payment to the debtor and the debtor's attorney, and the debtor voluntarily dismissed the motion under Rule 41 (incorporated by Rule 9014) without disclosing the settlement amount. The debtor's attorney filed an amended statement of compensation, which also did not include the amount. The court scheduled a hearing on approval of the settlement, at which it insisted upon disclosure of the amount. Upon disclosure, the court concluded that it required no further proceedings and permitted the dismissal to take effect. The court reporter prepared and filed a transcript of the hearing. The service provider moved to redact the settlement amount from the transcript. Section 107 requires that all papers filed in a bankruptcy case be public and open to inspection, with limited exceptions for trade secrets or confidential research, development or commercial information, for scandalous or defamatory information and for information that would create an undue risk of identity theft. None of these exceptions apply to the settlement amount. The court may redact information from the record, however, for cause under Rule 9037(d). In addressing a redaction request, the court must consider a bankruptcy case's multi-party nature and other bankruptcy policies, such as the rules requiring disclosure of the debtor's attorney's compensation and court approval of a settlement and the importance of the automatic stay. Where, as here, the violation was not idiosyncratic but was repeated despite several notices and a sanctions motion, confidentiality of sanctions (or settlement) for the violation is inconsistent with the court's responsibility to maintain the bankruptcy system's integrity. Therefore, the court denies the motion to redact the settlement amount. In re Blake, 452 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2011).

3.1.ll Proceeding to enforce discharge injunction must be brought by motion as a contested matter.

The debtor claimed that a creditor had violated the discharge injunction. He filed a complaint initiating an adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy court to impose sanctions for the violation. Rule 7001 lists the kinds of relief that require an adversary proceeding and includes a request for injunctive relief. Other two-party disputes are contested matters that must be initiated by motion under Rule 9014. Rule 9020 requires that a request for an order holding a party in contempt is a contested matter that must be initiated by motion. The list in Rule 7001 is exclusive, even though a court may order that some or all of the adversary proceeding rules apply in a particular contested matter. A proceeding to enforce, and for sanctions for violating, the discharge injunction does not seek a new injunction but only a contempt remedy for violation of an existing order and must be brought as a contested matter under Rule 9014, not as an adversary proceeding. The court therefore dismisses the complaint. Barrientos v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 633 F.3d 1186 (9th Cir. 2011).

3.1.mm Settlement's reasonableness depends on evaluation of each claim settled.

The debtor in possession negotiated a complex settlement with several adverse parties of several different claims that the debtor had against the other parties and that they had against the estate. In determining whether the settlement is reasonable, the court must evaluate each part of the settlement by evaluating each claim that is being settled to determine whether the settlement as a whole is reasonable. The settlement's reasonableness, however, is not simply based on the sum of parts. The court may consider the benefits to be gained by a global settlement. In doing so, the debtor in possession need not present legal expert testimony nor even the testimony of the debtor in possession's officers about the legal advice they received. Rather, the debtor in possession must present the facts underlying the disputes and the legal arguments that each side has advanced, and the court may then evaluate that information in determining whether the settlement is reasonable. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 442 B.R. 314 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

- 3.1.nn Community of interest privilege protects plan co-proponents. In a heavily disputed case, the court ordered mediation among twelve parties. The mediation resulted in a proposed settlement among three of the major parties—the debtor, the prepetition secured lenders and the unsecured creditors committee (“DCL”)—but not among all parties. The agreeing DCL parties proposed a plan; the others objected and commenced discovery against the DCL parties. Parties may assert a community of interest (common interest) privilege to protect their communication the same as they may protect an attorney-client communication, if “(1) the communication was made by separate parties in the court on a matter of common interest, (2) the communication was designed to further that effort, and (3) the privilege was not otherwise waived”. The DCL parties’ common interest in achieving a settlement through confirmation of their plan satisfies the common interest standard, even though the parties’ interests were adverse and would return to being so if the plan were not confirmed. The common interest begins once the parties reach agreement in principle on the material terms of the plan. In re Tribune Co., 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 299 (Bankr. D. Del. Feb. 3, 2011).
- 3.1.oo Creditor did not fail to participate in mediation in good faith; court denies sanctions. The court ordered mediation of a dispute. Disputes arose over the scope of the mediation (that is, whether it would extend beyond the matters in dispute); one party’s representative’s settlement authority (it was limited to the amount in dispute); and that party’s active participation in the mediation, including its inadequate risk analysis (whether the party refused to offer to pay anything because it was being obstinate or because it believed it had no risk). The bankruptcy court imposed sanctions on the party for refusal to participate in mediation in good faith. Mediation is by its nature voluntary and must be entirely confidential. A court may not coerce a party into settling. Requiring good faith participation may amount to coercion. Investigating the nature of a party’s participation may breach confidentiality. Thus, the party may properly refuse to make an offer, and the court may not require a party to show that it engaged in risk analysis. In addition, a party’s representative need have settlement authority only to the extent of the amount in dispute. It would be unduly burdensome to require broader authority or authority to approve creative solutions that may be developed at the mediation, because there is no way to predict what might arise beyond the scope of the dispute. In re A.T. Reynolds & Sons, Inc., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28163 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 18, 2011).
- 3.1.pp Settlement between debtor and insurer may not bind additional insureds. The debtor and vendors of its products were defendants in numerous personal injury actions. The debtor’s general liability insurance policy insured the vendors as well as the debtor and was a “non-eroding” policy, that is, defense costs did not reduce policy limits. The debtor in possession commenced an adversary proceeding for a stay of all actions against the debtor, the vendors and the insurer, which the court granted, and for a determination that all policy proceeds were property of the estate. The debtor in possession and the insurer then reached a settlement that provided that the insurer pay policy limits to the estate for the sole benefit of the personal injury claimants and excluded their use for payment of administrative expenses and that any plan must contain provisions that are not inconsistent with the settlement. The settlement excluded the vendors’ claims against the policy proceeds that the estate obtained and enjoined the claimants and the vendors from bringing any actions against the insurer. A settlement must be fair and equitable and in the best interest of the estate. By depriving the vendors of their independent direct claims against the insurer without providing for their sharing in the insurance fund, the settlement was not fair and equitable to them as creditors. In addition, the bankruptcy court may not, under the guise of a settlement, affect a third party’s claims against a non-debtor. The settlement also was not in the best interest of the estate. By allocating the settlement proceeds to a single creditor class and preventing them from being used to pay administrative expenses, the settlement did not benefit the estate as a whole. It also may have increased the burden on the estate by imposing the costs of administering the settlement fund on the estate’s general assets, which would reduce the amount available for other creditors. Finally, the fact that the settlement was made in the context of an adversary proceeding did not save it, because a settlement between some parties to an adversary proceeding cannot bind non-settling parties without their consent. Therefore, the settlement may not be approved. Overton's, Inc. v. Interstate Fire & Cas. Ins. Co. (In re SportStuff, Inc.), 430 B.R. 170 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2010).

- 3.1.qq Court sanctions creditor for failure to participate in mediation in good faith. The court ordered mediation of a dispute. The creditor attended with representatives whose authority to settle was questionable and who did not engage in negotiations. Instead, it argued its legal position, refused discussion of any risk to its position and repeated a “mantra” that it was not open to any compromise that “would involve taking a single dollar out of their pocket”. Mediation requires active work from each of the parties with the presence of a representative who has settlement authority. Telephone access is not adequate, because the participation in the process affects parties’ understanding of their risks and willingness to settle. A court may not force a party to settle, and a party unwilling to compromise does not necessarily act in bad faith. However, failure to engage and participate with a representative with adequate authority is not good faith and warrants sanctions. In re A.T. Reynolds & Sons, Inc., 424 B.R. 76 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 3.1.rr Confirmation order that lacks statutory authority is not void or subject to collateral attack. The debtor proposed a chapter 13 plan that provided for payment in full of only the principal amount of his student loan debt and discharge of any interest or other amounts. The clerk gave notice of the plan to the creditor, who filed a proof of claim for principal and accrued interest. Although section 523(a)(8) permits discharge of a student loan only if the court determines that payment would constitute an undue hardship, Bankruptcy Rule 7001(6) requires such a determination be made in an adversary proceeding and section 1325(a)(1) requires the bankruptcy court to find as a condition to confirmation that the plan complies with the applicable provisions of title 11, the court confirmed the plan. The debtor performed and, at the end of the plan period, received a discharge. Later, the creditor moved under Rule 60(b)(4) (made applicable by Bankruptcy Rule 9024) to set aside the confirmation order. The confirmation order was a final judgment. Rule 60(b)(4) permits the court to set aside a final judgment if the judgment is “void”. A judgment is void only if it is affected by a fundamental infirmity such as absence of even an arguable basis for jurisdiction or a due process violation. The creditor did not argue the bankruptcy court lacked jurisdiction to confirm the plan. Even though the creditor did not receive a summons and complaint as it would have in an adversary proceeding, the creditor received actual notice of the plan and the confirmation hearing. Due process does not require any particular form of notice, so confirmation did not violate due process requirements, and the creditor could not ignore the notice. Legal error or even lack of statutory authority, as here, is not sufficient to render a judgment void and subject to Rule 60(b)(4) attack. United Student Aid Funds, Inc. v. Espinosa, 559 U.S. 260, 130 S. Ct. 1367, 176 L. Ed. 2d 158 (2010)
- 3.1.ss Rule 2019 does not apply to an ad hoc committee in a chapter 11 case. In a chapter 11 case, there was one official committee of unsecured creditors, one self-formed ad hoc committee of holders of over 90% of the more senior bonds and another self-formed ad hoc committee of holders of over 65% of junior bonds. The debtor proposed a plan, which all three committees opposed. The debtor proposed a revised plan based on negotiations with the ad hoc senior bond committee, which the other two committees opposed. The official committee then moved to compel the ad hoc senior bond holder committee (but not the ad hoc junior bond committee that agreed with the official committee’s position on the plan) to comply with Rule 2019. Rule 2019 requires “every entity or committee representing more than one creditor” to file certain disclosures with the bankruptcy court. The Rule does not define “committee”. However, the plain meaning of “committee”, based on dictionary references, is a body appointed by others, by consent, contract or applicable law, for a particular function. Therefore, a self-appointed group is not a “committee” within the meaning of Rule 2019. The court also thoroughly reviews the history of Rule 2019, reaching back to committee practices in equity receiverships, the Chandler Act reforms enacting Chapter X and the Bankruptcy Act's Rules implementing it through Rule 10-211 to conclude that the abuses by committees that Chapter X and Rule 10-211 were intended to eliminate are not possible under chapter 11 and the Code, so that the Rule should not properly be read to apply to a self-appointed ad hoc committee in a chapter 11 case. In re Premier Int'l Holdings, Inc., 423 B.R. 58 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).

- 3.1.tt Rule 2019 does not apply to a bank lenders' steering group. The debtor moved to require a steering group (which had previously referred to itself in the case as a "steering committee") to comply with Rule 2019's disclosure requirements. Rule 2019 requires "every entity or committee representing more than one creditor" to disclose its members and certain information about their holdings. "Entity", as defined in the Bankruptcy Code, does not include a group such as the steering group, and as defined in Black's Law Dictionary, means an organization that has a legal identity apart from its members or owners. "Committee", as defined in Black's, means a subordinate group to which a group refers business for consideration, investigation, oversight or action. The steering group meets neither of these definitions, because it is not an organization independent of its members, and it has not been appointed by any larger body. "Represent" means to act on behalf of another, as an agent. The steering group members act only for themselves and therefore do not represent any other creditors. Therefore, Rule 2019 does not apply to the steering group. In re Phila. Newspapers, LLC, 422 B.R. 553 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2010).
- 3.1.uu Rule 2019 applies to an ad hoc noteholders group, who may owe fiduciary duties to other noteholders. A group of 23 noteholders appeared in a chapter 11 case through one counsel. They did not claim to be an informal committee. They asserted no authority to bind other members of the group and did not purport to speak on behalf of their class of noteholders or anyone other than themselves. They were not bound to remain in the group nor to abide by majority rule. Their counsel could assert positions in the case only on behalf of the individual group members who agreed, although typically the group reached unanimous agreement on each issue. Rule 2019 requires that "every entity or committee representing more than one creditor or equity security holder" must file a statement with the court setting forth information about the claims or interests that its members hold. The loose affiliation of creditors of this group is reflective of an ad hoc committee, and counsel has represented the group as a whole, rather than individual members, in all proceedings in the case. The group is an "entity" under section 101(15) and represents the members. Therefore, Rule 2019 applies to the group. Even though the group does not purport to speak on behalf of noteholders generally, the group is deemed to do so, because it attempts to use its size to wield greater influence than each individual member could wield on its own. In general, members of a class may owe fiduciary duties to other class members in certain circumstances when pressing issues affect the entire class. Therefore, the group here owes fiduciary duties to noteholders. The court does not define the extent of such fiduciary duties, but recognizes "that collective action by creditors in a class implies some obligations to other members of that class." In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 419 B.R. 271 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).
- 3.1.vv Court denies class proof of claim for the debtor's employees and former employees. Before bankruptcy, an employee sued the debtor in a class action for violation of various labor laws. The court had not yet considered class certification. After bankruptcy, the plaintiff filed a class proof of claim. Although a claimant may file a class proof of claim, there is no absolute right to proceed on a class basis. Proceeding with a class claim must be consistent with the goals of bankruptcy, which generally require either that the class has been certified before bankruptcy or there has been no actual or constructive notice to the putative class members. Here, the class had not been certified before bankruptcy, and the debtor in possession had given notice to all current employees and all former employees whose employment had been terminated within five years before bankruptcy. In addition, class certification adds complexity and expense to case administration. Therefore, the court does not permit the plaintiff to proceed with the class proof of claim. In re Bally Total Fitness of Greater N. Y., 402 B.R. 616 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

- 3.1.ww WARN Act claims for prepetition termination are not entitled to class action treatment. The debtor terminated employees five days before bankruptcy without providing WARN Act's 60-day notice. The employees asserted WARN Act damages for 60 days' pay, which would have run 55 days into the postpetition period, by a class action adversary proceeding. In addition, 5,300 of the 5,500 class members filed individual proofs of claim. The bankruptcy court has inherent power to control its own proceedings and broad discretion whether to permit a class action to proceed. The bankruptcy court may dismiss an adversary proceeding if it duplicates the ordinary claims allowance process and the ordinary process is adequate to handle the claims. Here, the filing of proofs of claims by nearly all class members made the ordinary claims allowance process fully capable of handling the claims. Therefore, the bankruptcy court properly dismissed the class action. Binford v. First Magnus Fin. Corp. (In re First Magnus Fin. Corp.), 403 B.R. 659 (D. Ariz. 2008).
- 3.1.xx Committee may settle objection to sale for payment solely for the benefit of unsecured creditors. The debtor in possession proposed to auction assets based on a stalking horse bid agreement. The day before the auction, the bidder discovered a defect in the assets to be sold and withdrew its bid. The debtor proceeded with the auction, which the stalking horse bidder won for an amount slightly less than its original bid. The unsecured creditors committee threatened to object to approval. The bidder agreed to settle with the committee by funding a trust for the sole benefit of unsecured creditors; in exchange the committee agreed, subject to court approval of the settlement, not to pursue its objection or attempt to impede the sale. Rule 9019 authorizes the court to approve a trustee's or debtor in possession's settlement. However, it is not limited. Therefore, the committee has standing to seek settlement approval. The absolute priority rule requires, in both chapter 7 and chapter 11 cases, that property of the estate be distributed according to statutory priorities, unless a consensual chapter 11 plan provides otherwise. However, a third party may contribute funds that are not property of the estate for the benefit of a selected group of creditors. Here, there was no evidence that the funds the bidder would contribute would have otherwise gone to the estate. Therefore, the settlement did not violate the absolute priority rule. The committee does not breach its fiduciary duty by negotiating a settlement that benefits only unsecured creditors. It owes its duty to the group it represents, the unsecured creditors, not to the estate as a whole. In re TSIC, Inc., 393 B.R. 71 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).
- 3.1.yy Service by certified mail does not satisfy Rule 7004(b)(9)'s first class mail requirement. The bank served a summons and complaint on the debtor by certified mail, return receipt requested. The Postal Service returned the mail to the bank as undeliverable, because the debtor did not pick up and sign for the envelope. The bank sought entry of a default judgment. Rule 7004(b)(9) requires service by first class mail. The Postal Service delivers first class mail to the addressee's location, and first class mail does not require any additional action by the addressee for delivery. By contrast, certified mail requires the addressee to sign or, if not at the address when the mail is first delivered, to fetch the mail from the post office within a specified time. This additional required action differentiates certified mail, return receipt requested from first class mail and therefore does not comply with Rule 7004(b)(9)'s requirement. As a result, the court denies the motion for entry of a default judgment. GE Money Bank v. Frazier (In re Frazier), 394 B.R. 399 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2008).
- 3.1.zz News media do not have a right of access to a Rule 2004 examination. The trustee obtained authorization to conduct a Rule 2004 examination of the debtor. News organization representatives moved to intervene in the bankruptcy case and for access to the examination transcript. Limited intervention is appropriate to permit challenge to a protective order, so the court permits limited intervention here. There is a common law presumption that all court proceedings are public. Proceedings under Bankruptcy Act section 21a, the predecessor to Rule 2004, were part of the bankruptcy proceeding, were held before the referee and therefore were open to the public. However, the Bankruptcy Code changed the court's role, and current Rule 2004 is only a vehicle to assist in the estate's administration, not a court proceeding. Moreover, to the extent Rule 2004 is discovery, there is no right of access to materials not filed with the court. Therefore, the court denies access. In re Thow, 392 B.R. 860 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 2007).

- 3.1.aaa A party may not withdraw from a settlement agreement pending bankruptcy court approval. The trustee settled with one of several parties in litigation and sought court approval of the settlement under Rule 9019. Before the settlement approval hearing, a guardian was appointed for the settling party. The guardian objected to the settlement and sought rescission. A settlement is a binding contract, subject to the condition precedent of court approval. Thus, a party may not rescind or repudiate the contract while awaiting fulfillment of the condition. If a party could unilaterally withdraw, it could game the system, for example, by settling to obtain a stay of litigation, and withdrawing later when it was ready to proceed. Therefore, the guardian could not rescind the settlement. Musselman v. Stanonik (In re Seminole Walls & Ceilings Corp.), 388 B.R. 386 (M.D. Fla. 2008).
- 3.1.bbb Creditor's investors do not have standing to challenge the estate's settlement with the creditor. The Committee, on behalf of the estate, brought a preference action against a creditor, which was an investment fund. The litigation settled. The Committee sought court approval under Rule 9019. Fund investors objected, arguing that the fund acted improperly in agreeing to settle. The investors are not parties in interest in this chapter 11 case that have standing to object to the settlement. Although the concept of "party in interest" in section 1109(b) is broad, it applies only to the entity with a direct interest in or against the estate, not to another who may be affected by the bankruptcy proceedings. The entity with the direct interest may assert its rights directly; another may not assert them on its behalf as a party in interest. Here, the investors' interest is not sufficiently direct to permit them to appear and be heard. In addition, although the bankruptcy court must determine that a settlement is fair and equitable, the court's obligation is to the estate. Any concerns that the investors had about the fund's improper action in settling is for a different forum, in an action between the investors and the fund or its managers, not as part of a settlement approval. Krys v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re Refco, Inc.), 505 F.3d 109 (2d Cir. 2007).
- 3.1.ccc "Case under title 11" does not include proceedings. The debtor filed the chapter 11 case in 1986. A creditor brought a malpractice action against the estate's accountants in state court in 2004, many years after the case was closed. The accountants removed the action to the bankruptcy court, and the creditors sought abstention. Congress adopted the statute governing the courts of appeals' jurisdiction over decisions not to abstain in 1984 and amended it in 1990, 1994, and 2005. The 1994 amendment provided that it "shall not apply with respect to cases commenced under title 11 ... before the date of enactment of this Act." "[C]ases under Title 11 ... refers merely to the bankruptcy petition itself, as opposed to proceeding[s], which refers to the steps within the case and to any subaction within the case that may raise a disputed or litigated matter." (internal quotation marks omitted). A court must apply the law in effect at the time of decision, unless the statute's effective date provision dictates otherwise. Therefore, the jurisdictional statute, as amended through 2005, applies to this appeal. Geruschat v. Ernst Young LLP (In re Seven Fields Dev. Corp.), 505 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2007).
- 3.1.ddd Rule 6003 does not prohibit interim employment of counsel. The debtor LLC sought immediate interim approval under section 327 of its employment of counsel, without whom it could not present its first day motions to the court. Rule 6003 prohibits certain orders in a case, including an order approving employment of counsel, without 20 days' notice to parties in interest.

It does not, however, prevent interim approval if necessary to prevent irreparable harm to the estate. Interim approval is preferable to retroactive approval (or retroactive interim approval following the court's decision that counsel should not be approved but should be compensated for the work performed until disapproval). Lack of counsel in the first 20 days of the case could result in irreparable harm to the debtor in possession, so the court approves counsel's employment on an interim basis only. In re First NLC Fin. Servs., LLC, 382 B.R. 547 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2008).

- 3.1.eee Local Rule requiring automatic reference withdrawal for a jury trial demand is invalid. The Local Bankruptcy Rule provides that if the bankruptcy court determines that a party has made a valid jury trial demand, the bankruptcy court must certify to the district court that the matter is to be tried before a jury, and, upon the certification, the "reference of the proceeding shall be automatically withdrawn." By contrast, section 157(d) permits the district court to withdraw the reference, "on its own motion or on timely motion of any party, for cause shown." Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 5011(a) requires that a "motion for withdrawal of a case of proceeding shall be heard by a district judge". The Local Rule is invalid, because it permits the bankruptcy judge, rather than the district court, to make the withdrawal decision, on a motion for certification, rather than on a motion for withdrawal. Sigma Micro Corp. v. Healthcentral.com (In re Healthcentral.com), 504 F.3d 775 (9th Cir. 2007).
- 3.1.fff Debtor seeking to enjoin litigation against non-debtor must meet traditional four-part injunction test. A creditor sued the debtor and the debtor's CEO and sole shareholder before bankruptcy over management control and patent rights. The debtor and the principal both filed bankruptcy, but the principal's case was soon dismissed, and the principal resigned as the debtor's CEO. The creditor resumed the litigation against the principal after his bankruptcy case's dismissal. The debtor sought a TRO and preliminary injunction from its bankruptcy court against continuation of the litigation on the grounds that the principal might argue in the litigation that he acted as the debtor's agent, thereby creating the possibility of debtor liability, would reveal the substance of attorney-client privileged communications with the attorney who previously represented both the debtor and the principal, and would assert indemnification claims against the debtor for any liability to the creditor. The bankruptcy court issued a preliminary injunction under section 105(a) staying the litigation until plan confirmation, on the grounds that the litigation "could conceivably have [an] effect on the administration of the bankruptcy estate" and that the debtor showed a reasonable probability of negative effect on the estate. The injunction was improper. The standard the bankruptcy court used is the standard to determine "related to" jurisdiction, not to determine whether to grant an injunction. Section 105(a) incorporates traditional injunctive powers of a court of equity, which incorporates the traditional four-part injunction standards. Therefore, a section 105 injunction protecting a non-debtor may be granted only on a finding of strong likelihood of success on the merits, possibility of irreparable injury, balance of hardships in favor of the plaintiff, and advancement of the public interest. Under In re Crown Vantage, 421 F.3d 963 (9th Cir. 2005), plaintiff need not show irreparable injury when seeking an injunction to enforce an express statutory or common law right, such as the automatic stay, where success on the merits is certain, but must meet this test in seeking to enjoin an action against a non-debtor. "Success on the merits" does not require a finding that the action to be stayed would likely violate the automatic stay, but only that the debtor has a reasonable likelihood of a successful reorganization. Here, the evidence did not support a finding of success on the merits, nor of irreparable injury, because, among other things, the litigation against the principal would not bind the debtor in the bankruptcy court. Solidus Networks, Inc. v. Excel Innovations, Inc. (In re Excel Innovations, Inc.), 502 F.3d 1086 (9th Cir. 2007).
- 3.1.ggg Court may not approve settlement that releases third party claims against settling defendants. The trustee for a debtor law firm reached a settlement among several bank creditors and settling former partners, which provided for a release of all claims against the settling parties by any person "based upon any fact, circumstances, or occurrence relating to" the firm, the bankruptcy estate or any related proceeding. The bankruptcy court addresses whether to approve the settlement by evaluating its subject matter jurisdiction to bar such claims against third parties, rather than any limits on its statutory power. “Related to” jurisdiction encompasses only matters that could conceivably have an effect on the estate or its assets or claims and reaches to disputes between third parties only when the outcome could have an effect on the estate. The bankruptcy court does not obtain “related to” jurisdiction based solely on the presence of facts in the third party dispute that are in common with facts in a dispute with the debtor or the estate. Facilitating overall resolution of the bankruptcy case also does not confer such jurisdiction. Therefore, the court denies approval. In re Arter & Hadden, LLP, 373 B.R. 31 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007).

- 3.1.hhh Third party release as part of a settlement requires an adversary proceeding. A chapter 11 trustee settled claims against two individuals. The trustee sought a bar order, enjoining “all persons” from pursuing the two individuals, whom the trustee had released, on contribution or indemnification claims arising out of or related to the claims that the trustee could have asserted against them. Such an injunction may not be granted except by an adversary proceeding under Bankruptcy Rule 7001(7). Without one, it “would not be worth the paper it is written on, except to use in an attempt to frighten off entities that might pursue claims for contribution and indemnification, and I will not assist the parties in obtaining a Bar Order, utterly devoid of legal authority, to utilize for that improper purpose.” In addition, subject matter jurisdiction is doubtful, absent the trustee’s showing that the injunction against claims against the third parties would have an effect on the estate. In re Stratesec, Inc., 375 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2007).
- 3.1.iii Minute entries are sufficient as orders to extend the time to assume a lease. The debtor in possession filed a motion for an order extending the time to assume a lease of nonresidential real property. After the hearing on the motion, the docket reflected a “Minute-Entry” stating “TIME TO ASSUME OR REJECT LEASE EXTENDED TO 1/27/06” and granted additional extensions through similar docket entries without any formal written order. The docket entries are sufficient to extend the time to assume or reject; a separate “bridge order” is not required. Vermont P’ners, Ltd. v. Thaler (In re Poseidon Pool & Spa Recreational, Inc.), 377 B.R. 52 (E.D.N.Y. 2007).
- 3.1.jjj Court may approve a settlement between the estate and a revenue bond indenture trustee. The debtor leased airport facilities from a municipality, which had issued nonrecourse revenue bonds through an indenture trustee, secured only by the rent due under the lease. Upon bankruptcy, the debtor in possession moved for approval to reject the lease. The DIP, the municipality, and the indenture trustee (with the participation of holders of 60% of the bonds) negotiated a settlement of the lease rejection and resulting claim issues that provided for a new lease at a substantially reduced amount, allowance of an unsecured claim, and a release of all the debtor’s obligations under the old lease, among other things. As a result, the bondholders would recover substantially less on their nonrecourse bond claims against the municipality than if the debtor had fully performed the lease. Some bondholders objected to the court’s approval of the settlement, arguing that the bankruptcy court could not bind them to a reduction in the amount of their bond claims because the municipality was not a Bankruptcy Code debtor. The bankruptcy court may, however, authorize the DIP to reject the lease, which would have resulted in an even greater reduction in bondholder recoveries, and the court therefore has authority to approve this settlement and bind not only the estate but also the municipality, its indenture trustee, and the bondholders. Subject matter jurisdiction exists under section 1334(b) because the proceeding is related to the DIP’s rejection right and the municipality’s resulting claim. The Trust Indenture Act does not prevent adjustment of the amounts owing under the bonds because the TIA is subject to the Bankruptcy Code. In re Delta Airlines, Inc., 370 B.R. 537 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).
- 3.1.kkk Court dismisses claim against the debtor asserted as a counterclaim to a preference action. The trustee sued a creditor to recover a preference. The creditor counterclaimed, asserting the prepetition claims against the debtor. Fed. R. Civ. P. 13 permits a defendant to assert counterclaims against an “opposing party”. Here, the plaintiff was the trustee, in his capacity as representative of the estate; the creditor’s claim was against the debtor, not the trustee either individually or in his representative capacity. Therefore, the trustee is not an “opposing party”, and the counterclaim is dismissed. Metcalfe v. Golden (In re Adbox, Inc.), 488 F.3d 836 (9th Cir. 2007).

3.1.iii Absolute priority rule governs preplan settlements, absent clear justification for departure.

Rule 9019, as interpreted by Protective Cmte. for Indep. Shareholders of TMT Trailer Ferry, Inc. v. Anderson, 390 U.S. 414 (1968), requires that a preplan settlement be “fair and equitable.” This requirement incorporates the absolute priority rule. However, before plan confirmation, legal rights may be uncertain, because of disputes and litigation, making precise application of the absolute priority rule difficult. The court may therefore depart from the rule if there is specific justification for departure, so long as the parties have not used the settlement to avoid the rule. Here, a settlement between the estate and the secured lenders provided for recognition of the validity of the lenders’ liens in exchange for the lenders’ allowing a portion of their collateral to be used to fund a litigation vehicle. Although any litigation proceeds were to accrue to the estate, to pay all claims in their order of priority, any unused portion of the funds were to be paid to general unsecured creditors, skipping administrative claimants. The appeals court remands the case to the bankruptcy court to determine whether there is a reasonable justification for deviation from the absolute priority rule in distribution of the excess funds. Motorola, Inc. v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re Iridium Operating LLC), 478 F.3d 452 (2d Cir. 2007).

3.1.mmm Secured lenders may not “gift” assets to junior classes in settlement of a dispute over the validity of a secured claim.

The creditors’ committee objected to the validity of the secured lenders’ liens. In settlement, the secured lender agreed to direct a portion of their disputed collateral to unsecured creditors, skipping over priority claims. In re SPM Mfg. Corp., 984 F.2d 1305 (1st Cir. 1993), authorized a secured lender to “gift” its collateral to unsecured creditors, outside of the chapter 7 case and applicable priority rules. That authority does not apply in this case, where there was a dispute between the estate (not just the unsecured creditors) and the secured lender over the rights to the collateral, because until resolution of the dispute, the secured creditor did not have any undisputed rights that it could give to the specified group of creditors outside of the bankruptcy priority scheme. Motorola, Inc. v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re Iridium Operating LLC), 478 F.3d 452 (2d Cir. 2007).

3.1.nnn Ad hoc committee members must disclose security acquisition dates and prices.

Several stockholders appeared in a chapter 11 case under the name “Ad Hoc Committee of Equity Security Holders” through a single law firm. The notice of appearance identified the committee members and disclosed their aggregate holdings, some of which were acquired before and some after the petition date. The committee members agreed to share payment of the firm’s fees pro rata among themselves, based on their relative stock holdings. Rule 2019 requires disclosure by “every entity or committee representing more than one creditor or equity security holder” to file a statement setting forth not only the name and address of the holders and the nature and amount of their claims, but also the “time of acquisition” and “with reference to the time of ... the organization or formation of the committee ... the amounts of claims or interests owned by ... the members of the committee ... the times when acquired, [and] the amounts paid therefor” The law firm filed a statement under Rule 2019 disclosing the engagement, the committee members’ names, and fee agreement and asserted that the law firm did not own any claims against or interests in the debtor, but the statement did not disclose the times the committee members’ interests were acquired or the amounts paid. The law firm’s statement is not sufficient. Although the individual members of the committee do not represent other stockholders, when acting as a committee or group, the Rule applies to them, not just to the law firm that represents them. Indeed, the firm stated that it represented only the committee, not the individual members. It is not just that the stockholders call themselves a “committee.” The important fact is that they are acting together, to promote their combined holdings and power of the group, which is more than the sum of the parts. Therefore, the committee must provide the full information required by the Rule. In re Northwest Airlines Corp., 2007 Bankr. LEXIS 557 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Feb. 26, 2007).

- 3.1.ooo Time for appellant to file a brief runs from notice of docketing the appeal. Rule 8009 requires the appellant to “file a brief within 15 days after entry of the appeal on the docket pursuant to Rule 8007.” Rule 8007(b) requires the district court clerk, upon receipt of the record from the bankruptcy court, to “enter the appeal in the docket and give notice promptly to all parties.” The 15-day time period starts to run only when the clerk has given notice, not when the clerk has entered the appeal on the docket. The reference in Rule 8009 to Rule 8007 encompasses both steps required of the clerk, not just the step (entry) referenced in Rule 8009. Glatzer v. Enron Corp. (In re Enron Corp.), 475 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 2007).
- 3.1.ppp “Hearing” might be held on paper. The chapter 13 debtor’s attorney sought fees in addition to the “no-look” fees the court allows in routine chapter 13 cases. No one objected, but the court questioned the fees and disallowed a portion of the additional request. The Court of Appeals applies Rule 2017 (dealing with prepetition payments) to the dispute. Rule 2017 permits the court, “after notice and a hearing,” to determine certain matters about prepetition fees. “After notice and a hearing” in Rule 2017 has the same meaning as provided in section 102(1), which “authorizes an act without an actual hearing ... if such hearing is not requested timely by a party in interest.” Although no party in interest here requested a hearing, if the court materially reduces the fee request, it assumes the role of an adverse party and must give the applicant a hearing. However, the required “hearing” need not involve an oral proceeding before the court. The requirement may be satisfied if the court notifies the applicant of its intent to reduce fees and gives the applicant an opportunity to respond in writing. Law Offices of David A. Boone v. Derham-Burk (In re Eliapo), 468 F.3d 592 (9th Cir. 2006).
- 3.1.qqq Creditor’s investors do not have standing to challenge the estate’s settlement with the creditor. The debtor in possession brought a preference action against a creditor, which was an investment fund. The litigation settled. The DIP sought court approval under Rule 9019. Fund investors objected, arguing that the fund acted improperly in agreeing to settle. They do not have standing. Their interest is not sufficiently direct to permit them to appear and be heard or to appeal. Although the bankruptcy court must determine that a settlement is fair and equitable, its obligation is to the estate. The bankruptcy court should not consider third-party concerns. Masonic Hall & Asylum Fund v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re Refco, Inc.), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85691 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 26, 2006).
- 3.1.rrr Creditor list is not “scandalous.” The debtor had been a municipal court judge. Many of her creditors were lawyers that had lent her money. She sought to seal her creditor list, claiming that the list of lawyer-lenders was “scandalous” under section 107(b)(2), because the potential ethical violations arising from lending to a judge before whom they appeared would unfairly brand all her lawyer creditors. Only section 107(b) governs sealing of papers in bankruptcy court; common law grounds do not apply. Injury to reputation alone is not sufficient to render information “scandalous.” The information, when taken in context, must lead to the alteration of a reasonable person’s opinion of the person mentioned. Here, the creditors list was just a list of creditors, was filed for a proper and required purpose, and did not appear to be untrue or inaccurate. Potential scandal lies only “outside the lines,” not within the list and is only a secondary consequence of the list. The state bar disciplinary board was investigating the loans and the lawyers. State law required that the disciplinary files be kept secret. Rule 9018(3), which permits the bankruptcy court to seal court filings “to protect governmental matters that are made confidential by statute or regulation,” also does not permit sealing the creditor list, because the list is not part of the state bar proceedings. Neal v. Kansas City Star (In re Neal), 461 F.3d 1048 (8th Cir. 2006).

- 3.1.sss SOFA question 1 is fundamentally ambiguous. The debtor owned his own law practice. When he filed bankruptcy, he answered SOFA Item 1, “State the gross amount of income the debtor has received from employment, trade or profession,” by listing his income after payment of business expenses. The government indicted him under 18 U.S.C. § 152 for knowingly and fraudulently making a false statement. Section 152 imports the standard for a perjury conviction, that the question must not be “fundamentally ambiguous.” (If the question is arguably ambiguous, the defendant’s perjury or not is a question for the jury.) Here, the question does not ask the gross income of the business and instead asks how much “the debtor has received,” suggesting something similar to “take-home” pay, which would be the debtor’s income after business expenses. Therefore, the court dismisses the indictment. The question on Schedule I, by contrast, asks for “Regular income from the operation of a business.” Schedule J asks for expenses from the operation of a business. Therefore, the context of Schedule I makes clear that Schedule I seeks gross business receipts, not income after expenses. Therefore, the court does not dismiss the indictment for a false statement on Schedule I. United States v. Naegele, 341 B.R. 349 (D.D.C. 2006).
- 3.1.ttt Inadequate documentation does not provide grounds for claims disallowance. Rule 3001(a) requires that a proof of claim conform substantially to Official Form 10, which requires the claimant to attach copies of supporting documents or, if not available or too voluminous, to attach a summary. Rule 3001(c) requires the original or a duplicate of a writing on which a claim is based to be filed with the claim. Rule 3001(f) makes “a proof of claim executed and filed in accordance with these rules prima facie evidence of the validity and the amount of the claim.” The debtor argued that a claim filed not in accordance with the rules does not have any effect and should be disallowed. However, section 502(b) lists the only grounds for claims disallowance. Failure to comply with the claims filing rules is not one of them. As a result, failure to file in accordance with the Rules deprives the claim of being prima facie evidence of the validity of the claim but does not deprive the claim of any effect at all. Heath v. Am. Express. Travel Related Servs. Co. (In re Heath), 331 B.R. 424 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).
- 3.1.uuu Rule 7004 does not govern service of an objection to claim. Rule 9014 provides, “(a) Motion. In a contested matter . . . not otherwise governed by these Rules, relief shall be requested by motion . . . (b) Service. The motion shall be served in the manner provided . . . by Rule 7004.” Rule 3007 provides for objection to claim by the filing of an “objection” and that a “copy of the objection . . . shall be mailed or otherwise delivered to the claimant. . . .” Therefore, an objection to claim is a contested matter “otherwise governed by these Rules,” and Rule 3007’s procedure applies. The court reasons that an objection is more like an answer to a complaint than an initiation of a new proceeding. More important, the filing of a claim submits the creditor to the court’s jurisdiction, and the creditor is under an obligation to keep the court informed of any address change. Application of Rule 7004 would require the trustee to search out the creditor’s “dwelling house or usual place of abode or . . . the place where the individual regularly conducts a business or profession.” Such a burden is unreasonable, especially where the creditor has already provided in the claim form the address where notices are to be sent. In re Hawthorne, 326 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2005).
- 3.1.vvv CM/ECF filing occurred too late to stop foreclosure sale. Debtor’s counsel logged on to the electronic filing system at 10:49 a.m., to stop a foreclosure sale scheduled for 11:00 a.m. The system was experiencing difficulties, and the system did not “stamp” the petition as filed until 12:09 p.m., by which time the foreclosure sale had been completed. After logging on, counsel is presented with several introductory screens. Only one screen irrevocably commits a document to the clerk’s custody, and the system time stamps the filing at the time counsel clicks the “next” button on that screen. Only when counsel has done so is the petition deemed filed. However, the time stamp creates only a rebuttable presumption. If counsel experiences system problems that delays the “filing” screen, counsel should contact the clerk’s office by telephone to make alternative arrangements or otherwise expedite the filing. Otherwise, it may be too late. In re Sands, 328 B.R. 614 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 2005).

- 3.1.www Electronic filing date is when document filing is completed, not when it is started. The attorney started the filing of an adversary proceeding cover sheet and complaint electronically, shortly before midnight on the last day to file such a complaint. The complaint was not marked filed by the CM/ECF system until 12:14 a.m. The court dismisses the complaint as late filed. The electronic filing administrative procedures specify that a deadline can be met only by completing the filing before midnight. The cover sheet is not part of the complaint, so neither the earlier filing of the cover sheet nor the beginning of the electronic filing of the complaint rendered the complaint timely. Mittman v. Casey (In re Casey), 329 B.R. 43 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2005)
- 3.1.xxx Local rule requirement cannot force debtor to waive statutory rights. The chapter 13 debtor filed a plan on the form mandated by the court's local rules. The debtor later sought to modify the plan in a manner inconsistent with a provision in the form plan. The fact that the debtor used the Local Rules form did not waive the debtor's right to modify the plan, which is statutory. The debtor had little choice but to use the mandated language in the original plan, but the debtor does not waive a substantive right by doing so, because local rules cannot modify substantive rights. Sunahara v. Burchard (In re Sunahara), 326 B.R. 768 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 2005).
- 3.1.yyy Order was effective upon announcement in court, before entry. The court had issued an order extending a statute of limitations to the date of a subsequent hearing. At the hearing, the court ordered from the bench that the statute be extended further. The written order extending it was not entered until two weeks later. Nevertheless, the order was complete and effective when made, so there was no gap in the extension, because entry is only a record of the act, not the act itself. The court relies on pre-FRCP cases and does not mention Rule 9021 ("A judgment is effective when entered."). IBT Int'l, Inc. v. Northern (In re Int'l Admin. Servs., Inc.), 408 F.3d 689 (11th Cir. 2005).
- 3.1.zzz Objection to claim may be served on attorney designated in "notice" box of claim form. A creditor asserted a personal injury claim against the debtor based on an accident that occurred only a month before the bankruptcy. The proof of claim form listed the creditor's attorney in the box on the proof of claim form (Official Form 10B) that asks where notices regarding the claim should be sent. The creditor signed the form and put her own address in the signature block. The debtor in possession objected to the claim but mailed the objection only to the attorney, who claimed not to have received the objection. Service was adequate, because Rule 9014, which governs contested matters "not otherwise provided for by these Rules" and requires service in accordance with Rule 7004, does not apply, because Rule 3007 governs objections to claims. Rule 3007 requires only notice to the claimant, not service. Jorgenson v. State Line Hotel, Inc. (In re State Line Hotel, Inc.), 323 B.R. 703 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).
- 3.1.aaaa Notice to creditor's attorney is not necessarily adequate notice to the creditor. The debtor sent notice of the claims filing bar date to the creditor's law firm, without identifying the firm's client in the notice. The notice was insufficient, because it was not reasonably calculated to reach the creditor. The law firm is not required to search its client files when it receives such a notice to determine who the creditor might be, if the law firm is not a creditor. In re Greater Southeast Comty.. Hosp., 324 B.R. 162 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2005).
- 3.1.bbbb Document is filed when presented to the clerk. The debtor presented a chapter 7 petition to the clerk, who required that the debtor scan the petition so that it could be filed electronically. Between the time the debtor presented the petition to the clerk and the time the clerk received the electronic version about 30 minutes later, the sheriff conducted a foreclosure sale. The sale was conducted in violation of the stay and was void, because the petition was filed when it was first placed in the custody or possession of the clerk. Beal Bank SSB v. Brown (In re Brown), 311 B.R. 721 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2004).

- 3.1.cccc Private Securities Litigation Reform Act does not prevent Bankruptcy Rule 2004 examination. The creditors committee sought authority to examine the former directors and officers of the debtor under Bankruptcy Rule 2004 to determine whether the estate owned any claims against them. A separate securities law action was pending against the same individuals in federal district court. The securities law action was subject to the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, which stays discovery in such an action pending the determination of any motion to dismiss. The bankruptcy court allows the Rule 2004 examination to go forward. It concludes that the action that the committee is investigating, which is on behalf of the debtor, differs from a securities fraud action, which is brought on behalf of individual shareholders, and that the importance of allowing an examination into causes of action belonging to the estate outweighs the policies of the PSLRA. The court was persuaded in permitting the examination to go forward by the fact that the committee had not yet determined to bring an action against the former directors and officers and had committed not to share the materials obtained in discovery with the plaintiff in the securities fraud action. In re Recoton Corp., 307 B.R. 751 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 3.1.dddd The discharge objection deadline is not jurisdictional. Within the time set by Bankruptcy Rule 4004, a creditor filed a complaint objecting to the debtor's discharge. After the deadline, the creditor amended the complaint to add new allegations. The parties litigated the new allegations, and the bankruptcy court denied the debtor's discharge. On motion for reconsideration, the debtor argued that the complaint was filed late, that the deadline in Rule 4004 was mandatory and jurisdictional, and that the deadline could not be waived. Citing Bankruptcy Rule 9030, which states that the Bankruptcy Rules "shall not be construed to extend or limit the jurisdiction of the courts," the Supreme Court rules that the deadline in Rule 4004 is a claim processing rule that does not affect jurisdiction. Thus, failure to assert the deadline as an affirmative defense until after litigation on the merits constitutes a waiver of the defense. If the debtor does not raise the issue before adjudication on the merits, the deadline is waived. In this case, the court does not reach whether the deadline may be extended on equitable grounds, because this case involves only waiver. Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443 (2004).
- 3.1.eeee A bar date order does not trump section 1111(a). The court issued a bar date order requiring all creditors to file proofs of claim. Neither the order nor the notice to creditors specifically stated that creditors whose claims were deemed filed under section 1111(a) (listed on the schedules as liquidated, undisputed, and not contingent) also needed to file proofs of claim by the bar date. Because the notice was not clear, the creditors' claims were deemed filed, despite the bar date order. However, the court questions whether such a bar date order, which might be inconsistent with section 1111(a) and with Bankruptcy Rule 3003, would ever be permitted. ATD Corp. Advantage Packaging, Inc. (In re ATD Corp.), 352 F.3d 1062 (6th Cir. 2003).
- 3.1.ffff Service on bank must be by certified mail on an officer. The debtor sued its bank lender to avoid liens on property and served the summons and complaint by certified mail on the bank's statutory agent for service of process. Bankruptcy Rule 7004(h) requires service on an insured depository institution to be made by certified mail addressed to an officer of the institution. Accordingly, service was improper, and the bankruptcy court properly set aside the default judgment previously granted to the debtor. Hamlett v. AmSouth Bank (In re Hamlett), 322 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 2003).
- 3.1.gggg Rule 2004 subpoena should be issued by home court. The Georgia debtor-in-possession sought an examination under Rule 2004 of a California witness. Based on a close textual reading of Rule 2004(c) and Rule 45(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the bankruptcy court rules that the bankruptcy court where the case is pending is the proper court to issue a subpoena for attendance at an examination, even for a witness who is not located within the home court district. Because the subpoena in this case did not require the witness to appear in the home court district, the issue did not arise of whether a home court subpoena could compel attendance from a distant district. The effect of the rulings is to require a motion to quash to be filed in the home court. In re Fred Ayers Co., Inc., 266 B.R. 557 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 2001).

- 3.1.hhhh Cash collateral stipulation waivers do not bind subsequent adversary proceeding litigants. Preference defendants asserted that the debtor subsidiary was insolvent because its guaranty of its debtor parent's debt was a voidable fraudulent obligation. The trustee countered that the cash collateral stipulation approved at the outset of the case constituted a determination of the validity of the guaranty that bound defendants under the law of the case doctrine and principles of res judicata. The court rules that the law of the case doctrine does not apply because the preference defendants were never parties to the cash collateral stipulation and never had an opportunity to litigate the guaranty validity issue. For the same reason, the res judicata does not apply. It would be unreasonable to require all potential preference defendants to appear and be heard on a cash collateral stipulation approved in the first days of the case, as that could cause reorganization cases to grind to a halt. Philip Servs. Corp. v. Luntz (In re Philip Services (Delaware), Inc.), 267 B.R. 62 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001).
- 3.1.iiii Complaint may relate back to prior motion date. The creditor filed a motion objecting to dischargeability under section 523. Bankruptcy Rule 7001 requires that such an objection be made by complaint and that the proceeding be an adversary proceeding. After the deadline for objecting to dischargeability, the creditor filed and served a complaint and argued that it related back to the date of the filing of the motion. The bankruptcy appellate panel agrees and permits the later-filed complaint to relate back, under a generous reading of F.R. Civ. P. 15(c)(2). *Gschwend v. - 3.1.jjjj Nationwide service of process rejected. The Eight Circuit rules that despite Bankruptcy Rule 7004, a defendant is not subject to suit in bankruptcy or district court in a state with which the defendant does not have minimum contacts. The court thus splits with the Second, Fifth and Seventh circuits in applying the general federal civil practice rule, rather than the rule intended by the drafters of Bankruptcy Rule 7004. *Warfield v. - 3.1.kkkk Rule 9006 "weekend" rule does not apply backwards. Where the relevant period (here, the two-year reachback relating to non-dischargeability of certain taxes) expired on a weekend, the relevant date is the actual weekend day, not the following business day, as it would be where an action is required to be taken within a period that runs forward and expires on a weekend. Smith v. United States (In re Smith), 96 F.3d 800 (6th Cir. 1996).
- 3.1.iiii Changed circumstances excuse a trustee from supporting a settlement agreement. Changed circumstances rendered a settlement agreement less valuable to the estate than the trustee had assumed when she reached agreement. She brought the matter before the bankruptcy court but did not recommend approval of the settlement. The Third Circuit holds that the bankruptcy court should choose between the trustee's fiduciary duty to the creditor body as a whole and her duty to go forward with a settlement agreement, and that the trustee is required to advise the bankruptcy court in full of the changed circumstances and is not required to recommend approval in such a circumstance. *Myers v. - 3.1.mmmm Debtor denied intervention in adversary proceeding. A debtor does not have the right to intervene in a chapter 7 adversary proceeding, where the trustee is the party entitled to

4. CASE COMMENCEMENT AND ELIGIBILITY

4.1 Eligibility

- 4.1.a Debtor may not elect subchapter V during a pending chapter 11 case if it prejudices creditors. The individual debtor purchased an historic home, which she used for her residence and as a bed and breakfast under a local ordinance that permitted short-stay rentals only if the owner also resided in the property. In October 2018, on the eve of foreclosure by the mortgage lender, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case, listing her debts as primarily consumer debts, and did not designate her case as a small business. Her debts included about $1.6 million on the mortgage and about $65,000 of general unsecured debts. After numerous cash collateral and preliminary plan proceedings, the court set deadlines for filing plans. The lender filed a plan that provided for foreclosure on the property. On the eve of the confirmation hearing for the creditor's plan, the debtor moved to amend her petition to designate her case as a small business case and to elect to proceed under then-new subchapter V, added by the Small Business Reorganization Act (SBRA), which became effective a week before the scheduled confirmation hearing. A small business debtor is "a person engaged in commercial or business activities" with total debt less than $2,725,625 (later amended effective March 27, 2020 to $7,500,000 for two years and then, under section 104 adjustment, to $3,024,725, and then again in June 2022 to $7,500,000), "not less than 50 percent of which arose from the commercial or business activities of the debtor." Bankruptcy Rule 1009(a) permits a debtor to amend a voluntary petition "as a matter of course," though the amendment is not necessarily controlling, and the original petition, signed under penalty of perjury, still retains evidentiary effect. However, the court should disallow an amendment where it would prejudice creditors. Prejudice is measured not by creditors' potential recoveries, but by whether the creditor detrimentally relied on the debtor's prior position. Here, the court and the creditor had spent considerable time and resources to get to the point where the creditor was ready to confirm its plan. Changing the rules, including imposing debtor plan exclusivity under subchapter V, after all the prior proceedings, prejudices the creditor, so the amendment is disallowed. In re Ventura, ___ B.R. ___ (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 21, 2022).
- 4.1.b A non-operating non-profit business can be eligible for subchapter V. The debtor was formed to acquire and sell interests in private aircraft, provide private air transportation, and provide depreciation tax benefits to its sole member and manager. It did not have a profit motive. A dispute with its fractional interests provider, which was the debtor's largest creditor, led to cessation of operations and related litigation. As of the petition date, it was engaging in litigation, paying its aircraft registry fees, remaining in good standing as a Delaware LLC, and filed tax returns and paying taxes. A person engaged in commercial or business activities at least 50 percent of whose debts arose from its commercial or business activities is eligible to proceed under subchapter V. The Code does not define "engaged in commercial or business activities." Commercial or business activities do not require historical operations. The present tense of "engaged" means the test applies as of the petition date. The activities in which the debtor was engaged as of the petition date qualify as commercial or business activities. And nothing in subchapter V requires that the debtor be a profit-motivated business; otherwise, churches and other nonprofits would be excluded, contrary to Congress' intent. NetJets Aviation, Inc. v. RS Air, LLC (In re RS Air, LLC), 638 B.R. 403 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2022).
- 4.1.c Court denies motion to dismiss divisional merger debtor's filing to address mass tort claims. A consumer products company was subject to an increasing number of tort claims, some of which resulted from asbestos exposure. The litigation and liability costs exceeded the company's operating income. Using the Texas divisional merger statute to resolve all the tort claims without subjecting the entire enterprise to the bankruptcy process, the company divided into one company that continued the consumer products business, assuming all the assets and the ordinary course liabilities associated with that business, and another that received certain royalty streams and assumed all the tort liabilities. The continuing company agreed, without any reimbursement rights, to fund a trust to resolve the other company's litigation and bankruptcy expenses and tort liabilities to the extent its royalty streams and other assets were insufficient. The funding agreement was limited in amount to the value of the continuing company. The ultimate parent company guaranteed the funding agreement. Immediately after completing the divisional merger, the other company filed a chapter 11 case with the goal of addressing the tort claims through an asbestos claims trust, funded by the royalty streams, the funding agreement, and insurance proceeds. A chapter 11 case that is not filed in good faith is subject to dismissal. Good faith is determined based on the totality of the circumstances, focusing on whether the debtor's objectives are within the legitimate scope of the bankruptcy laws, including whether the petition serves a valid reorganization purpose or is filed merely to obtain a tactical litigation advantage. A desire to take advantage of a particular Bankruptcy Code provision, standing alone, is not determinative. A debtor need not be insolvent to qualify for a chapter 11 case, although to be eligible, it should show a need for a financial restructuring. The mounting costs of the tort claims litigation would likely drive the debtor (and, without the divisional merger, the continuing company) into insolvency, which creates a need for financial relief. Here, the debtor's intent is to use the Code as a whole to address its financial needs. The class action system is not available to address mass tort claims, and using the bankruptcy system, rather than the tort system, is a substantially better approach to addressing both present and future tort claims for both the debtor and the claimants. Because the tort claimants are in no worse position under the divisional merger and bankruptcy filing than they would be otherwise, the filing was not made to secure a tactical litigation advantage. Moreover, the debtor has the funding necessary to satisfy tort obligations to the extent of its pre-merger valuation, with a contractual right to look to the ultimate parent without having to establish independent liability. Finally, the potential business disruption, professional fees, and loss in market value that would likely result from a filing by the pre-merger company justifies the division and concentration of the bankruptcy on the resulting debtor company. In re LTL Mgmt., LLC, 2022 LEXIS Bankr. 510 (Bankr. D.N.J. Feb. 25, 2022).

- 4.1.d Shareholder approval requirement for a bankruptcy petition is not contrary to public policy. The LLC debtor borrowed from an investor, who also acquired, for a separate substantial price, a preferred equity interest. The debtor's LLC agreement was amended to provide that the debtor could not file a bankruptcy petition without the affirmative vote of a majority of the preferred units. Applicable nonbankruptcy law determines who has authority to file a bankruptcy petition. A court should enforce any provision in the debtor's organic documents that specifies who has the authority. Such a provision might be contrary to public policy if it provided only a "golden share" to a creditor to prevent a filing. Here, however, the creditor is also a substantial equity holder, who, as a non-managing member of an LLC, does not have fiduciary duties to the LLC or its other members and thus may protect its rights by withholding consent to the bankruptcy filing. In re 3P Hightstown, LLC, 631 B.R. 205 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2021).
- 4.1.e Nonoperating debtor is not eligible for subchapter V. The debtor was a physician who owned a medical practice that had closed some years before the petition date. She filed a chapter 11 case and elected to proceed under subchapter V. To do so, she had to be "engaged in business or commercial activity." "Engaged in," in the present tense, has a temporal element and requires the debtor be engaged in business or commercial activity as of the petition date, not at some earlier time. Such a reading comports with the statute's purpose to assist small businesses to reorganize as going concerns. Therefore, the debtor does not qualify for subchapter V. Nat'l Loan Invs., L.P. v. Rickerson (In re Rickerson), ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 3403 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. Dec. 14, 2021).
- 4.1.f Subchapter V eligibility does not require business operations, only activities. The debtor ceased operations in October 2020 and filed a subchapter V petition in April 2021 to liquidate assets valued at about $300,000 and disburse sale proceeds to creditors. At the filing date, the debtor maintained business bank accounts, had accounts receivable, worked with insurance adjusters and insurers to address prepetition insurance claims, and was preparing assets for sale. Subchapter V eligibility is limited to a “person engaged in commercial or business activities.” “Engaged” is tested as of the petition date. “Commercial or business” means dealings or transaction of an economic nature. “Activities” requires behavior, actions, or acts. Under these definitions, the debtor’s conduct on the petition date included commercial or business activities and is therefore eligible for subchapter V. Operations are not required. In re Vertical Mac Construction, LLC, ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. M.D. Fla. July 23, 2021); accord In re Blue, 630 B.R. 179 (M.D.N. Car. 2021).

- 4.1.g Debtor’s eligibility is determined based on its law of formation. A REIT formed in Singapore under Singapore law filed a chapter 11 case. Only a person is eligible to file a chapter 11 case. “Person” is defined to include a business trust. Under the principles of Butner v. United States, bankruptcy courts should apply nonbankruptcy law unless there is a bankruptcy-based reason for not doing so. Thus, determination of whether an entity is a business trust that is a qualified debtor should be based on the entity’s law of formation, not on federal common law. Breaking with the majority of courts to address this issue, the court looks to Singapore law to determine the debtor’s status as a business trust and its eligibility for chapter 11. In re Eht Us1, 630 B.R. 410 (Bankr. D. Del. 2021).
- 4.1.h Nonbankruptcy law governs characterization of a business trust. An indebted Singapore trust that owned real estate filed a chapter 11 case. Lenders filed a motion to dismiss on the ground that the debtor was not eligible to be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code. Only a person may be a debtor under chapter 11. A trust that is not a business trust is not a person. Many prior decisions applied federal common law to determine whether a trust was a business trust. However, the Bankruptcy Code applies state law to determine legal rights and liabilities unless some federal interest or Code provision provides otherwise. There is no federal interest in determining eligibility. Therefore, the court must look to the nonbankruptcy law creating an artificial entity to determine the entity’s nature, rights, and capacity to take specific legal action. Applying Singapore law, the court determines the debtor is a business trust and denies the motion to dismiss the case. In re EHT US1, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 1477 (Bankr. D. Del. June 1, 2021).
- 4.1.i Wind-down activities constitute commercial or business activities for subchapter V eligibility purposes. The debtor operated a flue gas energy recovery facility, selling steam and electricity to its customers. A dispute with the energy supplier resulted in the termination of the debtor’s operation and in litigation against the supplier to recover damages. The debtor filed a chapter 11 petition and elected to proceed under subchapter V. As of the petition date, in addition to pursuing the litigation, the debtor was actively maintaining and preserving its physical assets and working on a sale of the assets. A debtor is eligible to proceed under subchapter V if the debtor is engaged in commercial or business activities. Commercial activities involve “the exchange or buying and selling;” business activities involve dealing or transactions of an economic nature. Subchapter V does not require that the commercial or business activities be the same as the debtor’s core or historic operations. Nor does it require the case to result in reorganization of such operations or business, as it permits a plan that may include selling all assets. Because the debtor’s activities as of the petition date qualified as commercial or business activities, the court denies a motion to dismiss the case or void the subchapter V election. In re Port Arthur Steam Energy, L.P., 629 B.R. 233 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2021).
- 4.1.j Owner of defunct business is not eligible for subchapter V. Before bankruptcy, the individual debtor owned and operated several small businesses, all of which had become defunct by the petition date. The debtor then became the manager of another business, which he did not own. Numerous investors in the defunct businesses sued the debtor for fraudulent investment solicitation in the defunct businesses, and the debtor believed he remained liable for some of the defunct companies’ outstanding debts. At the petition date, the debtor did not own an interest in any operating business and was not engaged in any business on his own. Subchapter V of chapter 11 applies to a small business debtor, which is a person engaged in commercial or business activities with debts below the statutory maximum. Whether a debtor is “engaged in” business “is inherently contemporary in focus instead of retrospective” and is designed to capture a debtor who needs a reorganization to remain in business. “Commercial or business activities” involve the buying and selling of goods and services and does not describe one who is only an employee of a business. Therefore, the debtor is not eligible for subchapter V. In re Johnson, ___ B.R. ___, Case no. 19-42063-ELM (Bankr. N.D. Tex. Mar. 1, 2021).

- 4.1.k Corporation winding down its business qualifies for subchapter V. The corporate debtor sold its principal asset for stock in another company and was winding down its business. It had no employees, and its only assets were the stock, a bank account, some receivables, and a law suit claim. It had no intention to reorganize. It was making an effort to realize the assets’ value and pay its creditors. It filed a chapter 11 petition and elected to proceed under subchapter V. A debtor is eligible to proceed under subchapter V if, among other things, the debtor “is engaged in commercial or business activities.” The Code does not define any of those words, so the court looks to their ordinary meaning. “Is engaged” means currently (as opposed to formerly) engaged as of the petition date. The court uses a “totality of circumstances” test to determine whether the debtor is currently engaged in business. “Activities” differs from “operations,” which would imply more active business conduct. Here, the debtor’s active bank accounts and accounts receivables, its work pursuing the lawsuit, managing the stock and winding down its business meet the requirement. The legislative history and recent case law support this reading. Therefore, the debtor qualifies to proceed under subchapter V. In re Offer Space, LLC, 629 B.R. 299 (Bank. D. Utah 2021).
- 4.1.l Debtor's employment qualifies as "commercial or business activities." The individual debtor owned an LLC, which he used as a pass-through entity for various businesses, including a business in which the LLC owned a 30% interest. The debtor used to work for that business until it failed shortly before the debtor's bankruptcy and had guaranteed its debts, which caused his bankruptcy and which constituted over 80% of his debts. At the petition date, he was an employee of an unrelated business and worked on the wind-down of the failed business of which he remained as a manager. He filed his petition to adjust his guarantee obligations. Only a "person engaged in commercial or business activities" at least 50% of whose debts arose from such activities is eligible to proceed under subchapter V. Based on its ordinary meaning, dictionary definitions, and use of a similar phrase ("engaged in business") in section 1304, "commercial or business activities" has a broad meaning. The tense of "engaged in," as used in the eligibility provision and other Code provisions, indicates the eligibility requirement applies as of the petition date. Because the debtor's commercial or business activities related to the LLC, relating to the wind-down of the failed business, and relating to his new employment, he qualifies to proceed under subchapter V. In re Ikalowych, 629 B.R. 261 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2021).
- 4.1.m A hotel is not single asset real estate. The debtor operated a 79-room hotel. It had 15 employees, who provided room cleaning, laundry, internet, phone, bus and trailer parking, business, breakfast and pool and fitness center services. It filed a chapter 11 petition and elected to proceed under subchapter V, which denies eligibility to "a person whose primary activity is the business of owning single asset real estate," which the Code defines as "real property constituting a single property or project ... on which no substantial business is being conducted by a debtor other than the business of operating the real property and activities incidental thereto." Because of the services the debtor provides in addition to simply renting rooms, the debtor is not a single asset real estate debtor and is eligible for subchapter V. In re ENKOGS1, LLC, ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. M.D. Fla. Apr. 20, 2021).
- 4.1.n Affiliates' debt disqualifies subchapter V filing. Four affiliates filed chapter 11 cases and elected to proceed under subchapter V. One of the affiliates only held real estate and so, as a single asset real estate debtor, was not eligible for subchapter V. The sum of the debts of the three other affiliates was less than $7.5 million, but adding the debts of the real estate affiliate put the aggregate debt of the group over $7.5 million. Section 101(51D) defines "small business debtor" as (A) a person engaged in commercial or business activities (including any affiliate of such person that is also a debtor under this title and excluding a person whose primary activity is the business of owning single asset real estate) that has aggregate noncontingent liquidated secured and unsecured debts as of the date of the filing of the petition or the date of the order for relief in an amount not more than" $7,500,000.00 and (B) "does not include any member of a group of affiliated debtors that has aggregate noncontingent liquidated secured and unsecured debts in an amount greater than" $7,500,000.00. Although the three debtors might have qualified under subparagraph (A), the aggregate debt limit for the entire group of affiliates makes them ineligible to proceed as small business debtors under (B), even though the affiliate who put them over the debt limit is not itself eligible for subchapter V. In re 305 Petroleum, Inc., 622 B.R. 209 (Bankr. N.D. Miss. 2020).

- 4.1.o Public company's affiliate's eligibility for subchapter V is based on all voting securities. A public company owned 21% of the subchapter V debtor's equity securities, but 27% of the debtor's voting securities. The debtor's charter limits the power to vote on an action to reorganize or liquidate the business to a single class of equity securities; the public company owns only 6.5% of that class. Under section 1182(1)(B)(iii), a debtor that is an affiliate of an "issuer, as defined in section 3 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934" is not eligible for subchapter V. An issuer, among other things, is a company that has publicly-traded securities. Under section 101(2)(A), an affiliate is "an entity that directly or indirectly owns, controls, or holds with power to vote, 20 percent or more of the outstanding voting securities of the debtor." The definition measures ownership against all outstanding voting securities, not just those that have a right to vote on the matter before the court. Therefore, the debtor is an affiliate of the public company and is ineligible for subchapter V. Hall Los Angeles WTS, LLC v. Serendipity Labs, Inc. (In re Serendipity Labs, Inc.), 620 B.R. 679 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2020).
- 4.1.p A nonprofit community association is eligible for subchapter V. The debtor is a nonprofit homeowners' community association. It is registered with the state as a corporation and has a board of directors. It collects assessments from homeowners, contracts for goods and services, hires managers, lawyers, landscapers, maintenance personnel, and other professionals, oversees common areas of the project, and files tax returns that list business income. Subchapter V is limited to a person engaged in commercial or business activities. It does not require a profit motive as an eligibility condition. Commercial or business activities are those that are not consumer activities—those intended for personal, family, or household use. The debtor here is not a consumer debtor but engages in business activities and so is eligible for subchapter V. In re Ellingsworth Res. Cmty. Ass'n., 619 B.R. 519 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2020).
- 4.1.q Personal guarantee of business debts qualifies an individual debtor for SBRA. The debtors personally guaranteed debts incurred by their wholly-owned corporate businesses. The Small Business Reorganization Act provides special procedures and substantive rules for a small business debtor who elects to proceed under subchapter V of chapter 11. The Act defines an eligible debtor as "a person engaged in commercial or business activities" with less than $7.5 million in debts. The statute does not qualify "engaged in" as limited to currently engaged in business. Here, the majority of the debtors' debts arose from operation of the current and former businesses. Therefore, they are eligible to proceed under subchapter V. In re Blanchard, ___ B.R. ___, Case No. 19-12440 (Bankr. E.D. La. July 16, 2020).
- 4.1.r State court order against hospital closure does not prohibit chapter 7 filing. Within a few months after a community hospital was acquired, the acquirer sought approval to close from the state review board, because the hospital was losing substantial amounts of money. The review board approved. The village where the hospital was located sought court review of the decision. The court issued a preliminary injunction against any action to close the hospital. While that order was on appeal, the hospital filed a chapter 7 case. The village moved to dismiss on the grounds that the filing violated the state court order. Section 109 of the Code specifies which entities are eligible to file a bankruptcy petition. Any contrary state law is superseded by the Supremacy Clause and may not restrict the authority of a debtor to file bankruptcy. Therefore, the court denies the motion to dismiss. In re Westlake Prop. Holdings, LLC, 606 B.R. 772 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2019).

- 4.1.s A district court receivership order may enjoin involuntary petition. The debtor was part of a corporate group whose members had guaranteed a loan and had commingled assets. The debtor defaulted, and the creditor sought a receivership in district court over all the debtor's assets. The debtor consented to the receivership. The receivership order enjoined all persons from "commencing, prosecuting, continuing or enforcing any suit or proceeding against or affected [debtor] or any part of the Receivership Assets." Three creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor in a different district. Because an involuntary petition is a suit or proceeding against the debtor and affects the debtor's assets, which were part of the receivership estate, the order covered the filing of an involuntary petition. Relying on case law from other circuits, the court determines it has authority to enjoin a bankruptcy filing. It concludes it should do so in this case because the receivership process is superior to a bankruptcy on the facts of this case: the receiver has already begun the process of selling the debtor as a going concern, the lender agreed to bear the receivership costs, the court permitted all creditors and other parties in interest to appear and be heard, and the local rules require a receivership administration to be similar to that in a bankruptcy case. In addition, the receivership court has complete jurisdiction over the debtor's property and the authority to protect that jurisdiction. Therefore, the court orders the petitioning creditors to dismiss the involuntary petition. Big Shoulders Cap., LLC v. San Luis & Rio Grande RR, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 199341 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 18, 2019).
- 4.1.t Pension trust is not a "business trust." A nonprofit organization that operated numerous schools established a pension plan for the schools' employees and a pension trust to hold the funds that would be paid as pensions. The plan required each school to contribute to the trust. The trust's sole function was to invest the contributions and pay pensions as employees retired. Declining enrollments led the organization to terminate the pension plan, and the trust soon thereafter stopped paying pensions, though the trust itself was never terminated. Numerous retirees sued the trust for their pensions, but the trust was unable to pay. It filed a chapter 11 petition. Only a "person" is eligible for chapter 11 relief. A corporation is a person; "corporation" includes a business trust. Although the case law on what constitutes a business trust is not completely coherent, generally the courts find a trust is a business trust if it was created for the purpose of transacting business and if the trust has the indicia of a corporate entity, such as the presence of investors expecting a profit from operations and transferability of ownership interests. The court should determine whether a trust meets those criteria as of the petition date. The petitioner has the burden of proof. In this case, the trust lacked the attributes of a corporation—there were no investors who expected to earn a return on their investments, and the retirees do not hold transferable interests in the trust, only in pensions, which the trust prohibits them from transferring. The pension trust was more like a traditional trust formed to effect, preserve, and protect a gift or contribution for the beneficiaries. The court dismisses the case. In re Catholic School Employees Pension Trust, 599 B.R. 634 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2019).
- 4.1.u Directors ousted by a state court receiver do not have authority to file a voluntary petition. Before bankruptcy, investors sued the debtor in state court. Finding the debtor's directors guilty of nonfeasance and gross mismanagement, the court appointed a receiver under the state corporations statute and permitted the receiver to replace the board of directors, which he did. The ousted directors filed a voluntary petition for the corporation. Section 301 permits a petition by an entity that may be a debtor under section 109. State law determines who may act for the debtor in authorizing the petition. Here, the receiver's replacement of the directors deprived them of authority to act for the corporation. Therefore, the petition was not authorized by the debtor and must be dismissed. Sino Clean Energy, Inc. v. Seiden (In re Sino Clean Energy, Inc.), 901 F.3d 1139 (9th Cir. 2018).

- 4.1.v Non-profit community mental health center is not a governmental unit. The debtor is a non-profit community mental health center (CMHC), authorized by state law and designated by a state department to provide mental health services that the state previously provided. The debtor receives nearly all its funding from the state under annual bid contracts with the state, not from direct appropriations from the legislature. The state regulates the debtor, has the authority to de-designate it as eligible to be a CMHC, and reviews budgets to assure compliance with bids and contracts. The debtor has a self-perpetuating board; the state has no role in selecting directors. Only a “person” may be a debtor under chapter 11. A governmental unit is not a person. A governmental unit includes an instrumentality of a state. Whether a debtor is an instrumentality of the state depends primarily on the degree of control the state exercises over the entity. Here, the state did not create the debtor or appoint its leadership; no enabling statute guides or controls its actions; funding is under a contract with the state, not by appropriation; and the state may not terminate the entity’s existence. In addition, as a private non-profit corporation, the debtor does not have governmental powers, such as eminent domain, sovereign immunity, or the taxing power. Therefore, the debtor is not an instrumentality of the state and is eligible for chapter 11. Ky. Employees Retirement Sys. v. Seven Counties Servs, Inc., 901 F.3d 718 (6th Cir. 2018).
- 4.1.w Court enforces charter provision that allows bona fide preferred shareholder to block bankruptcy petition. An investor made a $15 million preferred stock investment in the debtor, which incurred a $3 million unsecured liability to the investor for services rendered. In connection with the investment, the debtor amended its Delaware corporate charter to require the majority vote of each shareholder class to authorize a bankruptcy filing. The debtor’s board authorized a petition, which the debtor filed. The investor moved to dismiss on the ground that the debtor did not have authority to file. Authority to file a corporation’s bankruptcy petition depends on the corporation’s charter and state law. Although many courts have refused to enforce charter provisions that permit a creditor to block a bankruptcy filing, this case differs, because the charter provision was adopted in connection with an equity investment, not a credit extension and does not appear to be a ruse to guarantee a debt. Delaware law permits a corporate charter to reallocate a board’s traditional duties. The reallocation here to the shareholders of the power to authorize a bankruptcy filing does not violate Delaware law. Therefore, the court dismisses the case. Franchise Servs. Of N. Am., Inc. v. U.S. Trustee (In re Franchise Servs. Of N. Am., Inc.), 891 F.3d 198 (5th Cir. 2018).
- 4.1.x Court dismisses debtor’s petition where state court receivership order gave the receiver authority over bankruptcy filing. The closely-held debtor owned three hotels, which it had mortgaged to a bank for a loan. After default, the bank filed a foreclosure action in state court and obtained the appointment of a receiver, whom the state court vested with the authority of the debtor’s board of directors, including the authority to file a bankruptcy petition. Acting in his capacity as a shareholder and pre-receivership director, the debtor’s sole shareholder filed a chapter 11 petition for the debtor. The receiver moved to dismiss. State law determines who may authorize a bankruptcy petition for a corporation, and the bankruptcy court should respect a state court’s order. If the state court order exceeded its proper bounds, for example by appointing a receiver for the corporation when the only proceeding before it was for the appointment of a receiver for the corporation’s real estate, the remedy lies with the state appeals court. However, state law may not prohibit the filing of a bankruptcy petition. Analyzing conflicting case law on the effect of a receivership order that grants the receiver the authority to decide whether to file bankruptcy, the court concludes that it should respect the state court order, unless the state court proceeding resulted in an improper impediment to the debtor’s access to the bankruptcy court due to the receiver’s bias in favor of the creditor who obtained the appointment. Since no bias was shown here, the court dismisses the petition. Citizens & N. Bank v. Monroe Heights Dev. Corp., Inc. (In re Monroe Heights Dev. Corp., Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2017 Bankr. LEXIS 2355 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. Aug. 22, 2017).
- 4.1.y Directors ousted by a receiver cannot authorize the corporation’s bankruptcy petition. At the request of a corporation’s shareholders, the state court appointed a receiver, finding the directors liable for gross mismanagement. The appointment order authorized the receiver to replace the directors. The receiver did so. Later, the former directors filed a bankruptcy petition for the corporation. State law determines who may authorize a corporation's bankruptcy filing. State law here authorizes the current directors to authorize a filing. Bankruptcy policy does not permit state law to restrict a corporation's ability to seek bankruptcy relief. The state court's order does not restrict the corporation's ability to file bankruptcy; it just authorizes the appointment of a different board, which then has the authority to file. Thus, the order is not a restriction on the corporation's ability to file. The former directors lost their authority when the receiver replaced them. Accordingly, the court dismisses the petition. Sino Clean Energy Inv. v. Seiden, 565 B.R. 677 (D. Nev. 2017).

4.1.z Independent director's inaction ratified debtor's board authorization to file bankruptcy.

The single asset real estate debtor's organizational documents required the consent of an independent manager as a condition to the filing of a bankruptcy petition. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case without that consent. On the secured lender's motion to dismiss, the court ruled that the consent was required but might be obtained by the independent director's ratification of the filing and offered the director the opportunity to appear and be heard in the case. The debtor and the creditor notified the independent director of the court's ruling and deposed the director about his position on the bankruptcy filing. The director took no position. State law determines the requirements for a juridical person to authorize a bankruptcy filing. Here, state law recognized the validity of the unanimous consent provision. State law also permits ratification of a corporate action after the fact, and a court may infer ratification by silence when, despite obtaining full knowledge of the facts, the director does not disavow the action. The independent director's failure to object to or disavow the filing constitutes a ratification of the board's action, providing the necessary consent to the filing. In re Tara Retail Group, LLC, 2017 Bankr. LEXIS 1330 (Bankr. N.D.W. Va. May 4, 2017).

4.1.aa Good faith negotiation filing requirement does not waive privilege for prepetition mediation statement.

One of the eligibility grounds for a chapter 9 filing is that the debtor negotiate with creditors in good faith before filing its petition. In this case, the debtor and its principal creditors submitted to prepetition mediation. The mediator required from each party's counsel a confidential mediation statement to provide background and a description of the parties' positions. After the debtor filed its petition, one of the creditors sought discovery of the debtor's mediation statement. The ordinary work product doctrine protects an attorney's ordinary work-product prepared in anticipation of litigation—which includes raw facts—from discovery unless the opponent has a substantial need and cannot otherwise obtain the materials through other means. A mediation statement in preparation for a pre-chapter 9 mediation is prepared in anticipation of filing a chapter 9 case, which involves litigation, and because the creditor did not allege bad faith in the debtor's filing, it has not shown a substantial need for the material. Opinion work product—the attorney's mental impressions and conclusions—is not discoverable except in rare and unusual circumstances, such as where it would inculpate the attorney in illegal activity, which is not the case here. Work product is subject to discovery if there has been a waiver, such as where the party or its attorney has shown the material to a third party without expectation of confidentiality. The good faith negotiation eligibility ground itself is not such a waiver, and the disclosure to the mediator was with the full expectation of confidentiality. Finally, where the debtor is not relying on the mediation statement to show good faith negotiation, it need not disclose it to the creditor. In re Lake Lotawana Comm. Imp. Dist., 563 B.R. 909 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2016).

4.1.bb Non-profit community mental health center is not a governmental unit.

The debtor is a non-profit community mental health center (CMHC), authorized by state law and designated by a state department to provide mental health services that the state previously provided. The debtor receives nearly all its funding from the state under annual bid contracts with the state, not from direct appropriations from the legislature. The state regulates the debtor, has the authority to de-designate it as eligible to be a CMHC and reviews budgets to assure compliance with the debtor's bids and contracts. The debtor has a self-perpetuating board; the state has no role in selecting directors. Only a "person" may be a debtor under chapter 11. A governmental unit is not a person. A governmental unit includes an instrumentality of a state. Whether a debtor is an instrumentality of the state depends on whether it has governmental powers, such as eminent domain, sovereign immunity or the taxing power, whether it has a public purpose that is subject to the state's control in its execution and how the state characterizes the entity. Here, as a private non-profit corporation, the debtor has neither eminent domain power nor sovereign immunity. Its ability to request funds from the state does not amount to the taxing power. Although the state regulates the debtor heavily, it does not control its operations or governance and does not participate in its operations. Finally, the state retains the power to revoke the debtor's corporate charter and requires it to obtain various permits for its operations, which are all attributes of private entities, not public instrumentalities. Therefore, the debtor is not an instrumentality of the state and is eligible for chapter 11. Ky. Employees Retirement Sys. v. Seven Counties Servs, Inc., 550 B.R. 741 (W.D. Ky. 2016).

- 4.1.cc Puerto Rico may not enact composition statute. Puerto Rico's legislature adopted the Puerto Rico Corporation Debt Enforcement and Recovery Act, which provided a means to adjust its instrumentalities' debts through a Puerto Rico court proceeding in which the holders of a majority of claims could bind a class to a debt adjustment. Bankruptcy Code section 903(1) provides that chapter 9 does not limit a State's power to control its municipalities, but "a State law prescribing a method of composition of indebtedness of such municipality may not bind any creditor that does not consent to such composition." Section 101(52) defines "state" to include Puerto Rico, "except for the purpose of defining who may be a debtor under chapter 9." Section 109(c) permits only municipalities of a State to be a chapter 9 debtor, and section 103(g) provides that chapter 9 applies in a case under chapter 9. Because the "state" definition excludes Puerto Rico only for chapter 9 eligibility purposes, Puerto Rico's exclusion from chapter 9 eligibility does not affect the application of section 903(1), which applies and prohibits Puerto Rico from enacting a composition statute. Commonwealth of Puerto Rico v. Franklin Calif. Tax-Free Trust, 579 U.S. ___, 136 S. Ct. 1938 (2016).
- 4.1.dd LLC operating agreement requiring lender member to consent to bankruptcy petition is unenforceable. As part of a forbearance agreement, the debtor LLC agreed to sell one common interest unit to the creditor for $1 and to amend the LLC agreement to require unanimous consent to authorize the LLC to file a bankruptcy petition. An agreement not to file a bankruptcy petition or to waive a bankruptcy discharge are unenforceable as against federal public policy. Parties may not accomplish "by circuitry of arrangement" what they may not accomplish directly. Here, both parties intended to contract away the debtor's right to file bankruptcy. "A provision in a limited liability company governance document obtained by contract, the sole purpose and effect of which is to place into the hands of a single, minority equity holder the ultimate authority to eviscerate the right of that entity to seek federal bankruptcy relief, and the nature and substance of whose primary relationship with the debtor is that of creditor—not equity holder—and which owes no duty to anyone but itself in connection with an LLC's decision to seek federal bankruptcy relief, is tantamount to an absolute waiver of that right, and, even if arguably permitted by state law, is void as contrary to federal public policy." In re Intervention Energy Holdings, LLC, 553 B.R. 258 (Bankr. D. Del. 2016).
- 4.1.ee LLC operating agreement authorizing bank member to veto bankruptcy petition is unenforceable. After the single asset real estate LLC defaulted on its bank loan, the bank required it to amend its operating agreement to designate the bank itself as a "Special Member" of the LLC without any economic interest or voting rights except as to a "Material Action," which included authorizing a bankruptcy petition. Authorizing a Material Action required a unanimous member vote, including the consent of the Special Member, which it could deny solely in its own interest and without regard to any fiduciary duty to the borrower LLC. When the LLC defaulted again, the remaining members authorized a chapter 11 petition, and the LLC filed. State law governs what authorization is necessary to file a bankruptcy petition. If the petition is not properly authorized, the bankruptcy court will dismiss. But bankruptcy law will not enforce a contract, even a corporate control document, by which a debtor waives its right to file a bankruptcy petition, because such an agreement is against public policy. A bankruptcy remote structure requiring the consent of a special director (or LLC member) to the filing of a petition is enforceable if the director is bound by a fiduciary duty to the corporate entity. Here, however, the Special Member was not so bound but was authorized to act contrary to the LLC's interest. As such, the provision amounted to an unenforceable contractual prohibition on a bankruptcy petition. The court denies the bank's motion to dismiss the case. In re Lake Mich. Beach Pottawattamie Resort LLC, 547 B.R. 899 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2016).

- 4.1.ff Assignee for the benefit of creditors may not file a voluntary petition for the debtor. A Florida debtor made an assignment for the benefit of creditors under the Florida ABC statute. After a dispute arose in the assignment, the assignee filed a voluntary chapter 7 petition for the debtor assignor. State law determines who has authority to file a bankruptcy petition for a corporate debtor. Florida law grants that power to a corporation's board of directors. Though the Florida ABC statute requires the assignor to use the statutory language in the assignment, under which the assignor appoints the assignee "its true and lawful agent, irrevocable, with full power and authority to do all acts and things which may be necessary to execute the assignment," that power is limited to carrying out the assignment and does not contemplate authorizing the assignee to commence a bankruptcy as an alternative to the assignment. Therefore, the assignee does not have authority to file the petition. Ullrich v. Welt (In re NICA Holdings, Inc.), 810 F.3d 781 (11th Cir. 2015).
- 4.1.gg Section 903(1) prohibition on state composition procedures bars Puerto Rico's Recovery Act. Puerto Rico adopted a statute that permits a composition of some of its agencies' debts. Bondholders challenged the statute on numerous constitutional grounds and on the ground that Congress prohibited such a statute in the Bankruptcy Code. Section 109(c) permits a "municipality" to be a debtor under chapter 9. Section 101 defines "municipality" as a political subdivision or agency or instrumentality of a State and "State" as including the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico "except for purpose of defining who may be a debtor under chapter 9," so Puerto Rico municipalities are not eligible for chapter 9. Section 903(1) provides "a State law prescribing a method of composition of indebtedness of such [sic] municipality may not bind any creditor that does not consent." This provision bars any state composition proceeding, preempting Puerto Rico's composition statute. The court does not address any of the constitutional objections to the Puerto Rico statute. Franklin Calif. Tax-Free Trust v. Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, 805 F.3d 322 (1st Cir. 2015).
- 4.1.hh Court denies marijuana grower's chapter 13 conversion motion and dismisses chapter 7 case. The debtor operated a marijuana growing business, which was legal in Colorado but illegal under federal law. He filed a chapter 7 case and then moved to convert the case to chapter 13. His income other than from the marijuana business was insufficient to fund a chapter 13 plan. A debtor may convert a case to chapter 13 only if the debtor is eligible for chapter 13. Chapter 13 eligibility requires the debtor's good faith in filing the case, based on the totality of the circumstances, which include the debtor's ability to fund a plan, the burden a plan's administration would place on the trustee, and the debtor's motivation and sincerity in seeking chapter 13 relief. Here, the debtor would not be able to fund a plan except with the proceeds of his marijuana business. Using those proceeds would place an intolerable risk on the trustee by requiring him to violate federal law. Therefore, despite the debtor's sincere motivation, he did not seek chapter 13 relief in good faith, and the court denies his motion to convert. Section 707(a) permits the court to dismiss a chapter 7 case for cause. The trustee's administration of the estate's assets would violate federal law, which suffices as cause for dismissal. Therefore, the court dismisses the chapter 7 case. Arenas v. U.S. Trustee (In re Arenas), 535 B.R. 845 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2015).

- 4.1.ii Court allows a chapter 13 debtor who operates a medical marijuana business the option of exiting the business and remaining in chapter 13. The chapter 13 debtor had social security income and income from a medical marijuana business that was legal and fully compliant under state law. The debtor was in financial distress and, but for the source of some of his income, was clearly eligible for chapter 13. The federal Controlled Substances Act makes the debtor's marijuana business criminal and makes the assets used in the business contraband and subject to forfeiture. Federal officers, including the bankruptcy judge and the chapter 13 trustee, take an oath to uphold federal law. The debtor's conduct of his business is subject to the court's acquiescence. Section 959(b) of title 28 requires the trustee to comply with federal and state law. As a result, the trustee may not hold contraband or handle proceeds of criminal activity. Therefore, the court will not permit the debtor to remain in chapter 13 while he conducts his medical marijuana business. However, rather than dismissing the case, the court gives the debtor the choice of remaining in chapter 13 if he discontinues the business and destroys all contraband. In re Johnson, 532 B.R. 53 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2015).
- 4.1.jj Bond payments that are contingent on revenues do not become "due." A Colorado metropolitan district issued bonds to fund infrastructure development. The bond resolution required the district to level ad valorem taxes on all property in the district at a rate sufficient to pay principal and interest on the bonds, but not to exceed 60 mills. The only financial event of default under the bonds is the failure to levy and pay over the millage, and the bonds prohibit acceleration. As property values in the district declined during the recession, the district needed to devote more of the millage to bond payments and had insufficient revenues to pay operating expenses. After the second bond payment forbearance agreement with the bondholder expired, the district filed a chapter 9 petition. A municipality is eligible for chapter 9 only if, among other things, it is not presently paying, or will be unable to pay, its debts as they become due. The contingent nature of the bonds' payment obligation prevents the bonds from becoming "due." Therefore, the district meets neither chapter 9 insolvency test. In re Ravenna Metro. Dist., 522 B.R. 656 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2014).
- 4.1.kk LLC operating agreement prohibition on bankruptcy filing while loan is outstanding is unenforceable. The debtor LLC's Operating Agreement prohibited its filing a bankruptcy petition while its principal secured loan was outstanding. When the loan went into default, the debtor filed a chapter 11 petition. The lender moved to dismiss. Section 1109(b) provides that a party in interest, including a creditor, "may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue" in the case. A party in interest is one whose interest is directly and adversely affected pecuniarily by the case. Though a creditor seeking dismissal of a voluntary petition based on the debtor's organizational documents may be protecting only the creditor's own interest, rather than the debtor's equity owners who agreed to the documents, a creditor is a party in interest and has standing to challenge the filing as violating the organizational documents. A prebankruptcy waiver of a right to file a bankruptcy petition is unenforceable as against public policy, whether the waiver is found in a loan agreement or the debtor's organizational documents for the lender's benefit. If it were otherwise, such waivers would become standard. Therefore, the waiver is unenforceable. The court denies the creditor's motion to dismiss the petition. In re Bay Club Partners-472, LLC, 2014 Bankr. LEXIS 205 (Bankr. D. Ore. May 6, 2014).
- 4.1.ii Chapter 7 debtor automatically loses sole manager rights of an LLC and may not authorize LLC petition. An individual chapter 7 debtor was the sole member and manager of an LLC. The trustee did not take any action to assert control over or administer the LLC or to change the manager. The debtor authorized a chapter 11 petition on behalf of the LLC. State law characterizes all of a member's LLC interests as property but limits a levying creditor to execution on the profits of the LLC, not to the member's management interests. Section 541(a) includes as property of the estate all of the debtor's legal and equitable interests in property, not limited to the property on which a creditor may levy. Section 541 preempts any state law that would limit transferability of the debtor's interest in property. Therefore, the debtor's chapter 7 trustee automatically steps into the debtor's shoes with respect to the LLC. The trustee need not assert control or replace the LLC's manager. Therefore, the debtor did not have authority to file the LLC petition on behalf of the LLC, and the court dismisses the case. In re B & M Land and Livestock, LLC, 498 B.R. 262 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2013).

- 4.1.mm Court determines city's desire to effect a plan and its good faith only on objective facts and actions. Before bankruptcy, the municipal debtor took some steps to reduce its losses and sell assets to raise cash, but its financial records were in disarray, and as a result, the debtor unexpectedly confronted a $45 million cash deficit for the coming fiscal year. It quickly filed a chapter 9 petition without formulating a proposed debt adjustment plan or a plan to pay postpetition expenses and without any meaningful negotiations with its creditors. But shortly before and after the filing, the debtor prepared a budget report and presented it to city council, held open public meetings about the financing reports and the debtor's financial future, prepared an emergency fiscal plan and adopted it. To be eligible to proceed in chapter 9, a debtor must desire to effect a plan and must file its petition in good faith. A "desire" to effect a plan is the same as an intent to do so. Good faith requires that the city not use chapter 9 simply to buy time or evade creditors. Good faith is based on the totality of the circumstances. Although these factors are subjective, the court may determine their existence based only on objective facts, measured by the debtor's acts, not by a subjective inquiry into the state of mind of the debtor's officers or employees or a debtor's qualification statement filed with the court. The city's action in addressing its fiscal crisis showed its desire to effect a plan and its good faith. Therefore, the court issues the order for relief. In re City of San Bernardino, Calif., 499 B.R. 776 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2013).
- 4.1.nn Incorporated church is eligible to be a debtor. A state statute incorporated a church as "a corporation". Under state law, an incorporated church enjoys the powers, privileges and attributes of a private corporation and is an entity that is separate from its incorporators. Under church doctrine, policies and rules, the church held all its property in trust for the national church. The church did not conduct any business other than that incidental to its purposes as a church. That is, it did not engage in any general commercial activities. Under section 109, a "corporation" is eligible to be a debtor. The definition of "corporation" in section 101(9) is inclusive, not limiting. Whether something is a corporation is a federal question under section 101(9). Still, when state law considers something a corporation, it enjoys a presumption in favor of being a corporation under section 101(9). For Bankruptcy Code purposes, a corporation need not engage in business, nor need it hold property for its own benefit, rather than in trust for another. This church has the necessary attributes of a corporation and is designated as such by state law and so is eligible to be a debtor. In re Charles St. African Methodist Episcopal Church of Boston, 478 B.R. 73 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2012).
- 4.1.oo County hospital authority is a governmental unit that is not eligible for chapter 11. Georgia authorizes its counties to create a hospital authority as a "body corporate and politic" to "exercise public and essential governmental functions" and to invest it with the powers of eminent domain, to issue revenue anticipation certificates for essential public and governmental purposes and to sell its assets with public notice after a public hearing. A hospital authority is exempt from taxes to the same extent as Georgia counties and cities. The county appoints the authority's board, and its consent must be obtained before the authority may dissolve. A county created such an authority. The authority filed a chapter 9 petition. Georgia prohibits its municipalities from filing chapter 9 cases. The debtor moved to convert the case to chapter 11. An entity is eligible to be a debtor under a chapter only if it is a person. A governmental unit is not a person and is not eligible to be a chapter 11 debtor. An instrumentality of a state or a municipality is a governmental unit. Three factors affect whether an entity is a governmental unit: the extent to which it exercises traditional governmental powers, the extent of the county's control and the state's classification. The authority is a creature of a specific state statute, can exercise eminent domain, is tax exempt and may issue borrowing certificates for public and governmental purposes. The county exercises control, even though it does not exercise day-to-day control. And its designation as a body corporate and politic is a state designation that it is a governmental unit. Therefore, the authority is a governmental unit, not eligible for chapter 11, and the case must be dismissed. U.S. Trustee v. Hosp. Auth. Of Charlton County (In re Hosp. Auth. Of Charlton County), 2012 Bankr. LEXIS 3042 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. Jul. 3, 2012).

- 4.1.pp LLC Agreement provision that prohibits bankruptcy filing is enforceable. The debtor's LLC operating agreement provided that the debtor "will not institute proceedings to be adjudicated bankrupt or insolvent ... or file a petition seeking ... reorganization or relief under any applicable federal or state law relating to bankruptcy". The agreement also granted the manager "all specific rights and powers required or appropriate to the management of the Company business", but required the manager to "conduct and operate its business as presently conducted" and denied the manager authority to "do any act that would make it impossible to carry on the ordinary business of the Company". The record did not contain any evidence that the company's lender had coerced the company into adopting the non-filing provision. Applicable nonbankruptcy law determines who has authority to commence a bankruptcy case on behalf of a juridical entity. An LLC's operating agreement governs the rights and duties of an LLC's members and managers. Therefore, the non-filing provision denies the debtor the authority to file a petition. Such an agreement does not violate public policy where it is solely among the LLC's members and not induced by a creditor. Moreover, even in the absence of the provision, the LLC agreement provisions requiring the manager to operate the business "as presently conducted" and prohibiting anything that "would make it impossible to carry on the ordinary business of the Company" preclude a voluntary bankruptcy petition. Operating in chapter 11, with all of the duties placed on a debtor in possession, makes it impossible to operate in the manner in which the business was conducted before filing, and placing a company into bankruptcy is not within the ordinary course of business. DB Capital Holdings, LLC v. Aspen HH Ventures, LLC (In re DB Capital Holdings, LLC), 2010 Bankr. LEXIS 4176 (10th Cir. B.A.P. Dec. 6, 2010).
- 4.1.qq LLC statute does not permit automatic transfer of LLC voting rights to secured lender upon default. The debtor LLC's two members granted a security interest in their membership interests to a secured creditor. The security agreement provided that upon any payment obligation default, the pledge agreement automatically terminated the members' voting and distribution rights and vested them in the creditor. The members defaulted in payment and authorized a voluntary chapter 11 petition for the LLC. A person filing a voluntary petition must be duly authorized to do so under applicable nonbankruptcy law. The applicable LLC statute provides that an LLC is managed by its members, unless its articles provide otherwise, and that the granting of a security interest in a membership interest "shall not cause the member to cease to be a member or to grant to anyone else the power to exercise any rights or powers of a member". Thus, the voting rights do not transfer automatically to the creditor upon the payment default but do so only upon enforcement of the security agreement. The members therefore properly authorized the petition. In re Lake County Grapevine Nursery Ops., 441 B.R. 653 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2010).
- 4.1.rr Eligibility is not jurisdictional. The debtor filed her voluntary petition without obtaining the credit briefing (counseling) that section 109(h) requires. Section 109(h) provides, with limited exceptions, that "an individual may not be a debtor" unless the individual has received the required credit briefing. Arbaugh v. Y. & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500 (2006), distinguishes between subject matter jurisdiction and an essential element of a claim for relief. Courts should construe statutory requirements as elements of a claim, unless the statute makes clear that the requirement is jurisdictional. The bankruptcy jurisdictional provisions are set forth in section 1334 of title 28; the Code's eligibility requirements do not speak in jurisdictional terms. Therefore, an eligibility issue under section 109, as well as under section 303, is a predicate for relief, not a jurisdictional requirement for the court to hear the case. Otherwise, a case, an order for relief and all orders in the case could be subject to collateral attack, which would undermine the certainty required in bankruptcy cases. The Supreme Court's 2006 decision permits the Second Circuit to abrogate In re BDC 56 LLC, 330 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2003), which held that eligibility was jurisdictional. The appellate court leaves to the bankruptcy court's determination on remand whether to dismiss the case or strike the petition. Adams v. Zarnel (In re Zarnel), 619 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2010).

- 4.1.ss An ineligible debtor's petition commences a case and triggers the automatic stay. The debtor filed her voluntary petition without obtaining the credit briefing (counseling) that section 109(h) requires. Section 109(h) provides, with limited exceptions, that "an individual may not be a debtor" unless the individual has received the required credit briefing. Section 301 provides, "A voluntary case under a chapter of this title is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter." Section 362 provides that the filing of a petition operates as an automatic stay, but the stay is limited or does not arise if the debtor has filed one or more cases that were pending during the prior year and were dismissed. The limitation in section 301 to an entity that "may" be a debtor is directed to the chapter under which the petition may be filed, not to whether the case is or may be commenced. Moreover, if a petition for an ineligible debtor does not commence a case, then the automatic stay, which is triggered by a petition, might still go into effect, even though there is neither an eligible debtor nor a case. Moreover, its termination would be uncertain, because section 362(c)(2) provides for termination based on the end of a "case". If the automatic stay did not go into effect because an ineligible debtor's petition did not commence a case, then the bright line certainty of the automatic stay's trigger would be lost. Thus, the petition commences a case and triggers the automatic stay. The appellate court leaves to the bankruptcy court's determination on remand whether to dismiss the case or strike the petition. Adams v. Zarnel (In re Zarnel), 619 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2010).
- 4.1.tt Creditor has standing to object to unauthorized petition. The debtor's LLC agreement required the consent of its two members to file a bankruptcy petition. The nonmanaging member did not consent, but agreed not to object to the filing of a petition and not to assert any claims against the managing member for filing a petition. The managing member then approved a resolution authorizing the filing and filed the petition. The debtor's secured lender objected. Although ordinarily an equity holder objects to an unauthorized filing, a creditor has standing to object on the ground of lack of authority. Here, the LLC agreement required consent, not absence of an objection. Therefore, the petition was not properly authorized and should be dismissed. In re Carolina Park Assoc., LLC, 430 B.R. 744 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2010).
- 4.1.uu District court receivership order may enjoin involuntary bankruptcy petition. The SEC initiated a receivership proceeding in the District Court against 244 related entities involved in an international Ponzi scheme. The receivership order appointed a receiver, authorized the receiver to commence bankruptcy cases for any of the entities, and stayed litigation against the receivership and any action to interfere with the receivership, including the filing of a bankruptcy case. The district court has in rem jurisdiction over all the receivership assets sufficient to support an injunction that prevents interference with the assets. The Bankruptcy Code does not grant creditors the absolute right to file an involuntary petition. Although the district court's power should be exercised sparingly, it includes the power to enjoin a bankruptcy filing. Here, the injunction was appropriate to enable the court to retain control over numerous, scattered entities and prevent creditors of a few entities from removing assets from the receiver's control to the possible detriment of all creditors. S.E.C. v. Byers, 609 F.3d 87 (2d Cir. 2010).

- 4.1.vv Municipal debtor’s specific authorization need not be legislative; debtor otherwise meets eligibility requirements. The Legislature determined before bankruptcy that a New York public benefit corporation was “insolvent and facing closure” and that “continued operation ... is of paramount importance to the public interest”. The Governor, relying on his constitutional authority and the Legislature’s finding of a need to preserve the corporation, issued an Executive Order authorizing its filing of a chapter 9 case. The corporation developed a solution to its financial problems that required legislation, which several of its major creditors actively opposed. It engaged in negotiations with the Legislature, its major creditors and its unions to resolve its financial troubles. It worked with lenders to line up exit financing. Its plan was to obtain necessary statutory changes and exit financing that would allow it to pay creditors in cash in full upon plan consummation, but it never presented a formal plan. It was unable to reach agreement by the time it was about to run out of cash, so it filed a chapter 9 petition to protect itself and permit deferral of prepetition obligations. Section 109(c)(2) requires that a municipal debtor be “specifically authorized ... to be a debtor ... by State law, or by a governmental officer or organization empowered by State law to authorize such entity to be a debtor”. The Governor’s Executive Order provided specific authorization. The Governor’s broad executive power under state constitutional and statutory law, coupled with the Legislature’s finding of need to preserve the debtor in the public interest, adequately empowered the Governor to authorize the filing. Specific legislative authorization is not required. Section 109(c)(5) imposes a pre-negotiation requirement on a municipal debtor. The debtor must have negotiated an agreement with a majority of creditors it intends to impair under a plan or have negotiated in good faith and failed to reach agreement, or negotiation must be impracticable. Negotiations need not involve a formal plan; an outline or term sheet suffices. The debtor here negotiated in good faith but failed to reach agreement. Negotiations are impracticable when statutory changes are required to support a plan or where negotiations with large, controlling creditors break down. Thus, even though the debtor reached agreement with some creditors, negotiations were on the whole impracticable. Section 921(b) requires the court to dismiss a chapter 9 petition that was not filed in good faith. Mere desire to delay payments to creditors does not indicate lack of good faith. Lack of good faith occurs where the debtor uses bankruptcy to deter and harass creditors or uses bankruptcy as a litigation tactic, without intent to reorganize. Here, the debtor’s negotiations with creditors and the Legislature and its attempts to obtain exit financing, all of which started prepetition and continued postpetition, show the debtor’s good faith. Moreover, a debtor need not have a feasible plan in place before filing a chapter 9 petition to be in good faith. In re New York City Off-Track Betting Corp., 427 B.R. 256 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 4.1.ww Nonprofit, public benefit monorail company is not a municipality. The chapter 11 debtor owns and operates a monorail system. Its revenues come solely from passenger fares. It has no taxing power. It was formed under the state nonprofit corporation law as a nonprofit public benefit corporation. Upon dissolution, its assets revert to the state. Its by-laws allow the Governor to inspect and audit its books and records, disapprove by-law amendments, its rates and its annual budget and reject proposed board members or remove board members for cause. It financed construction by borrowing from a state agency, who issued nonrecourse tax exempt industrial revenue bonds and loaned the proceeds to the debtor under a financing agreement. It represented in its financing documents that it was an instrumentality of the state to qualify the bonds for federal tax exemption. A municipality is not eligible to file a chapter 11 case. A municipality is a “political subdivision or public agency or instrumentality of a State”. “Instrumentality” has different meanings for tax law and bankruptcy law purposes. Under bankruptcy law, whether an entity is an instrumentality of a state depends on whether the entity has powers typical of public agencies such as eminent domain, the taxing power or sovereign immunity, whether the entity has a public purpose and is subject to sufficient state control and whether the state designates the entity as an instrumentality. Here, the debtor does not have powers of a public entity and does not directly perform a public function. The Governor’s control is primarily strategic and periodic, rather than operational and constant, and is more akin to regulation than direct operational control. Finally, state law classifies it as a nonprofit public benefit corporation and does not treat it as a municipality in that it does not apply municipal finance laws or laws relating to public improvements to the debtor. Therefore, the debtor is not a municipality and is eligible to file its chapter 11 case. In re Las Vegas Monorail Co., 429 B.R. 770 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2010).

- 4.1.xx Court refuses to sanction defendant for failure, as a result of defendant's bankruptcy filing, to abide by court order. Defendant's counsel had warned plaintiff that defendant likely would file bankruptcy during the litigation. The court set a trial date and ordered the parties to prepare a joint pre-trial stipulation. Plaintiff produced a draft stipulation but received no response from defendant. Instead, defendant filed bankruptcy the day before the stipulation was due. Plaintiff sought sanctions, arguing that defendant and his counsel had acted in bad faith by allowing plaintiff's counsel to expend time and effort unnecessarily in preparing the draft stipulation without communicating defendant's intent to file bankruptcy on the due date's eve. A court has inherent power to award sanctions for vexatious or bad faith behavior; 28 U.S.C. § 1927 also authorizes sanctions, including for failure to abide by the court's order, such as the order to file the pre-trial stipulation. However, defendant had a right to file bankruptcy. Therefore, the court denies sanctions. Stone v. Stripe-a-Lot of Am., Inc., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108114 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 19, 2009).
- 4.1.yy A liquidating trust under an assignment for the benefit of creditors is not an eligible debtor. An individual operated a Ponzi scheme, in part through over 200 corporations. He made an assignment for the benefit of creditors, authorizing, among other things, the assignee to operate the corporations' businesses. Under applicable Michigan law, an assignment for the benefit of creditors creates a trust. The assignee filed a voluntary chapter 11 petition for the trust. Sixth Circuit precedent applies federal, not state, law to determine whether a trust is a business trust that is eligible to be a debtor and requires that the trust have been "created with the primary purpose of transacting business or carrying on commercial activity for the benefit of investors." The Sixth Circuit has also ruled that for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 959(a), a chapter 7 trustee is not carrying on a business by liquidating a chapter 7 estate. By analogy, therefore, the assignee is not carrying on a business, and the trust created upon the assignment is not created to transact business or carry on commercial activity and is not eligible to be a debtor. In re Estate of the Assignment for the Benefit of Creditors of May, 405 B.R. 442 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2009).
- 4.1.zz An Illinois trust is an eligible debtor. The debtor is described in its organizational documents as an "Illinois trust" (not an "Illinois land trust"). It owns a single real estate project. It lacks employees and an independent governing body, and its beneficial interests are non-transferable. However, it is authorized to conduct business and is actively engaged in business, entering into leases for its real property, borrowing under a credit agreement and entering into service agreements. It operated to generate a profit for its investors. A "business trust" is authorized to be a debtor. A business trust is created to carry on a business for a profit, not solely to hold and preserve an asset. This debtor's business activities qualify it as an eligible debtor. In re Gen. Growth Props., Inc., 409 B.R. 43 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).
- 4.1.aaa Municipal debtor with labor contract issues is eligible to file chapter 9 case. The municipal debtor faced a substantial operating deficit, largely due to labor expenses. It attempted negotiations with its principal unions but was not able to reach a collective bargaining agreement that would have eliminated the deficit. Section 109(c) permits a municipality to file a chapter 9 case only if the municipality is insolvent, desires to effect a plan to adjust its debts and "has negotiated in good faith with its creditors and failed to obtain the agreement of creditors holding at least a majority in amount of the claims of each class that [it] intends to impair under a plan" or such negotiation is impracticable. For a municipality, insolvency is determined under section 101(32)(C) on a present or projected cash flow basis. Because of its projected operating deficit, the city is insolvent. Whether a city desires to effect a plan is a subjective determination, which the city may satisfy by showing an attempt to resolve claims, by submitting a draft plan or by other evidence that the petition is not merely to buy time or evade creditors but is to implement a plan. This requirement does not contain a good faith element, which is contained separately in section 921(c). The city manager's declaration of intent to adjust debts, coupled with the city's running out of time to meet its obligations, satisfied this requirement. The negotiation requirement means that the city must have sought agreement to a plan or at least a plan term sheet, not merely negotiation over new labor agreements that would enable the city to confirm a plan. Negotiation may be impracticable, however, if there are material impediments to negotiation other than just the number of creditors. Here, the city was unable to negotiate a plan because its absence of a labor agreement that would have determined its financial future prevented it from formulating a repayment plan. Therefore, the city met the eligibility requirements to file its chapter 9 petition. Local 1186 v. City of Vallejo (In re City of Vallejo), 408 B.R. 280 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2009).

- 4.1.bbb Bankruptcy Clause does not require insolvency as a condition to filing bankruptcy. The debtor had few general unsecured claims, most of which were disputed, and a judgment for $12 million that was on appeal. The debtor was unable to post a bond to obtain a stay pending appeal. Immediately before the judgment creditor would have been able to enforce the judgment, the debtor filed a chapter 11 petition. The debtor fully disclosed all his assets in his schedules but either did not value or aggressively valued substantial assets. On a fair valuation, the debtor might have been solvent, but the debtor was illiquid. The judgment creditor did not file a proof of claim. As a result, the debtor was able to confirm a plan that paid all general unsecured creditors and left a substantial surplus. Neither the Bankruptcy Clause nor the Bankruptcy Code requires insolvency as a condition for application of the bankruptcy law. The full scope of "the subject of Bankruptcies" in the Bankruptcy Clause has never been defined, but it is broad and relates generally to the relations between creditors and debtors either unable or unwilling to pay their creditors. Any firm or individual in financial distress is eligible to be a debtor. A court may dismiss a petition, however, for bad faith, if the debtor filed without a proper rehabilitation purpose or to unreasonably deter and harass creditors. Filing on the eve of enforcement of a judgment or to avoid posting an appeal bond and aggressive assets valuations on the schedules do not constitute bad faith, and the debtor's proposal and confirmation of a plan can erase any suspicion that the debtor is using chapter 11 for an improper purpose. Marshall v. Marshall (In re Marshall), 403 B.R. 668 (C.D. Cal. 2009).
- 4.1.ccc Assignee for the benefit of creditors does not have authority to file a bankruptcy petition. The debtor's board of directors authorized an assignment for the benefit of creditors. The debtor made the assignment. After litigation began between the assignee and the directors, and with the consent of several large creditors, the assignee filed a chapter 7 case for the debtor. Management of a corporation is vested in its board of directors. Thus, the board of directors must authorize a bankruptcy filing. The assignment did not authorize the assignee to make that decision on the corporation's behalf. Therefore, the court dismisses the bankruptcy case. In re N2N Commerce, Inc., 405 B.R. 34 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2009).
- 4.1.ddd Incomplete board action may authorize closely-held corporation's petition. Creditors filed an involuntary petition against one of 19 related debtors, which consented to relief under chapter 11. Two related debtors and the 16 subsidiaries of the three principal debtors filed chapter 11 cases six months later. The debtors shared all shareholders, directors and officers. The subsidiaries' boards did not properly authorize the filing of their chapter 11 petitions. Separately, the court determined that the debtors should be substantively consolidated under the plan. A creditor objected only at plan confirmation to the debtors' filing authorization, six months after the cases were filed. Authority to file a bankruptcy petition rests with a corporation's managing body. However, whether to honor corporate formalities is an equitable determination. A closely held corporation is not held to the full rigors of corporate formalities. Because of the identity of the subsidiaries with the parents, the relaxed formalities applicable to a closely held corporation, the creditors' delay in objecting and the non-voting directors' ratification of the filing by their own inaction in objecting, the limited board actions authorizing the filings were adequate. Windels Marx Lane & Mittendorf, LLP v. Source Enterps., Inc. (In re Source Enterps., Inc.), 392 B.R. 541 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

- 4.1.eee Chapter 9's "impracticability" requirement does not apply only to a debtor with too many creditors. The debtor, a municipal health system that operated several hospitals, faced a severe liquidity crisis. It sought to restructure by issuing new bonds to refinance its debts and provide working capital, but the voters rejected the bond issue. It next attempted an asset sale, which the voters also rejected. Its liquidity problems then prevented it from having adequate time to implement a comprehensive business restructuring plan, which would have been the foundation for a negotiation with its creditors over its debts. Section 109(c)(5)(C) requires that to file a chapter 9 case, a municipality must, among other things, negotiate with its creditors, unless prepetition negotiation with creditors is impracticable. Impracticability does not contemplate only a situation in which the debtor's creditors are too numerous for meaningful negotiation. Although the debtor here had over 2700 creditors, it did not argue that it had too many creditors for real negotiations, only that it was impracticable to negotiate at all before its liquidity problems forced a filing. Because chapter 9's eligibility requirements are to be construed broadly to provide relief to distressed municipalities, any form of impracticability meets the statutory requirement. In re Valley Health Sys., 2008 Bankr. LEXIS 761 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Feb. 20, 2008).
- 4.1.fff Auto repair service contract provider is not an ineligible insurance company. The debtor sold automobile repair service contracts, usually through automobile dealers. The Illinois Service Contract Act (ISCA), based largely on the Service Contract Model Act, exempts service contract providers from regulation under the Illinois Insurance Code if they register and comply with certain financial responsibility rules. A provider who fails to comply is subject to enforcement proceedings under ISCA by the Illinois Insurance Director, but may lose its insurance regulation exemption only in certain undefined circumstances. The debtor may have violated the financial responsibility rules shortly before bankruptcy. Still, the debtor is not an insurance company that is ineligible for bankruptcy, because ISCA exempts providers from insurance regulation. The debtor is also not the substantial equivalent of an insurance company. By exempting registered service contract providers, ISCA classifies them other than as insurance companies, and even though they may have the essential attributes of an insurance company, they are not the substantial equivalent, in large part because they are not subject to the Insurance Code's rehabilitation and liquidation provisions. In re Automotive Profs. Inc., 370 B.R. 161 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007).
- 4.1.ggg A dissolved LLC may not file a bankruptcy petition. The LLC filed articles of dissolution with the Oklahoma Secretary of State, effective immediately, petitioned for and obtained the state court appointment of a receiver on the same day, and filed a bankruptcy petition seven months later. The bankruptcy petition was not authorized. Under Oklahoma law, an LLC comes into legal existence upon the filing of its articles of organization, which are cancelled upon the effective date of articles of dissolution. Since the LLC no longer existed, it was not eligible as a legal entity to be a debtor, and the filing of its petition was a nullity. Holliman v. Midpoint Dev., L.L.C. (In re Midpoint Dev., L.L.C.), 466 F.3d 1201 (10th Cir. 2006).
- 4.1.hhh The debtor has burden of proof on its officers' authority to file a petition. The debtor LLC filed a petition signed by its "authorized agent." Another party, who claimed to be the LLC's 100% owner and sole member, objected to the filing and made a prima facie case in support of her ownership. The debtor put on inconclusive evidence to the contrary. The court dismisses the petition, because the debtor has not met its burden of proof to show that it was properly authorized to file. In re Real Homes, LLC, 352 B.R. 221 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2005).

- 4.1.iii Bankrupt member of single member LLC may not authorize bankruptcy petition. The single member of the LLC debtor had previously filed a chapter 7 case. The U.S. trustee objected to the LLC's bankruptcy filing on the ground that the single member did not have authority to authorize and file the petition. In a multi-member LLC, the bankruptcy of a single member may or may not transfer management authority to the trustee, but in a single member LLC, the trustee succeeds to all of the member's economic and non-economic (management) rights. The court therefore dismisses the case. In re A-V Electronics, LLC, 350 B.R. 887 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2006).
- 4.1.jjj Creditor successfully challenges inadequately authorized LLC petition. The single asset real estate LLC's operating agreement required the unanimous vote of its members to authorize a bankruptcy petition. When the LLC fell behind on loan payments, the controlling 90% member removed the 10% member as manager and unilaterally authorized and filed a bankruptcy petition for the LLC. The mezzanine lender objected. (The court notes that the lender was secured by the LLC's membership interest but does not directly address whether it was a creditor of the LLC or only of the members.) A creditor has standing under section 1109(a) as a party in interest to object to and move to dismiss a petition that is not properly authorized, because its interests may be pecuniarily affected by the filing. The operating agreement unanimity requirement is enforceable, and the court must therefore dismiss the petition. (The court does not address whether the same result would apply in a chapter 7 case, where section 1109(a) does not apply.) In re Orchard At Hansen Park, LLC, 347 B.R. 822 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006).
- 4.1.kkk State court receivership may not bar the bankruptcy courthouse door. Creditors obtained the appointment in state court of a receiver for all of the debtor's assets. The receivership court enjoined interference with the receiver's control of the assets, authorized the receiver to remove the directors or officers, and enjoined the filing of a bankruptcy petition. The order was not effective to require dismissal of the bankruptcy petition based on lack of authority to file. Generally, determination of authority to file a bankruptcy petition for a corporation is not governed by bankruptcy law. However, protection of access to the bankruptcy courts is an important federal policy, which is governed by federal common law. Access cannot be defeated by creditors' race to the courthouse. Therefore, the state court's order, even authorizing the receiver to remove directors and officers, cannot hamper access to the bankruptcy court. In re Corp. and Leisure Event Prods., Inc., 351 B.R. 724 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2006).
- 4.1.iii State court enjoins directors from entering into sale agreement that requires bankruptcy filing. A financially healthy Delaware corporation desired to sell substantially all of its assets, which Delaware law permits only with a shareholder vote. The corporation had not filed SEC reports for several years, apparently because of disputes with its auditors over its financial statements. SEC rules prohibit solicitation of proxies from shareholders without a proxy statement, which cannot be sent unless the company is current in its SEC filings. To break the stalemate, the corporation was prepared to agree with the buyer that it would file a chapter 11 petition and consummate the sale under section 363 without a common shareholder vote. The preferred shareholders, who would not have been able to vote on the sale outside of bankruptcy, would have a vote in the chapter 11 case and, in exchange for their vote, extracted concessions from the corporation that would have been detrimental to the common shareholders. The transaction, while technically within the spirit of the law, was profoundly inequitable. Although the court recognizes that it may not enjoin the filing of a bankruptcy petition, it enjoins the board from entering into the sale agreement without complying with the shareholder vote requirement of Delaware corporate law. It orders the corporation to seek an exemption from the SEC before proceeding further with the sale. Esopus Creek Value LP v. Hauf, 2006 Del. Ch. LEXIS 200 (Del. Ch. Nov. 29, 2006) (not yet released for publication).
- 4.1.mmm Dissolved corporation is not eligible for bankruptcy. The debtor forfeited its corporate charter in 1995, which resulted in dissolution of the corporation. Nevertheless, the debtor continued to file tax returns. In 2005, in an SEC receivership action, the federal district court appointed a receiver for the corporation. The receiver filed a chapter 11 petition for the corporation. Under Texas law, a dissolved corporation continues in existence for three years to wind up its affairs. This corporation was no longer in existence. Therefore, it is not eligible for bankruptcy. In re American Heartland Sagebrush Secs. Invs., Inc., 334 B.R. 848 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2005).

- 4.1.nnn De facto LLC is eligible to be a debtor. The debtor prepared limited liability company organizational documents, obtained a unique employer identification number from the Internal Revenue Service, was carried on the town's tax rolls as the property owner, did business under the LLC name, and managed the real property. However, the LLC documents were never filed with the Secretary of State, so the LLC's legal existence was never created. Still, state law would recognize the entity as a de facto limited liability company, so the LLC is eligible as a "person" to be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code. In re 4 Whip, LLC, 332 B.R. 679 (Bankr. D. Conn. 2005).
- 4.1.ooo Foreign representative may not seek to stay action in U.S. without first obtaining recognition under chapter 15. The defendant in a civil action in the United States became a debtor in a Canadian insolvency proceeding. The Canadian receiver sought a stay of the U.S. proceeding. The court denies the stay because the receiver is a foreign representative and did not first seek recognition under chapter 15. In the absence of recognition, the court does not have authority to consider the stay request. If the receiver obtains recognition, a stay may be unnecessary, because the automatic stay of section 362 would likely apply. United States v. J.A. Jones Constr. Group, LLC, 333 B.R. 637 (E.D.N.Y. 2005).
- 4.1.ppp A limited liability company is a separate legal entity that qualifies as a "corporation" under the Bankruptcy Code definition. Gilliam v. Speier (In re KRSM Props., LLC), 318 B.R. 712 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).
- 4.1.qqq Section 304 does not encompass an ordinary (non-distress) foreign corporate reorganization. A group of English insurance companies undertook a reorganization under proceedings in the UK courts. The British director of the reorganization sought a section 304 order enjoining U.S. creditors from taking any action inconsistent with the reorganization. Section 304 does not authorize the relief, because the UK proceeding is not a "foreign proceeding," as defined in the Bankruptcy Code. "Foreign proceeding" is a "proceeding, whether judicial or administrative . . . for the purpose of liquidating an estate, adjusting debts by composition, extension or discharge, or effecting a reorganization." The term "reorganization" must be read in context to refer to distress reorganizations, whether or not for an insolvent debtor, not just an ordinary restructuring of a corporation and its affiliates. Thus, the court lacks jurisdiction to grant relief under section 304. In re Rose, 318 B.R. 771 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 4.1.rrr Court grants section 304 relief to protect Argentine APE proceeding. The debtor had commenced an out-of-court workout under the Argentine acuerdo preventivo extrajudicial (APE) law, which operates similarly to a U.S. prepackaged process, concluding with an Argentine court consideration and approval of a restructuring plan. Holders of a substantial majority of its unsecured U.S. dollar-denominated public notes and all of its unsecured bank debt voted for the restructuring proposal. One noteholder fought the proposal and sued the debtor in New York state court to collect on the notes. The debtor filed an ancillary proceeding under section 304 seeking to enjoin the state court action; the creditor opposed section 304 relief and filed an involuntary chapter 11 case against the debtor in response. The APE, even though it starts as a non-judicial proceeding, is a "foreign proceeding" as defined in the Bankruptcy Code. Because the APE law leaves the debtor in control even after the commencement of the judicial portion of the process, the debtor's board of directors may qualify as a "foreign representative" who is entitled to commence the section 304 proceeding. The differences between the APE and a U.S.

chapter 11 include differences in the way votes are solicited, so that an acceptance may be easier to cast than a rejection, and on the way votes are counted, a different classification scheme, and less judicial oversight on operations, approval standards, and application of the best interest (liquidation value) and absolute priority rules. These differences are not so great as to prevent section 304 relief. More importantly, the APE does not deny creditors due process or treat U.S. creditors unfairly, which is the applicable standard. Finally, because the standards for abstention under section 305(a)(2) are the same as for granting relief under section 304, the court dismisses the involuntary chapter 11 case. In re Board of Directors of Multicanal S.A., 314 B.R. 486 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2004).

- 4.1.sss Section 304 authorizes broad injunction. A Cayman Islands company with U.S. operations had issued Vehicle Service Contracts to hundreds of thousands of U.S. vehicle owners. One of the owners commenced a purported class action against the debtor when the company failed to honor the contracts. The company filed a foreign proceeding in the Cayman Islands, and its liquidators sought broad relief under section 304, enjoining all acts to collect on the owners' claims except through the Cayman proceeding. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in granting the relief, even though the owners may not pursue a class action in the Cayman Islands and must pursue individual claims, which might not be allowable because Cayman law does not recognize contingent claims. "Just treatment of all claims" in section 304(c)(1) may be met in this case, because Cayman law permits the owners to liquidate their claims in Cayman court, and Cayman law does not give a preference to Cayman creditors over non-Cayman creditors. The bankruptcy court's further injunction against further U.S. discovery is also within the bankruptcy court's "near blank check" authority under section 304. Hoffman v. Bullmore (In re National Warranty Ins. Risk Retention Group), 384 F.3d 959 (8th Cir. 2004).
- 4.1.ttt Dissolved limited liability company is eligible for title 11. The debtor Oklahoma limited liability company had filed articles of dissolution with the Secretary of State before filing its chapter 11 petition. The court nevertheless determines that the debtor is still a "corporation" as defined in the Bankruptcy Code, because under Oklahoma law, it still may take action to wind up its affairs and therefore must continue to exist in a legal sense. In re Midpoint Dev., L.L.C., 313 B.R. 486 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. 2004).
- 4.1.uuu Foreign bank is eligible for section 304 ancillary case. A foreign bank is not eligible under section 109 to be a debtor in a case under chapter 7 or 11. However, an ancillary case under section 304 is not a case under one of those chapters. May the foreign representative of a foreign bank therefore file an ancillary case? Apparently so. Section 109 defines eligibility only for debtors and only for the various chapters of the Bankruptcy Code and says nothing about the eligibility of a foreign representative to file a petition commencing an ancillary case. Section 304 contains no such limitation. As a result, the foreign representative could seek relief under section 304 to oust the Superintendent of Banks of the State of New York, who had seized the New York branch of a failed Yugoslav bank. Agency for Deposit Ins. v. Superintendent of Banks, 310 B.R. 793 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 4.1.vvv General partner may file voluntary petition on behalf of partnership. Section 303 of the Bankruptcy Code authorizes fewer than all of the general partners in a partnership to commence an involuntary bankruptcy case against the partnership. Neither section 303 nor section 301 (voluntary cases) addresses whether fewer than all of the general partners in a partnership may commence a voluntary case for a partnership if adequately authorized under the partnership agreement. Former Bankruptcy Rule 1004 prohibited such a filing, but because of doubts about the statutory authority for the Rule, it was amended in 2002. In this case, the court determines that neither Bankruptcy Rule 1004, as in effect before the amendment at the time this case was filed, nor section 303 of the Bankruptcy Code prohibits the filing of a voluntary case for a partnership by fewer than all of its general partners. In re Century/ML Cable Venture, 294 B.R. 9 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003).

- 4.1.www To qualify as a business trust, the trust must transact business or commercial activity for the benefit of investors. A trust account maintained by a title agency did not qualify as a business trust that is eligible for bankruptcy relief. Relying on In re Kenneth Allen Knight Trust, 303 F.3d 671 (6th Cir. 2002), the court concludes that the principle purpose of the trust account was to preserve a trust res, not to make profit or to provide a return to investors. Therefore, the so-called business trust was nothing more than bank accounts designed to preserve the funds collected from the title agency's customers for disbursement to third parties. Dayton Title Agency, Inc. v. The White Family Companies (In re Dayton Title Agency, Inc.), 292 B.R. 857 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2003).
- 4.1.xxx Eighth Circuit defines "business trust." The settlor/trustee/ primary beneficiary established a trust for his personal and business assets. The Eighth Circuit rules that federal law determines whether a trust is a "business trust" that is eligible to be a debtor under title 11. If the trust is created with the primary purpose of transacting business or carrying on commercial activity for the benefit of the investors, the trust is a business trust. The determination is fact specific based on the intention of the parties and on how the trust operated. The Eighth Circuit rejects a requirement (present under the former Bankruptcy Act) that the trust have transferable certificates of beneficial interest. Brady-Morris v. Schilling (In re Kenneth Allen Knight Trust), 303 F.3d 671 (8th Cir. 2002).
- 4.1.yyy An LLC is eligible for bankruptcy. Finding that a limited liability company has attributes of both a partnership and a corporation, the court holds that an LLC is a "person" within the definition of section 101 and is therefore a separate legal entity and an eligible debtor. However, that status requires that it be represented by an attorney and may not appear by or through its manager. In re ICLNDS Notes Acquisition, LLC, 259 B.R. 289 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2001).
- 4.1.zzz Comity is not the principal consideration under section 304. The bank, which had a claim secured by assets located in the United States, opposed the petition of the Bahamian liquidator for ancillary relief and turnover under section 304, arguing that Bahamian law subordinated the security interest to administrative expenses, which would have consumed all of the bank's collateral. The liquidator opposed, on the grounds that section 304(c)(5), requiring the court to consider comity, took precedence over considerations of the treatment of particular claims. The Second Circuit disagreed, holding that the special status that United States law gives to secured claims provided adequate grounds for denying the petition under section 304(c)(4), which focuses on a comparison of the treatment of claims in the U.S. and non-U.S. proceeding. Bank of New York v. Treco (In re Treco), 240 F.3d 148 (2d Cir. 2001).
- 4.1.aaaa Ancillary case does not require U.S. assets. In a case of first impression, the District of Columbia Circuit holds that a case ancillary to a foreign proceeding under section 304 may be filed even if the debtor has no assets in United States. Haarhuis v. Kumnan Enterprises, Ltd., 177 F.3d 1007 (D.C. Cir. 1999).
- 4.1.bbbb Section 304 grants jurisdiction to enjoin even where there is no U.S. property. A California plaintiff obtained an arrest in the Belgian courts of assets belonging to a U.K. debtor. The California plaintiff commenced a California state court action to obtain a judgment that would form the basis of establishing liability in the Belgian courts. The U.K. administrators commenced an ancillary case under section 304, and the bankruptcy court enjoined the California action. The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to do so under section 304(b)(1), even though the debtor did not have any property in the United States, because the section authorizes an injunction against "any action against a debtor with respect to property involved in such foreign proceeding.” A.P. Esteve Sales, Inc. v. Manning (in re Manning), 236 B.R. 14 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1999).

- 4.1.cccc A debtor must use his own address. The court prohibits the debtor from using his counsel’s address in his petition as a means of avoiding adverse publicity about his bankruptcy filing. In re Laws, 223 B.R. 714 (Bankr. D. Neb. 1998).
- 4.1.dddd Partnership in dissolution is not eligible for bankruptcy. One of the two partners of a partnership withdrew before the partnership filed its chapter 11 petition, resulting in the dissolution of the partnership. The Second Circuit holds “that a partnership in dissolution is not a ‘person’ eligible to avail itself of reorganization in chapter 11,” even if the sole purpose of the chapter 11 case is liquidation. C-TC Ninth Avenue Partnership v. Norton Company (In re C-TC Ninth Avenue Partnership), 113 F.3d 1304 (2d Cir. 1997).
- 4.1.eeee Unauthorized corporate filing may be ratified. A corporation owned by two fifty percent disputing shareholders filed a bankruptcy petition authorized by a resolution approved by only one of the shareholders. Upon a jurisdictional challenge brought by the other shareholder, the Fourth Circuit held that the objecting shareholders delayed in bringing the objection, effectively ratifying the corporate authorization to file the bankruptcy petition, which thereby authorized the filing. Hager v. Gibson, 108 F.3d 35 (4th Cir. 1997).

4.2 Involuntary Petitions

- 4.2.a Section 303(i) permits attorneys’ fee award for all consequences of a dismissed involuntary petition. After dismissal of the involuntary petition, the debtor brought litigation against the petitioning creditors under section 303(i)(1) for attorneys’ fees and under section 303(i)(2) for compensatory and punitive damages for the creditors’ bad faith filing. Before the court finally denied the compensatory and punitive damages claim, the creditor sought to attach and execute on its claim in state court. The debtor unsuccessfully defended that action, then filed a chapter 11 petition to obtain the automatic stay against execution of the attachment. Returning to the bankruptcy court, the debtor sought fees for its prosecution of the punitive damages claim, the defense of the attachment and execution proceeding, and the subsequent chapter 11 case. Section 303(i)(1) permits an award of costs and attorney’s fees against a creditor who unsuccessfully files an involuntary petition. Section 303(i)(2) permits an award of compensatory and punitive damages if the creditor filed the petition in bad faith. The authorization to award attorneys’ fees includes fees for pursuing the attorneys’ fees award, including the compensatory and punitive damage award. Where that claim is unsuccessful, the court may still award fees to the extent that they overlapped with the litigation under section 303(i)(1), for example, where the creditor defends that action on the ground that it filed the petition in good faith. To give full effect to the right to attorneys’ fees, the creditor may not offset the award against its claim, and the fees to be awarded may include the fees to collect or protect the award, including litigation in another court. The fees for determining whether to file a chapter 11 case to preserve the claim as an asset are also compensable, as are fees to prevent relief from the automatic stay, but not the fees for other aspects of the chapter 11 case. Nat’l Med. Imaging, Holding Co., LLC v. United States Bank, N.A. (In re Nat’l Med. Imaging, LLC), 644 B.R. 94 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2022).
- 4.2.b Convertible notes give rise to contingent claims. The debtor issued convertible promissory notes, which were convertible at their maturity at the holder’s option into equity in the debtor. The holders of the notes filed an involuntary petition against the debtor before the notes’ due date. To be an eligible petitioning creditor, the creditor must hold a claim that is not contingent. A claim is contingent if it remains uncertain at the petition date whether the debtor will be liable to pay it. The debtor would not be required to pay the notes if the holders converted. Therefore, the claims were contingent, and the creditors were not eligible petitioners. In re Qdos, Inc., 634 B.R. 552 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2021).

- 4.2.c Court may award damages only against “petitioners,” not against agents who signed the petition. Three creditors filed an involuntary petition, which the court dismissed. The debtor sought attorneys’ fees and damages from the petitioners and from the individuals who signed the petition on behalf of the petitioners. Section 303(i) permits the court to grant judgment in favor of the debtor and against the petitioners for costs, fees, and in some cases, damages. “Petitioner” does not include the individual employees or agents of the entities that hold the claims. Therefore, the court dismisses the claims against the individuals. Visium Techs., Inc. v. Tarpon Bay P’ners, LLC (In re Visium Techs., Inc.), 635 B.R. 428 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2022).
- 4.2.d Official Form 105 contains adequate allegations to withstand a motion to dismiss. The petitioning creditor filed an involuntary petition using Official Form 105, checking the boxes on that form to allege the debtor is eligible for involuntary relief, the creditor is eligible to file the petition, and the debtor is generally not paying his debts as they become due, unless subject to a bona fide dispute as to liability or amount. In response to an additional question on the form, the petitioner also listed the amount of the petitioner’s claim and asserted it was matured and unpaid. A debtor may respond to an involuntary petition with a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). Rule 9009(a) requires that Official Forms be used without alteration, which establishes the legal sufficiency of the form. Therefore, absent some defect in use of the form or in the information provided with the form, the court should deny a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). The better approach is to hold a prompt trial on the merits. In re Haymond, ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Sept. 28, 2021).
- 4.2.e Court must consider avoidance defenses in counting eligible petitioning creditors. One creditor filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. In the 90 days before the petition date, the debtor had made payments on account of antecedent debts to 15 of the 25 creditors listed on the debtor’s schedules. Section 303(b) requires at least three creditors join an involuntary petition, unless the debtor has fewer than 12 creditors, determined without counting any creditor who is an insider or received a voidable transfer. Section 547(b) makes avoidable a transfer by the debtor to or for the benefit of a creditor, for or on account of an antecedent debt, made within 90 days before the petition date, that permits the creditor to receive a greater percentage of the creditor’s claim than it would have received in a hypothetical chapter 7 case. However, section 547(c) provides that a transfer is not avoidable under section 547(b) if, among other things, the transfer is made in the ordinary course of business and according to ordinary business terms to pay an ordinary course claim. Because section 303(b) excludes a creditor from the count only if the creditor received a voidable transfer, the court must determine whether the creditor would have a section 547(c) defense and may not rely simply on the fact that the transfer met the avoidance requirements of section 547(b). Williams v. Roos, ___ B.R. ___, 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12560 (W.D. La. Jan. 22, 2021).
- 4.2.f A dispute over a portion of a claim disqualifies a petitioning creditor. A state taxing authority audited the debtor and asserted substantial claims for five tax years. The debtor challenged the claims in state court, except for a portion of one year’s claim. The taxing agency joined an involuntary petition against the debtor. Under section 303(b), a creditor qualifies as a petitioner only if the creditor has a claim that is “not subject to a bona fide dispute as to liability or amount.” The plain language disqualifies a claim that is disputed even in part. Therefore, the taxing agency is not a qualified petitioner. Mont. Dept. of Rev. v. Blixseth, 942 F.3d 1179 (9th Cir. 2019).
- 4.2.g Court must require filing of list of creditors if debtor disputes numerosity requirement for filing an involuntary petition. The alleged debtor filed a motion to dismiss the involuntary petition under Rule 12(b)(6), claiming one of the three petitioners was an investor, not a creditor. The bankruptcy court determined resolution of the motion required a trial but did not require the debtor to file an answer, as required under Bankruptcy Rule 1018, or to file a list of creditors. The court also denied discovery to the petitioning creditors. After trial, the court determined the debtor had more than 12 creditors and that only two qualifying creditors had joined the petition and dismissed the petition. Rule 1003(b) requires an alleged debtor who contests an allegation that it has fewer than 12 creditors to file a list of creditors to allow petitioning creditors to solicit others to join the petition. Contesting such an allegation is properly made in an answer to the petition, which the court should require if it denies a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Here, the court did not require an answer and so did not require the filing of the list. That constituted error. The court should require both an answer and the list whenever there is a dispute over the number of creditors. Though Rule 1013 requires disposition of a petition at the earliest possible time, Rule 1018 makes the discovery rules applicable, so a court should not dispense with discovery just to expedite trial. For these reasons, the appellate court remanded the case to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings. Hayden v. QDOS, Inc. (In re QDOS, Inc.), 607 B.R. 338 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2019).

- 4.2.h Court may not excuse the requirement of three petitioning creditors on equitable grounds. Two creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The debtor filed a response showing he had more than 12 creditors. The petitioning creditors disputed the response and claimed the debtor had defrauded his creditors. The bankruptcy court found the debtor had more than 12 creditors as of the petition date. Section 303(b) permits fewer than three creditors to file an involuntary petition only if the debtor has fewer than 12 creditors. Section 105(a), which grants the court authority to issue any order necessary to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, does not authorize the court to override specific statutory provisions on equitable grounds. Therefore, the court may not excuse the three-creditor requirement based on the debtor's alleged fraud in dealing with his creditors. Popular Auto, Inc. v. Reyes-Colon (In re Reyes-Colon), 922 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2019).
- 4.2.i Only the debtor may seek fees and costs under section 303(i). One of the debtor's two 50% shareholders opposed an involuntary petition. Because of the deadlocked board, the debtor did not oppose the petition or appear. The court dismissed the petition. The shareholder sought fees and costs for the debtor under section 303(i), which permits the court to award fees and costs "in favor of the debtor." This phrase limits standing to seek fees and costs to the debtor and does not permit any other entity to seek damages, even on the debtor's behalf. Vibe Micro, Inc. v. SIG Cap., LLC (In re 8Speed8, Inc.), 921 F.3d 1193 (9th Cir. 2019).
- 4.2.j Court dismisses involuntary chapter 11 petition by non-recourse noteholders against CDO. A structured finance vehicle known as a Collateralized Debt Obligation raised funds by issuing series of non-recourse notes with contractually-specified priorities and used the funds to purchase loans issued by unrelated entities, which secured the CDO's notes and whose payments would be used to pay its notes. The indenture for the CDO's notes contained detailed provisions for liquidation of the CDO after default. After it defaulted on its Series B notes, investors purchased 100% of its Series A-1 notes and 34% of its Series A-2 notes and, after waiving their collateral to the extent of $15,775, filed an involuntary chapter 11 petition against the CDO. They then filed a motion to terminate exclusivity to file a liquidating plan. Section 303(b) permits an involuntary petition against a person by "three or more entities, each of which is ... a holder of a claim against such person ... [that] aggregate at least $15,775 more than the value of any lien on property of the debtor." Section 102(2) provides "claim against the debtor" includes claim against property of the debtor." Section 1111(b)(1) provides a "claim secured by a lien on property of the estate shall be allowed or disallowed under section 502 of this title the same as if the holder of such claim had recourse against the debtor on account of such claim, whether or not such holder has such recourse," with exceptions relating to sale of property or treatment under a plan. Because section 1111(b)(1) provides for conversion of non-recourse claims into recourse claims for purposes of allowance or disallowance under section 502, it does not apply to determining whether a holder of a non-recourse claim holds an unsecured claim. Because section 303(b) refers to unsecured claims "against such person" rather than against the debtor, section 102(2) does not apply by its terms and does not make the holder of a non-recourse claim eligible as a holder of a claim against the debtor. Moreover, a bankruptcy court may dismiss an involuntary chapter 11 case for cause under section 1112, even if the petitioners qualify. Here, the chapter 11 case would supplant the carefully negotiated liquidation provisions in the CDO's indenture, which the petitioning creditors accepted by purchasing their notes, would disadvantage junior creditors, and would serve no rehabilitative purpose for the static investment pool alleged debtor. Therefore, the court also dismisses the petition for cause. In re Taberna Preferred Funding IV, Ltd., ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 3557 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Nov. 8, 2018).

- 4.2.k Lender may not offset a prepetition claim against a section 303(i) judgment for a bad faith filing. The lender obtained a judgment against the debtor on its claim and then, with affiliates, filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The debtor obtained dismissal of the involuntary and a judgment under section 303(i) against the lender and its affiliates for actual and punitive damages for a bad faith filing. Before obtaining the judgment, the debtor transferred the claim underlying the judgment to a third party. The lender sought to offset the two judgments, because the debtor was likely judgment proof. Setoff requires mutuality. In this case, mutuality was uncertain, because the debtor's judgment was against the lender's affiliates as well as the lender, and the debtor had assigned the underlying claim. Moreover, a court may deny setoff where the creditor has committed inequitable, illegal, or fraudulent acts. Section 303(i) discourages abuse of the involuntary bankruptcy process. The lender's bad faith in filing the petition provides equitable grounds to deny the setoff. U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Rosenberg, 581 B.R. 424 (E.D. Pa.), aff'd 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 21145 (3d Cir. July 31, 2018).
- 4.2.l CLO noteholders may not waive common security interest to qualify as unsecured petitioning creditors. Three senior noteholders filed an involuntary petition against a CLO, that is, a special purpose entity that issued notes to fund purchases of loans that would both generate cash flows to pay the notes and act as collateral for the notes. Under an indenture, the CLO granted a trustee a security interest in the loans for the equal and ratable benefit of all noteholders. The loans' aggregate value was less than the notes' aggregate amount. The petitioning creditors waived their security interest in an aggregate amount equal to $15,777. Section 303(b)(1) permits three or more creditors holding at least $15,775 in unsecured claims to file an involuntary petition against their debtor. Neither section 303(b)(1) nor the case law addresses whether a creditor holding a secured claim may waive its lien to qualify as an unsecured creditor. However, the indenture in this case grants the security interest to the trustee, not to the noteholders. As a result, the noteholders do not have authority to waive their security interest. Their waiver was ineffective to qualify them as petitioning creditors holding unsecured claims. In re Taberna Preferred Funding IV, Ltd., 578 B.R. 244 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 4.2.m Court denies a structured dismissal during the involuntary gap period. During the involuntary gap period, the alleged debtor agreed to transfer to one of the petitioning creditors certain assets whose value was uncertain due to clean-up obligations, recognize the validity of the other petitioning creditors' previously disputed claims, sell the alleged debtor's real estate and distribute the sale proceeds to all unsecured creditors who elected to participate. In exchange, upon the alleged debtor's performance of its obligations, the petitioning creditors would dismiss the petition. Unsecured creditors who did not participate in the distribution would retain any rights they had against the alleged debtor. Section 303(j) permits dismissal of an involuntary petition upon consent only after notice to all creditors. After notice, one creditor objected. Courts sometimes permit structured dismissals during a case, after the order for relief, even though they might arguably violate certain Code provisions such as the plan process requirements or the absolute priority rule in a chapter 11 case or section 726(a)'s distribution rules in a chapter 7 case. Bankruptcy Rule 1013(a) requires a court to resolve an involuntary petition "at the earliest practicable time." Neither the Code nor the Rules provide any authority for the kind of agreement proposed here, and approving an agreement that provides for dismissal only after the alleged debtor performs the agreement's obligations might violate Rule 1013(a). The court denies approval of the agreement. In re Positron Corp., 556 B.R. 291 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2016).
- 4.2.n Section 303(i) does not preempt nondebtor state law claims for damages from an involuntary petition. A creditor filed an involuntary petition. The bankruptcy court found it was filed in bad faith and dismissed it. The court awarded the debtor actual and damages punitive damages under section 303(i). Separately, the debtor's affiliates brought an action under state law for tortious interference with contracts and business relationships, alleging that the petition had caused them losses through cross-defaults on their own obligations. Federal law preempts state law if it fully occupies a field, leaving no room for state regulation. There is a presumption against preemption, which may be overcome only where Congress's purpose to preempt is clear and manifest. Section 303(i) grants the debtor a claim against petitioners upon the dismissal of an involuntary petition. Neither section 303(i) nor its legislative history gives any suggestion that Congress intended to preclude state law claims by non-debtors for damages caused by a bad faith involuntary petition. Therefore, the affiliates' action may proceed. Rosenberg v. DVI Receivables XVII, LLC, 835 F.3d 414 (3d Cir. 2016).

- 4.2.o Court issues injunction during involuntary gap to preserve proceeds of debtor's insurance policy. The debtor charter bus company suffered an accident that killed nine passengers and injured 40. The debtor had a liability insurance policy that was insufficient to cover all claims. Shortly after the accident, the insurance company reached tentative settlements with some passengers which, if consummated, would have consumed the entire policy. Several creditors filed an involuntary petition against the bus company and sought to enjoin the settlements. A bankruptcy court may issue an injunction under section 105 if not inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code and if the movant meets the requirements of Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 65 of likelihood of success on the merits, irreparable harm, balance of equities and public interest. The first two requirements are measured on a sliding scale. The petitioners have a likelihood of success if it appears likely they have standing to prosecute the involuntary petition and the debtor is generally not paying its debts as they come due. A creditor must have a claim that is not contingent as to liability and not subject to a bona fide dispute as to liability or amount. The petitioners' claims are not contingent, because the event giving rise to liability—the accident—already occurred. The insurance company's pending settlement with similarly situated creditors shows that the petitioners' claims are not subject to a bona fide dispute and though the full amount might be disputed, they clearly exceed the statutory minimum of $15,775. Therefore, the petitioners are qualified petitioning creditors. The debtor is not paying any of the accident liability claims, so it is likely that the debtor is not generally paying its debts as they become due. Therefore, the petitioners have shown a likelihood of success on the merits of the involuntary petition. If the court does not issue the injunction, a large asset that is potentially property of the estate, the insurance proceeds, would be dissipated, causing harm to the petitioners and to creditors generally. The balance of equities favors preserving potential estate assets for equitable distribution among all creditors, and the public interest is found in the Bankruptcy Code's public policy goals to the same effect. Therefore, the petitioners have met the requirements for a preliminary injunction, which the court issues. Villarreal v. N.Y. Marine & Gen. Ins. Co. (In re Oga Charters, LLC), 554 B.R. 415 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2016).
- 4.2.p Creditor may rely on undisputed portion of stayed judgment to qualify as holding a claim not subject to bona fide dispute. The creditor obtained a state court judgment against the debtor on four notes that the debtor's wholly owned corporation had issued, only two of which the debtor had guaranteed. The debtor appealed. State law stayed collection on the judgment pending appeal. The creditor joined with two other creditors in filing an involuntary petition against the debtor. In the bankruptcy case, the debtor conceded liability on the guaranteed notes, and the creditor conceded no liability on the non-guaranteed notes. A creditor is eligible to file an involuntary petition only if the creditor's claim "is not ... the subject of a bona fide dispute as to liability or amount." A claim is subject to bona fide dispute if there is either a genuine issue of material fact or a meritorious legal contention that bears on liability. A state court judgment would ordinarily automatically negate the existence of a bona fide dispute, but where enforcement is stayed, the "claim" is not yet automatically an undisputed "right to payment." The state court judgment bears on whether there is a bona fide dispute, but here, the state court's judgment on the non-guaranteed notes and the creditor's concession calls into question whether the entire claim remains subject to a bona fide dispute. However, the creditor may rely on a severable, undisputed portion of a claim under a stayed judgment to qualify as a petitioning creditor if the debtor is not prejudiced by the reliance. In this case, the debtor's liability on the guaranteed notes was sufficient to qualify the creditor as a petitioning creditor. Fustolo v. 50 Thomas Patton Dr., LLC, 816 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2016).

- 4.2.q Court dismisses involuntary petition used to resolve shareholder disputes for bad faith. The debtor owned raw land that it hoped to develop into a casino. It borrowed, including from its shareholders, to fund the development. The land was worth substantially more than the debt. But after 15 years, the debtor had made little development progress. Shareholders who were also creditors unsuccessfully attempted at a shareholder meeting to oust management, with whom they had become increasingly frustrated. Soon thereafter, some of those shareholders filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. Though the shareholder-creditors contended their purpose was to protect the property and collect on their notes, the court found their purpose was principally to change management. A court should dismiss an involuntary petition that is filed in bad faith. Determining bad faith is based on the totality of the circumstances. An involuntary petition is not to be used as a collection device. Creditors may not use an involuntary petition to obtain a disproportionate advantage over other creditors. Similarly, shareholders may not use an involuntary petition to gain a disproportionate advantage over other shareholders. Shareholder disputes are not appropriately remedied by an involuntary petition, and vindicating shareholder rights are not a proper purpose for a bankruptcy case. Here, the shareholder-creditors' involuntary petition soon after their failed attempt at the shareholder meeting to change management was an improper attempt to upend the shareholder vote, shows their desire to use the petition to settle a shareholder dispute and gain an inordinate advantage over other shareholders and, if their stated purpose was in fact to collect on their notes, improperly use bankruptcy as a collection device. Finding the totality of the circumstances to be bad faith, the court dismisses the petition. In re Diamondhead Casino Corp., 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 2450 (Bankr. D. Del. June 7, 2016).
- 4.2.r Court may dismiss one-creditor involuntary case for bad faith. The debtor's single creditor held a judgment against the debtor. The debtor's sole asset was an apartment he owed in tenancy by the entirety with his wife. The creditor filed a single-creditor involuntary case with the express purpose of using the trustee's power to sell entireties property to collect the judgment, which is a remedy not available under state law. A court may dismiss a case, whether voluntary or involuntary, if it is filed in bad faith or for "unenumerated cause." Here, there was only a single creditor in this two-party dispute. The creditor had ordinary remedies in state court under state law. The case implicated none of the collective action purposes and principles central to creditors' rights in bankruptcy, and no other creditors needed bankruptcy protection. A creditor may not use the bankruptcy court as "a rented battlefield" to continue pursuit of enforcement of a judgment. Under the circumstances, the court dismisses the case either for bad faith or for unenumerated cause. In re Murray, 543 B.R. 484 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016), aff'd sub nom. Wilk Auslander LLP v. Murray (In re Murray), ___ F.3d ___ (2d Cir. Aug. 14, 2018).
- 4.2.s Court may dismiss an involuntary petition for bad faith. The debtor and two creditors had been litigating for over five years. The creditors obtained a consent judgment against the debtor for $300,000; the debtor had a pending arbitration against one of the creditors that sought $5 million in damages. The debtor no longer operated and had no cash but hoped an arbitration award would provide funds to pay its 50 creditors over $2 million in debts. After obtaining the consent judgment, the creditor terminated the arbitration; the debtor moved to compel reinstatement. Before the court ruled, the two creditors and one other filed an involuntary petition against the debtor, which satisfied the requirements for an order for relief. Section 303 refers to a "bad faith" involuntary petition filing only in subsection (i), providing for punitive damages, after the court dismisses a petition, against a petitioner who files in bad faith. The reference suggests the court may dismiss an otherwise sound involuntary petition for bad faith, because a reading permitting only damages but not dismissal would not make sense. Bankruptcy is an equitable proceeding, which must be based on good faith. Finally, because a damages award might not cure an involuntary petition's full harm against a debtor, a court should be able to dismiss a petition filed for an improper purpose. A court should determine whether an involuntary petition is filed in bad faith based on the totality of the circumstances, the same as it does for evaluating dismissal of a voluntary petition. Using an involuntary petition as a litigation tactic or to collect a debt ahead of other creditors, contrary to bankruptcy's collective action spirit, or for retribution might constitute bad faith. Here, the creditor's effort to prevent the arbitration, collect his own claim and prevent other creditors from being paid through a potential arbitration award against the creditor constituted bad faith and justified dismissal. In re Forever Green Athletic Fields, Inc., 804 F.3d 328 (3d Cir. 2015).

- 4.2.t Creditors' lack of confidence in management is not grounds for appointment of involuntary gap interim trustee. The involuntary debtor owned real property that it had sought, for over 15 years, to develop as a casino. It had borrowed from several sources but ran short of funds. It had not paid its CEO or its rent for most of the several years before bankruptcy and had defaulted on its borrowed money obligations. Three creditors filed an involuntary petition and an emergency motion for the appointment of an interim trustee, alleging gross mismanagement by failing to pay their notes while continuing to enrich management, actions contrary to creditors' and shareholders' interests, and the lack of development progress. Section 303(g) permits the court to order the appointment of an interim trustee pending a decision on an involuntary petition "if necessary to preserve the property of the estate or to prevent loss to the estate." An order for relief on an involuntary petition is an extreme remedy with serious consequences to the debtor; the appointment of an interim trustee is an even more extreme remedy and should be administered with caution. It requires not only a showing of a need to preserve or prevent loss to property of the estate but also that the granting of an order for relief is likely. In this case, an order for relief is likely. However, the debtor was not an operating company, and there was no evidence that anything different would happen during the gap. The real property was appraised at substantially more than the debtor's debts. And the on-going decline in cash balances resulting from payment of ongoing expenses would likely continue under an interim trustee. The petitioning creditors' lack of confidence in management is not enough to justify the extreme relief of appointment of an interim trustee. Therefore, the court denies the motion. In re Diamondhead Casino Corp., 540 B.R. 499 (Bankr. D. Del. 2015).
- 4.2.u Court dismisses involuntary case against medical marijuana entity whose activities violate federal law. Creditors filed an involuntary petition against a company that had operated a medical marijuana dispensary and currently licensed its intellectual property to a dispensary. State law permitted the business's operation, but the federal Controlled Substances Act made it illegal. Section 707(a) permits a court to dismiss a case for cause. If the court granted an order for relief, the trustee would necessarily violate federal law and would be at risk for forfeiture of the debtor's assets and for criminal liability. Such circumstances constitute cause for dismissal. Therefore, the court dismisses the case. In re MedPoint Mgmt, LLC, 528 B.R. 178 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2015).
- 4.2.v Upon dismissal of an involuntary petition, the court may award fees incurred on appeal and fees incurred in seeking fees. The debtor managed entities that leased equipment from special purpose vehicles (SPVs) that securitized the leases. The SPVs appointed a lease servicer, who acted as agent for the SPVs and for the indenture trustee for the notes the SPVs issued to finance the equipment. The debtor guaranteed only to the servicer the payment of amounts owing under the leases. When the debtor defaulted on his guarantee, the servicer filed an involuntary petition against him in the name of and on behalf of the SPVs, though the SPVs' boards did not approve the filing. The bankruptcy court dismissed the petition; the SPVs were not eligible petitioners, because the guarantee ran only to the servicer, not to the SPVs. Two appellate courts affirmed. The debtor filed an adversary proceeding to recover attorneys' fees for defending the petition, for the appeals, and for the adversary proceeding itself, and for damages under section 303(i)(2) based on the servicer's bad faith in filing the petition. Section 303(i)(2) imposes two conditions to the bankruptcy court's award of fees upon dismissal of an involuntary petition: the court dismisses the petition other than by consent, and the debtor does not waive fees. It does not limit recovery to fees incurred at the trial court. It also does not require the debtor to seek fees for defending the appeal from the appellate court, under Appellate Rule 38, which permits fees on appeal only if the appeal is frivolous. Section 303(i)(1) is a fee-shifting provision, which applies when the debtor prevails, even on appeal. It applies to the whole course of proceedings in which the petition is dismissed, even to the award of fees, and includes the proceeding for the additional award of damages for bad faith under section 303(i)(2). However, the court should award fees for the bad faith litigation only after its conclusion. DVI Receivables XIV, LLC v. Rosenberg (In re Rosenberg), 779 F.3d 1254 (11th Cir. 2015).

4.2.w Regulatory payment prohibition does not make debtor's payment obligation contingent.

The alleged debtor issued trust preferred securities: it issued subordinated notes to an affiliated trust, which issued preferred equity securities to an investor. The note indenture permitted the debtor to defer interest payments for up to 20 quarters. The debtor's regulator prohibited it from making interest payments. After the deferral period expiration, the debtor defaulted on interest payments. The note indenture permits a trust preferred holder, upon a default, "to institute a suit directly against [the debtor] for enforcement of payment" of principal and interest. A "suit" is a proceeding by one party against another in court. An involuntary petition is a proceeding by the creditor against the alleged debtor in court and is therefore a suit that the investor may bring under the indenture. A creditor is eligible to file an involuntary petition if it holds a claim "that is not contingent as to liability or the subject of a bona fide dispute as to liability or amount." A claim is "contingent" when the debtor's payment obligation does not arise until the occurrence of a future event that was in the parties' contemplation. Although the regulatory order disabled the debtor from paying interest, the debtor's legal obligation to pay was fixed. Therefore, the investor is a qualified petitioning creditor. FMB Bancshares, Inc. v. Trapeza CDO XII, Ltd. (In re FMB Bancshares, Inc.), 517 B.R. 361 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 2014).

4.2.x Limited liability partnership is not a general partnership. A partner in a limited liability partnership filed an involuntary petition against the partnership. Section 303(b)(3) permits a general partner to file an involuntary petition against a general partnership. Section 101(9)(A)(ii) defines "corporation" to include a "partnership association organized under a law that makes only the capital subscribed responsible for the debts of such association." The Bankruptcy Code treats the terms corporation and partnership as mutually exclusive: if an association is a corporation, it is not a general partnership. Applicable nonbankruptcy law determines whether an association's partners or members are liable for the association's debts, but labels are not determinative. Here, applicable nonbankruptcy law protects the LLP's partners from personal liability for the LLP's debts. Therefore, the LLP is a corporation for Bankruptcy Code purposes, and its "partners" are not general partners as that term is used in section 303(b)(3). Therefore, the court dismisses the involuntary petition. In re Beltway Law Group, LLP, 514 B.R. 341 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2014).

4.2.y Counsel fees for unsuccessful involuntary petition defense are not allowable as a gap claim. Counsel unsuccessfully defended an involuntary petition against the debtor. Counsel sought fees for the work as a gap priority claim. Section 507(a)(3) gives priority to claims allowed under section 502(f), which allows as a prepetition claim one "arising in the ordinary course of the debtor's business or financial affairs after the commencement of the case." The defense of an involuntary petition is not in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs. Therefore, the claim is not allowable under section 502(f). The claim is also not allowable under section 330, which allows compensation only for professionals employed under section 327 or 1103 at the expense of the estate. Therefore, the claim is allowable only as a general unsecured claim. In re Babb Steel, Inc., 495 B.R. 530 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2013).

- 4.2.z Unstayed appealed judgment is not the subject of a bona fide dispute. The petitioning creditors obtained judgments against the debtor for intentional torts. The debtor appealed but did not obtain a stay pending appeal. While the appeal was pending, the creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. Section 303(b)(1) permits an involuntary petition only by three or more holders of claims that are not “the subject of a bona fide dispute as to liability or amount”. Generally, whether a claim is the subject of a bona fide dispute requires the bankruptcy court to determine whether there is an objective basis for a factual or legal dispute. “Claim” means “right to payment, whether or not such a right is reduced to judgment”. Thus, the petitioners’ “claim” here is the judgment, not the underlying tort claim, and the judgment is not subject to a bona fide dispute. Permitting the bankruptcy court to look behind an unstayed judgment would improperly permit a non-Article III federal court to examine whether a state trial court erred and would run counter to federalism principles and 28 U.S.C. § 1738, which requires federal courts to give full faith and credit to state court judgments. A dissent argues that a judgment is not a “claim” and that the court should examine the judgment to determine whether there is a bona fide basis for appeal. Marciano v. Chapnick (In re Marciano), 708 F.3d 1123 (9th Cir. 2013).
- 4.2.aa Section 303(i) permits a fee award for collection of a section 303(i) award. The creditor brought a bad faith involuntary petition against the debtor. The court dismissed and awarded attorneys’ fees, damages and punitive damages under section 303(i). The creditor then filed his own voluntary bankruptcy petition, which was later dismissed. After the dismissal, the creditor paid the section 303(i) award from the first case. The debtor sought additional attorneys’ fees for the effort to challenge the creditor’s bankruptcy and collect the award because of the creditor’s bad faith conduct. Generally, a fee-shifting statute permits recovery of all fees incurred, including fees incurred to collect a judgment. Section 303(i), which authorizes an award of attorneys’ fees and damages against a petitioning creditor, is a fee-shifting statute. As such, the general rule applies. Moreover, a debtor who must incur fees to collect a section 303(i) award incurs additional damages flowing from the involuntary petition. Accordingly, the court may award post-dismissal fees to collect the award, whether incurred in the bankruptcy court or elsewhere. Adell v. John Richards Homes Bldg Co., LLC (In re John Richards Homes Bldg Co., LLC), 475 B.R. 585 (E.D. Mich. 2012).
- 4.2.bb Appealed, unstayed state court judgment establishes that claims are not subject to bona fide dispute. As sanctions for repeated discovery abuses, the state court struck the debtor’s answer to the complaint and entered judgment for an amount determined by a jury. The debtor appealed. The appellate court denied a stay pending appeal. Several plaintiffs obtained liens on the debtor’s property in enforcement actions. Others filed an involuntary petition against the debtor within 90 days after the first plaintiffs obtained the liens. An involuntary case is commenced by the filing of a petition by creditors who hold claims that are not contingent as to liability or the subject of a bona fide dispute as to liability or amount. An unstayed state court judgment (other than a default judgment) establishes a debtor’s liability and that it is not in bona fide dispute for purposes of section 303. Moreover, the petitioners’ good faith in filing the petition is not relevant to whether the court should grant an order for relief. It is relevant only if the court dismisses the case and must determine attorneys’ fees and damages under section 303(i). Marciano v. Fahs (In re Marciano), 459 B.R. 27 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).
- 4.2.cc Creditors holding joint judgment do not count as separate creditors. A husband and wife and their jointly owned business sued the alleged debtor on three separate claims. The debtor settled with all three by a consent judgment in a single amount that was not allocated to any of the plaintiffs. The three plaintiffs then filed an involuntary petition against the alleged debtor.

Section 303(b)(1) permits an involuntary petition “by three or more entities, each of which is ... a holder of a claims against” the debtor. Courts apply the “three or more” requirement flexibly where more than one creditor holds a note or judgment against the debtor, but where the creditors cannot act separately in enforcing the obligation, courts treat the group as one creditor for purposes of section 303(b)(1). Here, the settlement combined the three creditors’ claims into a single judgment that could not be allocated among the creditors. Therefore, the group was a single creditor for purposes of section 303(b)(1). Husztj v. Husztj, 451 B.R. 717 (E.D. Mich. 2011).

- 4.2.dd A valuation dispute over a CDO’s assets is not a ground to dismiss a chapter 11 petition. The debtor's sole business is a CDO-squared vehicle that owns a pool of securities that serves as collateral for its notes. Under the indenture for the notes, a default terminates the collateral manager’s right to manage the pool actively and permits it only to collect payments on the underlying securities and distribute the cash to holders of notes according to their priorities. The debtor defaulted. Holders of senior notes filed an involuntary petition to avoid the indenture restriction on active management of the securities after a default. The debtor did not oppose the petition. The court ordered relief. The petitioning creditors filed a plan that provided for the transfer of the pool to the senior noteholders. Holders of junior notes moved to dismiss. Filing a petition and a plan to avoid transfer restrictions is consistent with chapter 11's purpose. Whether the court confirms the plan depends on whether the securities are worth more than the amount of the senior notes. But a valuation dispute is not a ground to dismiss the petition. In re Zais Inv. Grade Ltd. VII, 455 B.R. 839, (Bankr. D.N.J. 2011).
- 4.2.ee Only the trustee may appeal an involuntary order for relief. Creditors filed an involuntary chapter 11 petition against a corporate debtor. The debtor opposed, but the bankruptcy court ordered relief and then converted the case to chapter 7. A trustee was appointed. The corporation’s managers appealed from the order for relief in the name of the corporation. The trustee moved to dismiss the appeal for lack of appellate standing. Only a person aggrieved may appeal a bankruptcy court order. Here, the corporation may have been aggrieved. However, under CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343 (1985), upon his appointment, the trustee succeeds to the corporation’s management and assets, and corporate officers are completely ousted. Therefore, only the trustee has the right to appeal from the order for relief on behalf of the corporation. C.W. Mining Co. v. Aquila, Inc. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 636 F.3d 1257 (10th Cir. 2011).
- 4.2.ff Section 303(i) permits attorney’s fees for fee litigation and punitive damages without actual damages. Thirteen related creditors filed involuntary petitions against two related debtors. The creditors’ claims were the subject of a bona fide dispute, so the court dismissed the petitions. It then awarded attorney’s fees for the involuntary petition litigation and the fees litigation. It also awarded punitive damages, but no actual damages. Section 303(i) permits the court, upon dismissal of an involuntary petition, to award attorney’s fees and, if the petition was filed in bad faith, damages caused by the filing or punitive damages. Unlike Rule 11, which is a sanctions provision, section 303(i) is a fee-shifting statute. A fee-shifting statute permits an award of fees for the entire litigation, not just for a specific filing during the course of the litigation. A fee-shifting statute therefore permits an award of attorney’s fees for the fee litigation because a fee-shifting statute shifts fees for all phases of the litigation and because not permitting such fees would effectively dilute the fees for the remainder of the litigation. Federal common law generally prohibits awarding punitive damages where there are no actual damages, but a statute may authorize them. Section 303(i)(2) does so, because it authorizes punitive damages even in the absence of actual damages. In this case, however, the cost of defending the involuntary petition could be construed as actual damages, thus supporting the court’s award of punitive damages. Orange Blossom Ltd. P’ship v. So. Calif. Sunbelt Developers, Inc. (In re So. Calif. Sunbelt Developers, Inc.), 608 F.3d 456 (9th Cir. 2010)

- 4.2.gg Voluntary case filing while involuntary petition is pending amounts to consent to an order for relief in the involuntary case. Three creditors filed an involuntary chapter 7 petition against the debtor, which filed a voluntary chapter 11 petition in the same district 26 days later. The debtor sought dismissal of the involuntary petition on mootness grounds. The court rejects case law under the former Bankruptcy Act, which was based on different, lengthier procedures for involuntary petitions under the Act and which determined whether to proceed with the voluntary case based on whether prejudice would result from the later filing date. Instead, the court treats the voluntary petition as the functional equivalent of the debtor's admission that an order for relief should be entered in the involuntary case and the two cases consolidated under Rule 1015. Sections 301, 706 and 1112 allow the debtor to select the chapter under which a voluntary case should proceed. The same procedure should apply here, rather than requiring the debtor to seek conversion, so the court orders relief under chapter 11, effective as of the date of the voluntary petition. In re Premier Gen. Holdings, Ltd., 427 B.R. 592 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2010).
- 4.2.hh Section 303(i) does not require joint and several liability against all petitioning creditors. The debtor obtained a dismissal of the involuntary petition and sought fees against only one petitioning creditor. The bankruptcy court required the debtor to serve all petitioning creditors with the motion and awarded fees against all jointly and severally, under a tort theory. Section 303(i) provides that the bankruptcy court "may" award fees upon dismissal of an involuntary petition. The provision is permissive and discretionary, not mandatory. Therefore, the bankruptcy must exercise its discretion, based on the totality of the circumstances, including relative culpability among the petitioners, motives and objectives and reasonableness of conduct, in determining an award of fees against each petitioner. Tort theories have no role in section 303(i)'s application. Sofris v. Maple-Whitworth, Inc. (In re Maple-Whitworth, Inc.), 556 F.3d 742 (9th Cir. 2009).
- 4.2.ii Involuntary bankruptcy petitioner eligibility requirements are no longer subject-matter jurisdictional in the Eleventh Circuit. Several years after the court entered an order for relief, the debtor sought dismissal on jurisdictional grounds of a single-creditor involuntary petition in a case in which the debtor had more than 12 creditors. Reversing its panel decision in this case, 525 F.3d 1095 (11th Cir.), and overruling its prior panel decision, In re All Media Props., Inc., 646 F.2d 193 (5th Cir. Unit A 1981), the Eleventh Circuit en banc concludes that the requirements for an involuntary petition are not jurisdictional. A statute's requirements are jurisdictional if the statute clearly expresses the substantive requirements for relief in jurisdictional terms. Section 303(b)'s petitioning creditor qualification requirements do not speak in jurisdictional terms, nor is there any indication that Congress intended bankruptcy courts to consider petitioning creditors' qualification sua sponte, as they must do if their subject matter jurisdiction is at stake, because section 303(h) requires the court to grant relief if the petition's allegations are not timely controverted. Therefore, the requirements are not jurisdictional and may be waived, as they were in this case. Trusted Net Media Holdings, LLC v. The Morrison Agency, Inc. (In re Trusted Net Media Holdings, LLC), 550 F.3d 1035 (11th Cir. 2008).
- 4.2.jj Involuntary bankruptcy creditor eligibility requirements remain subject-matter jurisdictional in the Eleventh Circuit. Several years after the court entered an order for relief, the debtor sought dismissal on jurisdictional grounds of a single-creditor involuntary petition in a case in which the debtor had more than 12 creditors. Although the Eleventh Circuit panel concludes that the requirements for an involuntary petition are not jurisdictional, it determines that it is bound by an earlier Eleventh Circuit decision to the contrary and dismisses the case. Trusted Net Media Holdings, LLC v. The Morrison Agency, Inc. (In re Trusted Net Media Holdings, LLC), 525 F.3d 1095 (11th Cir.), vacated and ordered reh'g en banc, 530 F.3d 1363 (11th Cir. 2008).
- 4.2.kk LLC member's right to consent to a voluntary petition is enforceable. The lender advanced funds and took a note and a "Class B" equity interest in the Georgia LLC debtor. The LLC agreement prohibited certain major decisions, including filing a voluntary bankruptcy case, without the Class B holder's consent. Some of the "major decision" provisions expired upon payment of the loan, but the right to consent to a voluntary petition did not. On the eve of the lender's foreclosure and after the Class B holder refused consent to a voluntary petition, the debtor orchestrated an involuntary petition. The lender/Class B holder moved to dismiss the petition. Georgia law permits LLC members to make all decisions in managing an LLC. The LLC agreement's provision giving the Class B holder the right to veto a voluntary petition is therefore enforceable. Only the debtor may contest an involuntary petition. But the court may consider the grounds the lender asserted (that the petitioning creditors did not have standing) in determining whether the involuntary petition was filed in bad faith, and the traditional bad faith filing analysis applies equally to an involuntary petition. The circumstances of this case, which include a "pure subterfuge for a voluntary petition", evidence bad faith, so the court dismisses the case. In re Global Ship Sys., LLC, 391 B.R. 193 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2007).

4.2.ii Court may award attorney's fees and costs against fewer than all petitioners. Section 303(i)(1) permits a court to award attorney's fees and costs against "the petitioners" if the court dismisses an involuntary petition. Section 303(i)(2) permits the court to award "damages proximately caused by" the petition and "punitive damages" against "any petitioner that filed the petition in bad faith". Section 303(i)(2) imports tort concepts, which include the concepts of joint and several liability against joint tortfeasors and contribution or indemnity among them. Under the former concept, the tort victim need not pursue a claim against all tortfeasors, as their liability is joint and several. Section 303(i) should be read to incorporate the same concept, so the alleged debtor need not seek recovery from all petitioners, even under section 303(i)(1). Any petitioner who is held liable may seek contribution or contractual indemnity from the others in the bankruptcy court, through a motion to join the other petitioners, a third-party action, or an independent equitable action against them. A dissent argues that "the petitioners" in section 303(i)(1) means something different from "any petitioner" in section 303(i)(2) and that the court should recognize the difference by requiring any claim for attorney's fees and costs to be brought against all petitioners. Neither the majority nor the dissent mentions section 102((7), which provides, "the singular includes the plural", but not the opposite. Sofris v. Maple-Whitworth, Inc. (In re Maple-Whitworth, Inc.), 375 B.R. 558 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

4.2.mm Court dismisses involuntary chapter 11 case where it cannot effectively reorganize Argentine debtor that is already proceeding under an Argentine Concurso Preventivo. The debtor had been the subject of an Argentine Concurso Preventivo (the rough equivalent of a U.S. chapter 11 case) for over five years. Dissatisfied with the Concurso's progress, several holders of U.S. dollar-denominated unsecured notes filed an involuntary chapter 11 case in New York. The debtor's only U.S. assets were U.S. registered trademarks; nearly all of its assets, business, customers, suppliers, and trade creditors were in Argentina. On a section 305(a)(1) motion to abstain, the court must consider, among other things, the availability of fair, economical, efficient, and equitable alternative relief. Although a Concurso differs from a chapter 11 case in several respects, including no automatic stay of secured creditor enforcement actions, no equitable subordination or broad discovery, a Concurso is fundamentally similar to chapter 11 and provides fair, economical, efficient, and equitable relief to creditors and the debtor. A chapter 11 case would serve little purpose here, because the U.S. court would not be able to enforce many of its own orders, let alone a plan confirmation order, in Argentina, and coordination of the two cases and potential plans would be rendered challenging at best by the differences in the two laws' classification and treatment regimes. Chapter 11's only benefit in this case would be the automatic stay of secured creditor enforcement action, which would be enforceable because the principal secured creditors are Delaware companies. However, the automatic stay is not an end in itself but a means to achieving reorganization or liquidation. Where neither is a realistic possibility in the U.S. court, the case should not be retained solely to perpetuate the stay. Therefore, the court dismisses the case. In re Compañía de Alimentos Fargo, S.A., 376 B.R. 427 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

- 4.2.nn Court may limit the time for joinder in an involuntary petition. Section 303(c) provides that a creditor may join an involuntary petition “after the filing of [the petition] but before the case is dismissed or relief is ordered”. At a status conference shortly after the involuntary petition was filed, the debtor challenged the qualifications of two of the four petitioning creditors. The court set a deadline of the day before the involuntary petition trial, 10 days hence, for other creditors to join in the petition and ordered notice of the deadline be given to other creditors. One creditor joined, but after the deadline. Rule 1003(b) requires the court to “afford a reasonable opportunity for other creditors to join in the petition”. Rule 1013(a) requires that an involuntary petition be determined expeditiously. These rules permit the court to make orders governing the conduct of the case and to exercise its case management role. Section 303(c) does not limit application of those provisions. It provides only a maximum time limit on joinder, not a minimum. Riverview Trenton RR Co. v. DSC, Ltd. (In re DSC, Ltd.), 486 F.3d 940 (6th Cir. 2007).
- 4.2.oo Court may award attorney’s fees for an involuntary petition dismissed under section 305. The debtor lost patent litigation. Realizing it could not pay the judgment, it made an assignment for the benefit of creditors. The assignee sold all the debtor’s assets about four months later, though for just a fraction of what was owing. The patent creditor, who did not participate in the assignment, filed an involuntary bankruptcy petition against the debtor four days after the sale. The court determines that the interests of creditors and the debtor would be better served by dismissal and dismisses the petition under section 305(a). The court then awards the debtor attorney’s fees against the petitioner. Section 303(i) permits an attorney’s fee award “if the court dismisses a petition under this section other than on consent of all petitioners and the debtor, and the debtor does not waive judgment under this subsection”. This section authorizes a fee award even for a dismissal under section 305(a) because “under this section” modifies “petition” rather than “dismisses”. Therefore, the Code permits a fee award for any dismissal of an involuntary petition. However, because the authority is so broad, the court should exercise caution in awarding fees upon a dismissal under section 305(a), as a petition might be entirely proper yet should be dismissed on the basis of the interests of creditors and the debtor. In this case, the debtor had made an assignment, which was nearly concluded, so the petition appeared to be for litigation advantage rather than for a proper use of bankruptcy, and fees were therefore appropriate. Wechsler v. Macke Int’l Trade, Inc. (In re Macke Int’l Trade, Inc.), 370 B.R. 236 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).
- 4.2.pp Creditor may not offset claim against section 303(i) fee award. After the court dismissed an involuntary petition, it awarded fees against the creditor under section 303(i). The creditor may not offset its claim against the award. Otherwise, there would be little penalty to a creditor that files an improper petition. In many cases, even where a petition is improper, there is a risk that the creditor will not receive full recovery on its claim. Allowing the setoff would permit full recovery, would thereby reduce the downside to a creditor’s resort to an involuntary petition, and would not fully compensate the debtor for the loss it suffered in successfully defending against the petition. It would undercut a debtor’s ability, which section 303(i) was designed to bolster, to resist a creditor’s use of an involuntary petition for litigation advantage. Wechsler v. Macke Int’l Trade, Inc. (In re Macke Int’l Trade, Inc.), 370 B.R. 236 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).
- 4.2.qq Court may not award attorney’s fees to nonpetitioning creditors. A petitioning creditor filed an involuntary case in bad faith to stop a foreclosure. The court annulled the automatic stay to validate the foreclosure sale and dismissed the petition. The nonpetitioning creditors, which included the foreclosing mortgagee and the foreclosure sale purchaser, sought attorney’s fees against the bad faith petitioner. Section 303(i) permits the court, “if the debtor does not waive the right to judgment,” to grant judgment “(1) against the petitioners and in favor of the debtor” for attorney’s fees and “(2) against any petitioner that filed the petition in bad faith” for proximate and punitive damages. The difference in clauses (1) and (2) creates an ambiguity that suggests that proximate and punitive damages may be awarded in favor of an entity other than the debtor, such as the nonpetitioning creditors who opposed the petition and were harmed by the stay and delay the petition caused. However, the introductory clause makes clear that the court may grant judgment only in favor of the debtor under both clauses. Section 105(a) does not empower the court to grant damages, because section 303(i) provides the exclusive remedy for damages for a bad faith involuntary petition, and section 105(a) therefore may not override section 303(i)'s prohibition on granting fees to a nondebtor. In re VII Holdings Co., 362 B.R. 663 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007).

- 4.2.rr Creditor may not contest involuntary petition to which debtor consents. The debtor's affiliate filed an involuntary petition against it, alleging a debt to the affiliate that was undisputed and liquidated. After the court granted relief, a creditor moved to dismiss the petition. The creditor argued that because the debt was disputed and unliquidated, the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction over the case, citing In re BDC 56 LLC, 330 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2003), which holds that the requirement of a liquidated undisputed claim is "subject matter jurisdictional" under section 303(b). However, section 303(d) permits only the debtor to contest an involuntary petition, and section 303(h) mandates that the court order relief on an uncontested petition. Granting a creditor's late motion to dismiss on section 303(b) grounds would effectively nullify these other provisions of section 303, which have equal dignity with the jurisdictional limits of section 303(b). Therefore, the court denies the motion to dismiss. In re MarketXT Holdings Corp., 347 B.R. 156 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.).
- 4.2.ss Bankruptcy court may resolve legal dispute on involuntary petition. Petitioning creditors must have claims that are not subject to bona fide dispute. However, the court may conduct a limited legal analysis of disputed issues of law on largely stipulated facts. Here, although the debtor argued that it was not liable to the petitioning creditors under agency law, the law was clear on the issue, and the debtor did not show any clear alternative line of authority that would lead to a different conclusion. The bankruptcy court may determine whether there is a good faith legal dispute. Where there is not, the court may issue the order for relief. Mktg. and Creative Solutions, Inc. v. Scripps Howard Broad. Co. (In re Mktg. and Creative Solutions, Inc.), 338 B.R. 300 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).
- 4.2.tt Not guilty plea does not create bona fide dispute over petitioning creditor's claim. The debtor admitted to shooting his wife and mother-in-law. The wife's estate representative asserted a claim for wrongful death and filed an involuntary petition with two other creditors. The debtor had pled not guilty in the criminal case. That plea did not raise a bona fide dispute for purposes of determining the creditor's eligibility to file a petition under section 303(b)(1). In a civil case such as the bankruptcy proceeding, the plea amounts to a mere denial. The bankruptcy court must apply an objective standard to determine whether there is a bona fide dispute. The debtor must show that there are substantial factual or legal questions that bear upon liability. Given the debtor's crime scene admission, there was no bona fide dispute about his liability for wrongful death. Metz v. Dilley (In re Dilley), 339 B.R. 1 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2006).
- 4.2.uu Non-profit company that engages in commercial activity is not subject to involuntary bankruptcy. Under section 303(a), a corporation that is not a "moneyed, business, or commercial corporation" is not subject to an involuntary bankruptcy petition. Courts have construed the phrase to encompass entities organized as not-for-profit entities. The alleged debtor was a "Community Housing Development Organization," organized as a non-profit corporation under Texas law to own and operate low-income housing. It owned and operated a 220-unit apartment complex. Despite the operation of a commercial facility—the apartment complex—the debtor is not a "moneyed, business, or commercial corporation" for purposes of section 303(a). Although a court may look past non-profit incorporation to determine whether an alleged debtor is a moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, mere ownership and operation of a commercial facility do not qualify the debtor as eligible for involuntary bankruptcy. In re MAEDC Mesa Ridge, LLC, 334 B.R. 197 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2005).

- 4.2.vv Farmer may waive exemption from involuntary bankruptcy. Years after the court issued an order for relief on an involuntary petition, the debtor moved to dismiss the case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because he was a farmer. The farmer exemption from involuntary bankruptcy is a defense that must be raised or it is waived. It does not go to the court's subject matter jurisdiction. Subject matter jurisdiction is granted by 28 U.S.C. § 1334. Section 303(b) exempts a farmer from involuntary bankruptcy, but section 303(h) requires the court to grant an order for relief on an involuntary petition if it is not timely controverted. Therefore, a farmer must timely assert his status to defeat the petition. Marlar v. Williams (In re Marlar), 432 F.3d 813 (8th Cir. 2005). Accord U.S. Bank N.A. v. Young (In re Young), 336 B.R. 775 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2006) (farmer exemption from involuntary petition is not jurisdictional).
- 4.2.ww Section 303(i) provides the exclusive remedy for filing an involuntary petition that is dismissed. After the bankruptcy court dismissed involuntary petitions against a husband and wife, the couple's children brought actions against the petitioners in state court for state law torts arising from the distress caused the children by the parent's bankruptcies. The creditors removed the actions to the bankruptcy court, which dismisses them. Section 303(i) provides the exclusive remedy against a creditor who files an involuntary petition that is later dismissed and preempts any state law remedies. Section 303(i) is a comprehensive remedial scheme. It is important to the effectuation of Congressional policy that neither state law nor state courts determine the consequences of filing a bankruptcy petition, which could subvert the bankruptcy court's exclusive jurisdiction and undermine uniformity. Miles v. Okun (In re Miles), 430 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2005).
- 4.2.xx Creditor's lack of knowledge that debtor had more than 12 creditors does not require dismissal of one-creditor petition for bad faith. The creditor had obtained a judgment against the debtor and had taken post-judgment discovery in which the debtor could not identify more than 8 creditors. Nearly a year later, shortly before the creditor filed a one-creditor involuntary petition, the debtor's counsel wrote to the creditor's counsel stating that the debtor had at least 17 creditors, but did not identify them. An involuntary petition filed by a creditor who knows that the debtor has more than 12 creditors must be dismissed as a bad faith filing. The debtor moved to dismiss the petition on the ground that the creditor filed in bad faith. Because the bankruptcy court found that the creditor did not know that the debtor had more than 12 creditors, the petition was not filed in bad faith. Bock Transp., Inc. v. Paul (In re Bock Transp., Inc.), 327 B.R. 378 (Bankr. 8th Cir. 2005).
- 4.2.yy Court may limit time for joinder in an involuntary petition. Section 303(c) provides that a creditor may join an involuntary petition "after the filing of [the petition] but before the case is dismissed or relief is ordered." At a status conference shortly after the involuntary petition was filed, the court determined that only two of the petitioning creditors qualified as petitioners. It ordered the petitioners to give notice of a deadline for other creditors to join the petition. Two did so, but after the deadline. The court disallowed their joinder, reasoning that Rule 1013 (which requires that an involuntary petition be determined expeditiously), Fed. R. Civ. P. 16 (which applies to the trial of a contested involuntary), and section 105(d) all permit the court to make orders governing the conduct of the case and to exercise its case management role. Section 303(c) does not limit application of those provisions. It provides only a maximum time limit on joinder, not a minimum. In re DSC, Ltd., 325 B.R. 741 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2005).
- 4.2.zz Co-op that contracts out farming operations is ineligible for involuntary bankruptcy. The debtor contracted out all of its pig farming operations. It purchased the pigs, arranged with independent contractors to transport the pigs to hog producers to raise them, sold the raised pigs to packers, and hired trucking companies to ship the pigs to the packers. The debtor was not a passive investor. It actively oversaw and supervised the operations. The fact that the operations were conducted by independent contractors rather than employees does not make the debtor any less a farmer and therefore ineligible for involuntary bankruptcy. Cooperative Supply, Inc. v. Corn-Pro Nonstock Coop., Inc. (In re Corn-Pro Nonstock Coop., Inc.), 318 B.R. 153 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2004).

- 4.2.aaa Foreign debtor is not immune from an involuntary petition. A Brazilian company was undergoing an out-of-court workout in Brazil. It had minimal assets in the United States but had raised substantial capital here. A U.S. creditor who did not agree with the conduct of the out-of-court work-out process filed an involuntary petition against the company in New York. The record indicated that a Brazilian court would not enforce a U.S. bankruptcy court's orders dealing with the debtor's property or with Brazilian creditors. The court nevertheless could not dismiss the case on the ground that it would be too difficult to obtain the debtor's cooperation in the case or to obtain jurisdiction over the debtor's property outside the United States. The court has subject matter jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1334, and the debtor, by reason of having property in the United States, is an eligible debtor under section 109(a). Assuming the court has personal jurisdiction over the debtor based on "minimum contacts," the court's in rem jurisdiction over the debtor's property, "wherever located," would allow it to issue orders necessary to deal with the property and manage the case, and its in personam jurisdiction over the debtor would permit it to issue and enforce orders regarding the conduct of the case and of the debtor, as debtor in possession. Where the court has such jurisdiction, it must exercise it, unless Congress authorizes abstention, such as under section 305(a). GMAM Inv. Funds Trust I v. Globo Comunicacoes e Participacoes S.A. (In re Globo Comunicacoes e Participacoes S.A.), 317 B.R. 235 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 4.2.bbb Dispute over claim amount does not create disqualifying bona fide dispute. Although the alleged debtor disputed the amount it owed the petitioning creditors, it did not seriously dispute the existence of a debt in an amount greater than the amount required to file an involuntary petition. Such a dispute is not a bona fide dispute that disqualifies the petitioning creditors. Focus Media, Inc. v. National Broad. Co. (In re Focus Media, Inc.), 378 F.3d 916 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 4.2.ccc Fees for dismissal awarded under "totality of circumstances" test. After dismissing an involuntary chapter 7 case that appeared to have been filed to destroy a competitor, the bankruptcy court awarded fees to the alleged debtor. Although the award of fees is not mandatory, the presumption is in favor of fees, and the petitioners have the burden to rebut the presumption. The Ninth Circuit adopts the totality of the circumstances test for determining whether they have done so. Recognizing that the test may be amorphous, the court suggests that the bankruptcy court consider, among other things, the merits of the petition, the role of any improper conduct by the alleged debtor, the petitioners' reasonableness, and the motivation and objectives behind the petition. The bankruptcy court should rely on the evidence developed in the trial on the petition rather than conducting a new trial on fees. The court may not award fees, however, for any appeal from the dismissal order, which are governed solely by Fed. R. App. P. 38. Higgins v. Vortex Fishing Systems, Inc., 379 F.3d 701 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 4.2.ddd Judgment might not eliminate "bona fide dispute" for purposes of eligibility to file an involuntary petition. Although the creditor had obtained a judgment against the debtor in state court, the debtor had appealed and presented substantial legal issues on the appeal. As a result, the creditor's claim remained subject to a bona fide dispute, and the creditor was not an eligible petitioning creditor on an involuntary petition. Schlossberg v. Byrd (In re Byrd), 357 F.3d 433 (4th Cir. 2004).
- 4.2.eee Presence of a bona fide dispute in an involuntary petitioner's claim is determined under an objective test and is jurisdictional. A creditor that files an involuntary petition must hold a claim that is not the subject of a bona fide dispute. This requirement is jurisdictional; that is, the bankruptcy court does not have subject matter jurisdiction over an involuntary petition brought by a creditor whose claim is subject to bona fide dispute. Whether a debt is subject to bona fide dispute must be determined on whether there is an objective basis for either a factual or legal dispute as to the validity of the debt, because Congress did not intend to subject a debtor to involuntary bankruptcy when the debtor had a legitimate grounds for disputing the debt. The petitioning creditor must establish a prima facie case that no bona fide dispute exists. The burden then shifts to the debtor to demonstrate the opposite. Key Mechanical Inc. v. BDC 56 LLC (In re BDC 56 LLC), 330 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2003).

- 4.2.fff Only debtor may claim damages for a bad faith involuntary petition. Several related debtors were the subject of state court litigation by two creditors. The debtors' insider, who was also a creditor, filed an involuntary petition against the related corporations. The bankruptcy court dismissed the case as a bad faith filing. The non-petitioning creditors sued the petitioning insider creditor under section 303(i) for damages for a bad faith filing. However, section 303(i) grants damages only to the debtor, not to any non-debtor parties. Franklin v. Four Media Company (In re Mike Hammer Productions, Inc.), 294 B.R. 752 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 4.2.ggg Section 303(i) preempts state damage remedies. A neighbor filed an involuntary petition against the alleged debtor. The court dismissed the petition as a bad faith filing. The alleged debtor's wife and daughter sued the petitioning creditor in state court on theories of defamation, abuse of process, emotional distress, negligent misrepresentation, and negligence. The petitioning creditors removed the action to the bankruptcy court. Even though the action did not assert any bankruptcy claims, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to hear it. But section 303(i), which provides for damages for a bad faith filing, preempts all state causes of action related to the filing of an involuntary petition, so the complaint was dismissed. Miles v. Okun (In re Miles), 294 B.R. 756 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 4.2.hhh Involuntary petition against farmer is allowed. Section 303(a) does not permit an involuntary petition against a farmer. The Fifth Circuit rules that this prohibition is not jurisdictional. It is an affirmative defense that the alleged debtor may waive by failure to raise it in defending against the involuntary petition. McCloy v. Silverthorne (In re McCloy), 296 F.3d 370 (5th Cir. 2002).
- 4.2.iii Award of attorney's fees on dismissal of involuntary petition is not mandatory. The alleged debtor defeated an involuntary petition on the grounds that the creditors' claims were disputed. When the alleged debtor sought attorney's fees under section 303(i), the court ruled that the award of attorney's fees is discretionary. The court declines to award fees because the petitioning creditors did not file the involuntary petition in bad faith or seek to do the alleged debtor any harm. The principle reason for filing the petition was to preserve the debtor's cash. In re Allied Riser Communications Corp., 283 B.R. 420 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2002).
- 4.2.jjj Automatic stay strictly enforced during involuntary gap. During the involuntary gap period, the debtor paid proceeds of collateral to its lender. The lender applied the proceeds to the loan. The lender's application of the proceeds violated the automatic stay, which applies during the involuntary gap. Although the debtor is authorized under section 303(f) to use or dispose of property as though a petition had not been filed, it does not authorize the lender to apply proceeds received from the debtor during the gap to the loan. Bankvest Capital Corp. v. Fleet Boston (In re Bankvest Capital Corp.), 276 B.R. 12 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2002).
- 4.2.kkk A debtor's counterclaim against a creditor does not defeat an involuntary petition. Section 303(b) permits a creditor to bring an involuntary petition only if its claim is not subject to a bona fide dispute. If the claim is subject to a counterclaim on an unrelated transaction, then the claim is not subject to a bona fide dispute, although it would be if the claim was subject to recoupment (arising out of the same transaction). Here, the creditor received its claim against the debtor by way of assignment, and the debtor's claim against the creditor did not render the creditor's claim subject to a bona fide dispute. Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Secko Investment, Inc. (In re Secko Investment, Inc.), 156 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 1998).

- 4.2.III An indenture trustee is a separate qualified petitioner. Three debenture holders filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. One of the holders was disqualified as a petitioning creditor. The indenture trustee joined the petition. The court of appeals rules that the indenture trustee qualifies as a third petitioning creditor, even though the claim of the other two petitioning creditors are subsumed within the indentured trustee's claims. Grey v. Federated Group, Inc. (In re Federated Group, Inc.), 107 F.3d 730 (9th Cir. 1997).

4.3 Dismissal

- 4.3.a District court reverses dismissal of chapter 7 asbestos case. The debtor had been out of business for 20 years but was still the defendant in 27,000 asbestos personal injury actions in state courts. It had some cash from a settlement with its insurers and claims against other insurers that could be used to fund the administrative expenses of a case and provide a distribution to claimants. It filed a chapter 7 case to allow a trustee to pursue the claims and provide a distribution to claimants who could establish their claims. Section 707(b) requires a court to dismiss a case filed in bad faith. 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(5) requires that personal injury tort claims be heard in the district court, not the bankruptcy court. Those requirements do not divest the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction over the underlying bankruptcy case or make the bankruptcy proceeding useless. Chapter 7 provides a collective mechanism to address the claims of numerous creditors and to provide for equitable distribution, thus preventing and substituting for the creditors' race to dismember the debtor or grab its assets first. Therefore, the district court reverses the bankruptcy court's dismissal of the chapter 7 case for bad faith. In re Nash Engineering Co., 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 139985 (D. Conn. Aug. 5, 2022).
- 4.3.b Court dismisses Bahamian debtors' chapter 11 cases under section 305(a) based primarily on parties' expectations of location of insolvency proceedings. The debtors were formed to own, construct and manage a resort in The Bahamas. One of the debtors was a Delaware LLC; the rest were Bahamian corporations. They contracted with a Chinese construction firm to build the resort and primarily with Chinese lenders to finance the project. New York law governed the construction contracts, and the parties consented to New York jurisdiction and venue to resolve disputes. English law governed the credit agreement, and the parties consented to English jurisdiction and venue. Bahamian law governed the security interests. Construction was delayed, disputes arose, and the debtors ran short of cash. Attempts to negotiate a consensual resolution were unsuccessful. The Bahamian debtors opened bank accounts in New York, and 10 days later, all debtors filed chapter 11 cases in Delaware and promptly filed a petition in the Bahamian Supreme Court for recognition of the Delaware chapter 11 cases and an action against the construction company in London. Three weeks later, the Bahamian Attorney General filed winding up petitions against the Bahamian debtors in the Bahamian Supreme Court. The Bahamian Supreme Court denied the recognition petitions and refused to enforce the chapter 11 automatic stay in The Bahamas, finding that creditors would have expected insolvency proceedings to take place in The Bahamas, not the United States. The Bahamian court appointed provisional liquidators for several of the debtors, "with the power to promote a scheme/plan of compromise between all stakeholders." The Chinese entities moved for dismissal of the chapter 11 cases. Under section 109, the debtors are eligible for chapter 11 if they have property in the United States, which they do, even though it was of recent vintage. A court may dismiss a bad faith filing, but the debtors here filed with a valid purpose to reorganize and not to gain litigation advantage, so the filing was in good faith. Section 305(a) permits the court to dismiss or suspend proceedings if creditors' and the debtor's interests would be better served by dismissal or suspension. The parties likely did not expect that any main insolvency proceeding would take place in the United States, and nothing about the debtors' conduct suggest that a chapter 11 case would facilitate a consensual resolution better than the Bahamian proceeding would. Therefore, the court dismisses the chapter 11 cases, except the case of the Delaware LLC. In re Northshore Mainland Servs., Inc., 537 B.R. 192 (Bankr. D. Del. 2015).

- 4.3.c No-asset, single-creditor corporate debtor's chapter 7 case is filed in bad faith. The corporate debtor invested in a Ponzi scheme and had no assets after the Ponzi scheme collapsed. The Ponzi scheme trustee sued the debtor to recover its withdrawals from the Ponzi scheme as fraudulent transfers. The Ponzi scheme trustee was the debtor's only creditor. After two years of litigation, the debtor filed a chapter 7 case, which stayed the litigation. The chapter 7 trustee filed a no asset report. The Ponzi scheme trustee moved to dismiss the case as a bad faith filing. A bankruptcy court may dismiss a voluntary case that is filed in bad faith. Using bankruptcy solely as a litigation tactic is bad faith. Bankruptcy's twin pillars are a discharge and a fair distribution of the debtor's assets among creditors. A corporate debtor does not receive a discharge in chapter 7, and here, there are no assets to distribute. The bankruptcy case's only effect is to stay the fraudulent transfer litigation. Therefore, the case was filed in bad faith and should be dismissed. Kelley v. Cypress Fin. Trading Co., L.P., 518 B.R. 373 (N.D. Tex. 2014).
- 4.3.d Section 305(a) abstention is not an appropriate remedy for a bad faith filing. The creditor obtained a state court judgment against an individual. In the year after the judgment, the individual transferred real property among himself, his wife and related entities, until it rested with an LLC owned by a trust for which the individual defendant is the trustee. The creditor sued in a sister state's court to enforce the judgment against the LLC on constructive trust, reverse veil piercing and fraudulent transfer theories. The LLC owed property taxes, three banks with secured claims, all of which were parties to the state court action, and a few small unsecured claims. It filed a chapter 11 petition three days before the start of trial in the state court. A party in interest, including a creditor, may raise and appear and be heard on any issue in a case. A creditor is one who holds a prepetition claim, even a disputed, contingent, or unliquidated claim, against the debtor. Party-in-interest status is not limited to a creditor who has filed a proof of claim. It also includes anyone with a financial stake in the case's outcome. The creditor had a stake based on the claims he asserted in the state court action and therefore had standing to challenge the filing. Under section 305(a), a bankruptcy court may suspend proceeding in or dismiss a case if the interests of creditors and the debtor would be better served by abstention. Abstention must serve the interests of both creditors generally and the debtor. Abstention is an extraordinary remedy that should be granted sparingly. Rarely will a voluntary case meet the abstention requirements, because abstention is not likely to be in the debtor's interest where the debtor has commenced the case. Even where the debtor filed in bad faith, section 305(a) does not permit dismissal, though section 1112 does. Here, abstention might have served the parties to the state court action, but not the property tax creditor, the unsecured creditors, or the debtor. Therefore, the district court reverses the bankruptcy court's section 305(a) dismissal order and remands to consider in view of the debtor's apparent bad faith filing, whether dismissal under section 1112(b) or stay relief, either of which may be granted based on the debtor's bad faith, should be granted. Sapphire Dev., LLC v. McKay, 523 B.R. 1 (D. Conn. 2014).
- 4.3.e Debtor who can satisfy all claims in the ordinary course may obtain dismissal of its chapter 11 case. The debtor was a charitable foundation whose sole member was a not-for-profit hospital. The foundation was a separate legal entity, with a separate board. It conducted its operations independently from the hospital. The hospital filed a chapter 11 petition because of numerous debts, but the foundation filed only because of its co-liability on a bond with the hospital. During the chapter 11 cases, the hospital sold property and satisfied the bond, relieving the foundation of liability. The foundation thereby became able to satisfy all of its other obligations in the ordinary course and sought dismissal of its chapter 11 case. Section 1112(b) permits dismissal for cause on motion of a party in interest. A debtor is a party in interest and may seek dismissal. “Cause” includes that a chapter 11 case would no longer serve a bankruptcy purpose. Although courts typically apply that cause on a creditor’s motion to dismiss, when there is no reorganization purpose to be served, it applies equally on a debtor’s motion, where the debtor has the resources to pay all of its creditors outside of bankruptcy and has no need for bankruptcy protections or mechanisms. Because the foundation debtor is solvent and able to pay its debts, continuation of the chapter 11 case would serve no bankruptcy purpose, and dismissal is in the best interest of creditors. In re Forum Health, 444 B.R. 848 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2011).

- 4.3.f Court dismisses chapter 11 case as not filed in good faith where case does not serve to maximize asset value. The debtor had stopped operations over six years before bankruptcy and had dissolved. It was the defendant in environmental litigation, which implicated its parent companies under an alter ego theory. A few months before trial, it filed a chapter 11 case. It had a few other, minor actions pending against it. Its principal assets were a small amount of cash, loaned from its parent, and possible insurance policy claims. A court may dismiss a chapter 11 case that is not filed in good faith. A court determines good faith based on whether the petition serves a valid bankruptcy purpose and on whether it is filed merely to gain tactical litigation advantage. A valid bankruptcy purpose includes preserving a going concern or maximizing the estate’s value. However, the analysis requires a comparison of what could be achieved without a bankruptcy or, put differently, whether value would be lost outside of bankruptcy that would not be lost in a bankruptcy case. Here, the debtor made no showing of any valid bankruptcy purpose. The debtor had stopped operations long before bankruptcy, so there was no going concern to preserve. The filing also did not provide any particular advantage in bankruptcy over what might have occurred outside bankruptcy concerning focusing of claims in a single forum (because there were few claims other than the environmental litigation of any significance), litigation of the environmental claims or insurance policy recovery. In addition, because of its proximity to the environmental litigation trial date, the filing appeared to be to gain tactical litigation advantage. Therefore, the petition was not filed in good faith and should be dismissed. Santa Fe Minerals, Inc. v. Bepco, L.P. (In re 15375 Memorial Corp.), 589 F.3d 605 (3d Cir. 2009).
- 4.3.g Court denies motion to dismiss chapter 11 cases filed by bankruptcy remote single purpose real estate debtors. The debtors were bankruptcy remote single purpose real estate companies that were part of a large conglomerate of real estate companies. Debt of some of the debtors was in default, though not accelerated, and was due one to three years after the petition date. However, the commercial lending markets’ condition suggested that refinancing within those time periods was uncertain. The debtors’ parent was in default on various credit lines, and many of their affiliates’ loans were in default, in hyperamortization or due. The debtors’ equity holders replaced the debtors’ independent directors with new independent directors who had greater familiarity and experience with distressed real estate. The parent and nearly all of its single purpose subsidiaries filed chapter 11 petitions. The debtors’ secured lenders filed motions to dismiss the debtors’ cases as having been filed in bad faith, arguing that the debtors’ filings had been premature. A chapter 11 case may be dismissed for bad faith if there is no reasonable probability that the debtor will be able to reorganize, and a case may be dismissed if the debtors’ financial distress is speculative. Here, the debtors were in present financial distress because some of their loans were already in default, and there was a high likelihood that none could be refinanced when they became due. When viewed from a single debtor perspective, a debtor need not delay a filing until foreclosure is imminent, just as a debtor need not be insolvent to file. When viewed from the group’s perspective, the financial condition of the group may be taken into account in determining whether subsidiaries may file, so that cases may address the financial affairs of the group as a whole. Reorganizing the parent entities’ significant debt without dealing with all the subsidiaries’ maturing debt would not have been feasible. Therefore, the group’s financial predicament supported filing by the group’s members, even those that were not immediately distressed. Because the creditors did not show a reasonable likelihood that the debtors did not intend to reorganize, the court denies the motion to dismiss. In re Gen. Growth Props., Inc., 409 B.R. 43 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

- 4.3.h “Cause” for dismissal does not include conduct covered by another Bankruptcy Code provision. The district court had ordered the debtor to disgorge payments received from a corporation that was under an SEC receivership. Just before entry of judgment, the debtor filed bankruptcy. The SEC moved to dismiss under section 707(b) for cause, arguing that the debtor improperly used bankruptcy as a refuge from the district court, that the bankruptcy was part of a scheme to disfavor the SEC as against other creditors, and that the debtor exaggerated his financial problems by overstating liabilities and expenses. The Bankruptcy Code specifically addresses each of these kinds of conduct by narrower remedies than dismissal. This suggests that Congress intended to permit bankruptcy relief despite the specific conduct. In this case, section 362 addresses using bankruptcy as a refuge from other courts and contains several exceptions. Section 362(d)’s “cause” ground for stay relief, rather than dismissal under section 707(a), provides a more direct and tailored remedy for any illegitimate filing, such as one based on misrepresentation. Section 547 permits recovery of a preference but only to the precise extent provided by Congress, implying that other preferences are permissible and should not be disturbed. The bankruptcy court should not use dismissal as a means to expand the remedy against preferences. Section 727(a) provides a remedy against false statements on the debtor’s schedule. Where these matters are covered by a specific Bankruptcy Code provision, they do not constitute “cause” for dismissal under section 707(b). Sherman v. SEC (In re Sherman), 441 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2006).
- 4.3.i Russian oil company’s chapter 11 case is dismissed under “totality of circumstances” test. Yukos Oil Co., Russia’s largest oil company with very limited U.S. contacts or assets, filed a chapter 11 case in Texas to stay the Russian government’s seizure of assets to pay claimed tax debts. The bankruptcy court rejects dismissal on jurisdictional grounds, holding that Yukos’s U.S. property is sufficient to confer jurisdiction. It rejects dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds, holding that doctrine inapplicable to an entire bankruptcy case (as opposed to a proceeding within the case). It similarly concludes that comity is not a ground to dismiss an entire case and that despite the involvement of the Russian government, the act of state doctrine does not apply. However, based on the totality of the circumstances, the court dismisses under section 1112(b). The assets that created jurisdiction were transferred to the U.S. only days before the filing. The proposed reorganization is not a financial reorganization, and since most of its assets were oil and gas assets located in Russia, a reorganization without Russian government cooperation would have been futile. Yukos sought to substitute U.S. law for Russian and international arbitration laws in its dispute with the Russian government. Under the circumstances, the court dismisses the case. In re Yukos Oil Co., 321 B.R. 396 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2005).
- 4.3.j Court permits automatic chapter 13 dismissal for failure to file documents. The court has a local rule under which the clerk gives notice immediately after the date of the filing of a petition that is not accompanied by all required documents that the case will be dismissed if the documents are not filed within the 15 days permitted by Rule 1007(c), unless the debtor requests and the court grants additional time. Dismissal under this local rule is proper, because the debtor receives notice and opportunity for a hearing, and the court is authorized to act sua sponte under section 105(a). Section 1307(c) authorizes dismissal “on request of a party in interest or the United States trustee,” and paragraph (9) of that section permits dismissal for failure to file documents “only on request of the United States trustee.” This provision is intended to preclude parties in interest from requesting dismissal under this paragraph, not to preclude the court from acting sua sponte. Tennant v. Rojas (In re Tennant), 318 B.R. 860 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).
- 4.3.k Section 105 “abuse of process” dismissal is not appropriate for properly pleaded involuntary petition. A Brazilian company was undergoing an out-of-court workout in Brazil. It had minimal assets in the United States but had raised substantial capital here. A U.S. creditor who did not agree with the conduct of the out-of-court work-out process filed an involuntary petition against the company in New York. Dismissal of the case under the section 105(a) “abuse of process” provision is improper, because that provision is intended to apply to parties that willfully mislead the court, file frivolous proceedings, or fail to comply with court orders. It is not intended to apply to a petition that facially appears to state a good faith claim for relief. The court may, however, consider dismissal under section 305(a)(1) or on the ground of forum non conveniens, which applies to an involuntary petition against a foreign debtor. GMAM Inv. Funds Trust I v. Globo Comunicacoes e Participacoes S.A. (In re Globo Comunicacoes e Participacoes S.A.), 317 B.R. 235 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).

- 4.3.l Partnership case filed by general partner without authority to do so must be dismissed. The general partner had been dissolved under state law for nonpayment of taxes. A new entity was formed, which purported to succeed to the first entity’s rights as a general partner, but the limited partners had not elected it as the new general partner, as required by the partnership agreement. Therefore, neither entity was authorized to act for the partnership, and the voluntary bankruptcy petition that the second entity had filed for the partnership had to be dismissed. In re Telluride Income Growth Ltd. P’ship, 311 B.R. 585 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2004).
- 4.3.m Petition filed without valid bankruptcy purpose is dismissed for bad faith. The debtor’s business had failed, leaving it only with intellectual property worth about $2 million, miscellaneous assets worth about $500,000, and cash of $105 million. The only claims were a securities class action claim that had been capped at $25 million and the landlord’s uncapped lease rejection damage claim of $26 million. Although the Code permits a solvent debtor to file chapter 11, there must be a valid bankruptcy or reorganization purpose for doing so, such as to preserve going concern value or to maximize the value of the estate. Merely seeking a tactical litigation advantage or the benefit of a specific Bankruptcy Code provision, such as the lease damage cap of section 502(b)(6) or the automatic stay, does not justify a chapter 11 petition; conversely, seeking the specific benefit of such a provision does not constitute bad faith if there is a valid purpose in seeking bankruptcy relief. In this case, the business had terminated and the debtor was in dissolution proceedings under state law before it filed its chapter 11 case. Accordingly, the chapter 11 case was filed in bad faith and was dismissed. NMSBPCSLDHB, L.P. v. Integrated Telecom Express, Inc. (In re Integrated Telecom Express, Inc.), 384 F.3d 108 (3d Cir. 2004).
- 4.3.n Absence of present need for bankruptcy relief requires dismissal for bad faith. The debtor was an unsuccessful technology start-up that had raised and still had substantial cash on hand. Its principal unpaid obligations were for breach of a long term lease for space it no longer needed, a substantial patent infringement claim, and securities fraud claims resulting from accounting irregularities, which were insured and about to be settled. Even if it lost on all claims and did not get the benefit of the reduction of the landlord’s claim under section 502(b)(6), it would have enough cash to pay all claims and still continue operating. Although an intent to take advantage of specific Bankruptcy Code provisions, such as section 502(b)(6) or the ability to sell assets under section 363, does not imply bad faith, the debtor must have a need independent of these provisions for bankruptcy relief. Under the circumstances, the court concludes that because the debtor is neither insolvent nor illiquid, it does not have a present need for bankruptcy relief. In re Liberate Technologies, 314 B.R. 206 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2004).
- 4.3.o Court refuses to dismiss foreign debtor’s case. The substantial portion of the foreign debtor’s assets was located in a foreign country. However, the majority of its creditors were U.S. based. One creditor moved to dismiss the case under section 305, arguing that the chapter 11 case should not proceed unless the debtor also filed a case in its own country. The majority of the foreign creditors had participated and cooperated with a chapter 11 case, and the debtor had reached agreements with many of its major U.S. creditors. Accordingly, the court denies the motion to dismiss. The court can not find that the interest of the debtor and the creditors would be better served by dismissal, as required by section 305(a)(1), because there was no showing that the debtor could have obtained jurisdiction over the non-home country creditors in a home country proceeding, and the foreign creditors cooperated in the U.S. proceeding. Dismissal was also not warranted under section 305(a)(2) (cross-referencing factors for dismissal of an ancillary proceeding under section 304), because there was no effort to use chapter 11 improperly to gain an undue advantage over foreign creditors or to take advantage of provisions of chapter 11 that differ substantially from foreign law. The court clearly had jurisdiction under section 109, because of the presence of property in the U.S. In re Aerovias Nacionales v. Columbia S.A. Avianca, 303 B.R. 1 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003).

- 4.3.p Attorney sanctioned for bad faith chapter 11 filing. Sanctions may be warranted under Rule 9011(b) in the case of a filing that is both frivolous and for an improper purpose. The more compelling the showing as to one element, the less compelling the showing as to the other needs to be. In this case, the debtor, represented by counsel, filed a chapter 11 petition two days before the state court was to set a trial date on a specific performance action against the debtor for sale of real property. The value of the property plus the debtor's other assets was more than enough to pay all claims, including the specific performance claim, and the nature of the debtor's financial condition made it impossible for the debtor to confirm a plan without the consent of the specific performance plaintiff. Therefore, the petition was filed both for an improper purpose and was frivolous, in that it would not have accomplished any restructuring objective. Sanctions on both the debtor and his attorney were appropriate. Dressler v. The Seeley Co. (In re Silverkraus), 336 F. 3d 864 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 4.3.q A bankruptcy filing to take advantage of the section 502(b)(6) cap is not a bad faith filing. The bankruptcy court found that one of the principle reasons for the debtor to file its chapter 11 case was to take advantage of the cap under section 502(b)(6) on landlord damage claims. The landlord argued that such a motive constituted bad faith. The bankruptcy court concluded that, to the contrary, the debtor was using the Bankruptcy Code for exactly the purpose it was intended and that the filing was therefore not an abuse of the bankruptcy law. The court of appeals affirmed, ruling that the good faith determination is fact intensive and a case by case inquiry, that the standard for review is abuse of discretion, and that under the totality of circumstances, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion. Solow v. PPI Enterprizes (U.S.), Inc. (In re PPI Enterprizes (U.S.), Inc.), 324 F.3d 197 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 4.3.r Chapter 11 case may be dismissed for bad faith, even if there is a confirmable plan. The debtor had generally regained financial health and worked out a restructuring agreement with its lender when minority shareholders brought a derivative action against the corporation and its directors and officers. The debtor filed chapter 11 and proposed a reorganization plan. Following the lead of the Third Circuit in In re SGL Carbon Corp., 200 F.3d 154 (3d Cir. 1999), the Eighth Circuit rules that chapter 11 contains an implicit good faith filing requirement, that the filing primarily to stay litigation constitutes a bad faith filing, and that the case may be dismissed for bad faith, even if the debtor has proposed a confirmable reorganization plan. Cedar Shore Resort, Inc. v. Mueller (In re Cedar Shore Resort, Inc.), 235 F.3d 375 (8th Cir. 2000).
- 4.3.s Failure to pursue divorce proceeding may constitute bad faith in a bankruptcy filing. The debtor's wife had instituted divorce proceedings seven years before bankruptcy, but the proceedings were never pursued. The debtor went jobless for several years and incurred substantial credit card debt. Once the debtor found work, he filed bankruptcy. Had he concluded his divorce proceedings, his substantial equity interest in the family home, which he held in tenancy by the entirety with his estranged wife, would have been available for creditors. The failure to do so rendered the bankruptcy petition a bad faith filing, which provided cause for dismissal under section 707(a). Tamecki v. Frank (In re Tamecki), 229 F.3d 205 (3d Cir. 2000).

- 4.3.t Chapter 11 case dismissed on good faith ground where company was financially healthy. The debtor filed chapter 11 because of pending antitrust litigation that threatened substantial liability but that would not likely have rendered the company insolvent. It filed early in the antitrust litigation, before a threat of liability was imminent. On these facts, the Third Circuit rules that a chapter 11 filing requires good faith, including a valid reorganization purpose, and dismisses the case on the grounds that the debtor was financially healthy and was primarily seeking to gain a negotiating advantage in the non-bankruptcy litigation. In re SGL Carbon Corp., 200 F. 3d 154 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 4.3.u Dismissal with prejudice may bar subsequent filings. The debtors' third chapter 11 case, intended to stay foreclosure on their residence, was dismissed "with prejudice." When they subsequently filed a chapter 13 case on the eve of the next scheduled foreclosure sale, the creditor went forward with the sale anyway. The bankruptcy court dismissed the chapter 13 case nunc pro tunc to the filing date and validated the foreclosure sale. The Second Circuit affirms the bankruptcy court's authority to do so and to impose a dismissal with prejudice that prevents filing for longer than the 180-day period specified in section 109(g). Casse v. Key Bank N.A. (In re Casse), 198 F.3d 327 (2d Cir. 1999).
- 4.3.v Chapter 11 filing in response to litigation is not in bad faith. The debtor was the defendant in major antitrust litigation. Although the case had not yet begun trial, the debtor risked substantial liability. It filed chapter 11 as a protective measure, at least in part because of the current financial troubles (short of insolvency) that the litigation was causing. The court held that the filing was not in bad faith and denied a motion to dismiss for cause. In re SGL Carbon Corp., 233 B.R. 285 (D. Del. 1999).
- 4.3.w Section 707(b) is constitutional. Section 707(b), which permits a bankruptcy court to dismiss a case involving primarily consumer debts for substantial abuse is constitutional, despite a challenge under the equal protection clause that a similar standard does not apply to business debtors. The court also adopts the "totality of the circumstances" test in applying the substantial abuse standard. Stewart v. United States Trustee (In re Stewart), 175 F.3d 796 (10th Cir. 1999).
- 4.3.x First Circuit adopts "totality of circumstances" test for substantial abuse analysis. Following the lead of the Fourth and Sixth Circuits, the first circuit adopts the "totality of circumstances" test, rejecting per se rules based on ability to repay and focusing on equitable discretion, the purpose of section 707(b) to guide, not constrain, and "the open-textured nature of section 707(b)." First U.S.A. v Lamanna (In re Lamanna), 153 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998).
- 4.3.y Filing bankruptcy with too much debt may constitute "substantial abuse." With an annual gross income of $50,000, the debtors ran up $336,000 in credit card debt. Annual interest was accruing at $67,000 per year, and over $225,000 of the combined balances was accrued interest. The debtors had taken cash advances from some cards to pay minimum monthly payments on others in order to maintain a good credit rating. As a result, they owed money on 59 credit cards, six of which were issued by one bank and seven by another. The debtors had not lived extravagantly, had no medical bills, and did not have any gambling or substance abuse problems. Nevertheless, the filing of the case was a substantial abuse, and the case was dismissed. In re Wolniewicz, 224 B.R. 302 (Bankr. W.D.N.Y. 1998).
- 4.3.z Run up in credit card debts does not give grounds for bad faith or substantial abuse dismissal. Where the debtors comply with all of the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code, a run up of credit card debts before a bankruptcy does not constitute bad faith. When the debtor does not have the ability to repay, dismissal for substantial abuse would amount to a denial of discharge or a dismissal with prejudice, which is not warranted in the absence of the grounds specified under section 727. However, a substantial abuse dismissal may be warranted when

(1) the overwhelming percentage of the debtor's unsecured debt is due to credit cards; (2) the debtor has used so many cards that it would multiply the work load of the court to adjudicate non-dischargeability action separately; (3) there is no economic incentive to individual creditors to bring non-dischargeability actions; (4) the credit card debt was used for luxury, goods, high lifestyle or other improper purposes; and (5) the debtor has failed to make an honest effort to repay the obligations. In re Motaharnia, 215 B.R. 63 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1997).

- 4.3.aa Pre-petition bankruptcy waiver not enforced. The debtor and the secured creditor entered into a forbearance agreement before bankruptcy, which provided that breach of the forbearance agreement would constitute bad faith giving rise to grounds for dismissal of a chapter 11 case. The bankruptcy court holds that pre-petition waivers are not invalid per se, but will not be enforced if they adversely affect other creditors. In re Southeast Financial Associates, Inc., 212 B.R. 1003 (Bankr. N.D. Fla. 1997).
- 4.3.bb Bankruptcy remote provisions questioned. In the face of bankruptcy remote provisions that required unanimous board consent for the authorization of a bankruptcy and placed on the board an "independent" director designated by the lender, the debtor's management "orchestrated" the filing of an involuntary petition. Faced with strong evidence of nonfeasance (and possibly worse) by the independent director, and recognizing the duty of the board to the debtor, not to the lender, the court denied a motion to dismiss on grounds of collusion. The court questioned but did not rule on the efficacy of the bankruptcy remote provisions. However, because the directors' conduct indicated that they had abdicated their fiduciary responsibilities, the court ordered the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee. In re Kingston Square Associates, 214 B.R. 713 (S.D.N.Y. 1997).
- 4.3.cc Standing order of dismissal of chapter 7 cases vacated. The Bankruptcy Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania and the United States Trustee for that district developed a "standing motion" under which the United States Trustee moved for dismissal of any case in which the required schedules and statements were not timely filed. The Bankruptcy Court responded with a "standing order" that dismissed such cases if the defect was not cured shortly after notice by the clerk. On a motion brought by individual debtors to vacate the standing order, the court held that the "standing" procedure violated section 707(a) and Bankruptcy Rule 2002(a)(5) and nullified the standing order. In re General Order Governing Dismissal of Cases, 210 B.R. 941 (Bankr. N.D. Pa. 1997).
- 4.3.dd Ex parte chapter 7 dismissal procedure disapproved. In a chapter 7 case, the initial notice stated "failure by the debtor to appear at the 341 meeting shall result in the dismissal of the case upon ex parte order." On an appeal from such a dismissal, the Second Circuit B.A.P. rules that the notice is inadequate under section 707(a), which permits dismissal only "after notice and a hearing." The B.A.P. also castigates the trustee for presenting the ex parte dismissal motion to the bankruptcy court without a full explanation of the unique circumstances of the case, which the B.A.P. felt underscored the need for a hearing in any dismissal proceeding. Dinova v. Harris (In re Dinova), 212 B.R. 437 (2d Cir. B.A.P. 1997).
- 4.3.ee Dismissal for bad faith not a substitute for dischargeability complaint. The Debtor incurred gambling losses financed by credit cards and filed a chapter 7 petition. The debtor acted honestly with full disclosure in the chapter 7. Nevertheless, the bankruptcy court dismissed for lack of good faith. The B.A.P. reversed, holding that the dismissal was not a substitute for a dischargeability complaint under Section 523. Padilla v. U.S. Trustee (In re Padilla), 214 B.R. 496 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).

5. CHAPTER 11 PLANS

5.1 Officers and Administration

- 5.1.a Court permits redactions of individual creditors' home and email addresses. The Irish debtor and multiple international subsidiaries filed chapter 11 in New York. Its creditors included opioid claimants, medical device injury claimants, employees, and suppliers, all of whom were individuals. Section 521 requires the debtor to file a list of creditors. Rule 1007 and the Official Forms require the list to include creditors' names, physical addresses, and email addresses. Section 107(c) permits the court to protect an individual with respect to personally identifiable information whose disclosure "would create undue risk of identity theft or other unlawful injury." Disclosure of home addresses and email addresses and, in some cases, names creates a risk of identity theft, stalking, and intimate partner violence, especially when the information might reveal certain medical conditions that can cause embarrassment or opprobrium. Therefore, the court permits the redaction of home and email addresses of the individual creditors. In re Endo Int'l plc, ___ B.R. ___, 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 3093 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2022).
- 5.1.b Court orders appointment of subchapter V trustee upon debtor's refusal to be bound by the law. After an adverse decision by a district court that exposed the debtor to substantial liability, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case and elected to proceed under subchapter V. Defying the district court's order, the debtor's principal sent numerous harassing emails to the creditor, including one that denied any intention to be bound by the law. The creditor moved to de-designate the case as a subchapter V case so that it would proceed under ordinary chapter 11; the U.S. trustee moved to remove the debtor from possession under section 1185 or to dismiss. Under section 103(i), a case proceeds under subchapter V based only on the debtor's election in the petition. Rule 1020(a) requires a small business debtor to state whether it is proceeding under subchapter V and permits an objection to the statement but does not contemplate de-designation. Rule 1009(a) permits the debtor to amend a petition and the court, on motion of a party in interest, to order the amendment of the petition. However, the structure of subchapter V, under which only the debtor may file a plan, suggests that the court may not override the debtor's decision and force the case into ordinary chapter 11, where any party in interest may file a plan. In this case, the court adopts an alternative remedy. Under subchapter V, the debtor, while remaining in possession, has all the rights and duties of a trustee, who is a fiduciary. Because the debtor's principal has shown himself to be unable to act as a fiduciary, the court may, under section 1185(a), remove the debtor from possession and grant the trustee control over the debtor's business, which the court does. In re Comedymx, LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 3551 (Bankr. D. Del. Dec. 16, 2022).
- 5.1.c Cryptocurrency debtor may not redact customer names. The debtor operated a cryptocurrency brokerage and exchange, with over 300,000 customers, including foreign customers, having account balances of over $100. The debtor argued that disclosure of names and physical and email addresses would give competitors an undue advantage in soliciting the debtor's customers. Section 521 requires the debtor to file a list of creditors and a schedule of liabilities, with creditors' names and addresses. Public policy strongly presumes public access to court records. Section 107(b) permits the court to order redaction of confidential commercial information. Section 107(c) permits the court to protect an individual with respect to information whose disclosure would create undue risk of identity theft or other unlawful injury to the individual. Rule 1007(j) permits the court to protect information from disclosure to competitors or others who might make inappropriate or unfair use of the information. These exceptions to the public policy of public access are construed narrowly. Foreign data protection laws prohibit the debtor from disclosing any personal information, including names. Here, disclosure of physical and email addresses of individual customers could risk identity theft, and they may be filed under seal. However, disclosure of names, without more, does not pose the same risk, and foreign law does not trump U.S. law to prevent public access to records. Therefore, the debtor may redact physical and email addresses, but not customer names or account balances or non-individuals' information in filing its creditor lists and schedules of liabilities. The court notes that other bankruptcy courts hearing cryptocurrency cases have concluded otherwise. In re Celsius Network LLC, 644 B.R. 276 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2022).

- 5.1.d Court may order revocation of subchapter V election. The debtor filed its chapter 11 petition and elected to proceed under subchapter V. It did not go well. After the court denied confirmation of the debtor's fifth amended plan, it determined the debtor could not successfully proceed under subchapter V. Because a subchapter V case is under chapter 11, the case may not be converted to an ordinary chapter 11 case. However, a debtor accesses subchapter V by an election on the petition, and a debtor may amend a petition filed under chapter 11 to elect to proceed under subchapter V. By the same token, the court, exercising its power under section 105 to carry out the provision of the Code, should be able to order the amendment of a petition to revoke the subchapter V election. Because the debtor has a viable business, that is the appropriate remedy here. But because of the debtor's inability to manage the subchapter V case, the court orders the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee upon the revocation of the election. In re Nat'l Small Bus. Alliance, Inc., 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 1811 (Bankr. D.D.C. June 29, 2022).
- 5.1.e Court does not consider prepetition decisions in evaluating the debtor in possession's business judgment. The debtor vacated the premises on the lease expiration date, although the landlord claimed the debtor had exercised a lease extension option. The debtor filed a chapter 11 petition six days later. Because of the landlord's extension claim, the debtor in possession filed a motion the day after the petition date for approval of the rejection of the lease, effective as of the petition date or the motion date, arguing in part that its prepetition vacating of the premises supported its postpetition decision to reject the lease. Lease rejection requires court approval under a business judgment standard. The court should evaluate the debtor in possession's business judgment. Whether the prepetition debtor properly exercised sound business judgment is not before the court, which must address the situation as it exists as of the petition date or when the motion is filed. In re Player's Poker Club, Inc., 636 B.R. 811 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2022).
- 5.1.f Court approves payment during the case of RSA Parties' professional fees. Before bankruptcy, the debtor negotiated restructuring support agreements with three ad hoc committees of creditors. The agreements provided for payment of the groups' professional fees. After filing chapter 11, the debtor in possession sought approval of the assumption of the agreements to pay professionals and approval of postpetition agreements to pay professionals of additional ad hoc committees that agreed to the RSA. If the court did not authorize the payments, the committees would be released from any obligation to support a plan on the terms previously agreed, and early indications in the case were that negotiations would have collapsed and would need to start from scratch. Section 363(b) authorizes the debtor in possession to use property of the estate outside the ordinary course of business. Section 365(a) authorizes the debtor in possession, subject to court approval, to assume executory contracts. Both sections permit approval if the debtor in possession's action reflects a valid business justification. The prepetition reimbursement agreements require both sides to cooperate toward confirmation of a plan and require the debtor in possession to pay fees. Therefore, the agreements are executory and subject to assumption under section 365. The potential collapse of negotiations and the attendant increase in expenses supported the judgment to assume the agreements and pay the professionals. Section 503(b)(4) permits payment as an administrative expense, after the fact, of professional fees of creditors who have made a substantial contribution to the case. It provides for retroactive review and payment and does not restrict the court's authority under sections 363 and 365 to approve payments during the case. City of Rockford v. Mallinckrodt PLC (In re Mallinckrodt PLC), 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54785 (D. Del. Mar. 28, 2022).
- 5.1.g Court permits structured dismissal. The debtor in possession sold all its assets and had a pot of cash and some administrative claims, as well as its general unsecured claims. However, it did not have enough to pay all administrative claims and the cost of preparing, soliciting, and confirming a plan. It moved for a dismissal, contingent upon payment of all administrative claims (including US trustee fees) and a small payment on unsecured claims, with the court retaining jurisdiction over a pending adversary proceeding and an exception to the default rule in section 349 so that all orders issued during the case would remain in force. Section 349 permits dismissal of a case and provides that unless the court orders otherwise, dismissal vacates all orders entered during the case, among other things. Although the Supreme Court limited structured dismissals in Czyzewski v. Jevic Holding Corp. (In re Jevic Holding Corp.), 137 S. Ct. 973, 197 L. Ed. 2d 398 (2017), where the dismissal violated bankruptcy priorities, it did not prohibit them. Because the estate has limited remaining assets and no real alternatives, a structured dismissal is appropriate. The court has discretion to permit retention of jurisdiction of an adversary proceeding, which it does here, and to leave orders entered during the case in place, so as, among other things, to preserve the sale authorization. In re KG Winddown, LLC, 628 B.R. 739 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2021).

- 5.1.h Court subordinates to general unsecured claims an unauthorized postpetition loan. During its chapter 11 case, without court approval under section 364, the debtor borrowed from an insider to acquire real property. The lender asserted an administrative claim for the loan amount. Section 503(b) allows claims for actual amounts necessary to the preservation of the estate and grants them priority over prepetition claims. Section 364 permits the court to authorize postpetition loans with administrative expense priority. Failure to obtain prior approval defeats a claim for administrative expense priority. Section 503(b)(3) allows an administrative expenses claim of a creditor and certain other specified entities for making a substantial contribution to the case. An insider lender is not among the specified entities and so may not rely on the substantial contribution provision. A court may grant administrative expense priority to an unauthorized postpetition loan on equitable principles. To do so, the court must find that the court would have granted approval of the loan before it was made, the loan would not impair creditor interests, and the property acquired with the loan proceeds would provide a substantial distribution to creditors, all measured as of the time the loan was made. None of those factors was present here. Therefore, the court denies administrative expense priority to the loan. The court may disallow the claim in its entirety, but here, the court allowed it and subordinated it to the claims of general unsecured creditors based on the insider's inequitable conduct. Norcross Hospitality, LLC v. Glass (In re Nilhan Devs., LLC), ___ B.R. ___ (N.D. Ga. Sept. 30, 2021).
- 5.1.i Board-elected officers are not eligible for a KERP. The debtor in possession adopted a key employee retention plan for about 190 employees, including six employees who were elected as officers by the board of directors. Section 503(c) severely limits KERP payments to insiders. The definition of "insider" includes officer, but the Code does not define "officer." Objective criteria should govern whether an employee is an officer. Under nonbankruptcy law, someone elected to an officer position by the board is an officer and should be treated as such for Bankruptcy Code purposes, whatever the scope of the individual's duties and authority. Therefore, the six employees are not eligible to participate in the KERP. Harrington v. LSC Comm'ns (In re LSC Comm'ns), ___ B.R. ___, case no. 20-CV-5006 (JPO) (S.D.N.Y. July 9, 2021).
- 5.1.j Court may excuse compliance with section 345. The debtor maintained two operating accounts and 20 trust accounts for payments due to state taxing agencies at banks that had not met the requirements of section 345. It sought court approval to maintain its cash management system at those banks, despite noncompliance with section 345. Section 345 requires that moneys of estates be deposited or invested only with institutions that have provided security to the United States in the form of a bond or deposit of specified U.S. securities, "unless the court for cause orders otherwise." Because the "unless" clause is separated from the bond and securities requirements paragraphs by a semicolon, it applies equally to both of them. Any other reading would ultimately lead to the same result: authorizing the court to order otherwise for either form of security. In this case, the debtor's sound operating history, the complexity of its cash management systems, including the separate trust accounts for state authorities, and its progress toward a confirmable plan all provide cause for the court to order otherwise and authorize the debtor in possession to maintain its existing cash management system. In re King Mt. Tobacco Co., 623 B.R. 323 (E.D. Wash. 2020).
- 5.1.k Eleventh Circuit enforces SBA anti-bankruptcy PPP rule. The debtor in possession applied to a traditional lender for a Payroll Protection Program (PPP) loan. The PPP program permits a borrower to obtain a loan guaranteed by the Small Business Administration (SBA); to the extent the borrower uses the loan for specified purposes, the loan is forgiven. Congress placed the PPP loans under section 7(a) of the Small Business Act. Section 7(a) requires that SBA-guaranteed loans are subject to a “sound value” requirement so as reasonably to assure repayment. An SBA rule excludes debtors in possession from section 7(a) loans. The SBA continued to apply that rule to PPP loans. A court may hold an agency action or rule unlawful if it exceeds the agency’s statutory jurisdiction, authorization, or limitations. An agency has not done so if Congress has not spoken to the issue and left it to the agency’s rule-making and if the agency’s interpretation of the statute is reasonable. Here, Congress did not directly address eligibility of borrowers in bankruptcy; by enacting the program under section 7(a), it left to the SBA the implementation rules. The rule is a reasonable interpretation of section 7(a) and the “sound value” requirement. Finally, the court may hold the rule unlawful if it is arbitrary and capricious. The SBA determined that because of competing creditors’ claims and interests in bankruptcy, loans to borrowers in bankruptcy would present an unreasonably high risk of unauthorized use of funds and or default. Because bankruptcy debtors in possession are financially distressed, the SBA’s conclusion is not unreasonable. Therefore, the court denies the motion to enjoin the SBA to provide the loan guarantee. USF Fed. Credit Union v. Gateway Radiology Consultants, P.A. (In re Gateway Radiology Consultants, P.A.), 983 F.3d 1239 (11th Cir. 2020).

- 5.1.l State law governs a debtor’s corporate governance. The debtor manager-managed LLC’s operating agreements vested two managers with complete authority over the management of the LLC. The debtor’s secured lender had control rights upon a default, which it tried to exercise. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case to stay the exercise. Shortly after the filing, the debtor and the lender agreed upon the appointment of a CRO, and the two managers delegated the exclusive exercise of all their management duties under a stipulation to be filed with, and subject to the approval of, the court. They did not execute manager resolutions to confirm the delegation. A Delaware LLC may vest complete management authority in the managers and does not require a board of directors or any formal means of exercising that authority. As such, the delegation in the stipulation sufficed under Delaware law. Except in narrow circumstances, the Bankruptcy Code does not interfere with a debtor’s corporate governance and does not give the court or the US trustee authority to do so. Accordingly, the court approves the stipulation. In re K.G. IM, LLC, 620 B.R. 469 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2020).
- 5.1.m Court approves confidential critical vendor payments. The debtor in possession filed a motion for authority to pay up to $80 million for critical vendors, out of a total of about $400 million in accounts payable, based on 10 questions about each vendor, which were directed at determining whether the vendor was critical and payment was necessary to maintaining the relationship with the vendor. The motion contemplated that the DIP would provide the full list of critical vendors and, each week, a list of actual payments, to the committee and the US Trustee. The lists were not filed with the court, and the court had no role (absent an objection from the committee or the US Trustee) in determining whether a vendor was critical or should be paid. Ultimately, the DIP paid only $6.7 million in critical vendors. Section 363(b) authorizes a trustee to use property of the estate, including to pay prepetition claims, based on sound business judgment. Relying on the DIP’s representations that the 10 questions were accurately answered for each payment was appropriate, considering the time and resources that would have been required for the court to hear each one, and was not an improper delegation of decision-making authority, especially in light of the oversight by the committee and the US Trustee. Section 107 requires that all papers filed in the case must be public, unless, among other things, the paper contains confidential commercial information. However, the lists here were not filed with the court, so section 107 did not apply. Even if the lists had been filed, redacting the vendors’ names would have been an appropriate protection of confidential commercial information. Therefore, the court approves the procedures and the payments. GLM DFW, Inc. v. Windstream Holding Inc. (In re Windstream Holdings Inc.), 614 B.R. 441 (S.D.N.Y. 2020).

- 5.1.n Court dismisses chapter 11 case upon election to proceed under subchapter V. The small business debtor filed its chapter 11 case in June 2019. After litigation and settlements, it was prepared to proceed with a plan in April 2020, although one of the settlements imposed a large administrative expense claim that would have had to be paid in full at plan confirmation. During that 10-month period, the Small Business Reorganization Act added subchapter V to chapter 11, and the COVID-19 pandemic hit, requiring the debtor to close its business. Shortly after reopening in June 2020, the debtor amended its petition to elect to proceed under subchapter V. Subchapter V requires a status conference within 60 days after the order for relief and that the debtor file a plan within 90 days. The court may extend the deadline based on circumstances for which the debtor should not justly be held accountable. Section 1112(b)(4)(J) requires dismissal of a chapter 11 case if the debtor does not file a plan within the time fixed by the Code. Although Bankruptcy Rule 1009 permits a debtor to amend its petition at any time, thereby permitting it to elect application of subchapter V, the Rule does not waive the statutory deadlines in subchapter V. In this case, the debtor did not meet those deadlines, and the circumstances causing noncompliance were the debtor's own activities in its chapter 11 case and therefore did not support an extension. Because the debtor's election to proceed under subchapter V was effective and the debtor did not meet the deadlines, the court dismisses the case. In re Seven Stars on the Hudson Corp., 618 B.R. 333 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2020).
- 5.1.o Rule 1009 governs amendment to a petition to elect application of subchapter V, which applies to pending cases. The small business debtor filed a chapter 11 case before the effective date of the Small Business Reorganization Act of 2019, which added subchapter V to chapter 11. Subchapter V applies only in a case in which the debtor has elected its application. The debtor filed a motion seeking to amend its petition to elect subchapter V application. Bankruptcy Rule 1009 permits a debtor to amend a petition as a matter of course before the case is closed and requires notice of the amendment to the trustee (if any) and any affected party in interest. Therefore, the debtor's motion for leave to amend is procedurally improper and is denied without prejudice. If the debtor files an amendment, parties in interest may oppose, and the court will consider such issues then. In re Progressive Solutions, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 467 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Feb. 21, 2020).
- 5.1.p Rule 1009 governs amendment to a petition to elect application of subchapter V, which applies to pending cases. The debtor's sole business was owning and leasing out three real estate parcels. It filed its chapter 11 petition before the effective date of the Small Business Reorganization Act of 2019. In its petition, it designated itself as a small business debtor. After the SBRA effective date, the debtor amended its petition to elect treatment under subchapter V. Where a statute does not affect contractual rights or property interests, it applies as of its effective date, even in pending cases. With exceptions not relevant in this case, SBRA's provisions do not materially change the treatment of secured and unsecured creditors in subchapter V. Therefore, it applies to this case. SBRA amended the definition of "small business debtor" to exclude only "single asset real estate," not any debtor "whose primary activity is the business of owning or operating real property." The debtor did not qualify as a small business debtor under the prior definition, but did qualify under the SBRA definition, which applies to this case after its effective date. Accordingly, the debtor is eligible for subchapter V. Bankruptcy Rule 1009 permits a debtor to amend its petition. Therefore, the amendment electing subchapter V was effective, and the case will proceed under subchapter V. In re Moore Props. Of Person County, LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 550 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. Feb. 28, 2020).
- 5.1.q Debtor operating a bed and breakfast where she resides may elect subchapter V during a pending chapter 11 case. The individual debtor purchased a historic home, which she used for her residence and as a bed and breakfast under a local ordinance that permitted short-stay rentals only if the owner also resided in the property. In October 2018, on the eve of foreclosure by the mortgage lender, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case, listing her debts as primarily consumer debts, and did not designate her case as a small business. Her debts included about $1.6 million on the mortgage and about $65,000 of general unsecured debts. After numerous cash collateral and preliminary plan proceedings, the court set deadlines for filing plans. The lender filed a plan that provided for foreclosure on the property. On the eve of the confirmation hearing, the debtor moved to amend her petition to designate her case as a small business case and to elect to proceed under new subchapter V, added by the Small Business Reorganization Act (SBRA), which became effective a week before the scheduled confirmation hearing. A small business debtor is “a person engaged in commercial or business activities” with total debt less than $2,725,625 (later amended effective March 27, 2020 to $7,500,000), “not less than 50 percent of which arose from the commercial or business activities of the debtor.” Bankruptcy Rule 1009(a) permits a debtor to amend a voluntary petition “as a matter of course,” though the amendment is not necessarily controlling, and the original petition, signed under penalty of perjury, still retains evidentiary effect. Therefore, the debtor could amend the petition to take advantage of a statute that did not become effective until 15 months after the filing of her case. Whether a debt is a business or personal debt depends on whether the debtor incurred it with an eye toward profit. Because the debtor incurred the mortgage to purchase the property for a bed and breakfast business, the debt was a business debt, and she qualified as a small business debtor, even though she also occupied the property as her residence. It was within the court’s discretion to reset deadlines running from the order for relief that subchapter V imposes to allow the debtor to proceed when the law was not available at the time of the order for relief in her case. In re Ventura, ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 985 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. Apr. 10, 2020).

- 5.1.r Debtor with business debts who is out of business may be eligible for subchapter V. The debtor owned a company that filed bankruptcy and ceased operations. In that case, the estate’s assets were sold and some creditors were paid. However, substantial debts remained for which the debtor was personally liable. Those debts comprised 56% of the debtor’s scheduled debts. The Small Business Reorganization Act of 2019 permits a small business debtor to attempt reorganization under subchapter V of chapter 11. A small business debtor is “a person engaged in commercial or business activities ... that has aggregate noncontingent liquidated secured and unsecured debts as of the date of the filing of the petition or the date of the order for relief in an amount not more than $2,725,625 ... not less than 50 percent of which arose from the commercial or business activities of the debtor.” The debtor is engaged in commercial or business activities by addressing residual business debt and therefore meets the eligibility requirements for subchapter V. In re Wright, ___ B.R. ___, case no. 20-01035-HB *Bankr. D. S. Car. Apr. 27, 2020).
- 5.1.s Revolver payments are disbursements for U.S. Trustee fee purposes. The debtor had a revolving line of credit with a bank. In its chapter 11 case, the bank increased the borrowing limit for the debtor in possession and required a roll-over, which the bankruptcy court approved. Under the roll-over, the debtor’s customers sent payments to the bank, who credited the debtor’s prepetition loan and then re-advanced the same amount to the DIP as a postpetition loan. The total indebtedness remained the same, but it was converted from prepetition to administrative expense. 28 U.S.C. 1930(a)(6) requires a trustee or debtor in possession to pay U.S. Trustee fees as a percentage of “disbursements.” “Disbursements is a broad term, encompassing any money paid out. Because customer payments were the debtor’s receivables, paying them to the bank constituted a disbursement. The bank’s re-advance of the funds to the estate did not make them less so. Therefore, the U.S. Trustee fee calculation includes the customer payments that reduced the bank’s claim. In re Cranberry Growers Coop., ___ F.3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 21121 (7th Cir. July 17, 2019).
- 5.1.t U.S. Trustee fee increase is unconstitutional as non-uniform. The debtor confirmed a plan in 2010. The plan provided for payment of U.S. Trustee fees under 28 U.S.C. 1930(a) until the case was closed. Congress increased U.S. Trustee fees substantially, effective January 1, 2018. The increase did not apply to the six judicial districts in Alabama and North Carolina that do not have U.S. Trustees, but the Judicial Conference provided for the increase in those districts effective October 1, 2018, but only for cases filed on or after that date. The U.S. Trustee fee is like a tax. As such, it applies in pending cases, regardless of when they were filed or when a plan was confirmed. The Constitution requires that taxes and bankruptcy law be uniform geographically. The U.S. Trustee fee is not uniform as to cases filed before October 1, 2018, because different rates apply in the six non-U.S. Trustee districts. Therefore, it may not be charged in this cases. In re Circuit City Stores, Inc. ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 2121 (Bankr. E.D. Va. July 15, 2019).

- 5.1.u Court denies request for waiver of section 345 bonding requirement. The debtors in possession operated a complex mortgage origination and servicing business with hundreds of bank accounts and average daily balances of nearly $100 million. Section 345 requires a depository institution that holds estate funds to post a bond in favor of the United States to ensure proper accounting for all funds or to deposit securities with a federal reserve bank to collateralize the deposit obligations, unless the court orders otherwise. In this case, the bank had refused to deposit securities to collateralize the account unless the DIP offset the $80,000 per month cost. Section 345 is designed to ensure moneys of estates will be available for distribution to creditors or for reorganization. A court should permit a waiver of its requirements based on the totality of the circumstances, including the size and sophistication of the business and the complexity of the case, the soundness of the depository and the risk to the estate, and the potential effect on the reorganization if a depository failed. In this case, although the DIP's circumstances might have warranted a waiver, the depository's willingness to collateralize the account, albeit at a cost to the estate, undercut the need for a waiver, which the court denied. In re Ditech Holding Corp., 605 B.R. 10 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2019).
- 5.1.v Reorganized debtor common stock is not proceeds of collateral. The plan provided for first lien creditors to retain their lien on their collateral to secure new, cram-down notes and for second lien creditors to receive all the reorganized debtor's stock. In addition, the plan contemplated a rights offering, which second lien creditors back-stopped for a fee. Under an intercreditor agreement, second lien creditors agreed not to take any action to hinder any first lien creditor remedy exercise or object to the manner in which the first lien creditors sought to enforce their claims or liens. Second lien creditors also agreed not to receive any proceeds of common collateral or rights arising out of common collateral until first lien claims were paid in full in cash. However, the agreement permitted second lien creditors to take any action available to them as holders of unsecured claims. "Proceeds" includes whatever is received upon disposition of collateral. In this case, first lien creditors retain their lien on the common collateral. The reorganized debtor's stock was not part of the collateral or even property of the debtor. Therefore, it is not proceeds of the second lien. The common stock second lien creditors receive is on account of their claims, but not on account of the common collateral, so second lien creditors' receipt of the new stock does not violate the intercreditor agreement. Second lien holders became entitled to the back-stop fee as a result of their new, postpetition back-stop commitment, not their second lien claim, and the fee is therefore not proceeds of the common collateral. Therefore, the plan and the back-stop fee did not violate the intercreditor agreement's prohibition on second lien creditors' receipt of common collateral proceeds before payment in full of first lien claims. BOKF, N.A. v. Wilmington Sav. Fund Soc., FSB (In re MPM Silicones, L.L.C.), 596 B.R. 416 (S.D.N.Y. 2019).
- 5.1.w Section 1114 applies to Coal Act retiree benefits in a chapter 11 section 363(b) sale. The 1992 Coal Act requires coal mines to contribute to funds to provide retiree medical benefits. The debtor coal mine filed chapter 11 and sought approval of a sale of substantially all its assets to a buyer that was newly-formed by the debtor's secured lenders. The buyer conditioned the sale on the DIP's termination of retiree benefits under section 1114. Section 1114 permits the court to approve an agreement providing for modification, or to order modification, of retiree benefits if modification is, among other things, necessary "to permit the reorganization of the debtor." "Retiree benefits" are "payments ... for the purpose of providing or reimbursing payments ... for medical ... benefits ... under any plan, fund or program ... maintained or established in whole or in part by the debtor." Based on a detailed examination of the Coal Act, its history, section 1114, and its history, the court concludes that despite the statutory requirement that coal employers fund retiree benefits, the debtor's obligations qualify as payments "under any plan, fund or program ... maintained ... in whole or in part by the debtor." Modification must be necessary "to permit reorganization." Chapter 11 permits a going concern sale. In this case, the sale effectively exchanged secured claims for equity, as in a classic going concern reorganization. More generally, a going concern sale, even not to existing creditors, is a form of business reorganization. As such, section 1114 permits modification of retiree benefits as part of a going concern sale under section 363(b). *United Mine Works of Am. Combined Benefit Fund v. - 5.1.x Non-profit debtor in possession may sell assets free and clear of Attorney General's consent rights. The nonprofit hospital ran out of funds during its chapter 11 case and closed. It proposed to sell the closed facility, with its suspended state hospital license under section 363, to a for-profit buyer, without compliance with state law that permits the Attorney General to impose conditions on a sale of a non-profit hospital to a for-profit buyer. Section 363(d)(1) permits sale of a non-profit debtor's estate assets only "in accordance with nonbankruptcy law applicable to the transfer of property" by a non-profit. Section 363(f) permits a sale of property of the estate free and clear of an interest in that property. "Interest in property" includes obligations that arise from or are connected to the property; courts favor a broader definition of obligations that flow from the ownership of the property. Here, the Attorney General's authority to impose monetary conditions upon a sale, such as a requirement that the buyer provide a specified amount of charitable care, constitutes an interest in the hospital property that is subject to a free and clear sale under section 363(f). However, because the debtor was no longer operating a hospital, the Attorney General's consent rights did not apply, so section 363(d)(1) does not restrict the sale conditions. In re Gardens Regional Hosp. and Med. Center, Inc., 567 B.R. 820 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2017).

- 5.1.y Funder's control of litigation makes litigation finance champertous under North Carolina law. A post-confirmation liquidating trust sought court approval of litigation financing to pursue claims. The financing terms required the trustee to make periodic funding requests and to consult regarding replacement counsel and permitted the funder to review litigation budgets, reject budget increase requests, and cut off financing at any point. Litigation proceeds would go first to pay off the funder's advances, including advances for the law firms' reduced hourly fees, and then to the law firms' reduced contingency fees, and then would be split 25%-75% between the funder and the liquidating trust, even if the funder had stopped making advances. Under North Carolina law, champerty is an agreement under which a stranger to litigation agrees to prosecute the suit at the stranger's own expense in exchange for a portion of litigation proceeds, but only where the stranger exercises control over the litigation. Here, the funder exercises control by retaining the right to refuse further funding advances, to veto budget increases, and to consult on replacement counsel. Therefore, the agreements are champertous and may not be approved. In re Designline Corp., 565 B.R. 341 (Bankr. W.D.N.C. 2017)
- 5.1.z Supreme Court rejects distribution under structured dismissal that violates Bankruptcy Code priorities. The debtor in possession liquidated all assets except fraudulent transfer claims against its secured lender, who had financed the debtor's LBO, and against the shareholder, who had lent additional funds and had a remaining claim secured by all the estate's $1.7 million in cash. There were allowed administrative, tax, priority WARN Act, and general unsecured claims. The bankruptcy court had denied a motion to dismiss the fraudulent transfer action, but litigation would have been difficult, complex, and risky against the well-financed defendant. There was no prospect of confirming a plan, and conversion to chapter 7 would have left the trustee without any assets to pursue claims, because the secured creditor had a lien on all cash. All parties other than the priority WARN Act claimants negotiated a settlement of all issues: the secured lender would contribute $2 million to an account earmarked to fund administrative expenses; the shareholder, also a fraudulent transfer defendant, would assign its lien on the estate's $1.7 million in cash to a trust to pay administrative and tax claims, with any balance distributed pro rata on general unsecured claims; all parties would exchange releases; and the case would be dismissed. The priority WARN Act claimants would receive nothing. Section 349 authorizes dismissal, includes provisions designed to restore the prebankruptcy status quo, and permits the bankruptcy court to order otherwise “for cause.” The “cause” must be consistent with the general purpose of section 349 to restore the prebankruptcy status quo. The Bankruptcy Code imposes priorities on distributions in chapter 7 and under a chapter 11 plan, which generally may not be varied without the consent of the holders of the priority claims. Although courts have in some circumstances approved distributions that deviate from Code-mandated priorities, they do so in service of a larger bankruptcy objective that is designed to enhance overall recoveries in the case. Here, the court approved the deviation as part of a final distribution in connection with a dismissal, and the order’s provisions providing for distribution that differed from the Code’s priority scheme were not consistent with restoring the pre-bankruptcy status quo. The Code does not authorize such deviations. Therefore, the structured dismissal order is reversed. Czyzewski v. Jevic Holding Corp., 580 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 973 (2017).

5.1.aa Secured creditor may not direct distribution of property of the estate through a carve-out.

The chapter 7 trustee sold the estate’s encumbered property. The secured creditor agreed to a carve-out from the sale proceeds “to pay the allowed administrative expenses of the chapter 7 estate and the allowed general unsecured claims in the case,” but the order approving the agreement provided only that the carve-out amount would be transferred to the estate. Section 726(a) establishes priorities for distribution of property of the estate, which may not be altered by agreement or court order. Although a secured creditor may distribute property that it receives from the estate in any way it determines, it may not direct the distribution of property of the estate. Therefore, the trustee must distribute the carve-out proceeds in accordance section 726(a)’s priorities. In re MCO Wash, Inc., 555 B.R. 159 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2016).

5.1.bb A creditor who has been paid in full is not a party in interest. The debtor’s former employer and competitor sued the debtor before bankruptcy for stealing trade secrets and for breach of fiduciary duty, among other things. After bankruptcy, the bankruptcy court adjudicated the dispute and granted the creditor judgment. The debtor then proposed a plan that classified the creditor separately and provided for payment in full of the creditor’s claim on the effective date. The creditor objected to confirmation. The debtor moved to pay the creditor in cash in full before confirmation. The creditor objected to being paid in full before confirmation, because it wished to pursue its confirmation objection anyway and feared that it would no longer have standing if its claim was paid. It told the court that its purpose in objecting was to put the debtor out of business because the debtor was bad for the industry. Section 1109(b) gives a party in interest the right to appear and be heard, and section 1128 gives a party in interest the right to object to confirmation. Neither section defines “party in interest,” but courts have found that it encompasses an entity with a pecuniary interest that might be affected by the case. An interest as a competitor does not qualify an entity as a party in interest. Therefore, the court authorizes pre-confirmation payment of the claim and denies the soon-to-be former creditor the right to object to confirmation. In re RnD Eng’g, LLC, 556 B.R. 303 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2016).

5.1.cc A court may not order substantive consolidation against a not-for-profit non-debtor. The creditors committee of the archdiocese debtor moved for substantive consolidation of the archdiocese’s parishes, chaplaincies, high schools and community foundation, all of which were separate religious corporations and not debtors. A corporation that is not a moneyed, business or commercial corporation is not subject to an involuntary bankruptcy petition. A religious corporation is not such a corporation and so is exempt from involuntary bankruptcy. Substantive consolidation would contravene this exemption. Therefore, the bankruptcy court lacks authority to consolidate these entities with the archdiocese debtor. In re Archdiocese of Saint Paul and Minneapolis, 553 B.R. 693 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2016), aff’d ___ F.3d ___ (8th Cir. April. 26, 2018).

- 5.1.dd Adequate protection requires only protection of a secured creditor’s petition date claim amount. Because the secured creditor appeared substantially oversecured at the beginning of the case, the court authorized the debtor in possession to use cash collateral but required adequate protection payments. When the case converted to chapter 7, the secured creditor remained oversecured, but less so. It collected the proceeds of its collateral, which covered all principal and prepetition interest but only a portion of postpetition interests and costs and expenses. A secured creditor is entitled to a superpriority claim under section 507(b) if the court granted inadequate adequate protection and the creditor has an allowable administrative expense claim arising from the automatic stay, the use, sale or lease of the collateral or a superpriority borrowing. Adequate protection entitles a secured creditor to protection of its interest in property of the estate. Its interest is equal to its petition date principal and interest, not to the value of its collateral or of any equity cushion. Here, the secured creditor was oversecured on both the petition date and on the chapter 7 conversion date. Therefore, the protection it received was adequate, and it is not entitled to a superpriority claim for the amount of postpetition interest, costs and expenses it would have received if the collateral value had retained its petition date value. Branch Banking and Trust Co. v. Beaman (In re Construction Supervision Servs., Inc.), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61444 (E.D.N.C. May 9, 2016).
- 5.1.ee Debtor in possession may modify Coal Act-governed retiree benefits in a liquidating case. The debtor operated coal mines with union labor. The 1992 Coal Act established vehicles for retiree benefit payments and governed their operation. In its chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession unsuccessfully sought an internal reorganization. It then put its mines up for sale. The only bidder required the debtor in possession to reject its collective bargaining agreements and its retiree benefits. After reaching agreement on a sale of all assets that would continue in operation, the debtor in possession moved for approval of its rejection of the retiree benefits. Section 1114 permits a debtor in possession to modify retiree benefits if, among other things, the “modification is necessary to permit the reorganization of the debtor.” Liquidation is not limited to chapter 7; chapter 11 permits a liquidating plan. As a result, courts interpret “reorganization” to include any form of debt adjustment, including a going concern sale of the estate’s assets. Courts apply section 1113 “contextually” rather than literally where the debtor must pursue a going concern sale, consistent with Congressional intent that section 1114 serve a rehabilitative purpose. The Coal Act requires payment of retiree benefits. Section 1114 applies to statutory as well as contractual retiree benefits. It is a narrow exception to the Coal Act’s broad goals and applicability. Therefore, the debtor in possession may modify retiree benefits otherwise protected by the Coal Act if all other section 1114 requirements are met. In re Walter Energy, Inc., 542 B.R. 859 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 2015).
- 5.1.ff Environmental parties do not have standing to object to an estate’s environmental settlement. The debtor coal mining company had self-bonded its reclamation obligations. Shortly before the debtor’s chapter 11 filing, the state environmental department revoked the debtor’s self-bonding authority and threatened to revoke its mining permits. The debtor in possession and the state negotiated a settlement under which the estate posted collateral equal to about 10% of the prior self-bonded amount to secure the reclamation obligations and sought court approval of the settlement. Several environmental organizations, who did not have claims against the debtor, objected to the settlement’s approval. To object to a settlement, an entity must have either Article III or section 1109(b) standing. Article III standing requires a showing of a concrete and particularized injury in fact. The environmental parties showed no such injury, at least in part because the debtor had not yet failed to comply with its reclamation obligations. Section 1109(b) permits a party in interest to raise and be heard on an issue in the case. A party in interest is an entity whose pecuniary interests are directly affected by the case. Because the environmental parties did not have any claims and could not show any other means by which the case affected their pecuniary interests, they are not parties in interest and do not have standing to object to the settlement. In re Alpha Nat. Res., Inc., 544 B.R. 848 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2016).

- 5.1.gg Beneficiary of a trust that is a creditor does not have party-in-interest standing. A dispute arose between the reorganized debtor and its principal creditor, which was owned by a trust. A decedent had established the trust for the benefit of his son, who was the sole, non-contingent beneficiary. The creditor, acting through the trust’s trustees, settled the dispute, and the debtor in possession sought bankruptcy court approval. Shortly after the debtor in possession filed the approval motion, the state probate court replaced the trustees for malfeasance. The son objected to the settlement, arguing that the trustees had breached their fiduciary duties. The new trustee joined the objection. The bankruptcy court approved the settlement. The son and the new trustee appealed. The district court dismissed the son’s appeal for lack of standing but continued to hear the new trustee’s appeal while the son appealed to the court of appeals. Section 1109(a) grants a party in interest, including a creditor, equity holder, and certain others, standing to appear and be heard in a chapter 11 case. While “party in interest” is broad, it is not unlimited. It includes only one who has a legally protected interest that could be affected by the chapter 11 case, such as where the bankruptcy court’s ruling might directly affect the party’s legal interest by determining its liability or its right to recover. It does not include one whose rights are only derivative of a party in interest’s rights, such as a trust beneficiary where the trust or its subsidiary is the debtor’s creditor. Any dispute between the beneficiary and his trustee should be heard by the appropriate non-bankruptcy court. It is not an issue that the bankruptcy court should or need resolve. Therefore, the son did not have party-in-interest standing to object to the settlement. Hughes v. Tower Park Props., LLC (In re Tower Park Props., LLC), 803 F.3d 450 (9th Cir. 2015).
- 5.1.hh Court denies injunction to protect debtor’s parent where claim against parent differs from claim against debtor. The debtor issued unsecured notes under an indenture, which the debtor’s parent guaranteed. The debtor and its parent entered into a series of transactions under which the debtor transferred substantial assets to the parent and attempted to void the guarantees. After the transactions, some of the unsecured noteholders sued the parent in federal district court for declaratory relief that the guarantees remained in effect and for damages. While the actions were pending, the debtor and some of its secured lenders entered into a restructuring support agreement to provide for a restructuring under chapter 11, and the debtor filed its chapter 11 case. In the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession filed an adversary proceeding to enjoin the noteholders’ actions against the parent. Under section 105(a), if there is a likelihood of a successful reorganization, then in limited circumstances, the bankruptcy court may enjoin nonbankruptcy litigation that would defeat or impair the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction. In the Seventh Circuit, the limited circumstances are those in which the estate’s claims and the third-party litigation seek recovery from the same assets in possession of the same defendants and both arise out of the same set of facts. In this case, the noteholders’ litigation seeks recovery from the same assets as the estate’s claims—the parent’s assets—and although the underlying transactions challenged in each claim are the same, the noteholders’ claims arise out of the breach of the indentures, while the estate’s claims arise under the bankruptcy avoiding powers. Therefore, the court denies the injunction. Caesars Entertainment Op. Co., Inc. v. BOKF, N.A. (In re Caesars Entertainment Op. Co., Inc.), 533 B.R. 714 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2015).
- 5.1.ii Court denies enforcement to free and clear sale order to remedy due process violation. The debtor automobile manufacturer filed its chapter 11 case and sold substantially all its assets under section 363 40 days after the petition date, when its financing ran out and it would have had to cease operations if the sale had not closed. Over the objections of numerous contract and tort creditors, the sale order authorized a sale free and clear of all claims and interests and specifically protected the purchaser from successor liability claims. The purchaser expressly assumed some obligations, including product liability and warranty claims for cars manufactured before the chapter 11 case, but expressly excluded other tort liabilities resulting from issues with those cars. Five years after the sale, the purchaser revealed a previously concealed design defect in about 27 million prepetition cars, which had resulted in injury or death to numerous individuals and which were the subject to federal mandatory safety recall requirements and notices. At least 24 engineers, managers, and internal lawyers knew of the defect prepetition. The debtor in possession had not sent notice to the 27 million car owners but relied on broad publication notice. After the purchaser revealed the defect, several class actions were initiated against the purchaser on successor liability theories, among others. The purchaser moved to enforce the sale order provision prohibiting successor liability claims. Due process requires the best notice practical under the circumstances, reasonably calculated to apprise people of the pendency of an action and to permit them to assert objections. Publication may suffice for unknown creditors, but direct notice is required for creditors whose identity the debtor in possession knows or can ascertain with reasonable effort. If notice to a creditor is inadequate, the creditor must show prejudice from the lack of notice to obtain relief from the order. Because of the debtor's internal knowledge of the defect, its danger, and the recall notice obligation, owners of the affected cars were known creditors; failure to give them notice violated their due process rights. However, they were not prejudiced, because they were well represented by numerous other objectors in similar positions, who made similar arguments against release of successor liability claims, which the court overruled. They should not be absolved of an adverse ruling that was fully litigated because of the due process violation. However, other creditors did not object to a sale order provision that appeared to protect the purchaser from claims for its own actions. A constitutional due process violation allows the court to revise or deny enforcement to a provision in an otherwise final order to remedy the violation, despite a non-severability clause in the sale order. The court therefore denies enforcement to the overly broad provision that protected the purchaser from claims for its own actions. In re Motors Liquidation Co., 529 B.R. 510 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

- 5.1.jj Court approves structured dismissal. The debtor in possession liquidated all assets except a fraudulent transfer claim against its secured lender who had financed the debtor's LBO and against the shareholder who had lent additional funds and had a remaining claim secured by all the estate's $1.7 million in cash. There were allowed administrative, tax, WARN Act and general unsecured claims. The bankruptcy court had denied a motion to dismiss the fraudulent transfer action, but litigation would have been difficult, complex and risky against the well-financed defendant. There was no prospect of confirming a plan, and conversion to chapter 7 would have left the trustee without any assets to pursue claims, because the secured creditor had a lien on all cash. All parties other than the WARN Act claimants negotiated a settlement of all issues: The secured lender would contribute $2 million to an account earmarked to fund administrative expenses; the shareholder, also a fraudulent transfer defendant, would assign its lien on the estate's $1.7 million in cash to a trust to pay administrative and tax claims, with any balance distributed pro rata on general unsecured claims; all parties would exchange releases; and the case would be dismissed. The WARN Act claimants would receive nothing. Bankruptcy Rule 9019 authorizes settlements of disputed claims based on the probability of success in litigation, likely difficulties in collection, complexity, expense and delay, and creditors' paramount interests. The litigation settlement (without regard to the WARN Act claimants' exclusion or the dismissal) met these requirements. The three principal exit routes from chapter 11 are plan confirmation, conversion to chapter 7, and dismissal. Section 1112(b) authorizes the court to dismiss a case for cause, including continuing loss to or diminution of the estate, which applied here. Section 349(b) provides for reinstatement of the prepetition state of affairs, unless the court orders otherwise "for cause." A dismissal coupled with a settlement providing for distribution of estate assets is therefore permissible, so long as the procedure is not being used to effect a sub rosa plan or circumvent the plan confirmation process or conversion to chapter 7. Because neither was possible here, the bankruptcy court may approve a structured dismissal. Official Committee v. CIT Group Bus. Credit Inc. (In re Jevic Holding Corp.), 787 F.3d 173 (3d Cir. 2015).
- 5.1.kk Court approves preplan tender offer settlement. Before the petition date, the debtor had entered into a restructuring support agreement that offered a class of over-secured bondholders a settlement of a disputed makewhole amount on the bonds. Those who timely accepted would receive the cash settlement amount; those who rejected would have an allowed claim for whatever the court determined was owed on the disputed claim. The cash settlement amount was a percentage of the face amount of the bonds rather than a percentage of the makewhole amount. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession sent the offer to all bondholders, who were free to accept or reject the offer, in compliance with the securities laws' tender offer rules. About 40% in face amount of the bonds accepted. Some who rejected appealed from the bankruptcy court's settlement approval. Section 363(b) permits pre-confirmation settlements when approved under Rule 9019. The tender offer rules address certain disclosure requirements. The SEC enforces the rules, but the SEC has only a limited role in a chapter 11 case. The limitation does not imply that a tender offer is improper in a chapter 11 case. Section 1123(a)(4) requires equal treatment of all claims within a class. But it applies only to a plan, not to a settlement offer that creditors are free to accept or reject individually. A debtor in possession may pay secured debt outside of a plan without running afoul of the case law prohibiting a sub rosa plan. Therefore, the district court affirms the bankruptcy court's settlement approval. Delaware Trust Co. v. Energy Future Intermediate Holdings, LLC (In re Energy Future Holding Corp.), 527 B.R. 157 (D. Del. 2015).

5.1.ii Claim objection and cram down plan support do not violate intercreditor agreement.

Second lien creditors supported the debtor in objecting to a portion of first lien claims and in proposing a cram down plan against first lien creditors. Under an intercreditor agreement, second lien creditors agreed not to contest or support any other person in contesting first lien creditors' request for adequate protection or their objection to any motion based on lack of adequate protection and agreed not to take any action to hinder any first lien creditor remedy exercise or object to the manner in which the first lien creditors sought to enforce their claims or liens. However, the agreement permitted second lien creditors to take any action available to them as holders of unsecured claims. An intercreditor agreement of the type at issue here (as opposed to a "silent second" type) contemplates that the senior creditor controls all matters related to the common collateral, but does not restrict the junior creditors to the extent that their rights derive from holding, or are the same as the rights of holders of, an unsecured claim. An unsecured claim holder may object to claims or support the debtor in doing so and may support the debtor in proposing a cram down plan against a senior lien holder. Therefore, the second lien holders' actions do not violate the intercreditor agreement. BOKF, N.A. v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A. (In re MPM Silicones, LLC), 518 B.R. 742 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).

5.1.mm Reorganized debtor common stock is not proceeds of collateral. The plan provided for first lien creditors to retain their lien on their collateral to secure new, cram-down notes and for second lien creditors to receive all the reorganized debtor's stock. In addition, the plan contemplated a rights offering, which second lien creditors back-stopped for a fee. Under an intercreditor agreement, second lien creditors agreed not to take any action to hinder any first lien creditor remedy exercise or object to the manner in which the first lien creditors sought to enforce their claims or liens. Second lien creditors also agreed not to receive any proceeds of common collateral or rights arising out of common collateral until first lien claims were paid in full in cash. However, the agreement permitted second lien creditors to take any action available to them as holders of unsecured claims. "Proceeds" includes whatever is received upon disposition of collateral. In this case, first lien creditors retain their lien on the common collateral. The reorganized debtor's stock was not part of the collateral or even property of the debtor. Therefore, it is not proceeds of the second lien. The common stock second lien creditors receive is on account of their claims, but not on account of the common collateral, so second lien creditors' receipt of the new stock does not violate the intercreditor agreement. Second lien holders became entitled to the back-stop fee as a result of their new, postpetition back-stop commitment, not their second lien claim, and the fee is therefore not proceeds of the common collateral. Therefore, the plan and the back-stop fee did not violate the intercreditor agreement's prohibition on second lien creditors' receipt of common collateral proceeds before payment in full of first lien claims. BOKF, N.A. v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A. (In re MPM Silicones, LLC), 518 B.R. 742 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).

- 5.1.nn Party in interest standing requires a pecuniary interest. The debtor in possession settled a coverage dispute with its primary layer insurer for less than half of the policy face amount. The excess coverage carrier, who did not have any claims against the debtor, objected to the settlement. Only a party in interest may appear and be heard in a bankruptcy case. A party in interest is one who has a legally recognized interest in the debtor's assets or is a creditor. Suffering a collateral pecuniary effect, such as requiring excess coverage after less primary coverage, from an action of the debtor in possession is not such a legally recognized interest. Therefore, the excess carrier does not have standing to object to the settlement. In re C.P. Hall Co., 750 F.3d 659 (7th Cir. 2014).
- 5.1.oo Defendant in action by plan trustee does not have standing to oppose case reopening. The debtor's plan created a liquidating trust, which brought an action in state court against a group of defendants. After the trust expired by its terms, the defendants moved for summary judgment in the action on the ground that the trustee no longer had standing to prosecute it. The trustee moved to reopen the bankruptcy case to obtain court approval of an amendment to the trust agreement to extend the trust term. Section 1109(b) permits a party in interest to raise and be heard on any issue in the case. The section gives examples of parties in interest but is not limiting. A court should determine who is a party in interest by looking to the Code's underlying purpose of providing a forum to allow a debtor and its creditors to adjust their relationships. A financial interest is not required; a legal interest may suffice. Here, however, the defendants' legal interest in the estate is insufficient to allow them party-in-interest standing. Harbor Trust Co. Ltd. v. Aaron (In re PlusFunds Groups, Inc.), 505 B.R. 419 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 5.1.pp Case may not be reopened to administer previously known assets. The debtor's plan created a liquidating trust, which brought an action in state court against a group of defendants. After the trust expired by its terms, the defendants moved for summary judgment in the action on the ground that the trustee no longer had standing to prosecute it. The trustee moved to reopen the bankruptcy case to obtain court approval of an amendment to the trust agreement to extend the trust term. Section 350(a) requires the court to close a case after the estate's assets have been fully administered. Section 350(b) permits reopening to administer assets, but case law reads that provision to apply only to newly discovered assets. Here, the asset that the trustee sought to protect was known at the time the case was closed. Therefore, administering that asset did not provide adequate grounds to reopen the case. Harbor Trust Co. Ltd. v. Aaron (In re PlusFunds Groups, Inc.), 505 B.R. 419 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 5.1.qq Trustee may convert farmer's chapter 11 case. A corporate farmer filed a chapter 11 case. A trustee was appointed, sold the farm and moved to convert the case to chapter 7. Section 1112(c) prohibits the court from converting a chapter 11 case to chapter 7 "if the debtor is a farmer ... unless the debtor requests such conversion." The Code defines "debtor" as the "person ... concerning which a case under this title has been commenced." However, section 1112(a) prohibits a debtor who is not a debtor in possession from converting a chapter 11 case to chapter 7, which a trustee may do. In addition, reading "debtor" in subsection (c) as including the trustee is consistent with reading trustee as debtor in possession. Therefore, the trustee may exercise the power to convert to chapter 7 even if the debtor is a farmer. Sears v. U.S. Trustee (In re AFY), 734 F.3d 810 (8th Cir. 2013).
- 5.1.rr Section 1113 rejection does not relieve a debtor in possession from retiree benefits. The debtor had entered into a collective bargaining agreement that required it to pay retiree health benefits. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession rejected the agreement under section 1113, relieving it of any further contractual obligations to the retirees. However, section 1114 requires a debtor in possession to continue to pay retiree benefits after bankruptcy until the court orders otherwise. The obligations morph from contractual to statutory, so the rejection of the collective bargaining agreement does not by itself relieve the debtor in possession from paying retiree benefits. Patriot Coal Corp. v. Peabody Holding Co. (In re Patriot Coal Corp.), 497 B.R. 36 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2013).

- 5.1.ss Plan may not provide for insider severance contrary to section 503(c). Section 503(c) provides that a severance payment “shall neither be allowed, nor paid” to an insider unless it complies with certain limitations. The chapter 11 plan provided for a noncompliant severance payment to the CEO, who was to become the nonexecutive chairman of the reorganized debtor. Section 1123(b)(6) permits a plan to contain any provision not inconsistent with chapter 11; section 1129(a)(4) imposes a confirmation requirement that any payments to be made for services in connection with the case or in connection with the plan are disclosed and reasonable. Because section 503(c) prohibits payment of noncompliant severance, payment would be inconsistent with chapter 11 and would violate section 1123(b)(6), despite section 1129(a)(4)’s recognition that some plan-connected payments are permissible. Therefore, the plan may not provide for the payment. In re AMR Corp., 497 B.R. 691 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 5.1.tt Indenture “no action” clause is enforceable in a bankruptcy case. The debtor issued insured notes. The financing documents delegated all enforcement rights to the insurer, including control of enforcement rights and remedies and giving instructions to the collateral agent, and prohibited the noteholders from instituting or directing enforcement proceedings. Section 1109(b) grants every party in interest the right to be heard in a bankruptcy case. However, a “no action” clause is enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Although a no action clause is strictly construed, and this clause does not specifically mention action in a bankruptcy case, it is sufficiently broad to cover any enforcement action, even in a bankruptcy case. Therefore, the noteholders do not have standing to appear and be heard in the case. In re Am. Roads LLC, 496 B.R. 727 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 5.1.uu The trustee succeeds to the debtor in possession’s status in an adversary proceeding. The debtor in possession sued the bank to avoid a judicial lien under section 547. The court dismissed the adversary proceeding under Rule 12(b)(6) with leave to amend, and then finally dismissed it after the debtor in possession failed to file an amended complaint. The case converted to chapter 7, and the trustee brought the same action against the bank. Res judicata applies when the court in the prior action had jurisdiction, there was a final judgment on the merits and both cases involve the same claim and the same parties or their privies. The bankruptcy court here had jurisdiction over the claim, the dismissal was a final judgment, and the trustee brought the same claim that the debtor in possession had brought. A party is in privity with another party if the party succeeds to the other party’s interest in property or is controlled by the other party or if the party’s interest was adequately represented by the other party. The debtor in possession acts as representative of the estate. Upon appointment, the trustee succeeds to the debtor in possession as representative of the estate and therefore is the successor in interest to the debtor in possession. As such, the trustee is bound by all of the debtor in possession’s authorized acts. Accordingly, res judicata bars the trustee’s action here. Drake v. Sea Island Bank (In re Collins), 489 B.R. 917 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2012).
- 5.1.vv Section 959(b) does not apply in a chapter 9 case. The chapter 9 debtor voted to close a hospital. Other municipal authorities sued under applicable state law to require the debtor to maintain operations. Section 959(b) requires a “trustee, receiver or manager appointed in any cause pending in any court of the United States, including a debtor in possession, [to] manage and operate the property in his possession ... according to the valid laws of the State in which such property is situated.” Case law has read out of the statute the “appointed” requirement and expanded the section to apply to any officer of a United States court. A chapter 9 debtor is not an officer of the court where the case is pending. The debtor does not administer property of the estate or property that is in custodia legis, because there is no estate in a chapter 9 case. In addition, the Tenth Amendment, which prohibits the bankruptcy court from interfering with the debtor's operation of its property, also prohibits the court from requiring, through the operation of a federal statute, that a municipality comply with its own state's laws. Finally, under section 904, a municipal debtor retains full control over its property and operations. Therefore, section 959(b) does not apply to a chapter 9 debtor. In re Jefferson County, Ala., 484 B.R. 427 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 2012).

5.1.ww Employees who are not appointed to their positions by the board are not officer-insiders.

The debtor in possession airline proposed to implement a key employee retention plan for its director of flight safety, vice president-flight operations, chief pilot, senior director of maintenance and director-quality assurance and projects. None of the individuals sat on the board of directors or even attended board meetings. None were elected to their positions by the board. Each reported to a senior officer, such as the chief operating officer or a vice president. Section 503(c) imposes strict limits on implementing such a plan for an "insider". Under section 101(31)(B), insider includes director, officer or person in control. Neither the director nor vice president title determines whether a person is a director or officer. A "director" is one who sits on the board of directors. An "officer" is one elected or appointed by the board to manage the corporation's affairs. None of these employees meets these requirements. Therefore, they are not insiders, and section 503(c) does not limit a retention plan. In re Global Aviation Holdings Inc., 478 B.R. 142 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2012).

5.1.xx Cash collateral order expires upon case dismissal. With the court's approval in periodic orders, the secured creditor and the real estate debtor in possession agreed that rents and other proceeds were cash collateral and could be used for certain property maintenance and related expenses. Before the last order expired, the court dismissed the case. Promptly after dismissal, the debtor transferred cash to third parties who had guaranteed the loan from the secured creditor. The creditor sought a temporary restraining order in district court against dissipation of the funds, on the grounds that they remained cash collateral even after dismissal of the chapter 11 case. Section 363(a) defines "cash collateral" as "cash ... in which the estate and an entity other than the estate have an interest." Section 363(c)(2) prohibits a trustee's or debtor in possession's use of cash collateral without the other entity's consent or a court order. The statutory language negates any reading that the restrictions survive dismissal, because there is no longer an estate that could have an interest in the cash, nor a trustee or debtor in possession. In addition, a cash collateral order does not determine any rights; it operates only as an interim regulatory measure during the case, similar to a preliminary injunction. Therefore, section 363's restrictions do not survive dismissal. Jefferson-Pilot Invs., Inc. v. Cap. First Realty, Inc., 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73942 (N.D. Ill. May 29, 2012).

5.1.yy One case in an administratively consolidated group of cases may be a single asset real estate case. The debtor was one of 53 single asset real estate debtors owned by a single parent debtor. They shared administrative services and cash management and operated as a consolidated enterprise. In the absence of substantive consolidation, the Code treats each corporate entity separately, even though the entities may be part of a consolidated enterprise. The definition of "single asset real estate debtor" does not contain any exceptions for such a debtor that is part of a consolidated enterprise. Therefore, the single asset real estate rules apply to each debtor in the corporate group. Meruelo Maddux Props.-760 S. Hill St. v. Bank of Am. N.A. (In re Meruelo Maddux Props., Inc.), 667 F.3d 1072 (9th Cir. 2012).

5.1.zz Dissolved liquidating debtor does not have right to unclaimed funds deposited into court registry. The debtor confirmed a plan that provided for all of its assets to be vested in a liquidating trust, which would collect and liquidate the assets and make distributions to creditors.

The plan provided that the debtor and its shareholder would not receive or retain any property under the plan. The debtor was administratively dissolved under state law. After the trust completed the liquidation and distribution, it remitted unclaimed distributions to the court registry. The debtor's last officer assigned any rights the debtor had in any estate funds to a "fund locator", who would pursue the funds and share a portion with the officer. Section 347(b) provides that any unclaimed funds under a plan distribution "becomes the property of the debtor or of the entity acquiring the assets of the debtor under the plan, as the case may be." Under state law, a dissolved corporation is not authorized to make assignments as attempted in this case. The debtor did not continue to exist for purposes of section 347(b), and the plan provided for disposition of the funds in a manner that excluded the debtor and its shareholders. Therefore, the funds will be treated the same as unclaimed funds in a chapter 7 case and will remain in the court registry until claimed by creditors entitled to receive them. In re A.G.A. Flowers, Inc., 457 B.R. 884 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2011).

- 5.1.aaa Segregated cash deposit offered by the debtor in possession provides adequate assurance for utility service. The debtor in possession filed a first day motion to determine adequate assurance for its utilities. It proposed a segregated, interest-bearing bank deposit of two weeks' service charges. Section 366(c)(2) permits a utility to alter or discontinue service if, during the 30-day period after the petition date, the utility does not receive from the debtor in possession "adequate assurance of payment for utility service that is satisfactory to the utility." Section 366(c)(3)(A) permits the court, on request of a party in interest, to modify the assurance amount. Section 366(c)(2) does not contemplate that only the utility may set the form and manner of assurance. The debtor in possession may propose the assurance. If the utility is not satisfied, either party (the utility or the debtor in possession) may request modification. Otherwise, the debtor in possession could lose service by the utility's inaction, and the court's ability to set the assurance form and amount would be limited. Section 366(c)(3)(B) requires that the assurance be in the form of a cash deposit, a letter of credit, a certificate of deposit or prepayment. The escrow deposit here meets that requirement. It is similar to a letter of credit, without the fees. Long Isl. Lighting Co. v. The Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., Inc. (In re The Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., Inc.), 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131621 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 14, 2011).
- 5.1.bbb A beneficial owner of certificates in an investment trust that holds claims against the debtor is not a party in interest. A REMIC trust held a note secured by a mortgage on the debtor's real estate. The REMIC issued certificates of beneficial interest to investors. The trust agreement provides for a servicer of the trust's assets to administer the assets and exercise remedies for the trust. The agreement prohibits a certificate holder from instituting any suit, action or proceeding to enforce any of the assets of the trust without compliance with specified procedures. Section 1109(b) permits a party in interest, including a creditor, to appear and be heard on any issue in a chapter 11 case. As the holder of the note and mortgage, the trust is the creditor, and the servicer is the sole person authorized to enforce remedies on the trust's behalf. A certificate holder is only an investor in a creditor and thus is not a party in interest in the chapter 11 case, even though its interest is a beneficial interest in the trust's assets. Therefore, the certificate holder does not have standing in its capacity as such to appear and be heard in the case. In re Innkeepers USA Trust, 448 B.R. 131 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 5.1.ccc Bankruptcy court may modify a utility's demand for adequate assurance before the debtor in possession complies with the demand; a segregated cash account is adequate. The debtor in possession, with the bankruptcy court's approval, established a segregated cash account to provide adequate assurance to utilities. The court's order established a procedure for utilities to request more assurance. They could submit a written request to the DIP, and if the DIP did not agree, the DIP would have to seek a court determination of adequate assurance. One utility requested an additional direct deposit from the DIP, which the DIP refused, but it increased the segregated cash account to the full amount the utility had requested. Section 366(c) permits a utility to discontinue service if it does not receive from the debtor in possession, within 30 days after the order for relief, “adequate assurance of payment ... satisfactory to the utility” and permits the court to modify the amount of the assurance. Adequate assurance must take the form of a cash deposit, letter of credit, certificate of deposit, surety bond, prepayment or other form agreed by the utility. The establishment of a segregated account under the DIP’s control complies with these provisions. They require that the utility “receive” adequate assurance, not the cash itself. The court may modify and thereby establish the amount of assurance before the DIP provides it to prevent a stubborn utility from making demands that are impossible to satisfy. In re Crystal Cathedral Ministries, 454 B.R. 124 (C.D. Cal. 2011).

- 5.1.ddd Receipts from a miniature golf course are not cash collateral. The debtor operated a miniature golf course. Patrons paid for admission in cash at the entrance. Payment entitled them only to a license to use the course. The debtor’s lender had a perfected security interest in all the debtor’s assets, including the course, the putters and golf balls, accounts and general intangibles. The lender had possession of none of the collateral at the petition date. Section 363(a) defines “cash collateral” as cash or cash equivalents in which the estate and another entity have an interest. Under the U.C.C., “general intangibles” includes money, but a lender perfects a security interest in money only by possession. An “account” is a “right to payment of a monetary obligation, whether or not earned by performance”. Cash on hand or cash received upon provision of a good or service is not an “account”, as it is not a “right to payment”; it is payment already received. “Proceeds” is whatever is acquired upon sale, lease, license or exchange or other disposition of collateral” and “whatever is collected on, or distributed on account of, collateral”. Section 552(a) prevents a prepetition security interest from attaching to assets that are acquired postpetition unless the postpetition assets are proceeds of prepetition collateral. Because the lender did not have a perfected interest in the petition date cash on hand, and the postpetition customer fees were not proceeds of prepetition collateral, the lender did not have an interest in the cash, and the debtor’s cash was not “cash collateral”. In re Wright Group, Inc., 443 B.R. 795 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 2011).
- 5.1.eee “Insider” does not include “director” level employees. The debtor in possession proposed a key employee retention plan for “director” level employees. Section 503(c) limits such plans for insiders. Section 101 defines insider as a “director”, “officer” or “person in control of the debtor”. “Director” means member of the board of directors. “Officer” is one who has been elected by the board of directors and exercises executive authority. Title is not determinative, but authority and responsibility are. The court must examine the totality of the circumstances to determine whether the individual has a controlling interest in the debtor or the authority to dictate corporate policy or asset disposition. “Director” level employees here were employees without such authority. They report to corporate officers, not to the board, they are responsible only for running day-to-day operations, and they do not have decision-making authority akin to an executive. Therefore, they are not insiders. In re Borders Group, Inc., 453 B.R. 459 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 5.1.fff Court may not grant a priming lien to provide adequate protection for the use of cash collateral. When the debtor, a resort developer, filed bankruptcy, it held cash that was subject to its lenders’ lien and an uncompleted project that was subject to the lenders’ and mechanics liens. The lenders and the mechanics lienors disputed the priority of their liens on the project. The court authorized the debtor in possession to use the cash collateral to stabilize and maintain the project and to pay the chapter 11 expenses of administration, including the cost of an examiner. The authorizing order deemed that the debtor in possession repaid the cash to the lenders and reborrowed it from them under section 364(d), granted the lenders a priming lien on the project, ahead of the mechanics liens, and required that any third party debtor in possession financing proceeds be used first to repay the lenders the amount of cash collateral that the debtor in possession used. Although the court found that the cash collateral use was necessary to the chapter 11 case, it did not find that the use would protect the value of the mechanics lienors’ interest in the project if it were later determined that their lien was senior to the lenders' lien. Later, the debtor in possession obtained such third party financing from a good faith lender and used the proceeds to pay the lenders as the original cash collateral order required and for other purposes. Section 363(c) authorizes a debtor in possession to use cash collateral if the interest of the lienor is adequately protected. Section 364(d) authorizes a debtor in possession to borrow and to grant the lender a priming lien, as long as the interest of the existing lender is adequately protected. Section 363(c) does not authorize the grant of a priming lien to provide adequate protection of the cash lienor. The order deeming the cash collateral repaid and reborrowed was a legal fiction that the Code does not authorize. Therefore, the priming lien to provide adequate protection of the lenders' interest was not authorized. Desert Fire Protection v. Fontainebleau Las Vegas Holdings, LLC (In re Fontainebleau Las Vegas Holdings, LLC), 434 B.R. 716 (S.D. Fla. 2010).

- 5.1.ggg Distribution of securities of a buyer of the estate's assets to the holder of a lien on the assets is not properly justified as adequate protection. The debtor in possession conducted an auction of its assets, at which only the first lien holder and the second lien holder bid. Both bids contemplated distribution of the equity securities of the acquisition vehicle in satisfaction of the creditors' claims. The second lien holder's bid provided for distribution of securities to the first lien holder and to the second lien holder, to the extent of the value of its claim. The bankruptcy court authorized the distribution of the securities to the first lien holder as adequate protection of its interest in the collateral. Adequate protection is generally a means to protect a secured creditor against decrease in the value of its collateral. Providing that a lien attaches to proceeds qualifies as adequate protection. However, without a showing that additional adequate protection was needed because of decrease in value, distribution of the securities is not properly justified as adequate protection. Contrarian Funds LLC v. Aretex LLC (In re Westpoint Stevens, Inc.), 600 F.3d 231 (2d Cir. 2010).
- 5.1.hhh Revised Article 9 defines "proceeds" for purposes of section 552(b). The debtor granted its lender a security interest in contract rights under its franchise agreement from the city and in net revenues (defined as cash remaining after payment of operating expenses). The lender sought adequate protection of its interest in the estate's cash collateral. Under section 552, a prepetition security interest does not extend to property acquired after bankruptcy except to the extent the after-acquired property is "proceeds" of the petition date collateral. To protect commercial expectations, federal law looks to state law to define commonly used terms, except where doing so would frustrate specific federal objectives. Therefore, it is appropriate to look to the U.C.C.'s proceeds definition. Although section 552(b) and the security agreement in this case both predated the 2001 amendments to Article 9, applying Revised Article 9's definition is consistent with current commercial expectations and would not frustrate chapter 11's rehabilitative goals. Under Revised Article 9, "proceeds" includes "whatever is collected on, or distributed on account of, collateral". The revenues from operation of the debtor's system derive from the use of the equipment, not the contract rights under the franchise agreement, and therefore are not proceeds. The ongoing postpetition net revenues are also not proceeds. They do not derive from either the franchise agreement or the prepetition net revenues because, by definition, the net revenues are paid solely to the lender and are not used to support system operation. In re Las Vegas Monorail Co., 429 B.R. 770 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2010).
- 5.1.iii Committee may not recover DIP loan commitment fee after debtor in possession determines to proceed with loan. The debtor in possession agreed with its prepetition secured lender on use of cash collateral for two weeks. During the two weeks, it sought debtor in possession financing but was able to reach an agreement only with its prepetition lender. The agreement provided for a significant commitment fee, to which the creditors committee objected. The lender made clear in court that it would not proceed with the financing without approval of the commitment fee, because the lender was required to set aside capital once the financing was approved. The court approved the financing, including the commitment fee, on an interim basis and set the matter for final hearing. One day before the final hearing, the debtor in possession determined that it could survive on use of cash collateral and did not need the new financing. It withdrew the motion for approval of the financing. Later, the committee obtained authority to pursue estate causes of action and sought recovery of the commitment fee. Section 364(c)(1) authorizes incurring of debt “with priority over any or all administrative expenses”. Such a debt differs from an administrative expense. Priority under this provision therefore does not require compliance with the requirements for allowance of administrative expenses under section 503(b)(1), such as benefit to the estate. Section 364(e) provides that reversal or modification on appeal of an order approving a financing does not affect the validity of “any debt so incurred, or the priority of any lien so granted”. Although section 364(e) applies only on an appeal, its policy applies equally to a motion to modify the financing order. Section 364(e) would offer illusory protection if the estate could evade its protections by seeking modification of an order at the trial court, rather than on appeal. Rule 60(b)(6) permits modification of an order on any equitable ground. It should be used only sparingly, to prevent manifest injustice. Therefore, Rule 60(b)(6) does not provide grounds for modification of the order or recovery of the commitment fee. In re Fleetwood Enterps., Inc., 427 B.R. 852 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2010).

The lender sought adequate protection of its interest in the estate’s cash collateral. Under section 552, a prepetition security interest does not extend to property acquired after bankruptcy except to the extent the after-acquired property is “proceeds” of the petition date collateral. - 5.1.kkk Court may determine utility adequate assurance terms before payment. Before bankruptcy, the debtor had not paid its utility charges. The utility sought a deposit from the debtor-in-possession of two months’ charges as adequate assurance. Before making the deposit, the debtor-in-possession asked the court to modify the required deposit. “Subject to paragraphs (3) and (4)”, section 366(c)(2) permits a utility to discontinue service, if, within 30 days after the petition date, it does not receive from the chapter 11 trustee or debtor-in-possession a cash deposit as “adequate assurance of future payment for utility service that is satisfactory to the utility.” Paragraph (3) permits the court to “order modification of the amount of an assurance payment under paragraph (2).” Because the utility’s right to discontinue service is “subject to paragraph[] (3)”, it is therefore subject to the court’s power to modify. In addition, the “assurance payment” to which paragraph (3) refers is a payment “that is satisfactory to the utility”, not an amount “that is paid”. Thus, the court may modify the adequate assurance amount before payment. The court refuses to follow In re Lucre, 333 B.R. 151 (Bankr. W.D. 5.1.iii Court enforces intercreditor agreement that silences second lien holders. The debtor had issued both first lien and second lien debt, secured by all of its assets, although the lenders were unable by reason of federal communications law to perfect a security interest in the debtor guarantor subsidiaries' FCC broadcasting licenses. The lenders had a perfected lien in the stock of those subsidiaries. Under an intercreditor agreement, the second lien debt holders acknowledged the first lien debt's priority and that it would not be impaired by "any nonperfection of any lien purportedly securing" any of the first lien debt. The agreement also prohibited any second lien debt holder from objecting to any postpetition financing or any plan the terms of which are consistent with the first lien holders' rights unless the first lien lenders were paid in full. The first lien debt totaled $850 million; the debtor's value did not exceed $450 million. The debtor proposed a chapter 11 plan that provided for distribution of substantially all its value to the holders of the first lien debt. A second lien holder objected on the ground that the FCC licenses were unencumbered and their value should be available for distribution to holders of unsecured claims. Section 510(a) requires a bankruptcy court to enforce a subordination agreement. Although bankruptcy policy liberally permits parties to appear and be heard in a chapter 11 case, a party may waive its right to do so under such an agreement. Some courts have refused to enforce such a waiver where it involves the right to vote on a plan. The intercreditor agreement here applies to collateral whether or not the first lien holders have perfected their lien on it. It does not infringe on the second lien holders' right to vote. Therefore, it is enforceable under section 510(a), and the second lien holders do not have standing to object to the plan. Ion Media Networks, Inc. v. Cyrus Select Opportunities Master Fund, Ltd. (In re Ion Media Networks, Inc.), 419 B.R. 585 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

5.1.mmm Debtor in possession is not bound to seek court approval of an agreement that commits it to do so. The debtor in possession entered into an asset purchase agreement (APA) with a buyer that required the DIP to obtain approval of bidding procedures, including a structured auction process, and buyer protections, including a break-up fee, but the APA was not binding on the buyer pending its completion and approval of due diligence. The due diligence deadline expired after the court approved the bidding procedures and break-up fee. The DIP and the buyer later agreed to extend the deadline. Before the extended deadline expired, another buyer offered a higher price for the assets, but the original buyer completed and approved the due diligence before the extended deadline expired. A DIP's agreement that is subject to court approval is not binding on the DIP until court approval, and the DIP may walk away from the agreement while it seeks court approval until the court approves it. The court should not approve the agreement if there is a better offer. The court here construes the original agreement as having expired when the buyer did not approve due diligence by the date in the original agreement that was before the court when it approved the bidding procedures and construes the agreement with the extended deadline agreement as a new agreement. The DIP was not bound by the new agreement and properly conducted the informal auction that resulted in the higher bid and a new assets purchase agreement. The court approves the buyer protections for the new buyer and permits the DIP to withdraw the motion to approve the buyer protections for the original buyer. In re Metaldyne Corp., 409 B.R. 661 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

5.1.nnn Receiver may become the debtor in possession. The debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. Its principals were indicted, convicted and jailed. The United States obtained forfeiture orders that resulted in seizure of all the debtor's assets other than litigation claims. Some unpaid creditors brought an action in federal district court against the debtor and sought the appointment of a receiver under section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and under state law. The district court appointed an individual to act as receiver and vested him "with the sole and exclusive power and authority to manage and direct the business and financial affairs of the [debtor], including without limitation, the authority to petition for protection under the Bankruptcy Code". The receiver filed a chapter 11 petition for the debtor. The U.S. trustee moved for the appointment of a trustee, arguing that the receiver was a "custodian" that must turn over property under section 543 and was therefore disqualified from acting as the debtor in possession's management (though not as a trustee if the U.S. trustee appointed him). The standard for appointment of a chapter 11 trustee is very high and requires a showing by clear and convincing evidence. The receiver here was given all corporate governance power and authority and therefore functioned as management of the corporate debtor in possession. His receiver role (a "custodian" under section 543) was not exclusive; the district court could combine the receivership and corporate governance roles in the same individual so that he could serve as debtor in possession after a chapter 11 filing. Adams v. Marwil (In re Bayou Group L.L.C.), 564 F.3d 541 (2d Cir. 2009).

5.1.000 Prepetition receiver may serve as chapter 11 trustee. The individual shareholder owned and operated two investment companies, one apparently legitimate and one apparently fraudulent. On the U.S. Attorney's allegation of criminal securities fraud, the district court appointed a receiver for the debtor and all its assets and gave the receiver full management control of the companies, to the exclusion of the individual shareholder, and authorized the receiver to file bankruptcy petitions for the two companies. The receivership order also ordered the receiver to "coordinate with representatives of the United States Attorney's office and Court personnel as needed to ensure that any assets subject to the terms of this Order are available for criminal restitution, forfeiture, or other legal remedies in proceedings commenced by or on behalf of the United States". After the receiver filed chapter 11 cases for both companies, the shareholder was arrested and incarcerated, and the U.S. Trustee moved for the appointment of a trustee, on the grounds that the debtors were without any management. The court granted the motion, and the U.S. Trustee appointed the receiver as trustee for both companies, in part because of the receiver's already deep knowledge of the companies. A creditor of the apparently legitimate business asserted that the receiver had two conflicts: an "external" conflict because of his duties under the receivership order and an "internal" conflict because of the differing interests of the creditors and victims of the apparently illegitimate company and the creditors of the apparently legitimate company. Section 101(14)(C) requires that the trustee not "have" an interest materially adverse to the estate. In contrast, section 327(a) bars employment of an attorney who "holds or represents" an interest adverse to the estate. Section 101(14)(C), therefore, focuses on the trustee's personal interests, not his representations. Here, the only possible adversity was in the receiver's representative capacity, not his personal capacity. In addition, the receiver, as trustee, pledged to the court to resist criminal seizure of the debtors' assets, and the court determined that the "cooperation" provision of the receivership order did not require otherwise. Therefore, the trustee, as receiver, did not have a disqualifying interest. Rule 2009 permits a single trustee for multiple estates unless a creditor shows "that creditors ... of the different estates will be prejudiced by conflicts of interest". This provision requires an actual, not merely a potential conflict. Here, though a conflict might develop once the trustee completes his investigation of the fraud and collects assets, at this early stage of the case, involving only investigation and collection, not allocation or distribution, the conflict is only potential and therefore there is no showing of prejudice to creditors. This preliminary ruling will not, however, be binding in the future if an actual conflict and actual prejudice arise. Therefore, the receiver may serve as chapter 11 trustee for both estates. In re Petters Co., Inc., 401 B.R. 391 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2009), aff'd sub nom. Ritchie Spec'l. Credit Invs., Ltd. v. U.S. Trustee, 415 B.R. 391 (D. Minn. 2009).

5.1.ppp Court may enjoin enforcement action against foreign guarantor parent. The debtors' foreign parent corporation had guaranteed both the debtors' subordinated unsecured bonds and some operational liabilities. The parent had numerous indirect non-U.S. subsidiaries that were not financially distressed and had not filed insolvency proceedings in the U.S. or abroad. However, the parent's only material assets were the subsidiaries' stock and intercompany claims arising from the parent's downstreaming of bond proceeds to the subsidiaries. Insolvency proceedings for the parent would likely result in liquidation and forcing the non-U.S. subsidiaries into their own insolvency proceedings, resulting in substantial loss of value to the debtors, because the affiliates operate as an integrated, global enterprise, and would also default the debtor in possession loan. The debtors in possession sought to enjoin guarantee enforcement about 30 days after the petition date. The court has jurisdiction over proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11. The proceeding arises under title 11 because the debtors seek the injunction under section 105(a) and arises in the case because it addresses the debtors' ability to reorganize and their estates' value. The court may issue the injunction if there is a likelihood of reorganization, there is a threat of imminent harm to the estate, the balance of harms tips in favor of the moving party and the public interest weighs in favor of an injunction. Likelihood of success requires only a reasonable likelihood and does not require a showing of likely payment of unsecured claims in full. Irreparable harm includes burdening, delaying or impeding the reorganization case, and the court may enjoin where necessary to preserve or protect the estate or reorganization prospects. The movant need not show an actual threat where the harm would be grievous. The devastating damage to reorganization prospects from insolvency proceedings to the non-U.S. affiliates suffices. The balance of harms tips in favor of the estates because of the likely inability of the guaranteed creditors to collect anything on their guarantees even if the court did not issue the injunction. Finally, there is a public interest in generally protecting guarantee enforceability, but it is not without exception. Imposing the injunction for only a short period to allow the parent to obtain its own direct protection, either by insolvency proceedings or an out-of-court workout, does not contravene the public interest in protecting guarantees in general. Therefore, the court enjoins enforcement for 60 days, subject to certain limitations and protections unique to particular creditors. Lyondell Chemical Co. v. Centerpoint Energy Gas Servs. Inc. (In re Lyondell Chem. Co.), 402 B.R. 571 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

5.1.qqq Court approves non-competition payments to former insiders. Shortly after the debtor filed its chapter 11 case, it accepted the resignations of its CEO and COO. It also agreed to enter into consulting agreements with them for four months and three months, respectively, at their prior salaries. The debtor in possession did not expect them to perform any consulting services. Rather, the agreements were designed to prevent the former officers from stealing the debtor's customers, which the former officers were legally and practicably able to do. The debtor in possession sought court approval of the agreements. Section 503(c)(1) restricts payments "for the purpose of inducing such person to remain with the debtor's business". These payments do not qualify, as they are intended only to prevent the former officers from competing. Section 503(c)(2) restricts severance payments. These payments are not severance payments, as the former officers had already received severance, although the court must be vigilant to ensure that severance payments are not disguised in non-compete payments. Section 503(c)(3) requires the court to determine that transfers or obligations outside the ordinary course of business are "justified by the facts and circumstances of the case". The provision is unclear on whether it applies only to transfers to insiders, but this case does not present that issue. It requires the court to do more than evaluate whether the debtor in possession articulates a good business reason, as under section 363(b). The court must determine on its own that the transaction is justified, especially where the transaction is with an insider or former insider. These agreements meet the test, because of the substantial risk that the former officers could lure away the debtors in possession's customers, which would damage the debtor's business substantially. In re Pilgrim's Pride Corp., 401 B.R. 229 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2009).

5.1.rrr Court avoids constitutional issue of involuntary servitude in an individual chapter 11 case in which a trustee is serving. An individual filed a chapter 11 case. The court appointed a trustee. The debtor filed a plan, which drew numerous objections. The debtor then moved to convert the case to chapter 7 under section 1112. Section 1112 gives a chapter 11 debtor the absolute right to convert a case to chapter 7 if the debtor remains in possession. If a trustee has been appointed, the court may convert only if conversion is in the best interest of creditors. Section 1115, added by the 2005 Amendments, makes an individual debtor's postpetition earnings property of the estate. Therefore, conversion is not in the interests of creditors, who would benefit from the debtor's postpetition earnings during the five-year life of the plan if the case is not converted. The Thirteenth Amendment prohibits involuntary servitude, which includes requiring an individual to work for his creditors. Chapter 13, which has an analogous provision to section 1115, provides escape valves for a debtor that does not wish to continue devoting future income to his creditors. Once a chapter 11 trustee has been appointed, chapter 11 has no similar escape valve. To avoid the constitutional question of whether chapter 11 might thus impose involuntary servitude, the court terminates the trustee's appointment under section 1105, permitting the debtor to exercise the right to convert the case to chapter 7. In re Clemente, 2009 Bankr. LEXIS 1460 (Bankr. D.N.J. June 9, 2009).

- 5.1.sss A corporation with publicly traded securities need not disclose bankruptcy planning. The debtor had substantial debt. It had made clear disclosure to the market of its precarious financial condition, and several analysts predicted that it might file bankruptcy. It began bankruptcy planning in connection with a sale of major assets but also considered other alternatives to resolve its financial problems. While in sale negotiations and while planning and preparing a bankruptcy filing, the debtor issued press releases on separate topics reporting various material events in the operation of its business, which were true in and of themselves and were generally positive. After it reached agreement with the asset buyer, its board authorized the debtor to file bankruptcy, which it did the next day. Its stock price dropped significantly. Stockholders brought a class action against the CEO for securities fraud, alleging that the public statements were misleading in the absence of disclosure that the debtor was also preparing a bankruptcy filing. Liability for nondisclosure attaches only if public statements were misleading without the additional disclosure. Because of the public information and analysis about the debtor's distressed financial condition, the nondisclosure of actual bankruptcy planning was not misleading. What's more, a requirement that a company undergoing bankruptcy planning disclose that fact would put an unacceptable burden on a company and its officers, likely result in a self-fulfilling prophecy and pose challenges in determining when in the planning process disclosure would be required. Therefore, the public statements were not misleading by reason of the absence of bankruptcy planning disclosure. Belenson v. Schwartz, case no. 03-CV-6051 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 24, 2009).
- 5.1.ttt Court may order transfer to court registry of chapter 11 plan unclaimed funds. Section 347(a) permits unclaimed funds in a chapter 7, 12 or 13 case to be paid into the court's registry, but section 347(b) requires that unclaimed funds under a chapter 11 plan be paid to the debtor or to the entity acquiring the debtor's assets under the plan. The chapter 11 plan for a Ponzi scheme debtor provided for a liquidating trust to acquire the debtor's assets and for the debtor to dissolve. At the end of the trust's administration, shortly before the trust was to be terminated, some assets remained unclaimed, despite the trustee's best efforts to find the claimants. The court permits deposit into the court registry in the absence of any alternative. In re Premiere Holdings of Texas LP, 393 B.R. 156 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2008).
- 5.1.uuu Timber company is not a single asset real estate debtor. The single purpose debtor owns timberland, on which it plans timber planting, grows and maintains timber, builds and maintains roads, supervises the harvest of timber (although it does not conduct the harvest itself), sells the timber and then prepares and replants the timber sites. It ensures compliance with extensive environmental regulations by preparing and submitting permit applications and performing watershed analysis and maintenance, vegetation management and streambed remediation. It employs 60 people. Under the Code, "single asset real estate" is real estate on which "no substantial business is being conducted ... other than the business of operating the real property and activities incidental thereto". The definition refers to investment property, such as undeveloped land, an apartment complex or a commercial building, where the business activity is passive collection of income such as rents, with little or no effort or involvement other than by the principals, rather than to a business that requires multiple, varied entrepreneurial efforts of the principals and employees, such as a marina, golf course or hotel. The timberland here is not single asset real estate. Ad Hoc Group of Timber Noteholders v. The Pac. Lumber Co. (In re Scotia Pac. Co., LLC), 508 F.3d 214 (5th Cir. 2007).

5.1.vvv Court declines to appoint patient ombudsman for hospital. The chapter 9 debtor operates three hospitals and a skilled nursing facility, with a combined total of 632 beds. The court finds that the appointment of an ombudsman is not necessary for the protection of patients, based on an analysis of the nine applicable factors. The cause of bankruptcy was problems under the debtor's bonds, not patient care. The debtor is subject to extensive oversight and regulation by a national accrediting organization and two state public health departments. The debtor's past history of patient care is excellent, and the debtor has adopted redundant internal procedures to insure quality care. The patients are able to protect their rights through internal hospital procedures, the state health department, the accreditation agency, and other private agencies. An ombudsman might result in substantial administrative expense, because the statutory duties are extensive for a debtor of this size. Cutting the other way, the patients are highly dependent on the debtor, and the potential injury to them upon curtailment or material reduction in quality of service would be substantial. These factors, however, do not overcome the others. The court also rejects the US Trustee's argument that bankruptcy puts patients at greater quality of care risks and that a hospital in bankruptcy has an inherent conflict with its patients and therefore requires independent bankruptcy-centered supervision. In re Valley Health Sys., 381 B.R. 756 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2008).

5.1.www Court denies trustee appointment even though new management was selected by prior tainted management. The debtors' principal caused the debtors to loan substantial sums to his other companies, which did not have the cash to repay the loans when the debtors needed it. Various government agencies were conducting criminal investigations of the principal. The debtors filed bankruptcy because of the resulting illiquidity. The principal irrevocably transferred management to a chief restructuring officer and gave him authority to designate a new managing member of the debtors. The principal confirmed the new managing member when designated after bankruptcy. An active creditors committee negotiated a plan with the debtors. However, because of the principal's possibly criminal conduct, the U.S. Trustee moved for the appointment of a trustee, citing section 1104(e)'s requirement that she do so if there are reasonable grounds to suspect current management of fraud or criminal conduct. Section 1104(e) does not modify section 1104(a)'s appointment standards, but the U.S. Trustee acts prudently when moving for a trustee in such circumstances where the tainted management selected the current untainted management, and a court should apply heightened scrutiny where the U.S. Trustee has established a prima facie case of such a selection. The burden then shifts to the debtor in possession to show that the new management is unconflicted by any association with prior tainted management. Here, the management authority transfer was regular and court approved, and the tainted principal irrevocably waived further control. Therefore, the court does not find "cause" for appointment under section 1104(a)(1). The court also does not find "best interest" for appointment under section 1104(a)(2). Though several unsecured creditors distrusted the debtors, even with new management, an active creditors committee has made substantial progress with the debtors in resolving the case. It would not be in the best interest of the estate to displace the process with a trustee. In re 1031 Tax Group, Inc., 374 B.R. 78 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

5.1.xxx Secured creditor's blanket lien extends to assets generated postpetition. The debtor operated a service business that used substantial equipment but little inventory. The creditor had a blanket security interest in all the debtor's assets, including inventory and accounts receivable. The Ninth Circuit construes "proceeds" broadly. If the creditor can trace postpetition assets, including accounts receivable, to proceeds of its petition date collateral, then its security interest attaches to the postpetition assets. Here, only the secured creditor's collateral was spent to generate new accounts receivable and cash. Therefore, all postpetition assets are proceeds of the secured creditor's petition date collateral and remain subject to the creditor's security interest. Similarly, the secured creditor's security interest reaches the collateral's increase in value. The increase derives from the entire collateral package, much as rents derive from underlying real property collateral, and section 552(b) provides for parallel treatment of proceeds and rents. Burlingame Cap. P'ners II., L.P. v. Qmect, Inc. (In re Qmect, Inc.), 373 B.R. 682 (N.D. Cal. 2007).

5.1.yyy Adequate protection payments protect only against collateral's value diminution. The creditor had a blanket security interest in all the debtor's assets, including inventory and accounts receivable. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession made adequate protection payments to an escrow account for the secured creditor's benefit. Permitting the secured creditor to recover the adequate protection payments without showing diminution of the value of the creditor's collateral would impermissibly compensate the creditor for delay rather than loss of value. Burlingame Cap. P'ners II., L.P. v. Qmect, Inc. (In re Qmect, Inc.), 373 B.R. 682 (N.D. Cal. 2007).

5.1.zzz Court may enjoin service termination by utility that does not respond to DIP's section 366 proposal. The debtor in possession filed with the petition and gave its utilities notice of a motion for an order establishing adequate assurance for utilities and enjoining service termination. Several utilities did not respond within the 30-day period of section 366(c) during which the statutory injunction against termination remains in effect. Expressly disagreeing with In re Lucre, Inc., 333 B.R. 151 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2005), the court determines that the failure to respond constitutes acquiescence that the DIP's proposal provides adequate assurance. Because Congress enacted section 366(c) to protect against service termination, a construction of the statute to allow utility silence to authorize termination would be unreasonable and would prohibit a court from enjoining termination after the utility has had an opportunity to demand adequate assurance. Under the motion's terms, the utility may still request modification of the adequate assurance after the 30-day period. In re Syroco, Inc., 374 B.R. 60 (Bankr. D.P.R. 2007).

5.1.aaaa Investor may condition plan funding on pension plan termination. The debtor searched extensively for an investor to fund a reorganization plan. It found only one, who was willing to fund only if the debtor terminated its three PBGC-insured defined benefit pension plans. Without the investment, the debtor would have had to liquidate, which would have resulted in plan termination. ERISA authorizes plan termination in bankruptcy of a defined benefit plan if the employer is unable to pay its debts unless the plan is terminated. The court does not reach the issue of whether the bankruptcy court must review the three plans on a plan-by-plan or aggregate basis (that is, whether termination of fewer than all plans will enable the employer to pay its debts), because without the investment, the debtor would liquidate and not be able to pay any debts. Because the debtor required the investment to reorganize and the investor required plan termination as a condition to the investment, the debtor met the ERISA termination standard for all plans. This does not allow the investor to usurp the bankruptcy court's role in determining ability to pay, because the investor is not obligated to fund unless its conditions are met. The judge must still determine whether the financial test is met without the investment. Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. v. Falcon Prods., Inc. (In re Falcon Prods., Inc.), 497 F.3d 838 (8th Cir. 2007).

5.1.bbbb Court declines to appoint patient ombudsman for juvenile psychiatric care facility. The state licensed debtor provides child placement and residential caring and psychiatric services to disturbed children. The vast majority of its patients are referred from other child care agencies, but its website provides a "placement availability" link, and a very small number of its patients are brought in directly by parents. Its financial troubles resulted from an uninsured fire loss at its most profitable location. The debtor is a "healthcare business", because its services are generally available to the public, are for the diagnosis and treatment of "injury, deformity, or disease", and include drug treatment and psychiatric care. However, the court declines to appoint a patient ombudsman, because the bankruptcy's cause is not related to patient care, the state licensing and supervisory authorities adequately regulate and supervise the debtor's activities, the debtor has an excellent patient care history (3 complaints in 20 years' operation), there are adequate internal safeguards, such as medical and professional supervision, to protect patients, and the debtor could not bear an ombudsman's cost. The factors suggesting appointment—the patients' general inability to protect their own rights, their high dependency on the facility, and the potential patient injuries if the debtor drastically reduced care levels—do not outweigh the other factors, because many child patients have guardians ad litem to protect their interests, and the debtor and the patients share an interest in rescuing the facility. In re Alternate Family Care, 377 B.R. 754 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007).

5.1.cccc Receiver may become the debtor in possession. The debtor ran a Ponzi scheme. Its principals were indicted, convicted and jailed. The United States obtained forfeiture orders that resulted in seizure of all the debtor's assets other than litigation claims. Some unpaid creditors brought an action in federal district court against the debtor and sought the appointment of a receiver under section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and under state law. The district court appointed an individual to act as receiver and vested him "with the sole and exclusive power and authority to manage and direct the business and financial affairs of the [debtor], including without limitation, the authority to petition for protection under the Bankruptcy Code". The receiver filed a chapter 11 petition for the debtor. The U.S. trustee moved for the appointment of a trustee, arguing that the receiver was a "custodian" that must turn over property under section 543 and was therefore disqualified from acting as the debtor in possession's management. The court rejects the argument, because the receiver was given all corporate governance power and authority and therefore functioned as management of the corporate debtor in possession. His receiver role was not exclusive; the district court could combine the receivership and corporate governance roles in the same individual so that he could serve as debtor in possession after a chapter 11 filing. The court recognizes this result—the ability of creditors to select a receiver/corporate manager in a receivership action, vest him with governance powers, including the authority to file a chapter 11 petition, and leave him in position as debtor in possession—as a loophole in the Bankruptcy Code's scheme that only the U.S. trustee select a trustee, but concludes that the circumstances in which it might occur would be rare and that the solution lies with Congress. Adams v. Marwil (In re Bayou Group L.L.C.), 363 B.R. 674 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

5.1.dddd Court may approve a postpetition financing retroactively in special circumstances. During his chapter 11 case, the debtor quitclaimed his interest in his residence to his wife, who refinanced the mortgage and reconveyed the property to herself and to the debtor as joint tenants, as title had previously been held. The property's title report, which the lender saw, noted the debtor's bankruptcy, but the lender overlooked it. The debtor used the proceeds to pay off a higher-priced, above-market mortgage, to pay refinancing expenses, and to fund his chapter 11 plan. Afterwards, the debtor in possession sought retroactive approval of the postpetition borrowing. The court may approve the borrowing retroactively, as it may approve employment of a professional retroactively, if the financing benefits the estate, the creditor adequately explains its failure to obtain prior approval, the borrowing fully complies with section 364, and the circumstances "present one of those rare situations in which retroactive authorization is appropriate". Here, the borrowing benefited the estate by lowering the debtor's monthly expenses and providing plan funding, the loan complied with section 364, the lender's failure to note the pending bankruptcy was an oversight made in good faith, and for all those reasons, presents "one of those rare situations in which retroactive approval is appropriate". Sherman v. Harbin (In re Harbin), 486 F.3d 510 (9th Cir. 2007).

5.1.eeee First Circuit B.A.P. questions validity of a carve-out. At the beginning of the chapter 11 case, all three secured creditors expressly consented to a carve-out for certain professionals' fees. After all of the estate's assets were sold, the case was converted to chapter 7. There were insufficient unencumbered assets to pay all administrative expenses and insufficient assets to pay the claim of one of the secured creditors. The professionals therefore sought allowance and payment of fees from the carve-out. The unpaid secured creditor was judicially estopped from objecting to the allowance and payment of the fees from the carve-out, because his objection was inconsistent with his earlier position in court consenting to the carve-out, that earlier position prevailed, and allowing him to assert the inconsistent position now would impose an unfair detriment on those who relied on his earlier consent. In reaching this conclusion, however, the First Circuit B.A.P. expresses grave reservations about the propriety of a carve-out, especially in a case such as this, where the carve-out did not reduce the secured creditors' recoveries, the carve-out beneficiaries were only some of the professionals and other administrative claimants, and there were unpaid administrative claims. Costa v. Robotic Vision Sys., Inc. (In re Robotic Vision Sys., Inc.), 367 B.R. 232 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

5.1.ffff Section 503(c) limits only administrative claims. The debtor in possession had proposed an executive compensation plan that violated section 503(c)(1), because it did not provide sufficient performance incentives and provided compensation based primarily on retention rather than performance. The DIP proposed a revised plan, which provided executives salary, annual incentive pay, long term incentive pay, and assumption of unfunded pension obligations. The DIP assumed the pension obligations, however, only if the DIP did not terminate the union pension plans, and the pension benefits were payable only after plan consummation. If an executive were terminated without cause before plan consummation, the executive would have a general unsecured prepetition claim for a portion of the unpaid pension amount. Section 503(c) governs only administrative claims, so it does not limit the allowance as a general unsecured claim of the pension obligations. The plan's other provisions may have a retentive effect, but they primarily incentivize performance, so section 503(c)(1) does not apply. Turning instead to section 363(b)'s standards, the court itself, rather than deferring to the DIP's business judgment, reviews the balance of the plan holistically. It determines that, subject only to imposition of a total annual compensation limit so that the combination of annual salary, annual incentive payments, and long-term incentive payments does not become unreasonable, the plan provides reasonable compensation for the executives and is appropriately designed to further the reorganization's goals. In re Dana Corp., 358 B.R. 567 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

5.1.gggg Section 503(c) does not restrict an annual incentive bonus program that is in the ordinary course of business. The debtor in possession adopted an annual incentive plan for six levels of employees, from senior executives through junior non-officer managers, which provided bonuses based on the DIP's financial performance for the year. It did not obtain prior court approval but committed to the court that if it made any changes to the plan, it would seek approval. The DIP failed to meet the financial targets in the incentive plan. The DIP then modified the plan to provide reduced bonuses to the employees and sought court approval of the modification. In prior years, the debtor had regularly adopted annual incentive plans, which provided bonuses based on financial performance, and regularly modified them after year-end to provide reduced bonuses in those years when the debtor's business did not meet financial targets. Section 503(c)(3) restricts "transfer or obligations that are outside the ordinary course of business ... [to, or] for the benefit of, officers, managers, or consultants." This plan was in the ordinary course of business, because it meets both the horizontal and vertical tests. A compensation expert testified that other companies of comparable size in the same industry routinely adopted programs similar to this plan. The debtor had also done so in prior years, so plan adoption and modification was consistent with creditor expectations. Therefore, section 503(c)(3) does not restrict its adoption. By contrast, section 503(c)(1) prohibits allowance and payment of claims to an insider (director or officer) "for the purpose of inducing such person to remain with the debtor's business," whether within or outside the ordinary course of the debtor's business. All payments to employees, even ordinary course, have some retentive purpose and effect. Therefore, section 503(c)(1) must be read to apply only to plans whose primary purpose is retention rather than incentivizing performance. Because this plan's primary purpose was motivating employees during the chapter 11 case, this plan does not violate section 503(c)(1). In re Nellson Nutraceutical, Inc., 369 B.R. 787 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007).

- 5.1.hhhh Home development project is “single asset real estate.” The home construction debtor had multiple subsidiaries, each of which owned a single parcel of real estate which was held for development of homes for sale to the public. The development work includes acquiring the land, planning the site, obtaining site plan approvals from local government, constructing infrastructure such as roads, sewers, and utilities, constructing the homes, and running the sales operation. Section 101(51B) defines “single asset real estate” as “real property constituting a single property or project ... which generates substantially all of the gross income of a debtor ...and on which no substantial business is being conducted by a debtor other than the business of operating the real property and activities incidental thereto.” The development activities in which the debtor engages are incidental to the property operation, unlike the activities of a hotel's or golf club's providing catering, meeting, or other services to guests. The development activities all relate to the sale of the lots and houses, which is the debtor's sole business. Therefore, the real estate is “single asset real estate.” The court does not address the issue of whether development constitutes operation rather than a separate business activity. Kara Homes Inc. v. Nat'l City Bank (In re Kara Homes), 363 B.R. 399 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2007).
- 5.1.iii Undersecured creditor may make KERP payments. The debtor and its principal secured creditor agreed before bankruptcy on a sale of the business assets. Prompted by a senior executive exodus at the time, the creditor signed agreements with the remaining senior executives to pay them each a bonus if there were a sale that resulted in cash proceeds to the creditor and the executive remained employed in good standing at the time of the sale. After the sale closed, the creditor paid the bonuses from its proceeds. Because the creditor was undersecured and paid the bonuses from its own funds, section 503(c) does not apply. The bonuses were not allowed as claims against the estate and were not paid from property of the estate. The executives did not breach their fiduciary duties to the estate by contracting with and accepting payment from the secured creditor, because the agreements themselves required the executives to carry out their fiduciary duties to the estate. Therefore, the court denies the committee's motion for a turnover of the bonuses. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Airway Indus., Inc. (In re Airway Indus., Inc.), 354 B.R. 82 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2006).
- 5.1.jjjj Distress pension termination should be based on aggregate effect on the reorganization of all plans. The debtor was subject to several collective bargaining agreements, each of which provided for a defined benefit pension plan. The debtor sought rejection of the agreements and termination of the plan under the reorganization distress termination provisions of ERISA, section 1341(c)(2)(B)(ii)(IV), which requires that the bankruptcy court determine that termination is necessary to permit reorganization. In making this determination, the bankruptcy court may consider the collective effect on the reorganization of all plans and need not evaluate them on a plan-by-plan basis. ERISA gives no indication that the evaluation should be made plan-by-plan, as it gives no guidance on the order in which multiple plans should be evaluated. In addition, section 1113 permits rejection of collective bargaining agreements only if “all of the affected parties are treated fairly and equitably.” A court could not conduct such a balancing if each plan had to be evaluated separately. The court follows the Third Circuit's decision on the same issue. In re Kaiser Alum. Corp., 456 F.3d 328 (3d Cir. 2006). Pension Ben. Guar. Corp. v. Falcon Prods., Inc. (In re Falcon Prods., Inc.), 354 B.R. 889 (E.D. Mo. 2006).
- 5.1.kkkk Court unseals tort settlements. After confirmation, the plan authorized the reorganized debtor to settle tort claims of over $250,000 arising from the operation of its long-term care hospital only with court approval. The court granted the reorganized debtor's motion to seal the records of the settlements; the local newspaper moved to unseal the records. The newspaper did not meet the First Amendment's two-part requirement for unsealing court records, because even though bankruptcy proceedings have historically been open to the press and the general public, the settlement amounts would not inform the public about issues relating to the debtor's care or neglect of residents or governmental regulation and therefore would not "play a significant positive role in the functioning of the particular process in question." However, section 107, which supersedes any common law right of access, requires the court to unseal the records. Section 107(b)(1) permits sealing of confidential commercial information, which includes only information that relates to the debtor's (or reorganized debtor's) commercial operations or that would unfairly advantage competitors. Settlement amount information does not, at least in this case, qualify. In re Alterra Healthcare Corp., 353 B.R. 66 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).

5.1.iii Cable television is not a utility. The individual debtor's cable television provider terminated service when the debtor filed bankruptcy and did not pay prepetition amounts owing. Section 366 does not prohibit it from doing so, as a cable television provider is not a "utility." Section 366 covers only those entities that have a special relationship to the debtor, which includes providing a service that is a necessity for minimum standards of living. The inability to obtain comparable service elsewhere easily does not loosen the requirement that the service must be a necessity. Darby v. Time Warner Cable, Inc. (In re Darby), 470 F.3d 573 (5th Cir. 2006).

5.1.mmm Undisclosed insider purchase of estate property constitutes breach of fiduciary duty. The single asset real estate chapter 11 debtor's principals consented to stay relief to permit the lender to foreclose and formed a new entity, which bid at the foreclosure sale. When a creditor moved for reconsideration of the stay relief order, alleging that there was equity in the property and that the bidder was comprised of insiders, the debtor denied any affiliation between the new entity and the debtor's principals, and the court denied reconsideration. After the case was converted to chapter 7, the trustee sued the principals and the new entity for damages for breach of fiduciary duty. The action was therefore not a collateral attack on the stay relief order. By acting in their own self-interest in stipulating to stay relief and secretly buying the real estate and by misrepresenting the facts to the court, the principals breached their fiduciary duty to the estate. The court does not adopt a per se rule against a fiduciary buying from the estate but requires full disclosure, arm's-length, good faith negotiations, and inherent fairness. The remedy for the breach is imposition of a constructive trust in favor of the estate on the property and all its net cash flow while the insiders owned it. Lange v. Schropp (In re Brook Valley IV, J.V.), 347 B.R. 662 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

5.1.nnn Fostering plan confirmation merits substantial contribution award. A major bondholder persuaded its affiliate to offer debtor in possession financing as an alternative to the financing previously proposed and persuaded the indenture trustee for the bonds to withdraw a confirmation objection, which would have slowed or prevented confirmation. The availability of alternative financing gave the debtor in possession negotiating leverage, and the withdrawal of the objection facilitated confirmation. A court may award fees for a substantial contribution if the efforts conferred a demonstrable benefit on the estate, fostered and enhanced the reorganization, and would have been undertaken even without expectation of reimbursement. The efforts here met those requirements. In re FF Holdings Corp., 343 B.R. 84 (D. Del. 2006).

5.1.oooo Court disallows executive compensation plan. The debtor in possession proposed a bonus plan for its senior executives, who were officers and therefore clearly insiders. The plan promised a portion of the compensation based on financial performance. The balance, termed a "Completion Bonus," was payable if the executive was still employed at the conclusion of the case and was based on the debtor's total enterprise value at the effective date. A substantial portion was payable even if the total enterprise value declined during the case. The plan also included a severance package, which was linked to a non-compete agreement. Section 503(c) applies to this package. A substantial portion of the compensation is a “Pay to Stay” plan rather than a “Produce Value for Pay” plan. As such, it does not meet the standards of section 503(c). Similarly, the proposed severance arrangement by its nature primarily compensates the executive for severance, not for the non-compete agreement. The court therefore does not approve the plan. In re Dana Corp., 351 B.R. 96 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

5.1.pppp Chapter 11 trustee appointment does not require “clear and convincing” evidence.

The debtor failed to file a list of creditors with the petition; its principal did not appear at the 341 meeting, citing Fifth Amendment privilege. The US Trustee moved for the appointment of a trustee. Acknowledging a departure from the majority of other courts that have ruled on the question, the court determines that the US Trustee needs to satisfy the “fraud, dishonesty, or gross mismanagement” or the “best interest” grounds under section 1104(a) for appointment of a trustee only by a preponderance of the evidence. Other appellate courts that have imposed a “clear and convincing” standard have nevertheless reviewed the bankruptcy court’s decision only for abuse of discretion, undercutting the imposition of a higher standard. In addition, the statute does not indicate a higher standard, even for a fraud allegation, and the Supreme Court’s decision in Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279 (1991), which applied a preponderance standard to nondischargeability based on fraud, suggests that the Bankruptcy Code does not generally require a higher burden of proof for matters requiring a showing of fraud, even where the matter affects a core bankruptcy principle such as the fresh start. Tradex Corp. v. Morse, 339 B.R. 823 (D. Mass. 2006).

5.1.qqqq Section 1112(b) dismissal does not require presence of all causes for dismissal.

Section 1112(b), as amended by BAPCPA, requires the court to dismiss a chapter 11 case for cause. Section 1112(b)(4) provides, “‘cause’ includes (A) substantial and continuing loss ... ; and (P) failure of the debtor ...” (emphasis added). A literal reading of “and,” so that cause exists only when all 14 elements are present, would lead to absurd results. It would render section 1112(b) a nullity, because it would be nearly impossible for all 14 elements to exist in the same case, and they could never exist in a non-individual’s case, because one of the elements relates to payment of domestic support obligations. Therefore, “and” in this section should be read in the disjunctive, as “or,” and the presence of any element may constitute cause for dismissal. In re TCR of Denver, LLC, 338 B.R. 494 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2006).

5.1.rrrr Multiple debtor case does not require separate representation of each estate.

Counsel for the debtors in possession represented all related estates in a multiple debtor chapter 11 case. Counsel had agreed to refrain from any litigation of the multiple, complex, and substantial intercompany claims but to continue to advise all of the debtors in possession about the claims and to attempt consensual resolution. Counsel had not acted adversely to any of the estates. In fact, the debtors in possession on several occasions had agreed to allow a committee to prosecute intercompany claims, when the debtors in possession were conflicted. Nevertheless, the committee for one of the debtors sought to disqualify counsel from any role in any of the intercompany claims. Section 327(a), which requires disinterestedness, does not require any such per se ban on multiple representations, but permits the court to review the particular facts and circumstances to decide whether the potential conflict requires disqualification under that section. A per se rule “would burden estates with unjustified and insurmountable costs.” Therefore, counsel would not be disqualified here. Still, the court requires counsel to maintain neutrality with respect to any intercompany disputes. Similarly, these facts do not require the appointment of an independent chapter 11 trustee for each estate. In re Adelpia Commc’ns Corp., 342 B.R. 122 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), aff’d 336 B.R. 610 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

5.1.ssss SEC has standing as a creditor based on its role as an enforcer of the securities laws.

In an SEC receivership action against the debtor’s client, the court ordered the debtor to repay excess amounts it had received before the receivership. The order did not specify to whom the debtor should pay the amounts, but the funds would likely have gone to the receiver. Before he paid the amounts, the debtor filed bankruptcy. Although the SEC did not have a direct claim against the debtor for the funds, the SEC had standing as a creditor to pursue dismissal of the case. Relying on Nathanson v. NLRB, 344 U.S. 25 (1952), a case in which the Supreme Court recognized the NLRB's standing as a creditor on behalf of employees entitled to back pay, the court concludes that the SEC's role as enforcer of the securities laws grants it standing as a creditor even if it is not entitled to receive payment of the debtor's debt on which the SEC bases its claim. Sherman v. SEC (In re Sherman), 441 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2006).

5.1.tttt Nunc pro tunc substantive consolidation is improper to reverse prior bankruptcy court orders. The creditor sued a corporation and its shareholder, who had guaranteed each others' loans. Shortly after, the corporation filed bankruptcy. The creditor sought limited relief from the stay to pursue the litigation, which the trustee did not oppose and the court granted. The creditor and the shareholder soon settled the litigation, by the shareholder consenting to judgment and granting the creditor a lien. The shareholder later filed bankruptcy. The trustee sought substantive consolidation of the shareholder and the corporation nunc pro tunc to the date of the corporation's petition, which would have effectively unwound the settlement, the judgment, and the lien. Such an order is improper to undo the bankruptcy court's prior authorization to the creditor to prosecute the collection litigation against the shareholder. The court notes that nunc pro tunc consolidation would effectively consolidate the debtor corporation with the shareholder, who, as of the effective date of consolidation, was a non-debtor, questions (but does not decide) whether consolidation between a debtor and a non-debtor is proper, and cautions that it should be ordered only in special circumstances. The court does not adopt a test for consolidation, other than to note that it should be used sparingly, but it quotes extensively from In re Owens Corning, 419 F.3d 195 (3d Cir. 2005). Finally, it does not address the creditor's argument that Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S.A. v. Alliance Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308 (1999), eliminated a bankruptcy court's authority to consolidate. Wells Fargo Bank of Tex. N.A. v. Sommers (In re AMCO Ins.), 444 F.3d 690 (5th Cir. 2006).

5.1.uuuu Court limits committee's duty to share information with constituents. Section 1102(c) requires that a chapter 11 committee "provide access to information" to its constituents. The unsecured creditors' committee here sought an order limiting the information to which it must provide access. Section 1102(c) is similar to section 704(7), which requires a trustee to "furnish such information concerning the estate and the estate's administration as is requested by a party in interest." Case law interpreting section 704(7) construes the trustee's duty broadly; the committee's duty under section 1102(c) is similarly broad. The duty is not, however, unlimited. A trustee may obtain a protective order against disclosing information that is subject to the attorney-client privilege or is otherwise confidential. The limitations are informed by the trustee's fiduciary duties to protect creditors and the estate. The committee plays a pivotal role in a chapter 11 case, which it can fulfill only by protecting information that should remain confidential. Preserving confidentiality protects the estate from harms that could result from release of the information, increases the debtor in possession's willingness to share information with the committee, and prevents violations of the securities laws. Therefore, the committee is not required to provide access to confidential information unless the requesting party agrees to appropriate confidentiality restrictions. If there is a dispute over what is confidential or the scope and terms of the restrictions, the court should resolve it on a case-by-case basis. In re Refco, Inc., 336 B.R. 187 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

5.1.vvvv Court denies motion to appoint a trustee to address intercompany claims resolution. The debtor in possession made serious efforts through the chapter 11 case to resolve difficult and complex intercompany claims. Finally, the debtor in possession moved to establish a procedure for various creditor groups to be able to litigate the intercompany claims, with the debtor in possession remaining on the sidelines. Parties in interest representing the different creditor estates supported the motion, and the court granted it. Late in the case, when the creditors' committee for one of the debtors apparently demanded amendments to the pending reorganization plan to improve its treatment and was rebuffed, the committee brought a motion for the appointment of a trustee or, in the alternative, for the appointment of an independent fiduciary to investigate and prosecute this debtor's intercompany claims and to require the debtor in possession's board and counsel to recuse themselves from any involvement in that process. The court denies the motion. The existence of intercompany claims, which the debtor in possession labored hard but unsuccessfully to resolve by negotiation among all creditor groups, does not create grounds for the appointment of a trustee. These facts do not rise to the level of a showing of cause for the appointment of a trustee, and appointment would not be in the interests of creditors or the estate because of the delay and expense it would generate. Section 105 suggests that the court does not have authority to appoint an independent fiduciary, and section 1107(a), allowing the court to prescribe limits on the debtor in possession's activities, does not provide a grant of such authority or trump section 105's limitations. However, the court grants the motion only to the extent that it requests that the debtor in possession's and counsel's current voluntary recusal from the intercompany claim issues be made mandatory. In the course of the opinion, the court describes in detail the methods used in other mega-cases to resolve intercompany claims. In re Adelpia Commc'ns Corp., 336 B.R. 610 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

5.1.wwww Chapter 11 creditor derivative standing requires prior approval. The debtor in possession's CEO resigned, began negotiations with one of the DIP's largest customers, formed a new company, and encouraged the DIP's suppliers to follow him. Major creditors asked the CRO to seek an injunction against the former CEO. The CRO instead orally authorized the creditors and the committee to bring the action. In response to the former CEO's challenge to the creditors' standing to bring the action, the bankruptcy court found that the creditors had standing because of their concern over the reorganization and they had an interest in the outcome. However, the CEO's actions harmed the estate, which therefore owned the claim against the CEO. The creditors may not assert it through derivative standing unless the bankruptcy court expressly authorizes standing in advance. Derivative standing is the exception to debtor in possession's central role as the estate's representative. Creditors' interests are often adverse to the estate and diverse among themselves, so creditors are not generally the appropriate parties to represent the estate. Prior authorization is a necessary check on creditors improperly hijacking the case or major issues in the case. Scott v. Nat. Century Fin. Enters., Inc., 432 F.3d 557 (4th Cir. 2005).

5.1.xxxx Creditors may not seek settlement approval under Rule 9019. The debtor in possession sued the purchaser of the estate's assets. The bankruptcy court encouraged settlement and stayed discovery. In the meantime, the creditors committee reached a settlement with the purchaser and moved for approval under Rule 9019. The debtor in possession opposed. The debtor in possession is the estate representative and controls any causes of action. Rule 9019 vests the right to settle solely in the trustee or debtor in possession. Derivative standing may be appropriate to permit creditors to pursue a claim that belongs to the estate that the debtor in possession refuses to pursue, often when the claim is against the debtor's principals. However, derivative standing to pursue a settlement requires a much stronger showing, because the debtor in possession's interests are more likely to be aligned with the estate's. No showing of derivative Rule 9019 standing was made here, because the court did not make any determination about the possible validity of the claims. Section 1109(b), which authorizes parties in interest to intervene in adversary proceedings, does not authorize them to take ownership of the estate's claims, which must remain under the estate representative's control. Finally, section 105(a) does not permit the court, independent of these other provisions, to authorize creditors to settle an estate's claim, because section 105(a) cannot be used to override specific Code provisions. The court emphasizes the centrality of the debtor in possession's control of the estate and has harsh words for the purchaser's efforts to exclude the debtor in possession from settlement discussions with creditors and even harsher words for the bankruptcy court's refusal to permit the debtor in possession to conduct discovery and to insist that the litigation be settled. Smart World Techs. LLC v. Juno Online Servs., Inc. (In re Smart World Techs. LLC), 423 F.3d 166 (2d Cir. 2005).

5.1.yyyy Settlement with PBGC over pension plan termination does not violate section 1113.

The debtor in possession sought a distress termination of its pension plan under ERISA section 1341(c). Because such a termination may not override a collective bargaining agreement, the debtor in possession also sought authority to reject the agreement under section 1113. Independently, the PBGC may terminate a plan under ERISA section 1342, to protect its own assets and liabilities, regardless of whether the termination violates a collective bargaining agreement. Here, the debtor in possession and the PBGC agreed on the amount of the PBGC's pension underfunding claim that would be allowed in the chapter 11 case and that the PBGC would evaluate whether to terminate the plan under section 1342. Upon court approval of the agreement, the debtor in possession withdrew its motion to terminate the plan under section 1341(c) and to reject the collective bargaining agreement. The PBGC later determined to terminate the plan. This process did not violate section 1113, because the debtor in possession did not unilaterally modify the collective bargaining agreement or violate any duty owed to the union. The debtor in possession did not cause the PBGC to terminate the plan; the PBGC made its own determination to do so. In re UAL Corp., 428 F.3d 677 (7th Cir. 2005).

5.1.zzzz Section 366(c) protects only utilities that provide end-user service to the estate, but gives them veto power over adequate assurance offer.

The debtor in possession sought an order under section 366(c), as amended by BAPCPA, prohibiting utilities from altering or terminating service. The bankruptcy court addresses issues under amended section 366. First, because section 366(c)(2) permits a utility to alter or terminate service if the debtor in possession does not offer adequate assurance "that is satisfactory to the utility," the court may not enjoin the utility based on the utility's failure to respond to the debtor in possession's adequate assurance offer. Section 366(c)(3) only permits the court to modify an initial assurance payment that is satisfactory to the utility, for example, based on changed circumstances or the utility's failure to negotiate in good faith, not to determine and fix it initially. Second, the court may order continuation of service during the 10-day gap period between the 20-day automatic protection period of subsection (b) and the 30-day period of subsection (c) based on the debtor in possession's proposal of adequate assurance, but the utility may terminate after 30 days if the assurance is not satisfactory to the utility. Third, subsection (c) applies only to "utility service," while subsections (a) and (b) apply to any service that a utility provides. Thus, the broader utility protection that subsection (c) provides applies only to traditional utility service to the debtor as an end-user, not to ancillary services and not to service for resale to the debtor's customers. In re Lucre, Inc., 333 B.R. 151 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2005).

5.1.aaaa Debtor may modify retiree benefits after confirmation but before effective date.

One of the conditions to the debtor's plan confirmation was modification of retiree benefits under section 1114. During the confirmation process, the condition was modified to require retiree benefit modification before the effective date. Section 1129(a)(13) requires that the plan provide for continuation of retiree benefits after the effective date at the level established before confirmation under section 1114(e)(1)(B) (agreed-to-modifications) or 1114(g) (court-ordered modifications). This requirement does not render section 1114 inapplicable after confirmation and before the effective date. The court may still order modifications after confirmation under section 1114(g). In re Ormet Corp., 324 B.R. 654 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2005).

5.1.bbbbb Substitution of retiree benefit representative requires motion.

The union negotiated stipulated with the debtor in possession for a modification of retiree benefits under section 1114. Its counsel sent a letter to retirees advising them that he could not represent them in opposing approval of the stipulation, because he negotiated the stipulation on behalf of the union and was adverse to the retirees. Another lawyer appeared for the retirees to oppose the stipulation. Section 1114(c)(1) provides that if a union serve as the representative, unless the union elects not to serve as the retirees' representative and "the court, upon a motion . . . , determines that different representation of such persons is appropriate." Because there was no such motion here, the attorney could not represent the retirees. Hourly Employees/Retirees v. Erie Forge & Steel Inc. (In re Erie Forge & Steel, Inc.), 418 F.3d 270 (3d Cir. 2005).

5.1.ccccc An examiner's report should not be sealed. Section 107(b)(2) permits the court to seal a document that contains scandalous or defamatory matter. The authority should be used sparingly because of the importance of public access to court papers, and the burden on the requesting party is high. Bankruptcy Rule 9018 does not expand the court's authority. Material that is scandalous or defamatory is "material that would cause a reasonable person to alter their [sic] opinion of [a party] based on the statement therein." True information cannot qualify as scandalous or defamatory. The fact that the report might embarrass some individuals or harm their reputations is not adequate grounds to seal the report, as long as the information is true or appropriately described as preliminary investigatory results. The report met those requirements here and should not be sealed. In re Gitto/Global Corp., 321 B.R. 367 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2005).

5.1.ddddd DIP financing agreement restriction on plan filing is permissible. Some but not all of the debtor's prepetition secured lenders provided debtor in possession financing, secured by a priming lien. The DIP financing agreement required the debtor to file a plan by a specified date that was acceptable to two-thirds in amount and a majority in number of the prepetition secured lenders. The court approves the requirement. It is not an improper lock-up agreement and is not an improper postpetition solicitation without a disclosure statement, because it does not commit the prepetition lenders to vote for a particular plan. It does not eliminate the ability of the debtor to cram down the prepetition lenders, because as written, it permits the DIP lenders only to stop funding the DIP loan if the debtor does not comply with the provision. It does not violate the "deemed acceptance" provision of section 1126(f) as applied to a class that is not impaired, for the same reason. Finally, it does not prevent the debtor in possession from carrying out its fiduciary duties. It does not require the debtor in possession to cede control over its operations, plan formulation, or general chapter 11 case management to the lenders. The court finds that the provision was intensely negotiated and critical to the DIP lenders' willingness to lend and should not be upset. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. New World Pasta Co., 322 B.R. 560 (M.D. Pa. 2005).

5.1.eeeee Trustee does not have standing to bring creditor's claims against third party. The debtor's management falsified the debtor's books and records and defrauded its auditor, who opined on the debtor's financial statements. A creditor was defrauded and asserted a claim against the auditor for fraud and negligence. The creditor assigned the claim to the liquidating trustee under the plan. The trustee, whom the court treats as having the same rights as a bankruptcy trustee, does not have standing to bring a creditor's action against a third party, even though the creditor expressly assigns the claim to the trustee. The trustee has standing to bring only those claims that the debtor could have brought before bankruptcy. The court does not address whether section 544(b) might apply to this action. Ernst & Young v. Bankruptcy Servs., Inc. (In re CBI Holding Co.), 318 B.R. 761 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).

5.1.fffff Trustee may pursue creditors' claims assigned under chapter 11 plan. The chapter 11 plan provided for the establishment of a creditors' trust and the assignment to the trustee of all claims of the grower creditors against former management for fraud. The trustee may pursue the claims, despite Caplin v. Marine Midland Grace Trust Co., 406 U.S. 416 (1972). Unlike Caplin, the assignment of the claims to the trustee made the claims property of the estate under section 541(a)(7) (after-acquired property), all of the growers' fraud claim were assigned, so there is no risk of inconsistent results with individual creditor law suits, and the recovery is for the benefit of the trust, not directly for the assigning creditors (as in Caplin). The court does not discuss whether the plan confirmation terminated the estate and vested the assets in the trust rather than the estate, nor whether a plan may properly appropriate the property of nonconsenting creditors (the growers' individual fraud claims) to the estate or trust. Schnelling v. Thomas (In re Agribiotech, Inc.), 319 B.R. 207 (D. Nev. 2004).

- 5.1.ggggg Interim trustee's appointment does not toll avoiding power statute of limitation. Under section 546(a), a trustee may bring an avoiding power claim only within two years after the order for relief or, in a case converted to chapter 7, within one year after the election or appointment of the first trustee under section 702, if the election or appointment occurs in the initial two-year period. Here, after conversion, the interim trustee was appointed under section 701 within two years after the order for relief, but he did not become the permanent trustee under section 702 until after the two-year period expired. His appointment therefore did not extend the statute of limitation. Singer v. Franklin Boxboard Co. (In re American Pad & Paper), 319 B.R. 791 (D. Del. 2005).
- 5.1.hhhhh Motion for appointment of a trustee requires clear and convincing evidence. The Third Circuit reaffirms that a party moving for the appointment of a trustee must meet its burden of proof by clear and convincing evidence. The court had previously stated that rule in a case in which it said that there is a strong presumption in favor of leaving the debtor in possession. Here, the court rules that the presumption should be construed as a restatement of the heavy burden of persuasion, not as an evidentiary presumption under F.R.E. 301 that affects the burden of going forward or the level of proof. Even the absence of factors that normally give rise to the presumption, which the moving party argued here, does not reduce the moving party's burden or proof, because the presumption in favor of a debtor in possession derives from the statute, not from the facts of a particular case. Official Comm. of Asbestos Claimants v. G-I Holdings, Inc., 385 F.3d 313 (3d. Cir. 2004).
- 5.1.iiiii Liquidating chapter 11 provides grounds for conversion to chapter 7. The debtor in possession had sold all its assets, paid the proceeds to the secured creditor, and had unencumbered funds remaining to pursue claims and to make a distribution to creditors. The United States trustee moved under section 1112(b)(2) to convert the case to chapter 7. The court granted the motion, concluding that there was continuing loss to or diminution of the estate and that there was no reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation, because the estate was incurring administrative expenses and, even though the debtor might confirm a plan, it would be a liquidating plan, not rehabilitation. In addition, the debtor and creditors were unable after several months of negotiations to agree on the terms of a plan, which would have involved pursuing the estate's claim and a contribution from the debtor's parent, which wanted to use the debtor's tax operating loss carryforwards. The bankruptcy court converted the case. The Eight Circuit affirmed, noting that the facts met the definition of "cause" in section 1112(b) and that the enumerated grounds in (b)(1) through (12) are not exclusive. To the argument that the ruling would require conversion in every liquidating chapter 11 case, the court replied that the clear weight of authority permits liquidating plans and that conversion under section 1112(b) was not mandatory. It remained in the bankruptcy court's discretion. Loop Corp. v. United States Trustee, 379 F.3d 511 (8th Cir. 2004).
- 5.1.jjjjj Court denies examiner appointment in public company case. The debtor is a public company with more than $5 million in unsecured debt. Disgruntled shareholders alleged that the debtors and the creditors' committee were improperly colluding to depress their valuation and sought an examiner to "investigate" the debtors' value at the estate's expense after the court had denied their requests for an equity committee to conduct a valuation, also at the estate's expense. The court denied the motion under section 1104(c)(1). It reasoned that "the basic job of an examiner is to examine, not to act as a protagonist," but that an examiner here "would, at best for the shareholders, advance only their interest in opposition to the Debtors' plan." The shareholders could pursue their own objection to plan confirmation, but are "not entitled to the appointment of an examiner ... to help it advance that objection." It also denied the motion under the mandatory provision of section 1104(c)(2). An examiner's purpose is "only to conduct an 'investigation'" as generally understood, and the requested assignment here was unrelated to an investigation. In re Loral Space & Communications Ltd., 313 B.R. 577 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2004).

5.1.kkkkk Court may not prevent disclosure of sealed document by removing document from the court's files. In support of a motion to appoint a trustee, the Committee filed, under a blanket sealing order, a report on the debtor's prepetition conduct prepared by the debtor's counsel. The report contained substantial information that was irrelevant to the trustee motion and that might have harmed innocent individuals, if disclosed. A news organization moved for an order unsealing the report. Because the report had not been admitted and contained extraneous material, the bankruptcy court ordered it returned to the Committee, to file in redacted form, if appropriate. The debtor in possession and the Committee then settled the trustee motion. The bankruptcy court denied the unsealing motion, because the report was no longer part of the court record. On appeal, the district court ordered the report restored to the record, under seal, and required the debtor in possession to justify why certain portions should be redacted or kept under seal, under the standards for sealing documents. The public's right to know the contents of judicial proceedings takes precedence over a blanket sealing order, and the court may not defeat that right by ordering a document removed from the court's files, even though the report was never admitted into evidence and might not have been properly filed in the first instance. The Copley Press, Inc. v. Peregrine Sys., Inc. (In re Peregrine Sys., Inc.), 311 B.R. 679 (D. Del. 2004).

5.1.lllll DIP financing carve out does not limit professional fees. Under the debtor in possession financing order, the court approved a carve out for professional fees, which was allocated in separate amounts to the debtor in possession's professionals and the committee's professionals. The committee's professionals incurred and requested compensation in excess of the carve out amount. The court has authority to allocate the total fees allowed under the carve out and approved the financing with that limitation. In addition, the court has authority to order disgorgement of fees paid to some professionals so as to equalize the distribution to all professionals in an insolvent administration. In re Channel Master Holdings, Inc., 309 B.R. 855 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004).

5.1.mmmmm Court reverses critical vendor order. On a first day motion, the bankruptcy court promptly authorized the debtor in possession to pay any vendor it deemed critical, in the exercise of the debtor in possession's unilateral discretion, as long as the vendor agreed to provide goods on customary trade terms in the future. The record did not contain evidence, and the bankruptcy court did not make findings, that the vendors would refuse to ship without payment, or that the estate would be better off paying some but not all prepetition claims before a plan. Section 105 did not provide an adequate basis for the court's order. The Bankruptcy Code's priority scheme contemplates equal treatment of unsecured prepetition claims. Neither section 105 nor a "doctrine of necessity" authorizes the court to depart from that priority scheme. Section 363(b) might provide a basis for authorizing the use of the estate's property to pay prepetition unsecured claims. It would require, however, specific findings that the vendors would have ceased doing business with the debtor in possession if the prepetition claims had not been paid and that all other creditors would have been better off, through the prospect of reorganization, by payment of the favored few. (The court does not resolve whether such payments would be in the ordinary course or business or not.) In re Kmart Corp., 359 F.3d 866 (7th Cir. 2004).

5.1.nnnnn DIP financing order authorizes creditors committee to bring avoiding power actions. In the debtor in possession financing order, the debtor in possession stipulated to the validity of the lender's claims and liens. However, the order and subsequent stipulations authorized the creditors committee to pursue investigations and to file an action to challenge the lender's claims and liens within a fixed deadline. That provision was adequate to authorize the action without a separate formal request to the debtor in possession to bring the action, denial of that request, and separate court authorization for the committee. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Clark (In re National Forge Co.), 304 B.R. 214 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2004).

5.1.00000 Chapter 11 creditors committee dissolves upon conversion to chapter 7. The debtor in possession had obtained an order approving a break-up fee as part of its sale procedures motion in advance of the sale of all of its assets. The chapter 11 creditors committee appealed. After the sale was consummated, the court converted the case to chapter 7, and a trustee was appointed. Counsel for the creditors committee assigned the committee's rights under the appeal to the trustee, and the trustee argued that he could substitute as a matter of right for the committee on the appeal. The district court rules that the committee ceased to exist upon the conversion, so the post-conversion assignment of the right to appeal was ineffectual. In addition, the trustee, as representative of the estate, is bound by the actions of the debtor in possession, as representative of the estate. Because the debtor in possession sought and obtained the order approving the break-up fee, the trustee could not appeal it. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Belgravia Paper Co. (In re Great Northern Paper, Inc.), 299 B.R. 1 (D. Me. 2003).

5.1.ppppp "Vicinity of insolvency" is measured by the balance sheet and by adequacy of capital. In an action to hold directors and officers liable for breach of fiduciary duty to creditors while the corporation was in the vicinity of insolvency, the plaintiff and defendant agreed that the balance sheet test (fair value of assets against liabilities) is one of the two tests to determine solvency. But they disagreed on whether the second test was inability to pay debts as they become due (focusing on current maturities in the ordinary course of business) or cash flow and capital adequacy (measured over a longer period of time). The court adopts the latter test, analogizing it to the "unreasonably small capital" test of the fraudulent transfer law. It rules that "a company will be considered inadequately capitalized if it does not have sufficient cash flow to 'account for difficulties that are likely to arise, including interest rate fluctuations and general economic downturns, and otherwise incorporate some margin for error.'" Pereira v. Cogan, 294 B.R. 449 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

5.1.qqqqq Debtor's president is liable to trustee for breach of fiduciary duty. Before bankruptcy, the debtor's president negotiated a sale of the corporation's assets without undertaking any substantial marketing effort. The buyer proposed an employment contract for the president. In addition, the president caused the corporation to delay filing for bankruptcy until the sale agreement was ready. During the delay, the debtor nearly ran out of cash. He also made payments to or for the benefit of insiders. His inadequate marketing efforts violated his duty of care. The delay in seeking bankruptcy protection was an additional breach of the duty of care. Finally, the president breached the duty of loyalty because of his personal interest in the employment contract arising out of the transaction. The court awards damages in the amount lost as a result of the delay in filing bankruptcy and the inadequate marketing and punitive damages of $1 million. Roth v. Mims, 298 B.R. 272 (N.D. Tex. 2003).

5.1.rrrrr Court limits critical vendor payments. In its decision in In re CoServ, 273 B.R. 487 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2002), Judge Lynn permitted payment of critical vendors only on a claim-by-claim showing that it was critical to the debtor to continue to deal with the creditor, failure to do so could risk harm to the estate disproportionate to the creditor's prepetition claim, and there was no alternative. Adapting the CoServ test to the demands of the Mirant Corp. chapter 11, the court permits payment of valid prepetition liens and payment of prepetition claims that the debtor, upon advice of counsel, believes meets the CoServ test. However, if an entity demands payment of a claim that does not meet the CoServ standards, then: (a) If the debtor pays the amount, the creditor must show cause why the claim should be paid under the CoServ standards. If it does not, but returns the payment and continues to deal with the debtor, it will not be in violation of the automatic stay. (b) If the creditor refuses postpetition goods or services to the debtor without meeting the CoServ standards, it may be held in violation of the automatic stay. In re Mirant Corp., 296 B.R. 427 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2003).

- 5.1.sssss Critical vendors order is reversed. The district court reverses the bankruptcy court's order authorizing payment of critical vendors, including foreign vendors and liquor suppliers. The court concludes that section 105 does not authorize the bankruptcy court to expand the provisions of the Code and that the critical vendors order is contrary to the priority scheme set forth in sections 503 and 507. The court follows the cases that have ruled that the "doctrine of necessity" was not included in the Bankruptcy Code and therefore did not survive its enactment. Capital Factors, Inc. v. Kmart Corp., 291 B.R. 818 (N.D. Ill. 2003).
- 5.1.ttttt DIP financing agreement asset sale time lines are filed under seal. Section 107 provides that papers filed in a bankruptcy case are public records, open to examination, but that the court may protect an entity with respect to confidential commercial information. The debtor-in-possession financing agreement contained a time line by which the debtor agreed to market and sell certain major assets. Because the disclosure of that information would give competitors an unfair advantage and could give potential buyers more leverage in the sale process, the court orders that portion of the DIP financing agreement to be filed under seal. In re Farmland Industries, Inc., 290 B.R. 364 (Bankr. - 5.1.uuuuu Non-voting parent corporation is an "affiliate." Section 101(2)(A) defines affiliate as "entity that directly or indirectly owns, controls, or holds with power to vote, 20% or more of the outstanding voting securities of the debtor" The owner of 100% of the debtor's common stock had transferred the right to vote under a pledge agreement. Nevertheless, the parent is an "affiliate" under section 101(2)(A), because the phrase "with power to vote" modifies only "holds," not "owns" or "controls." In re Interlink Home Healthcare, Inc., 283 B.R. 429 (Bankr. It follows the ruling of the Third Circuit in In re Marin Motor Oil, 689 F.2d 445 (3d Cir. 1982), and departs from the ruling of the Fifth Circuit in *Fuel Oil Supply v. - 5.1.wwwww Breach of duty of loyalty provides grounds for denial of confirmation for lack of good faith. The debtor's CEO was also on the payroll of one of its largest creditors under a contract that required the CEO to follow the creditor's instructions regarding the creditors investments. Neither the CEO nor the creditor disclosed the arrangement to the debtor. The undisclosed existence of the agreement was grounds for denial of the debtor's first plan of reorganization and, though later disclosed, was also grounds for denial of confirmation of the second plan. Relying on Wolf v. Weinstein, 372 U.S. 633 (1963), the court concludes that the debtor-in-possession, performing the duties of a trustee, owes a fiduciary duty to the estate and that duty devolves upon officers as well. The duty includes the duty of loyalty, which the CEO breached by its loyalty to the creditor, resulting in a variety of actual harms to the debtor and the estate, including denial of confirmation of the first plan and the attendant expense. The breach of duty tainted the restructuring and the debtor's negotiations toward a plan. "The separate boundaries necessary between a debtor and creditor in formulating a chapter 11 plan" were not enforced. In re Coram Healthcare Corp., 271 B.R. 228 (2001).

- 5.1.xxxxx Insolvent debtor owes fiduciary duty to creditors. Before bankruptcy, while the debtor was insolvent, the controlling shareholder caused the debtor to repay bank loans that the shareholder had guaranteed. The trustee sued the shareholder for breach of fiduciary duty. Once the debtor became insolvent, its officers and directors owe unsecured creditors a fiduciary duty, which requires that they “maximize the value of the assets for payment of unsecured creditors.” Therefore, the allegation of payment of a debt guaranteed by the controlling shareholder was a sufficient allegation of breach of fiduciary duty. *Official Committee v. Accordingly, the bank may be liable for aiding and abetting if its involvement rose to a level of “substantial assistance or encouragement.” *Official Committee v. The bankruptcy court granted the debtor’s motion to distribute the cash in accordance with section 507, even though no disclosure statement or plan had been approved, and for dismissal of the case. The B.A.P. rules that the order was improper, holding that the court must follow the procedures of chapter 11, at least where, as here, a creditor had objected to the distribution and dismissal motion. *Ohio Department of Taxation v. Transcolor did not appear at the hearing on the motion to approve the rejection and did not object. One year later, in its own bankruptcy case, Transcolor sued the insiders of the first debtor for damages arising from the wrongful rejection of the lease. Although the bankruptcy court ultimately grounded its decision dismissing the lawsuit on waiver, estoppel, and res judicata, the court also ruled that, “Parties who counsel or influence a debtor to file bankruptcy. . .are not subject to liability in a collateral proceeding brought in a State court for having given such advice, counsel, or persuasion . . .” Transcolor Corp. v. Cerberus Partners, L.P. (In re Transcolor Corp.), 258 B.R. 149 (Bankr. D. Md. 2001).
- 5.1.bbbbbb DIP loan to multiple debtors does not constitute substantive consolidation. The DIP lender entered into a financing agreement with the debtor and its three debtor subsidiaries, under which each would have access to a line of credit and letters of credit and each would be liable under the line of credit for all amounts advanced to all debtors. Each debtor was given a super-priority administrative expense claim against the other debtors, subordinated only to the lender’s super-priority claim, to the extent that the debtor made payments to the lender in excess of funds that it received. The Fifth Circuit rejected the objection of an unsecured creditor that the DIP Financing Order resulted in a de facto substantive consolidation of the estates, finding that the availability of the cross-claims maintained the distinction among the assets and liabilities of each of the debtors, and the Financing Order did not combine the assets and liabilities or establish a common pool of funds to pay claims. In addition, the court rules that the absolute priority rule of section 1129(b) does not apply in the pre-plan context. *Clyde Bergemann, Inc. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co. - 5.1.dddddd Liquidating chapter 11 debtor might not be subject to WARN Act liability. The debtor health care provider surrendered its certificate of need to the state on the date of bankruptcy but retained its employees for approximately two weeks to prepare assets for sale. Under the circumstances, the debtor-in-possession was not an "employer" within the meaning of the WARN Act and so was not liable for 60 days notice or back pay to employees who were terminated shortly after filing. The court stresses the significance of the debtor's intent to liquidate upon the filing of the chapter 11 petition as a key factor in determining that the debtor-in-possession was not an "employer." *Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. - 5.1.eeeeeee Debtor is not a fiduciary in plan negotiations. The secured creditor moved to disqualify counsel for the debtor in possession because counsel had previously (but not currently) represented the purchaser/plan proponent. The court denies the disqualification motion on the ground that the debtor, in its role of proposing and obtaining confirmation of a plan, owes no fiduciary duty to the creditors and, indeed, may be adverse to them both by hard bargaining and by invocation of the cram down power. Because the debtor owed no such duty, its counsel would not be disqualified on motion of the creditor. In re Water's Edge Limited Partnership, 251 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2000).
- 5.1.ffffff Court disapproves executive severance and retention program. Because the debtor's union opposed an executive severance program in such a way that might threaten the viability of the reorganization and because the debtor had not consulted with the union before proposing the plan, the court disapproved the plan, noting three features whose revision would result in approval of the plan. The court suggested a mitigation provision (in the event the executive finds other work after termination), subordination to chapter 7 administrative expenses, and payment of the success/emergence bonus all in stock of the reorganized debtor rather than in cash. In re Geneva Steel Co., 236 B.R. 770 (Bankr. - 5.1.gggggg Fraudulent mismanagement resulting in loss to creditors does not breach fiduciary duty. The debtor's directors fraudulently misstated the debtor's assets, allowing it to incur additional credit and prolong its life. During its extended life, losses to creditors mounted. In a careful and thoughtful reading of Delaware law on directors' fiduciary duty to creditors when the debtor is in the vicinity of insolvency, the court rules that the directors did not breach any such duty by their conduct, because the complaint did not allege that the directors did not use the corporate assets in an informed, good faith effort to maximize the corporation's long-term wealth creating capacity. *Steinberg v. - 5.1.hhhhhh Settlement agreement that transfers control is disapproved. The debtor entered into a settlement agreement with a creditor who had moved to shorten exclusivity. The settlement agreement provided for a transfer of control of the debtor to creditor. The court disapproved the settlement on the grounds that the transfer of control could not be accomplished outside of a plan and on the further ground that the agreement compromised issues that were not the subject of the exclusivity motion. In re Louise's, Inc., 211 B.R. 798 (D. - 5.1.iiiii Bankruptcy Court may not appoint members of a committee. On its own motion, the Bankruptcy Court removed all of the attorney members of the tort claimants' committee and

5.2 Exclusivity

5.2.a Court sanctions creditor for filing draft plan as exhibit to motion to terminate exclusivity.

During the debtor's exclusivity period, the debtor's principal secured creditor filed a motion to terminate exclusivity and attached as an exhibit to the motion a draft proposed plan that it would file if the court terminated exclusivity. The court denied the motion. The debtor sought attorneys' fees from the creditor and subordination of the creditor's claim for violating the debtor's exclusive right to file a plan. Section 1121 gives a debtor the exclusive right to file a plan for a limited period. During that period, a creditor may not file a plan. Attaching a draft plan to a motion constitutes filing of the plan, as it is a public document on the court's docket and available for viewing by creditors. The debtor need not show harm to its own plan process from the creditor's action. Any burden rests with the filing creditor to show that other creditors did not review the draft plan. As a remedy, the court orders the creditor to pay the debtor's attorneys fees for responding to the exclusivity motion, prohibits the creditor from filing any other plan, and requires the creditor to fund the cost of an examiner up to $50,000 from any recovery the creditor receives in the case. In re Charles St. African Methodist Episcopal Church of Boston, 499 B.R. 126 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2013).

5.2.b Joint plan filing did not waive exclusivity. The debtor and the creditors committee filed a joint plan during the debtor's exclusivity period. The filing of the plan with the committee did not waive the debtor's exclusive right to file a plan. The court may terminate exclusivity for cause (which may include the debtor's consent to termination); but the Code does not separately authorize the debtor to terminate it. Moreover, waiver requires a knowing and intentional relinquishment of a right. Waivers should not lightly be implied. In re Adelpia Commc'ns Corp., 352 B.R. 578 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

5.2.c Proposal of a "new value" plan is grounds for terminating exclusivity. Recognizing the split in authority on the issue before the Supreme Court's decision in Bank of America v. 203 N. LaSalle St. Partnership, 526 U.S. 434 (1999), the bankruptcy court concludes that the presence of a competing bidder and the reasoning of LaSalle require that exclusivity be terminated once the debtor has filed a "new value" plan. In re Situation Management Systems, Inc., 252 B.R. 859 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2000).

5.3 Classification

5.3.a Guaranteed claim might not be substantially similar to other unsecured claims. The debtor bifurcated the real estate secured creditor's claim and classified the unsecured portion separately from other unsecured claims. A nondebtor entity had guaranteed the secured claim. Chapter XI of the Bankruptcy Act addressed only unsecured claims. It permitted separate classification of claims but did not provide a statutory standard. By contrast, Chapter X of the Act addressed secured and unsecured claims and permitted separate classification based on the "nature" of the claims. The rights a claim gives its holder against the debtor, typically priority and security, determine the "nature" of the claim. Section 1122(a) prohibits classification together only of claims that are not "substantially similar". The absence of "nature" from section 1122(a) suggests Congress intended a different classification regime, not based entirely on the holder's right against the debtor. Therefore, a general unsecured claim for which the creditor has an alternative source of repayment, whether a guarantee or collateral, creates a special circumstance that accords the creditor a different status and might actually require separate classification of its claim from other general unsecured claims. In re Loop 76, LLC, 465 B.R. 525 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

- 5.3.b Court permits separate classification of general unsecured and bond claims. The plan classified general unsecured claims separately from claims under two series of bonds issued under separate indentures. Some indenture provisions were ambiguous as to which bonds were senior. The plan resolved the ambiguity by treating the bonds equally. In addition, the plan provided for the continued involvement of the indenture trustee, payment of its fees and indemnification for its activities in helping implement the plan. The general unsecured claim class did not accept the plan; the bond class did. The Code does not prohibit separate classification of similar claims so long as the separate classification is not for an improper purpose, such as manipulating class voting or violating basic priority rights. The resolution of potential litigation between bond issues and the special treatment of the indenture trustee are proper purposes for separate classification, which the court approves. In re Colonial Bancgroup, Inc., 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 1984 (Bankr. M.D. Ala. May 20, 2011).
- 5.3.c Guaranteed claim might not be substantially similar to other unsecured claims. The debtor proposed a plan in which the real estate secured creditor's claim was bifurcated and the unsecured portion classified separately from other unsecured claims. The secured claim was guaranteed. Section 1122(a) prohibits classification together of claims that are not "substantially similar". Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act permitted separate classification based on the "nature" of the claims. Chapter XI of the Act addressed only unsecured claims and permitted separate classification without statutory standard. The "nature" of a claim is determined by the rights it gives its holder against the debtor, typically priority and security. The absence of "nature" from section 1122(a) suggests Congress intended a different classification regime. Classification determines voting and distribution. A creditor who has an alternative source of payment need not be concerned about plan recoveries to the same extent as other creditors and therefore might not vote based on the same interests as other creditors with claims of the same nature. Therefore, a general unsecured claim for which the creditor has an alternative source of repayment might not be substantially similar to other general unsecured claims, permitting or requiring separate classification. In re Loop 76, LLC, 442 B.R. 713 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2010), accord In re Red Mtn. Machinery Co., 448 B.R.1 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2011).
- 5.3.d Improper substantive consolidation under a plan may result in improper classification. Based on a widely (but not universally) supported settlement agreement, the plan provided for de facto substantive consolidation of the multiple debtor estates, which eliminated both pre- and postpetition intercompany claims. Because the claims were eliminated, they were not classified under the plan and did not vote. The court did not determine whether there were independent grounds for substantive consolidation but confirmed the plan based on the consolidated distribution that the settlement agreement contemplated and on the elimination under the plan of intercompany claims. In the context of a motion for a stay pending appeal, the district court determines that there is a substantial likelihood that the consolidation was improper. It was based on a settlement that had not yet become effective when the bankruptcy court was considering whether to confirm the plan, because it became effective only under the plan. Moreover, for the same reason, the non-classification of intercompany claims improperly eliminated the intercompany claims' plan voting rights. ACC Bondholder Group v. Adelpia Commc'ns Corp. (In re Adelpia Commc'ns Corp.), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7416 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 24, 2007).
- 5.3.e Third party release of insurance company is not warranted; separate classification is. The debtor was a law firm that was subject to numerous malpractice claims. The malpractice carrier proposed to contribute a substantial amount to the plan, which would be used to pay separately classified malpractice claims. The court determines that because the insurer had an obligation to pay up to the policy limits to the estate, its contribution under the plan did not provide a basis for a third party release. Similarly, the court disapproves the third party release in favor of the partners, because there was no showing that the partners' contribution was substantial. Nevertheless, the court permits separate classification of the malpractice claims from the general trade claims, because the insurance proceeds were available only to the malpractice claimants. In re Mahoney Hawkes, LLP, 289 B.R. 285 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2002).

- 5.3.f Unsecured deficiency claim must be classified with general unsecured claims. The Ninth Circuit joins the Second, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits in ruling that the unsecured deficiency claims created by section 1111(b) may not be classified separately from general unsecured claims without a legitimate business or economic justification. Barakat v. The Life Insurance Company of Virginia (In re Barakat), 99 F.3d 1520 (9th Cir. 1996).

5.4 Disclosure Statements and Voting

- 5.4.a Plan modification requires resolicitation, even of rejecting creditors. The debtor proposed a plan that allocated new equity to existing shareholders based solely on new capital contributions. A day before confirmation, the controlling shareholder moved to modify the plan to eliminate the contributions of the other three shareholders, without notifying them of the motion. The court confirmed the plan, reasoning that the shareholders were to receive or retain nothing under the plan on account of their old equity interests and were therefore deemed to reject the plan. Accordingly, it concluded that neither a new disclosure statement nor new solicitation was required. The three shareholders moved for reconsideration. Section 1126(g) provides that a class whose member receives or retains nothing under the plan on account of the interests is deemed to reject. However, the plan gave the three shareholders the right to invest to acquire new equity based on their existing interests and therefore did not provide for them to receive or retain nothing on account of their old interests. In addition, Bankruptcy Rule 3019(a) requires new disclosure and resolicitation when a modification materially and adversely affects the treatment of any creditor or equity holder who has not accepted the modification in writing. It is not limited to holders who had previously accepted the plan. Therefore, the court must require a new disclosure statement and solicitation before confirmation. Braun v. America-CV Station Group, Inc. (In re America-CV Station Group, Inc.), ___ F.4th ___, 2023 U.S. App. LEXIS 230 (11th Cir. Jan. 5, 2023).
- 5.4.b A class that receives full cash payment with postpetition interest at the federal judgment rate is unimpaired. The solvent debtor proposed a plan that left the class of general unsecured creditors unimpaired by providing for payment in cash in full with interest at the legal rate. Section 726(a)(5) requires payment of interest on unsecured claims before equity may receive any recovery. Section 1129(a)(7) effectively incorporates that requirement into a chapter 11 plan, although it does not expressly apply to an unimpaired class. More generally, the "solvent debtor" exception requires payment of postpetition interest. Leaving a class unimpaired requires the plan not alter the legal, contractual, or equitable rights of claims in the class, but it does not require undoing alterations that are effected by the Code's operation, rather than by the plan. The Code suspends accrual of postpetition interest. Accordingly, a plan may leave a class unimpaired even if it does not provide for payment of interest at the contract rate. In such a case, application of the federal judgment rate is appropriate. The use of the term "legal rate" in section 726(a)(5) suggests Congress did not intend application of the contract rate but rather a rate imposed by statute. Moreover, a single rate applicable to all claims simplifies administration, especially in cases with a large number of unsecured claims. Therefore, a plan that provides for payment of a class of unsecured claims in cash in full with postpetition interest at the federal judgment rate to date of payment leaves the class unimpaired. In re Cuker Interactive, LLC, 622 B.R. 67 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 2020).
- 5.4.c Creditor may vote claims purchased with intent to block plan to protect the creditor's interest. The oversecured creditor offered to purchase selected unsecured claims. Its motive was solely to block the debtor's plan, which it had concluded treated it unfairly, not for any ulterior purpose independent of its treatment under the plan. The effect was to give the secured creditor an unfair advantage over the unsecured creditors whose claims it did not offer to purchase and was prejudicial to those creditors. Section 1126(e) permits the court to designate a creditor's vote that was not cast in good faith. The good faith concept is fluid, depending on the facts of the case, but focuses primarily on the creditor's motive. The vote is in good faith if the motive is enlightened self-interest to protect its position in the case and its recovery and not an ulterior motive designed to accomplish some other purpose outside the creditor's treatment under the plan. The concept applies equally to the purchase of claims with the intent to vote them on the plan. Here, the creditor's motive related only to its treatment under the plan. The court allowed the vote. Pac. W. Bank v. Fagerdala USA-Lompoc, Inc. (In re Fagerdala USA-Lompoc, Inc.), 891 F.3d 848 (9th Cir. 2018).

5.4.d A claim transfer from an insider does not confer insider status on the transferee. The real estate LLC debtor had two principal creditors, a secured creditor and its managing member, which held a $2.76 million unsecured claim. After bankruptcy, one of the five managing member directors approached a close personal and business friend and offered on behalf of the managing member to sell its claim to him for $5,000. The claim buyer did not live or share expenses with his director friend, and neither controlled the other in their business relationships. Before the purchase, the buyer had no relationship with the managing member or its other directors and knew little of its business. After the sale, the debtor proposed a plan that distributed $30,000 on the unsecured claim. The buyer did not know the plan's terms before his purchase, which he made as a speculative investment. The buyer accepted the plan, creating an impaired accepting class; the secured creditor did not accept and objected to confirmation. Section 1129(a)(10) requires as a confirmation condition that at least one impaired class accept the plan, not counting any insider's acceptances. Section 101(31) defines insider to include persons with certain defined formal relations with the debtor, generally one with a sufficiently close formal relationship to warrant special treatment or scrutiny. A non-statutory insider is one who has any other sufficiently close relationship to fall within the purpose of the definition. "Insider" is a noun that describes a person, not an adjective that describes a claim. Insider status applies only to specified persons and does not accompany a claim when transferred from an insider to another. Here, the close personal relationship between the director and the buyer did not bring the buyer within the non-statutory insider concept, because the purchase transaction was at arms' length, and neither party controlled the other. Therefore, the court may count buyer's acceptance in applying section 1129(a)(10). U.S. Bank N.A. v. The Village at Lakeridge, LLC (In re The Village at Lakeridge, LLC), 634 Fed. Appx. 619 (9th Cir. 2016).

5.4.e Approval of a third-party release requires adequate disclosure and evidence of adequate consideration. The debtor's bond indenture trustee re-perfected a lapsed security interest within 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor in possession sued to avoid the re-perfection as a preference. The debtor in possession and the indenture trustee settled the litigation by allowance of the bonds as secured claims in a substantially reduced amount. The settlement provided for the indenture trustee's release of its contractual indemnification claims against the debtor and for a third-party release of the bondholders' claims against the indenture trustee. However, the settlement was contingent upon confirmation of a plan that incorporated its terms. The court approved the settlement and later approved a disclosure statement, which mentioned the third-party release in the course of describing all plan releases, but did not highlight it or call specific attention to it through boldface, italic, underlined or all-capitals type. The bondholders overwhelmingly accepted the plan, but one bondholder objected to confirmation based on the third-party release. A court may approve a third-party release in a plan if the third party has made an important contribution to the reorganization, the release is essential to confirmation, a large majority of creditors accept the plan, there is a close connection between the claims against the third party and the debtor, and the plan provides for payment of substantially all affected claims. Rule 3016(c) requires a disclosure statement to "describe in specific and conspicuous language" any injunction the plan proposes. A third-party release has the same effect as an injunction, so the Rule's requirements apply equally. Here, because the disclosure was not clear and conspicuous, the disclosure statement did not comply with the Rule. Therefore, the plan's acceptance by a large majority of bondholders was inadequately informed and therefore did not satisfy the third requirement for approval of a third-party release. In addition, there was insufficient evidence of what the bondholders received in exchange for the release or whether it was adequate. In re Lower Bucks Hosp., 571 Fed. Appx. 139 (3d Cir. 2014).

- 5.4.f Section 1129(a)(10)'s non-insider voting requirement applies at the time of the vote. The debtor proposed a plan that paid all creditors in cash in full, except creditors in a class consisting of contingent, unliquidated, disputed claims of directors and officers and former directors and officers for indemnification arising out of illegal prepetition securities issuances. Because the plan provided for full cash payment of claims in the other classes, only that class voted on the plan. All holders of claims in that class accepted. Under section 1129(a)(10), the court may confirm a plan only if, among other things, at least one class of claims accepts the plan, without counting acceptances by insiders. A director or officer is an insider. For purposes of determining whether an acceptance is by an insider, the court determines insider status when the debtor formulates and the creditor votes on the plan, not when the claim arose. Section 1129(a)(10)'s purpose is to prevent confirmation when only insiders favor the plan or control plan formulation without outside creditor acceptance. If a creditor is not an insider when voting, then the purpose is met, because the creditor does not have an insider's influence in that process. Therefore, the plan satisfies section 1129(a)(10). In re Neogenix Oncology, Inc., 508 B.R. 345 (Bankr. D. Md. 2014).
- 5.4.g Court denies claim buyer permission to change purchased claim's plan vote. The class of secured claims rejected the debtor's plan, but the class of unsecured claims accepted. One of the secured creditors bought one of the unsecured claims and sought to change the vote, so that the unsecured class would reject the plan. Rule 3018 requires a creditor to show "cause" before it may change its vote. The Rule does not define or give examples of "cause," but the cause must be good or legally sufficient cause. The court should determine what is legally sufficient by reference to the purposes of chapter 11 and of voting. Chapter 11 and the voting regime encourage consensual negotiation and fair bargaining over a plan by balancing the debtor's and creditors' rights and powers. Allowing a creditor to acquire a blocking position after negotiation and voting would upset the balance and encourage side deals that might treat some creditor classes unfairly. Votes would be bought and sold after they were cast, and the buyer could dictate new plan terms, despite a consensual negotiation. Permitting late vote changes would undermine parties' willingness to negotiate. Therefore, the court denies permission. In re J.C. Householder Land Trust #1, 502 B.R. 602 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2013).
- 5.4.h Court disqualifies vote of transferee whom loan agreement makes ineligible to hold loan interest and prohibits claim splitting. The debtor's loan agreement permitted lenders to assign an interest in the loan only to "a commercial bank, insurance company, financial institution or institutional lender." After bankruptcy, one of four lenders assigned the lender's interest in the loan to a distressed investing fund. The fund transferred portions of the interest to two other funds that its investment manager controlled. The remaining three lenders accepted the debtor's plan. The three investment funds rejected the plan. Under section 1126(b), a class accepts a plan if holders of a majority in number and two-thirds in amount of claims accept the plan. The court determines that "financial institution" does not include a distressed investing fund, that the fund was therefore not an eligible assignee and that the fund was therefore not entitled to accept or reject the plan. In addition, a creditor may not divide a claim in a way that artificially creates voting rights that the assignor never had. Otherwise, creditors could manipulate voting and plan acceptance or rejection just by claim assignment. Accordingly, even if the funds were eligible assignees and permitted to accept or reject, they would have only one vote, not enough to prevent the class's plan acceptance. Meridian Sunrise Village, LLC v. NB Distressed Debt Inv.

Fund Ltd. (In re Meridian Sunrise Village, LLC), 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30833 (W.D. Wa. Mar. 7, 2014).

- 5.4.i Court enforces vote assignment in subordination agreement. The debtor issued subordinated debt to former shareholders to purchase their shares. In the agreement providing for subordination of their claims, the former shareholders agreed that if a reorganization case were commenced, the debtor's bank "is irrevocably authorized to ... take such other actions (including without limitation, voting the Subordinated Debt) as it may deem necessary or advisable." Section 510(a) requires the court to enforce a subordination agreement. The section is not limited to priority issues; its plain terms apply to the entire agreement. Section 1126(a) permits "the holder of a claim" to vote. But it does not preclude assignment of a holder's voting rights. Nor does assignment violate public policy, as protection of creditors' rights to vote is not a fundamental purpose of the Bankruptcy Code. Finally, Rule 3018 permits a creditor to authorize an agent to vote. Construed consistently with Rules 2019 and 3001, which require an "authorized agent" only to produce the instrument empowering it to act, the Rule does not require that the agent act in the principal's interest. Therefore, the bank may, on behalf of the former shareholders, accept a plan that provides no recovery for the shareholders. Rosenfeld v. Coastal Broadcasting Sys., Inc. (In re Coastal Broadcasting Sys., Inc.), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91469 (D.N.J. June 28, 2013).
- 5.4.j Postpetition negotiation and agreement does not violate section 1125. The debtor and two groups of creditors negotiated and litigated against each other for a year before reaching agreement on a chapter 11 plan, which they embodied in a restructuring support agreement. The agreement required the signing creditors to accept a plan that was consistent with the agreement once the court approved a disclosure statement. The agreement was enforceable by specific performance. Section 1125(b) prohibits postpetition solicitation of plan acceptances before transmittal of a court-approved disclosure statement. Section 1126(e) permits the court to disqualify any acceptance that was not solicited in good faith or in accordance with the Code. The Code's structure contemplates and encourages negotiation, and section 1125 does not prohibit it. Thus, "solicitation" should receive a narrow construction. Negotiation's natural result is agreement. Prohibiting agreement would undercut the incentive to negotiate. Where, as here, the parties were sophisticated and had substantial information before reaching agreement, obtaining a binding commitment to support a plan is not a prohibited solicitation, and a resulting plan acceptance is not in bad faith or in violation of the Code. Therefore, the court does not disqualify the acceptances. In re Indianapolis Downs, LLC, 486 B.R. 286 (Bankr. D. Del. 2013).
- 5.4.k Approval of a third-party release requires adequate disclosure and evidence of adequate consideration. The debtor's bond indenture trustee re-perfected a lapsed security interest within 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor in possession sued to avoid the re-perfection as a preference. The debtor in possession and the indenture trustee settled the litigation by allowance of the bonds as secured claim in a substantially reduced amount. The settlement provided for the indenture trustee's release of its contractual indemnification claims against the debtor and for a third-party release of the bondholders' claims against the indenture trustee. However, the settlement was contingent upon confirmation of a plan that incorporated its terms. The court approved the settlement and later approved a disclosure statement, which mentioned the third-party release in the course of describing all plan releases, but did not highlight it or call specific attention to it through boldface, italic, underlined or all-capitals type. The bondholders overwhelmingly accepted the plan, but one bondholder objected to confirmation based on the third-party release. A court may approve a third-party release in a plan if the third party has made an important contribution to the reorganization, the release is essential to confirmation, a large majority of creditors accept the plan, there is a close connection between the claims against the third party and the debtor and the plan provides for payment of substantially all affected claims. Rule 3016(c) requires a disclosure statement to "describe in specific and conspicuous language" any injunction the plan proposes. A third-party release has the same effect as an injunction, so the Rule's requirements apply equally. Here, because the disclosure was not clear and conspicuous, the disclosure statement did not comply with the Rule. Therefore, the plan's acceptance by a large majority of bondholders was inadequately informed and therefore did not satisfy the third requirement for approval of a third-party release. In addition, there was insufficient evidence of what the bondholders received in exchange for the release or whether it was adequate. Bank of N.Y. Mellon Trust Co. v. Becker (In re Lower Bucks Hosp.), 488 B.R. 303 (E.D. Pa. 2013).

- 5.4.l Improper solicitation of others' votes is not grounds for designating the solicitor's vote. The debtor solicited creditors for acceptances of its plan. A lender proposed a competing plan and solicited rejections of the debtor's plan. Section 1126(e) permits the court to disregard a creditor's acceptance or rejection of a plan if the acceptance or rejection was not in good faith or was not solicited in good faith or in accordance with the Bankruptcy Code. Although the creditor may have solicited others not in accordance with the Code, its own vote was not so solicited. Therefore, the court refuses to disregard the creditor's plan rejection. In re Charles St. African Methodist Episcopal Church, 480 B.R. 66 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2012).
- 5.4.m Desire to preserve a debtor's business is not a disqualifying ulterior motive for the creditor's plan acceptance. A single asset real estate debtor borrowed $5,000 seven months before bankruptcy and secured the loan with computer equipment it used in its business. The debtor had other business relations with the creditor, who was considered a "friendly" creditor. In its chapter 11 case, the debtor proposed a plan that reduced the interest rate on the loan. The creditor accepted the plan. The real estate secured lender rejected the plan, objected to confirmation and moved to designate the computer secured lender's vote under section 1126(e). Section 1126(e) permits the court to disqualify an acceptance that was not in good faith or that was not solicited or procured in good faith. Good faith excludes an ulterior motive to secure an untoward advantage over other creditors and is akin to fraud. A desire to see the reorganization plan succeed or to continue in business with the debtor is not bad faith. "Solicitation" involves only a specific request for a vote. The debtor's creation shortly before bankruptcy of a small secured claim that it could separately classify under a plan does not constitute soliciting or procuring an acceptance. Even if it were, it would not be bad faith, because a desire to confirm a chapter 11 plan is not an ulterior motive; it is chapter 11's purpose. Therefore, the court does not disqualify the computer secured creditor's vote. In re Bataa/Kierland, LLC, 476 B.R. 558 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2012).
- 5.4.n Court may deny disclosure statement approval if the plan is facially nonconfirmable. The debtor proposed a plan and sought approval of a disclosure statement. Creditors challenged the confirmability of the plan on feasibility and good faith grounds. Ordinarily, confirmation issues are reserved for the confirmation hearing and should not be heard at the disclosure statement approval hearing. However, where there are no material facts in dispute, the plan defects cannot be overcome by creditor acceptance of the plan, and the court has given adequate notice that it may consider the issues at the disclosure statement hearing, the court may determine at that hearing that the plan is not confirmable. A court need not go through a needless solicitation and confirmation hearing if matters can be clearly determined earlier. In re Am. Cap. Equip., LLC, 688 F.3d 145 (3d Cir. 2012).
- 5.4.o Strategic motive to defeat confirmation and absence of bad faith does not support "cause" to change a vote of a claim purchased during the voting period. A single asset real estate debtor proposed a plan to pay its oversecured lender in full over time and artificially impaired the class of general unsecured claims. The unsecured claims class's two creditors accepted the plan. During the voting period, the secured lender purchased one of the claims and moved for authority to change the acceptance to a rejection for the express purpose of defeating the plan by preventing the existence of an impaired consenting class. Rule 3018(a) requires a creditor to show cause to change or withdraw a ballot. “Cause” requires more than a simple change of heart, more than a mere absence of an improper motive and more than a strategic reason. Here, waiting until after a plan is voted before deciding what claims to buy does violence to the plan solicitation process because it diverts attention from negotiation for the best plan for all creditors and permits parties to vie for control of the case outside the plan confirmation process. Therefore, the creditor did not show cause to change its vote. Beal Bank USA v. Windmill Durango Office, LLC (In re Windmill Durango Office, LLC), 481 B.R. 51 (9th Cir. B.A. P. 2012).

- 5.4.p Preplan settlement may not bind and “unimpaired” a bondholder class. The debtor’s bond indenture trustee re-perfected a lapsed security interest within 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor in possession sued to avoid the re-perfection as a preference. The debtor in possession and the indenture trustee settled the litigation by allowance of the bonds as secured claims in a substantially reduced amount. The settlement provided for the indenture trustee’s release of its contractual indemnification claims against the debtor and for a third party release of the bondholders’ claims against the indenture trustee. However, the settlement was contingent upon confirmation of a plan that incorporated its terms. The debtor proposed such a plan, designating the bondholder class as unimpaired. The court approved the settlement. An indenture trustee’s settlement of an adversary proceeding may not bind bondholders unless the indenture authorizes the indenture trustee to do so. Here, the indenture did not do so. A class of claims is impaired unless the plan does not alter the legal, contractual or equitable rights of holders of claims in the class. Because the settlement did not alter bondholders’ rights, the plan would do so, and the bondholder claim class is therefore impaired. In re Lower Bucks Hosp., 471 B.R. 419 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2012).
- 5.4.q Approval of a third party release requires adequate disclosure. The debtor’s bond indenture trustee re-perfected a lapsed security interest within 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor in possession sued to avoid the re-perfection as a preference. The debtor in possession and the indenture trustee settled the litigation by allowance of the bonds as secured claim in a substantially reduced amount. The settlement provided for the indenture trustee’s release of its contractual indemnification claims against the debtor and for a third party release of the bondholders’ claims against the indenture trustee. However, the settlement was contingent upon confirmation of a plan that incorporated its terms. The court approved the settlement and later approved a disclosure statement that did not clearly describe the third party release. The bondholders overwhelmingly accepted the plan, but one bondholder objected to confirmation based on the third party release. A court may approve a third party release in a plan if the third party has made an important contribution to the reorganization, the release is essential to confirmation, a large majority of creditors accept the plan, there is a close connection between the claims against the third party and the debtor and the plan provides for payment of substantially all affected claims. Rule 3016(c) requires a disclosure statement to “describe in specific and conspicuous language” any injunction the plan proposes. A third party release has the same effect as an injunction, so the Rule’s requirements apply equally. Here, because the disclosure was inadequate, the disclosure statement did not comply with the Rule. More importantly, the plan’s acceptance by a large majority of bondholders was inadequately informed and therefore did not satisfy the third requirement for approval of a third party release. In re Lower Bucks Hosp., 471 B.R. 419 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2012).
- 5.4.r Subordination agreement vote assignment provision is not enforceable. Under an intercreditor subordination agreement, the junior creditor assigned its bankruptcy voting rights to the senior creditor. Section 510(b) requires the court to enforce a subordination agreement, but not, however, to nullify other Code provisions. A subordination agreement provision that would alter a creditor’s substantive rights under the Code is not enforceable. Therefore, the junior creditor may vote its own claim. In re SW Boston Hotel Venture, LLC, 460 B.R. 38 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2011).

- 5.4.s Section 1129(a)(10)'s single impaired class acceptance requirement applies to each debtor in a joint plan. The 111 jointly administered debtors proposed a single joint chapter 11 plan. The plan did not provide for substantive consolidation of the debtors, so the plan was deemed to be a separate plan for each of them. Every impaired class for which an acceptance or rejection was submitted accepted the plan, though for some of the debtors, there were no acceptances or rejections from any impaired class. Section 1129(a)(10) requires, as a condition to confirmation, that a plan be accepted by at least one impaired class of claims. Under section 102(7), “the singular includes the plural”, so the reference in section 1129(a)(10) to “a plan” should not be read to apply on a “per plan”, rather than a per debtor, basis, and entity separateness is fundamental. Section 1129's other confirmation conditions also speak in the singular, yet provisions such as subsection (a)(3)'s good faith test and subsection (a)(7)'s best interest test apply per debtor. Read consistently with those paragraphs, subsection (a)(10) should apply per debtor. Finally, joint administration, which has the effect of permitting a joint plan, should not have any substantive effect. Applying section 1129(a)(10)'s acceptance requirement on a per plan basis would have such an effect. Therefore, it applies on a per debtor basis. The court notes that, with proper notice in the disclosure statement or voting instructions, a non-voting class might appropriately be treated as an accepting class. In re Tribune Co., 464 B.R. 126 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).
- 5.4.t Subrogation clause is effective to transfer voting rights. The first mortgage lender and the second mortgage lender agreed in an intercreditor agreement that the first mortgage lender was “subrogated” to the second mortgage lender “with respect to [the second's] claims against Borrower, rights, liens, and security interests, if any, in any of the Borrower's assets ... until the Senior Debt shall have been paid in full”. The debtor proposed a plan that paid the first over time and gave the second a small payment on the plan's effective date in full satisfaction of the second's claim. The first rejected the plan for both the first and the second. The first had not paid anything to the second. A right to accept or reject a plan is a derivative right that a claim holder possesses. Subrogation may be equitable or contractual. It substitutes one party in place of another with respect to a claim. The subrogee steps into the subrogor's shoes with respect to the claim. Contractual subrogation does not require any payment of the subrogor by the subrogee. The contractual terms govern. Here, the contract made the subrogation effective upon the contract's execution. Therefore, the first succeeds to the second's right to accept or reject the plan. Bankruptcy does not make a subrogation clause's transfer of voting rights unenforceable. Therefore, the first may reject the plan on behalf of the second. In re Avondale Gateway Center Entitlement, LLC, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41450 (D. Ariz. Apr. 12, 2011).
- 5.4.u Class with a single creditor who does not accept the plan is not a non-accepting class. A creditor purchased all the first lien claims during the chapter 11 case. The court designated the creditor's plan rejection under section 1126(e). A class accepts a plan under section 1126 if the plan is accepted by creditors (other than creditors whose acceptances or rejections are designated) “that hold at least two-thirds in amount and more than one-half in number of the allowed claims of such class held by” creditors whose acceptances or rejections are not designated. If a class does not accept the plan, then the section 1129(b) cram down protections apply, requiring the plan to be fair and equitable as to, and not to discriminate unfairly against, that class. Where the court has designated and thus ignores all the claims in a class in calculating the vote, it would be anomalous not to ignore the entire class for voting purposes as well, lest the designation be rendered meaningless. Therefore, section 1129(b) does not apply to a single creditor class whose rejection has been designated. In addition, affirming the court's prior decision in another case, the court determines that if none of the creditors of a class accept or reject the plan, whether by reason of apathy or designation, the class is deemed to accept. DISH Network Corp. v. DBSD N. Am., Inc. (In re DBSD N. Am., Inc.), 634 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2011).

- 5.4.v Modification of plan provision for voting power of new stock requires resolicitation. The debtor proposed a plan that provided for creditors to receive 5,000,000 shares of Class A stock, which represents 90% of the equity interests but only 18% of the voting interests, and for the old stockholder to receive 500,000 shares of Class B stock, which represents 10% of the equity and 82% of the voting interest. The directors are divided into two classes. The Class B shares entitled the old stockholder to elect one of seven directors. After one class rejected the plan, the debtor modified the stock provisions to provide for only one class of directors. The equity split would remain the same, but all stock would vote together as a single class, with the Class B stock having 40% of the voting power. Section 1127 permits a plan proponent to modify a plan before confirmation but requires resolicitation of acceptances if the modification adversely changes the treatment of any class of claims or interests. A plan modification is material if it would motivate a creditor to reconsider its prior acceptance, even if it did not change its prior acceptance. Because the provisions governing corporate governance affect the voting rights of the stock the creditors would receive under the plan, the modification is material and requires resolicitation. In re Young Broadcasting Inc., 430 B.R. 99 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 5.4.w Class with a single creditor who does not accept the plan is not a non-accepting class. A creditor purchased all the first lien claims during the chapter 11 case. The court designated the creditor's plan rejection under section 1126(e). A class accepts a plan under section 1126 if the plan is accepted by creditors (other than creditors whose acceptances or rejections are designated) "that hold at least two-thirds in amount and more than one-half in number of the allowed claims of such class held by" creditors whose acceptances or rejections are not designated. If a class does not accept the plan, then the section 1129(b) cram down protections apply, requiring the plan to be fair and equitable as to, and not to discriminate unfairly against, that class. It would be anomalous for a class whose sole creditor's rejection has been designated to be entitled to the same protections to which the class would be entitled if the creditor were permitted to accept the plan but did not. Therefore, section 1129(b) does not apply to a single creditor class whose rejection has been designated. In addition, affirming the court's prior decision in another case, the court determines that if none of the creditors of a class accept or reject the plan, whether by reason of apathy or designation, the class is deemed to accept. In re DBSD N. Am., Inc., 419 B.R. 179 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).
- 5.4.x Court refuses to designate plan proponents' votes under section 1126(e). The chapter 11 trustee and a creditor group settled their disputes over the creditors' claims against the debtor by agreeing to a liquidating plan term sheet. In the term sheet, the settling creditors agreed to accept the plan. The trustee and the creditors, as co-proponents, filed a plan that embodied the settlement, filed and obtained approval of a disclosure statement, and sought confirmation. The creditors accepted the plan. Their acceptances need not be designated under section 1126(e) as having been improperly solicited. First, section 1125(b) does not require "a creditor intending to jointly propose a plan to draft a disclosure statement, get it approved, and then mail it to himself before agreeing to vote for it." Second, direct plan negotiation, even to resolve disputed claims as part of the plan, is not, under section 1125(b), a "solicitation", a term that should be construed narrowly to include only the specific request to accept a plan. Third, the term sheet agreement did not give the trustee a specific performance right against the creditors, so the creditors could have decided not to accept the plan, once they reviewed the disclosure statement. Finally, the creditors were well informed, so vote designation here would not advance section 1125's policy of encouraging information dissemination before solicitation. In re The Heritage Org., 376 B.R. 783 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2007).

- 5.4.y A non-voting class has not “accepted” the plan. None of the creditors holding claims in an impaired class returned plan ballots. Section 1129(a)(8) relieves the debtor of meeting the cram-down requirements for an impaired class that “has accepted the plan”. Section 1126(c) provides that a class “has accepted a plan if such plan has been accepted by creditors ... that hold at least two-thirds in amount and more than one-half in number of the allowed claims of such class” A class in which none of the creditors accept the plan therefore has not “accepted” the plan as contemplated by section 1129(a)(8). In re Vita Corp., 358 B.R. 749 (Bankr. C.D. Ill. 2007).
- 5.4.z Subordination agreement may transfer voting rights. Two creditors agreed in a subordination agreement that the senior creditor could vote the junior creditor’s claim in a bankruptcy. Section 1126(a) permits a claim holder to vote a claim, but section 510(a) makes a subordination agreement “enforceable in a case under this title to the same extent [as] under applicable nonbankruptcy law.” Rules 3018 and 9010 permit an agent or other representative to vote a claim, and section 1126(a) does not explicitly limit prevent a claim holder from delegating or bargaining away the right. Therefore, the junior creditor’s prebankruptcy agreement to permit the senior creditor to vote the claim is enforceable. Blue Ridge Investors, II, LP v. Wachovia Bank, N.A. (In re Aerosol Packaging, LLC), 362 B.R. 43 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2007).
- 5.4.aa Court excludes pre-marked ballots. The creditors committee solicited votes for its plan with a ballot form that the court had approved. Plan opponents sent pre-marked ballots to certain creditors and solicited plan rejections. The pre-marked ballots are improper and may not be counted. A pre-marked ballot implies that the creditor does not have a choice to make. Only a ballot confirming to Official Form 14, with boxes to accept or reject the plan, are acceptable. Bakes v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors, 359 B.R. 831 (S.D. Fla. 2007).
- 5.4.bb Court enjoins misleading plan solicitation. An attorney representing an ad hoc equity committee solicited votes on his website against the plan, using false and misleading statements, such as “there is no downside to shareholders voting ‘no.’” Because he purported to represent a committee and sought compensation from the estate, he was a fiduciary and therefore owes a duty to those he purports to represent to present only truthful information, and he is answerable to the court for breach of the duty. Although reluctant to enjoin commercial speech, the court concludes it is appropriate to do so when the speech is false and misleading. In this case, the grounds for injunctive relief were met: if shareholders followed the attorney’s recommendation, the plan might not be confirmed, causing significant delay and extra expense; there was a probability of success on the merits against his misleading solicitations; balancing the harms, the attorney had an alternative course of action, truthful solicitation; and it was in the public interest to enjoin a misleading solicitation. Official Comm. of Equity Sec. Holders v. The Wilson Law Firm, P.C., 334 B.R. 787 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2005).
- 5.4.cc Creditor holding claim subject to pending objection may not vote on a chapter 11 plan. The creditor had obtained a state court judgment against the debtor and filed a proof of claim in the bankruptcy court for the judgment amount. The debtor in possession expressed an intention to appeal the judgment and filed an objection to the creditor’s claim. Section 1126(a) permits only a holder of an allowed claim to accept or reject a plan. Section 502(a) provides that a filed claim is allowed unless a party in interest objects. Because of the pending objection, the creditor’s claim was not allowed, and the creditor was not entitled to vote. The creditor’s alternative was to seek immediate adjudication of the claims objection or to seek temporary allowance of the claim for voting purposes under Bankruptcy Rule 3018(a). Jacksonville Airport, Inc. v. Mickeldel, Inc., 434 F.3d 729 (4th Cir. 2006).
- 5.4.dd Section 3(a)(9) exemption is not available to amended plan under foreign proceeding. The debtor had commenced an Acuerdo Preventivo Extrajudicial (APE) proceeding under Argentine law and obtained all requisite consents and Argentine court approval. It commenced a section 304 ancillary proceeding in the United States to enforce the plan in the U.S. The plan provided retail holders with less favorable treatment than qualified institutional buyers because offering the QIB treatment to retail holders would have required compliance with the registration requirements of U.S. securities laws. The bankruptcy court required equal treatment as a condition to approval. The debtor amended the plan, obtained a new vote and Argentine court approval, and sought approval of the new plan from the U.S. court. Approval required compliance with U.S. securities laws to permit offering and distribution to U.S. retail holders. Section 3(a)(9) of the Securities Act of 1933 is not available as an exemption for this purpose, because the debtor had compensated its financial advisor for the initial solicitation on an incentive basis, contrary to what section 3(a)(9) permits. Even though the subsequent solicitation did not involve incentive compensation to the financial advisor, it was integrated with the prior solicitation and therefore was not exempt under section 3(a)(9). Argentinian Recovery Co. v. Board of Directors of Multicanal S.A., 331 B.R. 537 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).

- 5.4. ee Prepetition lock-up agreement does not evidence lack of good faith. Before filing chapter 11, the debtor negotiated a lock-up agreement with its principal secured lenders. The agreement provided that the debtor would file chapter 11 and propose a plan containing terms specified in the agreement and that the creditors would provide postpetition financing and support the plan. The plan provided for elimination of equity interests. The debtor's signing the lock-up agreement did not evidence a lack of good faith. Although it limited the debtor's future course of action to seek more recovery for equity, it also provided assurances of postpetition financing and support for a plan. It therefore is proper and does not evidence bad faith that would prevent confirmation. In re Bush Industries, Inc., 315 B.R. 292 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 5.4. ff Section 1129(a)(2) required chapter 11 compliance only by the plan proponent. The major bondholder supported one of two competing plans. Counsel for the bondholder improperly contacted the financial advisor for the unsecured creditors committee. The contact did not constitute a violation of section 1129(a)(2), which requires that the proponent of a plan comply with the applicable provisions of title 11, because the bondholder was not a plan "proponent." In re Greate Bay Hotel & Casino, Inc., 251 B.R. 213 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2000).
- 5.4. gg Prepetition solicitation of consents must be clear. The debtor's prepetition solicitation of consents to a prepackaged chapter 11 plan requested that creditors "consent to and support a plan of reorganization under chapter 11" substantially similar to the exchange offer that was proposed, but the solicitation did not include a proposed plan. Based on these facts, the court held that the votes were not acceptances of a plan but simply an agreement to agree on a plan. As a result, the plan could not be confirmed as a prepackaged chapter 11 plan. In re Pioneer Finance Corp., 246 B.R. 626 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2000).
- 5.4. hh Vote transfer agreement is unenforceable. As part of a subordination agreement, the junior creditor authorized the senior creditor to vote its claim in a chapter 11 case. The agreement was unenforceable as contrary to the expressed language of section 1126 (a), authorizing the holder of a claim to vote. Bank of America, N.A. v. North LaSalle St. Ltd. Partnership (In re 203 N. LaSalle St. Ltd. Partnership), 246 B.R. 325 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2000).
- 5.4. ii Adequacy of prepetition disclosure statement is not governed by section 1125. The debtor submitted its prepetition disclosure statement and solicitation materials to the SEC for review, which declared the registration statement effective. In determining whether the disclosure statement was adequate, the court ruled that section 1126(b), governing prepetition disclosure, rather than section 1125, defining "adequate information," is the standard against which the disclosure statement must be judged. In re Zenith Electronics Corp., 241 B.R. 92 (Bankr. D. Del. 1999).

- 5.4.jj Disclosure statement description of plan amendments not required for plan participants. Where major players in the chapter 11 case were fully informed about plan amendments that directly affected them, failure of the plan proponent to revise the disclosure statement to describe the amendments for the benefit of those participants is not a grounds for objection to the disclosure statement or to confirmation. In re Cajun Electric Power Cooperative, Inc., 230 B.R. 715 (Bankr. M.D. La. 1999).
- 5.4.kk Failure to disclose material information in a disclosure statement may bar discharge. The individual principals of a corporate debtor failed to disclose material financial information in the corporate chapter 11 case. In the individual's subsequent chapter 7 case, the intentional withholding of relevant information in the chapter 11 disclosure statement constituted grounds for denial of discharge under section 727(a)(2). Peterson v. Scott (In re Scott), 172 F.3d 959 (7th Cir. 1999).
- 5.4.ll Purchased claims may be voted against a plan. The Ninth Circuit held that the sole secured creditor of a single asset real estate debtor did not act in bad faith when it purchased and voted a majority of the unsecured claims in order to defeat the debtor's proposed reorganization plan. A creditor is permitted to act with "enlightened self-interest" to preserve what it reasonably believes to be its fair share, as long as it has no ulterior motive. The Ninth Circuit also ruled that purchased claims may be voted separately for the purpose of the numerosity requirement of section 1126(c). Figter Ltd. v. Teachers Insurance and Annuity Association of America (In re Figter Ltd.), 118 F.3d 635 (9th Cir. 1997).
- 5.4.mm Purchasing claim to vote against a plan is not bad faith. The secured creditor in a single asset real estate case offered to purchase all non-insider unsecured claims outside of the plan, acquired the claims, and voted them against the debtor's plan. Absent a showing of an ulterior motive or an attempt to coerce payment for more than its fair share of the debtor's estate, the creditor's votes on the purchased claims would not be designated under section 1126(e) as cast in bad faith. 255 Park Plaza Associates Ltd. Partnership v. Connecticut General Life Insurance Company (In re 255 Park Plaza Associates Ltd. Partnership), 100 F.3d 1214 (6th Cir. 1996).
- 5.4.nn Criminal contempt is an appropriate remedy for disclosure and solicitation violations. A creditor improperly solicited rejections of the small business debtor's plan, suggesting that the creditor's own plan, which would follow denial of confirmation of the debtor's plan, would be a better choice. The district court confirmed a criminal contempt sanction by the bankruptcy judge as a remedy for the violation of Section 1125. Colorado Mountain Express, Inc. v. Aspen Limousine Service, Inc. (In re Colorado Mountain Express, Inc.), 198 B.R. 341 (D. Colo. 1996).
- 5.5 Confirmation, Absolute Priority
- 5.5.a In a solvent case, an unimpaired class of unsecured claims is entitled to postpetition interest at the contract rate. The solvent debtor's plan left unsecured trade claims unimpaired. Section 1124(1) provides that a class of claims is unimpaired only if the plan leaves unaltered the legal, equitable, and contractual rights of the holders of claims in the class. The common law and the Bankruptcy Act recognized a solvent debtor exception to the general rule that unsecured claims do not accrue postpetition interest. The solvent debtor exception is an equitable right of creditors. Therefore, a plan that does not alter a claim's equitable rights preserves the claim's entitlement to postpetition interest in a solvent case. The Code did not abrogate the exception. For an impaired class in a solvent debtor case, the best interest test of section 1129(a)(7) incorporates indirectly the postpetition interest requirement of section 726(a)(5), which provides for interest at the "legal rate," which is the federal judgment rate. Those sections do not apply to an unimpaired class. Therefore, the interest to which claims in an unimpaired class are entitled is interest at the contractual or default (nonbankruptcy statutory) rate, unless compelling equitable considerations require a different rate. Ad Hoc Committee of Holders of Trade Claims v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. (In re Pac. Gas & Elec. Co.), 46 F.4th 1047 (9th Cir. 2022).

- 5.5.b In a solvent case, an unimpaired class of unsecured claims is entitled to postpetition interest at the contract rate. The debtor became solvent during the case. It proposed a plan to leave the class of bond claims unimpaired but to pay the claims only principal, interest accrued at the contract rate to the date of the petition, and postpetition interest at the federal judgment rate. Under section 1124(1), a class of claims is impaired unless the plan leaves unaltered the legal, contractual, and equitable rights of the holders of the claims in the class. Although section 502(b)(2) disallows claims for unmatured postpetition interest, in the absence of a clear Congressional mandate to the contrary, historical precedent imposes a solvent debtor exception to the disallowance of postpetition interest. Here, section 502(b)(2) tracks closely with pre-Code law, section 63 of the Bankruptcy Act, under which the courts enforced a solvent debtor exception. Therefore, it survived the Code's enactment. Because unimpairment requires leaving legal and contractual right unaltered, creditors are entitled to postpetition interest at their contract rate. Ultra Petro. Corp. v. Ad Hoc Comm. (In re Ultra Petro. Corp.), ___ F. 4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 28604 (5th Cir. Oct. 14, 2022).
- 5.5.c Recovery for junior class contingent on post-consummation payment in full of senior class does not violate the fair and equitable rule. The debtor confirmed a cram-down plan that provided for immediate partial distributions to a class of unsecured claims, with contingent later distributions based on litigation recoveries. It provided for distribution to a junior class from litigation recoveries only if the later distributions on the unsecured claims were sufficient to satisfy those claims in full. The unsecured class and the junior class did not accept the plan. Section 1129(b)(2) permits confirmation over a class's nonacceptance of a plan if the plan is fair and equitable to that class by providing that a junior class may not receive or retain any consideration unless the senior class is paid in full. Even though the junior class's contingent recovery right might have some "option" value, the plan's provision that the junior class not receive any recovery until the unsecured class has been paid in full satisfies that requirement. NexPoint Advisors, L.P. v. Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P.), ___ F.4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 23237 (5th Cir. Aug. 19, 2022).
- 5.5.d Backstop commitment fees and plan treatment were reasonable. The debtor searched for financing from multiple sources. Ultimately, it engaged in a mediation with some of its largest unsecured creditors and reached agreement on their financing of a plan. The "Commitment Creditors" agreed to backstop a notes offering in exchange for the right to buy up to 50% of the notes in exchange for discharge of 50% of the amount of their unsecured claims as well as a contribution of approximately 20% of the face value of the notes in cash and for a backstop fee of 20% of the face amount of the notes. The effect was to give them the ability to purchase a disproportionately greater share of the notes than other creditors in the same class. The bankruptcy court determined that the Commitment Creditors were subject to substantial risk in their commitment and that the payments to them were reasonable based on the risk, the value, and backstop fees in other cases. Section 1123(a)(4) requires that holders of claims in the same class receive equal treatment under the plan on account of their claims. Here, any advantage to the Commitment Creditors did not violate the equal treatment requirement because it was in compensation for their commitment and the accompanying risk, not in payment of their claims, and the result of a reasonable search for financing, not an inside deal to favored creditors. Ad Hoc Group of Unsecured Claimants v. LATAM Airlines Group, S.A. (In re LATAM Airlines Group., S.A.), 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 157534 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 31, 2022).
- 5.5.e Mortgagee's failure to participate in chapter 11 case results in plan divesting it of its mortgage. The debtor mortgaged real property and later took out a second loan, which purported to pay off the earlier loan. But the title company erred, and the prior loan was not paid off. The debtor continued to make payments on both loans. Some years later, the debtor filed a chapter 13 case. During the chapter 13 case, the earlier mortgage holder appeared, filed a proof of claim, and ultimately obtained stay relief. The debtor converted the case to chapter 11. During the chapter 11 case, the title company paid the earlier mortgagee, took an assignment of the mortgage, and subordinated it to the later mortgage. The title company did not file a notice of the transfer of the claim. The debtor confirmed a plan that said the earlier mortgage had been satisfied by the later mortgage and that the earlier mortgage would receive nothing under the plan and the mortgage would be released. Although the debtor continued to send notices to the earlier mortgagee, neither the title company nor the earlier mortgagee appeared in connection with plan confirmation. After the debtor received his discharge, the title company sought to enforce the earlier mortgage. Under section 1141(c), property “dealt with” by a plan is free and clear of any claim or lien except as provided in the plan. A court may revoke a confirmation order obtained by fraud only if revocation is requested within 180 days after confirmation. Whether or not the debtor’s treatment of the earlier mortgage in the plan was fraudulent, the title company’s request to avoid the plan’s treatment of its mortgage was too late and was therefore barred. Lack of notice may be a ground for avoiding treatment under the plan, but here, the debtor continued to send notice to the earlier mortgagee, and the title company failed to receive notice only because it did not file a notice of transfer of claim or arrange with the earlier mortgagee for forwarded notices. Accordingly, the title company is deemed to have participated in the case. Stay relief does not remove the property from the estate, so the creditor is not relieved of having to appear and protect its rights. Therefore, the property reverted in the debtor free and clear of the earlier mortgage. Beyha v. Conestoga Title Ins. Co. (In re Beyha), 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 635 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2022).

- 5.5.f Effective date payment may satisfy subchapter V cramdown requirement. The debtor proposed a plan under subchapter V that would make a large payment on the effective date in an amount materially in excess of the debtor’s projected disposable income for the three years after the effective date and would make additional payments from actual disposable income received during the three years after the effective date. The debtor’s major creditor did not accept the plan and objected to confirmation. Section 1191(c)(2) permits nonconsensual plan confirmation if the value of property to be distributed under the plan in the three years after the effective date is not less than the debtors’ projected disposable income over the three-year period. Because the effective date payment is greater than the present value of the debtor’s post-effective date projected disposable income, the plan satisfies section 1191(c)(2) and is properly confirmed. Legal Service Bureau, Inc. v. Orange County Bail Bonds, Inc. (In re Orange County Bail Bonds, Inc.), 638 B.R. 137 (9th Cir. B.A.P. Apr. 27, 2022)
- 5.5.g Unfair discrimination may be measured against a baseline entitlement recovery amount. The debtors comprised over 60 related entities. Most creditors’ claims were against only a few entities, but a class of unsecured notes claims were guaranteed by nearly all entities. The plan provided for a distribution to the notes class of about 90%, which was less than the claims’ full entitlement based on the debtors’ value, and distribution of substantially lower percentages to seven other unsecured claims classes. The baseline entitlements of many of the seven other classes was zero, but the plan provided for recoveries to those classes derived from the value the notes class was foregoing. Those classes did not accept the plan. Section 1129(b) permits confirmation over the nonacceptance of one or more classes if the plan is fair and equitable to and does not discriminate unfairly against the nonaccepting classes. Unfair discrimination can be measured by relative recoveries between similar priority classes or by comparison of the plan recovery to a hypothetical baseline recovery under the absolute priority rule. Because the nonaccepting classes were receiving a recovery in excess of their baseline amounts as a result of the notes class’s acceptance of less than its full absolute priority entitlement, the plan does not discriminate unfairly and may be confirmed. In re Mallinckrodt PLC, ___ B.R. ___, Case No. 20-12522 (Bankr. D. Del. Feb. 3, 2022).
- 5.5.h In an individual subchapter V case, good faith does not require best efforts. The debtor was a high income individual. He proposed a plan that would pay unsecured claims 7.5% over three years. The class of unsecured claims accepted the plan, but one creditor objected to confirmation on good faith grounds. Section 1129(a)(3) requires as a condition to confirmation that the plan be proposed in good faith. Good faith includes pursuing a result that is consistent with the Code's objective and purposes, including preserving going concern value, maximizing property available to creditors, the fresh start, deterring misconduct, expeditious resolution, and achieving fundamental fairness and justice. Thus, courts analyze good faith based on the totality of the circumstances but construe the requirement narrowly to prevent the requirement from importing a judge's subjective moral judgments into the force of law. Confirmation denial should be reserved for egregious cases. The class's acceptance of the plan is important in evaluating good faith. Here, though the debtor might have been able to pay more, the debtor was not taking advantage of the system and did not go overboard in his lifestyle. Given that creditors accepted the plan, the court finds it was proposed in good faith. In re Walker, 628 B.R. 9 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2021).

- 5.5.i Court may confirm cramdown plan without enforcing a subordination agreement. The plan classified senior unsecured claims that benefitted from a subordination agreement in one class and other general unsecured claims in another class. The general class included some claims that also benefitted from the subordination agreement. The plan provided for the same 33.6% recovery for claims in both classes. Without the benefit of subordination, claims in both classes would have recovered 21.9% of their claims, and with full enforcement of the subordination provision as to the senior class and the senior creditor in the general class, the senior class claims would have recovered 34.5%, the senior claim in the general class would have recovered 36.9%, and the general claims would have recovered 21.9%. The general class accepted the plan; the senior class did not. Section 1129(b) permits nonconsensual plan confirmation if, "Notwithstanding section 510(a)," the plan "does not discriminate unfairly" and is fair and equitable with respect to the nonaccepting class. Section 510(a) requires the court to enforce subordination agreements. "Notwithstanding" means "in spite of" or "without obstruction or prevention by." Therefore, section 1129(b) permits nonconsensual plan confirmation despite the non-enforcement of a subordination agreement. The senior creditors' protections are found in the fair and equitable rule and the unfair discrimination provision. Therefore, the failure to enforce the subordination agreement strictly does not prevent plan confirmation. In re Tribune Co., 972 F.3d 228 (3d Cir. 2020).
- 5.5.j Third Circuit explains "unfair discrimination." The plan classified senior unsecured claims that benefitted from a subordination agreement in one class and other general unsecured claims in another class. The general class included some claims that also benefitted from the subordination agreement. The plan provided for the same 33.6% recovery for claims in both classes. Without the benefit of subordination, claims in both classes would have recovered 21.9% of their claims, and with full enforcement of the subordination provision as to the senior class and the senior creditor in the general class, the senior class claims would have recovered 34.5%, the senior claim in the general class would have recovered 36.9%, and the general claims would have recovered 21.9%. The general class accepted the plan; the senior class did not. Section 1129(b) permits nonconsensual plan confirmation if, "Notwithstanding section 510(a)," the plan "does not discriminate unfairly" and is fair and equitable with respect to the nonaccepting class. A plan may discriminate against a nonaccepting class, but not so much as to be unfair from the perspective of the nonaccepting class. Testing for unfairness requires analysis of the net present value of recoveries, based on a full pro rata recovery to all similarly situated creditors. A plan discriminates unfairly if there is a materially lower percentage recovery to the nonaccepting class. In this case, a difference in recovery of 0.9% is not material. The court properly confirmed the plan. In re Tribune Co., 972 F.3d 228 (3d Cir. Aug. 26, 2020).
- 5.5.k DIP financing provision that commits debtor to issue plan equity at a discount does not violate absolute priority but is an impermissible sub rosa plan. The debtor in possession arranged multi-tranche DIP financing. Only major shareholders subscribed to tranche C. The tranche C agreement permitted the debtor to repay it in cash or in stock, at a 20% discount to plan value, through a rights offering that would be made available to non-lender shareholders, though not at a discount. The debtor marketed the facility but found no takers on better terms.

The absolute priority rule applies to confirmation of a nonconsensual plan but not necessarily at other stages of a case. However, because approval of the DIP agreement would foreclose later challenge to applying the loan terms to a plan, the court considers whether the agreement violates the absolute priority rule. The rule prohibits shareholders from receiving or retaining any property under the plan if creditors receive less than full compensation and have not accepted the plan. Here, the shareholders would be receiving property—reorganized company stock—and are being given the opportunity to participate in the tranche C loan because they are shareholders. Therefore, they are receiving property on account of their existing shares. The new value exception to the absolute priority rule permits receipt of property under the plan on account of money of equivalent value invested in the debtor that is necessary for a successful reorganization. Determining whether the plan distribution is equivalent in value to the new money requires a market test. The marketing of the tranche C loan satisfied that test, so the provision satisfies the new value exception to the absolute priority rule. However, a debtor may not enter into a transaction that would circumvent chapter 11's plan confirmation requirements by dictating some of the plan terms in advance. Because the provision fixes some of the terms of a plan that has not yet been filed, it crosses the line as a sub rosa plan and may not be approved. In re LATAM Airlines Group S.A., ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 2405 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Sept. 10, 2020).

- 5.5.i Any form of collateral sale disqualifies a section 1111(b) election. A creditor's claim was secured by specified equipment that was part of a larger business operation. The claim was undersecured. The debtor proposed a plan that provided for a sale of the operation. Because the sale procedures order permitted sales only for the entire operation, the secured creditor was not able to credit bid its claim for its collateral. The winning bid was made by a combination of the debtor's other secured creditors and a newly formed entity that included some of the debtor's equity holders. After the selection of the winning bid, the creditor elected to have its entire claims treated as secured under section 1111(b). Section 1111(b) permits an undersecured creditor to have its entire claim treated as secured, despite section 506(a), unless its collateral is sold under section 363 or under a plan. Section 1111(b) does not limit the kind of sale or plan, such as a sale that looks like an internal reorganization, to which the exception applies. Therefore, the court disqualifies the election. In re Murray Metallurgical Coal Holdings, LLC, 618 B.R. 825 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2020).
- 5.5.m Shareholder's option to purchase stock given to unsecured creditors is subject to absolute priority rule. The debtor proposed a plan that the general unsecured creditors did not accept. The plan provided that if the creditors did not accept, they would receive 100% of the reorganized debtor's stock, but the stock would be subject to an irrevocable option in the debtor's sole prepetition stockholder to purchase the stock from the creditors. Under the absolute priority rule, the court may not confirm a plan that a class of creditors has not accepted unless it provides for no distribution on account of prepetition equity. The option is consideration to the shareholder and therefore is subject to the absolute priority rule. In re Green Pharms., Inc., 617 B.R. 131 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2020).
- 5.5.n Dirt-for-debt plan requires valuation to account for time to sell and for risk. The debtor's plan proposed to transfer unencumbered real estate to a secured creditor in satisfaction of a portion of the creditor's claim. The creditor did not accept the plan. Section 1129(b)(2)(A) requires as a condition to cram down that the creditor receive cash payments, sale proceeds (with a right to credit bid), or the indubitable equivalent of the creditor's claim. When valuing real estate to determine the extent to which it constitutes the indubitable equivalent, the court must take into account the time to sell the property and any associated costs of sale. Here, the court did not do so. Moreover, because the plan deems the creditor's claim satisfied to the extent of the court-determined value, the creditor assumes the risk of receiving less on sale of the property than the court determines and is then unable to look to remaining collateral to make up any difference. Therefore, the plan does not provide the indubitable equivalent of the creditor's claim. Havasu

- 5.5.o Subchapter V permits modification of a purchase-money mortgage on a bed and breakfast where the debtor resides. The individual debtor purchased a historic home, which she used for her residence and as a bed and breakfast under a local ordinance that permitted short-stay rentals only if the owner also resided in the property. In October 2018, on the eve of foreclosure by the mortgage lender, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case, listing her debts as primarily consumer debts, and did not designate her case as a small business. Her debts included about $1.6 million on the mortgage and about $65,000 of general unsecured debts. After numerous cash collateral and preliminary plan proceedings, the court set deadlines for filing plans. The lender filed a plan that provided for foreclosure on the property. On the eve of the confirmation hearing, the debtor moved to amend her petition to designate her case as a small business case and to elect to proceed under new subchapter V, added by the Small Business Reorganization Act (SBRA), which became effective a week before the scheduled confirmation hearing. The debtor could propose a confirmable plan only if she could modify the mortgage. Section 1123(a)(5) prohibits modification of a mortgage secured only by the debtor's principal residence. However, section 1190(3), in subchapter V, permits modification of a mortgage on the debtor's principal residence notwithstanding section 1123(a)(5) if the mortgage proceeds were not used primarily to acquire the property and the property is used primarily in connection with the debtor's business. In determining whether this provision applies, a court should determine whether the mortgage proceeds were used primarily to further the debtor's business interest, the property is an integral part of the business and is necessary to run the business, and customers enter the property to conduct business. Here, the debtor did not purchase a residence in which she used a part as an office but rather bought the property as a business and also resided there. The property's primary purpose is to rent rooms, even though the town requires that she live there as a condition to her permit. Therefore, section 1190(3) applies and permits modification of the mortgage. In re Ventura, ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 985 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. Apr. 10, 2020).
- 5.5.p Extra compensation for a back-stop agreement does not violate the equal treatment requirement. Through a mediation with its major creditors, the debtor developed a plan that provided for a common stock rights offering and a preferred stock private placement at a 35% discount to plan equity value. In phase one, the creditors participating in the mediation were given the exclusive right to purchase 22.5% of the preferred stock but had to backstop the sale of the remaining 77.5%. In phase two, other creditors in the same class were given three days' notice to elect to purchase 5% of the preferred stock, at the same discount, but also had to backstop the sale of the remaining 72.5% of the preferred stock. In phase three, remaining creditors in the same class could elect to purchase preferred stock at the same discounted price. A small group of creditors did not participate and objected to confirmation. Section 1123(a)(4) requires a plan to provide equal treatment of all claims within a class. Extra compensation for legitimate rights or contributions other than satisfaction of the claims within the class does not violate the equal treatment requirement. Here, the opportunity to participate was consideration for the backstop agreement, not treatment for prepetition claims. Therefore, the court overrules the objection. Ad Hoc Comm. of Non-Consenting Creditors v. Peabody Energy Corp. (In re Peabody Energy Corp.), 933 F.3d 918 (8th Cir. 2019).
- 5.5.q Section 1129(a)(3) applies only to the means by which the plan is proposed, not the plan's substantive provisions. The debtor leased property to a marijuana establishment, which operated in compliance with state law but not federal law. The debtor proposed a plan that paid all creditors in full. The plan contemplated retention of the lease and the use of rent paid under the lease as part of the plan. The U.S. trustee objected to confirmation on the ground that the property's use violated federal law. Section 1129(a)(3) requires as a condition to confirmation that the plan "be proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law." By its express terms, the provision addresses only the means by which the plan is proposed, not the substantive terms of the plan or of the debtor's postconfirmation activities. Therefore, the court overrules the objection. Garvin v. Cook Invs. NY, SPNWDY, LLC, 922 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 2019).

- 5.5.r A plan does not impair a class of claims when the Code, not the plan, disallows the claims. The debtor became solvent during the case because of rising commodity prices. It proposed a plan that provided for payment in cash in full of the principal owing on its notes, excluding postpetition interest and a make-whole amount. A class of claims is impaired unless the plan does not alter its legal, equitable or contractual rights. Section 502(b)(2) disallows claims for postpetition interest. Because the Code, not the plan, disallows the postpetition interest claim, the class is not impaired. Section 1141(d) discharges the debtor upon plan confirmation, including for unpaid postpetition interest, but still the Code, not the plan, does the work. Ultra Petroleum Corp. v. Ad Hoc Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Ultra Petroleum Corp.), ___ F.3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 1617 (5th Cir. Jan. 17, 2019).
- 5.5.s Horizontal gifting is not necessarily unfair discrimination. The debtor's value was insufficient to satisfy claims secured by a blanket security interest on all the debtor's assets. Under the plan, secured creditors permitted payment in full of trade and operations litigation claims and a 5% recovery on unsecured note claims. The class of unsecured note claims did not accept the plan, and one noteholder appealed, claiming unfair discrimination as compared to the treatment of the trade and litigation claims. Section 1129(b)(1) permits the court to confirm a plan that has not been accepted by all classes if the plan is fair and equitable to and does not discriminate unfairly against the nonaccepting class. A plan discriminates between two classes when the claims in the classes have the same priority and receive a materially different percentage recovery. Whether the discrimination is unfair is determined only from the perspective of the nonaccepting class. Here, because the nonaccepting note claims class would not have been entitled to any recovery, its low recovery compared to the trade claims class' recovery resulted only from the senior class' "gift" to the trade claims class. Where the disparate treatment results only from such a horizontal (not a class-skipping) gift, the resulting discrimination is not unfair and also does not implicate the absolute priority rule. Separate classification is proper if there is a rational legal or factual basis for it. Here, protecting trade creditors who would continue to do business with the reorganized debtor provided such a basis. In addition, the voting interests of note holders and trade creditors differ and support separate classification. Therefore, the separate classification does not result in unfair discrimination. Hargreaves v. Nuverra Env'tl Solutions, Inc. (In re Nuverra Env'tl Solutions, Inc.), 590 B.R. 75 (D. Del. 2018).
- 5.5.t Section 510(a) subordination clause enforcement does not apply in a cram down plan. The debtor's senior debt benefitted from a subordination clause in the debtor's subordinated debt instruments. The plan, which the senior debt class did not accept, provided for distribution to the senior debt class of 33.6% of its claims. Had the subordination clause been enforced literally, the senior claims would have recovered 35.9%. Section 510(a) requires the court to enforce a subordination agreement. Section 1129(b)(1) permits the court to confirm a plan that has not been accepted by one or more classes, "notwithstanding section 510(a)," if the plan is fair and equitable to, and does not discriminate unfairly against, the nonaccepting class. The "notwithstanding" clause renders section 510(a) inapplicable in a cram down. Accordingly, the court may confirm the plan even without the strict enforcement of the subordination agreement, as long as the plan is fair and equitable and does not discriminate unfairly. Under the so-called Markell test, unfair discrimination occurs against a nonaccepting class when another class with claims of the same priority receives a materially higher percentage recovery or a distribution with a materially lower risk. Here, the potential difference in distribution to the nonaccepting class was at most 2.3%, which is not material. Therefore, the court may confirm the plan. Law Debenture Trust Co. v. Tribune Media Co. (In re Tribune Media Co.), 587 B.R. 606 (D. Del. 2018).
- 5.5.u Section 1129(a)(10) requires one accepting class per plan, not per debtor. The debtor comprised two operating hotel entities, two mezzanine entities, and a holding company. The operating debtors' lender purchased the mezzanine debtors' loans. The debtor proposed a plan to sell the hotels to a third party and to restructure the operating debtors' loan. Creditor classes of the operating debtors accepted the plan, but no mezzanine debtor creditor classes did. Section 1129(a)(10) requires as a confirmation condition that "at least one class of claims that is impaired under the plan has accepted the plan." The statute refers to only one plan, so under its plain language, acceptance of the plan by a single class suffices, even if the plan covers more than one debtor. The rule of construction that "the singular includes the plural" does not change the result, as applying the rule would result in construing the condition as "at least one class of claims that is impaired under the plans has accepted the plans," and the per-plan approach is consistent with this reading as well. In the bankruptcy court, the lender had waived any argument, which it raised on appeal, that the per-plan approach effected a de facto substantive consolidation of the estates, so the court did not consider that, although a concurrence opined that consolidation should change the analysis. JPMCC 2007-C1 Grasslawn Lodging, LLC v. Transwest Resort Props. Inc. (In re Transwest Resort Props. Inc.), 881 F.3d 724 (9th Cir. 2018).

- 5.5.v Partial dirt-for-debt plan may meet "indubitable equivalent" cram down standard. The bankruptcy court confirmed a cram down partial dirt-for-debt plan that valued the surrendered land as sufficient to pay the remaining balance of the secured lender's claim. Section 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii) permits confirmation over a secured creditor class's rejection if the plan provides for distribution of the indubitable equivalent of the secured claim. The inherent uncertainty of valuations do not require a full collateral surrender to satisfy section 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii); a plan may provide for surrender of some of the collateral at the valuation the bankruptcy court determines. Here, the bankruptcy court determined the value, which was adequate, with an additional cash payment, to satisfy the lender's claim, so confirmation was proper. Bate Land Co. v. Bate Land & Timber LLC (In re Bate Land & Timber LLC), 877 F.3d 188 (4th Cir. 2017).
- 5.5.w In chapter 11, the court should use market rate, if available, for cram down notes. Using the "formula" approach adopted by the plurality in Till v. SCS Credit Corp., 541 U.S. 465 (2004), the bankruptcy court confirmed a plan, over the lenders' rejection, that provided for issuance of new notes to the senior lenders with an interest rate based on a risk free rate plus an adjustment for risk. Under section 1129(b)(2)(A), non-consensual confirmation requires the plan to provide for deferred cash payments with a value equal to the allowed amount of the secured claim. The value of deferred cash payments is based on the interest rate provided in the new notes. To achieve par value, the interest rate should be a market rate. Till involved a chapter 13 case, and the plurality opinion suggested the means of determining a proper interest rate in a chapter 11 case might differ, because a market might exist for business debtors' notes, unlike for a chapter 13 debtor's note. Therefore, if there is a market rate the court can determine, it should use that rate rather than the formula rate. The court remands for consideration of a market rate. Apollo Global Mgmt., LLC v. BOKF, NA (In re MPM Silicones, L.L.C.), 874 F.3d 787 (2d Cir. 2017).
- 5.5.x Section 506(a) requires use in a plan of replacement value based on debtor's proposed use, even if lower than foreclosure value. The debtor developed an affordable housing project. HUD guaranteed its $8.5 million first mortgage loan but imposed restrictions to require the project be used for affordable housing. The debtor obtained second and third mortgage loans from local and state governments, which imposed similar restrictions. The deed noted the restrictions, and they "ran with the land," but they also provided that a senior mortgagee's foreclosure sale would pass title free of the restrictions. After default, HUD paid the first mortgage lender, acquired the loan and sold the loan without the deed restrictions. The loan buyer began foreclosure proceedings, but the debtor stayed them with a chapter 11 petition. The debtor proposed a reorganization plan based on a new investment of $1.2 million from an unrelated third party. The bankruptcy court valued the property at $3.9 million with the restrictions. Evidence suggested the value without the restrictions would be about $7.5 million. Section 506(a) requires the court to value property based on the proposed use or disposition of the property. Associates Commercial Corporation v. Rash, 520 U.S. 953 (1997), requires use of replacement or going concern value rather than foreclosure value, which is typically lower, if the debtor retains and uses the property under the plan. Here, value is measured by the replacement value of an affordable housing project with restrictions, which the bankruptcy court found to be $3.9 million, rather than the value at a foreclosure, which the reorganization is intended to prevent. First Southern Nat'l Bank v. Sunnyslope Housing Ltd. P'shp (In re Sunnyslope Housing Ltd. P'shp), ___ F.3d ___, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 11257 (9th Cir. June 23, 2017) (en banc).

- 5.5.y Section 1111(b) does not apply after the collateral is sold. The secured creditor held a junior non-recourse mortgage on real estate. In the debtor's chapter 11 case, the senior secured mortgage creditor obtained stay relief and foreclosed. The foreclosure sale price exceeded the senior mortgage amount but was inadequate to pay the junior mortgage in full. The junior mortgage creditor filed a proof of claim for the balance. Section 1111(b) treats the holder of a nonrecourse claim that is secured by property of the estate under section 502 the same as if the creditor had recourse unless the creditor's class makes the section 1111(b)(2) election or the property is sold under section 363 or under the plan. Although section 502 requires the court to determine a claim as of the petition date, section 1111(b) operates only on collateral that is property of the estate, and it cannot apply if the lien does not exist. Therefore, if the collateral is no longer property of the estate, section 1111(b) ceases to apply to provide the nonrecourse creditor an allowable unsecured recourse claim. Mastan v. Salamon (In re Salamon), 854 F.3d 633 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 5.5.z Court approves substantive consolidation for plan purposes over guaranteed creditor's objection. The debtor and its subsidiaries operated a single business as a single economic unit under a single business plan, under single control from a single shared headquarters. They shared overhead, management, accounting, and other back office functions, used a consolidated cash management system, and prepared and published consolidated financial statements and filed a consolidated tax return. They had significant intercompany obligations, which would have taken time and expense to reconcile. Any delay in exiting from chapter 11 would have worsened their business problems and made recovery more difficult. The parent debtor guaranteed the subsidiary debtor's obligations. The debtors proposed a plan that substantively consolidated the estates only for plan distribution and claims allowance purposes, eliminating any double claims from guarantees. A court may substantively consolidate if creditors dealt with the entities as a single economic unit and did not rely on their separate identity in extending credit or the debtors' affairs are so entangled that consolidation will benefit all creditors. Here, the consolidated operations, finances, and financial statements suggest creditors dealt with the entities as a single unit, and consolidation benefits creditors because it accelerates the debtors' exit from bankruptcy. In re Republic Airways Holdings Inc., 565 B.R. 710 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 5.5.aa Court issues plan injunction to protect city from employees' mandatory indemnification claims for civil rights violations. The chapter 9 debtor was subject to numerous civil rights claims under 28 U.S.C. 1983, arising from the city's police officers' actions. State law requires the city to indemnify the officers for their costs of defense and any liability. The debtor proposed a plan under which general unsecured creditors, including the civil rights claims, would receive 1% on their allowed claims. The plan also enjoined the claimants from pursuing their claims against the police officers, whom the city would have had to indemnify. The city could not afford to pay more without impairing its ability to perform under its fiscal recovery plan. Under Ninth Circuit case law, section 524(e) prohibits third party releases and injunctions. However, section 524(e) does not apply in a chapter 9 case. The court has jurisdiction to address the claimants' claims against the police officers, because their claims give rise to indemnification obligations, which would affect the city and the chapter 9 case. Section 105(a) gives the court authority to issue the injunction to carry out the provisions of chapter 9 and of the plan if three conditions are met: the injunction is express, an integral part of the plan, and supported by specific factual findings regarding its necessity to the city's effective and efficient functioning, revitalization, or plan success. Here, the plan injunction was express and integral to the plan, because without it, the city effectively would have continued to be liable, albeit indirectly, to the claimants, which the city could not afford. In re City of San Bernardino, Calif., 566 B.R. 46 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2017).

- 5.5.bb Section 1123(d) requires cure payment to include interest at the default rate. The debtor defaulted on a mortgage loan, which provided for an increased interest rate after a default. It filed a chapter 11 case and proposed a plan that would sell the mortgaged property and cure the default by paying the accelerated amount of the loan and interest to date of payment at the nondefault rate. In re Entz-White Lumber & Supply, Inc., 850 F.2d 1338 (9th Cir. 1988), held that section 1123(a)(5), which permitted cure under a plan, permitted the debtor to avoid all consequences of a default and therefore to pay interest at the nondefault rate. Congress later added section 1123(d), which provides “the amount necessary to cure the default shall be determined in accordance with the underlying agreement and nonbankruptcy law.” Section 1123(d) reverses Entz-White by requiring payment in accordance with the agreement and nonbankruptcy law, rather than based on a bankruptcy-based definition of “cure.” Here, the agreement and nonbankruptcy law required payment of the default rate interest to cure the default. Pacifica L 5 LLC v. New Invs. Inc. (In re New Invs. Inc.), 840 F.3d 1137 (9th Cir. 2016).
- 5.5.cc “Impaired accepting class” requirement applies on a per-plan basis. The administratively consolidated debtors comprised a holding company, two mezzanine borrower holding companies and two operating subsidiaries that each owned real estate. The operating debtors had issued notes secured by mortgages on their real property; the mezzanine debtors had issued notes secured by their interests in the operating debtors. The real estate’s value was less than the mortgage debt. The debtors proposed a plan that crammed down the mortgage and mezzanine lenders, neither of whom accepted the plan, but other classes of creditors accepted the plan. The mezzanine lenders were the sole creditors of the mezzanine debtors. Section 1129(a)(10) permits confirmation of a plan that impairs at least one class of claims only if “at least one class of claims that is impaired under the plan has accepted the plan.” Because section 1129(a)(10) refers to acceptance by a class that is impaired “under the plan,” it applies on a per-plan basis, not on a per-debtor basis. JPMCC 2007-C1 Grasslawn Lodging, LLC v. Transwest Resort Props., Inc. (In re Transwest Resort Props., Inc.), 554 B.R. 894 (D. Ariz. 2016).
- 5.5.dd Secured cram-down note does not require a due-on-sale clause. The debtors comprised a holding company, two mezzanine borrower holding companies and two operating subsidiaries that each owned real estate. The operating debtors had issued notes secured by mortgages on their real property; the mezzanine debtors had issued notes secured by their interests in the operating debtors. The real estate’s value was less than the mortgage debt. The lenders made the section 1111(b) election. The debtors proposed a plan that crammed down the mortgage and mezzanine lenders with a 21-year bullet maturity note with a present value equal to the stipulated value of the real property and with a due-on-sale clause that did not apply from years five to fifteen after issuance. The absence of a due-on-sale clause during that ten-year period does not affect the present value of the note, and nothing in section 1129(b) requires a due-on-sale clause. Therefore, the note complies with that section’s cram-down requirements. JPMCC 2007-C1 Grasslawn Lodging, LLC v. Transwest Resort Props., Inc. (In re Transwest Resort Props., Inc.), 554 B.R. 894 (D. Ariz. 2016).
- 5.5.ee Trust Indenture Act permits a foreclosure restructuring transaction that deprives note holders of the practical (but not legal) right to payment. The debtor, worth about $1.0 billion, had issued $1.3 billion in secured debt and $200 million in unsecured notes. The debtor’s arguably-solvent parent guaranteed the unsecured notes. The notes indenture released the guarantee automatically upon a majority vote of noteholders or a release of a parent guarantee of the secured notes. The debtor was unable to pay all interest and principal on the debts as they became due, but a bankruptcy filing would have rendered it ineligible for federal programs that provided the majority of its revenue. It initiated restructuring negotiations with its secured debt holders. Before concluding a restructuring deal, the secured debt holders agreed to an interim extension of some obligations and received a parent guarantee. Further negotiations resulted in a complete restructuring agreement under which the secured debt holders would release the parent guarantee, foreclose on their security interest under Article 9, bid in their claims, and, upon acquiring the assets, sell them back to a new subsidiary of the parent, which would purchase them by issuing debt and equity to secured debt holders and equity to consenting unsecured note holders. Section 316(b) of the Trust Indenture Act provides a note holder's right to receive payment of principal and interest or to bring suit for enforcement of payment "shall not be impaired or affected" without the holder's consent. The indenture contained an identical prohibition. The TIA's purpose is to prevent nonconsensual modification of payment rights by contract through a collective action clause. It is not intended to prevent a restructuring transaction through a foreclosure, which was a common restructuring technique when Congress adopted the TIA. A broader reading that prohibited transactions that affected the practical, but not the legal, right to payment based on whether the transaction was intended as an involuntary debt restructuring would create uncertainty in the application of section 316(b), depriving the system of needed uniformity for this boilerplate provision. Because the transaction did not alter the note holders' legal right to payment, it did not violate the TIA's involuntary modification prohibition. A strong dissent argues otherwise, based on its view of the statute's plain language, claiming that the decision permits an issuer to accomplish indirectly what the statute prohibits it from accomplishing directly. Marblegate Asset Mgmt., LLC v. Educ. Mgmt. Fin. Corp., 846 F.3d 1 (2d Cir. 2017).

- 5.5.ff Secured-for-unsecured bond exchange offer does not violate the Trust Indenture Act. The bond issuer offered its qualified institutional buyers (QIBs) an exchange of its unsecured notes for secured notes in a reduced face amount. Many QIBs accepted. Two non-QIBs brought a class action to enjoin the exchange and for damages, claiming that their claims were subordinated and would fare worse if the issuer filed bankruptcy. Article III standing requires an injury in fact that is concrete and particularized and actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical, that is fairly traceable to the defendant's actions and will likely be redressed by a favorable decision. Injury that might happen from a future bankruptcy is hypothetical, not actual, and does not give the plaintiffs standing. Section 316(b) of the Trust Indenture Act protects a bondholder's right to receive payment of principal and interest on the bonds when due. The provision protects minority bondholders from majority holders' collusively agreeing to modify the bonds' payment terms. Courts have interpreted the provision broadly to prohibit an exchange offer only where the exchange effects an out-of-court quasi-bankruptcy reorganization by transferring assets or removing or materially modifying an affiliate guarantee or a security interest. The proposed exchange here does neither and is therefore not prohibited by the TIA. The court also dismisses claims for breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing arising from the indenture's "equal treatment" provision and a claim for unjust enrichment. Waxman v. Cliffs Natural Res. Inc., 222 F. Supp. 3d 281 (S.D.N.Y. 2016).
- 5.5.gg Artificial impairment constitutes bad faith. The debtor owned a single apartment building subject to an undersecured $8.6 million mortgage. Its only other creditors were its former lawyer and accountant, owed a total of $2,400. The secured lender offered to pay them in cash in full, but both refused payment. Its plan proposed payment of the "minor creditors" over 60 days, on the grounds that its cash flow could not safely pay them off on the effective date, even though its projections showed over $71,000 net income per month. The secured creditor did not accept the plan and objected to confirmation. The minor creditors class accepted. Section 1124(1) provides that a class is impaired if the plan alters the holders' legal, equitable, or contractual rights. Section 1124 does not consider motive, only result. Section 1129(a)(3) requires as a confirmation condition that a plan be proposed in good faith. A court should examine motive under section 1129(a)(3), not section 1124. Here, the debtor's inconsistent position on its payment ability, the minor creditors' refusal to accept full payment immediately from the secured creditors and their close relationship with the debtor support a finding that the artificial impairment was "an artifice to circumvent the purposes of section 1129(a)(10) (one impaired accepting class) and that the debtor did not propose the plan in good faith. Village Green I, GP v. Fed. Nat'l Mortgage Assoc. (In re Village Green I, GP), 811 F.3d 816 (6th Cir. 2016).

- 5.5.hh Section 506(a) requires use in a plan of foreclosure value if higher than the value under the debtor's proposed use. The debtor developed an affordable housing project. HUD guaranteed its $8.5 million first mortgage loan but imposed restrictions to require the project be used for affordable housing. The debtor obtained second and third mortgage loans from local and state governments, which imposed similar restrictions. The deed noted the restrictions, and they "ran with the land," but they also provided that a senior mortgagee's foreclosure sale would pass title free of the restrictions. After default, HUD paid the first mortgage lender, acquired the loan and sold the loan without the deed restrictions. The loan buyer began foreclosure proceedings, but the debtor stayed them with a chapter 11 petition. The debtor proposed a reorganization plan based on a new investment of $1.2 million from an unrelated third party. The bankruptcy court valued the property at $3.9 million with the restrictions. Evidence suggested the value without the restrictions would be about $7.5 million. Section 506(a) requires the court to value property based on the proposed use or disposition of the property. Associates Commercial Corporation v. Rash, 520 U.S. 953 (1997), requires use of replacement or going concern value rather than foreclosure value, which is typically lower, if the debtor retains and uses the property under the plan. Rash interpreted "use" to mean the alternative to "surrender;" it did not suggest that the debtor's voluntary restrictions on post-reorganization use should limit the property's valuation. In addition, here, use value is less than foreclosure value and substantially less than replacement value. For these reasons, the court should value the property free of the restrictions that would be released upon foreclosure and should therefore deny confirmation based on the lower restricted use value. First Southern Nat'l Bank v. Sunnyslope Housing Ltd. P'shp (In re Sunnyslope Housing Ltd. P'shp), 818 F.3d 937; motion for reh'g en banc granted, 838 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2016).
- 5.5.ii Plan that uses "rising tide" distribution method does not meet section 1129 confirmation requirements. The debtor conducted a Ponzi scheme. The trustee proposed a plan that allowed all Ponzi investors' claims that had not already been allowed by settlement or judgment at their net investment amounts (cash invested minus actual prepetition distributions, whether or not characterized as return of principal) and placed all those claims in the same class. The plan proposed a "rising tide" distribution formula for claims in that class: creditors would recover the same percentage of their original investments with the debtor regardless of when they received payments, whether prepetition by return of principal or under the plan. Three Ponzi investors rejected the plan, and the Creditors Committee objected to confirmation. Section 1123(a)(4) requires that a plan provide equal treatment for all claims in a class, unless a holder accepts a less favorable treatment. Treatment is equal based on the allowed claim amount and whether the distribution is under the plan. Equalizing based on prepetition distributions does not satisfy the requirement. Section 1129(a)(7) requires that each creditor receive or retain under the plan at least as much as the creditor would receive or retain in a chapter 7 case on account of its allowed claim. A creditor with a net investment loss who received more prepetition than the "tide level" would receive nothing under a rising tide plan but would receive a distribution in a chapter 7 case, and what the creditor "retains" in its prepetition distribution is not on account of its allowed claim. Therefore, the rising tide plan does not satisfy the liquidation value test for any non-accepting creditor. Accordingly, the court denies confirmation. In re The Vaughn Co., Realtors, 543 B.R. 325 (Bankr. D.N.M. 2015).
- 5.5.jj Court may award postpetition interest to an unimpaired unsecured class in a solvent case under the court's equitable powers. The debtor had issued unsecured notes that were not guaranteed by its parent corporation. Its parent was also in bankruptcy in a jointly administered case with the debtor. The joint plan provided that the class of note claims was unimpaired and would receive payment in cash in full in an amount equal to the allowed claim plus postpetition interest to the extent the court allowed and for the payment in cash in full of claims against the parent, i.e., the debtor was solvent. The debtor in possession objected to the allowance of claims for postpetition interest. Section 502(b)(2) disallows any claim for postpetition interest. Section 1129(a)(7) requires payment under a plan of an amount at least equal to the amount the claim would receive in a liquidation case; section 726(a)(5) requires payment in a solvent liquidation case of interest at the legal rate, which is the federal judgment rate. But section 1129(a)(7) applies only to an impaired class. Similarly, the fair and equitable rule of section 1129(b) applies only to a nonaccepting impaired class, but in any event, it requires only payment of unsecured claims' allowed amount or that no junior class receive or retain any consideration under the plan. A class is unimpaired under section 1124(1) if the plan does not alter the legal, equitable, or contractual rights of the holders of claims in the class. Under former section 1124(3), a class whose claims received full payment in their allowed amounts was not impaired, but Congress deleted that paragraph in 1994 to overrule a case that interpreted it to treat as unimpaired a class whose claims did not receive postpetition interest. Because section 502(b)(2) disallows postpetition interest, a plan that does not provide for payment of postpetition contract rate interest does not alter the holders' legal or contractual rights: the statute, not the plan, alters their rights. However, awarding postpetition interest on an unsecured claim in an unimpaired class is a matter of equity consistent with the Supreme Court's interpretation of the fair and equitable rule. It also resolves the conflict between the interpretation that statutory impairment under section 502(b)(2) does not require payment of postpetition interest for nonimpairment and Congress' deletion of former section 1124(3) to overrule prior case law that a class whose claims received payment of the petition date allowed claim amount in cash in full was not impaired. Therefore, the plan must provide that the court may award postpetition interest at an appropriate rate under its equitable powers. Equity might not require payment of postpetition interest where any surplus resulting from nonpayment of postpetition interest allows payment of the parent's creditors rather than a return to the ultimate equity holders, but the court does not yet have an adequate record to determine what equity requires here. In re Energy Future Holdings Corp., 540 B.R. 109 (Bankr. D. Del. 2015).

5.5.kk Court approves Till-based cramdown interest rate. The debtor's plan provided that if the first lien lenders accepted the plan, the lenders would be paid in cash in full, without any make-whole premium; if not, they would receive new seven-year notes in the full allowed claim amounts with an interest rate determined under the formula approach of Till v. SCS Credit Corp., 541 U.S. 465 (2004). The lenders did not accept the plan. Section 1129(b) permits a court to confirm a plan despite a secured claim class's rejection if the plan is fair and equitable, which permits the plan to provide deferred cash payments on account of the claim with a value as of the plan's effective date equal to the claim's allowed amount. Deferred cash payments will have such a value if they include an interest component that compensates the creditor for the decrease in value caused by the delayed payments. In Till, to determine the appropriate interest rate for payments under a chapter 13 plan, the plurality opinion approved a "formula approach," which uses a risk-free rate plus an addition to account for non-payment risk. The formula approach makes the creditor whole rather than ensuring that the payments have a present value equal to the allowed claim amount and prevents overcompensating the creditor by covering facts such as transaction costs and profits that are not relevant in the court-supervised cramdown context. It puts "the creditor in the same economic position that it would have been in had it received the value of its claim immediately [rather than if] it arranged a 'new' loan." In re Valenti, 105 F.3d 55, 63-64 (2d Cir. 1997). The same reasoning applies in a chapter 11 case. For a base rate, Till used the prime rate, which is appropriate for short term loans. The plan here uses the seven-year Treasury note rate as the base rate, which is appropriate because the new notes' tenor was seven years. Therefore, the court confirms the plan. U.S. Bank N.A. v. Wilmington Savings Fund Soc., FSB (In re MPM Silicones, LLC), 531 B.R. 321 (S.D.N.Y. 2015).

5.5.ii Cure and reinstatement requires payment of default rate interest. The debtor defaulted on a real estate mortgage. The lender asserted a claim for default rate interest and began foreclosure proceedings. Before foreclosure, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The debtor filed a plan under which it proposed to cure and reinstate the lender's mortgage and loan but without paying default rate interest. Section 1123(a)(5)(G) permits a plan to cure a default. Section 1123(d) requires determination of the cure "in accordance with the underlying agreement and applicable nonbankruptcy law." The agreement provided for default rate interest, and applicable law enforces such a provision. Therefore, the plan must pay default rate interest to effect the cure and reinstatement. JPMCC 2006-LDP7 Miami Beach Lodging, LLC v. Sagamore P'ners, Ltd. (In re Sagamore P'ners, Ltd.), 610 Fed. Appx. 922, modified at 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 15382 (11th Cir. Aug. 31, 2015).

5.5.mm Court approves distribution under structured dismissal that violates absolute priority rule.

The debtor in possession liquidated all assets except a fraudulent transfer claim against its secured lender who had financed the debtor's LBO and against the shareholder who had lent additional funds and had a remaining claim secured by all the estate's $1.7 million in cash. There were allowed administrative, tax, WARN Act and general unsecured claims. The bankruptcy court had denied a motion to dismiss the fraudulent transfer action, but litigation would have been difficult, complex and risky against the well-financed defendant. There was no prospect of confirming a plan, and conversion to chapter 7 would have left the trustee without any assets to pursue claims, because the secured creditor had a lien on all cash. All parties other than the WARN Act claimants negotiated a settlement of all issues: the secured lender would contribute $2 million to an account earmarked to fund administrative expenses; the shareholder, also a fraudulent transfer defendant, would assign its lien on the estate's $1.7 million in cash to a trust to pay administrative and tax claims, with any balance distributed pro rata on general unsecured claims; all parties would exchange releases; and the case would be dismissed. The WARN Act claimants would receive nothing. Section 507(a), which applies in a chapter 11 case, gives priority to WARN Act claims over tax and general unsecured claims. Protective Comm. v. Anderson (In re TMT Trailer Ferry), 390 U.S. 414 (1968), requires that a settlement in a chapter 11 case be fair and equitable, words of art that import the absolute priority rule. However, TMT Trailer Ferry and other cases requiring settlements to be fair and equitable arise in the plan confirmation context, not to all settlements in bankruptcy, where the Code and the Bankruptcy Rules leave more flexibility. Still, the absolute priority rule should ordinarily apply to settlements to ensure evenhanded and predictable treatment of creditors, and a bankruptcy court may deviate only based on specific and credible grounds to justify the deviation. Here, the settlement and proposed distribution "remained the least bad alternative since there was 'no prospect' of a plan being confirmed and conversion to Chapter 7 would have resulted in the secured creditors taking all that remained of the estate." Therefore, the court approves the settlement, the structured dismissal, and the distribution. Official Committee v. CIT Group Bus. Credit Inc. (In re Jevic Holding Corp.), 787 F.3d 173 (3d Cir. 2015).

5.5.nn Trust Indenture Act prohibits a restructuring transaction that deprives note holders of the practical (but not legal) right to payment.

The debtor, worth only about $1.0 billion, had issued $1.3 billion in secured debt and $200 million in unsecured notes. The debtor's arguably-solvent parent guaranteed the unsecured notes. The notes indenture released the guarantee upon a majority vote of noteholders or a release of a parent guarantee of the secured notes. The debtor was unable to pay all interest and principal on the debt as they became due, but a bankruptcy filing would have rendered it ineligible for federal programs that provided the majority of its revenue. It initiated restructuring negotiations with its secured debt holders. Before concluding a restructuring deal, the secured debt holders agreed to an interim extension of some obligations and received a parent guarantee. Further negotiations resulted in a complete restructuring agreement under which the secured debt holders would release the parent guarantee, foreclose on their security interest under Article 9, bid in their claims, and, upon acquiring the assets, sell them back to a new subsidiary of the parent, which would purchase them by issuing debt and equity to secured debt holders and equity to consenting unsecured note holders. The Trust Indenture Act prohibits impairment of a note holder's right to receive payment of principal and interest or to bring suit for enforcement of payment without the holder's consent. The indenture contained an identical prohibition. The TIA's purpose is to prevent nonconsensual modification of payment rights, to protect judicial scrutiny of the fairness of restructuring plans, and to permit nonconsensual debt adjustment only through bankruptcy. Therefore, a court should not read the TIA narrowly, to protect only the legal entitlement to payment and to bring suit, but should apply its prohibition to protect the practical right to payment as well. However, to prevent litigation over any corporate activity that might adversely affect an issuer's ability to pay TIA-governed debt, a court should apply the modification prohibition only when the modification effects an involuntary debt restructuring. Here, combination of the guarantee release, the foreclosure, the re-sale to the debtor's affiliate, and the resulting overall debt restructuring deprived the complaining note holders of their practical right to payment and therefore violated the TIA's involuntary modification prohibition. The court refuses to enjoin the transaction, however, based on the balance of the equities and public policy grounds. Marblegate Asset Mgmt v. Educ. Mgmt. Corp., 75 F. Supp. 3d 592 (S.D.N.Y. 2014); accord MeehanCombs Global Credit Opp. Funds, LP v. Caesars Entertainment Corp., 80 F. Supp. 3d 507 (S.D.N.Y. 2015).

- 5.5.oo Court denies confirmation because appointment of proposed directors is not consistent with public policy. The plan provided for the debtor holding company to retain one fledgling operating subsidiary and remain a publicly traded company. The CEO and CFO were creditors and stockholders and were to be the sole directors of the reorganized company. Both were to receive substantial salaries and termination benefits. In testimony at the confirmation hearing, it was clear the CEO did not understand many plan provisions. Two other stockholders engaged in a battle for control over the debtor against the CEO and CFO for over a year before bankruptcy. Section 1129(a)(5)(A)(ii) requires as a condition to confirmation that the appointment of individuals as directors of the reorganized debtor be "consistent with the interests of creditors and equity security holders and with public policy." The Bankruptcy Code's lack of definition of "public policy" leaves its interpretation to the court's sound discretion. In exercising its discretion, a court should consider, to the extent appropriate, whether the plan continues the debtor as a publicly held company, whether the individuals are competent, experienced, unaffiliated with groups inimical to the debtor's best interests, and disinterested, provide adequate representation of all creditors and shareholders, and will receive reasonable compensation, and whether there will be independent outside directors. Here, the debtor was to remain as a publicly held company, the individuals did not show competence, were not disinterested, had not previously represented other shareholders adequately, and were being overcompensated. In addition, there were no outside directors. Accordingly, the plan does not meet section 1129(a)(5)(A)(ii)'s requirement, and the court denies confirmation. In re Digerati Techs., Inc., 2014 Bankr. LEXIS 2352 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. May 27, 2014).
- 5.5.pp Court may supply commercially reasonable terms to plan documents and order parties to execute them. Mediation between the debtor and its secured lender resulted in agreement on a plan and a detailed agreement on the restructured secured lender's loan. The plan required the debtor and the lender to execute new loan documents on the plan's effective date. They could not reach agreement on the documents. Section 1142(a) authorizes the court to direct the debtor and other necessary parties to execute documents necessary to consummate the plan. A court should not supply plan terms where the parties have not agreed, but a plan typically does not contain all the detail that loan documents contain. Where the plan provides sufficient detail to evidence a meeting of the parties' minds on material terms, the court may determine commercially reasonable terms for the remaining provisions in the loan documents and order the debtor and the lender to execute them to consummate the plan. In re Chatham Parkway Self Storage, LLC, 507 B.R. 13 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2014).

- 5.5.qq Plan preemption of state law may overcome impediment to feasibility. Before bankruptcy, the debtor self-insured its workers compensation liability. Applicable state law required the debtor to post cash, a letter of credit or a surety bond to assure claim payments. The debtor did all three. After bankruptcy, the state agency and the surety drew the letters of credit and with the cash the debtor had posted, created a fund for payment of claims. State law permitted turnover of such a claim fund to the debtor only after all claims had been resolved and paid. The debtor's plan provided for immediate turnover of the claim fund to the estate to create a workers compensation claims escrow in an amount equal to the amounts of all undisputed claims plus the amount of the bankruptcy court's estimation of disputed claim; state court adjudication of disputed claims, which would be paid in full from the escrow; prompt transfer of the excess of the claim fund over the escrow amount to the estate for distribution to creditors; and an injunction that channeled all workers compensation claims to the escrow. Section 1123(a)(5) requires a plan to provide adequate means for its implementation, notwithstanding any otherwise applicable bankruptcy law. Section 1129(a)(11) permits confirmation only if confirmation is not likely to be followed by liquidation or the need for further financial reorganization. If the debtor could not require turnover to the escrow of the claim fund, the plan would not meet section 1129(a)(11)'s feasibility requirement. If section 1123(a)(5) allows preemption of state workers compensation law and thereby permits turnover to the escrow of the claim fund, the plan would be feasible. A plan meets the feasibility requirement where preemption upon confirmation overcomes the impediment to feasibility. Irving Tanning Co. v. Maine Superint. of Ins. (In re Irving Tanning Co.), 496 B.R. 644 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2013).
- 5.5.rr Section 1129(a)(3) does not bar confirmation of a plan that contains provisions prohibited by law. Before bankruptcy, the debtor self-insured its workers compensation liability. Applicable state law required the debtor to post cash, a letter of credit or a surety bond to assure claim payments. The debtor did all three. After bankruptcy, the state agency and the surety drew the letters of credit and with the cash the debtor had posted, created a fund for payment of claims. State law permitted turnover of such a claim fund to the debtor only after all claims had been resolved and paid. The debtor's plan provided for immediate turnover of the claim fund to the estate to create a workers compensation claims escrow in an amount equal to the amounts of all undisputed claims plus the amount of the bankruptcy court's estimation of disputed claim; state court adjudication of disputed claims, which would be paid in full from the escrow; prompt transfer of the excess of the claim fund over the escrow amount to the estate for distribution to creditors; and an injunction that channeled all workers compensation claims to the escrow. Section 1123(a)(5) requires a plan to provide adequate means for its implementation, notwithstanding any otherwise applicable bankruptcy law. Section 1129(a)(3) denies confirmation to a plan unless it is "proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law." Section 1129(a)(3) does not undo section 1123(a)(5)'s preemption authorization. It applies to only the means by which the plan is proposed and does not require that the plan comply with law that another Bankruptcy Code provision preempts. Therefore, section 1129(a)(3) does not prevent confirmation of a plan that relies on section 1123(a)(5) preemption of state law prohibiting an action the plan requires. Irving Tanning Co. v. Maine Superint. of Ins. (In re Irving Tanning Co.), 496 B.R. 644 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2013).
- 5.5.ss Preemption for plan implementation under section 1123(a)(5) is limited to protect public health and safety and property rights. Before bankruptcy, the debtor self-insured its workers compensation liability. Applicable state law required the debtor to post cash, a letter of credit or a surety bond to assure payments of claims. The debtor did all three. After bankruptcy, the state agency and the surety drew the letters of credit and with the cash the debtor had posted, created a fund for payment of claims. State law permitted turnover of the claim fund to the debtor only after all claims had been resolved and paid. The debtor's plan provided for immediate turnover of the claim fund to the estate to create a workers compensation claims escrow in an amount equal to the amounts of all undisputed claims plus the amount of the bankruptcy court's estimation of disputed claim; state court adjudication of disputed claims, which would be paid in full from the escrow; prompt transfer of the excess of the claim fund over the escrow amount to the estate for distribution to creditors; and an injunction that channeled all workers compensation claims to the escrow. Section 1123(a)(5) requires a plan to provide adequate means for its implementation, notwithstanding any otherwise applicable nonbankruptcy law. It permits a plan provision, rather than federal law, to preempt state law. Therefore, courts construe section 1123(a)(5) preemption carefully, subject to three limitations. The plan provision must be adequate for the plan's implementation, necessary, and nothing more. A law protecting public health, safety and welfare is not preempted. For both statutory and constitutional reasons, a law defining and protecting property rights is not preempted. Here, the turnover of the claims fund is not necessary to a liquidating plan, workers compensation laws protect public health and safety, and turnover would violate the property rights of the claim fund owners. Therefore, the plan turnover provision does not preempt state law, and the court denies confirmation. Irving Tanning Co. v. Maine Superint. of Ins. (In re Irving Tanning Co.), 496 B.R. 644 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2013).

- 5.5.tt Back-up liquidation provision in a plan does not establish feasibility. The debtor's plan provided that if it did not make payments that the plan required, it would be liquidated to make distributions to creditors. The debtor's recent operating history suggested that the debtor would not be able to make the payments. Section 1129(a)(11) requires as a condition to confirmation that confirmation "is not likely to be followed by the liquidation or need for further financial reorganization ... unless such liquidation or reorganization is proposed in the plan." This section applies only where the plan is a liquidating plan or the proposed liquidation is likely to yield the payments provided for in the plan; a mere "drop dead" provision, without more, is not adequate to meet the section's requirement. Therefore, the court denies confirmation. In re Renegade Holdings, Inc., 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 2193 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. May 29, 2013).
- 5.5.uu Best interest test applies only to creditors with filed claims. The individual debtor had suffered a substantial fraud judgment that precipitated the bankruptcy. The creditor did not file a claim by the claims bar date. The debtor proposed a plan that did not provide for any recovery on the fraud claim. Section 1129(a)(7), the best interest test, requires that a plan provide for a recovery by a creditor that is not less than the amount the creditor would receive in a hypothetical chapter 7 case. Even though the fraud creditor would have had an opportunity to file a proof of claim after the chapter 11 claims bar date if the case converted to chapter 7, the best interest test applies only to actual creditors with allowed claims in the chapter 11 case. If it applied to all creditors who might conceivably file proofs of claim in a converted chapter 7 case but who did not file them in the chapter 11 case, the test would become unmanageable. Therefore, the plan meets the best interest test and may be confirmed. Marshall v. Marshall (In re Marshall), 721 F.3d 1032 (9th Cir. 2013).
- 5.5.vv Court limits plan modification after consummation. The confirmed and consummated plan created a creditor trust to litigate issues remaining after plan confirmation, including claims by and against the estate. The trust agreement provided that the trust terminates five years after confirmation, unless the court issues an order at least six months before the scheduled termination date extending the trust's life. The IRS regulation governing liquidating trusts requires that any extension of a trust's life occur within six months before the trust's termination. Within six months before the trust's termination, the trustee sought to extend the trust's life and either to amend the plan to require that extension orders be issued within, rather than before, six months before the scheduled termination date or to obtain a plan interpretation or clarification that the time period was intended to be within six months, consistent with the IRS regulation. Section 1127(b) permits modification of a confirmed plan only before substantial consummation. Therefore, the court could not amend the plan. An interpretation is a modification where it is directly contrary to the plan language. Therefore, the court denies the trustee's motion to extend the trust's life. In re Daewoo Motor Am., Inc., 488 B.R. 418 (C.D. Cal. 2011).

- 5.5.ww Absolute priority rule applies to a plan sponsored by an equity holder's spouse. The debtor owns a shopping center, subject to a $10 million mortgage. The debtor's principal owns 100% of the debtor. The principal's wife owns a management company that employs the principal at an annual salary of $500,000 to run the shopping center. The debtor proposes a plan that values the shopping center at $8.2 million and provides a rewritten $8.2 million secured note to the mortgage holder, payment of 15% of allowed unsecured claims over five years and issuance of 100% of the equity to the principal's wife in exchange for a $375,000 new value contribution. The plan proposes to assume the management contract. The secured creditor does not accept the plan. The absolute priority rule entitles non-accepting creditors to full payment before equity holders may receive value under a plan on account of their equity interests. If an equity holder proposes a new value contribution for the equity in the reorganized debtor under a plan that a class of claims does not accept, the valuation of the contribution must be subject to a market test. The equity holder here is the principal, who receives value through his wife's receipt of the reorganized debtor's equity, including through the continuation of his contract with the management company, and the value he receives is at least in part on account of his equity interest in the debtor, through which he controlled the plan's details. Therefore, the plan is subject to the absolute priority rule, and the valuation is subject to a market test. The only appropriate market test is some form of competition, including by permitting the secured lender to credit bid its claim, whether or not exclusivity has been terminated. In re Castleton Plaza, LP, 707 F.3d 821 (7th Cir. 2013).
- 5.5.xx Fifth Circuit permits artificial impairment. The single asset real estate debtor proposes a plan under which the equity owners invested $1.5 million, the single oversecured secured lender would be paid in full over time and the small amount of general unsecured claims would be paid in cash in full three months after the effective date, though it has sufficient cash to pay the unsecured claims in full on the effective date. The secured class rejects the plan; the unsecured class accepts unanimously. The court finds that the reorganized debtor would be able to make all payments under the plan. Section 1129(a)(3) permits plan confirmation only the plan is proposed in good faith, and section 1129(a)(10) requires that at least one impaired class of claims have accepted the plan. A class is impaired if the plan proposes any alteration of the claim's legal rights. Neither the plan proponent's motive in proposing impairment nor the reorganized debtor's ability to pay the claims without impairment are relevant to determining impairment. Therefore, the plan meets section 1129(a)(10)'s "one impaired accepting class" requirement. A plan proposed with a legitimate and honest purpose to reorganize and with a reasonable prospect of success is proposed in good faith. Here, the equity holders contributed substantial new equity, the debtor had substantial equity in the real property, and the plan was feasible. Therefore, the plan is proposed in good faith, and its artificial impairment of the unsecured claims class does not require a contrary finding. Western Real Estate Equities, L.L.C. v. Village at Camp Bowie I, L.P. (In re Village at Camp Bowie I, L.P.), 710 F.3d 239 (5th Cir. 2013).
- 5.5.yy Fifth Circuit approves use of Till interest rate in chapter 11 cramdown. The hotel debtor's properties are well maintained and managed, revenue exceeded projections in the months before confirmation, the hotel property's value is stable or appreciating, and the debtor's proposed plan is tight but feasible. The plan proposes to repay the undersecured lender's secured claim at an interest rate of prime plus 1.75%. The plurality opinion in Till v. SCS Credit Corp., 541 U.S. 465 (2004), approved the use in a chapter 13 case of a cramdown interest rate of prime plus a risk factor, generally from 1% to 3%, in part because of the simplicity of the prime-plus approach. It rejected the coerced loan, market, presumptive contract rate and cost of funds approaches. The Court also acknowledged, in footnote 14, that a market approach might be appropriate in a chapter 11 case, if an efficient loan market exists. However, the majority of lower courts have adopted the Till prime-plus approach for chapter 11 cases. Without suggesting that the Till approach is the only or even the optimal method, the Court of Appeals rules that it was not error for the bankruptcy court here to apply Till here. The 1.75% adjustment is appropriate in light of the facts of this case. Therefore, the Court of Appeals affirms the confirmation order. Wells Fargo

Bank N.A. v. Texas Grand Prairie Hotel Realty, L.L.C. (In re Texas Grand Prairie Hotel Realty, L.L.C.), 710 F.3d 324 (5th Cir. 2013).

- 5.5.zz Section 1111(b) election claim includes postpetition attorneys' fees but not postpetition interest. The undersecured creditor made the section 1111(b) election to have its entire claim treated as secured "to the extent that such claim is allowed" under section 502, rather than bifurcated into secured and unsecured portions under section 506(a). The claim includes postpetition contractual interest and contractual attorneys' fees. Section 506(b) allows "interest on such claim, and any reasonable fees, costs, or charges provided for under the agreement" to a creditor holding an oversecured claim. But it does not disallow interest or fees, costs or charges to an undersecured or unsecured creditor. Section 502(b) provides the sole grounds for disallowance of a claim. Section 502(b)(2) disallows postpetition interest, and section 502(b)(1) disallows other portions of a claim "to the extent not enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law". Attorneys' fees are enforceable under applicable law. Therefore, the creditor's claim is allowed to include attorneys' fees but not postpetition interest, and that amount is the claim that is subject to the section 1111(b) election. In re Castillo, 488 B.R. 441 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2013).
- 5.5.aaa Extension of claims objection deadline is not a plan modification. The debtor confirmed a plan that set a deadline for the liquidating trustee to object to claims. The plan permitted the court to extend the deadline. Section 1127(b) prohibits plan modification after substantial consummation. Courts determine what constitutes a plan modification on a case-by-case basis, finding a modification when the change alters the legal relationship among the debtor and creditors or violates or removes plan provisions or affects substance rather than procedure. Here, an order extending the claims objection deadline is procedural, does not alter the legal relationship among the debtor and creditors and is expressly authorized by the plan. Therefore, a deadline extension is not a modification. McCrary v. Barnett (In re Sea Island Co.), 486 B.R. 559 (D.S.C. 2013).
- 5.5.bbb A party whose interests are in the zone of interests the statute protects may object to confirmation. The debtor proposed a plan that provided for the debtor to assign liability insurance policies issued by nonsettling insurers to an asbestos trust, despite antiassignment provisions in the policies. The plan proposed to be "insurance neutral"—that is, it would not affect the insurers' rights or defenses under the policy, other than regarding the antiassignment provision—but it limited certain defenses that the insurers could assert against settling insurers, permitted some claimants to assert direct claims against the insurers, and allowed the trust to pay claims and seek indemnification from the insurers. A party may object in a chapter 11 case if it is a party in interest under section 1109 and meets Article III and federal prudential standing requirements. Section 1109 does not provide an exclusive list of parties who qualify as parties in interest. It applies "to anyone who has a legally protected interest that could be affected" by the case. Because the plan may affect the insurers' rights and defenses, they have standing under section 1109 to object to the plan. Article III standing requires that a party show an injury in fact that is traceable to the proposed court order and may be redressed by a favorable ruling. For the same reasons that the insurers have section 1109 standing, they have Article III standing. A party meets the prudential standing requirement if its interests are in the zone of interests protected by the statutory provision at issue in the case. Here, the insurers' interests meet that requirement. Therefore, they have standing to object to plan confirmation. Motor Vehicle Cas. Co. v. Thorpe Insulation Co. (In re Thorpe Insulation Co.), 677 F.3d 869 (9th Cir. 2012).
- 5.5.ccc Plan that proposes collateral sale may not deprive a secured creditor of the right to credit bid its claim. The lender had a lien on substantially all of the debtor's assets, which were worth less than the claim amount. The debtor's plan proposed a sale of all assets, with the sale proceeds paid to the lender, according to sale and bid procedures that prohibited the lender from credit bidding its secured claim. The lender objected to confirmation. The court may confirm a plan without the acceptance of a class of claims if the plan is fair and equitable as to that class. Under section 1129(b)(ii)(A), a plan is fair and equitable to a class of secured claims if it proposes (i) that the holders of a secured claim retain their lien and receive payments with a present value equal to the amount of the secured claims, “(ii) for the sale, subject to section 363(k)”, of the encumbered property free and clear of the lien or “(iii) for the realization by such holders of the indubitable equivalent of such claims.” Section 363(k) authorizes the holder of a secured claim to credit bid its claim, unless the court for cause orders otherwise. In construing a statute, the specific governs the general, so as to give effect to every provision. Clause (ii) is a specific provision that governs the general “catch-all” provision of clause (iii). Therefore, even if the result of a sale would be to provide the secured creditor the indubitable equivalent of its claim, the plan must satisfy clause (ii). To do so, section 363(k) must apply, and the secured creditor must be permitted to credit bid, unless the court for cause orders otherwise. Because the debtor did not point to any such cause, the plan does not meet section 1129(b)(2)’s requirements and may not be confirmed. RadLAX Gateway Hotel, LLC v. Amalgamated Bank, 566 U.S. ____, 132 S. Ct. 2065 (2012).

5.5.ddd Section 1123(a) preempts a private contract restriction, including an anti-assignment provision. The debtor’s liability insurance policies each contained an anti-assignment provision. To fund in part an asbestos trust created under section 524(g), the debtor’s chapter 11 plan provided for the assignment, over the insurers’ objections, of all its rights under the policies to the trust. Section 1123(a) provides that, “Notwithstanding any otherwise applicable nonbankruptcy law, a plan shall ... (5) provide adequate means for the plan’s implementation, such as ... (B) transfer of all or any part of the property of the estate to one or more entities” Congress may preempt state law by express language or by implication, either by occupying the legislative field or because of a conflict between state and federal law. There is a general presumption, which also applies in bankruptcy, against preemption, but ultimately, Congress’s purpose is the guide. The use of “notwithstanding” is a clear indication of Congressional intent to preempt. The phrase “any otherwise applicable law” includes private contracts, which are implemented and enforced under state law. Therefore, section 1123(a)(5)(B) preempts state law that would enforce the policies’ anti-assignment provisions, and the plan may provide for the assignment of the policies to the trust. In re Federal-Mogul Global Inc., 684 F.3d 355 (3d Cir. 2012).

5.5.eee Secured claim valuation for plan confirmation purpose is based on present fair market value, not future prospects. At a cash collateral hearing at the beginning of the case, the real estate developer debtor in possession produced an appraisal that showed that the real property collateral securing the first and second lien debt was worth less than the amount secured by the first lien. To support plan confirmation, the debtor prepared a budget and projections showing that over time, the collateral, when developed and sold, would generate net cash proceeds in excess of the first lien debt plus interest. Yet based on the prior appraisal, adjusted downward for sales during the case, the debtor valued the collateral at less than the first lien debt and so proposed to treat the second lien creditor as wholly unsecured. Section 506(a) requires that the court value property to determine the extent of a creditor’s secured claim. The court must determine the value “in light of the purpose of the valuation and of the proposed disposition or use of such property.” The plan proposed that the debtor retain the property, develop it and sell it in the ordinary course of its business as a developer, so the court must use the property’s fair market value as of the plan confirmation date, rather than a foreclosure or liquidation value. The court rejects a “wait-and-see” approach that would base the value on cash collections over time. The projections do not determine value, as they contemplate the reorganized debtor’s investment of labor and capital into producing the returns. The court must not determine future value, under which a junior secured creditor could retain its lien to see how the property performs and collect anything after a senior lien creditor is fully paid, but must determine current value. Based on the collateral’s current fair market value, the second lien creditor was out of the money and should be treated as the holder of an unsecured claim. In re Heritage Highgate, Inc., 679 F.3d 132 (3d Cir. 2012).

- 5.5.fff A chapter 11 plan may strip an underwater lien. The court determined at plan confirmation that the present fair market value of a real estate developer's property was less than the amount of the first lien secured by the property. Under section 506(a), the holder of the second lien had only an unsecured claim. Section 506(d) avoids a lien to the extent it does not secure an allowed secured claim. However, Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410 (1992), prohibited avoiding such a lien in a chapter 7 case in which the collateral was being abandoned to a foreclosure sale outside of the case. By contrast, a chapter 11 plan involves the retention of collateral to use in a reorganized business, and chapter 11, in provisions such as sections 1129(b) and 1111(b), expressly contemplates stripping an underwater lien. Therefore, the plan may properly treat the claim as an unsecured claim under section 506(a) and avoid the lien under section 506(d). In re Heritage Highgate, Inc., 679 F.3d 132 (3d Cir. 2012).
- 5.5.ggg Treasury bonds are not the indubitable equivalent of real estate. The single asset real estate debtor valued the collateral securing the secured lender's $38.3 million claim at $13.5 million. It proposed a plan that would substitute Treasury bonds, to be purchased by an investor in the reorganized debtor, with a face amount of $13.5 million and a total payment stream over 30 years of $38.3 million. The lender made the section 1111(b) election and did not accept the plan. Section 1129(b)(2)(A)(i) permits confirmation if the plan provides for a secured claim holder to retain its lien on the property and receive cash payments with a present value equal to the property's value. Section 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii) permits confirmation if the plan provides for the secured claim holder to receive the indubitable equivalent of its claim. Treasury bonds are not the indubitable equivalent of real estate, because they have a different risk and volatility profile. Substituting Treasury bonds, especially at today's very low interest rates, would deprive the secured claim holder of the possibility of collateral appreciation with general inflation and expose the holder to the risk of collateral deflation, as inflation causes interest rates to rise and bond values to decline. A 30-year maturity exacerbates the problem. If the reorganized debtor defaults, the creditor's Treasury bill collateral would likely be worth substantially less than its real estate collateral. Therefore, the court denies plan confirmation. In re River East Plaza, LLC, 669 F.3d 826 (7th Cir. 2012).
- 5.5.hhh Feasibility requires credible evidence, not merely consent, and a "drop dead" provision does not suffice. The debtor proposed a plan to restructure substantial bond debt by issuance of three new bond series in substantially reduced amounts, some bearing pay-in-kind interest and requiring refinancing in seven years. Refinancing would require that three major contingencies, over which the reorganized debtor would have no control, all occur. Creditors overwhelmingly accepted the plan. Section 1129(a)(11) requires that the court find as a condition to confirmation that the plan is feasible, that is, not likely to be followed by liquidation or the need for further financial reorganization unless the plan so provides. Feasibility cannot be negotiated or based on the lack of an objection. The plan proponent must present some credible evidence that the plan, including any required refinancing, is feasible. A "drop dead" plan provision, which provides that the reorganized debtor will liquidate if it is unable to refinance, is insufficient to meet section 1129(a)(9)'s requirement. Therefore, the court denies confirmation. In re Las Vegas Monorail Co., 462 B.R. 795 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2011)
- 5.5.iii A debtor may use artificial impairment to meet the consenting class requirement of section 1129(a)(10). The single asset real estate debtor owed $32 million to a single secured creditor, who had purchased the claim to acquire the real estate, and $60,000 to general unsecured creditors. The real estate was worth $34 million, and the debtor had adequate cash to pay unsecured creditors in full upon confirmation. The debtor's plan proposed to pay the secured claim over five years and to pay the unsecured claims over three months after the effective date. The secured class rejected the plan; the unsecured class and the equity class accepted. Section 1129(a)(10) requires as a condition to confirmation that at least one impaired class of claims accept the plan. The plan's proposal to pay unsecured claims over three months was an artificial impairment; that is, it was a minor impairment that was not required by the debtor's cash position. Section 1129(a)(10) does not distinguish between kinds of impairment, and Congress intended to give "impairment" the broadest possible meaning. Therefore, artificial impairment does not vitiate acceptance for purposes of applying section 1129(a)(10). A court may deny confirmation of a plan that artificially impairs a class under section 1129(a)(3) for not being proposed in good faith. "Good faith" requires only a legitimate purpose to reorganize in a way that has a reasonable chance of success. The Code's language permits the debtor to use artificial impairment to obtain confirmation and implicitly recognizes a debtor's need for negotiating leverage with its creditors to preserve value for equity. Compliance with explicit and implicit Code provisions supports a finding of good faith. The creditor's motive and consequent refusal to negotiate as a creditor in this case further supports the propriety of the debtor's actions. In re Village at Camp Bowie I, L.P., 454 B.R. 702 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2011).

5.5.jjj All about post-petition interest under a chapter 11 plan. The liquidation plan proposed payment or satisfaction in full of claims in various classes of senior and subordinated bonds and payment of postpetition interest from any surplus before holders of equity interests would receive any distribution. Section 1129(a)(7) requires as a condition to plan confirmation that holders of claims and interests receive at least as much as they would in a hypothetical liquidation under chapter 7. Payment of holders of claims of more than they would receive in a chapter 7 case violates section 1129(a)(7) as to holders of interests, because the interest holders would receive more in the chapter 7 case. In a chapter 7 case, holders of claims are entitled under section 726(a)(5) to payment of postpetition interest on their allowed claims "at the legal rate from the date of the filing of the petition". The reference to "the" legal rate (rather than "a" legal rate) implies the rate on judgments, not the contractual rate. Payment of interest on judgments is a procedural matter that is governed by the forum's law. These factors point to use of the federal judgment rate. Use of that rate promotes fairness among creditors and administrative efficiency, because it provides a simple rule that reduces litigation and delay. The effect of a choice of a rate on recovery on claims or interests is not an appropriate consideration, because the statute's plain language requires selection of the federal judgment rate. The federal judgment rate is variable. The rate in effect on the petition date applies, because section 726(a)(5) refers to that date as the date from which interest runs. Interest compounds only annually, despite any contractual provision for more frequent compounding, because the federal judgment rate so provides. Therefore, a plan that provides for interest under the plan at a higher rate violates section 1129(a)(7) as to interest holders. A subordination agreement does not affect the rate for which the debtor is liable, though it may affect intercreditor issues. Section 510(a) requires the court to enforce a contractual subordination provision to the extent enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Therefore, the Rule of Explicitness, which applies under New York law, applies in a bankruptcy case. In this case, the indenture was explicit and permits the senior creditors to receive their full contractual interest from the distribution to subordinated noteholders' plan distribution, despite their inability to recover the interest from the debtor. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 461 B.R. 200 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

5.5.kkk Note trading by creditors who participate in plan negotiations does not prevent plan confirmation for lack of good faith but may subject the claims to equitable disallowance. Holders of large positions in the debtor's senior notes participated in plan negotiations with the debtor and the major adverse parties. After a year of litigation and intermittent negotiations, the parties reached a settlement that the participating noteholders supported. Their participation in the negotiations resulted in greater recoveries for creditors in the case. The settlement did not entitle them to any greater distribution than other holders of claims in the same class. The noteholders were subject to confidentiality agreements, and they refrained from trading while negotiations were ongoing. However, when negotiations broke off, the debtor disclosed material information, though not information about the existence or terms of the negotiations, and the noteholders traded actively. Section 1129(a)(3) permits plan confirmation only if the plan is proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law. This requires that the plan is consistent with the Code's purposes, that it was proposed with honesty and that there is fundamental fairness in dealing with creditors. Here, the plan did not favor the participating noteholders, and the noteholders' conduct improved recoveries. Therefore, any trading in which the noteholders engaged did not prevent the plan from being proposed in good faith and not by means forbidden by law. However, if the trading were improper, the court may consider equitable disallowance of the noteholders' claims. Section 510(c) permits subordination "under principles of equitable subordination". Section 510(c)'s reference only to subordination does not limit the section's reach. Principles of equitable subordination, derived from Pepper v. Litton, 308 U.S. 295 (1939), also permit disallowance for inequitable conduct, despite section 502(b)'s limitation of the grounds for claims disallowance under that section. Besides, violation of the securities laws in connection with the case might constitute sufficient grounds for equitable disallowance, and the debtor independently might have a defense to the claims of noteholders who violated the securities laws. Use of material nonpublic information in trading violates the securities laws under either the classical theory, violating a trust or fiduciary relationship with the debtor, or the misappropriation theory, under which the trader appropriates to his own use information that belongs to the debtor. Here, the fact and terms of negotiations was material nonpublic information because of the significance of the negotiations to the value of the notes. The participating noteholders could be considered insiders because they received material nonpublic information and because they held blocking positions in their classes. Therefore, even though the plan may be confirmed despite the trading, the court finds colorable claims for equitable disallowance, based on the trading, and the estate may seek equitable disallowance of their claims. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 461 B.R. 200 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

5.5.iii Court permits plan modification to extend a liquidating trust's life. The confirmed chapter 11 plan provided for the transfer to a liquidating trust, with a limited life, of a cause of action to generate additional creditor recoveries. Due to state court litigation delays, the trust was set to expire before the litigation could conclude. The liquidating trustee moved for an order modifying the plan to extend the trust's life. Since confirmation, the trust made only one payment, based on a pre-confirmation agreement. Section 1127(b) permits post-confirmation modification only if the plan has not been substantially consummated. Under section 1101(2), a plan has been substantially consummated if all property proposed by the plan to be transferred has been transferred, the debtor has assumed management of the business (if any) and plan distributions have commenced. Transfer of property differs from distributions to creditors under the plan. Here, the cause of action was transferred to the trust, though no plan distributions had been made. A court may permit only a modification that does not upset creditors' expectations and that complies with all applicable chapter 11 provisions, including sections 1122, 1123, 1125 and 1129. Here, the modification need resulted from unforeseeable circumstances and will not prejudice creditors. Therefore, the court permits the extension of the trust's life. In re Boylan Int'l Ltd., 452 B.R. 43 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

5.5.mmm A cram down plan sale requires that the secured creditor be permitted to credit bid. Section 363(k) provides that at a sale under section 363(b), a secured creditor may credit bid its claim, unless the court orders otherwise. Section 1129(b)(1) requires that a plan confirmed without the acceptance of one or more classes be fair and equitable as to the non-accepting class. Section 1129(b)(2)(A) provides that the fair and equitable requirement as to a class of secured claims includes the requirement that the plan provide "(i) that the holders of such claims retain the liens secured by such claims, whether the property ... is retained by the debtor or transferred ... (ii) for the sale, subject to section 363(k) of this title, of any property that is subject to the liens securing such claims, free and clear of such liens ... or (iii) for the realization by such holders of the indubitable equivalent of such claims". The secured lenders here had a lien on all of the debtor's assets. The debtor filed both a plan that provided for the sale at a public auction of all its assets free and clear of liens and a motion for approval of bid procedures for the plan sale, with a stalking horse asset purchase agreement at a price substantially below the lenders' claim amount. The bid procedures motion sought to preclude the lenders from credit bidding their claims, arguing that a plan providing for a sale free and clear, with proceeds paid to the secured creditors, could be confirmed under clause (iii). The lenders objected. What constitutes indubitable equivalent under clause (iii) depends on the market value of the lenders' collateral. A bankruptcy sale may result in a below market value price for several reasons. If lenders are not satisfied that cash bids at an auction adequately reflect market value, they may protect themselves by a credit bid. Moreover, the specific controls the general, and permitting cram down under clause (iii) in a way that violates clauses (i) or (ii) would improperly render the latter clauses superfluous. River Rd. Hotel P'ners, LLC v. Amalgamated Bank, 651 F.3d 642 (7th Cir. 2011).

5.5.nnn Insurer whose liability policies are assigned to a mass tort trust has standing to object to confirmation. The debtor was subject to numerous asbestos claims and a limited number of silicosis claims. The debtor's plan proposed the establishment of a silicosis claims trust and the assignment of the debtor's liability insurance policies to the trust, with full preservation of the insurer's defenses, including coverage defenses. The policies contained anti-assignment provisions. The insurer objected to the assignment of the policies as well as to other plan provisions that the insurer argued would increase the insurer's exposure in fact, even without any modification of the policies. Standing to object requires at a minimum Article III standing, which requires a concrete, distinct and palpable actual or imminent injury in fact. Section 1109(b) also requires that the objector be a "party in interest", which is "anyone who has a legally protected interest that could be affected by a bankruptcy proceeding". This standard is essentially co-extensive with the Article III standard. The increase in exposure, even though uncertain and contingent, as well as the administrative cost that the insurer would have to incur to defend against the possible increase, constitutes a tangible disadvantage to the insurer that provides the basis for standing as a party in interest. Although the appellate "person aggrieved" standing standard may be more stringent than "party in interest" standard, a party may appeal an adverse ruling on "party in interest" standing, even if it could not appeal the decision on the merits. Otherwise, the party could never obtain recourse for an improper exclusion from the bankruptcy case. Therefore, the insurer may appeal. The court remands to the bankruptcy court for the determination of the insurer's objection. In re Global Industrial Techs., Inc., 645 F.3d 201 (3d Cir. 2011).

5.5.ooo Terminating exclusivity provides a market test for a new value plan. The debtor filed a new value cram down plan, which provided for the old equity holders to purchase the stock of the reorganized debtor at a set price. The debtor did not market the company to determine the price but relied on expert testimony. The largest creditor sought exclusivity termination so that it could file its own plan, offered to pay more for the reorganized debtor's equity and objected to confirmation of the debtor's plan. Where the debtor proposes a new value cram down plan, the value of the new equity issued under the plan is subject to a market test, under In re 203 N. Lasalle St. P'shp, 526 U.S. 434 (1999). The market test may be provided either by competing bids or competing plan proposals. Here, the court chooses the latter, denies confirmation and terminates exclusivity to permit the creditor to file a competing plan. H.G. Roebuck & Son, Inc. v. Alter Comm'ns, Inc., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59781 (D. Md. June 3, 2011).

5.5.ppp Liquidating plan fails best interest test. The plan provided for the debtor's liquidation, for the appointment of a liquidating trustee to pursue claims for the creditors' benefit, for the appointment of a plan committee to oversee the trustee's conduct, with authority to bring claims that the trustee decided not to pursue and for distribution largely in accordance with the chapter 7 distribution scheme. The trustee's fees were largely contingent and were not capped by the statutory maximum that applies to a chapter 7 trustee's fees. The plan authorized the trustee and the committee to retain professionals. The best interest test of section 1129(a)(7) does not permit confirmation if the distribution under the plan to any nonaccepting creditor is less than the creditor would receive in a hypothetical chapter 7 case. The principal difference between the plan distributions and a hypothetical chapter 7 distribution involves the fees of the trustee's and the committee's professionals. The difference in the trustees' professional fees is speculative and therefore does not prevent confirmation under the best interest test. However, the committee's professionals, especially if the committee pursues litigation that the trustee refuses to pursue, is predictably higher than the fees that would be incurred in a chapter 7 case. Therefore, the plan does not meet the best interest test. In re Colonial Bancgroup, Inc., 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 1984 (Bankr. M.D. Ala. May 20, 2011).

5.5.qqq Court designates vote of competitor that bought claims and rejected plan to acquire debtor. The debtor proposed a plan under which its first lien note holders would receive modified notes and its second lien note holders would receive substantially all the reorganized debtor's equity. After the debtor filed the plan, a competitor purchased all of the debtor's first lien notes at par and rejected the plan. In purchasing the claims, the competitor intended to acquire the debtor, not to recover as a creditor. Section 1126(e) permits a court to designate an entity whose acceptance or rejection of a plan was not in good faith. Courts should use the power sparingly. Merely purchasing claims to defeat a plan or mere selfishness amount to bad faith. To find absence of good faith, the court must find an ulterior motive beyond self-interested protection of the claim, such as a quest to obtain a non-ratable better deal, to acquire an interest in the debtor's property or to further the creditor's own business interests by destroying the debtor's business. The analysis is factually intensive, and the conclusion must be based on the totality of the circumstances. Here, the creditor did not seek maximum recovery on its claim but advancement of its strategic objective of acquiring the debtor's business, which shows an absence of good faith in rejecting the plan. Even though the creditor held all the claims in the class, the competitor's rejection of the plan to further its acquisition interest was not consistent with its interest as a creditor in enhancing recoveries. The court therefore designates the creditor's rejection of the plan. DISH Network Corp. v. DBSD N. Am., Inc. (In re DBSD N. Am., Inc.), 634 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2011).

5.5.rrr Senior creditor class may not distribute collateral proceeds to equity holders when a junior creditor class does not accept the plan. The debtor proposed a plan under which its first lien note holders would receive modified notes, its second lien note holders would receive most of the reorganized debtor's equity, unsecured creditors would receive a nominal amount of equity and the existing shareholder would receive the balance of the equity in "satisfaction, release, and discharge" of the existing equity interests to induce the shareholder to continue to lend its expertise to the reorganized enterprise. The debtor's overall value was insufficient to pay the senior creditors in full, so neither the junior creditors nor the equity holders would have received anything if the senior creditors had not permitted the distribution. The unsecured claims class did not accept the plan, and an unsecured creditor objected to confirmation. The court may confirm a plan that an unsecured claim class has not accepted only if the plan is fair and equitable to the non-accepting class. Section 1129(b)(2)(B) codifies in part the fair and equitable rule; it requires that the plan provide for full satisfaction of the unsecured claims or that the holders of equity interests not receive or retain any property under the plan on account of their interests. The shares that the former equity holders would receive are property. They are received under the plan, not directly from the second lien lenders after they received their own distribution under the plan, and the plan made clear that the distribution was on account of—that is, because of—the old equity interests. A plan might provide for distribution to new equity to old equity on account of a new value contribution, but the contribution must be in money or money's worth, not the promise of future services. The distribution here was, if anything, on account of future services, that is, the shareholder's continuing involvement in the management of the reorganized debtor. Finally, the fair and equitable rule applies to distribution of "any property", whether or not it is property subject to a senior creditor's lien, if the distribution is under the plan.

Therefore, the court could not confirm the plan. DISH Network Corp. v. DBSD N. Am., Inc. (In re DBSD N. Am., Inc.), 634 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2011).

5.5.sss Disparate plan treatments violate equal treatment rule, but a third party release may be required as a condition to distribution under the plan. The plan provided that holders of claims above a specified amount in one class would be entitled to subscribe to a rights offering. The plan excluded holders of small claims in the class from the subscription right because of issues of administrative convenience. The plan also provided that holders of claims in all classes would release third parties, but if the creditor opted out of the release on its ballot, the creditor would not receive any consideration under the plan. Finally, the plan provided for holders of claims in a third class to receive cash, or at the holder's election, stock in the reorganized debtor. Some claims in the third class were disputed at the time of voting and therefore were not provided a ballot. Section 1123(a)(4) requires that a plan provide the same treatment for each holder of a claim in a class, unless the holder elects less favorable treatment. A claim may be classified separately for administrative convenience under section 1122(b), but not treated differently within the class. Therefore, depriving holders of small claims of the subscription right for administrative convenience violates the equal treatment rule. Depriving a creditor who does not grant a release of distributions under a plan does not violate the equal treatment rule. A creditor who refuses to grant a release retains potential value and thereby may receive less favorable plan distribution treatment, as long as the decision is the creditor's and all creditors in the class have the same election. Depriving a holder of a disputed claim of the election to receive stock violates the equal treatment rule. Once the claim is allowed, its holder is entitled to the same treatment as holders of claims that were allowed at the time of balloting. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 442 B.R. 314 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

5.5.ttt Res judicata* might not bar a debtor in possession in a second case from challenging lease that the debtor in possession assumed in a prior case. The debtor leased land to a contractor, who built a store for the debtor and leased the store and subleased the land back to the debtor. The debtor filed chapter 11 and confirmed a reorganization plan that provided for the reorganized debtor's continued operation. During the chapter 11 case, it assumed both leases and the sublease, because it intended to continue to operate the store. The reorganization was unsuccessful, and the reorganized debtor filed a second chapter 11 case 18 months after confirmation in its first case. The debtor's plan in the second case provided for liquidation and appointment of a plan administrator. The administrator challenged the characterization of the leases, arguing that they constituted a disguised secured financing. Res judicata bars relitigation of a final judgment involving the same parties or their privies. A successor in interest may be in privity with a prior party if their substantive legal relationship is complete. Although a bankruptcy estate succeeds to a debtor's interests, the trustee (or debtor in possession) as representative of the estate and creditors may have different interests from those of the debtor. Here, the reorganized debtor succeeded to the interests of the first debtor in possession, but the second debtor in possession (and therefore the plan administrator) had different incentives and therefore different interests from the first debtor in possession. The first debtor in possession and reorganized debtor wanted to continue operating the store; the second one was interested only in maximizing recovery for creditors. Therefore, they were not in privity, and the administrator was not barred by res judicata from challenging the lease. In re Montgomery Ward, LLC, 634 F.3d 732 (3d Cir. 2011).

5.5.uuu Court may rely on intrinsic value in the absence of a market, but deferred cash payment cram down requires payments. The debtor owned a single parcel of undeveloped land. It proposed a plan that valued the property at substantially more than the secured debt and provided that interest would continue to accrue for three years. During the three years, the debtor would maintain the property and pay taxes and insurance and would attempt to refinance or sell and would pay principal and accrued interest only from proceeds. If it were unable to refinance or sell, the secured creditor could resort to all available remedies. There was no market for undeveloped land, so the debtor relied on intrinsic value. A court may use intrinsic value, even when the lack of a market is not caused solely by the debtor's bankruptcy, just as it may rely on an intrinsic interest rate that might be unavailable to a reorganizing debtor in the market. Section 1129(b)(1) permits nonconsensual plan confirmation if the plan treatment is fair and equitable to the nonconsenting class. Section 1129(b)(2) contains additional requirements, not merely illustrations, for nonconsensual confirmation. Section 1129(b)(2)(A)(i) permits cram down based on deferred cash payments. The debtor's plan here does not provide for deferred cash payments to the creditor during the three-year period and so does not meet the cram down requirement. The appellate court remands for the bankruptcy court to determine whether the plan meets the indubitable equivalent requirement of section 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii). East West Bank v. Ravello Landing, LLC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101007 (D. Nev. Sept. 7, 2010).

5.5.vvv Duty to maximize value under a plan is not absolute. The debtor had guaranteed its parent's lender's claim for up to $75 million. The debtor had contracted prepetition for a sale through a plan of its principal asset for more than enough to pay all claims, including the guarantee claim, but for less than other offers for the asset. The proceeds to equity would not be enough to pay the parent's full liability to the lender. The debtor's equity holders accepted the plan. The lender objected to confirmation on the ground that the debtor had not maximized the estate's value. A debtor in possession ordinarily has a duty to maximize the estate's value. But stakeholders may accept less than optimal treatment under a plan. The court reaches this result even without distinguishing between the duty of the debtor in possession, acting with all the duties of a trustee, and the duty of the debtor, who may propose a plan and who does not have such duties, nor between a duty to maximize value and a duty to attempt to maximize value. In re Texas Rangers Baseball P'ners, 434 B.R. 393 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2010).

5.5.www Nonimpairment under section 1124(1) requires that a creditor's post-effective date remedy be left unaffected. The debtor guaranteed a portion of the debtor's parent's loan. The loan agreement with the debtor and its parent provided that the lender would have the right to approve any sale of the debtor's principal asset. The debtor proposed a plan that provided for a sale of its principal asset and payment in cash in full of the guaranteed portion of the loan without the lender's consent. Section 1124(1) provides that a class of claims is not impaired if the plan does not alter the legal, equitable or contractual rights to which the claim entitles its holder. Section 1124(1) is prospective. It requires that the plan preserve the creditor's rights after consummation. However, because the sale is consummated at, not after, the effective date, the lender may not exercise the consent rights. But if the breach of the approval provision damaged the lender, its rights against the debtor and its parent to assert a claim must be preserved for the class not to be impaired. In re Texas Rangers Baseball P'ners, 434 B.R. 393 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2010).

5.5.xxx Chapter 11 plan may base value allocation on relative values of collateral pools and unencumbered assets. The debtor's secured lenders were secured by most but not all of the debtor's assets. Their claims exceeded the reorganized debtor's going concern value. The plan proposed to allocate the reorganized debtor's going concern value between the secured lenders and the unsecured creditors based on the relative values of the secured lenders' collateral and the unencumbered assets. Where the debtor reorganizes, collateral should be valued as a going concern, not on a lower liquidation value basis. The proper division of the excess of going concern over liquidation value should be proportional, based on the value that each creditor group "contributes" to the whole, rather than on an asset-by-asset basis. Therefore, the plan properly allocated value between the secured lenders and the unsecured creditors. In re Hawaiian Telcom Communications, Inc., 430 B.R. 564 (Bankr. D. Hi. 2009).

- 5.5.yyy Substantial consummation requires commencement of distribution to all classes. The debtor confirmed a plan and made distributions to some but not all classes of secured claims and to no classes of unsecured claims. The debtor moved to modify the plan. A plan may be modified after confirmation but not after substantial consummation, which is defined as “(A) transfer of all or substantially all property proposed by the plan to be transferred; (B) assumption by the debtor ... of the business or of the management of all or substantially all of the property dealt with by the plan; and (C) commencement of distribution under the plan.” “Substantial”, especially when used with “all” means at least more than half. Although subparagraph (C) does not require commencement of distribution of substantially all payments or to substantially all classes or creditors, “commencement” should be construed to cover commencement of payments to all or substantially all creditors. Thus, the plan has not been substantially consummated and may be modified. In re Dean Hardwoods, Inc., 431 B.R. 387 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2010).
- 5.5.zzz Absolute priority rule does not apply in an individual chapter 11 case. The individual chapter 11 debtor operated a small business as a sole proprietorship but got into financial trouble from real estate investments. The debtor proposed a plan that left him the business but paid his general unsecured creditors only 10%. One creditor in that class rejected the plan; none accepted, but none objected to confirmation. Section 1129 permits plan confirmation where fewer than all classes have accepted the plan if the plan is “fair and equitable” as to the nonaccepting class. Under section 1129(b)(2)(B), for a class of unsecured claims, “fair and equitable” requires that the plan provide that claims receive full payment or that equity not receive or retain any property, except in an individual case, “the debtor may retain property included in the estate under section 1115”. Section 1115 provides that in an individual case, “in addition to property specified in section 541”, property of the estate includes property acquired postpetition and postpetition earnings. These provisions were added in 2005 as part of a legislative package that attempted to make the rules governing payments to creditors in an individual chapter 11 case parallel those in a chapter 13 case. Reading section 1115 narrowly, to exclude property that becomes property of the estate under section 541, would require the debtor to devote section 541 property to the plan, unlike in a chapter 13 case. Reading it to include section 541 property (and thus to exclude section 541 property from the absolute priority rule of section 1129(b)(2)(B)) makes the provision consistent with chapter 13. Therefore, the court confirms the plan. In re Shat, 424 B.R. 854 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2010).
- 5.5.aaaa Court denies confirmation sua sponte under section 1129(d) for tax avoidance. A single individual controlled both the shell corporation debtor and its sole creditor, who held its unsecured claim through a convoluted series of insider transactions involving additional affiliated corporations. The debtor’s sole asset was its net operating loss carryovers. It proposed a plan that would convert the creditor’s debt to equity. The disclosure statement made clear that the purpose was to allow the debtor to preserve and to be able to use the NOL. Not surprisingly, the creditor accepted the plan. The IRS did not object to confirmation, but the U.S. trustee did. Section 1129(d) provides, “on request of a party in interest that is a governmental unit, the court may not confirm a plan if the principal purpose of the plan is the avoidance of taxes”. Section 307 authorizes the U.S. trustee to appear and be heard on any issue, and section 105 permits the court to take action sua sponte despite a provision requiring an issue to be raised by a party in interest. As the U.S. trustee is the congressionally mandated watchdog in bankruptcy cases, the U.S. trustee is a party in interest who may object to confirmation on tax avoidance grounds under section 1129(d). The plan’s principal purpose was tax avoidance, but the plan also was not proposed in good faith, because it did not have a valid reorganization purpose at all, such as preserving a going concern or maximizing value for creditors. Therefore, the court denies confirmation and dismissed the case. In re S. Beach Secs., Inc., 606 F.3d 366 (7th Cir. 2010).
- 5.5.bbbb A cram down plan sale does not require that the secured creditor be permitted to credit bid. Section 363(k) provides that at a sale under section 363(b), a secured creditor may credit bid its claim, unless the court orders otherwise. Section 1129(b)(1) requires that a plan confirmed without the acceptance of one or more classes be fair and equitable as to the non-accepting class. Section 1129(b)(2)(A) provides that the fair and equitable requirement as to a class of secured claims includes the requirement that the plan provide “(i)(I) that the holders of such claims retain the liens secured by such claims, whether the property ... is retained by the debtor or transferred ... (ii) for the sale, subject to section 363(k) of this title, of any property that is subject to the liens securing such claims, free and clear of such liens ... or (iii) for the realization by such holders of the indubitable equivalent of such claims”. The secured lenders here had a lien on all of the debtor’s assets. The debtor filed a plan that provided for the sale at a public auction of all its assets free and clear of liens. It also filed a motion for approval of bid procedures for the plan sale, with a stalking horse asset purchase agreement at a price substantially below the lenders’ claim. The bid procedures motion sought to preclude the lenders from credit bidding their claims, arguing that a plan providing for a sale free and clear, with proceeds paid to the secured creditors, could be confirmed under clause (iii). The lenders objected. The three clauses of section 1129(b)(2)(A) are connected by “or”, which is not exclusive, so the court may confirm the plan if any one of the clauses applies. Although a specific statutory provision prevails over a general one, clause (iii) is not a general provision but a broad catchall that provides an alternative to a sale under clause (ii). As such, clause (ii) does not limit the use of clause (iii) to effect a sale. Clause (iii) requires only that the secured creditors receive the “indubitable equivalent” of their claims. It does not prescribe a specific procedure; nor is credit bidding required for a secured creditor to receive the indubitable equivalent. Therefore, the bid procedures need not permit credit bidding for the plan sale to comply with the section 1129(b)(2)(A) cram down requirements. A vigorous dissent argues that the entire structure of the treatment of secured claims under sections 363(k), 1111(b) and 1129(b)(2)(A) does not permit evasion in the context of a straight plan sale to a third party of the secured creditor’s credit bidding protection. In re Phila. Newspapers, LLC, 599 F.3d 298 (3d Cir. 2010).

5.5.cccc Court designates vote of competitor that bought claims and rejected plan to acquire debtor. The debtor proposed a plan under which its first lien note holders would receive modified notes and its second lien note holders would receive substantially all the reorganized debtor’s equity. After the debtor filed the plan, a competitor purchased all of the debtor’s first lien notes at par and rejected the plan. In purchasing the claims, the competitor intended to acquire the debtor, not to recover as a creditor. Section 1126(e) permits a court to designate an entity whose acceptance or rejection of a plan was not in good faith. Absence of good faith may be found where the creditor seeks personal advantage not available to other holders of claims of the same class or has an ulterior motive that is not related to its interest as a creditor. For example, a court may designate a vote where the creditor is using its position to assume control of the debtor, put the debtor out of business or gain competitive advantage, destroy the debtor out of malice or obtain benefits from an agreement with a third party that depends on the debtor’s failure to reorganize. Even though it held all the claims in the class, the competitor’s rejection of the plan to further its acquisition interest was not consistent with its interest as a creditor in enhancing recoveries. The court therefore designates its rejection. In re DBSD N. Am., Inc., 421 B.R. 133 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009), aff’d, Sprint Nextel Corp. v. DBSD N. Am., Inc. (In re DBSD N. Am., Inc.), 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 33253 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 24, 2010).

5.5.dddd Section 1123(a)(5) preempts only nonbankruptcy law relating to financial condition. The county in which the debtor taxicab company operated regulated taxi operations by issuance of fleet personal vehicle licenses and individual personal vehicle licenses. For each, the county imposed operational and financial requirements, but for fleets, it also imposed additional requirements relating to the availability of taxicab service within the county. The county also restricted the number of fleet licenses that could be transferred to individuals. The debtor’s plan proposed to distribute a substantial number of its fleet licenses to individuals without the county’s approval. Section 1123(a)(5) provides, “Notwithstanding any other applicable nonbankruptcy law, a plan shall ... provide adequate means for the plan's implementation". The introductory phrase shows clear Congressional intent to preempt state and local law but does not address the scope of preemption. Section 1142(a) contains similar preemptive language, "Notwithstanding any otherwise applicable nonbankruptcy law relating to financial condition", in authorizing the debtor to carry out the plan. Therefore, it makes sense to apply section 1142(a)'s scope of preemption to section 1123(a)(5). So limited, section 1123(a)(5) does not preempt laws regulating public health, safety or welfare. Although the county's taxicab regulations deal with financing stability and insurance, overall they are an exercise of the police power to regulate the adequate provision of safe and available taxicab service in the county. As such, they do not relate to financial condition and are not preempted. Montgomery County v. Barwood, Inc., 422 B.R. 40 (D. Md. 2009).

5.5.eeee Court confirms plan that does not determine relative distributions between common stock and securities law damage claims. The debtor in possession liquidated its tangible assets during the case; the intangible assets remained to be liquidated or collected and distributed under the plan. The plan created a class of equity security holders and a class of claims for damages arising from violations of the securities laws with respect to the debtor's common stock but did not specify the relative treatment of the two classes, leaving that for the court to determine by an adversary proceeding if there were more than sufficient assets to pay all unsecured claims in full. The bankruptcy court approved this provision only after the parties failed to reach agreement on a formula for the allowance and therefore the relative distributions between the two classes. Section 1123(a)(3) requires that a plan specify the treatment of any impaired class of claims or interests. This plan provision's vagueness does not violate section 1123(a)(3). It identified the source of distributions, the proportionate share of distributions between the two classes based on the allowance of their claims and interests and the respective priority of distributions. Such specificity does not differ materially from a "pot" plan, where distributions on particular claims are based on the total amount of all allowed claims, which are determined separately from the plan confirmation process. The plan therefore meets the requirements of section 1123(a)(3). Schaefer v. Superior Offshore Int'l, Inc. (In re Superior Offshore Int'l, Inc.), 591 F.3d 350 (5th Cir. 2009).

5.5.ffff "Indubitable equivalent" permits cash-out cramdown of secured claims based on bankruptcy court valuation. One affiliated debtor was an operating lumber business; the other was a single purpose entity that owned timberland that secured bonds. The debtors proposed a joint plan that provided for the transfer of each debtor's assets to new companies created and owned by two plan sponsors. One plan sponsor was unrelated to the debtors. The other held a large unsecured claim against the operating debtor. The plan provided for the sponsors to fund cash sufficient to pay the secured bonds the value of the timberland and provide working capital and to convert the sponsor's unsecured claim to equity. The plan classified the bonds into a secured claim class and an unsecured deficiency claim class, separate from other unsecured claims. Neither bond class accepted the plan. The bankruptcy court heard extensive valuation testimony and valued the timberland collateral at less than the amount owing on the bonds. The court may confirm a plan over the nonacceptance of a class of secured claims if the plan is fair and equitable, which requires at a minimum under section 1129(b)(2)(A) that the plan provide

- (i) deferred cash payments to the secured claim holder of a present value equal to the allowed amount
- of the claim, (ii) sale of the collateral, subject to section 363(k), which authorizes a credit bid or
- (iii) for the realization by the holder of the indubitable equivalent of the claim. The property transfer to the new entities is a "sale" under clause (ii). However, clause (ii) is not the exclusive means of permitting a cramdown sale. Therefore, a plan that provides for a sale may be confirmed if it meets clause (iii). Clause (iii) permits a cash payment. The secured claim cramdown provision focuses on principal repayment and time value of money. Cash satisfies both these focuses. Therefore, the court properly confirmed the plan. Bank of N.Y. Trust Co., N.A. v. Official Unsecured Creditors' Comm. (In re Pac. Lumber Co.), 584 F.3d 229 (5th Cir. 2009).

5.5.gggg Court confirms plan that provides additional distribution by secured creditors to only certain trade creditors. A senior secured lender group held valid secured claims in an amount greater than the reorganized debtor's value. The debtor proposed a plan that provided for distribution of new secured debt and 100% of the reorganized debtor's equity to the secured lenders (resulting in an approximately 42% recovery), cash to holders of general unsecured claim equal to approximately 9% of the claims and nothing for equity. In addition, the secured lenders, who would become the reorganized debtor's equity owners, offered an additional distribution to trade creditors who did not object to confirmation and who agreed to release the debtor and the secured lenders from any claims arising during the cases or from plan confirmation. The distribution's purpose was to enhance future supply to the reorganized debtor by engendering good will among suppliers and protecting some suppliers from their own financial distress and possible failures. Any additional distribution amounts that were not paid to trade creditors who did not consent would be paid to the secured lenders. The plan provides for the plan administrator to make the trade creditor distribution and for the court to resolve any disputes relating to the distribution. Section 1123(a)(4) requires equal treatment under a plan of each claim in a class. On the other hand, a creditor may dispose of its recovery from the estate in any way it chooses, without regard to the Bankruptcy Code's restrictions. The plan's involvement of the plan administration and the court in connection with the distribution are immaterial and do not make the distribution one that is "under the plan" so that it would violate section 1123(a)(4). In addition, excising the additional distribution provision would not enhance recoveries to any class except the secured lenders, who were providing the additional distribution. Therefore, the court confirms the plan. In re Journal Register Co., 407 B.R. 520 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

5.5.hhhh Compromise combined plan distribution improperly effects substantive consolidation. The related debtors had numerous intercompany claims, and many creditors' claims could be asserted against more than one debtor. The plan compromised both of these issues, among others, by allowing multi-debtor claims at 130% of face amount against the parent debtor, disallowing the claims against the other debtors and providing for distribution of the aggregate assets of the debtors among all claims against them, pro rata, based on the allowed amounts of the claims. Each creditor class voted separately, and all but one accepted the plan. Substantive consolidation combines the assets and liabilities of separate entities and distributes the combined assets among creditors of all the consolidated entities. It is an equitable remedy to address harms a debtor has caused by disregarding separateness or entangling its affairs. It should be used sparingly. Although the aggregation here was a result of a compromise settlement and did not erase intercompany claims, it had the same adverse effect on some creditors as an ordinary consolidation and therefore effects a substantive consolidation without the requisite showing of need. Section 1123(a)(4) requires that each claim in a class receive the same treatment, except to the extent the holder of a claim elects less favorable treatment. The 130% settlement provides more advantageous treatment to the multi-debtor creditors within an accepting class and less favorable treatment to the creditors in the nonaccepting class. Thus, the plan violates section 1123(a)(4). Schroeder v. New Century Liquidating Trust (In re New Century TS Holdings, Inc.), 407 B.R. 576 (D. Del. 2009).

5.5.iiiii Compromise combined plan distribution does not effect substantive consolidation. The related debtors had numerous intercompany claims, and many creditors' claims could be asserted against more than one debtor. The plan compromised both of these issues, among others, by allowing multi-debtor claims at 130% of face amount against the parent debtor, disallowing the claims against the other debtors and providing for distribution of the aggregate assets of the debtors among all claims against them, pro rata, based on the allowed amounts of the claims. Each creditor class voted separately, and all but one accepted the plan. Substantive consolidation combines the assets and liabilities of separate entities and distributes the combined assets among creditors of all the consolidated entities. The plan here is not a substantive consolidation. The plan recognizes and preserves each debtor's separateness but pools assets and liabilities and adjusts claims to compromise difficult disputed issues. Section 1123(a)(4) requires that each claim in a class receive the same treatment, except to the extent the holder of a claim elects less favorable treatment. The 130% settlement does not provide more advantageous treatment to certain creditors within a class. Because the multi-debtor creditors would have had 100% claims against more than one debtor, accepting a 130% claim against only one debtor results in less favorable treatment and does not violate section 1123(a)(4). In re New Century TS Holdings, Inc., 390 B.R. 140 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).

5.5.jjjj Court approves substantive consolidation under a plan. Creditors filed an involuntary petition against one of 19 related debtors, which consented to relief under chapter 11. Two related debtors and the 16 subsidiaries of the three principal debtors filed chapter 11 cases six months later. The debtors shared all shareholders, directors and officers. Corporate formalities were not observed for intercompany dealings, and most of the subsidiaries were only "minute books" on a shelf. The debtors conducted the same business operations under similar names. The creditors dealt with the debtors as though they were a single entity, and the debtors' books and records were incapable of being untangled. Only the lead parent debtor paid operating expenses of all debtors. A secured creditor had a lien on all debtors' assets to secure a claim substantially in excess of their value and agreed to waive its deficiency claim so that unsecured creditors could obtain a recovery under the plan. Substantive consolidation is appropriate where creditors dealt with the entities as a single economic unit and did not rely on their separate identity in extending credit and where the debtors' affairs are so entangled that consolidation will benefit all creditors. Here, the facts satisfied the first factor, creditor reliance. They also satisfied the second factor, because the books were entangled and, more importantly, all creditors benefited because the principal secured creditor waived its deficiency claim under the substantive consolidation plan to permit unsecured creditors to obtain some recovery. Windels Marx Lane & Mittendorf, LLP v. Source Enterps., Inc. (In re Source Enterps., Inc.), 392 B.R. 541 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

5.5.kkkk Cram down on an 1111(b)-electing secured creditor requires payment of the creditor's full allowed claim upon an early sale. The debtor's plan crammed down the secured creditor, who had made a section 1111(b) election. The plan provided a note equal to the value of the real property collateral (the creditor's allowed secured claim) with a market interest rate and a 40-year level payment amortization. The note did not address payment upon an earlier sale of the collateral, but the plan provided that the creditor would retain its lien until payment in full of the full face amount of the creditor's allowed claim. The debtor argued that an early sale would thus require an "1111(b) premium" payment equal to the difference between the full allowed claim and the amounts paid to the creditor as of the sale date, but the plan did not expressly so provide. To confirm a plan under section 1129(b) for a secured creditor who has made the section 1111(b) election, the plan must provide for the creditor to retain its lien and for cash payments equal to the full allowed amount of the claim with a present value equal to the allowed secured claim (the collateral value). The plan can accomplish the latter by a below-market interest rate, but the note must secure the full allowed claim, not only the collateral value. The note must also provide that any payments, including the below-market interest payments, are applied to the note's face amount. However, the court does not address whether all such payments must be applied to the note's face amount or if there is a point at which the present value analysis requires that some of the payments be treated as interest. The court also requires the note to provide for the payment of the section 1111(b) premium but does not address whether setting the note's face amount at the full amount of the allowed claim accomplishes the same result. Gen. Elec. Credit Equities, Inc. v. Brice Rd. Develops., LLC (In re Brice Rd. Develops. LLC), 392 B.R. 274 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

5.5.iii A due-on-sale clause is not a lien for purposes of section 1129(b)(2)(A). Legislation authorizes the FCC to sell C-block and F-block spectrum licenses to qualified licensees for a small cash payment and an installment note secured by the licenses. The regulations governing the program require repayment of the note if the debtor sells the licenses to a licensee who is not qualified for the installment payment program. The debtor’s plan proposed to transfer the licenses to such a non-qualified licensee, subject to the lien. The FCC did not accept the plan. The court may confirm a plan that a secured creditor does not accept if the plan provides for the creditor to “retain the lien” securing the claim. The Bankruptcy Code preempts any federal regulations that attempt to restrict the bankruptcy court’s ability to adjust debts, though not regulations that govern post-confirmation conduct or operations. A “lien” is a charge against or interest in property. The due-on-sale regulation is a payment term, just like any other term specifying the time of payment of an obligation, not an interest in the licenses. Therefore, the plan’s license transfer without satisfying the due-on-sale regulation does not violate the requirement that the plan provide for the creditor to “retain” the lien. Airadigm Comm’ns, Inc. v. Fed. Comm’ns Comm’n (In re Airadigm Comm’ns, Inc.), 519 F.3d 640 (7th Cir. 2008).

5.5.mmm Confirmation revocation is discretionary but requires the court to protect entities that acquired rights under the plan. The debtors confirmed a “pot” plan, which provided a fixed distribution to unsecured creditors, to be allocated among them based on the total amount of allowed claims. The disclosure statement estimated the amount that would be allowed, with caveats that it could not assure that would be the final amount and that the plan proponents would not update the disclosure statement before confirmation. The debtors announced 49 days after confirmation that the allowed claims estimate had increased by over 25%. A noteholder group, alleging the debtors knew of the increase before confirmation, sued on the 180th day after confirmation to set aside confirmation as having been procured by fraud. Section 1144 permits but does not require a court to revoke confirmation if it was procured by fraud. However, it requires that any revocation order “contain such provisions as are necessary to protect any entity acquiring rights in good faith reliance on the order of confirmation”. If a court cannot do so, it may not revoke confirmation. Because the complex transactions implemented under the confirmed plan here, including consummation of exit financing and distributions of stock to unsecured creditors, cannot be unwound, the court may not revoke confirmation. In addition, a court should dismiss a challenge to confirmation as equitably moot upon a finding of substantial consummation, unless granting relief will not affect the debtor’s reemergence and will not unravel complex transactions, among other things. Here, revocation would “knock the props out from under the authorization for every transaction that has taken place and create an unmanageable, uncontrollable situation”. Moreover, by waiting 131 days after the debtors announced the claims estimate revision, the noteholders did not act with the required diligence. Accordingly, the court dismisses the complaint as equitably moot. Varde Investment P’ners, L.P. v. Comair, Inc. (In re Delta Air Lines, Inc.), 385 B.R. 518 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2008).

5.5.nnn Court must consider the possible outcomes of nonbankruptcy civil litigation in determining feasibility. A creditor sued a debtor and his closely-held corporation in state court. The state court found the debtor not personally liable, but the creditor appealed. While the appeal was pending, the bankruptcy court disallowed the creditor’s claim, subject to reconsideration. In considering confirmation of the debtor’s 100% payment chapter 11 plan, the bankruptcy court must consider the likely future events that could affect the debtor’s ability to perform the plan, such as the possibility that the state appellate court might reverse. It may not determine feasibility based solely on the disallowance of the creditor’s claim. Although the court cannot predict the appeal’s outcome with certainty, it may not ignore the pendency of litigation. The court need not, however, delay confirmation until the state court resolves the litigation, so long as it considers the consequences of the possible outcomes of the state court litigation. Sherman v. Harbin (In re Harbin), 486 F.3d 510 (9th Cir. 2007).

- 5.5.0000 Release of creditor plan proponent for plan implementation activities is impermissible. The major secured creditor obtained confirmation of its own plan that provided for a trustee to sell the debtor's real estate, and, if the sale were not consummated within a certain time, for the secured creditor to foreclose. The plan released the creditor from all existing claims, including a fraudulent transfer claim that the debtor had asserted, in exchange for which the secured creditor distributed some of its collateral sales proceeds to pay certain administrative and priority claims. Section 1123(b)(3)(A) permits a plan to release the estate's claims. In judging a release, the court ordinarily defers to the judgment of the trustee, as the fiduciary administering the estate. Here, however, the creditor, who is not acting as a fiduciary, proposed to release itself. Such a release requires a higher standard of review. In addition, the plan proposed a general release of the creditor, including for claims arising from the breach of the plan or for negligence or malfeasance in plan implementation. Because a plan is a contract, it "should be enforceable and amenable to damages". The release is inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code and renders the plan unconfirmable. Whispering Pines Estates, Inc. v. Flash Island, Inc. (In re Whispering Pines Estates, Inc.), 370 B.R. 452 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2007).
- 5.5.pppp Creditor plan may transfer non-profit debtor's property without compliance with state law transfer procedures. State non-profit corporation laws typically impose procedural restrictions, such as a super-majority board vote or court or Attorney General approval, on a non-profit corporation's transfer of substantially all of its assets. Section 1129(a)(16) requires, as a confirmation condition, compliance with those restrictions. Here, however, a creditor seeks confirmation of a plan providing for transfer of the debtor's property to a new entity. The debtor objects. The property transfer under the creditor's plan is an involuntary transfer to which the state law restriction does not apply. Otherwise, for example, a creditor could not foreclose on a non-profit's assets without compliance with the restrictions. Therefore, the restrictions do not apply to the creditor's plan. In re Machne Menachem, Inc., 371 B.R. 63 (Bankr. M.D. Pa. 2006).
- 5.5.qqqq Individual debtor may retain property even under a cram down plan. The individual debtor's plan proposed payment on allowed secured, priority, and general unsecured claims of all disposable income over 10 years. The payments were not likely to pay unsecured claims in full. The class of unsecured claims rejected the plan. BAPCPA amended the absolute priority rule in section 1129(b)(2)(B(ii) to permit a debtor to retain "property included in the estate under section 1115", which includes all post-petition earnings. As such, the debtor may retain his petition date property and his postpetition earnings without violating the absolute priority rule's general prohibition on the debtor receiving or retaining any property if unsecured claims are not paid in full. In re Tegeder, 369 B.R. 477 (Bankr. D. Neb. 2007).
- 5.5.rrrr Court sets cram-down parameters for undeveloped real estate plan. The debtor owned undeveloped real estate. The debtor and its principal secured creditor each proposed a plan. The debtor's plan provided for equal payments on the creditor's claim of principal and interest at the three-year Treasury bill rate plus 200 basis points, to be funded by the debtor's general partner, for 30 months, during which the debtor would market and sell the property. Unsecured claims would be paid immediately. The bankruptcy court confirms the plan over the creditor's objection. The absolute priority rule does not require that secured claims be paid before unsecured claims, just that they be fully provided for before providing for unsecured claims. Till v. SCS Credit Corp., 541 U.S. 465 (2004), does not require use of a market rate for cram down in a chapter 11 case if there is no market for a comparable loan, but the court must take evidence to determine whether such a market exists. If there is no market, then the court must use Till's "prime-plus" method, unless the court makes findings on the evidence that it is appropriate to use a different base rate. Mercury Cap. Corp. v. Milford Conn. Assocs., L.P., 354 B.R. 1 (D. Conn. 2006).
- 5.5.ssss Granting releases only to creditors who accept a plan may violate the "equal treatment" rule. The plan was the product of a widely (but not universally) supported settlement agreement. It granted releases to creditors in certain classes who accepted the plan but not to those who did not. Otherwise, it provided the same distribution to all creditors in those classes. Section 1123(a)(4) does not permit different treatment of creditors based on whether they accept the plan. A release is valuable consideration. Therefore, in the context of a motion for a stay pending appeal, the district court determines that there is a substantial likelihood that granting the release only to accepting creditors may violate the equal treatment rule of section 1123(a)(4). ACC Bondholder Group v. Adelpia Commc'ns Corp. (In re Adelpia Commc'ns Corp.), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7416 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 24, 2007).

5.5.tttt Section 1144 does not bar post-confirmation action against non-debtors for damages from confirmation. Two years after they vigorously contested plan confirmation on valuation grounds, junior creditors sued senior creditors and the debtor's chief financial officer for money damages for fraud in connection with the projections and valuations that the debtor presented at the confirmation hearing. Although section 1144, which provides that confirmation may be revoked only for fraud and only if the challenge is brought within 180 days after confirmation, bars any action against the reorganized debtor, it does not bar claims against the senior creditors. Action against creditors for damages does not affect the reorganized debtor, would not upset the plan, and does not "redivide the pie." Haskell v. Goldman, Sachs & Co. (In re Genesis Health Ventures, Inc.), 355 B.R. 438 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).

5.5.uuuu Surplus funds may be directed to charity. The plan provided for a liquidating trust, which would administer any assets or claims of the debtor. The liquidating trust generated a surplus after paying all allowed claims in full with interest. The plan expressly cancelled all of the common stockholders' interests but permitted a distribution of any surplus to preferred stockholders, who later waived the distribution during the post-confirmation administration. The plan could not be modified to provide for distribution of the surplus, because section 1127 prohibits modification after substantial consummation. The surplus funds are not "unclaimed funds" subject to escheat, because they are not abandoned or unclaimed by any rightful owner or someone who is entitled to them. Under the cy pres doctrine, therefore, the court may direct their disposition, taking into account the suggestions of the trustee and her counsel, whose efforts helped generate the surplus. In re Xpedior Inc., 354 B.R. 210 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006).

5.5.vvvv The absolute priority rule requires payment of unsecured postpetition default interest in a solvent case. Section 1129(b) permits confirmation over an unsecured claims class's plan nonacceptance only if the plan is fair and equitable, which requires that either unsecured claims are paid in full or no junior class receives or retains any consideration under the plan. Payment in full requires payment of postpetition interest. A court may allow payment of only nondefault rate interest, based on equitable considerations, when the debtor is not solvent. Equitable considerations are limited, however, to the terms of the Bankruptcy Code and are further limited when the debtor is solvent. In that case, there is a presumption that postpetition default rate interest should be paid on unsecured claims, which may, however, be rebutted in limited circumstances, which the court does not specify. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Dow Corning Corp. (In re Dow Corning Corp.), 456 F.3d 668 (6th Cir. 2006).

5.5.wwww Only the district court may estimate tort claims for a plan distribution cap. The debtor's proposed plan distributed a fixed amount to a settlement trust as the sole source of payment of all tort claims. Confirmation with the cap would have the effect of limiting the distribution on the tort claims, so confirmation requires a determination that the aggregate amount of the tort claims does not exceed the proposed distribution. The debtor sought an estimate of the aggregate amount of the claims for purposes of limiting distribution under the plan. Only the district court may determine the amount of personal injury tort claims for purposes of distribution. Because the plan had the effect of limiting distribution to the aggregate estimated amount of the claims, the estimation would be for purposes of distribution, not just for allowance. The bankruptcy court may recommend a methodology to the district court. The methodology would not require mini-trials for each of the 129 claims but might entail the employment of an expert to develop a matrix or the use of advisory jury trials to develop a range of possible recoveries. However, estimation for confirmation and voting purposes involves less drastic effects on the claimants and will be permitted in the bankruptcy court with less exacting procedures. In re Roman Catholic Archbishop of Portland in Oregon, 339 B.R. 215 (Bankr. D. Ore. 2006).

5.5.xxxx Post-confirmation action against debtor for damages from confirmation is barred.

Two years after they vigorously contested plan confirmation on valuation grounds, junior creditors sued the reorganized debtor, senior creditors, and the debtor's chief financial officer for money damages for fraud in connection with the projections and valuations that the debtor presented at the confirmation hearing. The action against the reorganized debtor was barred by section 1144, which provides that confirmation may be revoked only for fraud and only if the challenge is brought within 180 days after confirmation. Although this action did not seek to revoke confirmation, its claim against the debtor for money damages in favor of prior junior creditors would, if successful, effectively "redivide the pie" and therefore constitutes an impermissible attack on the confirmation order. Finally, because valuation issues necessarily are litigated at confirmation and were in fact litigated in this case, with the plaintiffs here as active participants, res judicata bars any relitigation in this later action. However, the claims against the senior creditors are not necessarily similarly barred. The bankruptcy court should separately consider whether section 1144 should also bar claims against them. In addition, the junior creditors alleged that new evidence was disclosed only after confirmation and could not have been discovered before confirmation. The bankruptcy court did not adequately consider those allegations in ruling on the motion to dismiss, so the case is remanded for further consideration. Haskell v. Goldman, Sachs & Co. (In re Genesis Health Ventures, Inc.), 340 B.R. 729 (D. Del. 2006), aff'g in part and rev'g in part 324 B.R. 510 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).

5.5.yyyy Settlement with SEC for securities fraud does not violate the absolute priority rule.

The debtors disclosed that their financial statements were materially false, leading to withdrawal of their auditor's opinion, defaults on their credit facilities, shareholder lawsuits, government investigations, and ultimately, chapter 11. The SEC filed a proof of claim in the case for penalties and disgorgement. The debtor in possession reached a settlement with the SEC and the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice agreed not to indict the debtor corporation, and the debtor in possession made a payment of $715 million to an SEC restitution fund for the benefit of defrauded shareholders. Unsecured creditors in the chapter 11 cases were not likely to receive payment in full of their claims. Nevertheless, the settlement was reasonable and should be approved. It did not violate the absolute priority rule by allowing shareholders to receive value from the estate on account of their interests before creditors were paid in full. (The district court affirms the bankruptcy court's opinion approving the settlement, reported at 327 B.R. 143 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005), without adding additional reasons of its own.) Adelphia Trade Claims Commc'ns v. Adelphia Comm. Corp., 337 B.R. 475 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

5.5.zzzz Third Circuit rejects "squeeze play" cram down based on SPM Mfg.

The debtor's plan provided for less than full payment to classes 6 and 7, both general unsecured claims classes, and distribution of warrants to class 12, the equity class. But if class 6 did not accept the plan, class 7 would be entitled to the warrants but would immediately transfer them to the equity holder. Class 6 rejected, and the creditors' committee objected to confirmation. The plan did not meet the literal terms of the absolute priority rule in section 1129(b)(2)(B), because a class of unsecured claims (class 6) did not accept the plan, yet a junior class (class 12) received something on account of its equity interests. Although this is not literally the "squeeze play" (senior class gives up value to equity squeezing out an intermediate unsecured claims class) that the legislative history condemns, the literal language of the statute, supported by other legislative history, does not permit it. Nor does In re SPM Mfg. Co., 984 F.2d 1305 (1st Cir. 1993), authorize the cram down. That case differed because it was a chapter 7, so section 1129(b) did not apply, and it was a secured creditor that transferred (carved out) a portion of its collateral for the unsecured class. Although permissible there, it does not meet the requirements of the absolute priority rule. In re Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 432 F.3d 507 (3d Cir. 2005).

5.5.aaaaa Court uses formula rate for chapter 11 cram down. Till v. SCS Credit Corp., 541 U.S. 465 (2004), required the use of a formula rate (“prime” plus a risk factor) for the interest rate on an obligation imposed under a chapter 13 plan cram down. However, it noted in footnote 14 that the same rate might not be appropriate in a chapter 11 case if an efficient market exists to determine the rate. In this chapter 11 case, the restructured loan was unusual, and no market would exist for this kind of loan. Therefore, the court applies Till and imposes a rate of prime plus 1% under the formula approach. In re Cantwell, 336 B.R. 688 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2006).

5.5.bbbbb Court rejects the market as a source for valuing a reorganizing debtor or its new securities. The court addresses the appropriate interest rate to use for valuing the securities issued under the plan and the valuation of the reorganized debtor under the plan. Till v. SCS Credit Corp., 541 U.S. 465 (2004), required a formula approach—a risk-free rate (prime) plus a risk factor—to determine the appropriate interest rate on debt issued under a chapter 13 secured creditor cramdown plan. Footnote 14 suggested (but did not hold) that a rate determined by an efficient market might be appropriate for valuing securities issued in a chapter 11 cramdown plan. The court here rejects Till's suggestion. What the market is willing to pay for the new debt is not relevant, because the market systematically undervalues emerging companies, and because Till, by rejecting a “forced loan” approach, rejected looking to the market for what it would charge. Similarly, the court does not look to the current market for the debtor’s securities to imply what the market believes the reorganized debtor will be worth. Uncertainties over the final plan terms and the timing and certainty of confirmation and effective date, as well as uncertainty over the general condition of the market at an unknown future effective date, depress the current market value. In addition, the market adds a taint for bankruptcy and does not adequately appreciate the added value that the chapter 11 process (including deleveraging, contract rejection, and other dispute resolution) and court approval of the plan add. The court instead finds guidance in Till and uses a formula approach. In a chapter 11 case, the risk factor will depend, however, on the nature of the securities (secured or unsecured, nature of collateral, debt or equity, debt to equity ratio, and the terms of the plan, among other things), not on a fixed 1% to 3% adder, which the Supreme Court adopted only for a consumer car loan. In re Mirant Corp., 334 B.R. 800 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2005).

5.5.ccccc Revocation of confirmation is subject to equitable considerations. The court had confirmed a prepackaged plan that converted all of the debtor’s bond debt to 100% of the equity of the reorganized debtor, but left the old shareholder with warrants for 10% of the reorganized company. Shortly after confirmation, the reorganized debtor issued additional stock in a public offering. Confirmation was based in part on the CFO’s testimony about the debtor’s financial performance in the quarter immediately before bankruptcy and the reorganized debtor’s expected financial performance. As it turned out, the reorganized debtor did much better than the testimony suggested. A former shareholder, who had objected to confirmation, sued under section 1144 to revoke confirmation, alleging that confirmation was procured by the CFO’s fraudulent testimony. Section 1144 requires an order revoking confirmation to include provisions to protect any entity acquiring rights in good faith reliance on the confirmation order. The court here could not provide such protection because of the consummation of the plan, the trading in new stock issued under the plan, and the issuance of new stock to the public. Revocation is discretionary, based on equitable principles, including principles similar to those underlying equitable mootness, and on whether the court can protect those who acquired rights in good faith reliance on confirmation. Here, the court could not provide such protection, so the court denies revocation. However, the former stockholder also sought damages for fraud. The court allows the former stockholder to amend his complaint to assert any claim he might have, without deciding whether there is any such claim. The court does not mention whether any such claim would be barred under principles of claim preclusion or issue preclusion, based on the stockholder's participation in the confirmation hearing. It also does not mention the 180-day bar in section 1144. Salsberg v. Trico Marine Servs., Inc. (In re Trico Marine Servs., Inc., 337 B.R. 811 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

- 5.5.ddddd Distribution delay based on disputed allowance of claim or interest does not violate the equal treatment requirement. The debtor's plan provided for interim distributions to holders of allowed claims or interests but delayed distribution on any interest that was subject to an examiner's investigation as to issues that might affect the validity or allowability of the interest. There was only one such interest. The provision for delay did not violate section 1123(a)(4)'s requirement that a plan provide equal treatment for each claim or interest in a particular class. Enron Corp. v. New Power Co. (In re New Power Co.), 438 F.3d 1113 (11th Cir. 2006).
- 5.5.eeeee Section 1142(b) order is limited to plan provisions. The debtor casino was subject to disciplinary proceedings before the state licensing board. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor, the creditors, and the board reached agreement on a plan that was based on a dismissal of the disciplinary proceedings. Three of the four board members testified at the confirmation hearing that they would not pursue the disciplinary proceedings, and the court confirmed the plan as feasible. A short time later, they resigned from the board and were replaced by new members who re-instituted the disciplinary proceeding. The bankruptcy court could not enjoin the proceedings under section 1142(b). The plan did not include the agreement not to pursue the disciplinary proceedings, and the court's power under section 1142(b) is limited to the terms of the plan. It does not create substantive rights that are not already contained in the plan. Village of Rosemont v. Jaffe (In re Emerald Casino, Inc.), 334 B.R. 378 (N.D. Ill. 2005).
- 5.5.fffff Coerced loan cram down interest rate may be appropriate for chapter 11. Before the decision in Till v. SCS Credit Corp., 541 U.S. 465 (2004), the bankruptcy court used the coerced loan approach in determining the cram down interest rate, imposing the 6-year Treasury rate plus 3.75%. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit focuses on Till's footnote 14, which suggests that "it might make sense to ask what rate an efficient market would produce," rather than the "prime plus" approach required for chapter 13 cram downs. The court determines that the coerced loan approach, based on testimony about the market rate for a coerced loan, is an appropriate method of determining the cram down interest rate in chapter 11. Bank of Montreal v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re American HomePatient, Inc.), 420 F.3d 559 (6th Cir. 2005).
- 5.5.ggggg Enforcement of foreign plan under section 304 requires equal treatment of creditors. The debtor had commenced an Acuerdo Preventivo Extrajudicial (APE) proceeding under Argentine law and obtained all requisite consents and Argentine court approval. It commenced a section 304 ancillary proceeding in the United States to enforce the plan in the U.S. The plan provided retail holders with less favorable treatment than qualified institutional buyers because offering the QIB treatment to retail holders would have required compliance with the registration requirements of U.S. securities laws. The bankruptcy court required equal treatment as a condition to approval. The debtor sought an order under section 304 that would have given full force and effect to the APE proceeding. Such an order requires an amendment to the plan to provide for equal treatment of creditors in the same class (here, bondholders), resolicitation of the plan in accordance with Argentine law, and approval of the amended plan by the Argentine court. This equal treatment requires not only the same plan distributions, but also compliance with U.S. securities laws for distribution of the consideration, either by registration or the availability of a registration exemption, which had to be demonstrated to the court. Argentinian Recovery Co. LLC v. Board of Directors of Multicanal S.A., 331 B.R. 537 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).
- 5.5.hhhhh Debtor's former attorney is not an insider. The debtor's former law firm did not represent the debtor in its chapter 11 case. It voted its claim in favor of the debtor's plan. The law firm is not an insider for purposes of determining under section 1129(a)(10) whether the plan has been accepted by the requisite votes, not counting the votes of insiders. Although the law firm did not come within the listed relationships in the “insider” definition, those relationships are illustrative, not limiting. A person may be an insider if it exercises control over the debtor because of an affinity, rather than solely because of long business dealings between the parties. This relationship with the attorney was at arm’s-length and did not give the law firm control. In addition, attorneys are not automatically considered insiders. In re Premiere Network Servs., Inc., 333 B.R. 126 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2005).

- 5.5.iii Post-confirmation action against debtor for damages from confirmation is barred. Two years after they vigorously contested plan confirmation on valuation grounds, junior creditors sued the reorganized debtor, senior creditors, and the debtor’s chief financial officer for money damages for fraud in connection with the projections and valuations that the debtor presented at the confirmation hearing. The action was barred by section 1144, which requires that a confirmation may be revoked only for fraud and only if the challenge is brought within 180 days after confirmation. Although this action did not seek to revoke the confirmation order, its claim against the debtor for money damages in favor of prior junior creditors would, if successful, effectively “redivide the pie” and therefore constitutes an impermissible attack on the confirmation order. In addition, any claim against the debtor was barred by the discharge, which operates as to any claims that arose before the date of confirmation. Finally, because valuation issues necessarily are litigated at confirmation and were in fact litigated in this case, with the plaintiffs here as active participants, res judicata bars any relitigation in this later action. Haskell v. Goldman, Sachs & Co. (In re Genesis Health Ventures, Inc.), 324 B.R. 510 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).
- 5.5.jjjj Vacating a confirmed chapter 11 plan does not vacate the confirmation order or the discharge. A creditor obtained confirmation of a chapter 11 plan that provided conditions to the effective date, including certain due diligence and no material adverse change in the debtor’s business. The plan provided that if the conditions were not met, the plan proponent could move to vacate the confirmation order, which would nullify the plan and the discharge. The confirmation order discharged the debtor of all claims that arose before the confirmation date. The conditions were not satisfied, the debtor’s management resigned, and a trustee was appointed. The trustee held an auction for the debtor’s assets, which were purchased by the debtor’s insiders. The trustee subsequently moved to vacate the confirmation order. The court issued an order vacating only the plan, not the order. The creditor subsequently sued the asset purchaser for the previously discharged claim. The court dismisses the suit, because the order vacating the plan did not vacate the confirmation order, which contained the discharge. Moreover, the order could not properly vacate the confirmation order, because the plan permitted only the proponent to move to vacate the order. Any other party not authorized by the plan to vacate the confirmation order must use section 1144, which requires an adversary proceeding and proof that the order was obtained by fraud. Mickowski v. Visi-Trak Worldwide, LLC, 415 F.3d 501 (6th Cir. 2005).
- 5.5.kkkk Cows are not the indubitable equivalent of cash. The debtor’s dairy cows were destroyed by a faulty electric fence, and the debtor’s operation failed. The debtor in possession recovered from the fencing company and proposed a plan that would use the cash recovery to purchase replacement cows and restart the operation. The bank, who had a security interest in the cash proceeds of the settlement, objected that the plan did not meet the requirements of section 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii), which requires that a plan that crams down a secured creditor provide the creditor the indubitable equivalent of its claim and lien. Because the creditor’s collateral had been converted to cash, the creditor was entitled to the cash. A lien on cows would be too risky because, among other things, there would be no equity cushion in case of adverse business events. The court therefore denies plan confirmation. Wiersma v. O.H. Kruse Grain & Milling (In re Wiersma), 324 B.R. 92 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).

- 5.5.IIIII Plan may not provide for senior creditors to transfer value to a junior class over non-acceptance by an intervening class. The chapter 11 plan provided a distribution of warrants to equity, but if one of two classes of unsecured claims did not accept the plan, then the warrants would be distributed to the other, accepting class, who would automatically waive the distribution in favor of the equity class. The plan violates the absolute priority rule and section 1129(b)(2)(B)(ii), which prohibits a junior class from receiving any distribution if a senior non-accepting unsecured class does not receive payment in full. In re SPM Mfg. Corp., 984 F.2d 1305 (1st Cir. 1993), does not support the plan’s treatment of the non-accepting unsecured class here. That case was under chapter 7, in which the absolute priority rule does not apply, and the property involved in SPM was the senior creditor’s collateral, not unencumbered property of the estate. Thus, the agreement there was more analogous to a “carve out,” under which a secured creditor may dispose of the property without restriction once it receives it. By contrast, the absolute priority rule does not permit a senior class to distribute under a plan any of its recovery to a junior class over the non-acceptance by an intervening class. Accordingly, the court denies plan confirmation. In re Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 320 B.R. 523 (D. Del. 2005).
- 5.5.mmmmm Similar claims must receive equal treatment under a plan. Claims received different treatment under the plan based on when they were asserted against the debtor, whether they had been settled, and whether their holders had accepted the plan. Such difference in treatment violates section 1123(a)(4)’s requirement of equal treatment of similarly situated claims in chapter 11 cases. The treatment must be based on the nature of the claimants’ rights against the debtor. Although the difference in treatment resulted from prepetition payments in connection with the solicitation of votes for a prepackaged plan, the court must consider the entire package, including the prepetition payments, in determining whether the claims receive equal treatment. In re Combustion Eng’g, Inc., 391 F.3d 190 (3d Cir. 2004).
- 5.5.nnnnn Section 1129(a)(3)’s good faith provision requires proper plan formulation procedure, not any particular outcome. The debtor’s plan provided for conversion of a substantial portion of the secured claims to equity and the elimination of prepetition equity interests. As part of the debtor’s prepetition plan negotiations, it negotiated for and obtained agreement from its secured lenders to a release of insider shareholders’ debts to the debtor, which arose from their purchase of stock, and to a four-year employment contract for the retiring Chairman and CEO, who was the debtor’s principal shareholder and who agreed to waive a three-year severance claim under his existing employment contract. The directors breach their fiduciary duty to shareholders by negotiating for special consideration for only certain of the shareholders and not treating all shareholders equally. The plan therefore did not meet the requirement of section 1129(a)(3) that it be proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law: the breach of fiduciary duty is forbidden by state corporate governance law. The debtor’s amendment of the plan to eliminate the special treatment did not cure the lack of good faith, because section 1129(a)(3) focuses on the procedure by which the plan was formulated and proposed, not on the plan’s substantive terms. The violation of law tainted the plan formulation process, and the plan could not be confirmed without reformulation of the plan in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law. In re Bush Indus., Inc., 315 B.R. 292 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 5.5.ooooo Artificial impairment may disqualify consenting class. An asbestos prepackaged plan set up a prepetition trust for participating asbestos claimants, but left each of them with a “stub” claim so that they could vote for the plan. Although artificial impairment may be permissible in a commercial context, in the prepackaged asbestos context, the prepetition payment resulted in the stub claimants not representing the true will of impaired creditors. Since the purpose of section 1129(a)(10), requiring the consent of at least one impaired class, appears to be to require consent from creditors representing those who are affected by the plan, the form of artificial impairment here did not appear to satisfy the monitoring function of section 1129(a)(10), and the case was remanded for further consideration of the artificial impairment issue. In re Combustion Eng'g, Inc., 391 F.3d 190 (3d Cir. 2004).

- 5.5.ppppp Nonimpairment and reinstatement eliminates effect of default as to all parties, not just the debtor. The holders of the senior secured notes were entitled to a prepayment penalty upon default and acceleration. The holders of the subordinated secured notes had agreed not to receive payment on their notes while any amounts remained owing under the senior notes. The debtor's plan provided for cure and reinstatement of the senior notes, thereby erasing the effect of the default and relieving the debtor of the prepayment penalty obligation. The senior note holders were not entitled to recover the prepayment penalty from the subordinated note holders' recovery, because the de-acceleration and reinstatement of the senior notes entirely eliminated the prepayment penalty obligation as to all parties, not just as to the debtor. MW Post Portfolio Fund Ltd. v. Norwest Bank Minnesota (In re ONCO Inv. Co.), 316 B.R. 163 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004).
- 5.5.qqqqq Confirmation valuation must include non-saleable assets. The Equity Committee objected to confirmation of the trustee's plan, in part because shareholders had not accepted the plan and, based on the Committee's valuation, the distribution to creditors exceeded the allowed amounts of their claims. In valuing the reorganized debtor for confirmation and absolute priority rule purposes, the court includes assets that a hypothetical purchaser would not buy, such as the value of the debtor's tax net operating losses, cash on hand, and litigation claims. Although a purchaser would not pay for them, they provided value available for distribution under the plan to creditors and shareholders. Therefore, they are included in the confirmation valuation. In re Coram Healthcare Corp., 315 B.R. 321 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004).
- 5.5.rrrrr Absolute priority rule may require payment of postpetition interest. The chapter 11 trustee sought confirmation of a plan under section 1129(b), over the objection and non-acceptance by equity holders, who claimed that creditors who received 100% of the stock of the reorganized debtor were being overpaid. Under the absolute priority rule, unsecured creditors may be entitled to payment of postpetition interest before holders of claims or interests in junior classes are entitled to any recovery. Taking into consideration the provision of section 506(b), under which an oversecured creditor is entitled to the allowance of postpetition interest at the contract rate, section 726(a)(5), under which unsecured creditors are entitled to postpetition interest at the legal rate before shareholders may recover, and section 1124, under which an unimpaired class of claims is entitled to postpetition interest as a condition to non-impairment, the court concludes that the provisions of section 502(b)(2), disallowing postpetition interest, is not controlling. Therefore, payment of postpetition interest on unsecured claims is not prohibited and may be required. The interest rate allowed must be based on the facts and circumstances of the case. In this case, owing to the misconduct of some of the holders of the unsecured claims, which benefited other holders as well, the court allows interest only at the legal rate, not the contract rate. In re Coram Healthcare Corp., 315 B.R. 321 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004).
- 5.5.sssss Chapter 11 plan may not eliminate setoff right. The debtor's chapter 11 plan provided for allowance of the IRS's tax claim and payment over six years, without acknowledging the IRS's claimed setoff right. Despite the plan's language, and recognizing the split in the case law on this issue, the court permitted the IRS to offset a tax debt it owed the debtor in partial satisfaction of the allowed claim. Section 553(a) preserves the right of setoff, "except as otherwise provided . . . in sections 362 and 363." Therefore, the discharge, which is found in section 1141, does not trump the preserved setoff right. In re Ronnie Dowdy, Inc., 314 B.R. 182 (Bankr. E.D. Ark. 2004).
- 5.5.ttttt Reinstatement under section 1124(2) does not waive default rate interest. The debtor defaulted under its mortgage before bankruptcy. It sold the mortgaged property during the case for more than the amounts owing on the secured claim and proposed a plan that would leave the secured class unimpaired under section 1124(2) by reinstating the mortgage and paying it off with non-default rate interest. Under Second Circuit law, reinstatement under section 1124(2) does not undo the effects of the prior default, so interest would be allowed at the default rate. In re 139-141 Owners Corp., 313 B.R. 364 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).

5.5.uuuuu Liquidated debtor that proposes to engage in business may receive a discharge.

Section 1141(d)(3) denies a discharge to a corporate debtor that liquidates substantially all its assets and does not engage in business after plan consummation. In this case, the corporate debtor had sold its assets and ceased business operations before its chapter 11 case. Its plan provided for distribution to creditors of litigation proceeds and for the debtor to recommence business operations. Its disclosure statement set forth a business plan and showed that the reorganized debtor will have the ability to operate. The debtor may therefore receive a discharge, because it will engage in business after consummation. In re Global Water Techs., Inc., 311 B.R. 896 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2004).

The debtor lied on her bankruptcy schedules about her income and assets, but in a way that would have put a creditor on notice of the lie. 180 days after confirmation of the debtor's chapter 13 plan, creditors moved to revoke confirmation on the ground that it was obtained by fraud. Later, the creditors also moved to revoke confirmation on the ground that the debtor lied about her debts and was ineligible for chapter 13 under its debt limits. The 180-day deadline to seek revocation of confirmation is absolute, despite the debtor's fraud, and fraud is the only ground to obtain revocation. In this case, although the debtor obtained confirmation by fraud about her assets and income, those issues could have been litigated at the confirmation hearing, because the creditors, had they been diligent in investigating, would have uncovered the lie. Nor can they evade the 180-day limit by seeking revocation under section 105(a) or under Rule 9024 (incorporating Fed. R. Civ. P. 60), which expressly bars its use to revoke confirmation. They could, however, seek dismissal or conversion under section 1307 more than 180 days after confirmation based on the lie about debts and eligibility, because dismissal is not time-limited, and there was nothing that would have put the creditor on notice of the lie. Therefore, res judicata did not apply. Chapter 11's dismissal provision is the same as chapter 13's for these purposes. Duplessis v. Valenti (In re Valenti), 310 B.R. 138 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).

5.5.wwww Asset allocation between chapter 11 estate and parallel Belgian proceeding does not render plan unconfirmable.

The creditor's claim against the debtor was subordinated under section 510(b) as a securities sale rescission claim. The claim was not so subordinated in a parallel Belgian Concordat proceeding. The liquidating plan in the case provided for allocation of the assets of the estate to the Belgian proceeding in an amount only sufficient to pay priority claims in the Belgian Concordat. The rest of the assets would be distributed to creditors in the chapter 11 case. Because this particular creditor's claim was subordinated, it would receive nothing, even though it could have shared equally with other general creditors in the Belgian Concordat. The court finds that the plan is proposed in good faith. In addition, the plan does not discriminate unfairly against the subordinated creditor's claim, because in the chapter 11 case, the claim was not of the same priority as the general unsecured claims. In re Lernout & Hauspie Speech Prods., N.V., 301 B.R. 651 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003), affirmed, Stonington Partners, Inc. v. Official Committee (In re Lernout & Hauspie Speech Prods. N.V.), 308 B.R. 672 (D. Del. 2004).

5.5.xxxxx A chapter 11 plan does not broadly preempt non-bankruptcy law.

Section 1123(a)(5) requires a plan to provide adequate means for the plan's implementation, that is found "notwithstanding any otherwise applicable non-bankruptcy law." The debtor had argued that this clause preempted state regulatory laws that required regulatory approval of certain corporate transactions. The Ninth Circuit disagrees. It imports into this clause a limitation that is found in a comparable clause in section 1142(a), which limits the preemption of non-bankruptcy laws to those related to financial condition. Therefore, section 1123(a)(5) does not preempt applicable non-bankruptcy laws that require specific state authorization for corporate restructuring transactions. Pacific Gas and Electric Co. v. California, 350 F.3d 932 (9th Cir. 2003).

5.5.yyyyy The best interest test encompasses potential post-liquidation recoveries. The debtor is a homeowners association created under California law, which requires the existence of a homeowner association in a condominium development. The association may not be dissolved. The creditor obtained a judgment against the debtor, which drove the debtor into bankruptcy. Because of the debtor's perpetual existence, the creditor after a hypothetical chapter 7 case could recover all post petition interest at the statutory rate. Accordingly, a plan that did not provide for payment in full of the creditor's claim with interest did not meet the best interest test of section 1129(a)(7). In re Oak Park Calabasas Condominium Assoc., 302 B.R. 665 (Bankr. 5.5.zzzzz Asset allocation between chapter 11 estate and parallel Belgian proceeding does not render plan unconfirmable. The creditor's claim against the debtor was subordinated under section 510(b) as a securities sale rescission claim. The claim was not so subordinated in a parallel Belgian Concordat proceeding. The liquidating plan in the case provided for allocation of the assets of the estate to the Belgian proceeding in an amount only sufficient to pay priority claims in the Belgian Concordat. The rest of the assets would be distributed to creditors in the chapter 11 case. Because this particular creditor's claim was subordinated, it would receive nothing, even though it could have shared equally with other general creditors in the Belgian Concordat. The court finds that the plan is proposed in good faith. In addition, the plan does not discriminate unfairly against the subordinated creditor's claim, because in the chapter 11 case, the claim was not of the same priority as the general unsecured claims. In re Lernout & Hauspie Speech Products, N.V., 301 B.R. 651 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003).

5.5.aaaaa A claim is not impaired by disallowance. The plan proposed to pay the landlord's claim in its full allowed amount, as capped under section 502(b)(6). The landlord argued that because the Code capped the claim, it altered the legal and contractual rights to which the claim entitled the landlord and so impaired the claim. The court of appeals rules that the claim is impaired by statute, not by the plan, and that the plan need leave unaltered only the claim to which the Bankruptcy Code entitles the creditor. The court of appeals also notes that the 1994 amendment that repealed section 1124(3) was intended only to prevent cash-out of a claim without payment of post-petition interest and did not limit the scope of section 1124(1), under which the claim in this case was not impaired. Solow v. PPI Enterprizes (U.S.), Inc. (In re PPI Enterprizes (U.S.), Inc.), 324 F.3d 197 (3d Cir. 2003).

5.5.bbbbbb Leaving claim unimpaired to capture non-default interest rate is not bad faith. The debtors were in default under a mortgage and filed bankruptcy on the eve of foreclosure. During the case, the debtors sold the property free and clear of the creditor's lien, and the subsequent plan provided for payment in full of the creditor's secured claim and unsecured deficiency, with interest through date of payment at the non-default rate. Other unsecured creditors received payment in full with interest at 10%, and the surplus was returned to the debtors. The secured creditor challenged the plan, arguing that it was not proposed in good faith because it was crafted solely to let the debtors take advantage of the non-impairment rule and recover the surplus. The Ninth Circuit rejects a per se rule of good faith, reaffirming its prior rulings that good faith must be based on the totality of the circumstances. In this case, the debtors were permitted to nullify the consequences of the default, thereby avoiding the default interest rate, under In re Entz-White Lumber and Supply, Inc., 850 F.2d 1338 (9th Cir. 1988). Therefore, a plan that did so did not use the Code for a purpose for which it was not intended, and the plan was filed in good faith. Platinum Capital, Inc. v. Sylmar Plaza, L.P. (In re Sylmar Plaza, L.P.), 314 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2002).

- 5.5.cccccc Substantive consolidation authorized by section 1123(a)(5). The debtor’s reorganization plan proposed substantive consolidation of several of the jointly administered debtors’ estates. Though the equity committee challenged consolidation on the grounds that Grupo Mexicano, 527 U.S. 308 (1999), prohibits a bankruptcy court from imposing an equitable remedy such as substantive consolidation that did not exist in 1789, the court sidesteps the issue. The court authorizes substantive consolidation under a plan under section 1123(a)(5)(C), which requires a plan to provide adequate means for its implementation, such as “(C) merger or consolidation of the debtor with one or more persons.” Thus, the court finds direct statutory authority for consolidation under a plan. What is more, the court rules that because of the “notwithstanding” clause in section 1125(a)(5)(C), the debtors need not comply with applicable state law governing mergers to effect a consolidation under a plan. Finally, if there is a legitimate basis for substantive consolidation, the best interest test of section 1129(a)(7) must be applied on a consolidated basis. In re Stone & Webster, Inc., 286 B.R. 532 (Bankr. - 5.5.eeeeeee Plan may not enjoin withholding tax collection. The sole shareholder and principal officer of the debtor needed relief from the IRS’ collection efforts on the responsible person penalty for non-payment of withholding taxes in order for the reorganization plan to succeed. The plan enjoined the IRS from collecting the tax as long as the debtor was current on repayment. The Fifth Circuit rules the plan provision illegal and beyond the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court. Although the injunction might be related to the bankruptcy case, the court rules that the more specific provisions of section 505, which authorize determination of taxes and protection from tax collections related to the debtor, controls the more general grant of jurisdiction. Because section 505 does not provide for jurisdiction over responsible person penalty liability, the plan could not enjoin collection. The Fifth Circuit concludes that the Supreme Court’s decision in United States v. Energy Resources Co., Inc., 495 U.S. 545 (1990), does not apply, because that case dealt only with the allocation of payments under a plan, not with an injunction. United States v. Prescription Home Healthcare, Inc. (In re Prescription Home Healthcare, Inc.), 316 F.3d 542 (5th Cir. 2002).
- 5.5.ffffff Plan effective date may not be unreasonably delayed. The debtor proposed a plan whose effective date would occur only after completion of litigation over the allowability of the claim of the major creditor. Such a delay is not reasonable and unacceptably places the risk on the creditor. The effective date must be within a reasonable time after confirmation and cannot be delayed indefinitely. In re Central European Industrial Dev. Co. LLC, 288 B.R. 572 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2003).
- 5.5.gggggg Debtor may enforce confirmed plan against non-debtor plan proponent. After the non-debtor plan proponent failed to purchase the debtor’s assets as provided in the confirmed plan, the debtor sold the assets to a third party and sued the proponent for the loss. The court rules that under section 1141, the plan is binding on the debtor and the plan proponent, that it has the same effect as a contract between them, and that the debtor has standing to enforce that obligation where the proponent has signed the plan and committed to performance under the plan. *Shenandoah Realty Partners, L.P. v. - 5.5.hhhhhh Plan provisions preempt state law. In the Pacific Gas and Electric chapter 11 case, the district court gives a very broad reading to section 1123(a)(5), which requires a plan to provide adequate means for its execution, including by transfer of assets or issuance of debt, “notwithstanding any otherwise applicable non-bankruptcy law.” As a result, all of the requirements of the California Public Utilities Code that restricts a utility’s transfer of assets or issuance of debt are preempted by the chapter 11 plan. The court does not require any showing of necessity or any balancing of interests. Preemption applies broadly, by force of statute. In re Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 283 B.R. 41 (N.D. Cal. 2002).

- 5.5.iiiiii Ninth Circuit B.A.P. explains claim preclusion under a plan. In a lengthy opinion analyzing the applicability of the Restatement (Second) of Judgments, the Ninth Circuit B.A.P. rules that a preference action against a secured creditor is not barred by either claim preclusion or issue preclusion by reason of an order confirming a chapter 11 plan. The plan preserved the right to pursue avoiding power actions belonging to the estate and vested the right in a disbursing agent for the benefit of unsecured creditors. The B.A.P. attempts to apply the “plaintiff vs. defendant” rules of the Restatement (Second) to the collective proceeding that is a chapter 11 case. It concludes that unless the plan directly addresses the two-party dispute that is the subject of the subsequent litigation, the subsequent litigation comes under the Restatement’s exceptions to the general rules against claim splitting and may be pursued. The Alary Corp. v. Sims (In re Associated Vintage Group, Inc.), 283 B.R. 549 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).
- 5.5.jjjjjj Section 1123(a)(5) does not automatically preempt contrary state laws. Ruling at the disclosure statement hearing stage, Judge Montali decides that Pacific Gas & Electric Company’s plan, which provides for transfers of assets and issuance of security without state PUC approval under applicable state statutes cannot be confirmed without a showing that preemption of the state statutes is necessary for the debtor’s reorganization. He rejects the argument that the “notwithstanding any otherwise applicable non-bankruptcy law” introduction to section 1123(a) creates express federal preemption of contrary state laws, by contrasting it with other preemption provisions in the bankruptcy code that are specifically tailored to specific purposes, such as preemption of ipso facto clauses and bankruptcy anti-discrimination provisions. He also rejects the implied preemption argument. He concludes that the extent to which a plan may preempt state law depends on whether the state law prevents or hinders a reorganization and must be decided in the particular context of the case at issue. In re Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 273 B.R. 795 (Bankr. - 5.5.kkkkkk Chapter 11 plan stamp tax exemption applies to pre-plan sales. Affirming the bankruptcy court, 254 B.R. 306 (Bankr. D. Hechinger Investment Co. (In re Hechinger Investment Co.)*, 276 B.R. 43 (D. Del. 2002).
- 5.5.iiiii International union is not equity holder in local union debtor. Relying on another non-profit entity case, In re Wabash Valley Power Ass’n, 72 F.3d 1305 (7th Cir. 1995), the Ninth Circuit rules that an equity interest has three components: control, profit share, and ownership of corporate assets. The court finds that the international union has none of these three attributes, primarily as a result of the National Labor Relations Act. Therefore, the continued affiliation of the local union with the international after a reorganization in which creditors are not paid in full does not violate that absolute priority rule. What is more, the local union is not required to raise its dues to its members or sever its ties to its international (thereby reducing the expense of affiliation with the international) in order to increase distribution to general unsecured creditors. Security Farms v. General Teamsters Local 890 (In re General Teamsters Local 890), 265 F.3d 869 (9th Cir. 2001).
- 5.5.mmmmmm Plan unfairly discriminates against separately classified unsecured claims. The debtor’s subordinated debt was subordinated only to the senior bank lender but was pari passu with other unsecured claims, including trade claims. The plan separately classified the subordinated debt, providing for a recovery of approximately 1%, while unsecured trade would receive 100% recovery. Upon objection by the subordinated debt holders, the bankruptcy court rules that separate classification of unsecured claims is permissible to permit separate treatment of the claims in the two classes where the separate treatment was designed to preserve and enhance value of assets, such as by securing the continuing loyalty of trade creditors. However, the court rejects the disparate treatment of the classes in this case, relying on Bruce Markell, A New Perspective on Unfair Discrimination in Chapter 11, 72 Am. Bankr. L.J. 227 (1998). Applying Professor Markell's analysis, the court determines that the discrimination between the two classes is unfair. Moreover the court rejects the argument that the senior secured lender which held a lien on all of the assets of the debtor, could direct payment to any junior class it chose, regardless of the limits of section 1129(b). In re Sentry Operating Co., 264 B.R. 850 (Bankr. S. D. Tex. 2001).

- 5.5.nnnnnn "Drop dead" plan provision does not automatically meet feasibility requirement. Section 1129(a)(11) imposes as a condition to plan confirmation that the court find that "confirmation of the plan is not likely to be followed by the liquidation, or the need for further financial reorganization, or the debtor ..., unless such liquidation or reorganization is proposed in the plan." Relying on this provision, the debtor proposed liquidation, in the form of a "drop dead" provision that would permit the secured lender to foreclose immediately upon a default, so that post-confirmation default and subsequent liquidation would be "proposed in the plan." The Eighth Circuit rules that the "drop dead" provision does not per se meet the "unless" requirement of section 1129(a)(11). Danny Thomas Properties II Limited Partnership v. Beal Bank, S.S.B., 241 F.3d 960 (8th Cir. 2001).
- 5.5.oooooo Reorganization value is tested only at the effective date. The junior subordinated creditor argued that it should have received warrants or some other form of consideration under the plan in the event that the value of the reorganized company grew after the effective date to a value sufficient to pay the senior creditors in full. Rejecting this contention, the Third Circuit rules that the bankruptcy estate is evaluated as of the effective date of the plan, after which increases or decreases in value are irrelevant to compliance with section 1129(b). In re PWS Holding Corp., 228 F.3d 224 (3d Cir. 2000).
- 5.5.pppppp Exoneration clause in a plan is not an impermissible third party release. The reorganization plan provided for exoneration of all participants in the reorganization case for any acts or omissions in or related to the case or the plan or its confirmation, except for willful misconduct or gross negligence. The Third Circuit concludes that the exoneration provision is not an impermissible third party release because the beneficiaries of the exoneration are protected by a limited immunity in connection with their service in the chapter 11 case, and the contours of that limited immunity tracks the limitations of the exoneration clause. In particular, committee members have both a fiduciary duty to committee constituents and a concomitant grant of immunity that limits liability to willful misconduct or ultra vires acts. In re PWS Holding Corp., 228 F.3d 224 (3d Cir. 2000).
- 5.5.qqqqqq "Artificial" impairment does not defeat confirmation. Because of the 1994 amendment to section 1124, acceptance by an impaired class, no matter how little it may be impaired, complies with section 1129(a)(10) (at least one class has accepted the plan). The plan proponent is under no obligation to leave a class unimpaired, even though it could economically afford to do so, and its failure to do so does not invalidate the class' acceptance of the plan for purposes of applying section 1129(a)(10). In re Grete Bay Hotel & Casino, Inc., 251 B.R. 213 (Bankr. - 5.5.rrrrrr Release of claim constitutes a transfer of property. In applying the fair and equitable rule of section 1129(b)(2)(B), the estate's release of a claim against a creditor or shareholder constitutes a transfer of property, which must be tested under the standards of In re 203 North LaSalle Street Partnership, 526 U.S. 434 (1999). In re PWS Holding Corp., 228 F.3d 224 (3d Cir. 2000).
- 5.5.ssssss "Unfair discrimination" depends on percentage recovery or risk of recovery. Professor Markell recently proposed a modified test for unfair discrimination between two classes of the same priority where the plan's treatment results in either a materially lower percentage recovery or a materially greater risk to the recovery. Bruce A. Markell, "A New Perspective on Unfair Discrimination in Chapter 11," 72 Am. Bankr. L.J. 227 (1998). In re Dow Corning Corp., 244 B.R. 696 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1999), adopted the test. Now, the bankruptcy court in New Jersey also adopts the test in preference to the former test, which looked to consistency of treatment for a rational or legitimate basis for discrimination between the classes. Based on this test, the court confirms a plan that provides a recovery to former noteholders in new notes and stock valued at 76% of their claims while general unsecured trade claims receive 80% in cash over time. In re Greate Bay Hotel & Casino, Inc., 251 B.R. 213 (Bankr. - 5.5.uuuuuu Plan with greater likelihood of success would be confirmed. Where two competing plans were both confirmable, the court confirmed the plan that had a greater likelihood of success, based on its lower operating leverage, the greater reliability and achievability of its financial forecasts, a reduced risk of licensing, and an increased availability of cash for capital improvement to enhance performance. In re Greate Bay Hotel & Casino, Inc., 251 B.R. 213 (Bankr. - 5.5.vvvvvv Chapter 11 confirmation order may be revoked for fraud on the court. This single asset real estate debtor had received several expressions of interest in its property, before confirmation, at a price that substantially exceeded the amount owing on the mortgage. It did not disclose these expressions of interest to the court but instead obtained confirmation of a plan that paid the mortgagee less than in full. After confirmation, the debtor sold the property for substantially more. The Sixth Circuit rules that confirmation was properly revoked, on the grounds that the revocation for fraud provision in section 1144 applies equally to fraud on the court as well as to fraud on creditors. Moreover, the court affirms an award of attorney's fees because the fraud was upon the court. Tenn-FLA Partners v. First Union National Bank (In re Tenn-FLA Partners), 226 F.3d 746 (6th Cir. 2000).
- 5.5.wwwwww Court confirms single asset real estate cram down plan. The debtor's chapter 11 plan provided for the sale of the general partnership interest in the partnership debtor to an insider for $1.4 million, payment of the secured lender's claim at the value of the property (which was substantially less than the amount owing), and payment of nominal consideration to unsecured creditors. Over the secured creditor's objection, the court holds that the sale of the equity in the partnership is not a sale of the property, so that the credit bid provision of section 363(k) does not apply. The court also rules that net rents paid during the case do not reduce the secured creditor's secured claim but are in addition to the value of the underlying property. In addition, the court determines that the sale of the equity to the son-in-law of the general partner does not implicate the new value corollary, because the plan proponent did not own equity in the debtor. Finally, the court permits separate classification of the unsecured deficiency claim on the ground that the creditor's interest differs substantially from the interests of the unsecured creditors. Beal Bank, S.S.B. v. Waters Edge Limited Partnership, 248 B.R. 668 (D. Mass. 2000).

- 5.5.xxxxxx Best interest test requires calculation of interest at statutory rate on Federal judgments. In applying the best interest test of section 1129(a)(7) in an insolvent case, the court must apply the rate of interest fixed by 28 U.S.C. § 1961(a) in determining "interest at the legal rate from the petition date" on allowed claims under section 726(a)(5). In re Dow Corning Corporation, 237 B.R. 380 (Bankr. - 5.5.yyyyyy Post-confirmation interest on state tax claims runs at market, not statutory, rate. Joining the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits, the Fifth Circuit rules that the discount rate to be applied to deferred payment's of a priority state tax claim under section 1129(a)(9)(C) is the market rate of interest on a loan of comparable duration, not the statutory interest rate provided under the state tax statute. *Mississippi State Tax Commission v. - 5.5.zzzzzz Plan proponent's purchase of certain trade claims under a plan violates equal treatment rule. The plan provided for the proponent to purchase only certain designated trade claims for their full amount, to sell those claims to a secured creditor for the same amount, and to pay the secured creditor approximately that amount under the plan. This left other general unsecured creditors without any recovery. This plan violates section 1123(a)(4) of the Bankruptcy Code, which requires the same treatment for each claim or interest of a particular class. However, where members of a class were offered two different options, the fact that some select one and some select the other does not amount to prohibited different treatment. In re Cajun Electric Power Cooperative, Inc., 230 B.R. 715 (Bankr. - 5.5.aaaaaa A municipality does not have holders of interests. The bankruptcy court confirmed the municipal debtor's plan over the non-acceptance of the class of unsecured creditors because the debtor did not have any equity security holders that could be characterized as holders of "interests." - 5.5.bbbbbb Plan confirmation denied as securities fraud. The publicly-traded debtor lost all of its assets in a foreclosure sale. Using notes, it then acquired nonperforming assets from investors hoping to liquidate their failed positions, offering them access to the public securities markets for their interest through a chapter 11 plan. Shortly after making the acquisitions, it filed chapter 11 and proposed a plan to issue stock in exchange for the notes. The court denied confirmation under section 1129(d) on the ground that the principal purpose of the plan was the avoidance of the application of section 5 of the Securities Act. In Main Street A.C., Inc., 234 B.R. 771 (Bankr. - 5.5.cccccc An individual may not fund a chapter 11 plan from future income. The court denies confirmation of the individual's chapter 11 plan on the grounds that it is to be funded out of the debtor's future income rather than out of property of the estate, on the grounds that postpetition income is not property of the estate and it would hamper the debtor's fresh start to commit postpetition income to a chapter 11 plan. The court relies on its prior decision, In re Flor, 166 B.R. 512 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1994), affd., 3:94CV1130 (D. Conn. - 5.5.dddddd A debtor labor union does not have any equity interests. A class of creditors voted against the union's chapter 11 plan. The court confirmed the plan, even though the creditor was not paid in full, because the labor union as with other non-profit organizations, did not have equity

- 5.5.eeeeeee Plan-related expense payments permissible before court approval. One of three competing plan proponents advanced chapter 11 costs and expenses to an unofficial committee before plan confirmation, with no strings attached. The payments do not violate section 1129(a)(4) which requires that any such payment “has been approved by, or is subject to the approval of, the court as reasonable,” because the section does not require approval before payment, only before plan confirmation. The court cautions against a tough standard on approving such payments when they do not come out of the estate. The court also determines that because the payments were not on account of the committee members’ claims or interests, the payments did not violate section 1123(a)(4), which requires a plan to “provide the same treatment for each claim or interest of a particular class.” Mabey v. Southwestern Electric Power Co. (In re Cajun Electric Cooperative Power, Inc.), 150 F.3d 503 (5th Cir. 1998).
- 5.5.ffffff Second Circuit rejects new value corollary. In a single asset real estate case, the Second Circuit holds that the new value corollary may be satisfied only if “no other party seeks to file a plan or where the market for the property is adequately tested,” reasoning that permitting the debtor to file a plan funded by the equity holders when those conditions have not been met permits the equity holders to participate “on account of” their prior subordinate position, contrary to section 1129(b)(2)(B)(ii). The court reasoned that if those conditions were not met, the new value contribution by former equity holders is not “necessary, “ as required by the new value corollary. *Coltex Loops Central Three Partners, L.P. v. - 5.5.ggggggg Plan effective date may not be delayed. A plan may not fix the effective date as one year after a confirmation in order to allow the debtor to collect accounts receivable to have adequate funds to make payments under the plan. - 5.5.hhhhhhh Seventh Circuit affirms availability of new value corollary. The Seventh Circuit has affirmed the survival of the new value corollary to the absolute priority rule. The secured lender was owed $93,000,000, the secured portion was $55,000,000. The debtor’s partners would contribute $3,000,000 the day after the effective date and make five annual installments of $625,000. The bankruptcy court found that the new value corollary was available and that the contribution was substantial and necessary for the reorganization. The Court of Appeals affirmed. In re 203 North La Salle Street Partnership, 126 F.3d 955 (7th Cir. 1997).
- 5.5.iiiiiii Feasibility requirement eased. The debtor’s plan provided for payments to the secured lender over ten years and provided that the lender could foreclose if there was any subsequent default in payment. The debtor’s projections showed the probability of a default in year seven. The plan was held to meet the feasibility requirement of section 1129(a)(11) because, despite the projection of a possible default, an absolute certainty was not required, and a plan meets the requirements of section 1129(a)(11) if further “liquidation or reorganization is proposed in the plan.” In re 203 North La Salle Street Partnership, 126 F.3d 955 (7th Cir. 1997).
- 5.5.jjjjjjj Appeal from order confirming plan not moot. The debtor confirmed and consummated a cram-down plan. The secured lender appealed. - 5.5.kkkkkkk Chapter 12 plan may strip down a lien. In a case of first impression in the courts of appeals, the Eighth Circuit holds that a chapter 12 plan may provide for stripping down an undersecured creditor's lien to the value of the collateral. The court distinguishes Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410 (1992) as dealing only with section 506(d) in a chapter 7 case and Nobelman v. American Savings Bank, 508 U.S. 324 (1993) as dealing only with the limitation on restructuring a home mortgage in a chapter 13 case. Because the language of chapter 12 is so similar to the comparable language of chapters 11 and 13, this ruling should allow strip down of liens under both of those chapters as well (other than home mortgages in chapter 13). Harmon v. United States, 101 F.3d 574 (8th Cir. 1996).
- 5.5.lllllll New value contribution held de minimis. A new value contribution of $32,000 in a single asset real estate case in which the secured claim was $4.3 million dollars and the total secured claims were approximately $5 million dollars was de minimis as a matter of law and therefore failed to meet the requirement that new value be "substantial." *Liberty National Enterprises v. - 5.5.mmmmmmm Sale of property under plan renders appeal from confirmation order moot. The Sixth Circuit joins the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits in holding that sale of property under a plan (here, a single asset real estate case) renders moot an appeal from an order confirming the plan, even though the debtor's principal secured creditor, who was the plan proponent, is a party to the appeal. *255 Park Plaza Associates Ltd. - 5.5.nnnnnnn Third Circuit adopts "equitable mootness" doctrine. The Third Circuit has adopted the doctrine of "equitable mootness" on an appeal from disallowance of an administrative priority claim as part of an order of confirmation of a chapter 11. The Circuit adopts a five-factor test for equitable mootness: (1) substantial consummation of the plan (2) stay pending appeal (3) effect on rights of parties not before the court (4) effect on the success of the plan, and (5) public policy of finality of bankruptcy judgments. In re Continental Airlines, 91 F.3d 553 (3d Cir. 1996).

6. CLAIMS AND PRIORITIES

6.1 Claims

- 6.1.a Code's disallowance of postpetition interest, not the plan, alters a creditor's right to postpetition interest and permits non-impairment without payment of interest. Although the debtor claimed that it was insolvent, the debtor's plan proposed payment in cash in full of a class of unsecured claims, without postpetition interest. Section 502(b)(2) disallows unmaturing interest as of the petition date. Section 1124(1) provides that a class of claims is unimpaired under the plan if the plan does not alter any of the holders' legal, contractual, or equitable rights. The Code, not the plan, disallowed postpetition interest on the claims. Therefore, the plan left unaltered the claims' legal and contractual rights, so the class was not impaired, as that term is used in section 1124. However, the solvent debtor exception allows postpetition interest if the debtor is solvent, and the right to postpetition interest might be an equitable right under the solvent debtor exception. In this case, the debtor was not solvent, so the exception did not apply, although the court confusingly uses language that suggests the solvent debtor exception might not apply in any case. TLA Claimholders Group v. LATAM Airlines Group S.A., 55 F.4th 377 (2d Cir. 2022).
- 6.1.b Account debtor's payment to debtor does not satisfy obligation to secured lender. The debtor granted a security interest in its accounts receivable to its lender. The lender notified an account debtor of the security interest and directed it to pay the lender on any obligations owing to the debtor. UCC § 9-607(a)(3) permits a secured party to enforce the debtor's obligations, including an account debtor's payment obligation to the debtor, if so agreed with the debtor or, in any event, after a default. Section 9-406(a) permits an account debtor to pay an assignor until (but not after) it receives a notice from the assignor or assignee that the amount due has been assigned. A security interest is an assignment. Although section 9-406(a) would have permitted the account debtor here to pay the debtor before notice, the account debtor paid the debtor after notice. Therefore, the payment did not satisfy the obligation to the secured party. Worthy Lending LLC v. New Style Contractors, Inc., ___ N.Y. ___, 2022 N.Y. LEXIS 2384 (Nov. 22, 2022).

- 6.1.c A make-whole is unmaturred postpetition interest. The debtor's bonds contained a make-whole provision that required the debtor to pay the bondholders an additional payment if the bonds' maturity was accelerated and interest rates had dropped. Roughly speaking, the payment was calculated as the discounted present value of all future payments due on the bonds, including interest payments, minus the accelerated principal. Section 502(a) allows claims as of the petition date. Section 502(b)(2) disallows any claim for unmaturred interest. The disallowance applies equally to the economic equivalent of interest. Make-whole payments are designed to compensate a lender for a loss of future interest if reinvestment rates have declined. As such, they are the economic equivalent of unmaturred postpetition interest. Ultra Petro. Corp. v. Ad Hoc Comm. (In re Ultra Petro. Corp.), ___ F. 4th ___. 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 28604 (5th Cir. Oct. 14, 2022).
- 6.1.d Lenders must return mistaken payment. By failing to check a proper box on a computer screen that provided for payments on a syndicated loan, the agent bank mistakenly paid the lenders the full amount outstanding on the loan several years before it was due, rather than paying just the current interest amount. The agent requested the lenders to return the mistakenly disbursed funds the next day. Many refused. Generally, a payor may recover a mistaken payment. However, under the discharge-for-value rule, the payee need not return the payment that was in discharge of a debt if the payee had no knowledge the payment was mistaken. In this context, "knowledge" includes inquiry notice—whether the facts were sufficiently troublesome that a reasonably prudent investor would have made reasonable inquiry that would have revealed the error. Here, the facts that the payment was not due, that the lenders received no notice (as ordinarily required) that the payment would be made, and that the debtor was in severe distress, with the notes trading at 20% of their face amount, all raised questions about whether the payment was intended or mistaken. As a result, the lenders must return the mistaken payment to the agent. Citibank, N.A. v. Brigade Cap. Mgmt, LP, 49 F.4th 42 (2d Cir. 2022).
- 6.1.e COVID-19 pandemic excuses the debtor from WARN Act compliance. The debtor suffered financial losses, leading to a chapter 11 filing on March 8, 2020. It entered chapter 11 with a wind-down budget and plan to operate one line of stores pending a going-concern sale and to liquidate the remainder of its inventory. The COVID-19 emergency was declared on March 13, 2020, after which the debtor in possession concluded it could no longer operate or continue the liquidation sales. It terminated all employees about a week later. The WARN Act requires an employer to provide 60 days' notice of a mass layoff but permits exceptions for a liquidating fiduciary, an unforeseen business circumstance, and a natural disaster. A liquidating fiduciary is one whose sole operation is the liquidation of the business. Here, because the debtor continued some operations in aid of liquidating, the liquidating fiduciary exception does not apply. An unforeseen business circumstance involves a sudden, dramatic, and unexpected action or condition outside the employer's control that is the cause of the layoff. It need not be the sole cause, but it will suffice if it is the straw that broke the camel's back. Here, the sudden onset of the COVID-19 pandemic, which the employer could not predict or control, pushed the debtor over the edge, resulting in the closing of the business and the mass layoffs. The natural disaster exception applies in the case of "any form of natural disaster, such as flood, earthquake, or drought and similar effects of nature." Similar to the unforeseen business circumstances, the pandemic was a natural disaster that contributed substantially to the business closure and resulting layoffs. Therefore, the employer was excused from WARN Act compliance. Steward v. Art Van Furniture, LLC (In re Art Van Furniture, LLC), 638 B.R. 523 (Bankr. D. Del. 2022).

- 6.1.f Debt to a trustee for avoidance and recovery is incurred on the petition date, not at the time of the transfer. The SIPA trustee sued a partnership and its former general partner to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers. The partner disassociated himself from the partnership nine months before the filing of the SIPA proceeding. The court found the partnership liable for the fraudulent transfers. A general partner is liable for the partnership's debts incurred while a general partner, or, under the state statute in effect, within two years after disassociation, unless the creditor knew of the disassociation. The debtor's transfers to the partnership were proper transactions when made and became voidable only upon the filing of the SIPA petition. Because the partnership became liable to the trustee within two years after the partner's disassociation from the partnership, the partner was also liable to the trustee. Sec. Investor Prot. Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC (In re Madoff), 638 B.R. 41 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2022).
- 6.1.g Court provides treatise on postpetition interest in solvent debtor case, allowing postpetition interest. The individual debtor suffered a substantial prepetition judgment. He filed chapter 11 to prevent execution on the judgment. Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, interest on the judgment ran at 12%. Because of favorable postpetition events, the debtor was solvent both in a hypothetical liquidation and on a balance sheet basis and had sufficient assets to pay all creditors in full plus postpetition interest. The debtor proposed a plan that provided for payment in full, without postpetition interest. The class comprising the claims of the judgment creditors did not accept the plan. Section 1129(b) permits plan confirmation over the nonacceptance by a class of unsecured claims if the plan is fair and equitable with respect to the class. The "fair and equitable" requirement incorporates pre-Code law, which required payment of postpetition interest on unsecured claims if the debtor was solvent, and permits the court to consider the equities to determine to appropriate interest rate, despite section 502(b)(2), which disallows postpetition interest as part of an allowed claim. Generally, the contract rate should apply. But the consideration supporting the contract rate—negotiated at arms' length—do not apply to a state-law judgment rate. Still, considering all the factors in this case, including the debtor's ability to pay, the court requires application of the judgment rate for the plan to be fair and equitable. Section 1129(a)(7) requires that a plan provide as much value on claims and interests as would be paid in a liquidation case. Section 726(a)(5) provides for surplus funds to be paid to creditors for interest "at the legal rate." Uniformity within federal law and equality of treatment of creditors require that "the legal rate" be interpreted as the federal judgment rate. In re Mullins, 633 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2021).
- 6.1.h The court must evaluate factually whether a make-whole is the economic equivalent of interest; if it is, it is subject to disallowance as postpetition interest, which must be paid at the federal judgment rate in a solvent case. The debtor was solvent and proposed a plan that provided substantial recovery for equity. For its unsecured noteholders, it proposed the class be unimpaired by payment in cash in full on the effective date in the principal amount plus interest accrued but unpaid as of the petition date, without payment of a make-whole or postpetition interest. The notes' redemption clause, not its acceleration clause, determines whether the holders are entitled to a make-whole. If the indenture requires it, then it may be allowed only if it is not the economic equivalent of interest, based on the make-whole's terms and their relationship to interest on the notes, which is a factual question. Section 502(b)(2) disallows postpetition interest, even in a solvent debtor case; a plan's treatment of the claim as disallowed under section 502(b) does not constitute an impairment. Section 1124(3)'s repeal did not require the payment of postpetition interest at the contract rate to unimpaired classes. But the solvent debtor exception survived to a limited extent through 1129(a)(7) and 726(a)(5) for an impaired class of unsecured claims. Those sections require payment of postpetition interest at the federal judgment rate. There is no reason to treat impaired and unimpaired classes differently, so the federal judgment rate applies to unimpaired classes in a solvent debtor case. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. The Hertz Corp. (In re The Hertz Corp.), ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 3491 (Bankr. D. Del. Dec. 22, 2021).

- 6.1.i Court may set bar date for, and plan may discharge, claims arising between confirmation and effective date. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan, which provided for discharge of all claims arising before the effective date. In the long period between confirmation and the effective date, the debtor in possession discharged an employee, who sued for age discrimination in federal court after the effective date. The employee had notice of the general bar date and the administrative claims bar date, which was 30 days after the effective date, but did not file a proof of claim or request for payment of an administrative expense. Section 503(b) provides that the actual, necessary expenses of preserving the estate are administrative expenses, which are entitled to priority. The estate lasts until the plan effective date, so claims arising between confirmation and the effective date may qualify as administrative expenses. Although a tort or similar claim is not necessary to preserving the estate, Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), held that such claims are administrative expenses. By referring to timely filed claims, section 503 authorizes the bankruptcy court to set a bar date for the filing of requests for payment of administrative expenses and to bar unfiled claims from sharing in any distribution under a plan. Section 1141(d) discharges all claims that arose before confirmation, except as otherwise provided in the plan. The plan may modify not only the kinds of claims excepted from discharge, but also the effective date of the discharge. Therefore, the unfiled employment discrimination claim was barred by the bar date and discharged by the plan. Ellis v. Westinghouse Electric Co., LLC, 11 F.4th 221 (3d Cir. 2021).
- 6.1.j Guaranteed creditor may waive setoff rights before guarantor pays creditor in full. The debtor owed the United States, supported by a surety bond, and was entitled to a tax refund from the United States. The United States and the trustee settled: the United States' claim was allowed, and the United States waived the right to offset the tax refund. The surety had acknowledged its obligation to pay the United States but had not yet completed payment by the time the United States and the trustee settled. As subrogee to the debtor's rights against the United States, the surety claimed the right to the tax refund, which the United States had waived in the settlement. Section 509 subrogates a surety to the creditor's rights to the extent of payment but subordinates the surety's claim to the principal creditor's claim until the creditor's claim is paid in full. Because the surety had not paid the United States in full by the time of the settlement, its rights were subordinated, and the United States could use its setoff rights to protect its own interests without the surety's approval. Giuliano v. Ins. Co. of Penn. (In re LTC Holdings, Inc.), 10 F.4th 177 (3d Cir. 2021).
- 6.1.k Unimpaired unsecured claims are entitled to postpetition interest at the federal judgment rate. The plan provided that the class of unsecured claims was unimpaired. Creditors with a claim must pursue their rights in federal court, subject to federal law. A claim as of the petition date is similar to a federal judgment, whose payment depends on completion of the bankruptcy process, making postpetition interest analogous to post-judgment interest, which is payable at the federal judgment rate. The Code and federal law impose the limitation to the federal judgment rate; the plan is not the source of the limitation. Therefore, use of the federal judgment rate rather than the contract rate does not impair the class under section 1124 for. Official Comm. v. PG&E Corp., 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96081 (N.D. Cal. May 20, 2021).
- 6.1.l An environmental damage claim arises only after contact or a relationship. The debtor operated a creosote plant, which caused environmental pollution in a substantial area surrounding the plant. After its chapter 11 case, its liquidating trust reached an agreement with the debtor's predecessor to contribute to a fund for the creditors in exchange for a very broad injunction against any environmental claims, including claims whose holder is not aware of or does not suspect to exist, “to the maximum extent allowed under the law.” After the court approved the settlement and issued the injunction, a landowner discovered environmental damage to his property and sued the predecessor for damages. Whether the injunction applies depends on when the landowner’s claim arose. A claim arises upon conduct fairly giving rise to the claim if there is some minimum contact or relationship between the plaintiff and defendant such that the claim is identifiable. Because of both fairness and due process concerns, the test requires that the relationship was such that both parties knew liability could arise. Although the lawsuit alleges the pollution caused damages many decades before the suit, it alleges that the landowner did not discover the pollution until after the injunction. The release of pollutants alone does not constitute the requisite contact or relationship. Therefore, the injunction does not apply to the claim. Tronox Inc. v. Anadarko Petro. Corp. (In re Tronox Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31208 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 19, 2021).

- 6.1.m Dissolved corporation that continued to manage a pension plan remained the plan's sponsor. The debtor sponsored an ERISA-governed pension plan. The debtor filed bankruptcy in 1992, and its sole shareholder filed bankruptcy a few years later, surrendering all of his stock to the trustee. Shortly thereafter, the debtor dissolved under state law. Nevertheless, the pension plan continued to operate, and the debtor's shareholder/CEO continued to sign plan documents on the debtor's behalf, as plan sponsor. When the plan ran low on funds in 2012, the PBGC and the shareholder reached a settlement of his remaining liability in which he conveyed all his powers and authority to PBGC. Six years later, the PBGC sued 19 corporations the shareholder then owned under a controlled group liability theory. State law governing dissolution does not govern the status of the dissolved corporation for ERISA purposes, because state law cannot be used to defeat federal law. Because the dissolved corporation continued to serve as plan sponsor and to authorize payments from the plan, it remained the plan sponsor despite its dissolution. Therefore, the shareholder's currently owned companies are liable under the controlled group theory for the plan's underfunding. Pension Ben. Guar. Corp. v. 50509 Marine LLC, 981 F.3d 927 (11th Cir. 2020).
- 6.1.n Make-whole is not unmatured interest. The debtor's credit agreement provided for a make-whole payment if the loan became or was declared to be due and payable before its original maturity. The make-whole amount was calculated as the excess of the discounted present value, at 0.5% over the yield to maturity of specified US Treasury securities, of the early payment amount, over the early payment amount. The loan accelerated automatically upon the debtor's bankruptcy. Section 502(b)(2) disallows a claim for interest on a loan that is unmatured as of the petition date. It applies also to the economic equivalent of interest. Interest is a charge for the use or forbearance of money that accrues over time. A liquidated damages clause is a provision that determines in advance the amount of damages payable for breach of contract. A make-whole “is not interest because it does not compensate [the lender] for [the borrower's] use or forbearance of the [lender's] money, it compensates the [lender] for [the borrower's] breach of a promise to use money.” It is also not the equivalent of interest for the same reason and because it does not accrue over time. It compensates for the loss of interest. Therefore, it is a liquidated damages clause and is allowable as such and not disallowed as unmatured interest. In re Ultra Petroleum Corp., ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 2999 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2020).
- 6.1.o Collateral sold under a plan is valued at replacement cost. The debtor operated a coal mine. In the operation, it used heavy equipment, which was subject to a security interest. The chapter 11 plan provided for a sale of the mine, including the equipment. The buyer did not allocate the purchase price between the equipment and the rest of the mine. The secured lender filed a proof of secured claim based on the replacement value of the equipment. Section 506(a) bifurcates a claim secured by collateral into an allowed secured claim equal to the lesser of the claim amount or the collateral value and an unsecured claim equal to any balance and directs that collateral valuation “be determined in light of the purpose of the valuation and of the proposed disposition or use” of the collateral. In Assoc. Comm'l Corp. v. Rash, 520 U.S. 953 (1997), the Supreme Court held that property that a chapter 13 debtor would retain and use in the operation of his business should be valued at replacement cost, as determined by the bankruptcy court. Rash's principles apply equally in a chapter 11 case, and the reasons for use of replacement cost apply equally when the collateral is being sold, whether alone or as part of an operating business. Therefore, the court values the collateral at replacement cost, taking into account the current condition and possible depreciation of the equipment. Murray Oak Grove Coal, LLC v. Bay Point Capital Partners II, LP (In re Murray Metallurgical Coal Holdings, LLC), 618 B.R. 220 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2020).

- 6.1.p Unsuccessful credit bid does not set creditor's collateral value. The debtor in possession auctioned its entire business but permitted bids for less than all of the business. One secured creditor, who had a lien on only the debtor's intellectual property, credit bid its claim for the IP. The bidding proceeded, and a higher bid for the whole business prevailed. The court determined the allocation of the proceeds by valuing the IP collateral and the value of other assets, which were subject to another creditor's lien. A secured creditor may credit bid up to the full amount of its secured claim. The highest bid, whether or not the bid of the secured creditor, determines the asset's value. Value of a creditor's collateral is not capped at the amount the secured creditor bids for it if there is a higher bid. POLK 33 Lending, LLC v. THL Corp. Fin., Inc. (In re Aerogroup Int'l, Inc.), 620 B.R. 517 (D. Del. 2020).
- 6.1.q Borrower's improper foreclosure claim against mortgage servicer debtor arose when borrower defaulted on mortgage. The debtor serviced mortgages. A borrower defaulted postpetition but before the claims bar date. The borrowers had notice of the bar date and of the case but did not file a proof of claim. The reorganized debtor began foreclosure proceedings shortly after the plan effective date. The borrower answered and counterclaimed for damages for the reorganized debtor's failure to comply with the foreclosure procedures and give the notices required under the mortgage and federal and state law. The confirmed plan provided a broad discharge and injunction against litigation by any holder of a claim that arose before the effective date. The plan defined claim as broadly as section 101(5) does, which is sufficiently broad to encompass any possible right to payment, including a contingent claim. Courts apply the "fair contemplation" test to determine when a claim arises for breach of contract. Generally, a contingent claim arises when the claim is within the fair contemplation of the parties that the other party might breach the contract. Thus, contingent claims under a contract generally arise when the contract is executed. Because the borrower defaulted before the bar date, a claim for improper foreclosure was within the borrower's fair contemplation then and therefore arose then. The same analysis applies to claims arising under federal or state law related to the foreclosure. Therefore, the plan injunction bars the borrowers' counterclaims against the reorganized debtor. In re Ditech Holding Corp., ___ B.R. ___, case no. 19-10412 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Nov. 30, 2020).
- 6.1.r Layering subsidiary guarantors does not violate successor assumption obligation. The borrower parent issued notes that were guaranteed by its parent and its newly formed holding company subsidiaries. The notes provided the guarantors to dispose of all their assets, but if the disposal was not to the borrower or parent, the obligations under the guarantees had to be expressly assumed by the transferee. Later that year, the borrower offered to exchange the notes for new notes that would be guaranteed by newly created subsidiaries of the subsidiary guarantors, giving the new notes structural seniority over the original notes. Such a "successor obligor" provision is common boilerplate in notes; they are not the consequence of particular negotiations, and their meaning does not depend on the parties' intentions. Whether there is a triggering transfer depends on the nature of the transfer and amount of assets transferred, including the overall effect of the transaction on the company. Here, there was no material change in the company or its assets. The addition of another layer of holding companies did not result in a material change in the guarantors' assets or effect a novel transaction. The operating subsidiaries remained available to satisfy the upper tier guarantees. Therefore, the transaction does not violate the original notes. Whitebox Relative Value P'ners., LP v. Transocean Ltd., ___ F. Supp. 3d ___, 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 237497 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 16, 2020).

- 6.1.s Strict foreclosure under an indenture does not extinguish dissenting bondholders' payment rights. The debtor issued bonds under an indenture. The debtor's parent guaranteed the notes and secured the guarantee with the debtor's stock under a collateral trust agreement. The indenture provided that the parties to the indenture, including the bondholders, agreed to the collateral trust agreement. Although the indenture was not qualified under the Trust Indenture Act, it incorporated TIA section 316(b) prohibiting modification of any bondholder's right to payment of principal or interest without the bondholder's consent. Both the indenture and the collateral trust agreement authorized a majority of bondholders to direct the indenture trustee in "the time, method, and place of conducting any proceeding for exercising any remedy available to the Trustee." After default, the majority bondholders directed the trustee to conduct a strict foreclosure under sections 9-620 and 9-622 of the UCC (accepting the collateral in satisfaction of the debt). The trustee did so, taking the debtor's stock in the foreclosure and distributing it to all noteholders pro rata. The minority bondholders objected. They sued the debtor to collect the amounts due to them on the bonds. The authority in the indenture for the majority bondholders to direct the exercise of remedies remains constrained by the provision protecting the minority's right to payment. The collateral trust agreement provision that authorizes majority action to direct the exercise of remedies is similarly constrained. Therefore, even though the strict foreclosure purported to result in full satisfaction of the amounts owing under the indenture, it did not extinguish the minority's right to pursue full payment. The court remands for a determination of damages, that is, the amount remaining to be paid on the bonds. CNH Diversified Opps. Master Acct., L.P. v. Cleveland Unltd., Inc. ___ N.Y. ___, 2020 N.Y. LEXIS 2514 (Oct. 22, 2020).
- 6.1.t Secured creditor has burden of proof on collateral value. The debtor granted a lender a security interest in general intangibles, including non-tort claims. After a major accident that destroyed the debtor's business and most of a small town and led to the debtor's bankruptcy, the trustee sued for recovery of both tort and non-tort damages. The defendant settled. The creditor claimed a portion of the settlement proceeds were for non-tort claims in which it had a security interest. The trustee and the creditor stipulated that the debtor's non-tort claims were at least $25 million and that the net economic value of the claims, after attorneys' fees and costs, were at least $10 million. Section 506(a)(1) requires the bankruptcy court to determine the value of a secured creditor's collateral. The creditor has the burden of proof on value. "The settlement value of a claim is the amount the claimant would recover if he prevails in litigating the claim multiplied by the probability of recovery," which depends on the strength of the evidence and defenses, the defendant's ability to pay, the cost of litigation, the parties' staying power and their bargaining leverage, among other factors. The "net economic value" of the claim does not address any of those factors and therefore provided insufficient evidence of the value of the claim. Wheeling & Lake Erie Ry. Co. v. Keach (In re Montreal, Me. & Atl. Ry.), 956 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2020).
- 6.1.u Law firm trust account retainer is free and clear of lenders' security interest. The lenders lent the debtor money that the debtor used to lend to borrowers, who gave the debtor notes for the loans. The debtor granted the lenders a security interest in current and after-acquired cash, cash investments, general intangibles, accounts, chattel paper, instruments, contracts, contract rights, and all other tangible and intangible property of Borrower. The lenders filed a UCC-1, listing, among other things, contract rights or rights to payment of money, General Intangibles, documents, instruments (including any promissory notes), chattel paper, cash, receivables, deposit accounts, and financial assets. The borrowers' repayments went to the debtor's bank account. The debtor withdrew funds from the bank account to pay his lawyer. The lawyer placed the funds in a client trust account and withdrew from the account as the lawyer incurred fees. The borrower notes are instruments, as defined by UCC § 9-102(a)(47), in which the lenders had a perfected security interest. The borrowers' payments on the notes were deposited in a bank account, which is a deposit account under UCC § 9-102(a)(29). The debtor did not grant a security interest in deposit accounts, but the lenders had a security interest in the deposit accounts as proceeds of the notes, under UCC § 9-315(a). The wire transfers from the deposit account to the law firm trust accounts was a transfer of identifiable cash proceeds, in which the lenders still retained a perfected security interest under UCC 9-315(d)(2). The money in the law firm's trust accounts still belong to the debtor but can be accessed only by the law firm, so the debtor's asset is a general intangible but is still identifiable proceeds of the borrowers' notes. The lenders retained a perfected interest in the general intangible, because of the granting clause in the security agreement and UCC 9-315(d)(3). Under UCC 9-322(b), a transferee of collateral in the ordinary course of business takes free of the security interest in a deposit account unless the transferee acted in collusion with the debtor in violating the secured party's rights. Here, the debtor's transfer of the funds from its deposit account to the trust account (a general intangible) was a transfer for purposes of section 9-322. The law firm had a possessory security interest in the trust account which, absent collusion, had priority over the lenders because of section 9-322. Walters v. Lynch (In re 3P4PL, LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 2092 (Bankr. D. Colo. June 22, 2020).

- 6.1.v Court disallows surety's claim under a surety bond. Before bankruptcy, the debtor obtained surety bonds to secure performance obligations under various agreements. If the debtor defaulted under any of the agreements and the surety were required to pay the counterparty, the debtor agreed to indemnify the surety. At the petition date, the debtor had not defaulted under the agreements. The surety filed a proof of claim for a contingent unliquidated amount. Section 502(e)(1)(B) disallows "any claim for reimbursement or contribution of an entity that is liable with the debtor on or has secured the claim of a creditor, to the extent that ... such claim ... is contingent as of the time of allowance of disallowance of such claim." The provision prevents the co-obligor from competing with the principal creditor for the debtor's scarce assets. Because the surety was liable with the debtor to the counterparties and as of the time of allowance, the debtor had not yet defaulted, the surety's reimbursement claim was contingent, the court disallows the claim. In re Falcon V, L.L.C., 620 B.R. 256 (M.D. La. 2020).
- 6.1.w Landlord damages cap limits claim against bankrupt fraudulent transferee. The debtor fraudulently transferred assets to his wife. The debtor's lessor avoided the fraudulent transfer and obtained a judgment against both the debtor and the wife. The lessor's claim was partially paid under the debtor's chapter 11 plan, and the debtor received a discharge. The wife later filed her own bankruptcy. Section 502(b)(6) limits a landlord's claim for damages resulting from a termination of a real property lease, whether the claim is against the tenant or a guarantor. Similarly, the cap limits the allowable claim against the wife in her bankruptcy, even though the claim arose from the fraudulent transfer judgment, because it still is a claim resulting from breach and termination of the lease. Lariat Cos., Inc. v. Wigley (In re Wigley), 951 F.3d 967 (8th Cir. 2020).
- 6.1.x Liquidation safe harbor damage calculation applies to credit enhancements whether or not there is a surplus. The debtor defaulted on a repo of 28 securities. Under the transaction, the debtor also posted 9 securities as credit enhancement. The counterparty conducted an auction and sold all 37 securities for less than the repo amount. Section 101(47), which defines "repurchase agreement," includes "credit enhancement." Section 559 permits a counterparty, despite the automatic stay, to liquidate, terminate, or accelerate a repo in accordance with its terms, but provides that "any excess of the market prices received on liquidation ... shall be deemed property of the estate." Section 562 specifies the means for determining "damages" upon the trustee's rejection or the counterparty's termination of a repo, looking to market data to determine the amount. "Damages" in section 562 means a legal claim for damages, rather than merely a loss, shortfall, or deficiency. Therefore, it applies only if the liquidation of the repo does not result in excess proceeds. Because the counterparty did not initiate a damages action for the shortfall or file a proof of claim, section 562 does not apply in this case. Section 559's exception to the automatic stay applies to the repo, whether or not there are excess proceeds. Otherwise, the counterparty would have to liquidate collateral piecemeal, until it received adequate proceeds to cover the debt, leaving the remaining collateral subject to the automatic stay. Such a process would be contrary to section 559's language, which specifies that excess proceeds "received on liquidation" are property of the estate, and would be impracticable and slow. Therefore, the trustee may not assert a claim against the counterparty for excess proceeds based on a market valuation under section 562, other than the valuation determined by the liquidation and auction. *In re Homebanc Mortg.
