- 6.1.y Lender does not have an implied liability claim in an ultra vires transaction. The chapter 9 municipal debtor borrowed from a bank lender, but the loan amount might have exceeded the debtor's borrowing authority. The debtor objected to the bank's claim, arguing the loan was ultra vires. Nevertheless, the bank sought recovery on a restitutionary, implied liability basis. Ultra vires acts by public entities are void. The law does not imply a liability to pay where a statute prohibits contracting for that liability. S. Inyo Healthcare Dist. v. Optum Bank, Inc. (In re S. Inyo Healthcare Dist., 612 B.R. 750 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 2020).
- 6.1.z Section 502(b)(7) caps earned but unmatured compensation. The debtor's employee's employment contract provided for a bonus, payable over five years. The contract also provided for a severance payment and the acceleration of any unpaid portion of the bonus if the debtor terminated the employment without cause. The employee earned the bonus before the debtor terminated his employment without cause, but the debtor had paid only a portion. The debtor later filed a chapter 11 petition. The employee sought damages for termination of the employment contract plus interest. Section 502(b)(7) limits an employee's claim for damages resulting from termination of an employment contract to "the compensation provided by such contract, without acceleration, for one year following" termination plus "any unpaid compensation due under such contract, without acceleration," on such date. Although the employee had fully earned the bonus before termination, because the contract extended the payments over time but accelerated them upon termination without cause, section 502(b)(7) limits the employee's allowable claim to the amount provided under the contract for the one year following termination. Section 502(b)(7) similarly limits prepetition interest on the claim. Prepetition interest on the claim's capped portion is limited by the cap; prepetition interest on the uncapped portion, that is, the amount that was already owing on the termination date, is not. Woods v. 21st Century Oncology Holdings, Inc. (In re 21st Century Oncology Holdings, Inc.), ___ F.3d ___, 2020 U.S. App. LEXIS 22473 (2d Cir. July 20, 2020).
- 6.1.aa In section 552(b), "proceeds" retains the meaning from the original U.C.C., not Revised Article 9. A security agreement gave municipal pension fund bondholders a security interest on the pensions system's employer contributions, the right to receive employer contributions, and the proceeds thereof. Section 552 terminates a security interest in after-acquired property as of the petition date, except property that is proceeds of prepetition collateral. When Congress enacted section 552, Article 9 of the U.C.C. contained a definition of "proceeds," which courts used in interpreting section 552. Revised Article 9 expanded the definition. Courts look to a statutory term's definition when Congress used the term, not later amendments to the definition. Therefore, in construing the reach of "proceeds" in section 552, only the narrower original definition of "proceeds" in Article 9 applies. Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd. v. Andalusian Global Designated Activity Co. (In re Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd.), 948 F.3d 457 (1st Cir. 2020).
- 6.1.bb Postpetition receipts are not proceeds of a "right to receive" a mere expectancy. A municipal statute defined "employer contributions" as the amounts the statute required municipal employers to pay into the retirement system, which were based on actual payroll. The statute also allowed the legislature to modify or eliminate the contribution rate. A security agreement gave municipal pension fund bondholders a security interest on employer contributions, the right to receive employer contributions, and the proceeds thereof. Section 552 terminates a security interest in after-acquired property as of the petition date, except property that is proceeds of prepetition collateral. Because postpetition employer contributions based on payroll could not be determined as of the petition date, postpetition contributions, and the “right to receive” future employer contributions, were not property of the debtor as of the petition date, and the postpetition contributions were a mere expectancy interest, not proceeds in which the bondholders could have a security interest. Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd. v. Andalusian Global Designated Activity Co. (In re Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd.), 948 F.3d 457 (1st Cir. 2020).

- 6.1.cc Employer contributions to a pension system trust fund are not special revenues. A security agreement gave municipal pension fund bondholders a security interest on the employer contributions, the right to receive employer contributions, and the proceeds thereof of the debtor’s pension system, which is a separate legal entity from the debtor. The system does not charge fees for its services in handling employer and employee contributions and paying pensions from its trust fund and does not generate any revenues. Section 552 terminates a security interest in after-acquired property as of the petition date, except property that is proceeds of prepetition collateral and, in a municipal case under section 928, special revenues. Section 902(2) defines special revenues to include “(A) receipts derived from the ownership, operation, or disposition of projects or systems of the debtor that are primarily used or intended to be used primarily to provide transportation, utility, or other services” and “(D) other revenues or receipts derived from particular functions of the debtor.” Because the employer contributions do not originate in either the system’s ownership or operation of the pension system or trust assets, they do not qualify as special revenues under section 902(2)(A). And because they do not originate in the system’s management, investment, and distribution of its trust fund, they are not special revenues under section 902(2)(D). Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd. v. Andalusian Global Designated Activity Co. (In re Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd.), 948 F.3d 457 (1st Cir. 2020).
- 6.1.dd Court may not disallow default interest on a secured claim as an unenforceable penalty or on equitable grounds. After a successful auction, the senior lien creditor’s claim became oversecured. The creditor sought allowance of postpetition interest at the 18% default rate under the loan agreements, which was about 10% to 14% higher than the contract rate on the creditor’s loans. Section 502(b)(2) disallows postpetition interest, but section 506(b) authorizes allowance on an oversecured claim. Section 506(b) does not specify the interest rate, but courts have held that the contract rate is the presumptive rate, as long as the rate is enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Applicable nonbankruptcy law here permits a lender to charge any rate and disallows any contract term that imposes a penalty, rather than liquidated damages, upon a default. However, a default interest rate is not a liquidated damages provision, which provides a specific sum for breach, and may not be analyzed as liquidated damages. Although the bankruptcy court may apply equitable considerations in some circumstances, its power does not extend to determination of an allowable interest rate under section 506(b). For these reasons, the court allows the default rate. Bank of Mo. v. Family Pharmacy, Inc. (In re Family Pharmacy, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 716 (8th Cir. B.A.P. Mar. 19, 2020).
- 6.1.ee Related private equity funds are not a partnership-in-fact for MPPAA withdrawal liability purposes. A private equity firm created several investment funds, which were each structured as limited partnerships. The firm created and appointed the general partners of each of the funds. Two of the funds acquired a portfolio company: they formed an LLC, which formed a holding company, which owned the portfolio company. Their ownership interests in the LLC were 70% and 30%. The portfolio company was a participant in a multi-employer pension plan. Under the Multi-Employer Pension Plan Amendments (MPPAA), when a participant withdraws from a plan, it is liable for its portion of the plan’s unfunded liabilities. Any entity that qualifies as a trade or business and is under common control with and owns 80% or more of the withdrawing employer is jointly and severally liable for the withdrawal liability. MPPAA regulations provide an entity is under common control as provided under tax law. Under tax law, a partnership-in-fact is determined based on the parties' agreement and their conduct in executing its terms, their contributions, and their control over income and capital, and on whether each party is a principal (rather than an employee or agent), the business is conducted in the parties' joint name, they file partnership returns, maintain separate books and records, or exercise mutual control over the enterprise. Here, the funds, through their general partners, sought investments together and developed a common plan for acquisition and operation of portfolio companies, and their principals controlled the portfolio companies. However, the funds did not intend to conduct the portfolio company's business jointly, disclaimed a partnership, had few common investors, filed separate tax returns, maintained separate books and records and bank accounts, and did not operate in parallel. Based on these facts, the funds were not a partnership-in-fact and therefore were not liable for the debtor's withdrawal liability. Sun Capital P'ners III, LP v. N.E. Teamsters & Trucking Indus. Pension Fund, 943 F.3d 49 (1st Cir. 2019).

- 6.1.ff Trustee may settle a claim that is subject to a creditor's objection. A creditor filed an adversary proceeding objecting to and seeking equitable subordination of another creditor's claim. While the adversary proceeding was pending, the trustee settled with the other creditor and filed a motion under Rule 9019 for approval of the settlement, which would have mooted the adversary proceeding. Section 502(a) permits any party in interest to object to a claim and imposes a correlative duty on the court to hear and resolve any such objection. A bankruptcy court may discharge its duty by hearing the evidence on approval of the settlement and need not hear full litigation on the claim objection itself. If the court is satisfied the settlement meets the requirements for approval of a settlement, it may approve and thereby moot the claim objection. Hamon v. DVR, LLC (In re DVR, LLC), 606 B.R. 80 (D. Colo. 2019).
- 6.1.gg Court disallows default interest on a secured claim as an unenforceable penalty. After a successful auction, the senior lien creditor's claim became oversecured. The creditor sought allowance of postpetition interest at the 18% default rate under the loan agreements, which was about 10% to 14% higher than the contract rate on the creditor's loans. Section 502(b)(2) disallows postpetition interest, but section 506(b) authorizes allowance on an oversecured claim. Section 506(b) does not specify the interest rate, but courts have held that the contract rate is the presumptive rate. The presumption in favor of the contract rate may be overcome by equitable considerations or if applicable nonbankruptcy law would render the rate unenforceable. Applicable nonbankruptcy law here permits a lender to charge any rate, but it also disallows any contract term that imposes a penalty, rather than liquidated damages, upon a default. To be enforceable, the term must reflect "a reasonable prediction of the harm caused by the breach and ... of a kind difficult to estimate accurately." The creditor adduced no evidence to support satisfaction of that test. Therefore, the court disallows the default rate under nonbankruptcy law. A court may disallow the contract rate on equitable grounds based on the reasonableness of the difference between the default and non-default rate, the relative distribution rights of other creditors, and whether the higher rate compensates the creditor for any loss (or is a disguised penalty). Based on these factors, the court concludes the default rate should be disallowed on equitable grounds as well. In re Family Pharmacy, Inc., 605 B.R. 900 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2019).
- 6.1.hh Court allows default interest rate as liquidated damages. The debtor's loan agreement provided a default interest rate of 5% over the nondefault rate. The debtor and the bank did not negotiate over the default rate, and the bank made no effort when it issued the loan to determine what its damages, such as administrative or funding costs or loss in the loan's value, might be if the debtor defaulted or whether the default interest rate bore any relation at all to anticipated damages resulting from a default. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession objected to the allowance of default interest as an unenforceable penalty rather than liquidated damages arising from the debtor's breach of the loan agreement. Applicable nonbankruptcy law renders a liquidated damages provision unenforceable unless the provision was unreasonable under the circumstances existing when the contract was made. It does not require that the parties actually have negotiated the amount. The issue is a question of law. Courts have regularly treated a default interest rate as permissible and not as an unenforceable penalty. Moreover, in addition to the administrative costs and increased risk to the lender, the value of a loan to the lender decreases after default. A higher interest rate can compensate the lender for that loss. Therefore, the court allows the default interest rate. East West Bank v. Altadena Lincoln Crossing, LLC, 598 B.R. 633 (C.D. Cal. 2019).

- 6.1.ii Section 502(b)(7) caps earned but unmatured compensation. The debtor's employee's employment contract provided for a bonus, payable over five years. The contract also provided for a severance payment and the acceleration of any unpaid portion of the bonus if the debtor terminated the employment without cause. The employee earned the bonus before the debtor terminated his employment without cause, but the debtor had paid only a portion. The debtor later filed a chapter 11 petition. The employee sought damages for termination of the employment contract plus interest. Section 502(b)(7) limits an employee's claim for damages resulting from termination of an employment contract to "the compensation provided by such contract, without acceleration, for one year following" termination plus "any unpaid compensation due under such contract, without acceleration," on such date. Although the employee had fully earned the bonus before termination, because the contract extended the payments over time but accelerated them upon termination without cause, section 502(b)(7) limits the employee's allowable claim to the amount provided under the contract for the one year following termination. Section 502(b)(7) similarly limits prepetition interest on the claim. Prepetition interest on the claim's capped portion is limited by the cap; prepetition interest on the uncapped portion, that is, the amount that was already owing on the termination date, is not. In re 21st Century Oncology Holdings, Inc., 597 B.R. 217 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2019).
- 6.1.jj Surety's claim is superior to accounts receivable security interest. The debtor filed a bankruptcy petition before it completed work on a construction project. The debtor's surety completed the project, and the project owner paid the retainage due under the contract into court. The debtor's lender, who claimed a security interest in the debtor's receivables, and the surety each claimed the payment. The right to a retainage under a contract belongs to the party who completes the contract. As a result, the retainage belonged to the surety and never became property of the estate that was subject to the lender security interest. In addition, a surety's right to payment is based on equitable principles, not on the U.C.C. Therefore, the surety is entitled to the payment. Kappa Devel. & Gen. Contracting Inc. v. Hanover Ins. Co. (In re Kappa Devel. & Gen. Contracting Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 2002 (Bankr. S.D. Miss. July 2, 2019).
- 6.1.kk Sections 552(b) and 928 do not protect a security interest in the right to receive post-petition revenues that are not fixed prepetition. The municipal debtor served as a fund to which employers within the government made contributions to fund employees' retirements and from which employee pensions were paid. The amount of payments to the fund were based on a combination of a percentage of the employer's payroll, the then-current number of an employer's retirees, and an actuarial calculation based on the pension funding needs of the debtor and each employer's proportion of employees and contributions. An employer's contribution amount each year could be determined only when the payments were due, based on then-current statistics. The debtor had issued bonds secured by, among other things, employer contributions and the right to receive employer contributions. Section 552 terminates a security interest in property the debtor acquires after the commencement of the case, except property that is the proceeds of prepetition collateral. Because the debtor's right to receive the payment is not fixed and is based on postpetition workforce demographics and postpetition calculations, the right to receive the payments does not exist as of the commencement of the case, the debtor had no right to collect the postpetition payments as of the commencement of the case, and therefore the postpetition payments are not proceeds of prepetition collateral. Section 928(a) excepts “special revenues” from section 552’s effect. “Special revenues” include “(A) receipts derived from the ownership, operation, or disposition of projects or systems ... that are primarily used ... to provide transportation, utility or other services,” and “(D) other revenues or receipts derived from particular functions of the debtor.” Clause (A) applies only to receipts from physical systems that provide services to third parties. Clause (D) applies only to receipts from providing the “particular function;” it does not cover a debtor’s receipts that are not compensation for the function, such as for services. Therefore, the debtor’s revenues are not “special revenues.” Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd. v. Andalusian Global Designated Activity Co. (In re Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd.), ___ B.R. ___, case no. 3:17-213 (D.P.R. June 27, 2019).

- 6.1.ii Court allows postpetition attorneys’ fee claim to undersecured creditor. The undersecured creditor asserted a claim under the note for postpetition attorneys’ fees that would be enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Section 502(b) provides a claim is allowed unless one of nine enumerated exceptions to allowance apply. None of them disallows attorneys’ fees. “Claim” includes a right to payment that is contingent or unliquidated. Even though section 502(b) requires the claim to be determined as of the petition date and the creditor had not incurred postpetition attorneys’ fees as of that date, the creditor’s fee claim was contingent as of the petition date. The fees became fixed and liquidated during the case and before the final order on allowance, so awaiting the fixing or liquidation of the claim would not delay the case’s administration, which is the trigger for section 502(c) estimation. Therefore, the court could allow the claim in the actual amount rather than simply estimating the contingent claim under section 502(c). Section 506(b) allows a claim for attorneys’ fees on an oversecured claim. Its function is to fix the secured status of the fee claim and should not be read to override section 502(b), which requires allowance if none of the nine enumerated conditions are met. Therefore, the court allows the creditor’s claim for postpetition attorneys’ fees. Summitbridge Nat’l Invs. III, LLC v. Faison, 915 F.3d 288 (4th Cir. 2019).
- 6.1.mm Court refuses to enforce unconditional guarantee that violates public policy. The debtor leased aircraft under a financing lease; the debtor’s parent issued an unconditional guarantee. The lease contained a liquidated damages provision that was designed to ensure the lessor received a full return of its investment plus an IRR of 4%. Section 504 of Article 2A of the U.C.C. permits a liquidated damages provision “that is reasonable in light of the then anticipated harm caused by the default or other act or omission.” The liquidated damages provision effectively required the debtor to assume the risk of market value loss over the course of the lease and so was not related to the anticipated harm the lessor might suffer upon a default. As such, it was not reasonable and was instead a penalty that is unenforceable as a matter of public policy. Courts typically enforce an unconditional guarantee despite the unenforceability of the guaranteed obligations, except where enforcement would violate public policy. Accordingly, the guarantee is also unenforceable for the same reason as the lease’s damages provision. In re Republic Airways Holdings Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 407 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Feb. 14, 2019).
- 6.1.nn Court disallows make-whole claim as postpetition interest; remands to determine rate of postpetition interest in a solvent case. The debtor’s plan proposed payment of the noteholders’ claims in cash in full with whatever amount of postpetition interest and contractual make-whole amount is required for the class to be unimpaired. Section 502(b)(2) disallows claims for postpetition interest as part of a claim. Whether a claim is for unmaturing postpetition interest is based on economic realities, not formalities. A make-whole payment is the economic equivalent of interest and compensates a creditor for lost future interest. Therefore, section 502(b)(2) disallows a make-whole amount as well as the contractual postpetition interest on the claims. Section 1129(a)(7), which requires that a plan provide at least as much as a liquidation, allows postpetition interest “at the legal rate” on all allowed claims, through indirect incorporation of section 726(a)(5). Section 726(a)(5) differs from the pre-Code “solvent debtor” exception, which required payment of contractual interest as part of a claim before any surplus could be returned to the debtor, in that it applies to all claims, not just those whose contract provided for interest, applies to interest on, not as part of, the claim, and uses the legal, rather than the contractual, rate. But section 1129(a)(7), and therefore section 726(a)(5), do not apply to a class of claims that is not impaired. Therefore, the creditors are entitled to the make-whole amount if and only if the solvent debtor exception survives the Code. The court of appeals remands to determine that question. The parties agreed that the creditors are entitled to postpetition interest, based on Congress' repeal of former section 1124(3), which courts have read to deny postpetition interest to an unimpaired class, but did not agree on the rate. The court identifies two possible approaches: the legal rate under 28 U.S.C. § 1961(a), which allows interest at the legal rate on a money judgment, and equity, which might provide a right to postpetition interest at an appropriate equitable rate. The court of appeals remands to determine the appropriate rate. Ultra Petroleum Corp. v. Ad Hoc Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Ultra Petroleum Corp.), ___ F.3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 1617 (5th Cir. Jan. 17, 2019).

- 6.1.oo Court disallows default interest rate as unenforceable penalty. The debtor's loan agreement provided a default interest rate of 5% over the nondefault rate. The debtor and the bank did not negotiate over the default rate, and the bank made no effort when it issued the loan to determine what its damages, such as administrative or funding costs or loss in the loan's value, might be if the debtor defaulted or whether the default interest rate bore any relation at all to anticipated damages resulting from a default. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession objected to the allowance of default interest. Applicable nonbankruptcy law requires that a liquidated damages amount "must represent the result of a reasonable endeavor by the parties to estimate a fair average compensation for any loss that may be sustained." An amount disproportionate to that amount is an unenforceable penalty. Because the bank here made no effort to estimate damages or loss resulting from the default, the default interest rate is an unenforceable penalty. The court disallows the claim to that extent. In re Altadena Lincoln Crossing, LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 2018 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. July 3, 2018).
- 6.1.pp Section 562 does not apply to a termination resulting from a settlement of claims. The debtor's counterparty had entered into a prime brokerage agreement and a securities lending contract with the debtor's English broker-dealer subsidiary, which the debtor guaranteed. When the broker-dealer filed for administration in the U.K., it held securities valued at $118 million, which it did not return to the counterparty. The broker-dealer had offsetting claims against the counterparty under the securities lender contract. During the administration case, the U.K. administrator and the counterparty settled their offsetting claims, resulting in the termination of the contracts and a payment from the counterparty to the administrator, which was based on the value of the counterparty's securities as of the date of settlement of $101 million. The counterparty filed a claim under the guarantee in the debtor's chapter 11 case for the $17 million loss. Section 562 provides that damages resulting from the trustee's rejection or a financial participant's termination of a safe harbor financial contract is measured at the earlier of the date of rejection or of termination. Section 562 must be read in conjunction with the other safe harbor provisions, which protect a counterparty's right to terminate a safe harbor contract and exempt it from the automatic stay and its contract from assumption. And section 562 relates to damages arising from termination of the contract, not to damages determined under a settlement agreement. Therefore, section 562 does not apply; the basic bankruptcy principle of section 502(b) that claims are determined as of the petition date applies. The counterparty may assert a claim for the loss in value of the securities from the petition date to the settlement date. Maverick Long Enhanced Fund, Ltd. v. Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 594 B.R. 564 (S.D.N.Y. 2018).
- 6.1.qq Bankruptcy court enforces anti-assignment clause in a note against a claim buyer. The debtor issued a promissory note under a loan agreement, both governed by Delaware law. The note and the agreement prohibited the lender from assigning the note or the agreement without the debtor's consent and provided that any such assignment without consent would be void. A claims buyer bought the note and filed a proof of claim, to which the debtor in possession objected. Delaware law distinguishes between a right to assign and the power to assign. An anti-assignment clause, without more, restricts the lender's right, not power, to assign, so that an assignment is enforceable but might give rise to a damage claim against the assignor. If the anti-assignment clause renders the assignment void, it restricts the power to assign; the courts will enforce the provision. Here, the note restricted the power to assign, so the assignment was void. The debtor's breach of the note by filing bankruptcy does not render the provision unenforceable. The non-defaulting party may stand on the contract and seek damages for breach or may rescind. But its rights do not increase upon the defaulting party's default, so the provision remains enforceable. U.C.C. section 9-408 renders unenforceable any anti-assignment provision only to the extent the provision prohibits the creation, attachment, or perfection of a security interest or provides that the assignment gives rise to a breach or right of damages. Section 9-406(e) endorses the enforceability of an anti-assignment provision in the sale of a promissory note. The court give effect to each section; section 9-408 does not eclipse section 9-406. Therefore, the court enforces the anti-assignment clause. In re Woodbridge Group of Cos., LLC, 590 B.R. 99 (Bankr. D. Del. 2018), aff'd. Contrarian Funds, LLC v. Woodbridge Group of Cos., LLC (In re Woodbridge Group of Cos., LLC), 606 B.R. 201 (D. Del. 2019).

- 6.1.rr Resolution of claim objection does not preclude debtor's later action against creditor for damages. In his chapter 13 case, the debtor objected to a creditor's claim. The court sustained the objection. After bankruptcy the debtor sued the creditor for damages resulting from the creditor's prebankruptcy enforcement efforts, on the ground that the claim was invalid and the enforcement efforts pushed the debtor into bankruptcy. A prior judgment precludes a claim if the claim was adjudicated finally in the first action, the present claim is the same as the claim raised in the first action, and the parties are the same or in privity. Bankruptcy Rule 3007 provides that a claim objection is a contested matter, which may not include a demand for relief of a kind that requires an adversary proceeding. The debtor's claim against the creditor for damages required an adversary proceeding and could have been asserted in the claim objection proceeding. Therefore, claim preclusion does not apply. Davenport v. Djourabchi, ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97706 (D.D.C. June 11, 2018).
- 6.1.ss Municipal Bankruptcy Amendments do not require turnover of pledged special revenues. The debtor issued revenue bonds, pledging the revenues from a system to bondholders. After filing a case under Title III of PROMESA, which is a bankruptcy-like case that incorporates most of chapter 9's provisions, the debtor continued to collect and hold the revenues, some of which the debtor and the bondholders stipulated were "special revenues." The bondholders sought an order requiring turnover of the pledged special revenues that the debtor held. Section 928(a) provides that a prepetition security interest in special revenues continues in special revenues the debtor receives postpetition, despite section 552(b), which cuts off a security interest in postpetition receipts that are not proceeds. Section 922(d) provides an exception to the automatic stay for the "application of pledged special revenues" consistent with section 928. PROMESA section 305, which mirrors Bankruptcy Code section 904, prohibits the court from interfering with the debtor's property or revenues. Section 928(a)'s plain language operates only to preserve the bondholders' security interest in postpetition revenues, nothing more. It does not require turnover. Similarly, section 922(d) operates only to exempt from the automatic stay the application of pledged special revenues, whether by the debtor, the bondholders, or the indenture trustee, nothing more. It does not require turnover. Section 305 prohibits the court from interfering with the debtor's property and therefore from ordering the debtor to turnover pledged special revenues. Therefore, the court dismisses the bondholders' complaint. Assured Guar. Corp. v. Commonwealth of Puerto Rico (In re Fin. Oversight & Mgmt. Board for Puerto Rico), 582 B.R. 579 (D.P.R. 2018).
- 6.1.tt Reorganized debtor's stock is not proceeds of collateral. Two groups of secured creditors shared substantially all the debtor's assets as collateral. Early in the chapter 11 case, the court approved a cash collateral stipulation that recognized the creditors' rights under section 552(b) to ensure that the security interest attached to proceeds of the collateral. The debtor completed an internal reorganization, in which it transferred all its assets to a newly-formed subsidiary and spun off the subsidiary to the creditors by distributing to the prepetition secured creditors the stock in the new subsidiary, all cash on hand, and cash proceeds of the new subsidiary's borrowings. An intercreditor agreement allocated collateral proceeds received in connection with a sale or other disposition of collateral between the two groups. The plan provisions controlled allocation of other distributions. Although the creditors received the stock distribution in exchange for a release of their security interests in the collateral, the spin-off was not a sale that generated proceeds. Nor was it a "disposition," because the collateral was not transferred to another. Rather, it was a debt-for-equity reorganization where the collateral was transferred internally, and the reorganized entity retains control of the collateral. Section 552(b) provides that a security interest in collateral attaches to proceeds. However, it requires tracing of the proceeds to the petition-date collateral. Even where a secured creditor has a security interest in all or substantially all of the debtor's assets, postpetition cash is not necessarily proceeds of petition-date collateral. Accordingly, because the creditors did not trace the cash to petition-date collateral, the cash payments were not proceeds that were subject to the intercreditor agreement's allocation provisions. Del. Trust Co. v. Wilmington Trust, N.A. (In re Energy Future Holdings Corp.), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52476 (D. Del. Mar. 29, 2018).

6.1.uu Payment of a recovery judgment does not vitiate other grounds for objection to a claim.

The debtor issued a note to repurchase stock from an investor and paid a portion of the note within four years before bankruptcy. The investor filed a proof of claim for the balance owing on the note. The trustee avoided the prepetition payment and obtained a judgment for recovery of the payment. The investor paid the amount of the judgment. The trustee then objected to the investor's claim. Section 502(d) disallows "any claim of any entity from which property is recoverable under section ...550 ..., unless such entity ...has paid the amount, or turned over any such property, for which such entity is liable" Payment of the judgment undoes the effect of disallowance under section 502(d), but it does not entitle the claimant to an allowed claim if there are other grounds for objection, as there were in this case. RNI-NV Ltd. P'shp. v. Field (In re Maui Indus. Loan & Fin. Co.), 580 B.R. 886 (D. Haw. 2018).

6.1.vv State law determines whether a claimant is an employee and the burden of proof.

The debtor operated gas stations. One of the debtor's managers hired the claimant to work the night shift as a floater among several of the stations. The manager paid the claimant off the books in cash. When the debtor filed its petition, the claimant filed a proof of claim for his unpaid wages and asserted priority. Section 507(a) grants priority to a claim for "wages ... owed to an individual." Wages derive only from an employment relationship, not a contractual relationship. An employment relationship requires that the employer control and direct the manner of the employee's work. The Fair Labor Standards Act and the New York Labor Law, which use essentially that same definition of employee, are relevant to the determination. The court should apply state law in determining the allowability of a claim. State law includes the burden of proof. Although Bankruptcy Rule 3001 imposes the burden of persuasion on the claimant, the objector's obligation to rebut the claimant's prima facie case is defined by the state law burden of proof rules. The court remands to the bankruptcy court to determine the claimant's claim in accordance with these principles. Gyalpo v. Holbrook Devel. Corp., 577 B.R. 629 (E.D.N.Y. 2017).

6.1.ww Future claim arises only once the debtor can identify class of potential claimants or once claimants know facts connecting them to debtor's conduct.

The debtor manufactured iron pipe at a plant built in 1910. It filed chapter 11 in 1989 and confirmed a plan in 1995. The reorganized debtor closed the plant in 2010. Around the time the plant closed, the EPA designated an area around the plant as a Superfund site. Plaintiffs sued the reorganized debtor in state and federal court for personal and property injuries resulting from the environmental problems. The plaintiffs did not know of their injuries before plan confirmation. The reorganized debtor brought an action in the bankruptcy case to enforce the chapter 11 discharge against the plaintiffs. A chapter 11 discharge operates to discharge all claims that arose before confirmation.

The Code defines “claim” broadly to include contingent and unmatured rights to payment. The courts have adopted a variety of tests to determine when a claim arose, including the state law accrual test, the conduct test, the prepetition relationship test, and the fair contemplation test. In the Eleventh Circuit, the Piper Aircraft decision, 58 F.3d 1573 (11th Cir. 1995), adopted a version of the prepetition relationship test: “The debtor’s prepetition conduct gives rise to a claim to be administered in bankruptcy only if there is a relationship established before confirmation between an identifiable claimant or group of claimants and that prepetition conduct.” Based on that test, the debtor’s prepetition release of contaminants is not enough to establish the necessary relationship. For practical as well as due process reasons, to establish the relationship, during the bankruptcy case, either the debtor must be able to identify, from knowledge of its own conduct, a class of potential future claimants, or future claimants must have knowledge of facts connecting them to the debtor’s conduct. Otherwise, a claim could not be administered during the bankruptcy case. The record here showed no evidence of the debtor’s or the plaintiffs’ knowledge of any potential injuries or relationship before confirmation. Therefore, the claims did not arise before confirmation and were not discharged. U.S. Pipe & Foundry Co. v. Adams (In re U.S. Pipe & Foundry Co.), 577 B.R. 916 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2017).

6.1.xx Court disallows make-whole amount based on automatic acceleration. The debtor’s notes entitled the lenders to a make-whole payment if the debtor were to “redeem the Notes at its option” before a specified date. The indenture provided for automatic acceleration of the notes’ maturity upon the debtor’s bankruptcy filing. The debtor’s plan issued replacement notes to the lenders based on an allowed claim that did not include the make-whole amount. Following its prior decision in In re AMR Corp., 730 F.3d 88 (2d Cir 2013), the court rules the automatic acceleration changed the notes’ maturity date. As a result, the debtor’s payment of the notes under the plan was not at its option. It does not matter whether the indenture provided for the make-whole payment upon “redemption” or “prepayment”—the payment under the plan of the accelerated notes was not voluntary. And in any event, “redemption” means payment at or before maturity, not after. The court notes the different result in In re Energy Future Holdings Corp., 842 F.3d 247 (3d Cir. 2016). Apollo Global Mgmt., LLC v. BOKF, NA (In re MPM Silicones, L.L.C.), 874 F.3d 787 (2d Cir. 2017).

6.1.yy Court allows make-whole amount under cash-payment nonimpairment plan. Because commodity prices increased during the case, the debtor became hopelessly solvent. The bondholders asserted a claim for postpetition default rate interest, for a make-whole payment, and for interest on the make-whole amount, which became due on the petition date. The make-whole amount was calculated based on the present value of excess of the remaining interest payments under the bonds over the like maturity Treasury note plus 0.50%. The New York law-governed bond indenture expressly provided that the make-whole became due and payable upon any payment before regular maturity, even a payment upon acceleration after default. In this case, the chapter 11 filing was the default that accelerated the notes and triggered the make-whole obligation. The debtor’s plan proposed to pay its senior bonds in cash in full in the amount necessary to render them unimpaired under section 1124(1). Under New York law, a make-whole amount is generally viewed as liquidated damages, which are enforceable to the extent they represent a reasonable measure of probable actual loss and the amount of actual loss is incapable or difficult of precise estimation. The make-whole provision satisfies this standard, because prepayment damages were not easily calculable when the indenture was executed. Upon prepayment, the lender loses future interest, offset by reinvestment of prepaid principal. However, reinvestment alternatives are uncertain. Therefore, a formula may provide a reasonable loss estimate, and this formula does. The court also concludes, through a complex hypothetical calculation, that postpetition default interest does not double count any amount payable as a make-whole. Section 1124(1) treats a class as unimpaired only if the plan does not alter any of the legal, equitable or contractual rights of the claims. Here, the claims were entitled to a make-whole payment, default-rate interest, and interest on the unpaid make-whole amount, all of which must be paid to render the class unimpaired under section 1124(1). In re Ultra Petro. Corp., 575 B.R. 361 (Bankr, S.D. Tex. 2017).

- 6.1.zz Employment discrimination claims seeking lost wages, instatement, future wages, and contract debarment are “claims.” After the debtor confirmed its plan, the Department of Labor filed three administrative complaints against the debtor for prepetition violations, asserting claims for lost wages, interest, front wages, and fringe benefits, including retroactive seniority, employee instatement, cancellation of government contracts, debarment from future government contracts, and a permanent injunction against continuing violations of Executive Orders prohibiting discrimination. A claim is a right to payment or a right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance if the breach gives rise to a right to payment. The economic loss claims the DOL seeks all constitute potentially dischargeable claims, because they all assert a right to payment. Equitable instatement is an alternative to front pay and therefore is also a claim. The demand for contract cancellation and debarment are backward looking and therefore also claims. The request for a permanent injunction is a forward looking attempt to prevent discrimination, which does not seek payment, and therefore is not a claim. In re Pilgrim’s Pride Corp., 564 B.R. 534 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2017).
- 6.1.aaa Section 502(b)(6) cap does not apply to landlord’s claim for attorneys’ fees for litigating a pre-bankruptcy breach. The debtor stopped paying rent under his lease. The landlord sued; the debtor counterclaimed. The arbitrator awarded the landlord damages for past due and future rent and attorneys’ fees, as provided under the lease. The debtor filed bankruptcy. Section 502(b)(6) caps a landlord’s claim “for damages resulting from the termination of a lease of real property. The cap does not apply to damages that would be awarded to the landlord even if the debtor had not rejected or terminated the lease. The arbitrator awarded the attorneys’ fees for litigation over both past due rent and future rent. The claim for damages for past due rent and the associated attorneys’ fees would have occurred even if the debtor assumed the lease in his bankruptcy. Therefore, they are not capped. But the claim for future rent and for attorneys’ fees for litigating future rent result from the termination and are capped. Kupfer v. Salma (In re Kupfer), 852 F.3d 853 (9th Cir. 2016).
- 6.1.bbb In bankruptcy, a statute of limitations of the state of the parties’ choice of law governs if longer than the forum’s statute. The debtor signed a note that was governed by Ohio law without regard to conflict of law principles. The debtor defaulted and later filed bankruptcy in California within six years. California’s statute of limitations is four years; Ohio’s is six years. Because bankruptcy is a federal proceeding and does not rely on diversity, federal choice of law rules apply. The Ninth Circuit looks to the Restatement for those rules. Under federal choice of law rules, ordinarily, a contractual choice of law provision does not govern the choice of a statute of limitations, which is generally considered procedural. The 1988 version of section 142 of the Restatement permits deviation from that rule in “exceptional circumstances [that] make such a result unreasonable.” While a plaintiff that files in a state after its short statute of limitations expires may refile in the other state to preserve the claim, a creditor in bankruptcy may not do so. Therefore, application of the forum state’s shorter statute of limitations would be unreasonable, and the longer Ohio statute of limitations applies, making the claim timely. PNC Bank v. Sterba (In re Sterba), 852 F.3d 1175 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 6.1.ccc Lender’s false estoppel certificate leads to claim disallowance and breach of contract damages. With its loan approaching maturity, the debtor received an offer to buy the real property securing the loan. It needed an estoppel certificate from the lender, which had acquired the loan from the FDIC with a “shared loss” agreement under which the FDIC reimbursed the lender for 80% of the difference between the loan’s book value and the actual recovery. Despite a state court judgment against the lender that prohibited the lender from charging interest for a period during a prior falsely-called default, the lender included the interest and other improper amounts in the estoppel certificate. The purchase offer exceeded the actual loan payoff amount but was less than the false estoppel certificate amount. As a result, the debtor was unable to sell the property, leading to the bankruptcy filing. In the bankruptcy case, the lender sought the previously disallowed interest and other amounts attributable to a default that would not have occurred if it had provided an accurate estoppel certificate. The court finds that the lender's protection from the shared loss agreement provided the lender the incentive to attempt to collect more than was owed on the loan. The bankruptcy court has authority to determine and enter a final order on the allowable amount of a claim against the estate and on the amount of any contract counterclaim that is necessarily resolved as part of the claims allowance process. Here, the court disallows the previously disallowed interest and the other amounts attributable to the false default and enters judgment against the lender on the debtor's breach of contract claim for all the costs of the bankruptcy, which the court finds would not have been incurred if the lender had provided an accurate estoppel certificate. Kraz, LLC v. Branch Banking & Trust Co. (In re Kraz, LLC), 570 B.R. 389 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2017).

6.1.ddd Court allows make-whole premium on repayment of notes in chapter 11. The debtor issued secured notes that permitted the debtor to redeem them before a specified date with payment of a "make-whole" premium. The debtor considered refinancing the notes before bankruptcy but did not because of the high make-whole cost. It filed bankruptcy several months later. The notes accelerated automatically by their terms upon the filing. The debtor in possession obtained financing to pay the notes, which were over-secured. The holders demanded payment of the make-whole. Notes are "redeemed" whenever the issuer pays them off, whether before, at or after maturity. The redemption here was "optional," despite the acceleration, because the debtor had the option to reinstate the notes under a plan but instead carried through on its prepetition proposal to refinance the notes in bankruptcy. Therefore, the make-whole is allowed. The court does not address whether the make-whole constitutes post-petition interest. Del. Trust Co. v. Energy Future Intermediate Holding Co. LLC (In re Energy Future Holdings Corp.), 842 F.3d 247 (3d Cir. 2016).

6.1.eee Surety may retain owner's payment if it incurs a payment obligation before contractor's bankruptcy. The debtor contractor obtained surety bonds to protect project owners. Shortly before the petition date, the debtor notified both the surety and the owners that it was ceasing work on the projects the next day. The surety sent the owners a letter the next day demanding that they not make any additional payments to the debtor under the contracts. A few days later, the debtor filed bankruptcy. The owners made three payments under the contracts, one before the debtor ceased work, one between cessation and bankruptcy, and one after bankruptcy. The surety filed a UCC-1 financing statement identifying payments under the contracts as collateral and obtained a state court attachment between cessation and bankruptcy. Against the bankruptcy trustee's claim for the payments, the surety asserted a right of subrogation. Section 509 permits subrogation among codebtors but does not preempt equitable subrogation principles in bankruptcy. Equitable subrogation applies when the subrogee pays in full, but not as a volunteer, an obligation for which it is not primarily liable. When the surety incurs the legal obligation to the owner, it subrogates to the contractor's right to the remaining payments. If that occurs before bankruptcy, the right to payment becomes the surety's property, not property of the estate. Here, the surety became obligated to the owner upon the debtor's cessation of work. Therefore, the surety was entitled to the second and third payments but not the first. Dwyer v. The Ins. Co. of the State of Pa. (In re Pihl, Inc.), 560 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2016).

6.1.fff Indenture trustee's acceleration of notes after default results in issuer's obligation to pay make-whole. A company issued notes under an indenture that gave the indenture trustee the option to accelerate the notes' maturity upon an event of default and the issuer the option to prepay the notes with a make-whole. The issuer defaulted under the indenture by spinning off one of its subsidiaries to its shareholders. The indenture trustee sought a declaration that the spin-off defaulted the indenture and that the make-whole was therefore due; the debtor disputed that the spin-off was a default. An issuer may prepay notes only if the instrument so provides, and a contractual requirement to pay a prepayment premium as a condition to prepayment is enforceable. The issuer's voluntary action that led to the indenture trustee's ability to demand payment acts the same as the issuer's voluntary optional redemption and the imposition of the make-whole, so that the issuer's default (whether or not voluntary) followed by acceleration does not leave the issuer in a better position than if it had optionally redeemed the notes. In this case, the spin-off was a default, and therefore the make-whole was due, even though the bonds were not redeemed. Wilmington Savs. Fund Soc., FSB v. Cash America Int'l, Inc. 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 127421 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 19, 2016).

- 6.1.ggg A claim does not arise until the law on which the claim is based is enacted. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan in 1985. The debtor had previously shipped hazardous waste to a processing facility that violated the environmental protection laws and that was closed down under orders from state and federal environmental protection agencies. Years later, a potentially responsible party incurred CERCLA remediation costs under a settlement agreement with an unrelated plaintiff and then sought contribution from the reorganized debtor under CERCLA sections 107 and 113(f). A chapter 11 discharge applies to all claims that arose before the plan effective date. A claim arises only when "the relationship between the debtor and the creditor contained all the elements necessary to give rise to a legal obligation under the relevant non-bankruptcy law." Congress did not enact CERCLA section 113(f) until after the 1985 confirmation order, and the courts did not recognize a contribution claim under section 107 until the Supreme Court reversed contrary court of appeals precedents in 2007. Therefore, the claim did not arise before the plan effective date and was not discharged. DMJ Assocs., L.L.C. v. Capasso, 565 B.R. 27 (E.D.N.Y. 2016).
- 6.1.hhh Court requires postpetition interest at the contract rate in a solvent case. The trustee confirmed a plan that paid all creditors in full, with postpetition interest at the federal judgment rate, and returned a surplus to equity holders. One creditor objected to the interest rate. Section 502(b)(2) disallows postpetition interest. Section 726(a)(5) provides for payment of postpetition interest in a solvent chapter 7 case "at the legal rate." Section 1129(a)(7) requires as a confirmation condition that holders of claims in an impaired class receive at least as much as they would receive in a chapter 7 case. Section 1124 provides that a plan impairs a class unless the plan does not alter the legal, equitable or contractual rights of the claims in the class (except for possible reinstatement and cure). Generally, courts should interpret the Code not to alter pre-Code practice unless a specific Code provision so provides. Historically, creditors were entitled to postpetition interest at their contract rates in a solvent case. Section 726(a)(5) is ambiguous on whether the phrase "the legal rate" changes that practice. A better reading, consistent with pre-Code law, is interest at a rate appropriate under federal bankruptcy law. Because that has historically been the contract rate, the court should enforce creditors' rights and use the contract rate in a solvent case for the class of claims to be unimpaired. Colfin Bulls Fundings A, LLC v. Paloian (In re Dvorkin Holdings, LLC), 547 B.R. 880 (N.D. Ill. 2016).
- 6.1.iii Pendency interest on an oversecured claim is presumptively at the default rate. The debtor's mortgage loan provided for interest after default at a higher rate. The loan matured prepetition. The property was worth more than the loan amount. The debtor proposed a plan that would allow the claim at the petition date amount plus interest accrued at the non-default rate during the case and would pay the claim over five years. Because the plan did not propose cure and reinstatement, case law that permits a cure to reset matters as they were before the default and therefore pay the pre-default interest rate does not apply. Instead, section 506(b) applies. It allows postpetition interest on a secured claim to the extent the collateral is worth more than the debt, but it does not specify the rate. State law generally governs creditor entitlements in bankruptcy, subject to any qualifying or contrary Bankruptcy Code provisions. Nothing in section 506(b) suggests any qualification or contrary result, so to the extent the default rate is enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law, it applies in determining the allowable claim amount under section 506(b), subject only to rebuttal based on equitable considerations. The debtor showed none here. Therefore, the claim is allowed with pendency interest at the default rate, and plan confirmation standards apply to that amount. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Beltway One Dev. Group, LLC (In re Beltway One Dev. Group, LLC), 547 B.R. 819 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2016).

- 6.1.jjj Intercreditor Agreement does not address adequate protection payments or plan distributions. Several creditors shared a first lien against the debtors' assets, but their claims accrued interest at different rates. An intercreditor agreement required pro rata sharing, based on amounts due and owing as of the payment date, among all first lien creditors of collateral or its proceeds "[1] received in connection with the sale or other disposition of, or collection on, such Collateral [2] upon the exercise of remedies ... [3] by the Collateral Agent." A cash collateral order provided for adequate protection payments directly to the creditors (bank agent, indenture trustee and swap counterparty) to the extent of any diminution in collateral value in an amount equal to interest at a single rate on the petition date principal balance of first lien claims. A confirmed plan provided for the debtors to contribute their assets to a new entity and for distribution to first lien creditors of stock of the new entity and of the debtors' cash (including cash from an exit financing), among other things. Stock received upon conversion of debt to equity is not proceeds of the debtor's assets; the different means of issuing the equity here does not require a different result. The debtor's cash on hand and exit financing proceeds do not fall within the intercreditor agreement's "proceeds" definition as "(i) consideration received from the sale/disposition of assets, (ii) value received as a consequence of possessing the Collateral, or (iii) insurance proceeds." Similarly, adequate protection payments are intended to protect against decrease in value and therefore are not "proceeds." The adequate protection payments and the plan proceeds do not result from or in connection with a sale or other disposition of, or collection on the collateral, because they are proceeds of an internal reorganization. Therefore, the reorganized debtor's stock and the cash are not proceeds of the debtor's assets that served as collateral. In addition, the adequate protection payments are not received by the Collateral Agent, because they were paid directly to the creditors. Finally, the plan distribution is not an exercise of remedies, such as a foreclosure, because the collateral agent never sought stay relief or took any other enforcement action. Therefore, the adequate protection payments and the plan distributions are not subject to the intercreditor agreement's sharing and waterfall provision, with the result that they are to be distributed based on petition date amounts, without regard to the differential accrual of postpetition interest. Delaware Trust Co v. Wilmington Trust, N.A. (In re Energy Future Holdings Corp.), 546 B.R. 566 (Bankr. D. Del. 2016).
- 6.1.kkk Trustee may surcharge collateral under section 506(c) even if expenses were not intended to benefit the secured creditor. The estate's principal asset was real property encumbered by three liens. At the beginning of the case, the trustee believed there to be equity in the property. Accordingly, he expended unencumbered estate assets to protect and preserve the property, including maintenance, insurance, and taxes. However, his attempts to sell the property yielded a price that was less than the amount required to satisfy the first mortgage. The first mortgagee objected to a sale at that price. The trustee then moved to abandon the property to the mortgagee but to surcharge the property for the expenses he had incurred in protecting and preserving the property. Section 506(c) permits a trustee to recover from encumbered property "the reasonable, necessary costs and expenses of preserving, or disposing of, such property to the extent of any benefit to the holder of" the secured claim. The statutory language does not limit the surcharge to expenses incurred with the specific intent to benefit the secured creditor. Actual benefit suffices, to prevent the secured creditor's unjust enrichment at the expense of the estate. However, to qualify, the benefit must be direct and quantifiable and must be primarily to preserve or dispose of the encumbered property, so as not to charge the creditor with general administrative expenses that are properly the responsibility of the general estate. The surcharge may include even expenses incurred while the trustee reasonably but unsuccessfully attempts to realize value for the estate if they ultimately benefit the secured creditor. SW Secs., FSB v. Segner (In re Domistyle, Inc.), 811 F.3d 691 (5th Cir. 2015).

- 6.1.iii Refinancing accelerated debt is not a prepayment that gives rise to an allowable make-whole claim. The debtor's indenture required a make-whole payment upon an optional redemption of the notes. It also automatically accelerated the notes' maturity upon a bankruptcy filing, without reference to the make-whole payment. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession refinanced the notes, paying them in cash in full. Before the refinancing, the indenture trustee attempted to give notice rescinding the acceleration. Acceleration of a note changes the maturity date, and under New York law, which governs the indenture, a borrower's repayment after acceleration is not considered voluntary or optional, so payment after an acceleration is not a prepayment. New York law requires express language imposing a prepayment penalty upon acceleration. The indenture here does not contain such language, because it does not provide that payment on acceleration constitutes a prepayment. The indenture permits the indenture trustee to rescind acceleration, but doing so violates the automatic stay, because it is an act to assess or recover on a claim, and so is void. The court defers to an evidentiary hearing whether there is cause to annul the automatic stay to permit the trustee to rescind acceleration. Del. Trust Co., v. Energy Future Intermediate Holding Co LLC (In re Energy Future Holdings Corp.), 527 B.R. 178 (Bankr. D. Del. 2015).
- 6.1.mmm Court denies stay relief to permit noteholders to rescind acceleration notice to gain make-whole payment. The debtor's first lien notes indenture contained a "make-whole" provision under which the debtor was obligated to pay a premium to the noteholders if the debtor voluntarily redeemed the notes before their stated maturity date. The indenture also provided that a bankruptcy filing was an automatic default and automatically accelerated the notes' maturity date and that the noteholders, by a majority vote, could rescind a default and reinstate the notes and their original maturity date. Shortly after the commencement of the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession sought approval to refinance the notes at a substantially lower interest rate. The indenture trustee moved for a declaration that a default rescission notice would not violate the automatic stay or, in the alternative, for stay relief to deliver such a notice and, acting on the noteholders' instructions, gave the debtor in possession a default and acceleration rescission notice that was expressly conditioned on the court's granting stay relief. After the refinancing, the court ruled that the rescission notice would violate the stay and that the indenture's terms did not entitle the noteholders to the $431 million make-whole payment, because the automatic acceleration advanced the maturity date to the petition date, so the payment was not before the notes' maturity. The court considered whether to grant retroactive stay relief to validate the rescission notice, assuming the debtor was solvent. For purposes of this proceeding, the court assumed, with the parties' consent, that the debtor was solvent. A court may grant stay relief for "cause," which must be determined based on the totality of the circumstances, including whether the harm to the party seeking stay relief substantially outweighs the potential harm to the estate. The estate includes the interests of shareholders, not just of creditors. Here, the savings to the estate from not paying the make-whole equals the gain to the noteholders, so the relative direct harms are equal. However, the estate would suffer much greater indirect harm: three other note issues had similar make-whole provisions that would generate claims of over an additional $500 million in the aggregate. Allowance of the additional claims would not only harm the estate directly but also would make plan confirmation more difficult. The court denies stay relief. Del. Trust Co. v. Energy Future Intermediate Holding Co. LLC (In re Energy Future Holdings Corp.), 533 B.R. 106 (Bankr. D. Del. 2015).
- 6.1.nnn Prepetition arbitration costs and attorneys' fees are not subject to lease termination damages cap. Before bankruptcy, the debtor failed to pay rent. The lessor brought an unlawful detainer action. They agreed on a surrender date but arbitrated the lessor's claim for unpaid rent. The arbitrator issued an award against the debtor for unpaid past and future rent and for arbitration costs and attorneys' fees. After bankruptcy, the lessor filed a proof of claim for all amounts. The debtor and the lessor agreed on the amount of the statutory cap under section 502(b)(6) but not on whether the arbitration costs and attorneys' fees were subject to the cap.

Section 502(b)(6) limits a lessor's claim "for damages resulting from the termination of a lease." A lessor might suffer both rent and non-rent damages from lease termination. Non-rent damages are not subject to the cap if the lessor would have had the same claim if the tenant assumed the lease, because such a claim does not result from lease termination. A claim for arbitration costs and attorneys' fees would not normally arise if the lease termination results from post-bankruptcy rejection. But here, lease termination occurred before bankruptcy. The costs and fees did not result from lease termination but from the debtor's refusal to pay and could have been prevented by an earlier bankruptcy filing. Therefore, the costs and fees are not subject to the cap. In re Kupfer, 526 B.R. 812 (N.D. Cal. 2015).

- 6.1.ooo City may not have unsecured claim under section 1111(b) for the portion of a property tax claim that is disallowed under section 502(b)(3). The city asserted a secured real property tax claim for over three times the property's value. Section 502(b)(3) disallows a tax claim assessed against property of the estate to the extent the claim exceeds the property's value. The court allowed the claim only for the property's value. The city sought to make the section 1111(b) election. Section 1111(b) permits a secured creditor to treat the entire amount of its claim as secured, even though the undersecured portion would be allowed under section 506(a) only as an unsecured claim. Here, however, the unsecured portion of the city's tax claim had been disallowed under section 503(b)(3), not merely disallowed as a secured claim. Permitting the city to make the section 1111(b) election would effectively nullify section 502(b)(3). Therefore, the court denies the election. In re 300 Washington St. LLC, 528 B.R. 534 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 6.1.ppp Security interest in accounts does not extend to insurance proceeds. The debtor granted the bank a security interest in accounts, including payment intangibles, and all proceeds, including insurance proceeds. The debtor was involved in a major accident, causing personal injury and property damage claims that led to its chapter 11 case. It asserted a claim against its commercial property insurance carrier for policy proceeds for the loss, including for losses resulting from business interruption. The carrier disputed the claim; the debtor in possession settled; the bank claimed a security interest in the settlement proceeds. UCC section 1-102(2) and (61) define "account" as "a right to payment of a monetary obligation ... for a policy of insurance issued or to be issued ..." and "payment intangible" as a "general intangible under which the account debtor's principal obligation is a monetary obligation." But section 1-109 provides that Article 9 does not apply to a "transfer of an interest in or an assignment of a claim under a policy of insurance." The inclusion in the account definition applies only to premiums owing to an insurance company or agent. Broadening its application would eviscerate section 1-109's exclusion of insurance interests. The limited case law that includes insurance proceeds from loss or destruction of the secured party's collateral as subject to the lender's security interest does not apply here, because the insurance proceeds were not proceeds of the bank's collateral. Therefore, the insurance proceeds were not subject to the bank's security interest. Wheeling & L.E. R'wy Co. v. Keach (In re Montreal, M. & A. R'wy, Ltd.), 521 B.R. 703 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2014).
- 6.1.qqq Trustee may not settle claims to which a creditor's objection is pending. A creditor objected to another creditor's proof of claim. The trustee settled with the claiming creditor and moved under Rule 9019 for approval. The objecting creditor objected to the settlement. Under section 502(b), the objecting creditor, as a party in interest, has standing to object to another creditor's claim. Approval of the settlement would deprive the objecting creditor of his standing to object to the other creditor's claim and moot the objection. Therefore, the court denies the settlement motion. In re The C.P. Hall Co., 513 B.R. 540 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2014).
- 6.1.rrr Section 506(b) fee limitations apply to nonbankruptcy foreclosure sale following stay relief. The secured lender's real property deed of trust authorized nonjudicial foreclosure and payment of trustee fees of 5% of the amount bid at the foreclosure sale and of the lender's attorneys' fees. The lender received stay relief to permit foreclosure under state law. The trustee conducted the foreclosure sale, realizing a surplus over the principal and interest owing and the fees. Section 506(b) allows to an oversecured creditor “interest on such claim, and any reasonable fees, costs, or charges provided for under the agreement ... under which such claim arose.” Stay relief does not constitute abandonment, so the real property remained property of the estate until sold, and the sale proceeds were property of the estate. Therefore, section 506(b) applies, even though the foreclosure sale occurred under nonbankruptcy law, and the bankruptcy court may determine whether the fees are reasonable and should be allowed. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. 804 Congress, L.L.C. (In re 804 Congress, L.L.C.), 756 F.3d 368 (5th Cir. 2014).

6.1.sss Right to purchase shares is not a claim. Before bankruptcy, the chapter 11 debtor guaranteed a nondebtor’s obligation to the bank. The debtor’s affiliate, also a chapter 11 debtor, gave the bank the right to purchase up to $10 million in shares in its subsidiary if the debtor did not pay on the guarantee. The bank could offset the purchase price against the amount owing on the guarantee. The debtor defaulted before bankruptcy. The bank filed a claim against the affiliate for $10 million. A claim is a right to payment or a right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance if the breach gives rise to a right to payment. Here, the bank’s right against the affiliate was for performance—the sale of the subsidiary’s shares. Breach of performance does not give rise to a right to performance where the claimant does not have the option to accept money in lieu of performance. The bank’s right to offset the purchase price against the unpaid guarantee amount is not an alternative right to payment, because the setoff would be a triangular setoff, which the Bankruptcy Code does not permit. Therefore, the court disallows the bank’s claim. In re Arcapita Bank B.S.C., 2014 Bankr. LEXIS 2237 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. May 20, 2014).

6.1.ttt Court disallows yield maintenance premium that accrues after the petition date as unmatured interest. The debtor guaranteed all of a nondebtor affiliate’s obligations under a promissory note, including an obligation for yield maintenance premium that arose upon acceleration of the note. The note calculated the yield maintenance premium as the amount necessary to purchase U.S. government obligations with a payment stream that most nearly resembled the note’s payment stream, so as to allow the noteholder to receive the full payment of principal and interest over the note’s life that it would have received if the note had not been accelerated. Three months after the debtor’s bankruptcy filing, the noteholder commenced an action against the affiliate on the note. The action accelerated the note. The noteholder filed a claim in the debtor’s case for principal, interest matured to the petition date, and yield maintenance premium. Section 502(b)(2) disallows a claim for unmatured interest as of the petition date. Courts look to economic substance to determine what constitutes interest. In re Chateaugay Corp., 961 F.2d 378, 380 (2d Cir. 1992), ruled that original issue discount, which compensates a creditor for a low interest rate, amounts to interest. A yield maintenance premium similarly compensates a creditor for the use of money, is part of the price of money to be repaid in the future, and is therefore interest under an economic analysis. As of the petition date, the noteholder had not accelerated the loan, so the interest represented by the yield maintenance premium was then unmatured and is disallowed. Paloian v. LaSalle Bank N.A. (In re Doctors Hosp. of Hyde Park, Inc.), 508 B.R. 697 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2014).

6.1.uuu Court may value collateral as of different times during the case, depending on the valuation’s purpose. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession contracted to sell its hotel for more than the amount of the first mortgage. The sale was subject to several contingencies that the debtor in possession needed to resolve. The hotel’s value was unclear at the petition date, and the sale price was not a clear value indicator at the contract date, because of the contingencies. But once the debtor in possession resolved the contingencies and the sale closed, the hotel was then worth more than the first mortgage. The mortgagee asserted a claim for postpetition interest from the petition date under section 506(b), which allows a secured creditor postpetition interest to the extent of the equity in the property. Section 506(a) provides that a claim is secured to the extent of the value of creditor’s interest in the debtor’s interest in the property and that the “value shall be determined in light of the purpose of the valuation and of the proposed disposition or use of such property, and in conjunction with any hearing on such disposition or use or on a plan ...,” giving the court flexibility in selecting the valuation method. The section does not provide general guidance on the valuation time, but the same considerations that support flexibility in selecting a method apply to selecting a valuation time. Moreover, a rigid valuation time, such as the petition or confirmation date, could effect a windfall for the debtor or the secured creditor, depending on when the collateral’s value changed. Therefore, the court may use a date during the case on which the creditor becomes over or undersecured and start or stop postpetition interest then. In addition, a valuation at one time during the case is not binding on the court on a later valuation for another purpose. Thus, though the sale price provides an appropriate value measure, it does not determine the collateral’s value at other times during the case, because value may change over time with changes in the market or the property’s condition. Prudential Ins. Co. v. SW Boston Hotel Venture, LLC (In re SW Boston Hotel Venture, LLC), 748 F.3d 393 (1st Cir. 2014).

6.1.vvv Claim disallowance for late filing does not permit lien avoidance under section 506(d). The creditor’s proof of secured claim was disallowed on the sole ground that it was filed late. After disallowance, the chapter 13 debtor moved to void the lien under section 506(d), which provides that “To the extent a lien secures a claim against the debtor that is not an allowed secured claim, such lien is void, unless ... such claim is not an allowed secured claim due only to the failure of any entity to file a proof of such claim under section 501 of this title.” Although the section’s plain language would lead to voiding the lien, such a reading would contradict the principle that a valid lien passes through bankruptcy unaffected. A proof of claim that the creditor files late has the same effect as no claim at all. The creditor’s late filing should not result in voiding of the lien where non-filing would have preserved it. Shelton v. Citimortgage, Inc. (In re Shelton), 735 F.3d 747 (8th Cir. 2013).

6.1.www Valueless nonrecourse junior lien is entitled to an unsecured claim. The junior nonrecourse lienor and the debtor in possession stipulated that the collateral’s value was less than the amount of the senior lien. The creditor asserted an unsecured deficiency claim against the estate under section 1111(b)(1)(A), which provides, “A claim secured by a lien on property of the estate shall be allowed or disallowed ...the same as if the holder of such claim had recourse against the debtor on account of such claim, whether or not such holder has such recourse.” The section is not limited to liens that have value. It does not reference section 506(a)’s bifurcation of secured claims or refer solely to an “allowed secured claim,” as determined under section 506(a). Moreover, the Congressional purpose in enacting section 1111(b) was to provide protection against undervaluation and to strike a balance between reorganization and a creditor’s equitable treatment. Application of section 1111(b) to allow the deficiency claim prevents a windfall to a debtor who retains the collateral under a plan. Therefore, the creditor is allowed a deficiency claim. In re B.R. Brookfield Commons No. 1 LLC, 735 F.3d 596 (7th Cir. 2013).

6.1.xxx Illinois tax lien purchaser has a secured claim. The debtor filed a chapter 13 plan that paid delinquent real property taxes in full. Under Illinois law, the county may conduct a tax sale of property that is delinquent on property tax payments. The purchaser obtains a tax deed, from which the purchaser may obtain title if the property owner does not redeem the property from the tax sale within a set period. Illinois law treats the tax purchaser’s right as a “species of personal property, a lien for taxes,” that allows the purchaser to obtain title. The Bankruptcy Code defines “claim” as a right to payment or right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance if the breach gives rise to a right to payment. A claim against property of the debtor is treated as a claim against the debtor. An Illinois tax purchaser does not have a claim against the delinquent taxpayer, because the purchaser cannot enforce a right to payment against the taxpayer. But the purchaser has a lien on the property and a right to payment from any proceeds from selling the property, as well as an equitable remedy to obtain title to the property arising from the taxpayer’s breach of the performance of the obligation to pay property taxes. Therefore, the tax purchaser's right is a claim that the chapter 13 plan may affect. In re LaMont, 740 F.3d 397 (7th Cir. 2014).

6.1.yyy Issue preclusion applies to claim allowance. The creditor obtained a judgment against the debtor in Georgia state court. The creditor sought enforcement through contempt proceedings. Despite the debtor's efforts to show that he had paid the judgment, the court held the debtor in contempt and ordered the debtor to pay the creditor. The debtor did not appeal. The debtor filed a chapter 13 petition in Indiana. The creditor filed a proof of claim based on the Georgia judgment. The debtor objected on the ground that he had paid the judgment. Issue preclusion (collateral estoppel) prevents relitigation of issues that have been fully litigated by the parties or their privies and determined. It applies in a bankruptcy case. Therefore, a bankruptcy judge may not re-examine, on equitable grounds, a claim based on a final judgment from another court. The creditor's claim is allowed. Adams v. Adams, 738 F.3d 861 (7th Cir. 2013).

6.1.zzz Parent corporation is the "employer" for WARN Act liability purposes only if the parent is the employment decision maker. A private equity firm owned a holding company that owned the operating debtor LLC, which did not have its own board of directors. The lender called its loan. Based on the recommendation of the debtor's turnaround manager, the holding company board authorized an immediate reduction in force. The debtor filed a bankruptcy petition within two days. The employees asserted claims against the holding company under the WARN Act, which requires an employer to give employees at least 60 days' notice of a mass layoff. Department of Labor regulations set forth five non-exclusive factors to determine if a subsidiary lacks sufficient independence so that its parent should be treated as an "employer." A parent's exercise of control solely under ordinary stock ownership incidents is not sufficient to make the parent the employer, but the parent is treated as the employer if it was the decision maker responsible for the employment practice. Here, there was sufficient evidence that the holding company made the layoff decision that the court could not grant summary judgment for the holding company. Guippone v. BH S&B Holdings LLC, 737 F.3d 221 (2d Cir. 2013).

6.1.aaaa Prepetition secured creditor does not obtain a lien on goodwill that is generated postpetition. A secured creditor claimed a lien on the intangible assets, including goodwill, associated with one of the debtor's divisions. At the petition date, the division's value was seriously impaired, and the goodwill had no value. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession sold the division for substantially more than the petition date value. The buyer attributed no value to goodwill, except for tax purposes. The creditor claimed a lien on the portion of the purchase price attributed to goodwill. Section 552(b) continues a security interest in postpetition proceeds that are directly attributable to prepetition collateral, without addition of the estate's resources. Here, the debtor in possession generated the goodwill at the sale by its time, effort, and expense in stabilizing the business and negotiating settlements and a favorable sale price. Therefore, the goodwill is not the proceeds of the creditor's prepetition collateral. In re Residential Cap., LLC, 501 B.R. 549 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

6.1.bbbb The Bankruptcy Code does not permit equitable disallowance of a claim. The debtor in possession and the debtor's shareholder brought an action against an entity that had purchased claims under the bank credit agreement in apparent violation of its terms and then sought to acquire the estate's assets. The action sought equitable disallowance of the creditor's claim, among other things. Section 502(b) provides "the court shall ... allow" a claim, except to the extent that one of the following paragraphs provides otherwise. Section 502(b)(1) permits disallowance if the claim is unenforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law, but none of the paragraphs in section 502(b) contemplate disallowance because of the creditor's conduct, unless the conduct would give the debtor a nonbankruptcy law defense. Section 105(a) permits the court to issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of the Code. It does not permit a court to fashion relief that is inconsistent with a specific Code provision. Section 510(b) permits subordination of a claim on equitable grounds to other claims, but not to equity. Subordination to other claims is adequate to remedy harm to other creditors from a creditor's misconduct. But disallowance amounts to subordination to equity, in violation of section 510(b)'s limitation, and would give shareholders a windfall by allowing them to recover without having to pay a valid claim. Therefore, the court dismisses the claim for equitable disallowance. Harbinger Cap. P'ners LLC v. Ergen (In re LightSquared Inc.), 504 B.R. 321 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

- 6.1.cccc Prepetition fair value bond exchange does not result in disallowable original issue discount. The debtor exchanged unsecured bonds for secured bonds with a face amount based on the fair market of the old bonds. The new bonds had original issue discount, i.e., their value was less than their face amount. The amount of OID reflected the actual value of the exchanged bonds. Before bankruptcy, the debtor amortized the OID for both book and tax purposes. Section 502(b)(2) requires disallowance of interest that is unamortized as of the petition date. Courts disallow unamortized OID in a direct cash issuance. But courts do not disallow any portion of the new bonds in an issuance in a face amount exchange, even if the exchanged bonds' market value was less than face. The same rule should apply to a fair value exchange. The old bonds' market value in a fair value exchange is likely less than the new bonds' face amount, as it is in a face value exchange. Each kind of exchange creates OID for tax purposes. And both kinds of exchanges offer out-of-court restructuring opportunities that the courts should encourage. Disallowance in a fair value exchange would discourage parties from taking advantage of those opportunities. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. UMB Bank, N.A. (In re Residential Capital, LLC), 501 B.R. 549 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 6.1.dddd Silent secured creditor's lien rides through chapter 11 case. The chapter 11 debtor scheduled the secured creditor's claim and lien as disputed and gave the creditor notice of the case filing and plan confirmation. The plan provided that the lien was discharged. The creditor did not file a proof of claim, appear in the case or object to confirmation. Section 1141(c) provides that after confirmation, "the property dealt with by the plan is free and clear of all claims and interests of creditors." The courts have conditioned this section's application on the lien holder's participation in the case, on the ground, based in part on section 506(d), that a secured creditor who is satisfied to rely on the collateral alone may ignore the bankruptcy case and preserve the lien securing the claim. Participation means active participation. Receipt of notice does not constitute participation, such as appearing or filing a claim or objecting. Here, the secured creditor took no action at all. Therefore, section 1141(c) did not affect this lien, which was preserved. Acceptance Loan Co., Inc. v. S. White Trans., Inc. (In re S. White Transp., Inc.), 725 F.3d 494 (5th Cir. 2013).
- 6.1.eeee Section 502(d) disallowance applies to a purchased claim. A trade creditor sold its claim. The debtor's statement of affairs listed the trade creditor as having received a preference. The trustee objected to the claim under section 502(d) on the ground that the creditor had received a preference and had not returned it. Section 502(d) requires the court to disallow "any claim of any entity from which property is recoverable" under the avoiding powers unless "such entity has paid the amount ... for which such entity or transferee is liable." By its terms, the statute focuses on the claim, not the claimant, and requires disallowance no matter who holds the claim. That result is consistent with the bankruptcy policies of equal treatment, augmenting the estate and ensuring compliance with bankruptcy court orders and prevents the creditor from "washing" the claim through a sale. The purchaser is a volunteer in the bankruptcy process who can mitigate this risk through the purchase terms and therefore deserves no special protection. In re KB Toys, Inc., 736 F.3d 247 (3d Cir. 2013).
- 6.1.ffff Trustee may file proofs of claim for creditors, even if doing so would not benefit the debtor. After the debtor joined a class action of which he was unaware during his bankruptcy and secured a recovery, the court reopened his formerly no-asset case and set a new claims bar date. When only one creditor filed a proof of claim, the trustee filed claims on behalf of all unsecured creditors listed in the debtor's schedules. Section 501(c) permits a trustee to file a claim on behalf of a creditor who does not timely file a claim. The legislative history states that the provision was intended to benefit the debtor, not the creditors who failed to file claims. The provision is unambiguous, and the court may not override it based on legislative history. Therefore, the court permits the trustee to file the claims, subject to the debtor's objections on the merits. Yoon v. VanCleaf, 498 B.R. 864 (N.D. Ind. 2013).

6.1.gggg Private equity fund is liable for MEPPA withdrawal liability of its portfolio company.

Two general partners of two separate private equity funds (limited partnerships) have exclusive authority to manage the funds. The general partners each have a subsidiary management company that contracts with the funds' portfolio companies to provide management services for a fee, which is offset against the general 2% management fee that each fund owes to its general partner. The funds invest in a distressed company, dividing the investment 70/30. After the investments, numerous individuals affiliated with the funds and their general partners exert substantial operational and management control over the portfolio company. Ultimately, the portfolio company fails after missing payments to its multiemployer pension plan, which then terminates its participation in the plan and asserts a claim for withdrawal liability against the private equity funds. The Multiemployer Pension Plan Amendments Act imposes withdrawal liability on any trade or business that is under common control with the plan participant. MEPPA does not define "trade or business." Courts have adopted a fact-specific "investment plus" test, under which an investor meets the "engaged in a trade or business" test if it is actively engaged in management and operation of the company, such as through authority over hiring, firing and compensating employees. Under agency principles, a general partner's activities are attributed to its partnership as its principal. Here, the general partners act for the funds in operating and managing the portfolio company. The funds thereby engage in a trade or business and because they are under common control with the portfolio company, they are liable under MEPPA for the portfolio company's withdrawal liability from the multiemployer fund. Sun Cap. P'ners III v. N.E. Teamsters & Trucking Indus. Pension Fund, 724 F.3d 129 (1st Cir. 2013).

6.1.hhhh Estate is not liable for postpetition multiemployer pension plan accruals if the plan terminates before bankruptcy.

The debtor's collective bargaining agreement provided that the debtor's sole obligation to the covered employees was the obligation to make periodic payments to a multiemployer pension plan based on the employees' service. If the debtor failed to make payments for more than 120 days, the pension plan trustees could terminate the debtor's participation in the plan, and employees would stop accruing pension benefits under the plan. Based on the debtor's nonpayment, the trustees terminated the debtor's participation in the plan and assessed withdrawal liability before the petition date. The employees continued to work under the collective bargaining agreement for the debtor in possession until the court approved rejection about four months after the petition date. The union filed an administrative expense priority claim for pension plan contributions for the employees' postpetition work. Only a claim for actual necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate is entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor's obligations to make pension plan contributions ceased under the collective bargaining agreement when it was no longer a plan participant, which occurred before bankruptcy. Therefore, the debtor in possession was not obligated to make such contributions after bankruptcy, and any claim for such contributions is not entitled to administrative expense priority. Bakery, Confectionery, Tobacco Workers and Grain Millers Int'l Union v. Hostess Brands, Inc. (In re Hostess Brands, Inc.), 499 B.R. 406 (S.D.N.Y. 2013).

6.1.iiii Section 506(d) permits avoidance of lien securing claim filed as an unsecured claim. The secured creditor filed a proof of unsecured claim. The debtor sought to avoid the creditor's lien under section 506(d), which provides, "To the extent that a lien that secures a claim against the debtor that is not an allowed secured claim, such lien is void, unless ... (2) such claim is not an allowed secured claim due only to the failure of any entity to file a proof of such claim under section 501." Under the rule of the last antecedent, the phrase "proof of such claim" refers to any proof of claim, not to proof of a secured claim, because it references section 501, which applies to both secured and unsecured claims. Therefore, section 506(d) permits the debtor to avoid the lien only where the creditor did not file a proof of claim at all. Such a reading is consistent with apparent Congressional intent that a secured creditor need not file a proof of claim to be able to rely solely on its collateral. Therefore, the debtor may avoid the lien. White v. FIA Card Servs., N.A., 494 B.R. 227 (W.D. Va. 1012).

- 6.1.jjjj Bankruptcy court may recharacterize a claim as an equity interest. The debtor's shareholders made a series of loans to the debtor, which the debtor repaid while insolvent within two years before bankruptcy. The trustee sought to recharacterize the loans as equity investments in the debtor and then to avoid the repayment as a fraudulent transfer. The trustee may avoid a transfer that the debtor made while insolvent within two years before bankruptcy if the debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value. "Value" includes satisfaction of an antecedent debt, although it does not include a return of an equity investment. A debt is a liability on a claim. A claim is a right to payment. Applicable nonbankruptcy law determines whether there is a right to payment or only an equity investment. Therefore, the court must examine the transaction and apply nonbankruptcy law to determine whether the shareholders' loans gave rise to a right to payment, that is, whether to recharacterize what purported to be loans as equity investments. Recharacterization, which determines a loan's character, thus differs from equitable subordination, which determines whether an acknowledged loan or other claim should be subordinated to other claims. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Hancock Park Capital II, L.P. (In re Fitness Holdings Int'l, Inc.), 714 F.3d 1141 (9th Cir. 2013).
- 6.1.kkkk Court applies adequate protection payments from rents to reduce lender's unsecured deficiency claim. During the single asset real estate chapter 11 case, as adequate protection, the debtor in possession paid excess rents to the undersecured mortgage lender, who had a perfected security in the real property and the rents. Section 506(a) bifurcates the lender's claim into a secured and an unsecured portion. Section 506(b) allows postpetition interest only on an oversecured claim. U.S. v. Timbers of Inwood Forest Assocs., Ltd., 484 U.S. 365 (1988), does not permit payment of postpetition interest on an undersecured claim. Under section 552(b), postpetition rents are additional collateral, decreasing the undersecured lender's deficiency. If retained as cash collateral, they would reduce and perhaps eventually eliminate the lender's unsecured deficiency claim and could then start applying to postpetition interest. Therefore, the court applies the adequate protection payment to reduce the lender's unsecured deficiency claim. In re Lichtin/Wade, L.L.C., 487 B.R. 665 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2013).
- 6.1.iiiii Bankruptcy Code preempts state law anti-deficiency statute. The secured creditor filed a proof of claim that bifurcated the claim into secured and unsecured portions and then stipulated with the trustee for stay relief to permit foreclosure. At the foreclosure sale, the creditor bid the amount of the secured claim. The debtor received a discharge about 30 days later. Later, the trustee objected to the creditor's unsecured claim on the basis of a state statute that bars a post-foreclosure deficiency claim against a debtor if the creditor does not commence an action for the deficiency against the person liable on the claim within 90 days after the foreclosure. Federal law preempts state law when the federal law so thoroughly occupies a field as to imply that Congress left no room for state legislation in the field (field preemption) or when the state law poses an obstacle to the accomplishment of the federal law's purposes (conflict preemption). Here, requiring the creditor to proceed in state court would be inconsistent with the Congressional purpose that claims in a bankruptcy case be addressed in the case in the bankruptcy court. In addition, the automatic stay that was in effect at the time of the foreclosure and the discharge injunction that took effect later prevented the creditor from complying with the state law, creating a conflict between state and federal law. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Code preempts the state law, so the court allows the creditor's unsecured deficiency claim without the creditor's compliance with the state law anti-deficiency statute's procedure. Pierce v. Carson (In re Rader), 488 B.R. 406 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2013).

6.1.mmmm Environmental remediation obligation for which the creditor has agreed to accept reimbursement is a claim. The debtor sold environmentally contaminated property to the creditor years before bankruptcy. It entered into agreements with the creditor and the state environmental protection agency providing for the creditor to remediate the property and for allocation of remediation expenses among the debtor, the creditor and the agency. The creditor did not complete remediation before the debtor filed its chapter 11 case. In the bankruptcy, the debtor rejected the agreements. The creditor filed a proof of claim and sought specific performance of the debtor's obligations under the agreements. A claim is a right to payment or a "right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance if such breach gives rise to a right to payment". If paying for or reimbursing a third party for the remediation costs cannot be used to satisfy an environmental remediation obligation, such as is the case under the Resource Recovery and Conservation Act of 1976 (RCRA), then the obligation might not be a claim. Here, however, the creditor and the agency had expressly agreed to accept payment from the debtor to satisfy the debtor's obligations. Thus, the creditor had a claim, which could be discharged under the plan, and was not entitled to specific performance. Route 21 Assocs. of Belleville, Inc. v. MHC, Inc., 486 B.R. 75 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

6.1.nnnn Court disallows creditor's claim for unpaid environmental remediation costs for which the creditor is jointly liable with the debtor. The debtor sold environmentally contaminated property to the creditor years before bankruptcy. It entered into agreements with the creditor and the state environmental protection agency providing for the creditor to remediate the property and for allocation of remediation expenses among the debtor, the creditor and the agency. The creditor did not complete remediation before the debtor filed its chapter 11 case. In the bankruptcy, the debtor rejected the agreements. The creditor and the agency each filed a proof of claim, and the creditor sought specific performance of the debtor's obligations under the agreements. The creditor and the agency agreed to treat their claims as a single claim and to work out between themselves the allocation of any distribution on the claims. Under section 502(e)(1)(B), a claim for reimbursement or contribution of one who is liable with the debtor (a codebtor) is disallowed if the claim is contingent at the time of allowance. "Reimbursement is construed broadly to include indemnification. A reimbursement claim is contingent if the codebtor has not yet paid the amount for which it seeks reimbursement, even though it might later be entitled to reimbursement after it pays the amount. Here, because the creditor was directly liable with the debtor for remediation and had not yet paid all of the remediation expenses that it had agreed to share with the debtor, its reimbursement claim would be allowed only for the amount it had paid to date, not for any future payment obligations. The creditor's agreement with the agency to combine and share the distribution on their claims underscores this result. Route 21 Assocs. of Belleville, Inc. v. MHC, Inc., 486 B.R. 75 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

6.1.oooo WARN Act unforeseen circumstances exception applies to layoffs following an unplanned bankruptcy filing. The debtor manufactured swing sets and go-carts. An asset-backed lender provided financing, secured by receivables and inventory, with advances equal to 80% of receivables. The debtor's private equity sponsor had provided additional equity financing over several years, as needed, and never indicated an intention not to continue to do so. In April, it was required to recall a substantial number of go-carts. In June, three major customers postponed a major swing set order. The debtor made every effort to continue in business and met with some limited success and positive movement from customers and suppliers. As a precaution, however, it consulted bankruptcy counsel in early August. In mid-August, the lender reduced the advance rate to 50% and in the first week of September, stopped advances altogether. The private equity sponsor refused any further investment. Within two days, the debtor filed bankruptcy and gave layoff notices to its employees, immediately terminating their employment. The WARN Act requires an employer to give 60 days' notice of a mass layoff or to pay 60 days' compensation to the employees. The Act's purpose is to soften the blow on employees of a planned or foreseeable mass layoff, allow them to adjust and seek new employment or retraining. Thus, it does not apply where the layoffs are caused by circumstances that are not reasonably foreseeable, such as "when caused by some sudden, dramatic, and unexpected action or condition outside the employer's control". Thus, where an adverse condition is only possible but not probable, notice is not required. Here, the sudden and unexpected termination of financing caused the shutdown and layoffs, which were not planned or within the debtor's control. Therefore, the unforeseen circumstances exception applies. Angles v. Flexible Flyer Liquidating Trust (In re FF Acquisition Corp.), 511 Fed. Appx. 369 (5th Cir. 2013).

6.1.pppp Security interest in proceeds of FCC license is valid. The debtor owned an FCC broadcast license. It granted its lender a security interest in general intangibles and their proceeds. After it suffered a major judgment, it filed a chapter 11 case. The judgment creditor challenged the lender's security interest in the license or its proceeds. At the time, the debtor in possession did not have a buyer for the license and was not attempting to sell it. The Federal Communications Act prohibits a licensee from transferring a license, including granting a security interest, without FCC approval. The FCC interprets this provision to permit a licensee to grant a security interest in the proceeds of a license. Section 552(b) provides that an after-acquired property clause in a security interest does not attach to property that an estate acquires after bankruptcy unless the property is proceeds of property in which the secured creditor had a prepetition security interest. Therefore, unless the lender had a security interest in a prepetition asset related to the license, it would not have a security interest in postpetition proceeds of the license. The FCC recognizes that a license gives a licensee the right to receive proceeds from a license transfer. This right exists before bankruptcy, so sale proceeds received after bankruptcy are proceeds of a prepetition asset. Applicable nonbankruptcy law determines whether a creditor has a security interest in an asset. Under the UCC, general intangibles include a government license. Under section 9-203, a security interest attaches when a debtor has rights in the collateral. The right that the FCC recognizes is an adequate right in the collateral. Section 9-408 contemplates the same result, that the right to the proceeds is a present right, even without a contract for sale, in which the debtor may grant a security interest. Therefore, the lender's security interest in the license proceeds is valid. Valley Bank & Trust Co. v. Spectrum Scan, LLC (In re Tracy Broadcasting Corp.), 696 F.3d 1051 (10th Cir. 2012).

6.1.qqqq Court approves "rising tide" distribution method in a Ponzi scheme receivership. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. The district court, on the SEC's complaint, appointed a receiver for the debtor's assets. The receiver proposed use of the "rising tide" distribution method, rather than the "net loss" or "net investment" method. Under rising tide, pre-receivership withdrawals are treated as distributions, so distributions from the receivership estate are allocated to even out the aggregate pre- and post-receivership distributions of all investors. In a receivership case, the district court has discretion over which method to adopt, which it did not abuse in this case. The decision contains an interesting discussion of the benefits of each method from several perspectives, including the policy of ending Ponzi schemes early. SEC v. Huber, 702 F.3d 903 (7th Cir. 2012).

6.1.rrrr Section 502(b)(7) applies to all employment termination claims, whether arising in contract or tort. Before bankruptcy, the debtor fired an at-will employee, who then sued. The employee obtained a jury verdict for back pay, front pay and emotional distress damages in an amount substantially in excess of the employee's annual salary. The debtor filed bankruptcy soon thereafter. The employee filed a proof of claim for the jury verdict amount. Section 502(b)(7) limits "the claim of an employee for damages resulting from the termination of an employment contract."

Employment under an at-will arrangement is employment under a contract, though one terminable at any time. Therefore, employment termination does not breach the contract, even though it may violate other employee rights. Section 502(b)(7) applies to damages “resulting from” termination, not only to damages for breach of an employment contract. Here, the damages that the employee suffered from wrongful termination resulted from the termination of his employment, which also was a termination of his employment contract. As such, the damage claim is covered by the claim allowance limitation in section 502(b)(7). Belson v. Olson Rug Co., 483 B.R. 660 (N.D. Ill. 2012).

6.1.ssss Section 509(a) does not preempt equitable subrogation for a lender who is not a co-debtor. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor transferred his heavily encumbered Florida real property to his father. The father financed the purchase with two new mortgage loans, the proceeds of which were used to satisfy all of the liens against the property. However, the deed to the father, the mortgages to the new lenders and the lien releases from the old lenders were not recorded until after the debtor’s bankruptcy. The trustee avoided the transfer to the father as a fraudulent transfer and then sought to avoid the two new mortgage loans under section 544(a)(3) as unperfected liens. Section 509(a) subrogates “an entity that is liable with the debtor on ... a claim of a creditor against the debtor, and that pays such claim ... to the rights of such creditor.” By its terms, it does not apply to the new lenders. Although their loans paid off the prior liens on the debtor’s real property, they were not “liable with the debtor on” those prior claims. Therefore, section 509(a) does not preempt applicable nonbankruptcy subrogation law as it might apply to the lenders. Under Florida law, a creditor may equitably subrogate to another’s claim and position if the creditor made the payment to protect its own interest, did not act as a volunteer, was not primarily liable on the underlying debt and paid off the entire existing debt and if subrogation would not work an injustice to third parties. Here, the lenders paid the prior claims to enable them to have senior mortgages; a new mortgagee who pays off a prior mortgage is not a “volunteer;” the new lenders were not liable on the existing debt; and the new lenders paid the prior claims in full. Finally, subrogation would not work an injustice to the trustee’s rights, because it merely substitutes the new lenders for the old lenders, whose claims were unavoidable. Subrogation makes the trustee no worse off and is permitted. Anderson v. SunTrust Mortgage, Inc. (In re Judd), 471 B.R. 830 (D.S.C. 2012).

6.1.tttt Third Circuit extends Grossman’s to postpetition, pre-confirmation claims. A consumer purchased the debtor’s product during the debtor’s chapter 11 case. The product manifested a defect three years after plan confirmation. Under In re M. Frenville & Co., 744 F.2d 332 (3d Cir. 1984), the consumer did not have a claim as of plan confirmation, because the product defect had not yet become manifest. Determining when a claim arises requires balancing the goals of giving a reorganizing debtor a fresh start with protecting individuals who might not know yet that they have suffered injury. Based on such a balancing, In re Grossman’s Inc., 607 F.3d 114 (3d Cir. 2010), overruled Frenville four years after plan confirmation in this case, stating the rule that a claim arises upon the exposure to a product or upon conduct that gives rise to an injury. Section 1141(d) discharges a debtor from all claims that arose before plan confirmation. Applying Grossman’s only to claims that arise before bankruptcy would defeat the fresh start goal for a debtor who otherwise receives a discharge of all claims that arise before confirmation. The court therefore extends Grossman’s to apply to a claim that arises upon the pre-confirmation exposure to a product or conduct that gives rise to an injury. Wright v. Owens Corning, 679 F.3d 101 (3d Cir. 2012).

6.1.uuuu Section 502(d) may disallow a transferred claim. In its statement of financial affairs, the debtor had listed a creditor, among others, as a recipient of a payment within 90 days before bankruptcy. The creditor transferred its claim during the debtor’s bankruptcy. After plan confirmation, the liquidating trustee brought a preference avoidance action against the creditor and obtained a judgment. The trustee then objected under section 502(d) to the claim in the transferee's hands. Section 502(d) requires the court to "disallow any claim of any entity ... that is a transferee of a transfer avoidable under section [547], unless such entity or transferee has paid the amount, or turned over such property, for which such entity or transferee is liable". The language focuses on the claim, not the holder. Section 502(d) provides the estate with an affirmative defense, which is not destroyed by a transfer of the claim. A transfer does not change the claim's nature, only the holder. A different rule would permit a creditor who had received a voidable transfer to "wash" its claim by transfer, and a transferee can protect itself by obtaining an indemnity. Finally, in this case, the statement of affairs put all potential transferees on notice of which claims transferors might be subject to avoidance actions. Therefore, section 502(d) applies equally to a transferred claim even though the claim transferor is liable to return an avoidance transfer, and the court disallows the claim. In re KB Toys, Inc., 470 B.R. 331 (Bankr. D. Del. 2012).

6.1.vvvv A prepetition forum's choice of law rules apply to a proof of claim. A client filed a malpractice claim against its former law firm in Connecticut, where the claim had accrued. While the action was pending, the law firm filed bankruptcy in New York. The client filed a proof of claim. The action in Connecticut was timely under its statute of limitations but would not have been timely under New York's statute of limitations. To prevent forum shopping to gain a longer statute of limitations, New York has a "borrowing statute", which is a choice of law rule that requires a New York court to apply the shorter statute of limitations of New York or the state where the cause of action accrued. Under Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Elec. Mfg. Co., 313 U.S. 487 (1941), a choice of law rule is part of a state's substantive law. A federal court sitting in diversity must apply the choice of law rule of the state where it sits. Bankruptcy courts must do the same when addressing state-law rights. A plaintiff may choose a forum based on its substantive law, including its choice of law rules. So when a defendant obtains a venue transfer from one federal court to another, the transferor court's state choice of law rules follow the action to the transferee court. When the defendant files a bankruptcy case, effectively forcing the plaintiff to continue the action in the bankruptcy court by filing a proof of claim, the rule is the same. Accordingly, Connecticut's choice of law rules applied to the court's adjudication of the client's proof of claim in the New York bankruptcy court. The court distinguishes some broad language in its prior decision in In re Gaston & Snow, 243 F.3d 599 (2d Cir. 2001), by noting the difference between the estate's collection action against a third party there and the proof of claim by a third party against the estate here. Statek Corp. v. Devel. Spec., Inc. (In re Coudert Bros. LLP), 673 F.3d 180 (2d Cir. 2012).

6.1.wwww Agent with only general authorization may file a proof of claim. The creditor purchased a loan from another lender, who was also the agent under the loan agreement. The loan agreement authorized the agent to enforce and pursue all rights and remedies under the loan agreement. The creditor had not seen the loan agreement before the claims filing bar date. The creditor received a letter from the agent shortly after the debtors filed their cases saying that the agent was "continuing to act as authorized agent under the [loan agreement] in connection with those proceedings and was actively pursuing all avenues of recovery" and that it would "proceed on behalf of the lenders ... in these cases". In conversations before the bar date between the creditor and the agent, the creditor understood the agent to say that it would take whatever action necessary or appropriate to protect the creditor's interests, though the agent never used the word "agent" nor said expressly that it would file a proof of claim for the creditor. The debtors objected to the agent's proof of claim for the creditor. Rule 3001(b) permits a creditor's authorized agent to file a proof of claim for the creditor. The Rule looks to nonbankruptcy agency law to determine whether the filer is an authorized agent, but the creditor must authorize the agent before the bar date. Establishment of an agency relationship requires only "assent", not express authorization. Rule 3001(b) does not require that the authorization expressly authorize the filing of a proof of claim. Requiring such "magic words" would be burdensome and impractical and would unduly prejudice unwary creditors. Here, the agency provision in the loan agreement did not authorize the agent to file the proof of claim for the creditor, because the creditor had not seen (and therefore had not assented to) the provision before the bar date. But the general assent reflected in the agent's letter and later conversations gave adequate authorization for the agent to file the proof of claim for the creditor. Palmdale Hills Prop., LLC v. Lehman Comm'l Paper, Inc. (In re Palmdale Hills Prop., LLC), 457 B.R. 29 (9th Cir. B.A. P. 2011).

6.1.xxxx State law determines recharacterization. The debtor signed a loan agreement that required repayment only from an oil royalty interest or from the proceeds of any future equity offering. After bankruptcy, the debtor objected to the allowance of a claim under the loan agreement on the ground that the agreement granted only an equity interest. Section 502(b)(1) requires disallowance of a claim that is not enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Under Butner v. U.S., 440 U.S. 54 (1979), applicable law is state law unless federal bankruptcy policy requires a different result. Although some courts have found authority to recharacterize claims as equity interests under section 105(a), state law that recharacterizes an equity investment dressed up as a claim is a sufficient basis for the bankruptcy court to reach the same result under section 502(b)(1). Grossman v. Lothian Oil Inc. (In re Lothian Oil Inc.), 650 F.3d 539 (5th Cir. 2011).

6.1.yyyy The court should use probabilities in estimating a claim to establish a disputed claims reserve. The creditor filed a proof of claim, to which the debtor in possession objected. The objection involved only contested issues of law, not of fact. To facilitate plan distributions, the debtor in possession sought an order estimating the claim for purposes of setting a distribution reserve. Section 502(c) permits a court to estimate “for purposes of allowance ... any contingent or unliquidated claim, the fixing or liquidation of which ... would unduly delay the administration of the case.” Neither the Code nor the Rules provides any procedures for estimation, except that the court is bound by the legal rules governing the claim. Claim estimation may be used to determine voting rights, gauging plan feasibility, determining the likely aggregate amount of a related series of claims, fixing a distribution reserve or allowing a claim. Estimation permits the court to achieve reorganization or distribution without waiting until all disputes are resolved. An “all or nothing” approach estimates the claim at the full amount or at zero, depending on whether the claimant proves its case by a preponderance of the evidence. Because an estimation for reserves can effectively prevent a claimant's recovery and because the trier of fact or an appellate court may disagree with a bankruptcy court's determination of factual or legal issues, a probabilistic approach is superior. Therefore, the bankruptcy court should allow for that possibility in setting a reserve. In this case, the court determines that the claim should be disallowed but acknowledges a 10% to 15% probability that an appellate court will disagree. Fixing the reserve too low would unfairly penalize the creditor; fixing it too high would require other stakeholders to wait longer than they should before they receive their full distributions. The court therefore fixes the distribution reserve based on estimating the claim at 30% of its face amount. In re Chemtura Corp., 448 B.R. 635 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

6.1.zzzz Debtor-employer's post-withdrawal MEPPA liability is an administrative expense to the extent of postpetition employment. The debtor retained its union employees for the 18 months after the petition date during which it operated. During the 18-month period, the debtor made all required contributions to its multi-employer pension plan. When it sold all its assets and terminated its employees, it was deemed to withdraw from the plan, incurring withdrawal liability under the Multi-Employer Pension Plan Amendments to ERISA. The amount of withdrawal liability is based on a combination of factors, including the number of employees that the employer has in the plan and the accrued actuarial obligations to those employees over the preceding five years relative to all other employees in the plan and the amount by which the plan is underfunded. Withdrawal liability protects remaining employers from liability for the full underfunding. Section 503(b)(1) allows as administrative expenses the actual and necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate. Employee compensation for postpetition services, including the employer's obligation to pay benefits, is an administrative expense. Therefore, the portion of the withdrawal liability attributable to postpetition services is entitled to allowance as an administrative expense, even though the amount of the liability is subject to numerous factors beyond the debtor in possession's control and benefits other employees and other employers by enhancing the multi-employer plan. A debtor in possession assumes that risk and the obligation to fund by continuing employment of its employees after bankruptcy. Making all required contributions alone is insufficient, because the full cost of the pension benefit includes the funding of any accumulated deficit. Accordingly, the court must determine the amount attributable to postpetition services, which will be allowed as an administrative expense. In re Marcal Paper Mills, Inc., 650 F.3d 311 (3d Cir. 2011).

6.1.aaaaa ADEA claim is subject to section 502(b)(7) employment contract damages cap. An employee filed a proof of claim against the debtor under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act for wrongful termination on the basis of age discrimination. Section 502(b)(7) caps the allowability of a claim for damages resulting from the termination of an employment contract. The claimant was an employee subject to an employment contract. Therefore, his claim for termination of his employment is subject to the cap, even though the termination was not the result of a breach of the contract. In re Fairpoint Comm'ns, Inc., 445 B.R. 271 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

6.1.bbbbbb Debtor's financial sponsor/owner is not liable for WARN Act violations. A private equity firm owned 70% of the debtor's stock and designated nearly all of its directors, who were firm employees, as were many of the officers. When the debtor encountered financial difficulties, it began a restructuring program, with its board's involvement, which would have resulted in numerous layoffs. However, before the debtor could implement the plan, the bank froze the debtor's revolving credit line and demanded the appointment of a chief restructuring officer. The CRO directed mass layoffs without compliance with the WARN ACT and, within two weeks, the board authorized and the debtor filed a bankruptcy petition. Employees sued the private equity firm for liability under the WARN Act as a control person. Under WARN, an employer must give employees who are subject to a mass layoff either 60 days' notice or pay in lieu of notice. A parent corporation may be considered a "single employer" with the actual employer, depending on relevant factors, including (i) common ownership, (ii) common directors or officers, (iii) de facto exercise of control, (iv) unity of personnel policies from a common source and (v) dependency of operations. Although the employees showed common ownership, directors and officers, they did not show the presence of the other factors. The private equity firm controlled the debtor through its directors after the appointment of the CRO, but the CRO made all decisions relating to the restructuring, including the layoffs. Therefore, the firm was not liable for WARN Act violations. Manning v. DHP Holdings II Corp. (In re DHP Holdings II Corp.), 447 B.R. 418 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).

6.1.ccccc Rabbi trust beneficiaries who were wrongfully denied prepetition payment are not entitled to a constructive trust. A company that the debtor acquired had established a deferred compensation plan for its senior executives, under which the compensation the executives deferred was held in a rabbi trust. The funds in a rabbi trust are held as part of the employer's general assets and are available to the employer's general creditors. The executives have no cognizable property interest in the trust assets and have only general unsecured claims against the employer for the benefits. After the debtor's acquisition, it wrongfully refused to pay the executives amounts to which they were entitled under the plan terms, in violation of ERISA. The executives sought imposition of a constructive trust in their favor on the trust assets. ERISA provides the exclusive basis for claims against an employer for denial of benefits under an employee benefit plan. The imposition of a constructive trust is only a remedy, not a substantive claim and is therefore not barred by ERISA. Imposition of a constructive trust requires wrongful conduct by the defendant and tracing of the assets subject to the trust. Here, the debtor's denial of payments to the executives was wrongful, but the executives were not entitled to trace funds into a trust. Because the executives had no interest in the rabbi trust, there were no funds that in good conscience belonged to them and that could be traced into a constructive trust. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 450 B.R. 490 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

6.1.ddddd Court denies reclamation claims in toto under section 546(c). The debtor's prepetition lenders had a security interest on the debtor's inventory. The debtor in possession financing proceeds were used to repay the prepetition lenders; the financing was secured by the inventory. Soon after bankruptcy, the debtor in possession obtained an order requiring suppliers asserting reclamation claims to file demands within 20 days after the petition date. The order did not limit the suppliers' right to pursue any other remedies or affect their right to recover goods. Suppliers promptly sent letters to the DIP demanding return of goods supplied within 45 days before the petition date and filed proofs of claim but took no other action to reclaim goods. Reclamation is a nonbankruptcy remedy, grounded generally in U.C.C. section 2-702, which makes the reclaiming seller's rights subject to the rights of a good faith purchaser. The right is limited to a right to reclaim. It does not include a right to possession or to a lien and does not give a right to proceeds of the goods. It is not self-effectuating; the seller must take action, including identifying the goods. A secured party is a purchaser under the U.C.C. Therefore, the sellers' reclamation rights were subject to the prepetition inventory security interest and to the transfer of a security interest to the postpetition lenders. Section 546(c) subordinates the trustee's avoiding powers to a seller's reclamation right under nonbankruptcy law. It does not grant such a right or an administrative expense priority for or a lien to secure a reclamation claim. The 2005 amendments to section 546(c) eliminated the court's authority to grant an administrative expense priority claim for or lien to secure a reclamation claim that the court denied. Therefore, the sellers have only general unsecured claims. In re Circuit City Stores, Inc., 441 B.R. 496 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2010).

6.1.eeeee DCF valuation is a commercially reasonable determinant under section 562 for a repo agreement. Before bankruptcy, the debtor repo'd mortgage loans to the creditor and defaulted on the repo agreement, and the creditor terminated the repo agreement and retained the collateral. On the termination date, the market for mortgages was completely dysfunctional. The creditor filed a proof of claim for damages, asserting its damage claim based on the value of the mortgage loan portfolio as of the first date on which the creditor could have sold the portfolio for a reasonable price. Section 562 requires that damages resulting from the termination of a repo agreement be measured as of the earlier of the rejection or termination date or, "if there are not any commercially reasonable determinants of value as of" such date, then "as of the earliest subsequent date or dates on which there are commercially reasonable determinants of value". The phrase "any commercially reasonable determinants" permits a court to review any determinant, not just a market value, in determining whether damages may be measured as of the earlier of rejection or termination dates and in measuring damages. Here, the court used a discounted cash flow analysis, which it determined, based on expert testimony, should approximate the market value except in unusual circumstances. Although the market value is a preferred method to determine value, a discounted cash flow valuation is appropriate when the market is dysfunctional. An alternative method is preferred so as to prevent moral hazard, which could result if the creditor were allowed to delay the valuation date and thereby see which way the market moved before selecting a valuation date. Crédit Agricole Corp. and Inv. Bank v. Am. Home Mortgage Holdings, Inc. (In re Am. Home Mortgage Holdings, Inc.), 637 F.3d 246 (3d Cir. 2011).

6.1.fffff Section 1111(b) converts unsecured nonrecourse claim to recourse only for purposes of allowance, voting and distribution. The debtor leased land to a contractor, who built a store for the debtor and leased the store and subleased the land back to the debtor. The contractor mortgaged the leasehold interest, and the debtor pledged the fee to secure a nonrecourse guarantee. The debtor filed chapter 11 and confirmed a reorganization plan, under which the mortgagee confirmed that its claim was fully satisfied. The reorganization was unsuccessful, and the reorganized debtor filed a second chapter 11 case 18 months after confirmation in its first case. The mortgagee filed a proof of claim for amounts owing and unpaid under the mortgage. Section 1111(b) provides that a nonrecourse claim “shall be allowed or disallowed under section 502 of this title the same as if the holder of such claim had recourse against the debtor on account of such claim, whether or not such holder has such recourse”, with exceptions not relevant here. Section 1111(b) affects only allowance, voting and distribution in the chapter 11 case. It does not convert a nonrecourse claim into a recourse claim for any other purpose or change the nature or terms of the security interest. Therefore, the mortgagee’s unsecured claim in the second case is disallowed. In re Montgomery Ward, LLC, 634 F.3d 732 (3d Cir. 2011).

6.1.ggggg Failure to make unallocated prepetition mortgage escrow payments creates a prepetition claim. The chapter 13 debtor fell behind on his mortgage payments before bankruptcy, including payments for principal, interest and escrow for taxes and insurance. The lender could use the escrow amounts for payment of taxes and insurance, and they served as additional collateral for the loan. The mortgage required the debtor to make the escrow payments and permitted the lender to declare a default and foreclose on the mortgage based on missed escrow payments. Before bankruptcy, the lender had made tax and insurance payments in an amount that exceeded the escrow account balance by about $3500, but the total missed prepetition escrow payments totaled about $5300. As permitted under the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act (RESPA), the lender recalculated the debtor’s postpetition escrow payments to make up the $1800 prepetition shortfall (although it was unclear whether the $1800 would be required for postpetition tax and insurance payments that would come due before the next annual escrow payment adjustment). A “claim” is a right to payment, whether or not contingent. Although the debtor was not yet liable to the lender on the petition date for postpetition tax and insurance that the lender had not yet paid, the lender’s claim for such payments was contingent as of the petition date on its paying those amounts. Accordingly, the lender’s claim for the missed prepetition escrow payments was a prepetition claim that should have been included in the lender’s proof of claim, and the lender’s effort to collect them after bankruptcy through an adjustment in the monthly escrow violated the automatic stay. A dissent argues that RESPA permits the adjustment and that the majority’s ruling unnecessarily and therefore improperly places RESPA and the Bankruptcy Code in direct conflict. Neither opinion addresses whether the requirement to make escrow payments was solely a requirement for the debtor to post additional collateral, rather than a right to payment itself, or whether such an analysis would make any difference in the application of the definition of “claim” or of the automatic stay to the facts. In re Rodriguez, 629 F.3d 136 (3d Cir. 2010).

6.1.hhhhh Minority shareholders’ buyout order gives rise to a claim. The debtor’s minority shareholders sued the debtor and the majority shareholders for dissolution. Under applicable state corporate law, the debtor and the majority agreed to purchase the minority’s shares. After an appraisal proceeding, the state court issued an order requiring the debtor to purchase the shares at a fixed price by a deadline, failing which the corporation would be dissolved, and the shareholders would receive from the corporation the actual value of the shares. Shortly before the deadline, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. A claim is a right to payment, whether or not matured or contingent. Although the debtor effectively had an “option” before bankruptcy to purchase the shares or dissolve, and the minority shareholders retained their shares until the commencement of the case, the minority shareholders had a noncontingent right to payment, whether of the appraised value or of the actual value, and therefore had a claim, not an equity interest. The Minority Voting Trust v. Orange County Nursery, Inc. (In re Orange County Nursery, Inc.), 439 B.R. 144 (C.D. Cal. 2010).

- 6.1.iiii Section 502(e) disallows distributors’ product liability contribution claims. The debtor manufactured chemicals, which it sold through distributors. Claiming injury from the chemicals, end users sued the debtor and its distributors. The debtor proposed a chapter 11 case that provided a separate distribution reserve for the plaintiffs’ claims. The distributors filed proofs of claims for contribution for liability to the plaintiffs in pending and in settled cases and for their defense costs, though not all plaintiffs filed proofs of claim. Section 502(e)(1)(B) requires disallowance of “any claim for reimbursement or contribution of an entity that is liable with the debtor ... to the extent that such claim ... is contingent as of the time of allowance or disallowance”. This provision is intended to prevent competition for the debtor’s limited assets between the principal creditor and the co-debtor. Still, the co-liability condition is unlimited, and its satisfaction does not depend on how the principal and contribution claims are treated under a plan, whether the co-liability is automatic upon the co-debtor’s liability or whether the principal creditor has filed a proof of claim. The contingency condition is not satisfied by the non-contingency of the principal creditor’s claim against the co-debtor. It is satisfied only once the co-debtor has actually paid the principal creditor’s claim. Until then, the debtor’s contribution liability is contingent. Therefore, section 502(e)(1)(B) disallows the distributors’ claims for contribution except for claims that they have already paid to plaintiffs. It does not disallow their claims against the debtor for defense costs. The debtor is not liable with the distributors for their attorneys’ fees and other costs, so section 502(e)(1)(B) does not disallow those claims. In re Chemtura Corp., 436 B.R. 286 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 6.1.jjjj Court disallows CERCLA PRP’s claim against the debtor except to the extent that the claimant has actually made payments. The debtor in possession agreed to allow the EPA’s claims against the debtor, in an agreed amount, for future remediation costs related to several polluted sites. Potentially responsible parties (PRPs) filed claims against the debtor for future expenses they would incur in remediating those same sites. CERCLA makes PRPs jointly and severally liable for remediation costs and gives a PRP who has resolved its liability to the EPA for remediation costs a claim for contribution against other PRPs. In addition, CERCLA allows a PRP who has incurred remediation costs to claim directly against another PRP. Section 502(e)(1)(B) disallows a contingent claim for contribution or reimbursement of an entity that is liable with the debtor. Until the claimant actually pays the amount for which it is liable with the debtor, its claim against the debtor remains contingent, even if it has acknowledged liability on the claim to the principal creditor or entered into an agreement to pay. Other events may intervene, particularly in the environmental remediation context, that may result in the claimant’s not actually paying the claim. Moreover, allowance of the claim may result in the debtor’s double payment, on the principal creditor’s claim and on the claimant’s claim, since they both address the same amount. A claimant is liable with the debtor on a debt, even if the liability arises under a different statutory basis, if the claimant’s payment of the principal creditor would reduce the debtor’s liability to the principal creditor. That situation applies under CERCLA, so the claimant here is liable with the debtor. Finally, a claim is for reimbursement whenever it seeks payment to the claimant of amounts that the claimant has expended or will expend, even if the statutory basis for reimbursement does not use the term “reimbursement”. Here, that is precisely what the claimant seeks under its proof of claim, in addition to claims under CERCLA expressly for contribution. Therefore, the claimant’s claim is disallowed except to the extent that the claimant has already made payments on the debt. In re Lyondell Chem. Co., 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 10 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Jan. 4, 2011).
- 6.1.kkkk WARN Act unforeseen circumstances applies to layoff following unplanned bankruptcy filing. The debtor manufactured swing sets and go-carts. An asset-backed lender provided financing, secured by receivables and inventory, with advances equal to 80% of receivables. Its private equity sponsor had provided additional equity financing over several years, as needed, and never indicated an intention not to continue to do so. In April, it was required to recall a substantial number of go-carts. In June, three major customers postponed a major swing set order. The debtor made every effort to continue in business and met with some limited success and positive movement from customers and suppliers. As a precaution, however, it consulted bankruptcy counsel in early August. In mid-August, the lender reduced the advance rate to 50% and in the first week of September, stopped advances altogether. The private equity sponsor refused any further investment. Within two days, the debtor filed bankruptcy and gave layoff notices to its employees, immediately terminating their employment. The WARN Act requires an employer to give 60 days' notice of a mass layoff or to pay 60 days' compensation to the employees. The Act's purpose is to soften the blow on employees of a planned or foreseeable mass layoff, allow them to adjust and seek new employment or retraining. Thus, it does not apply where the layoffs were caused by unforeseeable circumstances. Here, the termination of financing caused the layoffs, which were not planned. The consultation with bankruptcy counsel a month before the layoffs did not make the layoffs foreseeable, because the debtor was still trying to preserve the business and believed it might succeed until it lost all its financing. Therefore, the unforeseen circumstances exception applies. Angles v. Flexible Flyer Liquidating Trust (In re FF Acquisition Corp.), 438 B.R. 886 (Bankr. N.D. Miss. 2010).

6.1.IIIII Leveraged lease tax indemnity agreement requires payment of tax indemnity payment that is included in stipulated loss value. The debtor entered into typical leveraged lease transactions, under which it agreed to pay stipulated loss value to the lessors/owner trustees if it breached the leases and agreed to indemnify the owner participants for tax losses, including those resulting from lease breaches. The owner trustees granted security interests in the leases and rents, including the stipulated loss value payment obligation, to the indenture trustees for the debt. The stipulated loss value calculations included amounts necessary to pay off the debts and the return on the equity investments, including the expected returns and tax benefits, thereby duplicating payments that might be owing under the tax indemnity agreements. In chapter 11, the debtor in possession rejected the leases. The indenture trustees filed claims for stipulated loss value, which the debtor's plan did not pay in full, and the owner participants filed claims for indemnification for lost tax benefits. One tax indemnity agreement excludes a claim for lost tax benefits if the lessee/debtor "pays an amount equal to" stipulated loss value. Another excludes the lost tax benefits claim if the lessee/debtor were "required to pay" the stipulated loss value (as opposed to actually making the payment). The third excludes the claim if the lessee/debtor "pays the stipulated loss value ... or an amount determined by reference thereto". The plan provided for distributions, but not payment in full, to the indenture trustees based on their stipulated loss value claims. "Pays an amount" requires actual cash payment, not mere discharge of the claim, whether through bankruptcy or otherwise. The lessee/debtor may not be released from the lost tax benefits claim whenever the indenture trustee property demands payment of stipulated loss value, regardless of whether the lessee/debtor actually pays, so the "required to pay" provision also does not release the lost tax benefits claim. Finally, payment of "an amount determined by reference" to the stipulated loss value does not contemplate payment of a portion of the claim under a plan. Therefore, the tax indemnity agreement claims are allowed. The Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co v. Delta Air Lines, Inc. (In re Delta Air Lines, Inc.), 608 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2010).

6.1.mmmmm Third Circuit overrules Frenville. The plaintiff purchased product that contained asbestos from the debtor home improvement center in 1977. The debtor filed its chapter 11 case in 1997 and confirmed a plan in 1998. In 2006, the plaintiff manifested injury caused by asbestos and brought a claim against the debtor's successor, who defended on the ground that the claim had been discharged. Relying on In re M. Frenville Co., 744 F.2d 332 (3d Cir, 1984), the bankruptcy court and the district ruled that the claim had not yet arisen at the time of bankruptcy and therefore was not discharged. Frenville held that a claim arises for purposes of the Bankruptcy Code when applicable nonbankruptcy law gives the claimant a right to payment. In this case, applicable law gave the plaintiff a right to payment in 2006, when the injury manifested itself. The Third Circuit reviews the extensive criticism of Frenville over 25 years and the refusal of any of its sister circuits to follow it. The court determines that Frenville's reading of the definition of “claim” focused too much on “right to payment” and not enough on “contingent”, “unliquidated” and “unmatured” and so overrules it. In the absence of the Frenville test, the court must adopt a different analysis or test for when a claim arises. The court reviews the tests used in the case law, divided roughly into the “conduct” test and the “prepetition relationship” test. It finds a consensus “that a prerequisite for recognizing a ‘claim’ is that the claimant’s exposure to a product giving rise to the ‘claim’ occurred pre-petition, even though the injury manifested after the reorganization” and holds that a claim arises in a personal injury case “when an individual is exposed pre-petition to a product or other conduct giving rise to an injury”. The court limits the scope of the dischargeability, however, by fundamental principles of due process and notice. Van Brunt v. JELD-WEN, Inc. (In re Grossman’s Inc.), 607 F.3d 114 (3d Cir. 2010) (en banc).

6.1.nnnnn Bankruptcy court may certify a class action for a class of debtors within a judicial district. A mortgage loan servicer charged and collected postpetition fees without court approval. A debtor filed a class action for declaratory relief against the mortgage servicer on behalf of all debtors in the judicial district for a specified time period who had been charged fees without court approval. The Bankruptcy Rules incorporate Civil Rule 23, authorizing class actions. Section 1334 of title 28 grants the district court limited jurisdiction and authorizes it to refer cases and proceedings within the bankruptcy jurisdiction to the bankruptcy judges of the district. The allocation of cases among the judges is an administrative matter, not a jurisdictional one. Therefore, there is no impediment to a bankruptcy judge’s certification of a class of debtors whose cases were pending before other judges of the same district. In this case, however, the facts did not meet the requirements for class certification. Wilborn v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (In re Wilborn), 609 F.3d 748 (5th Cir. 2010).

6.1.ooooo Bank that did not preserve attorney’s fees claim after payment in full of its principal may not later assert fees claim as a secured claim. The bank had a secured claim against the debtor, secured by substantially all the debtor’s assets and guaranteed by the debtor’s principal. The note included an attorney’s fees provision. The bank filed a proof of secured claim. The debtor in possession sold some of the assets, paying off about half the bank’s claim. The principal paid the bank the remaining amount due, and the bank filed a motion to be dismissed from the case, because it had been paid in full. The creditors committee objected, asserting that the estate had claims against the bank that it intended to pursue. The bank did not pursue the motion to be dismissed from the case. The debtor in possession objected to the bank’s claim, and the court disallowed the claim as paid. The debtor confirmed a plan, which discharged all claims and liens not provided for in the plan. The plan also established a creditors trust, which brought an action against the bank to avoid its lien and for equitable subordination, recharacterization, deepening insolvency and other claims. The bank asserted a claim under its loan documents for attorney’s fees incurred in the action and moved to set aside the order disallowing its claim. Section 506(b) gives a secured creditor a claim for costs and expenses to the extent the creditor’s claim is allowed and the claim is oversecured. Section 506(d) voids a lien to the extent the claim secured by the lien is disallowed. In this case, the bank’s claim was disallowed, which extinguished the lien under section 506(d). So section 506(b) does not apply. Section 502(j) permits the court to reconsider an order allowing or disallowing a claim “for cause”. The statute does not specify what constitutes cause, but case law incorporates Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 60(b) (made applicable in a bankruptcy case by Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 9024) into section 502(j), without Rule 60(b)’s one-year time limit. Rule 60(b) does not provide grounds for reconsideration, because the bank had clear notice of claims against it and did not reserve its rights under its claim. In re Gluth Bros. Constr., Inc., 426 B.R. 771 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2010).

6.1.ppppp SIPA customer net equity claims are based on the “net investment” method. The debtor stockbroker operated a Ponzi scheme. It issued account statements to its customers showing purchases of and earnings on real securities. However, it never purchased any securities for the customers or their accounts. All account statements were fictitious. The last account statements before the commencement of the SIPA liquidation proceeding showed substantial securities positions, for which customers asserted claims against the estate as well as against SIPC for customer advances. SIPA provides for distribution of customer property among customers in priority to other creditors, pro rata, based of customers' "net equity" claims. SIPC may make advances to the trustee of up to $500,000 per customer to pay "claims for the amount by which the net equity of each customer exceeds his ratable share of customer property". SIPC subrogates to each customer's net equity claim that it pays. Therefore, SIPA payments are not "insurance" and may be made only to the extent of a customer's net equity claim. SIPA section 16(11) defines "net equity" as the dollar amount of a customer's account based on "all securities positions" of the customer as of the filing date. The trustee must discharge net equity claims to the extent "ascertainable from the books and records of the debtor". Here, the debtor's books and records revealed no securities positions. Therefore, a customer's net equity claims is based solely on the amount the customer deposited with the debtor over the life of the account, less the amount the customer withdrew. Secs. Inv. Protection Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 424 B.R. 122 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

6.1.qqqq Unsecured creditor is entitled to attorney's fees incurred postpetition if provided in the contract. The surety company paid the debtor's obligations after bankruptcy and filed a proof of claim for reimbursement of amounts paid and attorney's fees that it incurred in trying to collect from the estate. Section 502(b) requires that a claim be determined as of the petition date and allowed except to the extent provided otherwise in sections 502(b)(1) through (9). "Claim" is broadly defined to include a contingent and unliquidated right to payment. The fact that the postpetition attorney's fees were contingent until incurred after bankruptcy and unliquidated as of the petition date until the amount was determined as they were incurred is not a ground for disallowance in paragraphs (1) through (9). Section 506(b), which allows postpetition attorney's fees to the holder of an oversecured claim as part of the secured claim, does not disallow them as a general unsecured claim to the holder of an unsecured claim. Therefore, the court allows the claim. Ogle v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 586 F.3d 143 (2d Cir. 2009).

6.1.rrrr Section 502(d) disallowance of a claim does not apply to administrative expenses. A creditor asserted an administrative expense claim. The debtor in possession brought an action against the creditor to recover a preference and objected on that ground to the allowance of the administrative expense claim. Section 502(d) requires the court to "disallow any claim of an entity from which property is recoverable" under the avoiding powers, unless the entity has paid the amount for which it is liable. Although the Bankruptcy Code defines "claim" in a way that includes administrative expenses, it does not use "claim" uniformly when addressing administrative expenses, alternately using "expenses" and "claims". Sections 502(a) and (b) provide for automatic allowance of claims filed under section 501, which covers only prepetition claims. Section 502(d) operates an exception to sections 502(a) and (b). Finally, the statutory structure of section 502 suggests that it applies only to prepetition claims, not to administrative expenses. Therefore, section 502(d) does not apply to administrative expenses. ASM Cap., LP v. Ames Dep't Stores, Inc. (In re Ames Dep't Stores, Inc.), 582 F.3d 422 (2d Cir. 2009).

6.1.ssss Section 502(d) disallowance of a claim does not apply to a supplier's 20-day administrative expense claim under section 503(b)(9). The debtor received goods from the supplier within 20 days before the petition date. The debtor made two payments to the supplier on prior invoices within the same 20-day period. The supplier asserted administrative expense priority for its $302,512 claim. Section 503(b)(9) provides "there shall be allowed administrative expenses, ... including ... the value of any goods received by the debtor within 20 days before" the petition date. Section 502(d) provides the "court shall disallow any claim of any entity from which property is recoverable" under the avoiding powers, unless the entity has paid the amount for which it is liable. Although section 502(d) is designed to foster equality of distribution among creditors, it does not contain any language that suggests it applies to administrative expense claims, which already enjoy priority over general unsecured prepetition claims. Rather, its text and placement suggest that it applies only to a claim filed under section 501, not to “a request for payment of an administrative expense” under section 503, even though the 20-day claim is a prepetition claim. In addition, applying section 502(d) to disallow administrative expense claims would defeat the policy of section 503 generally to encourage suppliers to deal with the estate and the policy of section 503(b)(9) in particular to encourage continued supply of trade credit to a failing debtor. Therefore, section 502(d) does not apply to disallow the supplier’s section 503(b)(9) claim. Southern Polymer, Inc. v. TI Acq., LLC (In re TI Acq., LLC), 410 B.R. 742 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2009).

6.1.ttttt Liquidating chapter 7 trustee is not subject to WARN Act liability. The debtor hospital filed a chapter 7 petition. Within two hours after the petition, the trustee laid off most of the hospital’s employees. The trustee obtained court authority under section 721 to operate the hospital for a few days to transfer patients and care for them pending transfer and to dispose of medical waste. Four days later, he laid off the remaining employees. The WARN Act requires an “employer” to provide 60 days’ notice of a mass layoff or to pay 60 days’ back pay. The Act defines “employer” as a business enterprise that employs 100 or more employees. Department of Labor commentary provides that a “fiduciary whose sole function in the bankruptcy process is to liquidate a failed business for the benefit of creditors [and] is not operating a ‘business enterprise’ in the normal commercial sense” is not subject to WARN liability, while a fiduciary who “may continue to operate the business for the benefit of creditors” is subject to liability. The Department of Labor’s comments are entitled to deference. Here, the trustee’s continued operation for four days as part of the winding down process did not continue operations in the normal commercial sense. Walsh v. Century City Doctors Hosp, LLC (In re Century City Doctors Hosp., LLC), 417 B.R. 801 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2009).

6.1.uuuuu Court may use discounted cash flow analysis in the absence of a functional market to determine a repurchase agreement counterparty’s deficiency claim. The debtor’s counterparty terminated mortgage repurchase agreements shortly before bankruptcy when the mortgage markets were dysfunctional, price quotes for the underlying mortgages could not be obtained and the underlying mortgages could not be sold for a possibly extended period after the termination date. The counterparty asserted a deficiency claim for the amount by which the repurchase price under the repurchase agreement exceeded the value of the mortgages. Section 559 requires that “any excess of which the market price received on liquidation of [the repurchase] assets (or if any such assets are not disposed of on the date of liquidation of such repurchase agreements, at the prices available at the time of liquidation of repurchase agreements from a generally recognized source or the most recent closing bid quotation from such a source) over the sum of the stated repurchase prices ... shall be deemed property of the estate”. Section 562(a) provides that termination “damages shall be measured as of ... the date or dates of such ... termination”, and section 562(b) provides, “If there are not any commercially reasonable determinants of value as of [that date], damages shall be measured as of the earliest subsequent date or dates on which there are commercially reasonable determinants of value”. Although market determinants are preferred, section 562 refers to “commercially reasonable determinants” and so permits multiple alternative means of value determination, not only market pricing. Section 559 does not limit the determination of repurchase agreement termination value to market prices or quotes, because it applies only where the market price exceeds the repurchase price, not where there is a deficiency, as the counterparty asserted here. The discounted cash flow method is nearly always a commercially reasonable value determinant for a bond or mortgage and therefore may be used here, despite the absence of a functional market and of the availability of price quotes or any opportunity to sell the mortgages. Based on the discounted cash flow analysis, the mortgages’ value exceeded the repurchase price just slightly, so the court disallows the counterparty’s deficiency claim. In re Am. Home Mortgage Holdings, Inc., 411 B.R. 181 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).

6.1.vvvvv Section 506(b)'s attorney's fee provision applies only until the plan's effective date.

The chapter 13 debtor sought to sell her house under her plan. The secured creditor objected, based on a partially completed prepetition foreclosure. The litigation continued after confirmation. The creditor sought attorney's fees. Section 506(b) provides, "there shall be allowed to the holder of [an oversecured] claim, interest on such claim, and any reasonable fees, costs, or charges provided for under the agreement under which such claim arose". Section 506(b) entitles an oversecured creditor to interest and attorney's fees and thereby determines the allowable amount of an oversecured claim. Plan confirmation establishes the scope of allowed claims under the plan. A plan's effective date occurs when it becomes binding on the parties, which is the confirmation date in a chapter 13 case. In addition, section 1325(a) (and section 1129(b) in chapter 11) entitles a secured creditor to post-effective date interest. Therefore, section 506(b)'s interest provision should be read to apply only until the plan's effective date. Section 506(b) does not distinguish between interest and attorney's fees for this purpose, so it should apply only to pre-effective date attorney's fees. Therefore, section 506(b) and the federal rule apply until the effective date. Because section 506(b) does not reference state law, it states a federal rule entitling the creditor to attorney's fees provided under the agreement, which much be interpreted and applied under federal standards. Applicable nonbankruptcy law applies after the effective date. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. v. Hoopai (In re Hoopai), 581 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2009).

6.1.wwwww Bankruptcy Code does not affect managers' liability to employees under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The corporate debtor operated under chapter 11, shut down, laid off employees and then converted its case to chapter 7. Some employees remained unpaid after shut down and conversion. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C. § 206(a), individual managers of an employer may be personally liable for unpaid wages. The Bankruptcy Code does not affect any such liability unless there is some effect on the estate from the potential liability, such as an obligation to defend or indemnify the managers, which is not present here. Therefore, the managers are liable to the employees, despite the bankruptcy and the conversion. Boucher v. Shaw, 572 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2009).

6.1.xxxxx PBGC's Deficit Reduction Act claim arises only upon discharge and is not dischargeable.

The debtor obtained a distress termination of its defined benefit pension plan during its chapter 11 case. Congress passed the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005 (DRA) before the debtor's chapter 11 case. Among other things, it provides for an additional premium payable to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation by an employer whose defined benefit pension plan is subject to a distress termination in a chapter 11 case. The section providing for the premium "shall not apply ... until the date of discharge". Although the definition of "claim" is broad, it is not unlimited. A claim's existence depends on whether the claimant had a right to payment, and the claim is a prepetition claim only if that right arose prepetition. Nonbankruptcy law determines whether and when a claimant has a right to payment. The DRA establishes the PBGC's right to the termination premiums as of "the date of discharge", specifically to prevent employers from evading the premium by a bankruptcy filing. Therefore, the claim for termination premiums is not affected by the discharge. Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. v. Oneida Ltd., 562 F.3d 154 (2d Cir. 2009).

6.1.yyyyy Court may disallow late filed cure claim as a general unsecured claim.

The debtor in possession assumed and assigned executory contracts in connection with the sale of the debtor's business. The notice to contract counterparties stated cure amounts. The court fixed a bar date for filing cure claims, which provided that any contract counterparty that did not file a proof of claim by the bar date would be bound by the cure amount stated in the notice and "shall be forever barred from asserting any other cure claim(s) against the Debtor, its estate and/or any successful purchaser of the Debtor's assets arising under such executory contract". The counterparty did not file a cure claim by the cure claim bar date but filed a general unsecured claim before the general bar date. The contract cure amount notice was sufficiently clear, so the counterparty's claim was barred, even from sharing in the distribution on general unsecured claims, by its failure to file by the cure claim bar date. ReGen Cap. I, Inc. v. Halperin (In re U.S. Wireless Data, Inc.), 547 F.3d 484 (2d Cir. 2008).

6.1.zzzzz Union employees may assign WARN Act and wage claims. Shortly after the debtor's bankruptcy, a claims purchaser solicited union employees to purchase their claims for WARN Act violations and for wages. Several employees sold their claims. Their union later brought claims against the estate on the employees' behalf for the WARN Act violations and wages and reached a settlement with the debtor in possession. The claims purchaser sought payment of the selling employees' claims, while the union sought to pay the employees directly. Under the Labor Management Relations Act, a union is its members' exclusive representative to bring claims against an employer. Still, the WARN Act makes the employer liable to "each aggrieved employee", and the union's representative rights do not deprive the employees of ownership of either WARN or wage claims. Federal law determines whether such claims, which federal law creates, are assignable. Nothing in the statutes or in the federal common law suggests that the claims should not be assignable. Therefore, the settlement amounts should be paid to the purchaser, not to the union or the employees. Preston Trucking Co., Inc. v. Liquidity Solutions, Inc. (In re Preston Trucking Co., Inc.), 392 B.R. 623 (D. Md. 2008).

6.1.aaaaa Contract interest rate applies to interest allowed as secured under section 506(b), unless inequitable to junior creditors. The secured creditor's collateral value substantially exceeded the amount of its claim under two separate notes plus postpetition interest. It sought allowance of default interest plus compounding, which would have amounted to 38% simple interest. Allowance in full would have left the otherwise solvent liquidating debtor insolvent and unsecured creditors partially unpaid. However, the secured creditor agreed to reduce its interest rate to allow payment of unsecured creditors in full. Although United States v. Ron Pair Enters., Inc., 489 U.S. 235 (1989), does not address how interest on an oversecured claim should be calculated section 506(b), most courts have applied the contract rate and have allowed a different rate only if there is creditor misconduct, the contract rate would cause direct hardship to unsecured creditors or prevent the debtor's fresh start or if the interest rate is a penalty. Vanston Bondholders Protective Comm. v. Green, 329 U.S. 156 (1946), held that it could be inequitable to junior creditors to allow interest on interest accruing during a case to senior secured creditors. However, it did not require considerations of the equities as to the debtor or equity holders. Therefore, the secured creditor's claim should be allowed in the agreed amount, so that there were adequate funds to pay unsecured creditors in full, without any surplus for the debtor. Urban Communicators PCS Ltd. v. Gabriel Cap., L.P., 394 B.R. 325 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

6.1.bbbbbb Section 502(d) disallowance does not apply to 20-day priority claims allowed under section 503(b)(9). The debtor in possession objected under section 502(d) to the allowance of claims entitled to administrative expense priority under the 20-day provision of section 503(b)(9) on the ground that the claimants had failed to surrender voidable transfers. The court reviews the split in authorities over whether section 502(d) applies to administrative expenses in general and sides with those courts that hold that it does not apply. It reasons that section 502(d)'s introductory phrase, "Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b)", suggests it supersedes only the allowance provisions of sections 502(a) and (b), not of section 503(b), that section 503 is self-contained as to filing and allowance of administrative expenses, while sections 501 and 502 are self-contained as to filing and allowance of prepetition claims and that the mandatory disallowance and allowance provisions of sections 502(d) and section 503(b) would otherwise conflict. That conclusion does not require section 502(d)'s non-application to 503(b)(9) claims, as those claims arise prepetition. However, the allowance provision's placement in section 503(b), rather than in the priority section 507(a), requires the claim to be handled as an administrative expense under the self-contained section 503 regime, without regard to sections 501 and 502.

Therefore, section 502(d) does not apply to section 503(b)(9) claims. In re Plastech Engineered Prods., Inc., 394 B.R. 147 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2008).

6.1.cccccc Allowance of debt participant's Stipulated Loss Value claim does not foreclose owner participant's Tax Indemnity Agreement Claim. An aircraft leveraged lease's Stipulated Loss Value (SLV) includes amounts necessary to pay the debt, the owner participant's expected equity return under the lease and its expected equity tax benefits. In addition, a related Tax Indemnity Agreement (TIA) gives the owner participant a claim for lost tax benefits unless the lessee "has paid" SLV. The airline debtor in possession rejected an aircraft leveraged lease. It stipulated with the debt participant to allow a claim in the amount of the lease's SLV minus the aircraft's value. The stipulation provided, "Allowance of the Allowed Claims ... constitutes full payment and discharge of" SLV for the lease. "Paid" as used in the TIA is ambiguous. It could mean payment of SLV in cash in full or simply payment in a manner that satisfies the SLV claim. Based on extrinsic evidence, including testimony of counsel who drafted the TIA and a copy of the term sheet on which it was based, and an evaluation of the documents as a whole, the court concludes that "paid" means paid in cash in full, because the apparent purpose of transaction was to permit the owner participant to assert a TIA claim whenever it (rather than the debt participant) was not fully paid through distribution of SLV payments. In re Northwest Airlines Corp., 393 B.R. 337 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2008).

6.1.dddddd Oversecured creditor may be entitled to default interest rate upon a sale of its collateral. The creditor's loan agreement provided for interest at a higher rate after a default. The debtor in possession sold the oversecured creditor's collateral during the case and distributed the proceeds to the creditor. Section 506(b) entitles an oversecured creditor to postpetition interest but does not specify at what rate. If the plan provides for leaving the claim's class unimpaired under section 1124 by curing defaults and reinstating maturity, the plan may provide for only the non-default interest rate, because the cure undoes all the default's effects. The same is true for default cures upon executory contract assumption under section 365. When the Bankruptcy Code does not require a contrary result, applicable non-bankruptcy law governs creditors' entitlement in bankruptcy. Section 363, authorizing assets sales, does not provide a cure mechanism similar to the one in sections 365 and 1124. Therefore, the case law permitting reinstatement at the non-default rate does not apply to payment in cash in full of a defaulted secured claim from collateral sale proceeds. The court remands to determine whether the creditor's default rate is enforceable under applicable non-bankruptcy law and is reasonable. Gen. Elec. Cap. Corp. v. Future Media Prods. Inc., 536 F.3d 969 (9th Cir. 2008).

6.1.eeeeeee Bankruptcy court may recharacterize a claim as equity, within the Bankruptcy Code's confines. In the debtor's first chapter 11 case, the plan proponent agreed to make a nonrecourse loan to the debtor after confirmation, against the possibility that the debtor would succeed in its dispute over ownership of its principal asset. If it did not succeed, then the proponent would be entitled to the debtor's other assets and nothing more. After the proponent advanced substantial sums and the debtor prevailed in its dispute over its principal asset, the debtor filed a second chapter 11 case. An objecting creditor sought recharacterization of the proponent's claim as equity on the ground that the parties never intended the loan to be repaid. Claim recharacterization can occur only within the Bankruptcy Code's confines. A transaction's substance rather than its form or name controls its legal effect. Recharacterization is nothing more than an effort to discern a transaction's substance and so is permitted by the Bankruptcy Code. In this case, however, all parties intended a loan, so the claim should be allowed. FCC v. Telephone and Data Sys., Inc. (In re Airadigm Comm'ns, Inc.), 392 B.R. 392 (W.D. Wis. 2008).

6.1.fyyyyy Discovery of a proof of claim in a former subsidiary's bankruptcy case may suffice for MEPPA withdrawal liability notice. When an employer withdraws from a multi-employer pension fund, the Multi-Employer Pension Plan Amendments (MEPPA) to ERISA imposes withdrawal liability on the employer and all members of the controlled group. The controlled group members must commence arbitration within 90 days of withdrawal liability notice to the employer or be bound by the fund's liability notice. If a controlled group member engages in a corporate transaction whose principal purpose to evade or avoid MEPPA liability, liability is determined without regard to the transaction. In this case, over three years before its bankruptcy, the debtor's parent corporation entered into a merger/spin-off transaction after which the debtor was no longer part of the parent's controlled group. The multi-employer pension fund, to which the debtor and its former subsidiary contributed, filed a proof of withdrawal liability claim in the debtor's bankruptcy case but never sent notice to the former parent. Over two years later, the parent's lawyer learned of the proof of claim by happenstance. Three years after that, the fund sent formal notice and demand for withdrawal liability payment. The parent commenced arbitration within 90 days after the formal notice. The fund's proof of claim filing did not suffice as MEPPA notice to the parent, because the debtor was no longer a controlled group member. Disregarding the merger/spin-off transaction for liability purposes does not permit disregard for notice purposes, where the debtor and parent no longer have any corporate relationship. However, the parent's lawyer's discovery of the proof of claim put the parent on notice of the withdrawal liability claim, triggering the 90-day arbitration deadline. The parent's failure to commence arbitration within 90 days after learning of the proof of claim prevented the parent from seeking a later liability determination. Chicago Truck Drivers v. El Paso CGP Co., 525 F.3d 591 (7th Cir. 2008).

6.1.gggggg Administrative claims bar date is subject to claims process of 28 U.S.C. § 959(a).

During its lengthy chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession dismissed an employee. Before plan confirmation, the employee filed a state court discrimination action. The debtor then confirmed a plan that provided for payment in full of all allowed administrative claims but also an administrative claims bar date and discharge of all administrative claims not timely filed. The employee received notice of the hearing on approval of the disclosure statement but not of the hearing on confirmation or of the administrative claims bar date. 28 U.S.C. § 959(a) permits a claimant to sue a trustee, without leave of the bankruptcy court, in a nonbankruptcy forum for a claim arising in the operation of the business. The automatic stay does not apply to such an action. However, any judgment obtained in the nonbankruptcy forum may be enforced only in the bankruptcy court, typically by the filing of an administrative claim. A plan that does not preserve litigation rights under section 959(a) and provide for payment of the amount determined in the nonbankruptcy forum is subject to objection. The employee here did not object to that plan provision and so would be bound by it if he had received notice. However, because the employee did not receive notice of the plan, the bar date, or the discharge, he was not bound and did not violate the discharge injunction by continuing to pursue the state court action. In re UAL Corp., 386 B.R. 701 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2008).

6.1.hhhhhh Claim transfer may also transfer professional fee reimbursement rights. Secured lenders consented to a cash collateral order, which required the estate to reimburse all professional fees arising from or related to "the interpretation, amendment, modification, enforcement, enforceability, validity or implementation of the" prepetition credit and security agreements or to the bankruptcy cases. The lenders sold their claims under transfer agreements that transferred all claims (as defined in section 101(5)) and any right "that is based upon, arises, out of or is related to" the prepetition loans, including any right against an entity "arising under or in connection with the Credit Documents or the transactions related thereto or contemplated thereby. The debtor and the committee agreed with the claims buyers on plan terms. Later, the committee sued the original lenders to avoid their security interest. The original lenders sought reimbursement from the estate for their professional fees in defending the suit, based on the attorney's fee provision in the cash collateral order. The transfer agreement covered any such reimbursement rights. The "claim" definition is broad and includes the contingent rights, as of the cash collateral order date, to professional fee reimbursement that might later arise in the case. Such rights are assignable. The transfer agreement language is broad enough to cover them.

Therefore, the court disallows the original lenders' reimbursement claims against the estate. In re M. Fabrikant & Sons, Inc., 385 B.R. 87 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2008).

- 6.1.iiiii Absence of supporting documents is not grounds for claims disallowance. Rule 3001(c) requires a claimant to attach the original or a copy of any writing supporting a proof of claim, and the Official Form contains similar language. A credit card creditor filed a proof of claim, without any supporting documents, in an amount approximately equal to the amount the debtor schedules. The trustee objected. The court overrules the objection. Section 502(b) contains the exclusive grounds for claims disallowance. The Rules may not expand the grounds. A writing is required to prove the claim only if the claim may be disallowed on statute of fraud grounds, because without the writing, the claim is not enforceable under applicable non-bankruptcy law. This interpretation supports the Rules' overall purpose of just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of cases and proceedings, because it eliminates the need for a trustee to object to undocumented claims, the need for creditors to supplement claims at risk of disallowance when there is no substantive dispute over the claim, and possible litigation over whether the claim form "substantially complies " with the Rules. B-Line, LLC v. Kirkland (In re Kirkland), 379 B.R. 341 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).
- 6.1.jjjjj Landlord claim damage cap does not apply to non-rent tort claims. The debtor rejected a lease, after leaving substantial debris on the property. The landlord sued for waste, nuisance, trespass, and breach of contract, seeking $23 million for the debris removal cost. Section 502(b)(6) limits a landlord's claim for damages "resulting from the termination of the lease". The damages sought here do not result from the rejection. They would have been the same even if the debtor had assumed the lease or allowed it to run its term. Moreover, applying the cap to a landlord's tort claim such as these, where its rent-related damages already exceed the cap, would allow a debtor in possession to damage leased property with impunity and would not further Congress's policy to limit potentially large rent and rent-related claims. The court excludes from its ruling the issue of whether the damages cap applies to a claim for failure to perform future routine repairs or pay utility bills. Saddleback Valley Comm. Church v. El Toro Materials Co. (In re El Toro Materials Co.), 505 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2007).
- 6.1.kkkkk Actual collateral sale price determines collateral value for purposes of section 506(b). The debtor owned C-block spectrum FCC licenses, which it acquired in the original C-block FCC auction in 1997, and which it pledged to secure a loan. The licenses' value plummeted after the filing of its chapter 11 case, but ultimately, after legal issues were resolved favorably to the debtor, the debtor in possession sold the licenses for substantially more than the liens against them. Section 506(b) allows a claim as secured to the extent of the value of the collateral. Section 506(a) requires that the court value collateral "in light of the purpose of the valuation and the proposed disposition or use of such property, and in conjunction with any hearing on such disposition or use ...". The disposition here is the sale and the purpose is the allowance of the creditor's claim. The best measure of value for such purposes is the actual sale proceeds. In re Urban Communicators PCS Ltd. P'shp, 379 B.R. 232 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).
- 6.1.iiiii Contract interest rate does not necessarily apply to interest allowed as secured under section 506(b). The secured creditor's collateral value substantially exceeded the amount of its claim under two separate notes plus postpetition interest. It sought allowance of default interest plus compounding, which would have exceeded by 13% the 25% criminal usury statute rate applicable to one of its notes. United States v. Ron Pair Enterps., Inc., 489 US. 235 (1989), ruled that section 506(b)'s reference to "interest on such claim" is not limited by the agreement under which the claim arises. Therefore, the court has discretion on the allowable rate, although the contract rate is the common measure. Here, the allowance of the excess interest would have rendered an otherwise solvent debtor insolvent. The interest rate sought is very high. And the debtor's equity holders' investment needed to maintain litigation, and the chapter 11 case led to the high collateral value. Therefore, the court limits the rate to 25%. In re Urban Communicators PCS Ltd. P'shp, 379 B.R. 232 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

6.1.mmmmmm PBGC's Deficit Reduction Act claim arises prepetition and is dischargeable. The debtor obtained a distressed termination of its defined benefit pension plan during its chapter 11 case. Congress passed the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005 before the debtor's chapter 11 case. Among other things, it provides for an additional premium payable to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation by an employer whose defined benefit pension plan is subject to a distress termination in a chapter 11 case. The section providing for the premium "shall not apply ... until the date of discharge". The premium is a claim that is contingent on plan termination. The claim arose prepetition, because the debtor and the PBGC had a relationship with respect to this pension plan before bankruptcy, and the parties could contemplate before bankruptcy that this additional premium could arise. The claim's unenforceability until discharge does not make it arise postpetition. It is not an administrative claim, because it provides no benefit to the estate. Therefore, it is allowed as a general unsecured prepetition claim, and plan confirmation discharges it. Oneida Ltd v. Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. (In re Oneida Ltd.), 383 B.R. 29 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2008).

6.1.nnnnnn Court disallows note de-acceleration, change of control put, unmatured original issue discount, and yield maintenance. The debtor issued secured notes with original issue discount, due 2009, and warrants under a 2002 indenture. The notes gave the holders the right to put the notes to the debtor at 101% of their full face amount upon a change of control. The notes provided for automatic acceleration, without notice, upon a bankruptcy filing and permitted a majority of holders to waive defaults and acceleration under certain circumstances. After the debtor proposed a plan that would pay the holders in cash the full amount of their oversecured claims and would result in a change of control, the holders attempted to waive defaults and acceleration, return the notes to their pre-default state, and assert the change of control put. Section 502(b)(1) allows claims as of the petition date. The automatic acceleration upon bankruptcy moved the notes' maturity date to the petition date. The amount owing became fixed as of that date, and the attempted waiver could not de-accelerate the claim nor change the claim's allowable amount to 101% of par. Because the notes were oversecured, the debtor in possession paid current contract interest during the case. Upon confirmation, the remaining allowable claim included only original issue discount accrued through the plan effective date. The holders are entitled to accruing postpetition original issue discount only through the plan effective date, not through the notes' original maturity, because the notes accelerated automatically upon bankruptcy, section 502(b)(2) disallows unmatured postpetition interest, and section 506(b) allows postpetition interest to the extent the claim is oversecured. The holders' claim for contract interest through original maturity is also not allowable. Although it is possible to contract for "yield maintenance", the automatic acceleration here re-set maturity to the petition date and thereby disallows any yield maintenance claim. In re Solutia Inc., 379 B.R. 473 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

6.1.000000 A prepetition unsecured creditor's attorney's fees incurred postpetition are allowable. The unsecured creditor had released the debtor before bankruptcy under a contract that provided for the creditor's attorney's fees. The release was revoked after bankruptcy, and the creditor filed a claim under the prepetition agreement for the attorney's fees it incurred postpetition. The attorney's fees claim was contingent as of the petition date but became fixed after the petition date by the release revocation. The Code's definition of "claim" includes a right to payment, whether contingent or fixed, liquidated or unliquidated. Section 502(b)(1) requires claim disallowance only if the claim is unenforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law for a reason "other than because such claim is contingent or unmatured". A court may not disallow a claim unless section 502(b) provides a specific ground for disallowance. Thus, neither the claim's contingency nor its unliquidated amount as of the petition date provided a ground to disallow it. Section 506(b) does not require disallowance. Section 506(b) addresses only the portion of a claim that is treated as secured, whereas section 502 addresses allowance. Section 502(b) requires the court to determine the amount of a claim “as of the date of the filing of the petition”, but the right to payment, though contingent and unliquidated, existed as of the date of the filing of the petition, so the postpetition incurrence of the attorney’s fees does not create a bar to their allowance. Otherwise, contingent claims would all be disallowed, contrary to section 502(b)(1). The court rejects public policy analysis as irrelevant to the statutory construction. Centre Ins. Co. v. SNTL Corp. (In re SNTL Corp.), 380 B.R. 204 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007); aff’d, 571 F.3d 826 (9th Cir. 2009).

6.1.pppppp Section 506(b) does not apply to prepetition fees and costs. A secured creditor incurred attorney’s fees both before and after the petition date. Section 506(b)’s reasonableness requirement applies only to the postpetition fees, because section 506(b) operates only on an allowed secured claim, which is the allowable claim amount determined under section 502(b). Section 502(b) governs allowance of the prepetition fees, based on the contract and applicable nonbankruptcy law. In re Woods Auto Gallery, Inc., 379 B.R. 875 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2007).

6.1.qqqqqq Principal co-obligor is not entitled to subrogation upon foreclosure on its property to pay claim against the debtor. One of the partners in the debtor co-signed a promissory note with the debtor as a co-maker and granted a security interest in its own real property to secure a lender’s advance to the debtor to acquire real property. The partner was principally liable on the note, not an accommodation endorser, because none of the documents evidenced any intent that the partner be only secondarily liable, and because, as a partner in the debtor, the partner benefited from the debtor’s acquisition of the real property. After bankruptcy, the lender foreclosed on the partner’s property to satisfy its claim against the debtor. The partner may not subrogate to the lender’s secured claim against the debtor. Under section 509(a), a purported subrogee “that is liable with the debtor on, or that has secured, a claim of a creditor against the debtor, and that pays such claim, is subrogated to the rights of such creditor to the extent of such payment.” Here, the partner was not liable with the debtor on a claim against the debtor but was directly liable to the creditor. The partner did not pay the claim, because suffering the foreclosure is not a payment. In addition, section 509(b)(2) denies subrogation if “as between the debtor and [the subrogee], [the subrogee] received the consideration for the claim”. Because the partner was primarily liable for the debt, it received consideration for paying the debt. (The court does not distinguish between receiving consideration for paying the debt (release of liability on the debt) from receiving the consideration for the underlying claim.) In re Flamingo 55, Inc., 378 B.R. 893 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007).

6.1.rrrrrr Court recharacterizes as equity shareholder advances in excess of board-approved loan amount. A minority shareholder and director, who did not control the board but who served part of the time as the debtor’s CEO, made advances to the debtor in excess of the amount the board approved as loans. The amount the board approved was documented as loans, and the debtor signed a security agreement to secure the loans. The debtor treated all the advances as loans for accounting and tax purposes, but, with the lender’s acquiescence, it stopped paying interest on all of the advances when it got into financial trouble. The debtor had also borrowed from a bank. When the debtor began to fail, the creditor resigned from the board, bought the bank’s loan, and issued a notice of default on both loans on the same day. The debtor soon filed a bankruptcy petition. The creditor’s loan is properly allowed as a claim up to the amount the board authorized as a loan. The board approval, the documentation, and the tax and accounting treatment all show that the advances were loans, not equity investments. However, the advances in excess of the authorized amount were not authorized as loans, were not documented as such, and were made to keep the company afloat. As such, they are properly characterized as equity investments, not allowable claims. Nelson v. Repository Techs., Inc. (In re Repository Techs., Inc.), 381 B.R. 852 (N.D. Ill. 2008).

6.1.ssssss Oversecured creditor may enforce prepayment penalty in a solvent case. Section 506(b) allows to “the holder of [an oversecured] claim ... reasonable fees, costs, or charges provided for under the agreement ... under which such claim arose.” In a solvent case, the debtor objected to allowance of an oversecured creditor’s prepayment penalty as unreasonable. The penalty was enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Section 506(b) does not disallow claims, even unreasonable ones, that are enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law, but only disallows them the benefit of the creditor’s collateral. Section 502(b)(2) disallows a claim that is not enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law, but unless there is another, independent ground for disallowance, does not prevent the secured creditor from recovering on an otherwise enforceable but unreasonable fee or cost as an unsecured claim. Therefore, the secured creditor may recover the penalty in this case. The court stresses that its holding is limited to a solvent case, suggesting equitable considerations might require otherwise “if unsecured creditors are at risk of collateral damage”, but its statutory interpretation and reasoning would otherwise seem to equally apply to an insolvent case. Gencarelli v. UPS Capital Bus. Credit (In re Gencarelli), 501 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2007).

6.1.tttttt Creditor may not allocate payment from guarantor to postpetition interest. The creditor obtained a guarantee limited to $140 million from the debtor’s non-debtor affiliate. After the debtor’s bankruptcy, the creditor obtained an arbitration award against the debtor and the guarantor, which included $17 million in interest accrued after bankruptcy. The guarantor collected $140 million from the guarantor, which it allocated first to $17 million in interest and the balance to principal, and filed a claim for $140 million (without interest) in the debtor’s bankruptcy case. Based on a 1935 Supreme Court case, the guarantor’s payment does not reduce the allowable amount of the creditor’s claim against the debtor, as a matter of bankruptcy law. New York law, which governs the guarantee, also does not require reduction of the claim against the debtor, as surety. Therefore, the creditor’s claim is allowed in the debtor’s case for $140 million, despite the guarantor’s payment, except the creditor may not collect more than $17 million on its claim. However, for purposes of application in the bankruptcy case, the creditor may not allocate the guarantor’s payment to postpetition interest and then collect the balance as principal in the bankruptcy case. The disallowance of postpetition interest is an equitable rule, which requires the courts to sift the facts to ensure that claims treatments are equitable, and the facts here show that the payment would permit the creditor to collect postpetition interest. A concurring opinion suggests the ability of the creditor to call the guarantor’s payment interest does not preclude the bankruptcy court from calling it interest. It appears the result might have differed if the guarantee were not limited to the principal amount. A dissent argues that section 524(e) requires allowance of the claim and that because section 502(b)(2) does not protect a non-debtor, the creditor may allocate as it chooses. Nat’l Energy & Gas Trans., Inc. v. Liberty Elec. Power, LLC (In re Nat’l Energy & Gas Trans., Inc.), 492 F.3d 297 (4th Cir. 2007).

6.1.uuuuuu Court allows postpetition interest in solvent case at federal judgment rate. Section 726(a) permits interest in a solvent chapter 7 case at “the legal rate”, which the court interprets to mean the rate allowable under 28 U.S.C. § 1961 on federal judgments rather than at the contract rate. The common understanding in 1978 of “the legal rate” was the rate allowable on judgments, as contrasted with “a” legal rate or with the contract rate, which Congress specified in other Bankruptcy Code sections such as section 506(b). Congress adopted this rule to promote fairness among creditors. Even though the legal rate may be lower than the contract rate and thereby create a windfall for the debtor, the court is not free through its equitable powers to change the result that Congress prescribed. Branch Banking & Trust Co. v. McDow (In re Garriock), 373 B.R. 814 (E.D. Va. 2007).

6.1.vvvvvv Court generally may equitably subordinate or disallow a claim only in the hands of an assignee, not an innocent purchaser. The bank was a member of a lending syndicate. Separately, it engaged in a transaction with the debtor that may have contributed to the misstatement of the debtor's financial statements, securities fraud, and harm to numerous other creditors. The bank also received an avoidable preference. After bankruptcy, it sold its loan syndicate claim to an unrelated third party who had had no contacts with the debtor before bankruptcy. Section 502(d) provides for disallowance of a "claim of an entity from which property is recoverable ... or that is a transferee of a transfer avoidable [under the avoiding powers], unless such entity or transferee has paid the amount ... for which such entity or transferee is liable [under the avoiding powers]". Section 510(c) permits the court, "under principles of equitable subordination, [to] subordinate ... all or part of a claim" These provisions are disabilities that are personal to the holder that engaged in inequitable conduct or that received an avoidable transfer: Section 510(c) permits subordination based on "principles of equitable subordination", which focus on the claimant's conduct, not the nature of the claim; and section 502(d)'s language refers only to "the claim of an entity ... that is a transferee of a transfer avoided ..." (emphasis added), not to the claim itself. A sale/ purchase transfers title to a good faith purchaser free of any personal disabilities of the seller. Except for an assignment of a negotiable instrument to a holder in due course, an assignment transfers only what the assignor had, subject to any personal disabilities. Therefore, whether the claim here is subject to equitable subordination or section 502(d) disallowance depends on whether the claim transfer was a sale or an assignment and, if a sale, whether there are any other facts that would prevent the transferee from being a good faith purchaser. The district court remands for a determination of these factual issues, but does not give any guidance on how to distinguish a sale from an assignment. Enron Corp. v. Springfield Assocs., L.L.C. (In re Enron Corp.), 379 B.R. 425 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

6.1.wwwww Former officer's defense costs advancement claim is not subject to disallowance under section 502(e)(1)(B). The debtor's certificate of incorporation and by-laws permitted it to advance to an officer costs incurred in defense of a civil or criminal investigation or action for which the officer may be entitled to indemnification, subject only to the officer's agreement to repay advances if ultimately found not entitled to indemnification. The SEC settled claims against the debtor related to improper accounting, but the government continued a criminal investigation against one officer. The officer filed a claim for defense costs, which debtor continued to advance during the case. Section 502(e)(1)(B) requires disallowance of a contingent reimbursement claim for which the debtor and the claimant are co-liable. A claim for reimbursement includes an indemnification claim. An advancement means the reimbursement of costs in advance of a final determination of indemnification entitlement and is therefore a form of indemnification claim. The claim, however, is not contingent. It has already accrued, because the officer has already incurred the defense costs for which he seeks advancement. The possibility that the officer may be found not entitled to indemnification may give the estate a contingent claim against the officer for repayment, but does not render the officer's claim against the debtor contingent. (The court does not consider the possibility that the claim may be disputed, rather than contingent, on the theory that the facts giving rise to the officer's claim—incurring defense costs—have occurred, but the dispute over liability has not yet been resolved.) The claim remains unliquidated, however, because the full amount is not yet established. Finally, the debtor and the officer are not co-liable for defense costs. The liability for those costs is the officer's alone. Therefore, section 502(e)(1)(B) does not require disallowance. In re RNI Wind Down Corp., 369 B.R. 174 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007).

6.1.xxxxx BAPCPA's section 546(c) does not create a federal reclamation right. The debtor owed prepetition $367 million, secured by its inventory, among other things. The debtor in possession obtained $1.4 billion in financing, also secured in part by inventory, that was used in part to pay off the prepetition claim. Numerous suppliers asserted reclamation claims against the inventory. Section 546(c) provides that "subject to the prior rights of a holder of a security interest in such goods or the proceeds thereof, the [trustee's avoiding power] rights and powers are subject to the right of a seller of goods ... to reclaim such goods" if certain additional conditions are met. This provision is incomplete, in that it does not address many of the issues that the state law right created under U.C.C. § 2-702 addresses, such as the treatment of good faith purchasers, the effect of prior payment for the goods, the requirement of buyer insolvency, or the effect or commingling. Moreover, it contains no creation or granting words such as “may reclaim” or “has the right to reclaim”, and the legislative history contains no suggestion that Congress intended to change existing law, which relied on the state law right. Therefore, the provision does not create a federal reclamation right that supplants the state law right and so does not vitiate the limitations inherent in the state law right. Finally, the DIP’s use of inventory to secure the postpetition financing acted as a disposition of the goods that were subject to the reclamation claims that rendered the reclamation claims valueless. In re Dana Corp., 367 B.R. 409 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

6.1.yyyyyy Section 502(b)(7) does not limit an employee’s retaliatory discharge claim. The debtor discharged its CFO, who was employed at will, for refusing to violate federal securities laws in the debtor’s accounting books. The former CFO sued and obtained a judgment for several years’ lost wages, mental anguish, interest, and attorney’s fees for the debtor’s violation of the state’s public policy against retaliatory discharge for refusing to violate law. Section 502(b)(7) limits the claim of an employee for damages resulting from termination of an employment contract to accrued prepetition compensation plus up to one year’s postpetition compensation. Here, the CFO’s employment, even under an at will agreement, was under an employment contract. However, the state court judgment was not for termination of the contract but, according to applicable state law, in tort. Therefore, the section 502(b)(7) limitation does not apply. In re Ajay Sports, Inc., 370 B.R. 703 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2007).

6.1.zzzzzz Leveraged lease tax indemnity agreement excludes payment of tax indemnity payment included in stipulated loss value. The debtor entered into a typical leveraged lease transaction, under which it agreed to pay stipulated loss value to the lessor/owner trustee if it breached the lease, and agreed to indemnify the owner participant for tax losses, including those resulting from lease breach. The owner trustee granted a security interest in the lease and rents, including the stipulated loss value payment obligation, to the indenture trustee for the debt. The stipulated loss value calculation included amounts necessary to pay off the debt, the return on the equity investment, including the expected return and tax benefits, thereby duplicating payments that might be owing under the tax indemnity agreement. In chapter 11, the debtor in possession rejected the lease. The indenture trustee filed a claim for stipulated loss value, which the debtor’s plan did not pay in full, and the owner participant filed a claim for indemnification for lost tax benefits. Although the same lost tax benefits were included in both claims, no contract law (or “cosmic”, in the court’s word) principle prevents a debtor from contracting with two separate parties to pay the same claim twice. However, the tax indemnity agreement excludes a claim for lost tax benefits if the lessee/debtor were required to make the payment (as opposed to actually making the payment) as part of a stipulated loss value claim. Therefore, the court disallows the owner participant’s tax indemnity claim. In re Delta Airlines, Inc., 370 B.R. 552 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

6.1.aaaaaa Court disallows city’s environmental claim as a contingent co-debtor claim. The debtor was a potentially responsible party (PRP) and owed the state for environmental remediation at a large site. The city, which was also a PRP, agreed with the state to undertake the site remediation. Later, the city obtained a judgment against the debtor for contribution under CERCLA section 113(f) for the debtor’s portion of remediation costs for the entire site (1.72%), which the debtor paid, and for 100% of future response costs for the debtor’s small portion of the site. The city filed a proof of claim for the future response costs, but the state did not. The court disallows the city’s claim under section 502(e)(1)(B), which requires disallowance of “any claim for ... contribution of an entity that is liable with the debtor on ... the claim of a creditor, to the extent that ... such claim for ... contribution is contingent as of the time of allowance” The city's claim was for contribution, because it was under CERCLA section 113(f), which only permits a PRP to recover a fair share of remediation costs from other PRP's. The allocation of 100% of future response costs for a portion of the site does not make the claim one for direct cost recovery under CERCLA section 107(a), because the liability was for only a portion of the entire large site and was to another PRP, not to the state. The city was liable with the debtor on the claim, because both were liable to the State for the remediation costs, even though the state had not filed a proof of claim. The principal creditors' failure to file a claim does not erase the underlying liability for section 502(e) purposes, even though the non-filing prevents the "double-dipping" risk that section 502(e)(1) is designed to avert. The city's claim was contingent because it had not yet incurred the future response costs. (The court does not discuss the more traditional "contingency" of a co-debtor's claim, the co-debtor/claimant's nonpayment of the principal creditor's claim.) In re Apco Liq. Trust, 370 B.R. 625 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007).

6.1.bbbbbbb State-imposed obligation to make deposits against future potential liability is a claim. States who settled tobacco litigation in 2000 adopted legislation to require nonsettling cigarette manufacturers to make quarterly deposits into an escrow fund, which is controlled by the states, is held in the manufacturer's name, earns interest that the manufacturer may receive, and may not be used as collateral for loans. The funds are to be used to pay any of the manufacturer's tobacco liability; if there is no liability in 25 years, the escrow fund is returned to the manufacturer. If a manufacturer fails to make a deposit, it may no longer sell cigarettes in the state. The debtor failed to make fund deposits for several quarters before bankruptcy. Its chapter 11 plan provided for it to make up the missed deposits over 46 months. The state may enforce the obligation to pay fund deposits. Therefore, even though the state does not have a current right to the funds and might never receive any of the funds, the missed deposits are claims that may be adjusted in a plan, rather than a security deposit or bonding requirement that is unaffected by bankruptcy or the discharge. In addition, section 1123(a)(5), which permits a plan (at least in the Ninth Circuit, see Pac. Gas & Elec. v. Cal., 350 F.3d 932 (9th Cir. 2003)) to override applicable nonbankruptcy law relating only to financial conditions such as insolvency, but not those relating to nonfinancial operating requirements, applies to this state law requirement. Reading "financial condition" broadly to include "profitability," the court concludes that when a business has no potential source of revenues other than from operations, an operational condition and financial condition might be the same. Settling States v. Carolina Tobacco Co. (In re Carolina Tobacco Co.), 360 B.R. 702 (D. Ore. 2007).

6.1.cccccc Landlord damage limitation does not apply to owner participants in a leveraged lease. The debtor entered into a leveraged lease of several of its store locations. As in any leveraged lease, the debtor indemnified the owner participants directly for losses in general and for loss of tax advantages in particular. The debtor's bankruptcy defaulted the lease, and the indenture trustee foreclosed out the owner participants' equity interests in the owner trust. The debtor in possession rejected the leases and settled with indenture trustee on the amount of the lease rejection damage claim, which was subject to the landlord damage cap in section 502(b)(6). The owner participants asserted their own indemnification claims, which may be allowed without application of the cap. First, the owner participants' claims for their lost investment has ties to the lease and the rents but are distinct claims. Second, section 502(b)(6) applies only to a lessor's claim. The owner participants were not the lessors; the owner trust was. To limit the owner participants' claims as lessors would require disregarding the trust, effectively piercing the "trust's veil," and thereby recharacterizing the transaction's economic substance. Third, section 502(b)(6) applies only to claims arising from termination of a lease. Even if the owner participants were the lessors, the losses for which they assert general indemnification claims are not tied to rejection or termination; they could arise had the lease run full term and a loss had occurred within the indemnity's scope. The tax claims similarly could arise from and are in compensation for loss of anticipated tax benefits, not lease termination. In re Kmart Corp., 362 B.R. 361 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007).

- 6.1.ddddddd Court order allowing uncontested proof of claim is res judicata. The IRS had filed a proof of claim. No party in interest objected. The claim was allowed by court order. The order is a final adjudication on the merits of the claim by a court of competent jurisdiction. That a bankruptcy court may reconsider a claim under section 502(k) does not detract from the finality of the order. The debtor as well as the trustee may object to a proof of claim, so the debtor is a party for purposes of claim preclusion. Therefore, res judicata applies to the order allowing the claim. EDP Med. Computer Sys., Inc. v. U. S., 480 F.3d 621 (2d Cir. 2007).
- 6.1.eeeeeee Claim for postpetition attorney’s fees is allowable. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor and its workers’ compensation surety bond issuer disputed the treatment under the plan of the issuer’s unsecured claim. The dispute related solely to bankruptcy law issues, not to the enforceability of the bond or the allowability or amount of the surety’s claim. They ultimately settled (except as to the allowability of attorney’s fees). The Bankruptcy Code does not by its terms disallow the surety’s claim for attorney’s fees incurred in the dispute. Section 502(b) specifies the grounds for claims disallowance. Generally, state law determines contract rights. Section 502(b)(1) incorporates state law grounds into the claims allowance process. Neither section 502(b)(1) nor any of the other grounds requires disallowance of attorney’s fees for disputes related solely to bankruptcy law issues. Therefore, if the claim is enforceable under the contract and nonbankruptcy law, the Bankruptcy Code does not require that it be disallowed. The Court does not address, however, whether section 506(b), which allows an oversecured creditor’s attorney’s fees as part of the secured claim, implicitly or explicitly requires disallowance of an unsecured creditor’s attorney’s fees claim, because the debtor did not timely raise the issue, but allows the court below to consider that issue, as well as nonbankruptcy law enforceability, on remand. Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 549 U.S. 443 (2007).
- 6.1.fyyyyyy Tortfeasor who is jointly and severally liable with the debtor is not entitled to subrogation. The debtor and another were found jointly and severally liable to a creditor for a tort. The other paid the claim in full and asserted a subrogation claim against the debtor under section 509(a). Section 509(b), however, disallows the subrogation claim. It denies subrogation if as between the debtor and the subrogee, the subrogee “received the consideration for the claim held by such creditor.” The other party’s joint and several liability for the tort made it primarily and directly liable to the creditor. As such, it received a release of its liability upon payment, which was the consideration for payment of the claim, bringing it under the disallowance provision of section 509(b). The court does not distinguish between receiving the consideration for paying the claim and the statutory language of “received the consideration for the claim.” Fibreboard Corp. v. Celotex Corp. (In re Celotex Corp.), 472 F.3d 1318 (11th Cir. 2006).
- 6.1.ggggggg Secured creditor’s prepayment charge is allowable only under section 502(b). The loan documents provided for a prepayment penalty if the debtor defaulted and the lender accelerated the loan, all of which happened prepetition. The court denies allowance of the prepayment charge under section 506(b), which applies solely to postpetition interest, fees, and charges. The prepayment charge arose prepetition, upon the default. Because the charge is enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law, it is allowable under section 502(b) as part of the lender’s prepetition claim. The prepetition claim, including the charge, is an allowed secured claim under section 506(a). In re Tri-State Ethanol Co. LLC, 354 B.R. 913 (Bankr. D.S.D. 2006).
- 6.1.hhhhhhh Where postpetition interest is disallowed, principal should not be discounted to present value. The creditor filed a claim under a guarantee that included the principal amount of the guaranteed claim plus interest that would accrue under the guarantee until maturity of the underlying obligation. The bankruptcy court disallowed the portion representing interest that would accrue after bankruptcy under section 502(b)(2), which requires disallowance of a claim for unmatured interest. The court did not, however, discount the remaining principal amount to present value. The language in section 502(b), that a claim is to be determined “as of the date of the filing of the petition,” does not require discounting of a claim’s principal amount where postpetition interest has already been disallowed. That would amount to improper “double discounting.” Case law requiring principal discounting involves only claims without a stated interest rate (as to which discounting is questionable, based on the legislative history’s statement that the stated interest rate – even 0% – provides an irrebutable presumption as to the proper discount rate), which is not the kind of claim at issue here. In re Oakwood Homes Corp., 449 F.3d 588 (3d Cir. 2006).

6.1.iiiiii A bankruptcy court may recharacterize claims. The parent sold inventory to the subsidiary, accruing an intercompany receivable that it intended to collect only when the subsidiary became profitable. Its auditor recognized the major part of the receivable as an equity investment. After the subsidiary filed bankruptcy, the committee sought to recharacterize the intercompany claim as an equity investment. Recharacterization differs from disallowance, in that it is applied to a legitimate underlying obligation from the debtor to the claimant that is not a right to payment but an equity investment. It differs from equitable subordination in that it is based on the substance of the underlying transaction, not on the creditor’s behavior. Consistent with the bankruptcy court’s equitable powers, it may look through form to substance to determine whether an obligation is debt or equity. The facts here, including the special relationship between the parent and the subsidiary, the deferral of the repayment obligation until profitability, the long history of unprofitability, and the auditor’s recognition of the transfers as equity contributions, support recharacterization. Transfers of inventory qualify for recharacterization equally with transfers of cash. Fairchild Dornier GMBH v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re Dornier Aviation (N. Am.), Inc.), 453 F.3d 225 (4th Cir. 2006).

6.1.jjjjjj “Fair contemplation” rule applies to gender discrimination claims. The debtor filed a prepackaged chapter 11 case on February 28. The court set an April 19 prepetition claims filing bar date. The court confirmed the plan on April 30 and set a July 1 bar date for administrative claims arising between February 28 and April 30. The plan became effective on May 13 and purported to discharge all claims arising on or before the effective date. Three female employees of the debtor claimed that they suffered from gender discrimination upon the debtor’s payment of certain similarly situated male employees in January, but that they did not learn of the discrimination until “late April or early May.” The “fair contemplation” rule of Cal. Dep’t of Health Servs. v. Jensen (In re Jensen), 995 F.2d 925 (9th Cir. 1993), applies to gender discrimination claims, so they were deemed to arise when the women learned of the discrimination in late April or early May. ZiLOG, Inc. v. Corning (In re ZiLOG, Inc.), 450 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006).

6.1.kkkkkk Time barred fraudulent transfer claim does not provide section 502(d) disallowance grounds. The creditor filed a proof of claim on the debtor’s guarantee of its parent’s obligation. The liquidating trustee’s claim to avoid the guarantee as a constructively fraudulent obligation under section 544(b) was barred by the statute of limitations of section 546(a). In a prior decision, the court had ruled that the trustee could not use section 502(d) to object to the claim, because that provision applies only to a creditor “that is a transferee of a transfer avoidable under” the avoiding powers, not to an avoidable obligation. In re Asia Global Crossing, Ltd., 333 B.R. 199 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005). In this decision, the court rules that the trustee may not obtain disallowance under section 502(d) on a “common law” fraudulent obligation defense. First, unlike the fraudulent transfer law, the common law recognizes and enforces contracts for which the consideration may be wholly inadequate, as long as there is consideration. Second, section 502(d) provides a defense to a time-barred avoiding power for avoiding power claims only under section 544(a), because, in addition to an avoiding power, section 544(a) gives the trustee a status (judicial lien creditor or real property bona fide purchaser), which the trustee may use defensively against the creditor. In re Asia Global Crossing, Ltd., 344 B.R. 247 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

- 6.1.iiiii Landlord claim cap does not limit kind of allowable claim. The landlord obtained a state court judgment against the debtor for attorney's fees for lease-related litigation and filed a proof of claim for that amount. Section 502(b)(6) limits a landlord's claim for damages for breach of a lease to an amount calculated based on the "rent reserved under the lease." The cap does not limit the kind of claim the landlord may assert for breach of the lease, only the amount. Therefore, so long as the attorney's fees claim did not exceed the formula amount, it is allowable. Wall St. Plaza, LLC v. JSJF Corp. (In re JSJF Corp.), 344 B.R. 94 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).
- 6.1.mmmmm Dispute over the amount of a claim does not make it unliquidated. The chapter 13 debtor challenged the IRS's claim for past years' taxes and argued that the claims were contingent and unliquidated, so that the debtor's debts would not push the debtor's debts over the eligibility limit for chapter 13. The debts were for tax years that had already been completed. Thus, all facts necessary to establish liability had occurred, so the debts are not contingent. The tax debts were disputed in amount, but the determination of the allowable amount is not based on the court's discretion or a future event (other than a judicial determination of the amount owing). The judicial determination is limited by the specific provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. A debt that has been made certain by agreement of the parties or operation of law, rather than one based upon a future exercise of discretion, is liquidated. Therefore, though disputed, the debts are liquidated. In re Tucker, 345 B.R. 373 (Bankr. M.D. Ala. 2006).
- 6.1.nnnnn A plan may not categorically disallow punitive damage claims. Bankruptcy law generally enforces state law entitlements. State law in this case permits punitive damages but requires that 60% of punitive damage claims be paid to the state, which does not affect their allowability in bankruptcy. State law does not permit punitive damages where the agent who committed the tort acted outside his authority or where defendant has corrected the offending conduct. The court may not make those determinations on confirmation but only upon proceedings on an objection to the tort claim. In a liquidation case, punitive damages are given fourth priority, ahead of any return to equity. In a chapter 11 case, therefore, they cannot be disallowed without a showing at a minimum that they would not receive any recovery in a chapter 7 case. The claims may be subordinated only on an independent analysis on a case-by-case basis. In re Roman Catholic Archbishop of Portland in Oregon, 339 B.R. 215 (Bankr. D. Ore. 2006).
- 6.1.ooooo Only the district court may estimate tort claims for a plan distribution cap. The debtor's proposed plan distributed a fixed amount to a settlement trust as the sole source of payment of all tort claims. Confirmation with the cap would have the effect of limiting the distribution on the tort claims, so confirmation requires a determination that the aggregate amount of the tort claims does not exceed the proposed distribution. The debtor sought an estimate of the aggregate amount of the claims for purposes of limiting distribution under the plan. Only the district court may determine the amount of personal injury tort claims for purposes of distribution. Because the plan had the effect of limiting distribution to the aggregate estimated amount of the claims, the estimation would be for purposes of distribution, not just for allowance. The bankruptcy court may recommend a methodology to the district court. The methodology would not require mini-trials for each of the 129 claims but might entail the employment of an expert to develop a matrix or the use of advisory jury trials to develop a range of possible recoveries. However, estimation for confirmation and voting purposes involves less drastic effects on the claimants and will be permitted in the bankruptcy court with less exacting procedures. In re Roman Catholic Archbishop of Portland in Oregon, 339 B.R. 215 (Bankr. D. Ore. 2006).
- 6.1.ppppp Claim transfer does not vitiate section 502(d) objection. Section 502(d) provides for disallowance of a "claim of an entity from which property is recoverable ... or that is a transferee of a transfer avoidable" Section 502(d) continues to apply to the claim in the hands of a transferee who acquired the claim after bankruptcy. The statute focuses on the claim, not its holder, and a transferee takes a claim subject generally to all of the defenses that the debtor would have, so the transfer does not affect section 502(d)'s applicability. What's more, claims traders can protect themselves by agreements allocating the risk of disallowance, whether on the claim's merits or for Bankruptcy Code reasons. Finally, section 550(b) does not protect the transferees. Section 550(b) applies only to transfers of property of the debtor, not of claims against the debtor. Moreover, section 550(b) requires that a transferee take "without knowledge of the voidability of the transfer." Knowledge of bankruptcy or insolvency imputes knowledge of voidability. Enron Corp. v. Avenue Special Situations Fund II, LP (In re Enron Corp.), 340 B.R. 180 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

6.1.qqqqqq Court may temporarily disallow claim under section 502(d) pending determination of the related preference action. The debtor in possession brought a preference avoidance action against a creditor who had previously transferred the claim to an unrelated entity. The debtor in possession also objected to the claim under section 502(d). The objection to claim may proceed, despite a motion to dismiss, even though the preference action has not been resolved. The claim may be temporarily disallowed pending resolution of the preference action, subject to reconsideration if the preference action defense is successful. Enron Corp. v. Avenue Special Situations Fund II, LP (In re Enron Corp.), 340 B.R. 180 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

6.1.rrrrrr Section 510(b) subordinates employees stock option claims. The debtor was guilty of securities fraud. When the fraud was uncovered, the value of the debtor's stock collapsed, and the debtor was forced into bankruptcy. Employees filed claims for losses they suffered when their stock options became worthless. Stock options are "securities" within the meaning of section 101. A claim against the employer for its fraudulent inducement to the employee to purchase the stock option, that is, to take the option as compensation, is therefore a claim arising in connection with the purchase of a security. So also are claims for fraudulent inducement to retain the stock option and not exercise it. Although the cases are not so clear as to the latter kind of claim, section 510(b) subordinates both kinds of claims. In re Enron Corp., 341 B.R. 141 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

6.1.ssssss Limitation on landlord damage claim does not apply to letter of credit draw. The landlord drew on a letter of credit when the debtor in possession rejected the lease. The amount of the draw exceeded the limitation on a landlord's damage claim imposed by section 502(b)(6). The landlord did not file a proof of claim for damages. The bankruptcy court may not disallow the draw. Section 502(b)(6) applies only to disallow a filed proof of claim. It is not an avoiding power. Therefore, it does not affect the landlord's draw. The court does not address whether section 502(b)(6) would affect the bank's resulting letter of credit reimbursement claim. EOP-Colonnade of Dallas Ltd. P'ship v. Faulkner (In re Stonebridge Techs., Inc.) 439 F.3d 260 (5th Cir. 2005).

6.1.tttttt Trustee may recover letter of credit proceeds in excess of damage claim. The landlord took a security deposit and a letter of credit to secure the debtor's performance under a lease. When the trustee rejected the lease, the landlord applied the security deposit and drew the full amount under the letter of credit. The trustee sued to recover the amount that the landlord had recovered that was in excess of the landlord's actual damages. First, the lease rejection did not vitiate the trustee's rights. Rejection is a breach, not a rescission, and it does not eliminate any of the trustee's rights under the lease. Second, the doctrine of independence applicable to letters of credit does not prevent the trustee from recovering excess amounts. A letter of credit establishes two relationships (bank-customer and bank-beneficiary) based on a third relationship, customer-beneficiary. The independence principle prevents the customer-beneficiary relationship from interfering with the first two relationships, but the letter of credit relationship does not provide any additional protection to the customer-beneficiary relationship. Therefore, if the landlord over-recovered its damage claim, the fact that it did so through a letter of credit did not prevent the trustee from recovering the overage. First Ave. W. Bldg., LLC v. James (In re OneCast Media, Inc.), 439 F.3d 558 (9th Cir. 2006).

6.1. uuuuuuu Third Circuit rejects recharacterization and equitable subordination claims and narrows grounds for both. As the debtor drifted further into financial distress, the debtor's secured term lenders kept extending more credit and taking more collateral and guarantees, including from the debtor's subsidiaries. In the process, the lenders acquired seats on the debtor's board, and other board members resigned, leaving only the three lender representatives and the debtor's CEO on the board. As the end neared, the lenders worked with a venture fund to acquire the debtor. The deal they negotiated required them to assign their secured claims to a new entity, formed and funded by the venture fund. The new entity agreed to acquire the debtor in a section 363 sale by credit bidding the secured claims and paying an additional amount in cash, which was used to pay the debtor's senior working capital lender, to pay administrative expenses, and to assume certain ordinary operating expense obligations. After the sale closed, the creditors' committee sued the secured lenders on several theories, all of which the court rejects. The court rejects the claim for recharacterization of the loans, including the latest ones. It first notes that recharacterization should be called "characterization," because it seeks to determine what the substance rather than the form of the transaction was, and differs from equitable subordination, because equitable subordination operates only when it is clear there is a claim (rather than equity) to subordinate. The court addresses recharacterization as a question of the intent of the parties, not of a "mechanistic scorecard" of factors. Because the resolution is based on intent, it is a question of fact, not law. The court concludes that the trial court's decision determining that the loans were not equity investments was not clearly erroneous: the lenders' transactions were documented as loans and were not improper, and the lenders' membership on the debtor's board was not unusual and did not require recharacterization. The court rejects the equitable subordination claim, because the lenders' conduct did not result in any harm to other creditors. In fact, it kept the debtor alive and allowed most operating expenses to be paid. Finally, in a footnote, the court rejects the "inaccurate generalizations of Credit Lyonnais that have gained traction from uncritical repetition," that directors' fiduciary duties extend to creditors when a corporation is in the vicinity of insolvency, and instead adopts the clarification of directors' duties set forth in Prod. Res. Group L.L.C. v. NCT Group, Inc., 863 A.2d 772 (Del. Ch. 2004). Cohen v. KB Mezz. Fund II, LP (In re Submicron Sys. Corp.), 432 F.3d 448 (3d Cir. 2006).

6.1. vvvvvvv Postpetition attorney's fees incurred under prepetition contract are allowable as a prepetition claim. The debtor's prepetition surety litigated after bankruptcy with the beneficiary and recovered substantial sums, but not full compensation, for the surety and for the estate. Its remaining reimbursement claim was unsecured. The surety bond obligated the debtor to reimburse the surety for attorney's fees, for which the surety sought allowance as part of its claim. Section 506(b), which allows attorney's fees to an oversecured creditor as part of its secured claim, does not impliedly prohibit allowance of postpetition attorney's fees to an unsecured creditor. Section 502(b), which requires determination and allowance of a claim as of the date of the filing of the petition, also does not prohibit allowance of fees incurred postpetition. The surety's prepetition contract gave it a contingent, unliquidated claim as of the petition date. The later incurrence of attorney's fees fixed and liquidated the claim, which could be allowed as part of the surety's unsecured prepetition claim. Ins. Co. of N. Am. v. Sullivan, 333 B.R. 55 (D. Md. 2005).

6.1. wwwwww Breach of PACA floating trust creates personal liability. The Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act imposes a floating trust in favor of a produce supplier on a buyer's commodity-related liquid assets. If a buyer does not pay a seller, the seller has a claim for breach of trust against such of the buyer's principals who are in a position to control the trust assets. The claim arises out of the common law, not PACA, for breach of the trustee's duty to preserve the assets for the trust's beneficiaries. Such a liability is personal to the trustee. The court does not distinguish between the corporation as trustee and its officers, who are agents of the corporation. Weis-Buy Servs., Inc. v. Paglia, 411 F.3d 415 (3d Cir. 2005).

- 6.1.xxxxxxx Secured letter of credit proceeds are deducted from landlord's capped claim. The debtor's landlord secured its claim for breach of lease with a fully collateralized letter of credit. In determining the allowable amount of the landlord's remaining unsecured claim under section 502(b)(6), the court must deduct the collateral from the capped claim, not from the gross, uncapped claim, at least where (as here) the letter of credit is fully collateralized by the debtor's property, so that the net effect on the estate is the same as if the landlord held the collateral directly. AMB Prop., L.P. v. Official Creditors Committee (In re AB Liquidating Co.), 416 F.3d 961 (9th Cir 2005).
- 6.1.yyyyyyy Lien perfected by court filing is a statutory lien. A Pennsylvania driver who violates the motor vehicle law may be liable to the state for various surcharges. The law permits the state to obtain a lien on the driver's property by filing a certificate with the superior court; the certificate has the same effect as the docketing of a judgment in the court, including the creation of a lien on the driver's real property. Such a lien is a statutory lien, not a judicial lien, even though a court filing is required to make it effective. The lien arises based on specified facts and circumstances and is not based on a judicial determination of liability. Nor is it significant that the motor vehicle law does not directly grant the lien, which is then perfected by the filing. As a result, the debtor may not avoid the lien under section 522(f) as a judicial lien. In re Schick, 418 F.3d 321 (3d Cir. 2005).
- 6.1.zzzzzzz Administrative claims are not entitled to interest in a surplus chapter 7 case. The trustee sought interest on his fees in a surplus chapter 7 case. Section 726(a)(5) requires "payment of interest at the legal rate from the date of the filing of the petition, on any claim paid under paragraph (1)." Section 726(a)(1) provides for payment of claims described in section 507. The majority view permits interest only from the date the fees are allowed, despite the literal language of the statute. The minority view follows the literal language and permits interest from the petition date on administrative claims. However, section 726(a)(1) applies only to a claim, "proof of which is timely filed under section 501." Because section 501 does not apply to administrative claims, which are filed under section 503, section 726(a)(5) does not apply, and interest is not payable at all. Tarbox v. United States Trustee (In re Reed), 405 F.3d 338 (5th Cir. 2005).
- 6.1.aaaaaaa Creditor gets postpetition interest at contract rate in surplus liquidation case. After the debtor's case was closed as a no-asset chapter 7, the bank investigated and discovered substantial assets that the debtor had concealed. The trustee reopened the case, which resulted in a surplus. The bank sought postpetition interest on its claim and attorney's fees from the surplus. Section 502(b)(2) disallows postpetition interest, but section 726(a)(5) provides for distribution of interest at the legal rate before any surplus is returned to the debtor. Based at least in part on the debtor's asset concealment and the absence of an objection by the debtor to the claim's allowance, the court awards the interest and, noting the split in the cases, at the contract rate, so that the debtor does not receive a windfall. The court also allows the bank's postpetition attorney's fees as part of its prepetition claim, because the note provided for attorney's fees, which were contingent claims as of the petition date. In re Fast, 318 B.R. 183 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2004).
- 6.1.bbbbbbb Note holder does not have standing as a creditor without proper proof of note ownership. Premier brought a nondischargeability complaint against the debtor based on a negotiable note the debtor had issued to Fleet. Fleet had assigned the note to Sovereign, who had assigned it to Premier. Although Premier had endorsement and transfer documents from Sovereign, it had no similar proof of transfer from Fleet to Sovereign. UCC article 3 requires proper endorsement and transfer of possession of the note for the transferee to enforce the note, unless the transferee properly shows loss of documents and the right to enforce the note and protects the debtor against the risk of double payment. Here, Premier did not have proof of right to enforce because it did not have any documents showing transfer from Fleet to Sovereign. Therefore, Premier lacked standing as a creditor. Gavin v. Premier Capital, LLC (In re Gavin), 319 B.R. 27 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2004).

- 6.1.ccccccc Claim filed one day late is disallowed. The claimant's attorney's clerk mailed the proof of claim by "second day delivery" to the claims agent one day before the bar date, and the claim predictably arrived one day late. The attorney did not verify whether the claim had arrived on time and did not move for an extension of the bar date until 81 days after the bar date. The claim was disallowed because the claimant did not show excusable neglect: (1) although one claim arriving one day late might not prejudice the debtor, the precedent could; (2) the one day delay was short, but the delay in requesting relief from the bar date was long; (3) the reason for the delay—the attorney's delay until the eleventh hour and the clerk's mailing error—was not compelling and was the claimant's own fault; and (4) the claimant acted in good faith, but the finding of good faith was mitigated by the claimant's own delay. In re Kmart Corp., 381 F.3d 709 (7th Cir. 2004).
- 6.1.dddddddd Faxed claim is untimely. The bar date notice provided that to be timely filed, claims had to be received by the bar date and that faxed claims would not be accepted. On the claims bar date, the creditor's attorney mailed the claim to the claims agent and faxed a copy to the trustee, who forwarded the faxed claim to the claims agent. The claim was disallowed as untimely. The fax did not comply with the bar date notice. The trustee's receipt of the fax was not timely under Bankruptcy Rule 5005(c), which requires a claim erroneously delivered to the wrong official to be transmitted to the clerk and permits the court to backdate the filing, and should not be treated as an informal proof of claim. Both those grounds are based on equitable considerations, which are not demonstrated by the creditor's attorney's "self-inflicted wound." In re Outboard Marine Corp., 386 F.3d 824 (7th Cir. 2004).
- 6.1.eeeeeeee Responsible officer who pays trust fund taxes subrogates to the IRS's withholding tax claim. The debtor failed to pay employee withholding taxes. After bankruptcy, the IRS offset its 100% penalty claim against tax refunds owing to the responsible officers in partial satisfaction of the withholding tax claims. After the chapter 7 trustee paid the balance of the IRS's claims, the responsible officers asserted subrogation claims. After an extensive review of the conflicting case law on both the standard for allowing subrogation in a bankruptcy case and whether a 100% penalty payment gives rise to a right of subrogation, the court concludes that the requirements for subrogation set forth in section 509 are exclusive and preempt any state law rights of subrogation and that a responsible officer "is liable with the debtor on" the tax claim, does not receive the consideration for the claim and is therefore entitled to subrogation under section 509. In re Fiesole Trading Corp., 315 B.R. 198 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2004).
- 6.1.ffffff Disputed claim can nevertheless be a liquidated claim. An insurance company sought recovery from the debtor for fraudulent claims, listing the specific checks and amounts that the debtor had received. The debtor claimed that the debtor were not the payees on all of the checks and so were not liable. The court determines, in the context of chapter 13 debt eligibility limits, that the claims are disputed but liquidated, because the amounts in dispute are either known or readily ascertainable. In re Huelbig, 313 B.R. 540 (D.R.I. 2004).
- 6.1.gggggggg Court denies recharacterization of loan to Ponzi scheme debtor. A creditor of a Ponzi scheme debtor's affiliate rolled its loan into a loan to the debtor, with an interest rate and other terms similar to those promised to the equity investors in the Ponzi scheme, but the loan was secured. The trustee seeks to recharacterize the loan as an equity contribution. The Tenth Circuit carefully distinguishes between recharacterization (the substance of the transaction was really an equity investment at the outset) from equitable subordination (a loan is subordinated because of the lender's subsequent inequitable conduct) and denies recharacterization. It adopts the 13-factor test from In re Auto-Style Plastics, Inc., 269 F.3d 726 (6th Cir. 2001), but stresses that "[n]one of these factors is dispositive and their significance may vary depending upon circumstances." In this case, despite the absence of a fixed maturity date and the debtor's thin capitalization, the court refuses to recharacterize the loan. Sender v. Bronze Group, Ltd., 380 F.3d 1292 (10th Cir. 2004).

6.1.hhhhhhhh Landlord's section 502(b)(6) claim is reduced by the amount of a secured letter of credit. The debtor posted $350,000 in cash and $650,000 in a letter of credit "as security for the faithful performance" of the debtor's obligations under the lease. The debtor deposited $650,000 in cash with the issuing bank to secure its reimbursement obligation under the letter of credit. The debtor in possession rejected the lease. The landlord applied the cash deposit and drew on the letter of credit. The sum of those amounts was less than the landlord's allowed claim under section 502(b)(6). The court reduced the landlord's unsecured claim not only by the amount of the cash security deposit, but also by the amount of the letter of credit draw. Although the issuing bank's obligation to the landlord under the letter of credit is independent of the debtor's obligation to the landlord for breach of the lease, the debtor's pledge of cash to the issuing bank resulted in property of the estate being used to satisfy the landlord's claim. A long and thoughtful concurrence argues that the court improperly focused on the landlord's remedy and that the proper analysis is to apply section 502(b)(6) only to limit the estate's exposure. It also traces the effect of an amendment to UCC Article 5 that may treat the issuing bank's reimbursement claim the same as the claim of a guarantor or other secondarily liable entity, which would support the court's ruling. Redback Networks, Inc. v. Mayan Networks Corp. (In re Mayan Networks Corp.), 306 B.R. 295 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).

6.1.iiiiiii Secured tax claim allowed, based on value of debtor's use of property. The debtor owed substantial personal property taxes on equipment it used in the operation of its business. The taxes were secured by the equipment, which was also encumbered by other liens in excess of its value. The debtor in possession operated its business for a short while postpetition and sold its business, including the equipment, but for less than enough to pay off all secured claims, including the secured tax claims. Section 502(b)(3) disallows a secured property tax claim to the extent that the claim "exceeds the value of the interest of the estate in such property." The section is designed to prevent a windfall to a secured creditor, whose lien would otherwise be subject to the secured tax claim, and to prevent a concomitant disadvantage to general unsecured creditors. In this case, however, the court construes "the interest of the estate in such property" broadly to include the benefit the estate received from postpetition operation and from sale of the equipment as part of an operating business and allows the tax claim as a general unsecured claim, even though the debtor did not have equity in the property. In re Precision Concepts, Inc., 305 B.R. 438 (M.D.N.C. 2004).

6.1.jjjjjjj Consideration paid for transferred claim need not be disclosed. The creditor had acquired two claims before proofs of claim had been filed. The creditor filed the proofs of claim. The debtor in possession objected to the claims on the ground that the creditor did not disclose the consideration paid for the claims. Such disclosure is irrelevant to the allowance of a claim that has been transferred before the proof of claim has been filed. Bankruptcy Rule 3001(e)(1), which governs transfer of claims before a proof is filed, does not require disclosure of the consideration paid, as do Rules 3001(e)(3) and 3001(3)(4) (governing transfers of claims for security). Thus, the claims should be allowed without the disclosure. Resurgent Capital Servs. v. Burnett (In re Burnett), 306 B.R. 313 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).

6.1.kkkkkkk Letter of credit beneficiary does not hold a secured claim. To protect its claim against the debtor in prepetition state court litigation, the creditor obtained an order from the state court requiring the debtor to post a letter of credit. When the letter of credit was about to expire post-bankruptcy before the condition to its draw (a state court decision on the merits) had been met, the creditor sought an order requiring the debtor in possession to obtain a renewal or extension of the letter of credit. The creditor argued that it was entitled to adequate protection of its interest under the letter of credit, which it would not receive if the letter of credit expired before resolution of the state court litigation. The Second Circuit concludes that the creditor is not entitled to adequate protection. Adequate protection is available only to a holder of a secured claim, that is, a creditor whose claim is secured by an interest in property of the debtor. A letter of credit is not such an interest. In re Dairy Mart Convenience Stores, Inc., 351 F.3d 86 (2d Cir. 2003).

6.1.iiiii Debtor may not strip off a valueless junior lien. Following the Supreme Court’s reasoning in Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410 (1992), the Sixth Circuit joins the Fourth Circuit in holding that a chapter 7 debtor may not strip off a valueless junior lien. The Sixth Circuit notes the extensive split among the lower courts on this issue, but follows the only other court of appeals to have decided it. Talbert v. Citi Mortgages Services (In re Talbert), 344 F.3d 555 (6th Cir. 2003).

6.1.mmmmm True lease or security interest? The debtor had entered into an agreement for the counterparty to install energy saver light fixtures. The debtor would pay the counterparty over a period of up to eight years based on the expected energy cost savings. At the end of the term of the agreement, the counterparty had the option of removing the equipment and replacing it with equipment comparable to the prior equipment originally, abandoning the equipment or negotiating with the debtor for an additional lease term or for a buyout. The cost of removal would have exceeded the value of the equipment removed. After bankruptcy, the debtor sought to recharacterize the agreement as a disguised security interest, while the counterparty sought treatment as a lessor. The court determines the transaction is a disguised security interest. It relies on the 1995 version of section 1-201(37) of the UCC. The agreement does not meet the bright line test for recharacterization of a security interest, because the lease term does not exceed the useful life of the equipment, the debtor does not have a nominal purchase or re-lease option, and the debtor is not contractually bound to renew the lease or to become the owner of the goods. Nevertheless, because the economics and the lease negotiation dynamics dictate that counterparty must abandon the equipment at the end of the lease term, the court determines that the transaction is a disguised security interest. The court notes the departure in the 1995 version of the UCC from the “intent of the parties” test to the “economic realities of the transaction” test. The court discounts the importance of the accounting and tax treatment of the transaction. Duke Energy Royal, LLC v. Pillowtex Corp. (In re Pillowtex, Inc.), 349 F.3d 711 (3d Cir. 2003).

6.1.nnnnn Treatment under section 365 requires “true lease.” To finance improvements in various municipal airports, the debtor entered into lease-leaseback transactions, under which it leased its airport facility to a municipal agency. The municipal agency issued tax-exempt bonds, the proceeds of which were used to construct improvements on the airport property. The agency then leased the property back to the debtor for rental payments equal to the debt service payments on the municipal bonds. The leaseback terminated upon payment of the bonds. The leasebacks were not true leases, because the municipal agency did not have any of the benefits or risks of ownership at the end of the leaseback term. Accordingly, section 365 did not apply. United Airlines, Inc. v. HCS Bank USA (In re UAL Corp.), 307 B.R. 618 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2004), rev’d, 317 B.R. 335 (N.D. Ill. 2004).

6.1.ooooo Court allows undersecured property tax claim under section 502(b)(3). The debtor owed substantial personal property taxes on equipment it used in the operation of its business. The taxes were secured by the equipment, which was also encumbered by liens in excess of its value. The debtor in possession operated for a short while postpetition and then sold its business, including the equipment, but for less than enough to pay all secured claims, including the secured tax claims. Section 502(b)(3) disallows a secured property tax claim to the extent that the claim “exceeds the value of the interest of the estate in such property.” The section is designed to prevent a windfall to a secured creditor, whose lien would otherwise be subject to the secured tax claim, and to prevent a concomitant disadvantage to general unsecured creditors. In this case, however, the court construes “the interests of the estate in such property” broadly to include the benefit the estate received from postpetition operation and from sale of the equipment as part of an operating business and allows the tax claim as a general unsecured claim, even though the debtor did not have equity in the property. In re Precision Concepts, Inc., 305 B.R. 438 (M.D.N.C. 2004).

6.1.pppppppp Pay in lieu of notice is subject to one year salary cap. After bankruptcy, the trustee terminated two executives, whose employment contracts provided for two years’ severance pay plus a requirement for 90 days’ notice of termination without cause or 90 days’ salary in lieu of notice. The claim for 90 days’ pay in lieu of notice was equally subject to the one-year cap on damages for termination of an employment agreement under section 502(b)(7). The claim is for amounts that are accelerated or become due by reason of termination, rather than “unpaid compensation due under such contract, without acceleration.” Harrington v. Dornier Aviation (North America), Inc. (In re Dornier Aviation (North America), Inc.), 305 B.R. 650 (E.D. Va. 2004).

6.1.qqqqqqqq Bank is not liable for aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty. A closely held corporation’s owners fraudulently inflated the corporation’s revenues and its accounts receivable after the bank opened its revolving credit line. The bank became suspicious and demanded that the corporation refinance the line. The corporation borrowed additional funds from its existing noteholders, which were used to repay the bank. The trustee in bankruptcy sought recovery from the bank for the insiders’ breach of fiduciary duty to the corporation, alleging that the bank aided and abetted the fraud by participating in or encouraging the fraud on the corporation and the noteholders. The bank claimed that its sole participation in the refinancing was to demand that the corporation obtain new financing, to avoid telephone inquiries from the noteholders, and to consent to the refinancing, as required under the loan agreement, and that it did not immediately call its loan when it suspected fraud. Such conduct did not rise to the level of aiding and abetting. Because a lender is not a fiduciary to its borrower, the bank had no obligation to put the corporation’s interests ahead of its own in attempting to stop the fraud, which thereby might have prevented the repayment of the bank. In addition, the bank’s consent to the new borrowing did not impose an affirmative duty to protect either the corporation or the new lenders from the owners’ fraud. Accordingly, the complaint was dismissed. Sharp Int’l Corp. v. State Street Bank and Trust Co. (In re Sharp Int’l Corp.), 302 B.R. 760 (E.D.N.Y. 2003).

6.1.rrrrrrrr Mandatorily redeemable preferred stock and warrants are equity interests. The debtor had issued mandatorily redeemable preferred stock and warrants to purchase preferred stock, which became redeemable shortly after the debtor filed its chapter 11 petition. The holders had given notice of redemption shortly before bankruptcy and asserted that their right to payment was a claim, not an equity interest. The court disallows the claim. Reading the definition of “equity security” closely, the court concludes that a right to sell an equity security is an equity interest and that the equity characteristics of the interest prevail over the claim status of the same interest. Carrieri v. Jobs.com Inc., 301 B.R. 187 (N.D. Tex. 2003).

6.1.ssssssss A bar date order does not trump section 1111(a). The court issued a bar date order requiring all creditors to file proofs of claim. Neither the order nor the notice to creditors specifically stated that creditors whose claims were deemed filed under section 1111(a) (listed on the schedules as liquidated, undisputed, and not contingent) also needed to file proofs of claim by the bar date. Because the notice was not clear, the creditors’ claims were deemed filed, despite the bar date order. However, the court questions whether such a bar date order, which might be inconsistent with section 1111(a) and with Bankruptcy Rule 3003, would ever be permitted. ATD Corp. Advantage Packaging, Inc. (In re ATD Corp.), 352 F.3d 1062 (6th Cir. 2003).

- 6.1.tttttttt Post confirmation claim objection is permitted. The plan provided for a deadline for objections to claims 60 days after the effective date. The debtor in possession objected to the creditor's claim 30 days after confirmation. The bankruptcy court overruled the objection on the grounds that confirmation had resolved the claim. The court of appeals reverses, holding that the plan bar date provision is binding. Unless the evidence in support of confirmation relied on the validity of the claim, confirmation does not determine the allowability of the claim, and the debtor in possession may object within the time provided in the plan. In re Hovis, 356 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2004).
- 6.1.uuuuuuuu Rabbi Trust assets are not subject to creditor's security interest. A "rabbi trust" protects an executive by a deposit in a trust for her benefit of cash or cash equivalents sufficient to pay specified executive compensation benefits such as severance. The executive does not receive a security interest or other specific right to the trust assets, so as to prevent taxable constructive receipt of the funds. Still, she can be assured that the money is available in the event that the corporation, for whatever reason (such as parting on bad terms or a change of control) chooses not to pay the benefit. The funds in the trust remain subject to the claims of the corporation's creditors. The IRS' "Model Rabbi Trust" form states that the assets are subject to the claims of "general creditors," which probably means unsecured creditors. In a case of apparent first impression involving a corporation that had used the IRS Model Rabbi Trust form, the Seventh Circuit ruled that the trust assets are not subject to a security interest of a creditor secured by "general intangibles." Bank of America, N.A. v. Moglia, 330 F.3d 942 (7th Cir. 2003).
- 6.1.vvvvvvvv Secured creditor need not file fee application to recover attorneys fees. A secured creditor seeking attorneys fees under section 506(b) may include the amount in its proof of claim, even if the fees are incurred postpetition, and need not file a fee application under Bankruptcy Rule 2016. Atwood v. Chase Manhattan Mortgage Co. (In re Atwood), 293 B.R. 227 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 6.1.wwwwwwww Employment termination damage claim not limited by prepetition payments. Section 502(b)(7) limits the claim of an employee for breach of an employment contract to the extent the claim exceeds "the compensation provided by such contract ... for one year following the earlier of the date of the filing of the petition or the [termination] date" plus any unpaid compensation due on the earlier of those dates. In this case, the executive had been terminated several years before bankruptcy and had been receiving payments under the termination provision of his employment contract. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, approximately one year's salary was still owing. The court separates the measurement of the cap from the calculation of the damage claim. It rules that the court must first determine the allowable claim and then must calculate the cap in a mechanical fashion and apply the cap to the damage claim. As a result, it doesn't matter how much of the employee's damage claim has been paid before bankruptcy. The Code applies the cap only to the amount allowable as of the date of bankruptcy. In addition, a letter of credit available to the employee is irrelevant in determining the amount of the cap, even though the draw on the letter of credit occurred after bankruptcy. Finally, "compensation" includes salary as well as other benefits. Young v. Condor Systems, Inc. (In re Condor Systems, Inc.), 296 B.R. 5 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 6.1.xxxxxxxx Non-repayment of avoidable transfer does not require disallowance of administrative claim. Section 502(d) requires disallowance of a claim, "notwithstanding subsection (a) or (b) of this section" if the claimant received an avoidable transfer and has not returned it to the estate. Taking sides in the split among the courts that have ruled on this issue and listing the cases on both sides, the court rules that section 502(d) does not require disallowance of an administrative claim. The court analyzes the structure of the statute, concluding that section 502(d) applies only to allowance of claims under section 502, not allowance of administrative expenses under section 503. Beasley Forest Products, Inc. v. Durango Georgia Paper Co. (In re Durango Georgia Paper Co.), 297 B.R. 326 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2003).

- 6.1.yyyyyyyy Bankruptcy court may deny claims transfer on equitable grounds. The bankruptcy court does not need to approve a request for issuance of a notice of transfer of claim under Bankruptcy Rule 3001(e). In this case, the transferee's inequitable conduct in obtaining the claim could have given the bankruptcy court grounds to deny the transfer. Bevin v. SoCal Communications Sites, LLC (In re Bevin), 327 F.3d 994 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 6.1.zzzzzzzz Creditor did not demonstrate that yield maintenance premium was reasonable. The creditor's 20 year loan provided a fixed yield maintenance premium of approximately 18% of the principal balance, regardless of any change in interest rates between the date of the loan and the date of pre-payment. The district court construes such a yield maintenance premium as a penalty, rather than a liquidated damages clause, because the creditor did not make any showing of any actual loss suffered or anticipated as a result of the pre-payment. As a result, the yield maintenance premium was not a reasonable fee allowable under section 506(b). In re Schwegmann Giant Supermarkets, 287 B.R. 649 (E.D. La. 2002).
- 6.1.aaaaaaaa Court disallows prepayment penalty. The debtor issued an eight-year note to the secured creditor. The note provided for an increase in the interest rate of five percent upon default and a prepayment penalty based on the difference between the note interest rate and the interest rate on comparable maturity treasuries. The court disallows the prepayment penalty on the ground that the return on short-term treasuries is not an accurate measure of the current market interest rate for the type of commercial loan that a commercial lender is likely to make. In addition, the high default interest rate that the creditor received and the presence of junior lienors who would be damaged led the court to conclude that it would be inequitable to allow the lender the prepayment penalty. Sachs Electric Co. v. Bridge Information Systems, Inc. (In re Bridge Information Systems, Inc.), 288 B.R. 556 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2002).
- 6.1.bbbbbbbbbb Letter of credit proceeds reduce section 502(b)(6) cap. The landlord had received, in lieu of a security deposit, a letter of credit. The landlord drew on the letter of credit before bankruptcy but after the landlord accepted surrender of the premises. Because the letter of credit operated in the place of a security deposit, and because security deposits are deducted from a landlord's allowed claim after applying the section 502(b)(6) cap, the proceeds of the letter of credit would be applied against the landlord's capped claim, leaving the landlord an unsecured claim for only the balance. The court of appeals notes that any other rule could permit an end run around section 502(b)(6). Solow v. PPI Enterprizes (U.S.), Inc. (In re PPI Enterprizes (U.S.), Inc.), 324 F.3d 197 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 6.1.ccccccccc One-year limitation in section 502(b)(6) relates to the year immediately following the petition. Section 502(b)(6) limits the claim of a landlord for damages resulting from a termination of a lease to "the rent reserved by such lease . . . for . . . one year . . . following the earlier of" the petition and the date of repossession or surrender. In this case, the landlord argues that the measure should be the average one year's rent over the remaining term of the lease. The court does not agree, holding that the measure is the rent reserved for the one year immediately following the trigger date, even though that period may overlap with the period of administration of the case for which the trustee paid rent. In re USInternetworking, Inc., 291 B.R. 378 (Bankr. D. Md. 2003).

- 6.1.ddddddddd Joint tort feaser may not subrogate to victims' claim. Celotex and Fibreboard were held jointly liable in asbestos litigation. While the judgments were on appeal, Fibreboard purchased the victims' claims at a discount, obtaining a full release of Fibreboard. Fibreboard filed the claims in the Celotex chapter 11 case, seeking subrogation under section 509 rather than contribution under section 502(e). The court rules that Fibreboard is not entitled to subrogation under section 509 because it cannot be subrogated for paying its own debts. Celotex Corp. v. Allstate Ins. Co. (In re Celotex Corp.), 289 B.R. 460 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2003).
- 6.1.eeeeeeeee Section 502(e) disallowance does not apply when the principal creditor has waived its claim. The debtor and a co-debtor were obligated to the state under CERCLA. The co-debtor settled with the state and agreed to clean up a polluted site. As part of the settlement, the state agreed not to pursue any claims against the debtor. When the co-debtor filed its claim against the debtor, the debtor objected to allowance under section 502(e) on the ground that the co-debtor had not yet satisfied its claim to the state in full. In a case of apparent first impression, the bankruptcy court overrules the debtor's objection and allows the co-debtor's claim, concluding that there is no difference between the co-debtors satisfaction of the state's claim and the state's waiver of the claim against the debtor. In re Laidlaw USA, Inc., 287 B.R. 603 (Bankr. W.D.N.Y. 2002).
- 6.1.fffffff Disallowance of late filed claim does not avoid lien. Section 506(d)(2) voids a lien to the extent that it secures a claim that is not an allowed secured claim, "unless such claim is not an allowed secured claim due only to the failure of any entity to file proof of such claim." In this case, the creditor filed a proof of claim late. The bankruptcy court disallowed the claim but refused to void the lien. The Fourth Circuit, joining the Eighth and Eleventh Circuits, affirms, reasoning that a creditor should not be penalized more for filing a late claim than for not filing a claim at all. Hamlett v. AmSouth Bank (In re Hamlett), 322 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 2003).
- 6.1.ggggggggg Interest rate swap termination damages are not unmatured interest. Affirming the district court's decision, the Ninth Circuit rules that termination damages under an interest rate swap between the debtor and the lead lender on the debtor's credit line did not amount to unmatured interest that should be disallowed under section 502(b)(2). The court adopted the opinion of the district court, which found that the loan agreement and the swap agreement were not tied together and so should not be integrated. The court also ruled that the CFTC's exemption of swaps from bucket shop laws applied retroactively to this transaction, which was entered into before the regulations were promulgated. Thrifty Oil Co. v. Bank of America N.T. & S.A. (In re Thrifty Oil Co.), 310 F.3d 1188 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 6.1.hhhhhhhhh Yield maintenance premium allowed. The creditor's loan was accelerated pre-petition, which triggered the debtors obligation for a yield maintenance premium. The court finds the yield maintenance premium enforceable as a liquidated damages provision under New York law and rules that it is an allowable claim, because if it was owing as of the petition date, even though the plan did not propose pre-payment and instead proposed reinstatement of the note for the original term at the interest rate contained in the note. In addition, because the debtor was solvent, the court rules that the plan does not meet the best interest test of section 1129(a)(7) unless it pays the yield maintenance premium, because upon a liquidation, the loan would have been repaid in full, with the yield maintenance premium, because a liquidation would have resulted in a prepayment. In re Vanderveer Estates Holdings, Inc., 283 B.R. 122 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2002).
- 6.1.iiiiiii Receipt of unreturned preference precludes allowance of administrative claim. Section 502(d) requires disallowance of any claim of an entity that received a voidable transfer who has not returned the transfer. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. rules that this disallowance provision applies as well to administrative claims. Even though the provision is in section 502, which deals only with pre-petition claims, the provision uses the word "claim" which is not limited to pre-petition claim. The B.A.P. dismisses any argument that the ruling will discourage pre-petition creditors from providing post-petition goods or services to a debtor-in-possession, on the theory that the pre-petition creditor would be liable for the preference in any event, but does not discuss whether the preference liability and the administrative claim may be offset. MicroAge, Inc. v. Viewsonic Corp. (In re MicroAge, Inc.), 284 B.R. 914 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).

6.1.jjjjjjjj Unclaimed funds under section 347(a) do not bear interest. The liquidating trustee's check to the creditor was not cashed within 90 days, so the trustee deposited it into the bankruptcy court as required under section 347(a). When the creditor sought recovery, he claimed interest on the funds. The Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit rules that the creditor is not entitled to interest, because the bankruptcy court did not invest the funds at interest and was under no obligation to do so. Therefore, the general rule that "interest follows the principle" does not apply. Leider v. United States, 301 F.3d 1290 (Fed. Cir. 2002).

6.1.kkkkkkkkk "Legal rate" means federal judgment rate. The creditor obtained a pre-petition judgment against the debtor in state court, forcing the debtor into bankruptcy. The debtor's chapter 11 plan provided for payment of post-petition interest on the claim at the federal judgment rate under 28 U.S.C. § 1961(a), rather than the judgment rate provided for under state law. Focusing only on section 726(a)(5), which requires "payment of interest at the legal rate" in a solvent chapter 7 case, the Ninth Circuit rules that the "legal rate" is the federal judgment rate, rather than the state law judgment rate, even in a chapter 11 case. Onink v. Cardelucci (In re Cardelucci), 285 F.3d 1231 (9th Cir. 2002).

6.1.lllllllll Property tax claim limited by section 502(b)(3). The state assessed personal property taxes of $81,000 against the debtor's assets for 1998 and 1999. After the taxes were assessed, the debtor filed bankruptcy. At the time of the bankruptcy, the debtor's personal property was worth only $58,000. The tax claim was limited to $58,000, equal to the gross value of the property, rather than being prorated across all of the property on which the tax was assessed. Universal Seismic Associates, Inc. v. Harris County (In re Universal Seismic Associates, Inc.), 288 F.3d 205 (5th Cir. 2002).

6.1.mmmmmmmmm Letter of credit bank is not subrogated to creditor's non-dischargeable claim. The creditor obtained a fraud judgment against the debtor in state court before bankruptcy. To obtain a stay pending appeal, the debtor posted a bond and obtained a letter of credit payable to the bonding company to secure the debtor's reimbursement obligation to the surety. The underlying creditor obtained a judgment from the bankruptcy court that the state court judgment was non-dischargeable, and the state court of appeal ultimately affirmed the liability. After the bonding company paid the defrauded creditor and drew under the letter of credit, the letter of credit bank asked the bankruptcy court to hold that the letter of credit reimbursement obligation was also non-dischargeable, on the ground that the bank subrogated to the creditor's claim. The Ninth Circuit rules that section 509(a) of the Bankruptcy Code does not provide statutory subrogation: the bank was not liable with the debtor on the claim, because the letter of credit obligation was independent of the debtor's obligation. The court also denies equitable subrogation for the same reason. The court reasons that the bank was not a victim of the debtor's fraud but was rather a contractual creditor, whose claim should be discharged. Hamada v. Far East National Bank (In re Hamada), 291 F.3d 645 (9th Cir. 2002).

6.1.nnnnnnnnn Case dismissal vacates claim disallowance order. Although the creditor had obtained a state court judgment against the debtor, the bankruptcy court disallowed the creditor's proof of claim on the grounds that the creditor corporation had been suspended by the Secretary of State. The bankruptcy court thereafter dismissed the chapter 11 case. After the creditor attempted to execute on the state court judgment, the debtor filed another chapter 11 case and sought disallowance, on the grounds that the prior order of disallowance in the prior chapter 11 case was binding. Relying on section 349, the district court holds that the dismissal of the prior case vacated the order disallowing the claim, so that it was not binding in the subsequent case. Mirzai v. Kolbe Foods, Inc. (In re Mirzai), 271 B.R. 647 (C.D. Cal. 2001).

- 6.1.00000000 Yield maintenance premium is disallowed. The debtor filed its chapter 11 petition when it was not in default to its secured creditor. The creditor moved to compel sale of the assets securing its $8.4 million loan and then claimed a pre-payment penalty of $1.3 million upon the sale of the asset and pre-payment of the loan. The court rules first that the allowance of a pre-payment penalty is an issue of federal law under section 502(b) ("reasonable fees, costs, or charges provided for under the agreement . . ."). Second, the court disallows the pre-payment penalty as unreasonable and inequitable on the grounds that the debtor did not seek pre-payment but was rather forced into it by the creditor's motion to compel sale of the property. In re Schwegmann Giant Supermarkets Partnership, 264 B.R. 823 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2001).
- 6.1.ppppppppp Bankruptcy court may recharacterize debt as equity. Although some courts have ruled that the bankruptcy court does not have authority to disallow a claim other than through express provisions of the Bankruptcy Code authorizing disallowance, the Sixth Circuit rules that the bankruptcy court has the authority to recharacterize debt as equity under the court's equitable powers to test the validity of a debt. Moreover, the bankruptcy court may use the factors developed under the tax law to determine whether a claim should be recharacterized. Bayer Corp. v. Mascotech, Inc. (In re Autostyle Plastics, Inc.), 269 F.3d 726 (6th Cir. 2001).
- 6.1.qqqqqqqqq Bank participation agreements defined. The shareholders advanced funds to the debtors' principal secured lender in exchange for subordinated participation agreements in the creditors revolving credit facility. A junior secured creditor challenged the validity of the shareholders' claims against the corporation's assets. The Sixth Circuit rules that the shareholders were parties to true participation agreements and that their claims, through the lead lender, were allowable and took priority over the secured claim of the junior secured creditor. In so doing, the Sixth Circuit adopts a four-part definition of a true participation agreement: (1) money is advanced by a participant to a lead lender; (2) the participant's right to repayment arises only when the lead lender is paid; (3) only the lead lender can seek legal recourse against the debtor; and (4) the document evidences the parties' true intentions. Bayer Corp. v. Mascotech, Inc. (In re Autostyle Plastics, Inc.), 269 F.3d 726 (6th Cir. 2001).
- 6.1.rrrrrrrrr Interest for a pre-petition period that is awarded post-petition is not unmaturred interest. The creditor sued the debtor on a breach of contract claim two years before the petition date and was awarded judgment, including interest from the date of breach, after the petition date. The trustee objected to the allowance of the interest attributable to the pre-petition period under section 502(b)(2), which disallows a claim for "unmaturred interest" as of the petition date. The bankruptcy court allows the claim on the ground that the interest was contingent but matured as of the petition date and became fixed upon the awarding of judgment. In re Lamarre, 269 B.R. 266 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2001).
- 6.1.sssssssss Bankruptcy court may not estimate administrative claims under section 502(c). By its terms, section 502(c) applies only to prepetition claims, although some courts have permitted estimation to be used in the context of administrative claims. The First Circuit B.A.P. rules that estimation of an administrative claim under section 502(c) defeats the rights of an administrative claimant, whose claim must be determined under section 503. What is more, because the claim was an administrative tax claim, section 505 provides the exclusive procedure for determining the allowability of the claim. United States v. Sterling Consulting Corp. (In re Indian Motorcycle Co., Inc.), 261 B.R. 800 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

- 6.1.tttttttt Non-return of avoided preference does not require disallowance of administrative expense claim. The debtor in possession avoided preferences to a prepetition creditor who had also provided postpetition services. The debtor sought to disallow the creditor's administrative expense claim under section 502(d), which requires disallowance of a claim by an entity that has received and not returned a voidable transfer. The bankruptcy court rules that section 506(d) does not apply to the allowance or disallowance of administrative expense claims, which are creatures of the bankruptcy law that are unique and differ from prepetition claims dealt with by section 502. Camelot Music, Inc. v. MHW Advertising and Public Relations, Inc. (In re CM Holdings, Inc.), 264 B.R. 141 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001).
- 6.1.uuuuuuuuu Disallowance under section 502(d) does not require finding of liability to return a voided transfer. Section 502(d) requires the court to disallow the claim of a recipient of an avoidable transfer unless the creditor returns the property for which it is liable. In this case, the tax lien of the city of El Paso was avoidable under section 545, but the debtor did not seek avoidance or recovery of the lien. When the debtor objected to the claim under section 502(d), the city argued that it had not been found liable to release the tax lien, so section 502(d) did not apply. The Ninth Circuit reads the "unless" clause as a savings clause only and does not require a finding of liability for return and refusal to return before the claim must be disallowed. El Paso v. America West Airlines, Inc. (In re America West Airlines, Inc.), 217 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 6.1.vvvvvvvvv A tort claim does not arise until there is harm. A manufacturer sold pipe which burst long after the manufacturer's bankruptcy. The pipe purchaser did not have a claim that would be subject to the bar date at the time of bankruptcy. Fogel v. Zell, 221 F.3d 955 (7th Cir. 2000).
- 6.1.wwwwwwwww "Mello-Roos" bondholders are not creditors. Under California law, a city may issue bonds to finance development of real property. The city pays the bond's solely from a special tax assessment on the real property. Because the bondholders have a claim only against the city, which has a claim only for the tax revenues (secured by a tax lien) on the real property, the bondholders are not "creditors" whose rights can be modified under a chapter 11 plan. Ritter Ranch Development, L.L.C. v. City of Palmdale (In re Ritter Ranch Development, L.L.C.), 255 B.R. 760 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2000).
- 6.1.xxxxxxxxx Burden of proof on tax claims does not shift in bankruptcy. State law imposed the burden of proof on the taxpayers for a sales and use tax. The taxing agency filed a proof of claim. The trustee filed an objection but came forward with little evidence to refute the claim. Because the burden of proof is a part of the substantive tax law, it does not shift upon the filing of the bankruptcy. The trustee did not meet his burden, so the claim was allowed. Raleigh v. Illinois Dept. of Revenue, 120 S. Ct. 1951 (2000).
- 6.1.yyyyyyyyy Loan participant does not have a claim against the debtor. A bank purchased a 22.5% participation interest in a letter of credit facility originated by another bank and asserted a direct claim against the borrower/debtor when it filed its chapter 11 case. Distinguishing among a participation agreement, an interbank loan, and a syndication agreement, the court ruled that a participation agreement gives the participant a claim only against the originating bank, not against the debtor, despite language in the participation agreement under which the originating bank "sells" and the participating bank "purchases" an interest in the loan. In re Okura and Co. (America), Inc., 249 B.R. 596 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2000).
- 6.1.zzzzzzzzz A "keep-well" is not a guarantee. The shareholders agreed to provide adequate capital to support payments on the note to the creditor. The shareholders failed to do so, and the creditors sued. The Second Circuit holds that the keep-well is not a guarantee, but the creditor has a contract damage claim against the shareholders for the amounts that he may have lost as a result of their failure to provide adequate capital to the corporation to pay the note. Terwilliger v. Terwilliger, 206 F. 3d 240 (2d Cir. 2000).

- 6.1.aaaaaaaa Interest rate swap termination damages are not unmatured interest. Affirming the bankruptcy court’s decision, the district court rules that termination damages under an interest rate swap between the debtor and the lead lender on the debtor’s credit line did not amount to unmatured interest that should be disallowed under section 502(b)(2). The court found that the loan agreement and the swap agreement were not tied together and so should not be integrated. The court also ruled that the CFTC’s exemption of swaps from bucket shop laws applied retroactively to this transaction, which was entered into before the regulations were promulgated. Thrifty Oil Co. v. Bank of America N.T. & S.A. (In re Thrifty Oil Co.), 249 B.R. 537 (S.D. Cal. 2000).
- 6.1.bbbbbbbbbb Objection of proof of claim must be served on corporate officer. The debtor filed an objection to a proof of claim and served the objection on the address shown in the proof of claim under the block entitled “name and address where notices should be sent.” The bankruptcy court rules that service of the objection was inadequate. Bankruptcy Rule 9014 makes an objection to a proof of claim a contested matter. Rule 7004 governs service in a contested matter and requires service on a corporate officer, managing or general agent, or agent for service of process. Boykin v. Marriott International, Inc. (In re Boykin), 246 B.R. 825 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2000).
- 6.1.cccccccccc Subordination agreement applies to section 1111(b) deficiency claim. Rejecting an argument that the Rule of Explicitness requires a subordination agreement to provide expressly for the subordination of the junior creditor’s artificial deficiency claim created under section 1111(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, the court holds that the deficiency claim is subordinated to the same extent as the principal recourse secured claim. Bank of America, N.A. v. North LaSalle St. Ltd. Partnership (In re 203 N. LaSalle St. Ltd. Partnership), 246 B.R. 325 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2000).
- 6.1.dddddddddd Claim for partnership interest is not discharged. A former general partner sought reinstatement of its partnership interest in the discharged debtor. Because monetary damages would not be an alternative remedy for the former partner, the Third Circuit holds that the partner’s state court proceeding for reinstatement did not assert a “claim” that was discharged in the partnership’s chapter 11 case. In re Ben Franklin Hotel Associates, 186 F.3d 301 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 6.1.eeeeeeeeee A subsequent transferee of a preference does not have a claim against the debtor. After the debtor-in-possession recovered a preference from a subsequent transferee, the subsequent transferee asserted a claim under section 502(h). The claim was disallowed, on the grounds that the debtor never owed the subsequent transferee any money. Southmark Corp. v. Schulte, Roth & Zabel, L.L.P., 242 B.R. 330 (N.D. Tex. 1999).
- 6.1.fffffff Administrative claimant does not have standing to surcharge secured creditor’s collateral. The secured creditor took all assets of this failed chapter 11 debtor, leaving an administrative claimant unpaid. The claimant sought to surcharge the secured creditor’s collateral for the benefit the claimant had rendered to the collateral. Departing from the ruling of four other circuits and its own prior panel ruling, the Eighth Circuit en banc holds that only the trustee has standing to surcharge a secured creditor collateral under section 506(c). Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Magna Bank N.A. (In re Hen House Interstate, Inc.), 176 F.3d 719 (8th Cir. 1999).
- 6.1.gggggggggg Landlord damages cap applies to claim against a guarantor. In a case of first impression, the Ninth Circuit rules that the landlord damages cap of section 502(b)(6) applies to the claim of the landlord against a debtor guarantor of the lease, even if the guarantor is solvent. Arden v. Motel Partners (In re Arden), 176 F.3d 1226 (9th Cir. 1999).

6.1.hhhhhhhhhh Employee damages cap does not apply to a claim against a guarantor. The individual debtor was held jointly liable in state court for breach of an employment agreement between the creditor and the debtor's wholly-owned corporation. The Fifth Circuit rules that the employee damages cap of section 502(b)(7) does not apply to limit the employee's claim in the bankruptcy case of the debtor, whom the court analogizes to a guarantor on these facts. Hall v. Goforth (In re Goforth), 179 F.3d 390 (5th Cir. 1999).

6.1.iiiiiiiiii Senior lienor is entitled to interest from a junior lienor on wrongful payment of cash collateral. Despite the IRS's senior lien on the debtor's assets, cash collateral was paid to the junior bank lender, largely because the IRS was not given notice of the intention to pay the cash collateral to the bank. On the IRS's action against the bank and the debtor for payover of the wrongfully diverted cash collateral, the district court awarded the IRS principal and interest to the date of payment against the bank. The district court also holds that notice of the case was not adequate notice of the subsequent proceedings in which the court authorized the payment of the cash collateral to the bank. United States v. National Westminster Bank USA (In re Q-C Circuits Corp.), 231 B.R. 506 (E.D.N.Y. 1999).

6.1.jjjjjjjjjj Property tax claim allowed to the full value of the debtor's property. A creditor secured by property subject to an ad valorem tax objected to the allowance of the tax under section 502(b)(3), which disallows a property tax "to the extent that . . . such claim exceeds the value of the interest of the estate in such property." The court holds that the phrase refers to the value of the entire property, not just the debtor's equity, and allows the tax claim. In re Milit, Inc., 231 B.R. 604 (Bankr. W.D. Tx. 1999).

6.1.kkkkkkkkkk Proof of claim required in chapter 12. Even though the chapter 12 plan listed the creditor and the undisputed amount and provided for payment, the claim was disallowed because the creditor did not timely file a proof of claim. Reliance on the plan provision did not constitute excusable neglect or meet any of the exceptions to timely filing a proof of claim under Bankruptcy Rule 3002(c). Thus, the confirmation of the plan was not res judicata on the allowance of the claim. In re Greenig, 152 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 1998).

6.1.iiiiiiiii First claim purchaser's rights defeat second claim purchaser. Several trade creditors sold their claims to two different purchasers. The second purchaser purchased the claims and filed a notice of claims transfer with the bankruptcy court under Bankruptcy Rule 3001(e) before the first purchaser filed the notice. Nevertheless, the first purchaser's rights defeated the second purchaser. The claims register is not a notice system for recording interest in claims, and once the original creditors sold the claims to the first purchaser, they had nothing to transfer to the second purchaser. In re The Celotex Corp., 224 B.R. 853 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1998).

6.1.mmmmmmmmmm Default rate interest allowed on reinstated claim. The plan proposed reinstatement of the oversecured creditor's claim but did not specifically refer to section 1124(2) or the cure and de-acceleration provided in that section. As a result, interest was allowed at the higher default rate. Southland Corporation v. Toronto-Dominion (In re Southland Corporation), 160 F.3d 1054 (5th Cir. 1998).

6.1.nnnnnnnnnn Deferred compensation claim is not subject to one-year cap on employment contract damages. The employee voluntarily resigned three years before bankruptcy. Because the debtor refused to pay deferred compensation owing under the employee's contract, the employee sued and obtained a state court judgment for deferred compensation and attorney's fees. The claim was allowable in full. It did not come within the restrictions of section 502(b)(7), which restricts damages for termination of an employment contract, because the employee was not an “employee” at the time of the breach of contract. Irvine-Pacific Commercial Ins. Brokers, Inc. v. Adams (In re Irvine-Pacific Commercial Ins. Brokers, Inc.), 228 B.R. 245 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).

6.1.000000000 Rents in excess of valuation amount remain subject to a mortgage. The debtor owed $13.4 million, secured by a mortgage. The bankruptcy court valued the property at $10.1 million for purposes of plan confirmation, but denied confirmation and granted relief from the stay. The creditor foreclosed, credit bidding $10.0 million. The Ninth Circuit rules that postpetition rents of $330,000 remain subject to the mortgage, despite the prior valuation, which would have suggested that the credit bid plus $100,000 would have satisfied the secured claim in full. A valuation becomes irrelevant when the purpose of the valuation no longer exists, and Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410 (1992) applies in Chapter 11, so that the mortgage could not be stripped down based on the valuation. Gold Coast Asset Acquisition, L.P. v. 1441 Veterans Street Co. (In re 1441 Veterans Street Co.), 144 F.3d 1288 (9th Cir. 1998).

6.1.pppppppppp An administrative creditor may surcharge a lender’s collateral under section 506(c). The prepetition lender agreed to postpetition financing, based on a budget that included payment of workers’ compensation premiums. When the chapter 11 case failed, the insurance carrier sought to surcharge the collateral to pay unpaid premiums. Following its prior decision in IRS v. Boatmen’s First National Bank, 5 F.3d 1157 (8th Cir. 1993), the Eighth Circuit recognizes the standing of an administrative claimant under section 506(c) to seek surcharge of collateral. However, two judges on the panel, though compelled to follow Boatmen’s, dissented from the principle. As a result, the Eighth Circuit has granted rehearing en banc. Hartford Underwriters Insurance Company v. Magna Bank N.A. (In re Henhouse Interstate, Inc.), 150 F.3d 868 (8th Cir. 1998).

6.1.qqqqqqqqqq A confirmed plan is not res judicata on the allowable amount of a claim. The amount owing on certain priority tax claims was listed as zero in the plan and the disclosure statement. The IRS did not object, but after confirmation sought to hold the debtor liable for the non-dischargeable taxes. The plan was not res judicata on the allowed amount of the claim. The debtor should have used section 505 to determine the amount of the tax claim. IRS v. Taylor (In re Taylor), 132 F.3d 256 (5th Cir. 1998).

6.1.rrrrrrrrrr Deemed allowed claim is res judicata. The secured creditor filed a proof of claim in the debtor’s no asset chapter 7 case. The trustee did not object, so the claim was deemed allowed under section 502(a). In the debtor’s post-bankruptcy action against the creditor, the deemed allowance of the claim was held res judicata, on the grounds that the debtor (not just the trustee) could have objected to the allowance of the claim in the bankruptcy case. Siegel v. Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corp., 143 F.3d 525 (9th Cir. 1998).

6.1.ssssssssss Equipment should be valued “in location.” The creditor had a valid lien on dry-cleaning equipment and the real property lease. In their chapter 13 plan, the debtors proposed a valuation based on separate sales of the equipment and the lease, not as a package. The Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that the value of the equipment and lease in place was the proper measure, relying on its decision in Taffy v. United States (In re Taffy), 96 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. 1996) (en banc) but without citation of Associates Commercial Corp. v. Rash, 117 S. Ct 1879 (1997). Ardmore Vending Co. v. Kim (In re Kim), 130 F.3d 863 (9th Cir. 1997).

6.1.tttttttttt Oversecured creditor is not entitled to contract rate of interest after confirmation. In a chapter 13 case, interest on the oversecured creditor’s claim runs at the contract rate until the date of confirmation of the plan. If the contract rate is higher than the current market rate, then the creditor is entitled to only the current market rate after confirmation, because to give the contract rate would allow the creditor to recover more than the present value of its claim. Key Bank N.A. v. Milham (In re Milham), 141 F.3d 420 (2d Cir. 1998).

- 6.1. uuuuuuuuuu A non-secured creditor may not be surcharged under section 506(c). A subcontractor of the debtor claimed entitlement to a portion of payments the debtor received under his contract with the project owner, under a state trust fund act that provides for such payments to be held in trust for the benefit of subcontractors and suppliers. The bankruptcy court upheld the trust fund claim, but surcharged the subcontractor under section 506(c) for the trustee's expenses in recovering the property. The Sixth Circuit reversed, holding section 506(c) "applies only to secured creditors (which [the subcontractor] was not) and their claims against property of the estate (which [the subcontractor's] money was not). Architectural Building Components v. McClarty (In re Foremost Manufacturing Co.), 137 F.3d 919 (6th Cir. 1998).
- 6.1. vvvvvvvvvv A "make-whole" prepayment penalty is allowed. A prepayment penalty, characterized as a "make-whole" amount, was allowed, even though the debtor had a prepetition right to reduce the amount if the prepetition restructuring agreement had been carried out in full. The court concluded that the restructuring agreement was not an executory contract, that the filing of a bankruptcy was an enforceable event of default under the "make-whole" amount reduction provision, and that the resulting increase in the amount of the allowable claim that occurred primarily because of the filing of the petition should not be equitably subordinated. Anchor Resolution Corp. v. State Street Bank and Trust Co. (In re Anchor Resolution Corp.), 221 B.R. 330 (Bankr. D. Del. 1998). But see In re Public Serv. Co., 114 B.R. 813 (Bankr. D. N.H. 1990) (prepayment penalty disallowed where bondholders demanded that plan pay them in full).
- 6.1. wwwwwwwwww The S.E.C. may be a creditor to enforce a disgorgement judgment. The individual debtor was ordered to pay disgorgement to a receiver for his corporation, which had defrauded investors. The S.E.C. holds a claim for the disgorgement amount and may bring dischargeability litigation against the debtor. Securities Exchange Commission v. Cross (In re Cross), 218 B.R. 76 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).
- 6.1. xxxxxxxxxxx Seniority rights under a collective bargaining agreement are a "claim." By giving a broad reading to the word "claim" in the Bankruptcy Code, the Third Circuit holds that the right of pilots under a collective bargaining agreement to seniority integration upon the merger of Continental Airlines with Eastern Airlines can be satisfied by a monetary award and is therefore an allowable claim that is dischargeable in bankruptcy. Air Line Pilots Association v. Continental Airlines (In re Continental Airlines), 125 F.3d 120 (3d Cir. 1997).
- 6.1. yyyyyyyyyy Bankruptcy Court may not interfere with claims transfer. General partners of the debtor unsuccessfully sought to purchase the debtor's partnership interest from the trustee. The creditors then purchased all of the unsecured claims at a deep discount and moved for dismissal of the case. The Eighth Circuit ruled that in the absence of an objection from the claim transferors, the bankruptcy court must recognize the claims transfer and has no authority to disallow or subordinate the purchased claims. Viking Associates, L.L.C. v. Drewes (In re Olson), 120 F.3d 98 (8th Cir. 1997).
- 6.1. zzzzzzzzzz Interest rate swap upheld. The Bankruptcy Court allows termination damages under an interest-rate swap agreement between the bank and the debtor entered into at the same time as the loan from the bank to the debtor, finding that the termination damages, which are fixed at the date of filing of the petition, are not disallowable as unmatured interest under section 502(b)(2). The court also determines that the interest rate swap does not violate the California Bucket Shop laws. In re Thrifty Oil Company, 212 B.R. 147 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1997).

6.1.aaaaaaaaaa Replacement value standard adopted for plan purposes. The Supreme Court has ruled that the second sentence of section 506(a), which requires that value “be determined in light of the purpose of the valuation and of the proposed disposition or use of such property,” requires that a replacement value standard be used in valuing property for purposes of determining the treatment of a secured claim under a chapter 13 plan (and presumably under any chapter 11 or chapter 12 plan). Associates Commercial Corporation v. Rash, 117 S. Ct. 1879 (1997).

6.1.bbbbbbbbbbb Chapter 12 plan may strip down a lien. In a case of first impression in the courts of appeals, the Eighth Circuit holds that a chapter 12 plan may provide for stripping down an undersecured creditor’s lien to the value of the collateral. The court distinguishes Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410 (1992) as dealing only with section 506(d) in a chapter 7 case and Nobelman v. American Savings Bank, 508 U.S. 324 (1993) as dealing only with the limitation on restructuring a home mortgage in a chapter 13 case. Because the language of chapter 12 is so similar to the comparable language of chapters 11 and 13, this ruling should allow strip down of liens under both of those chapters as well (other than home mortgages in chapter 13). Harmon v. United States, 101 F.3d 574 (8th Cir. 1996).

6.1.cccccccccc Creditor allowed fees for substantial contribution. The Fifth Circuit orders the award of fees and expenses for a substantial contribution, even though the creditor was acting only in its own self-interest, ruling “that a creditor’s motive in taking actions that benefit the estate has little relevance whether the determination whether the creditor has [made] a substantial contribution to a case.” Moreover, the creditor is not required to give advance notice before confirmation of the debtor’s plan of its intent to seek substantial contribution fees and expenses. Hall Financial Group, Inc. v. DP Partners Ltd. Partnership (In re DP Partners Ltd. Partnership), 106 F.3d 667 (5th Cir. 1997).

6.2 Priorities

6.2.a Failed adequate protection priority amount is based on proposed disposition or use as of the petition date. On the petition date, it appeared that the debtor would sell its assets, not reorganize as a going concern, although it was unclear whether the sale would be an orderly liquidation/going concern sale or a forced liquidation. Ultimately, the sale was a going concern liquidation. Section 507(b) gives priority to the claims of a secured creditor to the extent that adequate protection of the value of its collateral provided to the creditor turned out to be inadequate and the collateral value decreased during the case. Section 506(a) requires valuation in light of the purpose of the valuation, the proposed use or disposition of collateral, and in conjunction with any hearing of the disposition or use affecting the creditor’s interest. When the creditor sought a priority claim under section 507(b), the bankruptcy court valued the collateral as of the petition date using a “net orderly liquidation value” basis. Because an orderly liquidation sale was a possibility at the petition date, that valuation method was proper, without regard to how the collateral was ultimately used or disposed of. ESL Invs., Inc. v. Sears Holdings Corp. (In re Sears Holdings Corp.), ___ F.4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 28584 (2d Cir. Oct. 14, 2022).

6.2.b DIP’s postpetition breach of prepetition contract may entitle counterparty to administrative expense claim. Prepetition, the debtor entered into a service contract. The contract permitted the counterparty to extend the term unilaterally, which it did, both pre- and postpetition. The debtor’s plan rejected the contract. The counterparty claimed the debtor in possession breached the contract during the chapter 11 case, before rejection, and filed an administrative expense claim for breach damages. Section 503(b)(1) allows the actual and necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate as administrative expenses. It must arise from a transaction between the counterparty and the debtor in possession, not the debtor, and is allowable only to the extent the consideration was both supplied to and beneficial to the estate. However, to the extent that the damage claim was within the parties’ fair contemplation at the time of contracting, the claim could be a contingent prepetition claim. But “fair contemplation” does not end the inquiry. For if the counterparty provided value to the estate at the debtor in possession's request, the counterparty is entitled to an administrative expense claim to the extent of the benefit to the estate. Although the parties argued the state law question of whether the postpetition extensions constituted new, postpetition contracts entitling the counterparty to allowance of an administrative expense or were part of the prepetition executory contracts, the questions whether a contract is an executory contract under section 365 and whether a claim is entitled to administrative expense priority is a bankruptcy law question. Here, the counterparty continued postpetition to provide services to the estate, so the district court remands for determination of the reasonable value of those services. Fin. Of Am. LLC v. Mortgage Winddown LLC (In re Ditech Holding Corp.), 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 172793 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 23, 2022).

- 6.2.c Postpetition attorneys' fee award against the estate is denied administrative expense priority. The debtor's insurer denied coverage on a prepetition claim. The trustee sued the insurer for damages arising from its bad faith denial of coverage and lost. A state statute awards attorneys' fees to the prevailing party in such litigation. A claim arises based on the timing of the debtor's or trustee's conduct. Here, the claim could not arise until the trustee sued, because the state statute awarding attorneys' fees applied only upon commencement of the litigation. Therefore, the claim is a postpetition claim. The definition of "creditor" includes only the holder of a prepetition claim. Therefore, the insurer was not a creditor. A claim is entitled to administrative expense priority only if it arises from a transaction with the estate that directly and substantially benefits the estate. Defending against the trustee's lawsuit does not meet those criteria. However, Reading v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), grants administrative expense priority to a claim arising from the wrongful conduct of a receiver or trustee in operating the debtor's estate. Under circuit precedent, only a claim arising from operation of the debtor's business involving tortious or otherwise wrongful conduct qualifies under the Reading test. Here, the claim does not meet those criteria and is disallowed. In re Greenway Park, LLC, 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 2734 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. Sept. 29, 2022).
- 6.2.d Court subordinates to general unsecured claims an unauthorized postpetition loan. During its chapter 11 case, without court approval under section 364, the debtor in possession borrowed from an insider to acquire real property. The lender asserted an administrative claim for the loan amount. Section 503(b) allows claims for actual amounts necessary to the preservation of the estate and grants them priority over prepetition claims. Section 364 permits the court to authorize nonordinary course postpetition loans with administrative expense priority. Failure to obtain prior approval defeats a claim for administrative expense priority. The nature of the transaction here was not in the debtor's ordinary course of business. A court may grant administrative expense priority to an unauthorized postpetition loan on equitable principles. To do so, the court must find that the court would have approved the loan before it was made, the loan would not impair creditor interests, and the property acquired with the loan proceeds would provide a substantial distribution to creditors, all measured as of the time the loan was made. None of those factors were present here. Section 503(b)(3) allows an administrative expense claim of a creditor and certain other specified entities for making a substantial contribution to the case. An insider lender is not among the specified entities and so may not rely on the substantial contribution provision. Therefore, the court denies administrative expense priority to the loan. The court may disallow the claim in its entirety, but here, the court allowed it and subordinated it to the claims of general unsecured creditors based on the insider's inequitable conduct. Norcross Hospitality, LLC v. Jones (In re Nilhan Devs., LLC), 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 22291 (11th Cir. Aug. 11, 2022).
- 6.2.e Goods supplied in connection with a service contract are entitled to section 503(b)(9) administrative priority. In the 20-day period before bankruptcy, a supplier provided "acidizing services" to the debtor, which necessitated the use of certain chemicals. The supplier sought administrative expense priority for the cost of the chemicals. Section 503(b)(9) grants administrative expense priority to goods sold to the debtor within the 20 days before the petition date. Generally, courts look to U.C.C. Article 2 to determine what constitutes goods. Although chemicals are goods, they were supplied here as part of a service. The U.C.C. uses the “predominate purpose” test to determine whether a transaction that includes both goods and services should be subject to Article 2, which governs the sale of goods. Section 503(b)(9) addresses only priority for the sale of goods, not an entire body of law to govern transactions involving goods. Therefore, the predominate purpose test does not apply in determining section 503(b)(9)’s applicability. Nor does the apparent link between Article 2 and section 546 reclamation rights on the one hand and section 503(b)(9) on the other suggest that the latter should apply only where a reclamation right might otherwise exist, because nothing in the statute or the legislative history supports such a reading. Therefore, the supplier is entitled to administrative expense priority for the chemicals used in the service. In re Sklar Exploration Co., LLC, 638 B.R. 627 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2022).

- 6.2.f Court may subordinate lien as well as claim under section 510(b). The creditor and individual debtor were partners in several ventures. After a falling out and litigation, they settled under an agreement that provided for the creditor to transfer all his interests in the ventures and other consideration in exchange for four payments, secured by a lien on the interests in the ventures. The debtor made only two of the payments. The creditor obtained a judgment for breach of the settlement agreement. Section 510(b) provides that a claim “for damages from the purchase or sale of [a security of the debtor or an affiliate of the debtor] ... shall be subordinated to all claims or interests that are senior to or equal the claim or interest represented by such security.” Because the settlement provided for the sale of the securities in the ventures, it was subject to subordination under section 510(b), even though the judgment arose from a claim for violation of the settlement agreement that resulted in the sale. Because the settlement agreement did not apportion the payments between payments for interests in the ventures and the other consideration, the entire claim was subordinated. Even though section 510(b) addresses only claims, it permits the court to subordinate liens as well. The term “claim” encompasses the right to payment, whether personal or in rem. Failure to subordinate the lien would defeat the purpose of section 510(b). Therefore, the creditor’s claim may receive a distribution only after all general unsecured claims are paid in full. Kurtin v. Ehrenberg (In re Elieff), 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 711 (9th Cir. B.A.P. Mar. 21, 2022).
- 6.2.g Underfunded defined benefit pension plan liability is not an administrative expense. The debtor maintained a defined benefit pension plan for its employees. At the petition date, there was a substantial underfunding liability. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession continued to employ the employees and incurred administrative and current service liabilities for the plan. Section 503(b) grants administrative expense priority to the actual and necessary costs of preserving the estate. Employee compensation is such an expense. But only the administrative and current expenses of the plan are payable on account of the employees’ postpetition services. The underfunding liability existed at the petition date and arose because of prepetition services. Accordingly, the underfunding liability is not an administrative expense. In re Verity Health Sys. of Cal., 633 B.R. 607 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2021).
- 6.2.h Employee benefit priority applies separately to multiple employee benefit plans. Under a collective bargaining agreement, the debtor funded three employee benefit plans. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, each of the plans filed a proof of claim. Section 507(a)(6) grants priority to a claim of an employee benefit plan for services rendered within 180 days before the petition date “for each such plan, to the extent of the number of employees covered by each such plan multiplied by $12,850.” Because the statute uses the term “each such plan,” the priority amount is set separately for each plan. The plans are not required to share the priority. Algozine Masonry Restoration, Inc. v. Local 52 (In re Algozine Masonry Restoration, Inc.), 5 F.4th 827 (7th. Cir. 2021).
- 6.2.i Claims for the purchase price of a private flight service membership are entitled to priority. The debtor provided private flights to its “members.” To become a member, a consumer was required to pay the debtor a fixed amount, which would entitle the consumer to a certain number of flight hours. The debtor maintained a ledger recording the amount paid and the deductions for flight hours used. The payments were nonrefundable unless the debtor terminated the agreement with the consumer. Section 507(a)(7) grants priority to a claim “arising from the deposit ... of money in connection with the purchase ... of property or ... services ... that were not delivered or provided.” A “deposit” is the giving of money to another who promises in exchange to return goods or services. Where a membership is part of a dependent, open transaction for future services and contains no independent value, the membership purchase price is a deposit for future services, not a completed purchase of a membership. Therefore, the claims are entitled to priority. In re Superior Air Charter, LLC, 627 B.R. 241 (Bankr. D. Del. Apr. 9, 2021).

- 6.2.j Administrative expense priority is determined by benefit to the estate. The debtor proposed a plan based on a merger agreement with a buyer. The court confirmed the plan, but the merger never consummated, because the buyer could not obtain regulatory approval for the transaction. The debtor ultimately sold to another buyer in a transaction that borrowed heavily from the structure and documentation of the first transaction, including by avoiding certain risks that defeated the first transaction. The buyer sought reimbursement of its expenses as an administrative expense claim. Section 503(b)(1)(A) allows the actual and necessary costs and expenses of administration as administrative expenses. An expense that does not confer a benefit on the estate is not necessary. A prospective buyer’s efforts may qualify if they promote a more competitive bidding process by inducing a bid or encouraging due diligence that leads to a bid on which other bidders can rely. The allowable amount is not necessarily the costs incurred but is measured by actual benefit to the estate, including intangible benefits that cannot be measured precisely. The courts may use hindsight in measuring the benefit. The buyer’s efforts here benefitted the estate in helping to set up the ultimately successful transaction, so the buyer is entitled to allowance of an administrative expense claim. The court of appeals remands for a determination of the benefit and any offsetting costs. In re Energy Future Holdings Corp., 990 F.3d 728 (3d Cir. 2021).
- 6.2.k Court enforces broad subordination agreement, denies standing to subordinated creditor. The creditors’ subordination agreement provided all payments on the subordinated claim would be made directly to the senior creditor, granted the subordinated creditor’s voting rights to the senior creditor, and prohibited the subordinated creditors from taking any position in a bankruptcy case contrary to the priorities and other rights of the creditors under the agreement. The debtor proposed a plan to pay the senior creditor about 35% of its claim, with a small distribution to the subordinated creditors, which would be redirected to the senior creditor under the subordination agreement. Section 1126(a) permits the holder of a claim to accept or reject a plan. The subordination agreement provision granting the subordinated creditors’ vote to the senior creditor does not override section 1126(a), because prebankruptcy agreements do not override contrary Code provisions. Section 510(a), which requires the court to enforce a subordination agreement, applies only to priorities, not to other provisions, such as voting rights, and Rule 2018(c) permits voting only by a creditor or its agent, which the senior creditor was not. Therefore, the subordinated creditor may vote its claim. Section 502(b)(2) requires allowance of a claim except to the extent not enforceable under nonbankruptcy law. Although the subordination agreement granted all payment rights associated with the claim to the senior creditor, the claim remained enforceable and therefore was allowed over the debtor’s objection. Section 1109(a) grants a party in interest the right to appear and be heard on any issue in the case. Therefore, the subordinated creditors had standing to appear and be heard, despite the subordination agreement. However, prudential standing limits a party in interest’s ability to participate when the party is raising another person’s legal rights or when its interests would not be affected by the proceeding. Because the debtor’s value, combined with the subordination agreement’s effect, left no possibility that the subordinated creditors would recover anything in the case, the court denies prudential standing to the creditor. In re Fencepost Productions, Inc., 629 B.R. 289 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2021).
- 6.2.l Texas oil and gas producers’ security interest is junior to perfected security interest in Delaware debtor’s receivables. Texas oil and gas producers sold minerals to the debtor, a Delaware corporation, who sold them prepetition to refineries and commodity traders. The downstream purchasers paid for the minerals postpetition. The debtor's bank debt was secured by a security interest in receivables and bank accounts, including the bank accounts where the downstream purchasers' payments were deposited, which the bank perfected by filing for the receivables and a control agreement for the accounts. A Texas nonuniform UCC Article 9 provision grants an automatic, perfected, purchase-money security interest to the producers. UCC section 9-301 provides that the law of the debtor's jurisdiction of incorporation governs perfection, priority, and enforcement of a security interest. Since the debtor is a Delaware corporation, the Delaware UCC governs the relative priority of the bank's and the producers' security interests. Delaware does not have the nonuniform provision protecting oil and gas producers, so the uniform first-to-file rule applies. Since the bank filed its financial statement before any of the producers filed theirs, the bank's security interest takes priority. Deutsche Bank Trust Co. Americas v. U.S. Energy Devel. Corp. (In re First River Energy, L.L.C.), 986 F.3d 914 (5th Cir. 2021).

- 6.2.m “Hanging [suspension] paragraph” in section 507(a)(8)(A) applies in a chapter 11 case. The state taxing authority asserted claims for franchise taxes for numerous tax years in the debtor's first two chapter 11 cases. During the second case, the debtor settled with the taxing authority on the claim amount and a payment schedule. The second case's confirmed plan provided that creditors, including the taxing authority, were enjoined from collecting any prepetition claims except as provided in the plan. After making three of the four required payments, the debtor filed a third chapter 11 case. The taxing authority asserted priority for its stipulated claim from the prior case. Section 507(a)(8)(A) grants priority to taxes on or measured by income if the taxes are less than three years old, are assessed within 240 days before bankruptcy or are still assessable. However, the “hanging paragraph” at the end of subparagraph (A) suspends the 240-day period for any period during which a collection stay was in effect under a confirmed plan in a prior case. That paragraph applies here, so the taxing authority's claim is entitled to priority in the third case. Buffets, LLC v. Calif. Franchise Tax Bd. (In re Buffets, LLC), 617 B.R. 880 (W. D. Tex. 2020).
- 6.2.n Subordinated IRS lien on real property takes priority in insurance proceeds over senior liens. The debtor secured two loans by a mortgage on his real property. The IRS agreed to subordinate a preexisting tax lien on the property to the mortgages in exchange for payment of a portion of the loan proceeds. The mortgages required the debtor to insure the property, but the mortgagees were not named as additional insured on the policy. The structure on the property burned down. The insurer paid the policy proceeds to the trustee. The tax lien attached to the insurance proceeds. Because they were not named as additional insureds on the policy, the mortgagees did not have ownership interests in the policy proceeds, but because the mortgages required insurance, they had equitable liens on the insurance proceeds. The tax lien in the policy proceeds has priority over the mortgagees' liens unless the mortgagees' liens were choate before the tax lien attached. A lien is choate when the identity of the lienor, the property subject to the lien, and the lien amount are all established. Although the lienors and the amounts were established, the property subject to the lien was not established until the insurance proceeds were paid (or at least until the debtor was entitled to receive them). The tax lien attached no later. Therefore, the tax lien has priority, despite the subordination agreement. Wolinsky v. Frye (In re Frye), 620 B.R. 61 (Bankr. D. Vt. 2020).
- 6.2.o Court grants Six Month Rule priority to interline charges. The railroad debtor owed a railroad creditor for interline charges incurred within a few months before the debtor's chapter 11 case. Section 1171(b) grants priority to claims that would have been entitled to priority in a receivership of the railroad. In a receivership, a creditor would be entitled to priority under the Six Month Rule or under the Necessity of Payment rule. The latter Rule authorizes a receiver to pay obligations he incurs without court authority if the goods or services obtained were necessary to continued rail service. The former Rule reflects equitable considerations so that creditors who supplied goods or services to the railroad shortly before bankruptcy are not disadvantaged compared to those who do so after and receive administrative expense priority. It permits priority to a claim for current operating expenses incurred within six months before bankruptcy for goods or services with the expectation they would be paid from current operating revenues and not in reliance on the railroad's general credit. In this case, the parties specifically contemplated the interline charges would be paid from interline receipts the debtor received, the interline service was necessary for the continued operation of the railroad, and the charges were incurred within a few months before bankruptcy. Therefore, the court grants priority to the charges. Keach v. New Brunswick S. Ry. Ltd. (In re Montreal Maine & Atl. Ry., Ltd.), 953 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2020).

- 6.2.p Creditor's reclamation claim is subordinate to a postpetition secured lender's lien. The debtor received goods from a supplier shortly before bankruptcy. The debtor's prepetition lender had a security interest in all the debtor's assets. Within one day after bankruptcy, the court approved the lender's "creeping roll-up" debtor in possession financing, which also provided a security interest in all the debtor's assets, including inventory. Two days later, the supplier delivered to the debtor in possession a reclamation demand for the goods. Section 546(c)(1), "subject to the prior rights of a holder of a security interest in such goods," protects the reclamation rights of a seller of goods who makes a reclamation demand sooner than the earlier of 45 days after delivery of the goods and 20 days after the petition date. Unlike prior law, the statute makes explicit that the reclamation right is subject to a valid security interest, without regard to state law concepts of whether the security interest holder is a good faith purchaser under U.C.C. section 9-207(3). A reclamation right arises only upon delivery of a reclamation demand. Here, the demand came only after the debtor in possession granted a lien to the postpetition lender, and there was no break between the prepetition and postpetition lien. Accordingly, the supplier's reclamation right did not spring into first position when the lender's prepetition lien was extinguished by the postpetition lien. Therefore, the supplier's reclamation claim is subordinate to the lender's security interest. Whirlpool Corp. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (In re hhgregg, Inc.), 949 F.3d 1039 (7th Cir. 2020).
- 6.2.q Affordable Care Act individual mandate "tax" is not entitled to priority as an excise tax. The Affordable Care Act imposes a tax on anyone who does not purchase qualifying health insurance. The debtor incurred such a tax but did not provide for its payment as a tax priority claim in his chapter 13 plan. Section 507(a)(8)(E) grants priority to an "excise tax on a transaction occurring before the petition date." The failure to purchase qualifying health insurance is not a transaction. Therefore, the charge under the ACA is not entitled to priority under section 507(a)(8)(E). U.S. v. Chesteen (In re Chesteen), 799 Fed. Appx. 236 (5th Cir. Feb. 20, 2020).
- 6.2.r Guarantee of tax claim is entitled to tax priority. A company settled a dispute with the IRS by agreeing to pay a tax claim over an extended period. Another company, which was owned by the same individuals who owned the tax debtor, guaranteed the payment of the taxes. The guarantor filed a chapter 11 case, and the IRS filed a proof of claim on the guarantee as a priority tax claim. The debtor objected that the claim was not entitled to the tax priority because the claim arose under a contractual guaranty, not as a tax against the debtor. Section 507(a)(8) grants priority to "allowed unsecured claims of governmental units, only to the extent that such claims are for" various taxes. The IRS's claim was for a tax, even though the tax was not imposed on the debtor. Therefore, the claim was entitled to priority under section 507(a)(8). In re Cent. Proc. Servs., 606 B.R. 712 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2019).
- 6.2.s Statutory priority under section 507(a) does not prevent equitable subordination. A creditors' committee member asserted a first priority domestic support claim. When pressed by the trustee on the scope, extent, and priority of the claim and whether the creditor would permit payment of the expenses necessary to administer the estate's assets, the creditor evaded the question. When the trustee and her professionals later filed interim compensation applications, the creditor objected on the ground that her claim had priority over the administrative expenses, and it was unclear whether there would be sufficient assets to satisfy her claim. The creditor's failure to disclose her position on payment of the expenses necessary to administer the estate until after fee applications were filed violated her fiduciary duty of full disclosure, because it enabled the trustee and her professionals to expend time and effort in administering the estate, which they likely would not have done if they had known the first priority domestic support obligation would consume all available assets. A court may equitably subordinate a claim if the creditor acted inequitably resulting in harm to other creditors and subordination is not inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code. If subordinating a claim that has priority under the Code is inconsistent with the Code, then even secured and general unsecured claims, whose priority the Code specifies, could not be subordinated. Based on the breach of fiduciary duty, the court subordinates the creditor's claim to the extent necessary to pay administrative expense claims. Naylor v. Farrell (In re Farrell), ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 3782 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Nov. 15, 2019).

- 6.2.t Fifth Circuit defines requirements for treatment as an administrative expense claim. The debtor operated offshore oil and gas platforms. It contracted with a drilling contractor to drill another well from one of the debtor's platforms. After a fatal accident during the drilling operation, drilling ceased. Shortly thereafter, creditors filed an involuntary petition. The debtor consented to an order for relief. The debtor in possession then rejected the drilling contract. As a result, the contractor had to plan and execute a demobilization plan to remove its equipment from the debtor's platform. That process took several months: regulatory approvals and the contractor's preparation of a demobilization plan were both delayed. The contractor asserted an administrative expense claim for its entire pre-demobilization and demobilization expenses. An administrative expense is an actual and necessary postpetition cost that benefitted the estate (regardless of cost to the creditor) and arose as a result of the trustee's actions, either by direct request or other inducement or by voluntary acceptance of desired goods or services. A supplier's mere availability to provide goods or services suffices, if it meets these requirements for an administrative expense. Therefore, the contractor is entitled to an administrative expense claim for its pre-demobilization services, including waiting (availability) time, except to the extent of any delay the contractor caused. However, because the removal of the contractor's equipment from the platform benefitted the contractor, not the estate, the contractor is not entitled to an administrative expense claim for its demobilization costs. Nabors Offshore Corp. v. Whistler Energy II, L.L.C. (In re Whistler Energy II, L.L.C.), 931 F.3d 432 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 6.2.u Damages arising from purchase of an equity-like interest is subject to section 510(b) subordination. Through a long series of transactions over 80 years, including most recently a merger, a party did not own any equity security interests in the debtor but had a right to receive a certain percentage of dividends the debtor declared. The debtor stopped paying the party, who sued for breach of contract, advanced tort claims, and breach of fiduciary duty. Once the debtor filed bankruptcy, the party filed a proof of claim. Section 510(b) subordinates a claim for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor or an affiliate. The section effectuates a principal bankruptcy policy that creditors are entitled to be paid before equity interest holders. It applies when three conditions are met: (1) damages (2) arising from a purchase or sale (3) of an equity security. The party acknowledged it was seeking damages. The party acquired the interest through a merger that converted a prior existing interest in dividends to the current one. "Arising from" is broadly construed, so the party's damages claim arises from the purchase of the interest. The interest tracked the debtor's value and entitled the party to the upside, just as an equity interest would, and subjected the holder to the same risks as a shareholder. Although this form of instrument does not fall within any of the enumerated kinds of securities in section 101(49), it comes within the catch-all of "other claim or interest commonly known as a security." The court notes the interest, though unusual, is more like equity than debt. Therefore, the court subordinates the claim. French v. Linn Energy, L.L.C. (In re Linn Energy, L.L.C.), 936 F.3d 334 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 6.2.v Nursing home state quality assurance fee is entitled to priority as an excise tax. The state department of health services imposes a quality assurance fee on skilled nursing facilities. The fee is "assessed per resident per day, based on the aggregate net revenue" of the facility. The state filed a proof of claim for prepetition fees, asserting priority as an excise tax. Section 507(a)(8)(E) grants priority to an excise tax on “a transaction occurring [prepetition] for which a return, if required, is last due ... after three years before the date of the filing of the petition.” Because the fee is measured on a per resident per day basis, the fee is an excise tax that is assessed on a transaction, which is the “sale” of the services of a bed to a resident each day, and is therefore entitled to priority under section 507(a)(8)(E). Calif. Dept. of Health Care Servs. v. Ehrenberg (In re Ridgecrest Healthcare, Inc., 601 B.R. 826 (C.D. Cal. 2019).

6.2.w Subordination agreement prevents subordinated creditor from taking Rule 2004 discovery against senior lender. The creditors’ subordination agreement provided “the Subordinated Lender shall not ... foreclose upon, take possession of, or attempt to realize on any Collateral, or proceed in any way to enforce any claims it has or may have ... unless and until the Obligations to the Senior Lender have been fully and indefeasibly paid and satisfied in full.” In the debtor’s chapter 7 case, the subordinated lender sought discovery under Rule 2004 from the Senior Lender, who opposed the request. Section 510(a) requires the court to enforce a subordination agreement to the same extent enforceable outside of bankruptcy. Here, because any discovery would be calculated to enforce claims against the debtor, the subordination agreement language constitutes an express “silent second” provision, which prevents the subordinated lender from using the bankruptcy process to obtain discovery. In re Argon Credit, LLC, 596 B.R. 882 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2019).

6.2.x Trustee may avoid consignor’s unperfected interest in proceeds of consigned goods. The debtor sold the consignor’s goods but had not yet paid the consignor the proceeds of sale when the debtor filed bankruptcy. The consignor had not perfected its interest in the goods by the filing of a UCC-1. A consignment is subject to the U.C.C.’s priority and perfection rules. A consignor must perfect, usually by filing a UCC-1, to retain priority in its goods or their proceeds. A delivery of goods to a merchant for sale is a consignment if the merchant deals in those kinds of goods and is not generally known by its creditors to be substantially engaged in selling goods of others. If a merchant is generally so known, then the delivery is not a consignment, and the deliverer need not perfect to prevail over perfected security interests. Here, the debtor was not generally known to be substantially engaged in selling consigned goods, so the supplier’s interest in the goods was unperfected and avoidable by the trustee under section 544(a). The UCC treats unperfected consignments the same as unperfected security interests. An interest in proceeds is perfected only if the interest in the goods was perfected. Therefore, the trustee may avoid the supplier’s claimed interest in the proceeds. IPC (USA), Inc. v. Ellis (In re Pettit Oil. Co.), 917 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2019).

6.2.y True consignment requires that debtor purchase at least 20% of its inventory on consignment. The debtor maintained a program for its suppliers who wished to sell on consignment. About 14% of the debtor’s inventory was purchased that way. The debtor also had a term loan secured by a lien on its inventory. The term loan lender perfected its security interest by filing a UCC-1. One consignor filed a UCC-1 to perfect its interest in its consigned inventory only a month before the bankruptcy. The lender did not know the consignor was selling goods on consignment, and the consignor did not give the lender direct notice of its interest once it filed its UCC-1. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sold some of the consigned goods. The consignor and the secured lender each claimed the proceeds. A consignment is subject to the U.C.C.’s priority and perfection rules. A consignor must perfect, usually by filing a UCC-1, to retain priority in its goods or their proceeds. A delivery of goods to a merchant for sale is a consignment if the merchant deals in those kinds of goods and is not generally known by its creditors to be substantially engaged in selling goods of others. If a merchant is generally so known or if the competing secured creditor actually knows, then the delivery is not a consignment, and the deliverer need not perfect to prevail over perfected security interests. The courts use a 20% rule of thumb to determine whether a merchant is substantially engaged in selling goods of others. Here, the debtor purchased only 14% of its inventory on consignment. Therefore, the consignor’s sale was not a true consignment, and the consignor had to file a UCC-1 to perfect its security interest in the goods. Since it filed its UCC-1 after the lender did so, the lender's security interest has priority and is entitled to the sale proceeds. TSA Stores, Inc. v. Sport Dimension (In re TSAWD Holdings, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 1181 (Bankr. D. Del. April 12, 2019).

- 6.2.z Section 364(c)(1) superpriority claims are not subordinate to administrative claims incurred under chapter 7 after conversion. The court permitted a chapter 11 debtor in possession to obtain credit from a supplier on a superpriority basis under section 364(c)(1). The case converted to chapter 7. Section 364(c)(1) permits obtaining credit "with priority over any or all administrative expenses of the kind specified in section 503(b) or 507(b)." Section 726(b) provides "a claim allowed under section 503(b) of this title incurred under [chapter 7 after conversion from another chapter] has priority over a claim allowed under section 503(b) of this title incurred under any other chapter of this title," but does not refer to section 364 at all. Claims with superpriority under section 364(c)(1) are not administrative claims allowable under section 503(b); they are a special category of claims with priority over section 503(b) administrative claims. Therefore, they are not subordinate to section 503(b) administrative claims incurred under chapter 7 after conversion. In re Happy Jack's Petroleum, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 3424 (Bankr. D. Neb. Nov. 7, 2018).
- 6.2.aa Secured lender with actual knowledge of a consignment is junior to the consignor. The debtor established a consignment program for its suppliers. About 10% of its goods were received under the program. One consignor filed a UCC-1 statement to perfect its interest in its consigned goods, but the filing had lapsed by the time of the debtor's bankruptcy. The debtor borrowed under a secured lending facility. When the lender filed its own UCC-1, it had actual knowledge of the consignor's interest, as the interest was listed in the loan agreement. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sold some of the consigned goods. The consignor and the secured lender each claimed the proceeds. A consignment is subject to the U.C.C.'s priority and perfection rules. A consignor must perfect, usually by filing a UCC-1, to retain priority in its goods or their proceeds. A delivery of goods to a merchant for sale is a consignment if the merchant deals in those kinds of goods and is not generally known by its creditors to be substantially engaged in selling goods of others. If a merchant is generally so known, then the delivery is not a consignment, and the deliverer need not perfect to prevail over perfected security interests. A UCC-1 gives constructive notice of a security interest in the debtor's property and protects creditors against secret liens. A creditor who has actual knowledge of a consignment takes its interest subject to the consignment interest: it would be anomalous to subject a creditor with constructive notice to a consignor's interest but not a creditor with actual knowledge, as the protection against secret liens is the same. Therefore, the court orders the sale proceeds paid to the consignor. TSA Stores, Inc. v. Performance Apparel Corp. (In re TSAWD Holdings, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 3680 (Bankr. D. Del. Nov. 26, 2018).
- 6.2.bb Creditor may not offset PACA trust claim against debt owing to the debtor. The debtor and the creditor were both perishable agricultural commodity purchasers and sellers. They traded between themselves, setting up offsetting credits and debits. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, the debtor owed the creditor $205,000, and the debtor owed the creditor $263,000. The debtor had assets derived from the purchase and resale of perishable agricultural commodities. The creditor claimed the right of setoff and asserted the $58,000 balance of its claim against those assets. The Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act creates a floating trust over all a debtor/purchaser's assets in favor of sellers to the debtor of such commodities. The trust assets are not property of the estate but are held solely in trust for the sellers. As such, the creditor had a claim against the trust assets for $263,000. A creditor may offset debts and credits, but they must be mutual, that is, between the same parties in the same capacity. The creditor's claim was against the trust, not against the debtor, and so could not be offset. The creditor was required to pay its debt to the debtor's estate and share pro rata with other PACA creditors in the PACA trust on its claim against the debtor. The PACA Trust Creditors v. Genecco Produce Inc., ___ F.3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 627 (2d Cir. Jan. 9, 2019).

- 6.2.cc Court limits reach of the Federal Priority Statute. The debtor’s plan created a liquidating trust to pursue claims, including claims against former directors and officers. The trustee settled with the former CEO. The United States obtained a False Claims Act judgment against the former CEO and objected to the court’s approval of the settlement on the ground that the settlement violated the federal priority statute, 31 U.S.C. § 3713, which requires that a claim of the government be paid first when a person indebted to the government is insolvent and is without enough property to pay all the person’s debts, but “does not apply to a case under title 11.” The exclusion applies here, so the United States may not assert the priority to defeat approval of the settlement. Arrowsmith v. Mallory (In re Health Diag. Lab., Inc.), 588 B.R. 154 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2018).
- 6.2.dd Executive’s employment contract does not establish presumptive postpetition compensation rate. The debtor’s plan rejected its executive chairman’s employment contract as of the plan effective date. The chairman claimed postpetition salary as an administrative expense at his contractual rate, relying only on the contract as the presumptive value of his services and introducing no evidence of the services he actually performed. Section 503(b)(1)(A)(i) grants priority to administrative expenses, including “the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate, including wages, salaries, and commissions for services rendered after the commencement of the case.” Generally, an administrative claimant, including for wages and salaries, bears the burden of persuasion by a preponderance of the evidence. The contractual rate is not binding, and although possibly probative, it does not create a presumption either of reasonableness or necessity. An objector need not rebut it; the claimant must prove it. Because the chairman did not prove the value of his postpetition services to the debtor in possession, his administrative expense claim is disallowed. Boruff v. Cook Inlet Energy LLC (In re Cook Inlet Energy LLC), 583 B.R. 494 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2018).
- 6.2.ee Section 546(e) gives DIP lender priority over prepetition supplier’s reclamation claim. The debtor’s secured lender entered into a secured postpetition financing agreement with the debtor in possession on the petition date. The order approving the financing provided that it did not “impair, extinguish, subordinate or prime any party’s rights under section 2-702 of the [U.C.C.], subject, however, to section 546(c) of the Bankruptcy Code.” A prepetition inventory supplier demanded reclamation of its good under U.C.C. section 2-702 five days after the petition date. Section 546(e) makes a seller’s reclamation rights “subject to the prior rights of a holder of a security interest.” Here, the lender’s lien chain on the debtor’s goods remained unbroken. Although section 2-702 might have permitted reclamation, section 546(e) subordinates that claim to the lender’s security interest. Therefore, the court denies the seller’s reclamation claim. Whirlpool Corp. v. hhgregg, Inc. (In re hhgregg, Inc.), 578 B.R. 814 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. 2017).
- 6.2.ff Cigarette taxes whose collection were delayed by appeal are not entitled to priority. The state imposes an excise tax on wholesale cigarette sales and requires sellers to file tax returns reflecting the amounts owing. The state taxing authority audited the debtor’s sales and tax returns and determined that the debtor had underpaid its taxes for sales that occurred more than seven years before bankruptcy. The debtor appealed to the taxing authority appeal board. The appeal board issued its ruling, which required further calculations by the taxing authority, after the debtor’s bankruptcy. The taxes did not become due and payable until the appeal process concluded. Section 507(a)(8)(E)(i) grants priority to an excise tax on “a transaction occurring before the date of the filing of the petition for which a return, if required, is last due ... after three years before the date of the filing of the petition.” The “flush paragraph” following section 507(a)(8) provides for extension of a period in section 507(a)(8) “for any period during which a governmental unit is prohibited under applicable law from collecting a tax as a result of a request by the debtor for a hearing and an appeal of any collection action taken or proposed against the debtor.” Because the taxes were not due and owing until after final determination, the debtor’s appeal addressed only liability for the taxes, not any proposed collection action against the debtor. Therefore, the flush paragraph extension does not apply, and the taxes were too old to be entitled to priority. In re USA Sales, Inc., 580 B.R. 852 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2018).

- 6.2.gg Court orders disgorgement of professional fees to achieve pro rata distribution to administrative claimants. The chapter 7 trustee operated the debtor’s business. He paid all operating expenses and made interim compensation payments to himself and his law firm, which was serving as his counsel. The trustee obtained some of the funds remaining at the end of the case through a settlement with a secured creditor of a claim under section 506(c). At the end of the case, there were insufficient funds to pay the remaining claimant, the trustee, his counsel and accountant, and the U.S. trustee fees. The trustee may recover under section 506(c) so that the estate’s unencumbered assets are not used for a secured creditor’s benefit. Because the recovery is to reimburse the estate’s unencumbered funds, the recovery is for the benefit of the estate, not just the claimants whose expenses were the basis for the recovery. Section 726(b) entitles creditors to a pro rata distribution of unencumbered property of the estate. Section 726(b) applies equally to funds recovered under section 506(c) and to administrative claimants. Orders authorizing interim compensation are not final and may be reconsidered at any time, so interim payments are not final. To enforce section 726(b)’s pro rata distribution requirement, the court, under section 105(a), may order disgorgement of interim compensation payments to professionals. In this case, disgorgement is appropriate to ensure pro rata distribution to the remaining administrative claimants in the case. In re NETtel Corp., 2017 Bankr. LEXIS 3363 (Bankr. D.D.C. Sept. 29, 2017).
- 6.2.hh For purposes of section 503(b)(9), the debtor “receives” goods only when it takes physical possession. The creditor shipped goods FOB (free on board) from China more than 20 days before the date of the filing of the petition. When goods are shipped FOB, the buyer assumes the risk of loss upon shipment. The debtor took physical possession of the goods when they arrived in the United States, within 20 days before the date of the filing of the petition. Section 503(b)(9) gives a creditor an administrative priority claim if the debtor receives the creditor’s goods within 20 days before the date of the filing of the petition. The Code does not define “receive.” But the context in which Congress adopted the legislation shows that Congress intended “receive” to have the same meaning as it does under the U.C.C. U.C.C. section 2-103(1)(c) defines “receipt” as “taking physical possession.” Dictionary definitions of “receive” also define it as meaning to take physical possession. The court previously construed “receive” in section 546(c), which addresses reclamation rights, to mean take physical possession. Sections 503(b)(9) and 546(c) relate to the same subject matter and should be construed together. Therefore, the creditor is entitled to administrative priority under section 503 (b)(9). In re World Imports, Ltd., 862 F.3d 338 (3d Cir. 2017).
- 6.2.ii For purposes of section 503(b)(9), the debtor does not “receive” drop-shipped goods. The supplier shipped goods directly to the debtor’s customers, which the customers received within 20 days before the petition date. Section 503(b)(9) gives a creditor an administrative priority claim if the debtor receives the creditor’s goods within 20 days before the date of the filing of the petition. The Code does not define “receive.” But the context in which Congress adopted the legislation shows that Congress intended “receive” to have the same meaning as it does under section 546(c), which governs reclamation claims under U.C.C. 2-702 and 2-705. There, “receipt” requires physical possession, either directly or through the buyer’s agent. The court also relies on the Third Circuit’s opinion, issued three days earlier, in In re World Imports, Ltd., 862 F.3d 338 (3d Cir. 2017), which construed “receive” to require physical possession. Because neither the debtor nor its agent received the goods, section 503(b)(9) does not apply. In re SRC Liquidation, LLC, 537 (Bankr. D. Del. 2017).
- 6.2.jj Employees’ restricted stock unit claims are subordinated under section 510(b). As part of their compensation, the debtor’s employees received restricted stock units (RSUs) that vested after five years if the employees met certain employment-related conditions. The employer held the RSUs in trust until they vested. The employees were credited with additional RSUs in lieu of dividends that the debtor paid on its stock, and the employees were entitled to direct the trustee how to vote the shares. After bankruptcy, the employees filed proofs of claims for their RSUs. Section 510(b) subordinates to the level of equity securities a claim arising from the purchase or sale of an equity security of the debtor or for damages arising from the purchase or sale. An equity security includes stock and any other claim or interest commonly known as a security. The RSUs permitted participation in firm profits and therefore were equity securities. The claimants purchased the RSUs by exchanging their labor for the RSUs as compensation. Therefore, any claims arising from the purchase or for damages are subordinated. In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc., 855 F.3d 459 (2d Cir. 2017).

- 6.2.kk Rule of Explicitness applies in post-bankruptcy action between lenders. Lenders entered into an Intercreditor Agreement that provided for payment of “any interest then due and payable” pro rata among the senior and subordinated debt tranches before payment of principal. It provided “interest hereunder shall be due and payable ... before and after judgment, regardless of whether an Insolvency or Liquidation Proceeding exists in respect of Borrower, and, to the fullest extent permitted by law, the Lenders shall be entitled to receive post-petition interest.” The chapter 7 trustee distributed collateral proceeds to the collateral agent, who held them pending nonbankruptcy litigation between holders of different tranches of debt over entitlement to payment of postpetition interest. The Rule of Explicitness permits a senior creditor to enforce a subordination provision of a junior creditor’s claim to the senior creditor’s postpetition interest claims only if the intent to do so is explicit in the agreement. Although the Rule began as a bankruptcy rule under the Bankruptcy Act, the New York courts have adopted it as a state law rule. The Rule applies generally to subordination of claims to postpetition interest, not just as between senior and junior creditors. Here, the ICA is explicit that it subordinates principal payment on senior tranches to postpetition interest owing on all tranches. Because the litigation is after bankruptcy, the phrase “to the fullest extent permitted by law” does not incorporate Bankruptcy Code section 502(b)(2)’s disallowance of postpetition interest. Therefore, the collateral agent must distribute the funds to pay postpetition interest on all tranches before any payments of principal on the senior tranche. U.S. Bank N.A. v. T.D. Bank, N.A., 569 B.R. 12 (S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 6.2.ii Section 510(b) does not subordinate a claim for the debtor’s conversion of stock. The debtors and the creditor were initially stockholders in a corporation. After the creditor became ill, he stopped participating in the corporation’s activities, and the debtors fraudulently canceled his shares. He sued and won judgment against the debtors for the value of his shares at the time they were canceled. The debtors filed bankruptcy cases. Section 510(b) subordinates any claim “arising from the purchase or sale” of a “security of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor.” The claim here did not arise from the creditor’s purchase but from the debtors’ conversion of the creditor’s shares many years after the purchase. Therefore, section 510(b) does not apply to the creditor’s claim. A dissent argues that the broad reading the courts have given section 510(b) requires a different result, because the creditor would not have had his claim but for his initial purchase of the shares. Khan v. Barton (In re Khan), 846 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 6.2.mm Section 510(b) does not subordinate the claims of purchasers of an SPV that owns the debtor’s securities. The debtor contracted with a placement agent to issue non-voting preferred securities. The placement agent subcontracted with a subagent. The subagent formed a special purpose vehicle and sold membership interests in the SPV to raise money for the SPV to acquire the debtor’s non-voting preferred securities. The membership interest purchasers filed proofs of claim for the debtor’s violations of the securities laws. Section 510(b) subordinates a claim for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor. The membership interest purchasers held securities of the SPV, not of the debtor. An affiliate includes an entity owning 20% or more of the debtor’s voting securities or “person whose business is operated under a lease or operating agreement by a debtor.” To qualify, the debtor must be a party to the lease or operating agreement. Here, even if the debtor operated the SPV, the debtor was a party to the contract with the agent but not with the subagent, so the SPV does not qualify as an affiliate. Therefore, section 510(b) does not subordinate the membership interest purchasers' claims. In re FAH Liquidating Corp., 563 B.R. 160 (Bankr. D. Del. 2017).

- 6.2.nn Court subordinates claim against individual debtor arising from the purchase of a security under section 510(b). The individual debtor joined another investor in acquiring an operating business through an LLC. The debtor defrauded the other investor in making the investment by using stolen funds and by issuing a guarantee that had no financial support behind it. When customers learned of the fraud, the business faltered, and the other investor's investment became virtually worthless. He filed a proof of claim in the debtor's case in the amount of his investments. Section 510(b) requires the court to subordinate "a claim arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor [or] for damages arising from the purchase or sale of such a security ... to all claims or interests that are senior or equal to the claim or interest represented by such security, except that if such security is common stock, such claim has the same priority as common stock." A claim "arises from" a purchase or sale if it has any connection with the purchase or sale. Section 510(b) applies to a claim arising from the purchase or sale of a security of an affiliate. An affiliate is an entity 20% or more owned by the debtor. Therefore, the purchase need not be from the debtor. Section 510(b) is not limited by its terms to corporate debtors. Here, the other investor's claim is for damages for the purchase of securities in the LLC, which was an affiliate of the debtor. Therefore, the claim qualifies for subordination under section 510(b). The court reviews the three alternative approaches to determining the level of subordination of a claim arising from the purchase or sale of a security of an affiliate—subordination to senior or equal claims in the debtor's priority scheme, treatment of the claims as general unsecured claims in the debtor's case and subordinating them to other unsecured claims, and subordinating to the same types of claims against the debtor—and, while favoring the last, concludes that this claim would be subordinated below the debtor's general unsecured claims under any of the approaches. Liquidating Trust Comm. v. Freeman (In re Del Biaggio), 834 F.3d 1003 (9th Cir. 2016).
- 6.2.oo Court grants Six-Months Rule priority under section 1171(b) to interline charge claims. The debtor railroad incurred interline freight charges with another railroad. They agreed to swap payments each month, rather than netting the payments. Later, based on increased shipments of a particular commodity, they agreed the debtor would not have to pay the charges for those shipments until it received payment from its customer. Section 1171(b) provides for priority to any unsecured claim that would have been entitled to priority in an equity receivership. This section incorporates the "Six Months Rule," which grants priority to claims for current operating expenses the debtor necessarily incurs within six months before the petition date, where the supplier expected payment from current operating revenues, rather than from general reliance on the debtor's credit. An expense is necessary if the goods or services contribute to the debtor's operation; the supplier needs to show that without them, the debtor would shut down. Therefore, interline charges generally are entitled to priority under the Six Months Rule. Here, the supplier's agreement to wait for payment of some charges until the debtor received payment from its customers was not a security interest that was granted to protect against the debtor's general creditworthiness. Rather, it shows that the supplier was relying on the debtor's operating revenues that were directly related to the interline charges and thus not on the debtor's general credit. Therefore, the claim is entitled to priority under section 1171(b). Keach v. New Brunswick S. Ry. Co. Ltd. (In re Montreal, M. & A. Ry., Ltd.), 558 B.R. 473 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2016).
- 6.2.pp Supplier's timely reclamation claim prevails over DIP lender's inventory security interest. The debtor in possession borrowed under a secured post-petition facility, which fully paid off the secured prepetition facility from another lender. The day after the court approved the postpetition loan, a supplier delivered a written reclamation notice to the debtor in possession and later filed a proof of claim for all amounts owing. During the case, the debtor in possession paid off the supplier's claim for goods received within the 20-day prepetition period specified in section 503(b)(9), but the amount owing for goods that were subject to the reclamation demand remained unpaid. Section 546(c) recognizes a supplier's reclamation right for goods the debtor received within 45 days before the petition date if the debtor was insolvent when it received the goods, the supplier made timely written demand and the goods were identifiable and in the debtor's possession at the time of the demand. A supplier's reclamation right is subject to an ordinary course buyer's rights, but a new secured creditor with rights in the inventory does not extinguish the supplier's existing reclamation rights. In this case, the prepetition secured creditor was fully paid off by the new loan. The new lender's lien was not an assumption of the prior lien and was therefore subject to the supplier's reclamation right. The grant of the new lien on the supplier's goods does not constitute the "sale" to an ordinary course purchaser so as to defeat the supplier's reclamation right. Therefore, the supplier's reclamation right prevails over the DIP lender's security interest. In re Reichold Holdings US, Inc., 556 B.R. 107 (Bankr. D. Del. 2016).

- 6.2.qq Gift card holders' claims are not entitled to consumer deposit priority. The debtor retailer issued gift cards for cash, for returned merchandise and as credits for reward point under its loyalty club rewards program. A state attorney general filed a claim on behalf of holders of unredeemed gift cards. Section 507(a)(7) gives priority to "allowed unsecured claims of individuals ... arising from the deposit ... of money in connection with the purchase, lease, or rental of property, or the purchase of services, for the ... use of such individuals, that were not delivered or provided." "Deposit" connotes a temporal relationship, that is, a transaction that requires additional steps in the future to complete. Money used for a completed purchase is not a deposit. Thus, if the customer receives something in return for the payment, such as a money order or other transferrable instrument, the payment is not a deposit. Here, the customer received a gift card, which was transferrable. Whether the card was honored was not part of the transaction. Therefore, the payment for the gift card is not a deposit, and the customer claim under the gift card is not entitled to priority. In re City Sports, Inc., 554 B.R. 329 (Bankr. D. Del. 2016).
- 6.2.rr For purposes of section 503(b)(9), the debtor "receives" good shipped FOB when placed on board. The creditor shipped goods FOB (free on board) from China more than 20 days before the date of the filing of the petition. The debtor took physical possession of the goods when they arrived in the United States, within 20 days before the date of the filing of the petition. Section 503(b)(9) gives a creditor an administrative priority claim if the debtor received the creditor's goods within 20 days before the date of the filing of the petition. The Code does not define "receive." U.C.C. section 2-103(1)(c) defines "receipt" as "taking physical possession". However, where federal law (including a treaty) provides a rule of decision, it preempts state law. The Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG), which the Senate ratified, does not contain a definition of "receive." But it requires interpretation questions "to be settled in conformity with the general principles on which [the CISG] is based or, in the absence of such principles, in conformity with the law applicable by virtue of the rules of private international law," § 7(2), and that "the parties are considered, unless otherwise agreed, to have impliedly made applicable to their contract" common usage. § 9(2). "Incoterms," which are defined terms adopted by the International Chamber of Commerce, provides that "FOB" means the "risk of loss or damage passes when the goods are on board the vessel, and the buyer bears all costs from that moment forward." Based on that definition, in the context of an FOB shipment, "received" in section 503(b)(9) means when the goods are placed on board. In this case, that occurred more than 20 days before the petition date, so the court disallows the creditor's administrative expense claim. Fujian Zhangzhou Foreign Trade Co., Ltd. v. World Imports, Ltd. (In re World Imports, Ltd.), 549 B.R. 820 (E.D. Pa. 2016).
- 6.2.ss Chapter 7 creditor may recover for "substantial contribution." Three creditors successfully pursued a motion to remove the chapter 7 trustee for malfeasance. The successor trustee recovered from the removed trustee, resulting in a substantial recovery for unsecured creditors.

Two of the three creditors sought reimbursement of their fees and expenses as an administrative expense. Section 503(b) permits allowance of administrative expenses, “including ... (3) the actual, necessary expenses ... incurred by (D) a creditor ... in making a substantial contribution in a case under chapter 9 or 11 of this title.” Equitable principles govern bankruptcy jurisdiction, but the statutory language is the keystone on which all other analysis rests, so a court may not authorize what the Code prohibits. Although section 503(b)(3)(D) authorizes substantial contribution fees in chapter 9 and 11 cases, it does not prohibit their allowance in chapter 7 cases. And the lead-in of section 503(b) uses “including,” meaning that the list of allowable administrative expenses is not exclusive. Therefore, the court may allow the creditor’s fees and expenses for a substantial contribution in this case. Mediofactoring v. McDermott (In re Connolly N. Am., LLC), 802 F.3d 810 (6th Cir. 2015).

- 6.2.tt Responsible officer liability for unemployment tax is entitled to tax priority. The individual debtor’s corporation failed to pay state unemployment taxes that accrued within three years before the debtor’s filing bankruptcy. State unemployment tax law imposes liability on a corporation’s responsible officers for unpaid unemployment taxes. Section 507(a)(8)(C) grants priority to a tax required to be withheld or collected from others; section 507(a)(8)(E) grants priority to excise taxes incurred within three years before bankruptcy. The priorities are not mutually exclusive, so even if the tax is required to be withheld or collected from others, another tax priority provision might also apply. In this case, the unemployment taxes are imposed on the employer, so the “withheld or collected” priority does not apply. The state statute that imposes liability on a responsible officer does not convert the liability into something other than a tax. Therefore, the responsible officer liability retains its character as a tax and is entitled to the same priority in the responsible officer’s bankruptcy case that it would have had in the corporation’s bankruptcy case. Carpenter v. Montana Dept. of Labor (In re Carpenter), 540 B.R. 691 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2015).
- 6.2.uu Court subordinates co-underwriters’ contribution claim for underwriting debtor’s affiliate’s securities. A broker-dealer underwrote its parent’s debt security issuances under an underwriting agreement with co-underwriters that provided for contribution among them for damages arising from the underwriting. After the parent’s chapter 11 filing and the broker-dealer’s SIPA proceeding, securities purchasers sued the co-underwriters for damages. The co-underwriters asserted claims for contribution against the broker-dealer. Section 510(b) subordinates “a claim ...for reimbursement or contribution ... on account of” a “claim for damages arising from the purchase or sale of” a “security of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor.” The courts give section 510(b) a broad reading. The parent is an affiliate, and the co-underwriters seek a claim for contribution arising from securities purchasers’ claims for damages arising from the purchase of the parent’s securities. Therefore, the claim falls squarely within the statutory language and should be subordinated. Section 510(b) requires subordination “to all claims or interests that are senior to or equal to the claim or interest represented by such security.” There are no “claims represented by [the parent’s] security” in the broker-dealer’s SIPA proceeding. So to effect the subordination, the bankruptcy court must determine an appropriate level. Where, as here, the security represented a general unsecured claim against the parent, the bankruptcy court appropriately subordinates the claim to general unsecured claims against the broker-dealer. ANZ Secs., Inc. v. Giddens (In re Lehman Brothers Inc.), 808 F.3d 942 (2d Cir. 2015).
- 6.2.vv Court may not equitably subordinate a claim based on the creditor’s negligence or failure to act on inquiry notice. The debtor was required by commodity trading regulations to keep customer property segregated from its own assets. Despite this requirement, it used customer-segregated assets to secure its obligations arising from its own proprietary trading activities. Financial reverses prevented the debtor from covering all of its loans to the bank and therefore restoring customer funds to the segregated accounts. Instead, the debtor took more customer assets out of segregation to secure the bank loans in an apparently sincere, but ultimately hopeless and desperate, attempt to prevent collapse. The trustee successfully avoided the bank's lien on the customer assets under section 548(a)(1)(A), because the debtor intended to hinder, delay, or defraud its customers by using their assets to secure its own obligations, and the bank was on inquiry notice of the debtor's fraud on its customers and so did not have a "good faith" defense under section 548(c). The trustee sought to subordinate the bank's now unsecured claim under section 510(c), which permits subordination based on principles of equitable subordination. Equitable subordination is a draconian remedy based on conduct that harms creditors and that is not only inequitable but also egregious, tantamount to fraud, or willful. Here, the bank's conduct clearly harmed the debtor's customers, who were left with unpaid claims. But in the absence of a showing that the bank actually knew, rather than merely suspected, the debtor's fraud, the bank was not itself engaged in fraud on the debtor or its customers. Equitable subordination requires conduct that is more than negligence for failing to investigate based on inquiry notice. Therefore, the court denies the trustee's request for equitable subordination. Grede v. Bank of N.Y. Mellon Corp. (In re Sentinel Mgmt. Group, Inc.), 809 F.3d 958 (7th Cir. 2016).

6.2.ww Involuntary gap rent claims are entitled to section 507(a)(3) priority. Creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The debtor consented to an order for relief and converted the case to chapter 11 two months later. The debtor did not pay rent under its real property leases during the involuntary gap. Section 502(f) requires allowance of claims incurred in the ordinary course of business during the gap. Section 507(a)(3) grants second priority to claims allowed under section 502(f). Rent accrues each month as the debtor occupies the premises, not once when the debtor signs the lease. Therefore, the landlords' gap rent claims are entitled to priority. In re Howrey LLP, 534 B.R. 373 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2015).

6.2.xx Section 510(b) subordinates shareholder claim for breach of fiduciary duty. The debtor entered into a plan support agreement with its principal noteholders, which provided for the filing of a chapter 11 petition and a sale of the debtor's assets. The process failed to produce a going concern sale, so the debtor in possession liquidated its assets at an auction that the bankruptcy court approved. The liquidating plan provided no equity recovery. A shareholder filed a claim in the case alleging the debtor breached its fiduciary duty to him by agreeing to the bankruptcy and the sale, which he claimed were unnecessary and imprudent and harmed shareholders. Section 510(b) subordinates a claim for damages "arising from the purchase or sale" of a security of the debtor. The section's policy is to prevent a wronged shareholder, who took equity risk, from elevating his interest to a claim. Accordingly, "arising from" should be given a broad reading and cover any claim that has a nexus or causal relationship to a purchase or sale. As applied here, the shareholder would not have his claim unless he had purchased the shares. Therefore, even though his claim arose long after his purchase, his claim arises from his purchase of the debtor's securities and must be subordinated. The court does not address whether the claim for breach of fiduciary duty belongs to the corporation rather than to the shareholders. Murphy v. Madden, 532 B.R. 286 (E.D. Mich. 2015).

6.2.yy Repo creates only a contractual, not a fiduciary, relationship. A bank entered into a securities repo transaction with a broker-dealer. The repo agreement gave the debtor broker-dealer full legal title to the securities and permitted the debtor to transfer the securities for any purpose. The agreement gave the bank the right to any principal or interest payments generated by the securities during the repo period. Before the bank repurchased the securities from the debtor, the debtor became subject to a SIPA proceeding. SIPA requires the SIPA trustee to return customer property to a customer. SIPA defines "customer" as a person "who has a claim on account of securities received, acquired, or held by the debtor ... from or for the securities accounts of such person for safekeeping, with a view to sale, to cover consummated sales, pursuant to purchases, as collateral, security, or for purposes of effecting transfer." Thus, a customer is one who entrusts cash or securities to a broker-dealer in a fiduciary relationship. Delivery is not entrustment; the broker-dealer must hold the securities on the customer's behalf and deal with the securities for the customer. Here, the relationship between the bank and the debtor was strictly contractual, not fiduciary. Despite the bank's continuing economic interest in the securities, the debtor had full legal and equitable title and was not constrained in its use of the securities. Therefore, the bank was not a customer of the debtor with respect to the repo. CarVal UK Ltd. v. Giddens (In re Lehman Brothers, Inc.), 791 F.3d 277 (2d Cir. 2015).

6.2.zz Court grants late filed tax return penalties administrative priority. The chapter 7 trustee for a subchapter S corporation, under the mistaken belief that he did not need to file the corporation's annual information returns, filed them late. Though no tax is due from a subchapter S corporation, the IRS assessed penalties for the late filings, which the bankruptcy court allowed as an administrative expense. The bankruptcy appellate panel reversed, holding that the penalties did not qualify under section 503(b)(1)(A) as "actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate" and remanded for the bankruptcy court to determine whether there was any other basis for administrative expense priority. Under Nicholas v. U.S., 384 U.S. 678 (1966), interest that accrues on postpetition taxes and a penalty incurred for failure to file a return are entitled to administrative priority. Late filing of a return is similar to late payment of a tax, so the rule that applies to interest for late payment should apply to a penalty for late filing. In re 800Ideas.com, Inc., 527 B.R. 701 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 2015).

6.2.aaa Section 510(b) subordinates claim on debtor's guarantee of affiliated limited partnership investments. The debtor organized limited partnerships to invest in low-income housing and solicited limited partner investors, who would receive substantial tax benefits as well as returns on their investments. The debtor acted as general partner for some but not all of the limited partnerships. As the debtor's financial condition worsened, the debtor started raiding some limited partnership accounts to fund other accounts. The debtor had guaranteed one limited partner's investment. After bankruptcy, the investor filed a proof of claim against the debtor on the guarantee. Section 510(b) requires the court to subordinate the claim of a creditor for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor or an affiliate of the debtor. The investor asserted his claim for breach of the guarantee, which is a breach of contract claim and therefore a claim for damages. Moreover, it would elevate form over substance not to apply section 510(b) to a claim for a guarantee rather than a claim for return of the equity investment in the limited partnership. The limited partnership interests that the investor purchased are "securities" under section 101(49)(A)(xiii). A claim arises from the purchase or sale of a security if there is a nexus or causal relationship between the claim and the sale. The guarantee claim stems directly from the limited partnership interest purchases. Finally, an affiliate includes a "person whose business is operated under a lease or operating agreement by a debtor" For the limited partnerships in which the debtor was the general partner, the debtor operated the partnership. For the others, the debtor's actual control over the limited partnerships was sufficient to treat them as being operated under an operating agreement by the debtor. Therefore, the limited partnerships are affiliates of the debtor. The claims meet all section 510(b) elements and must be subordinated. Templeton v. O'Cheskey (In re Am. Housing Found.), 785 F.3d 143 (5th Cir. 2015).

6.2.bbb Section 510(b) subordinates exiting equity holder's judgment for share purchase. A holder of a minority interest in an LLC exercised her right to withdraw. The LLC elected to purchase her interest based on a valuation procedure in the LLC operating agreement. An arbitrator awarded her a fixed amount of damages, on which she obtained a state court judgment. Nine months later, the LLC filed bankruptcy. Section 510(b) requires the court to subordinate a claim for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security. The claim here arose from damages for the LLC's breach of the operating agreement. A claim arises from the purchase or sale of a security if there is a sufficient nexus or causal relationship between the claim and the purchase or sale of a security, regardless of whether the claim is debt or equity at the petition date. Because the judgment arose from her underlying equity investment in the debtor, it arises from the purchase or sale of the equity security and must be subordinated. Pensco Trust Co. v. Tristar Esperanza Props., LLC (In re Tristar Esperanza Props.), 782 F.3d 492 (9th Cir. 2015).

- 6.2.ccc Section 510(b) subordinates minority shareholders' buyout order claim. The debtor's minority shareholders sued the debtor and the majority shareholders for dissolution. Under applicable state corporate law, the debtor and the majority agreed to purchase the minority's shares. After an appraisal proceeding, the state court issued an order requiring the debtor to purchase the shares at a fixed price by a deadline, failing which the corporation would be dissolved, and the shareholders would receive from the corporation the actual value of the shares. Shortly before the deadline, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The court determined that the minority had a right to payment, not an equity interest. Section 510(b) requires the court to subordinate a claim for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security. A claim arises from the purchase or sale of a security if the claim has a causal nexus with a purchase or sale or a failure to effect a purchase or sale. Once a court finds a causal nexus, a court must look behind a judgment or a claim to determine the type of claim, to prevent a claimant from characterizing the claim to avoid section 510(b)'s reach. A court should look to the claimant's expectations at the time of underlying investment to determine whether it was an equity or debt investment. In this case, the minority sought recovery on its equity investment. Therefore, section 510(b) applies, and the court subordinates the claim. Orange County Nursery, Inc. v. The Minority Voting Trust (In re Orange County Nursery, Inc.), 523 B.R. 692 (C.D. Cal. 2014).
- 6.2.ddd Section 510(b) subordinates claim against broker-dealer for failure to purchase parent's debt securities. The debtor broker-dealer was the creditor's executing broker. The creditor held the debtor's parent's unsecured bonds. It sold them before the debtor's SIPA proceeding, but the debtor did not complete the transaction, leaving the creditor with a loss when it later sold the bonds, for which it asserted a claim against the debtor. Section 510(b) requires subordination of a claim for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor. Courts read "arising from" broadly, to include a claim that would not have arisen but for a purchase or sale. Therefore, section 510(b) applies to the damage claim here for failure to purchase the affiliate's security. Section 510(b) specifies the subordination level, which is subordination to "all claims or interests that are senior or equal to the claim or interest represented by the [security]," separately referencing the claim subject to subordination, the underlying security, and the claim the security represents. Section 510(b) applies to securities of a debtor's affiliate, so it applies even though the underlying security is not within the debtor's capital structure or claim priority ladder. The subordination level is based on the kind of claim the security represents. Here, the bonds represented general unsecured claims against the debtor's parent. Therefore, it is subordinated to general unsecured claims against the debtor. In re Lehman Bros., Inc., 519 B.R. 434 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 6.2.eee IRS claim for reimbursement of replacement refund check is not entitled to priority. The trustee filed amended tax returns for the individual debtor to carry back her net operating losses for prepetition years. The IRS accepted the amendments and mailed a refund check, but to the debtor, who cashed the check and spent the money. The trustee sued the IRS for turnover, which the bankruptcy court ordered. The IRS then filed a proof of a priority tax claim for the extra refund. Section 507(c) provides "a claim of a governmental unit arising from an erroneous refund ... has the same priority as a claim for the tax to which such refund or credit is due." In this case, the refund was not erroneous; it was correct. But the IRS sent the check to the wrong place. Therefore, section 507(c) does not apply, and the IRS's claim for priority is disallowed. McCarthy v. IRS (In re Naeem), 515 B.R. 297 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2014).
- 6.2.fff Section 510(a) trumps section 726(a)(3). An agreement between the senior note indenture trustee and the junior note trustee subordinated the junior note claims to the senior note claims. The junior note trustee filed a claim before the bar date; the senior note trustee filed a claim long after the bar date. Section 726(a) specifies the priority of payments: timely filed allowed claims are paid before untimely filed claims. But section 510(a) requires the court to enforce a subordination agreement. Applicable nonbankruptcy law in this case enforces a waiver of a subordination agreement only if the waiver was knowing, voluntary, and intentional. Filing a claim after the bar date does not meet that standard. Section 726(a)(3) permits distribution on a late-filed claim, so it does not require subordination of a late-filed senior claim if the parties have agreed otherwise. Therefore, the trustee must pay the senior claim. Bank of N.Y. Mellon Trust Co., N.A. v. Miller (In re Franklin Bank Corp.), 526 B.R. 527 (D. Del. 2014).

6.2.ggg Claim for damages resulting from debtor’s default in purchasing parent’s unsecured bond is subordinated to unsecured claims against debtor.

The parent’s broker-dealer subsidiary agreed to purchase the parent’s general unsecured bonds from an investor. Before settlement, the parent filed bankruptcy, and the broker-dealer did not complete the purchase. A SIPA proceeding for the broker-dealer was commenced days later. The investor filed a claim in the SIPA proceeding. Section 510(b) subordinates a claim “for damages arising from the purchase or sale” of such a security of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor “to all claims or interests that are senior to or equal to the claim or interest represented by such security.” “Arising from” implies a causal relationship between the claim and a purchase or sale but does not require an actual purchase or sale, if the claim arises from a failed purchase or sale. Therefore, section 510(b) applies to the claim. The section separately refers to the underlying security and the claim or interest represented by the security. It does not tie subordination to a security within the debtor’s capital structure, only to the level of a security within the capital structure. Here, the claim “represented by” the security is the bond claim against the parent, which is a general unsecured claim. Therefore, the investor’s claim against the broker-dealer is subordinated to general unsecured claims against the broker-dealer. In re Lehman Brothers Inc., 519 B.R. 434 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).

6.2.hhh Securities of a debtor-sponsored securitization vehicle are not securities “of” the debtor under section 510(b).

The debtor created, funded, and marketed the certificates of a mortgage-backed securitization trust. Under the Securities Act of 1933, those functions make the debtor the “issuer.” However, the prospectus for the certificates made clear that the trust and the mortgages it held were the sole payment source of the certificates, which did not represent any obligation of or interest in the debtor. A holder of trust certificates filed a claim against the debtor alleging misrepresentation under the Securities Act. Section 510(b) subordinates the claim of a creditor arising from the purchase or sale “of a security of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor.” This provision prevents an investor who takes debt or equity risk of the debtor from elevating a claim above the level of the investor’s security. The certificates here do not involve any debt or equity risk of the debtor or any part of the debtor’s capital structure, only risk of the mortgage pool that backs the trust. Accordingly, they are not “securities of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor.” Their status under the Securities Act and the “issuer” label the Securities Act places on the debtor are for regulatory purposes and do not change the bankruptcy law analysis. In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc., 513 B.R. 624 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).

6.2.iii Prepetition DIP lending breakup fee is not allowable as an administrative expense.

Shortly before bankruptcy, as an alternative to debtor in possession financing with its regular bank lender, the debtor entered into a contract for DIP financing with another lender. The contract committed the debtor to pay the lender a breakup fee if the debtor, as DIP, obtained other DIP financing. After entering into the contract, the debtor reached agreement with its regular bank lender and, after the petition, sought and obtained court approval of DIP financing from the bank. The other lender sought allowance of the breakup fee as an administrative expense. Section 503(b) allows as an administrative expense the actual and necessary costs and expenses of administering the estate. The expense must arise from a transaction with the DIP and must directly and substantially benefit the estate. Here, the lender’s contract was with the prepetition debtor, and any benefit of providing the debtor negotiating leverage with the bank accrued prepetition. Therefore, the claim is not allowable as an administrative expense. In re C & K Market, Inc., 2014 Bankr. LEXIS 1510 (Bankr. D. Ore. Apr. 8, 2014).

- 6.2.jjj Court subordinates claim against stockbroker for failed trade of parent's bond. The debtor stockbroker failed to execute a sale for a client of a bond issued by the debtor's parent. The client asserted a claim for damages. Section 510(b) requires subordination of "a claim arising from rescission of a purchase or sale of a security of the debtor or of an affiliate of the debtor, for damages arising from the purchase or sale of such a security ... to all claims or interests that are senior to or equal to the claim or interest represented by such security" The bond was a security of the debtor's affiliate. Though the "claim ... represented by such security" is a claim against the parent, not the debtor, the phrase must be interpreted to apply to the priority of the claim represented by such security. Otherwise, the phrase would have no meaning when applied to an affiliate's security, and the section would not receive the broad interpretation that the courts have required. Therefore, the claim must be subordinated to the general unsecured claims against the debtor. The court does not address the absence of a sale or a rescission of the security. In re Lehman Bros., Inc., 503 B.R. 778 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 6.2.kkk Contempt sanctions for postpetition environmental violations are entitled to administrative expense priority. Before bankruptcy, the state obtained a state court injunction requiring the debtor to bring facilities into compliance with environmental laws. The state brought a contempt motion in the state court, claiming the debtor had not complied with the injunction. While the contempt motion was pending, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case and continued operations. The state court stayed proceedings, but the bankruptcy court ruled that the automatic stay did not apply. The state court then issued a contempt citation and imposed a daily fine pending compliance. The debtor in possession did not comply, and the state requested assessment of the penalties, which the state court granted. Section 503(b) grants administrative expense priority to the actual and necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate. Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), granted administrative expense priority to a tort claim resulting from the estate's business operation. Here, although state court issued the initial compliance order before bankruptcy, it imposed contempt sanctions for postpetition noncompliance. Therefore, the sanctions qualify as an administrative expense, whether compensatory or punitive, as long as they were incurred in the postpetition business operation. Munce's Superior Petroleum Prods., Inc. v. N.H. Dept. of Enviro. Servs., 736 F.3d 567 (1st Cir. 2013).
- 6.2.iii Section 510(b) subordinates claim for debtor's failure to issue additional stock. The debtor used its own stock to purchase stock of the seller's subsidiary. The agreement provided that the debtor would issue more of its stock to the seller if the debtor's the stock price declined. The agreement also required the debtor to assume the subsidiary's real property leases. The debtor did not assume the leases, its stock price declined, and the debtor filed bankruptcy. Section 510(b) subordinates a claim for "damages arising from the purchase or sale of a" security of the debtor. Damages arise from the purchase or sale when they originate from the purchase or sale and are causally connected to the purchase or sale. Section 510(b) does not distinguish between fraud claims and breach of contract claims. It prevents a party who has bargained for the upside of being a shareholder from converting to creditor status on the downside. Here, the seller's claim arising from the debtor's obligation to issue more shares is a claim arising from the debtor's sale of its securities and so is directly within section 510(b). The seller's right to more shares gave the seller the risks and rewards of a stockholder, not of a creditor. Therefore, section 510(b) subordinates the claim for nondelivery of the additional shares. However, the seller did not take equity risk and rewards in connection with the debtor's agreement to assume the subsidiary's leases. It was collateral to the purchase and sale of the debtor's stock. Therefore, section 510(b) does not subordinate that claim. KIT Digital, Inc. v. Invigor Group Ltd. (In re KIT Digital, Inc.), 497 B.R. 170 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

6.2.mmm Electricity is not “goods.” A municipal lighting plant supplied the debtor with electricity. After bankruptcy, the plant asserted an administrative expense priority claim for electricity supplied within 20 days before bankruptcy. Section 503(b)(9) grants an administrative expense priority to a claim of a supplier for goods received by the debtor within 20 days before bankruptcy and sold to the debtor in the ordinary course of business. Courts should look to U.C.C. Article 2 for a definition of “goods”. U.C.C. § 2-105(1) defines “goods” as “all things ... which are movable at the time of identification to the contract for sale.” Electricity becomes identifiable to the contract when it passes through the meter at the buyer’s location. The buyer uses the electricity an infinitesimal period later. The electricity moves between the meter and consumption point and is therefore in some sense “movable,” but the infinitesimal period is not a meaningful period that makes the electricity movable in any practical sense. Moreover, electricity cannot be stored, and it cannot be reclaimed, so it is not eligible for reclamation under section 546(c), which should be read in conjunction with section 503(b)(9), as they were added to the Bankruptcy Code at the same time. For these reasons, among others, electricity is not “goods,” and the supplier is not entitled to an administrative priority claim under section 503(b)(9). In re NE Opco, Inc., 501 B.R. 233 (Bankr. D. Del. 2013). Accord In re PMC Marketing Corp., 501 B.R. 17 (Bankr. D.P.R. 2013).

6.2.nnn Late filed tax return penalties are not costs of preserving a chapter 7 estate. The chapter 7 trustee for a subchapter S corporation, under the mistaken belief that he did not need to file the corporation’s annual information returns, filed them late. The IRS assessed penalties for the late filings. Section 503(b)(1)(A) grants administrative expense priority to “the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate.” The priority should be narrowly construed. To qualify, a claimant must have provided actual benefit to the estate in incurring the claim. Here, the trustee was not operating a business, so the penalties were not incurred to benefit or preserve the estate. Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), held that fairness may entitle certain claims to administrative expense priority, even if the claimant did not benefit the estate in incurring the claim, if the claim was for a cost ordinarily incident to operating a business, such as for tortious or active wrongdoing. Here, the trustee was not operating a business and did not engage in active wrongdoing. Granting administrative expense priority would harm general unsecured creditors, who could not have benefitted from the trustee’s conduct. Therefore, Reading does not apply. The appellate panel remands for the bankruptcy court to determine whether there is any other basis for administrative expense priority. Kipperman v. I.R.S. (In re 800Ideas.com, Inc.), 496 B.R. 165 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2013).

6.2.ooo Court subordinates LLC interest buy-back claim. The LLC member withdrew from the LLC under the LLC’s operating agreement, which entitled her to payment of the appraised amount of her interest. After the LLC refused to pay, she obtained a judgment against the LLC for the amount owed. The LLC then filed bankruptcy. Section 510(b) subordinates a claim “for damages arising from the purchase or sale of” a security of the debtor. The non-limiting definition of “security” includes equity interests similar to LLC interests, so an LLC interest is a security. Section 510(b) does not contain any limitation on the nature of “damages” to which it applies; the term includes loss from breach of contract as well as from fraud or another tort. Similarly, courts construe “purchase or sale” in section 510(b) broadly to encompass the underlying principle that an equity investor takes the risks and rewards of an enterprise and should not be able to elevate an equity interest to a priority that competes with creditors who have only fixed claims. Here, the investor’s claim was for purchase of her interests and so comes within section 510(b)’s mandatory subordination rule. O’Donnell v. Tristar Esperanza Props., LLC (In re Tristar Esperanza Props., LLC), 488 B.R. 394 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2013).

6.2.ppp Stockholder claim to enforce settlement agreement arising from failure to hold a stockholder meeting is not subordinated. Stockholders sued the debtor for failure to hold a stockholder meeting. The debtor settled by agreeing to pay all the stockholders’ expenses and to direct 50% of certain receivables to the stockholders. Though the debtor made an initial payment, it did not make later payments. The stockholders sued to enforce the settlement agreement. While that action was pending, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. During the bankruptcy, a trustee was appointed. The chapter 11 trustee negotiated a settlement with the stockholders to allow a claim as a general unsecured claim. Section 510(b) subordinates the claim of a stockholder “arising from the rescission of a purchase or sale of a security of the debtor ..., for damages arising from the purchase or sale of such a security, or for reimbursement or contribution ... on account of such a claim”. Courts have applied section 510(b) broadly to ensure that equity holders may not assert claims that are disguised attempts to recover equity interests, but there still must be some connection between the claim and a purchase or sale of stock. The section does not subordinate any stockholder claim that is merely connected with stock ownership. To apply section 510(b), courts look behind a judgment or a settlement agreement to determine the underlying nature of the claim. Here, the underlying claim relates to litigation over holding a stockholder meeting. The claim does not seek recovery on account of the stockholders’ equity interests. Therefore, it is not subordinated. Stucki v. Orwig, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53139 (N.D. Tex. Apr. 12, 2013).

6.2.qqq Court may not allow a creditor’s “substantial contribution” claim in a chapter 7 case.

A creditor made a substantial contribution in a chapter 7 case, resulting in increased recoveries for all creditors, and sought allowance of its attorneys’ fees as an administrative expense. Section 503(b) permits allowance of administrative expenses, “including ... (3) the actual, necessary expenses ... incurred by (D) a creditor ... in making a substantial contribution in a case under chapter 9 or 11.” Although “including” is not exclusive, section 503(b)(3)(D)’s express limitation to chapter 9 and 11 cases suggests that Congress did not intend that substantial contribution claims be allowed in a chapter 7 case. Therefore, the court denies the administrative expense claim. In re Connolly N. Am., LLC, 479 B.R. 719 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2012).

6.2.rrr Claim for severance pay under rejected employment contract is entitled to priority. The debtor in possession terminated the employee after bankruptcy. The employee filed a claim for severance pay owing under his prepetition employment contract, which entitled him to severance pay if the debtor terminated him without cause. Section 507(a)(4) grants priority to an unsecured compensation claim, including severance pay earned within 180 days before bankruptcy. Here, the severance pay was earned upon satisfaction of the condition that he be terminated without cause. Because the debtor in possession rejected his employment contract, his claim for damages is deemed to arise immediately before the petition date, which is within 180 days before bankruptcy. Even if the contract is not executory, the postpetition termination still gives rise to a prepetition claim. The severance payment right was a prepetition contingent obligation that became fixed upon termination. The claim is therefore entitled to the prepetition wage priority. In re Ellipsat, Inc., 480 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2012).

6.2.sss Staffing agency’s claim for benefits paid to employees is not entitled to priority. The debtor used a staffing agency to provide it with employees. The staffing agency agreed to pay all employee compensation and all taxes, such as FICA and Medicare taxes, and unemployment and other insurance. The agency sought priority for its claim for taxes and insurance under section 507(a)(5) as a claim “for contributions to an employee benefit plan”. Section 507(a)(5) is not limited by its terms to claims of individuals, as the section 507(a)(4) wage priority is, but it is still intended to supplement the wage priority to protect the debtor’s employees who traded wages for benefits. Here, the employees were not the debtor’s employees. Neither the wage nor the benefits priority applies to individuals who have never been direct employees of the debtor. In addition, even if the employees were considered the debtor’s employees whose claims the agency had paid, under section 507(d), the agency does not subrogate to the employees’ priority. Therefore, the agency’s claim is not entitled to priority. In re DeWitt Rehab. & Nursing Ctr., Inc., 476 B.R. 827 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

- 6.2.ttt Wage priority applies only to wages earned before termination of employment. Four years before bankruptcy, the debtor fired an employee, who then sued. The employee obtained a jury verdict for back pay, front pay and emotional distress damages in an amount substantially in excess of the employee's annual salary. The debtor filed bankruptcy soon thereafter. The employee filed a proof of claim for the jury verdict amount, asserting the wage priority for a portion of the claim. Section 507(a)(4) gives priority to "allowed unsecured claims ... earned within 180 days before" bankruptcy. Salary can be earned only while the individual is employed, so any claim for salary is earned no later than the termination of the individual's employment. In this case, the debtor terminated the former employee several years before bankruptcy, so none of his claim was entitled to priority. Belson v. Olson Rug Co., 483 B.R. 660 (N.D. Ill. 2012).
- 6.2.uuu Unpaid sales taxes collected from customers are entitled to priority without time limit under section 507(a)(8)(C). The individual debtor operated a business in corporate form. The corporation failed to pay the state sales taxes that it had collected from customers. State law makes the principal liable for any such unpaid taxes, characterizing the taxes as being held in trust pending payment to the state. Section 507(a)(8)(C) grants priority to "a tax required to be collected or withheld and for which the debtor is liable in whatever capacity," without a time limitation. Section 507(a)(8)(E) grants priority to "an excise tax" on a transaction within three years before bankruptcy. Taxes entitled to priority under either subparagraph are nondischargeable in an individual debtor's case. The sales taxes here might qualify under either of the subparagraphs. Because it is unclear which subparagraph encompasses the taxes, resort to the legislative history is appropriate. But the legislative history is equally unclear. Therefore, the court may turn to policy considerations. Providing a debtor a fresh start and creditors a maximum distribution are two fundamental bankruptcy policies. However, the Code should not be interpreted to give a debtor an incentive to refuse to turn over state sales taxes once he knows he is in financial trouble. This latter policy weighs more heavily. In addition, the taxes are similar to trust fund taxes withheld from employees' paychecks. The taxes are funds in which the debtor never held an equitable interest. Therefore, the sales taxes should be treated under section 507(a)(8)(C) as "taxes collected or withheld" and are entitled to priority and are nondischargeable without time limit. The court does not consider the possibility that the two subparagraphs are not necessarily mutually exclusive and that the tax might qualify under both. In re Calabrese, 689 F.3d 312 (3d Cir. 2012).
- 6.2.vvv Employees earn severance upon termination. The debtor implemented a severance pay plan for its employees which entitled them to a payment, based on length of service, upon termination of employment without cause. The debtor reserved the right to amend or terminate the plan at any time. Employees who were terminated within 180 days before the petition date filed a priority claim for their severance pay. Section 507(a)(4) grants priority to an individual's claim for "wages, salaries, or commissions, including vacation, severance, and sick leave pay" "earned within 180 days before the date of the filing of the petition". An individual earns pay when he becomes entitled to receive it. The severance pay here was earned upon termination, not over the course of the employees' employment, even though the measure was based on length of service. Otherwise, if the employee had earned the severance pay each week he worked for the debtor, the debtor could not have terminated the plan and divested the employee of the earnings. Therefore, the claims are entitled to priority under section 507(a)(4). The result may differ from a claim for severance pay after a postpetition termination, because section 503(a)(1), which governs payment of administrative expenses, uses different language to define which claims are entitled to priority. Matson v. Alarcon, 651 F.3d 404 (4th Cir. 2011).
- 6.2.www Reading v. Brown does not apply in a non-operating chapter 7 case. The debtor installed and operated a system to collect and sell methane and other gases generated in a landfill. It filed a chapter 11 case and continued to operate the system for four years as a debtor in possession, after which a chapter 11 trustee was appointed. Two years later, the case converted to chapter 7, and a different chapter 7 trustee was appointed. The system did not function properly during the entire bankruptcy case, but it did not fail until four days after the chapter 7 trustee's appointment. When it failed, it released noxious odors into a hotel adjacent to the landfill. The hotel owner filed an administrative expense claim in the chapter 7 case for the loss of the hotel's value resulting from the incident. Reading v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), gives administrative expense priority to the claim of a party who is injured by the operation of a business in chapter 11. Reading's touchstone is the operation of the business, not the chapter in which the trustee operates, because tort expenses are part of the ordinary and necessary expenses of operation. Here, however, the chapter 7 trustee was not operating a business in any meaningful sense. He was not attempting to achieve improved recoveries for creditors by keeping the system functioning. He operated only for a short time and only under compulsion of Midlantic Nat'l Bank v. N.J. Dep't of Enviro. Protection, 474 U.S. 494 (1986), which prohibits a trustee from abandoning environmentally hazardous materials. Therefore, the estate is not liable for the tort as an administrative expense. In re Resource Tech. Corp., 662 F.3d 472 (7th Cir. 2011).

6.2.xxx A claim for the amount owing under a note is not subject to subordination under section 510(b). The debtor issued notes that were exchangeable for an amount of cash based on the value of a reference security. The notes were contractually subordinated in right of payment to "senior indebtedness". Before bankruptcy, some holders exercised their exchange right, which would have entitled them to a cash payment substantially in advance of the notes' maturity. The debtor did not pay them in cash. Section 510(b) subordinates a claim "for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security". The notes are "securities" under section 101(49), but the exchanging noteholders' claims are not claims for "damages". The claims are for payments on the notes. More generally, section 510(b) is designed to prevent disappointed creditors or equity holders from attempting to elevate their position in the capital structure by asserting a claim for damages rather than under the instrument under which they assert their claim or interest. The exchanging noteholders are not doing so here. They seek only payment of the amount owed on the notes at the priority level specified in the notes. Therefore, section 510(b) does not apply to their claims. In re Tribune Co., 464 B.R. 126 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

6.2.yyy A fraudulent transfer claim is not an asset of the debtor for purposes of applying a contractual subordination provision. The debtor issued notes that were contractually subordinated in right of payment to senior indebtedness "upon distribution of assets of the Company in the event of any ... bankruptcy case". The chapter 11 plan established a litigation trust to pursue fraudulent transfer claims that the debtor in possession could assert. The Bankruptcy Code and applicable state law provide fraudulent transfer claims to the trustee and creditors, respectively, but not to the debtor, who may not pursue such claims. Therefore, any distribution from the litigation trust is not from "assets of the Company" and is not subject to the notes' subordination provision. In re Tribune Co., 464 B.R. 126 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

6.2.zzz Mortgage on after-acquired rents trumps a federal tax lien. The bank had a mortgage on the borrower's property and on all rents "derived or owned by the Mortgagor directly or indirectly from the Real Estate or Improvements". The borrower defaulted, and the bank obtained the appointment of a receiver for the property. The borrower also defaulted on his taxes, and the IRS filed a federal tax lien against the borrower. The receiver rented the property after the IRS filed the tax lien. Under Internal Revenue Code section 6323(h)(1), a federal tax lien is junior only to a lien or other interest if, when the interest is acquired, "the property is in existence and the interest has become protected under local law against a subsequent judgment lien arising out of an unsecured obligation". Property is "in existence" if it is a source of value for repaying an obligation, such as proceeds. Thus, a federal tax lien does not take priority over a lender's security interest in proceeds that are generated after the tax lien is perfected. The rents generated by the real property are proceeds of the property, every bit as much as sale proceeds. The rents represent value derived from the property, not newly created property. Therefore, the tax lien is junior to the bank's lien on rents. Parenthetically, the court rejects using the concept of "choateness" as a measure of whether the property is in existence, both on linguistic and legal grounds. Bloomfield State Bank v. U.S., 644 F. 3d 521 (7th Cir. 2011).

6.2.aaaa Electricity is a good for purposes of section 503(b)(9). Section 503(b)(9) gives administrative expense priority to a seller of goods that the debtor received within 20 days before bankruptcy. Electricity suppliers sought administrative expense priority. As used in section 503(b)(9), "goods" has the meaning assigned in the U.C.C., which is "things that are moveable at the time of identification to a contract for sale". Electricity is identified for sale when it is metered. It moves through the electric lines from the power source to the meter to the loan, however rapidly, and therefore meets the definition of "goods". Section 366, providing special protection to suppliers of "utility services" does not indicate a Congressional intent to treat electricity as goods. Therefore, the supplier's claim is entitled to priority. GFI Wisc., Inc. v. Reedsburg Util. Comm'n, 440 B.R. 791 (W.D. Wis. 2010).

6.2.bbbb Securities purchase rescission claims against the parent arising from the sale of a subsidiary's securities are subordinated to the parent's general unsecured claims. Creditors asserted claims against the debtor parent for misrepresentation in the selling of a subsidiary's securities. The parent had issued senior debt securities of its own and also had general unsecured claims. Section 510(b) requires subordination of claims arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor or an affiliate of the debtor to all claims that are senior or equal to the claim represented by the security. At the parent level, the misrepresentation claim is a general unsecured claim, not a security claim and so is subordinated to all claims that are senior or equal to general unsecured claims. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 442 B.R. 314 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

6.2.cccc Reclaiming creditor must do more to preserve claim than give written reclamation notice. On the petition date, the court approved debtor in possession financing, which was secured by the debtor in possession's inventory and was used to repay prepetition financing that was secured by the debtor's inventory. A creditor gave the debtor in possession a written reclamation notice one day after the bankruptcy petition. Three days after the petition date, on the debtor in possession's motion seeking an orderly reclamation procedure and warning of the likely spate of litigation that might occur in its absence, the court ordered reclamation claimants to file demands no later than 20 days after the petition date. The order provided that it did not limit or expand other remedies or a claimant's rights. The debtor in possession's reorganization efforts failed, so two months later, with the court's approval on notice to creditors, it conducted going out of business sales. Section 546(c) makes the trustee's avoiding powers "subject to the right of a seller of goods ... to reclaim such goods" if the seller makes timely written demand for reclamation. Section 546(c) is not self-executing. A reclaiming creditor must diligently assert its rights. Filing a written demand without more, such as seeking stay relief to reclaim goods, objecting to debtor in possession financing that liens the goods or to a going out of business sale that results in sale of the goods, is insufficient to preserve the reclaiming creditor's legal rights in the bankruptcy case. Therefore, the creditor lost its right to reclaim the goods or to an administrative expense for their use during the chapter 11 case. Paramount Home Entertainments Inc. v. Circuit City Stores, Inc., 445 B.R. 521 (E.D. Va. 2010).

6.2.dddd Severance pay is earned upon termination. The debtor maintained a severance plan that promised payment upon severance without cause equal to a specified number of weeks of salary based on number of completed years of service. The debtor terminated employees within 180 days before the petition date. The terminated employees asserted priority claims for their severance benefits. Section 507(a)(4) grants priority to "wages, salaries, or commissions, including vacation, severance, or sick leave pay, earned by an individual" within 180 days before bankruptcy. This provision differs in its application to severance pay from section 503(b)(1)'s application to severance pay owing for postpetition termination, because section 503(b)(1) grants administrative expense priority to wages for “services rendered” to the estate, regardless of when the wages were earned. Severance pay is neither earned nor accrued on a daily basis: if an employee quits, the employer owes no severance pay, and an employee who works for most but not all of an additional year does not become entitled to additional severance, but an employee who may have worked only a few additional days becomes entitled to the additional amount. In addition, severance is to compensate for the dislocation resulting from termination of employment, not for work performed. Therefore, severance pay is earned for purposes of section 507(a)(4) upon termination, and the employee’s claims are entitled to priority if termination occurred within 180 days before bankruptcy. In re LandAmerica Fin. Group, 435 B.R. 343 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2010).

- 6.2.eeee Backpay award for violation of a collective bargaining agreement is not allowable as an administrative expense. The debtor terminated the employee before bankruptcy. Claiming a violation of the collective bargaining agreement, the employee’s union brought an arbitration proceeding against the debtor. During the arbitration proceeding, the debtor filed its chapter 11 case. The arbitrator awarded the employee reinstatement and backpay for the period of unemployment, which spanned the pre- and post-petition periods. Section 503(b)(1)(A) allows as an administrative expense “the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate, including (i) wages ... for services rendered after the commencement of the case; and (ii) wages ... awarded ... as backpay attributable to any period of time occurring after commencement of the case under this title, as a result of a violation of Federal or State law by the debtor”. The “and” between clauses (i) and (ii) does not require that the claim satisfy both clauses to qualify as an administrative expense. Rather, “and” joins a list following “including”, which renders each kind of claim allowable. Rather, clause (ii) allows the portion of the claim attributable to the postpetition time period. However, violation of a collective bargaining agreement is not a violation of federal or state law. Therefore, none of the backpay claim is allowable as an administrative expense. In re Phila. Newspapers, LLC, 433 B.R. 164 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2010).
- 6.2.ffff Goods are “received” when the debtor obtains physical possession. The supplier consigned goods to the debtor under a contract that provided for transfer of title simultaneously with the debtor’s sale of the goods to a customer. The supplier delivered goods to the debtor under the contract more than 20 days before bankruptcy. The debtor sold the goods to customers within 20 days before bankruptcy. The supplier sought allowance of an administrative expense for its claim for the goods under section 503(b)(9), which grants priority to a claim for the value of any goods the debtor “received” within 20 days before bankruptcy. The Code does not define “received”. When the Code does not define a term, the court should look to state law. However, looking only to state law could cause inconsistent results, depending on where the debtor received the goods. Therefore, the court adopts a federal definition of “received”. It is appropriate to look to U.C.C. section 2-103(c) to define “receipt” as “taking physical possession”. “Received” and “receipt” are similar terms, and the Code uses them in parallel in section 546(c), so “received” should have the same meaning as “receipt”. In addition, the parties’ contract uses “received” to refer to the taking of physical possession. Therefore, the debtor received the goods when it obtained physical possession, more than 20 days before bankruptcy, not when it obtained title, and the supplier’s claim is not allowable as an administrative expense under section 503(b)(9). The court did not need to reach the issue of whether the supply contract provided for a true consignment or whether title passed upon the debtor’s receipt of the goods. In re Circuit City Stores, Inc., 432 B.R. 225 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2010).

- 6.2.gggg Postconfirmation payments are not “actual” expenses of administration. The debtor in possession obtained workers’ compensation insurance with a retrospective premium adjustment. That is, the insurer advanced the payments to the injured workers over time, and the insured was required to reimburse the insurer. Some of the debtor in possession’s employees were injured during the policy period and were entitled to workers’ compensation benefits, which the insurer was obligated to pay. The payments were to extend into the future, beyond the effective date of the debtor’s plan. The insurer and the reorganized debtor arbitrated the amount of the expected future payments, and after the award, the insurer sought allowance of the amount as an administrative expense. A claim may be allowed as an administrative expense if it is an “actual and necessary” cost or expense of preserving the estate. Here, the expenses were not “actual”, because they had not yet been paid, and they could not benefit the estate, because the estate terminated upon the plan’s effective date. Therefore, the claim is not allowable as an administrative expense. Nat’l Union Fire Ins. Co. v. VP Bldgs., Inc., 606 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 2010).
- 6.2.hhhh Postpetition chapter 9 claims are not entitled to allowance as administrative expenses. A chapter 9 debtor incurred obligations postpetition but deferred their payment indefinitely (though not permanently). The claimants sought timely payment of the obligations as administrative expenses of the chapter 9 case. Section 503(b)(1) allows the “actual and necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate” as administrative expenses. A chapter 9 petition does not create an estate. Therefore, costs and expenses cannot preserve the estate, and a municipality’s operating expenses are not administrative expenses. The court may not interfere with any of the property or revenues of a chapter 9 debtor unless the debtor consents. The debtor’s consent in this case does not change the result, because the consent does not create an estate that can be preserved. In re New York City Off-Track Betting Corp., 434 B.R. 131 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 6.2.iii Electricity is “goods”. The supplier supplied electricity to the debtor within 20 days before bankruptcy. Section 503(b)(9) grants administrative priority to claims for “the value of any goods received by the debtor within 20 days before” bankruptcy. The priority applies only to “goods received”. Services are not covered. Therefore, the U.C.C.’s “predominant factor” test in determining whether something is “goods” has no place in the Code, which grants priority only to the value of goods. The Code does not define “goods”. However, courts must apply the common meaning of a term that Congress uses that has acquired a common meaning. The widespread adoption of Article 2 of U.C.C., which deals with “goods”, provides a source for defining the term. As section 503(b)(9) is a federal statute, the definition must be uniform. Therefore, the court should look to the model U.C.C., independent of any state variations. The U.C.C. defines “goods” as “all things ... which are movable at the time of identification to the contract for sale ...”. Electricity is movable; it is transmitted over wires. It is identified to the contract and sold when it passes through the meter, which precedes, if only by an imperceptible amount of time, its use and consumption. Therefore, it is movable (and moving) when it is identified to the contract and qualifies as goods. In re Erving Inds., Inc., 432 B.R. 354 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2010).
- 6.2.jjjj Subordinated creditor’s examiner motion is an act to collect that is barred by its subordination agreement. A subordinated creditor of two of sixteen chapter 11 debtors objected to the debtors’ proposed allocation of proceeds from the sale of all debtors’ consolidated assets and moved for the appointment of an examiner to investigate an appropriate allocation. Under its subordination agreement, the creditor agreed not to “exercise any rights or remedies or take any action or proceeding to collect or enforce any of” its claims before the senior creditor was paid in full, without the senior creditor’s consent, and waived any legal or equitable principles or provisions that might be in conflict with the subordination agreement. Section 510(a) requires the court to enforce a subordination agreement. The examiner motion is tantamount to an effort by the creditor to collect its subordinated claim. Therefore, the creditor does not have standing to move for an examiner. An examiner is mandatory only when requested by a party in interest and so is not required in this case. In re Erickson Retirement Communities, LLC, 425 B.R. 308 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2010).

6.2.kkkk Court defines “goods” for purposes of section 503(b)(9). Various suppliers asserted claims for administrative expense priority under section 503(b)(9), which gives priority to a claim for “the value of any goods received by the debtor within 20 days before” bankruptcy, if the goods were sold to the debtor in the ordinary course of business. The Code does not define “goods”. First, the definition is a federal question, because the priority implements a federal policy without reference to state law. The U.C.C. may provide guidance on the definition of “goods”, but only the “model” version, not individual state variations. The U.C.C. definition requires that goods be movable at the time of identification, and it includes minerals, including oil and gas, within its definition of goods. Second, priorities are narrowly construed. Therefore, the scope of “goods” should be narrowly construed. Third, the Code does not grant priority for services, nor for a claim under a contract that provides for delivery of goods and services. Therefore, the U.C.C.’s “predominant factor” test is not relevant; a supplier is entitled to priority only for the goods the debtor receives. Finally, “value”, also not defined, should be determined as the amount the debtor would have to pay to acquire similar goods, consistent with the concept in both section 506(a) and in allowing an administrative claim for postpetition goods or services under a rejected contract or lease. Based on this interpretation, “electricity” is not a good. It cannot be identified until it is used, and it cannot be packaged or handled. By contrast, natural gas is a good. The U.C.C. specifies it as such. Trucking services and the city’s sewer and waste removal services do not qualify, but the water the city supplied is a “good”. The suppliers have the burden of proving value. In re Pilgrim’s Pride Corp., 421 B.R. 231 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2009).

6.2.iiiii Section 510(a) applies only to fixed subordination agreements. The U.S. debtor entered into a credit default swap with a synthetic collateralized debt obligation SPV (CDO), which issued notes. The notes’ proceeds were held as collateral for the CDO’s obligations under both the notes and the swap. The security agreement, which was governed by English law, provided that the security interest of the debtor, as swap counterparty, had priority over the security interest of the noteholders, unless the debtor defaulted under the swap and amounts become payable after sale of the collateral. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, the collateral trustee issued a notice of default and terminated the swap. Section 510(a) requires the bankruptcy court to enforce a contractual subordination agreement. However, it applies only to such agreements that establish “priorities that are permanently fixed without regard to the unenforceable future contingency of a bankruptcy filing”. Therefore, it does not apply to protect the noteholders here. Lehman Bros. Special Financing Inc. v. BNY Corp. Trustee Servs. Ltd. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 422 B.R. 407 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

6.2.mmmmm Debtor’s payment to supplier within 20 days before petition date does not affect supplier’s 20-day administrative expense claim under section 503(b)(9). The debtor received goods from the supplier on July 11 and July 22 with an invoiced value of $302,512 and filed its chapter 11 petition on July 27. The debtor made two payments to the supplier totaling $279,910 on July 10 and July 23 that were designated as payments on prior invoices. The supplier asserted administrative expense priority for its $302,512 claim. Section 503(b)(9) provides “there shall be allowed administrative expenses, ... including ... the value of any goods received by the debtor within 20 days before” the petition date. In enacting section 503(b)(9), Congress intended to insure that certain ordinary course sellers receive priority over most other creditors. The provision does not restrict its application in any way, such as based on whether the supplier’s claim is secured, nor does it give the court authority to apply equitable considerations in allowing the claim as an administrative expense. Therefore, the court may not net the payments the supplier received in the 20-day prepetition period against the supplier’s administrative expense claim for the value of the goods the debtor received in that period. Southern Polymer, Inc. v. TI Acq., LLC (In re TI Acq., LLC), 410 B.R. 742 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2009).

6.2.nnnn Uniform Commercial Code definition of “goods” and predominant purpose test govern 20-day administrative expense claims. Section 503(b)(9) grants administrative expense priority for a claim for “the value of any goods received by the debtor within 20 days before the date of commencement of a case under this title in which the goods have been sold to the debtor in the ordinary course of such debtor’s business.” The Bankruptcy Code does not define “goods”. In such circumstances, the courts ordinarily should look to a word’s well-known meaning in the law generally and, in bankruptcy cases, should look to state law to define undefined terms. However, suppliers sold the debtor goods in 48 states in this case, and resorting to the law of 48 states would cause disparate results. Therefore, a federal rule should apply. A federal interpretation may rely on general state law to fill definitional gaps. The Uniform Commercial Code provides the rule of decision in at least 49 states and has come to provide the generally accepted definition of “goods”. In addition, Congress adopted section 503(b)(9) as part of its revision of reclamation law in bankruptcy. Before the amendment, the reclamation provision relied on the U.C.C. definition of “goods”, so Congress may be presumed to have intended that definition. Therefore, the court adopts the U.C.C. definition as the federal rule of decision for the scope of section 503(b)(9). The U.C.C. determines whether a contract is for the sale of goods or of services by the “predominant purpose” test. Although the statute grants priority for a claim arising from the sale of “any goods”, it also requires that the sale be “to the debtor in the ordinary course of such debtor’s business”. That formulation requires that goods have been sold to the debtor. The U.C.C. determines whether goods have been sold by the predominant purpose test. Therefore, that test should apply in determining whether a qualifying sale of goods to the debtor has occurred. In re Circuit City Stores, Inc., 416 B.R. 531 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2009).

6.2.0000 “Value” of goods received within 20 days prepetition is generally the invoice or purchase price. Section 503(b)(9) grants administrative expense priority for a claim for “the value of any goods received by the debtor within 20 days before” the petition date. The goods’ invoice or purchase price is presumptively the best value determinant, though the presumption may be rebutted by evidence to the contrary. The Bankruptcy Code does not define “goods”. All but one state has adopted Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. Adoption of its definition of goods is consistent with commercial expectation. “Goods” in section 503(b)(9) is therefore defined by reference to the U.C.C. In re SemCrude, L.P., 416 B.R. 299 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).

6.2.pppp Court subordinates limited partnership rescission judgment that was based on post-issuance conduct. Two groups formed the debtor limited partnership. One contributed expertise and contacts; the other contributed assets and cash. Dispute quickly arose, and the groups agreed to rescind the agreement. The debtor defaulted on the rescission agreement, resulting in a judgment in favor of the capital-contributing partner for return of the assets, which was accomplished, and for payment of an amount based on the contributed cash. The debtor soon filed bankruptcy and sought subordination of the limited partner’s judgment claim. Section 510(b) requires subordination of “a claim arising from rescission of a purchase or sale of a security of the debtor [or] damages arising from the purchase or sale of such a security”. Under section 101(49)(A)(xiii), a limited partnership interest is a “security”. “Rescission” in section 510(b) includes not only rescission under a judgment but also an agreement to rescind. Section 510(b) includes damage claims resulting from post-issuance conduct, such as a breach of contract, as long as the claim is “arising from”, that is, has some nexus or causal relationship with, the securities purchase or sale. Subordination is based on the investor’s having bargained for equity return and risk and creditors’ presumable reliance on the equity investment. Such factors do not apply differently if the debtor’s misconduct occurs after issuance rather than before. Finally, whether the creditor has obtained a judgment does not affect subordination, and the court may look through a judgment to determine if it was based on rescission of the purchase or sale of a security. Therefore, the court subordinates the creditor’s claim here. SaaQuest Diving, LP v. S&J Diving, Inc., 579 F.3d 411 (5th Cir. 2009).

6.2.qqqq Workers' compensation fund claim is not entitled to excise tax priority. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession failed to maintain its self-insured workers' compensation insurance. The state workers' compensation insurance fund drew on the letter of credit the debtor had posted to secure its obligations to the fund and asserted a priority excise tax claim against the estate for the balance owed.

A claim qualifies as an excise tax only if it is an involuntary pecuniary burden, imposed or authorized by legislation for a public purpose, such as defraying governmental expenses, under the state's police or taxing power and only if a private creditor similarly situated to the state cannot be hypothesized under the relevant statute. The last requirement carries out the Bankruptcy Code's equal distribution policy by preventing the state from having an advantage over similarly situated creditors. The parties did not dispute the applicability of any except the last test. Here, the letter of credit issuer as well as the injured worker could have a claim against the debtor of the same kind as the workers' compensation fund, unlike under other state workers' compensation schemes, under which only the fund may assert such claims. Therefore, the claim is not an excise tax entitled to priority. Calif. Self-Insurers' Sec. Fund v. Lorber Indus. of Calif. (In re Lorber Indus. of Calif.), 564 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2009).

6.2.rrrr Retiree health care claims are not entitled to priority under section 507(a)(5). A third party plan administrator administered the debtor's health care coverage for the debtor's employees and retirees. The administrator paid the employees' and retirees' claims, and the debtor was required to reimburse the administrator. The debtor filed bankruptcy owing substantial sums to the administrator. Section 507(a)(5) grants priority to "claims for contributions to an employee benefit plan ... arising from services rendered within 180 days before the date of the petition". The priority amount cap is based on the number of employees covered by the plan times the employee wage priority under section 507(a)(4) minus the aggregate amount paid to employees under the wage priority. Health care coverage is an employee benefit plan. Because the benefits priority and the wage priority are tied to each other, they should be construed together to determine the scope of the benefit priority's coverage. The wage priority applies only to payments to employees for services rendered within the 180 days before bankruptcy. The benefit priority should be construed in parallel, so the "services rendered within 180 days before" bankruptcy are only services of active employees during that period, not the services of retirees or of the health care plan administrator. However, the plan administrator's claim is entitled to priority to the extent it is for payment of health care expenses of covered employees. For the same reason, the cap amount is determined by the number of employees who rendered services during the 180-day period, whether or not they were employed at the petition date. The benefits priority cap amount is an aggregate amount, not a per employee cap, because the benefits priority provision does not include the phrase "for each individual" in referring to the cap amount. Consol. Freightways Corp. v. Aetna, Inc. (In re Consol. Freightways Corp.), 564 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2009).

6.2.ssss WARN Act claims for prepetition termination are not entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor terminated employees five days before bankruptcy without providing WARN Act's 60-day notice. The employees asserted WARN Act damages for 60 days' pay, which would have run 55 days into the postpetition period. Section 503(b)(1)(A) grants administrative expense priority to "the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate, including (i) wages ... for services rendered after the commencement of the case; and (ii) wages and benefits awarded pursuant to a judicial proceeding ... as back pay attributable to any period of time occurring after commencement of the case under this title, as a result of a violation of Federal or State law by the debtor, without regard to the time of the occurrence of unlawful conduct on which such award is based or to whether any services were rendered". The introductory phrase, "actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate", limits the language of clause (ii). WARN claims based on prepetition termination are not necessary to maintain the debtor as a going concern or to preserve the estate. In addition, allowing such claims would magnify the amount of wages entitled to priority and possibly cripple any attempt at reorganization. Therefore, the claims are not entitled to administrative expense priority. Binford v. First Magnus Fin. Corp. (In re First Magnus Fin. Corp.), 403 B.R. 659 (D. Ariz. 2008).

6.2.tttt WARN Act claims for prepetition termination are not entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor terminated most of its employees before bankruptcy. After bankruptcy, a terminated employee brought a class action adversary proceeding against the debtor for allowance as administrative claims of the WARN Act claims arising from the termination, or at least the portion that would have been attributable to the employees' postpetition services had they not been terminated. Administrative expenses include only the costs and expenses of services rendered to the estate to preserve the estate. Because the claims here arose prepetition and did not provide any benefit to the estate, they are not entitled to administrative expense priority. In addition, the claimant's counsel's attorney's fees, which the WARN Act authorizes, are also not entitled to administrative expense priority. Bridges v. Continentalafa Disp. Co. (In re Continentalafa Disp. Co.), 403 B.R. 653 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2009).

6.2.uuuu Employee fringe benefit priority is based only on employee, not provider, services. The debtor self-funded its health insurance for its employees and retirees. Aetna administered the program, paying claims and seeking reimbursement from the debtor. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, it owed both employees and retirees for unpaid claims and Aetna for unpaid reimbursement. Section 507(a)(4) grants priority to up to $10,950 per individual of wages and salaries earned within 180 days before bankruptcy. Section 507(a)(5) grants priority to "unsecured claims for contributions to an employee benefit plan— (A) arising from services rendered within 180 days before [bankruptcy]; but only (B) for each such plan, to the extent of—(i) the number of employees covered by each such plan multiplied by [$10,950]; less (ii) the aggregate amount paid to such employees under paragraph (4) of this subsection, plus the aggregate amount paid by the estate on behalf of such employees to any other employee benefit plan". The linkage between the two provisions makes clear that paragraph (5) should be read to refer to the same people as paragraph (4)—employees who earned wages within 180 days before bankruptcy—not to individuals who were retirees during the whole period, and that the "services rendered" are those of the employees, not those of the benefit plan provider. Finally, the priority limit is calculated on an aggregate basis, not a per employee basis, because paragraph (5) refers to the "aggregate", unlike paragraph (4)'s reference to "per individual". Consol Freightways Corp. of Del. v. Aetna, Inc. (In re Consol. Freightways Corp. of Del.), 564 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2009).

6.2.vvvv A non-statutory insider's claim may be equitably subordinated under a "rigorous scrutiny" standard. The debtor and the supplier entered into a strategic partnership agreement, under which the supplier would become the debtor's exclusive telecommunications equipment and software supplier and would provide the debtor with substantial financing to make purchases from the supplier. The financing agreement permitted the supplier to call its loan if the debtor's capital expenditures or the loan balance exceeded specified amounts and required, among other things, that the debtor use any increase in its bank facility to pay down the supplier's credit line. The supplier used the debtor "as a mere instrumentality to inflate [the supplier's] own revenues [w]hat began as a 'strategic partnership' ... degenerated into a relationship in which the much larger company bullied and threatened the smaller into taking actions that were designed to benefit the larger at the expense of the smaller ... to prop up its own revenue ... in the form of purchases ... of unneeded equipment". The supplier used its position as lender to ensure the debtor's cooperation by repeated threats to stop the funding. The Bankruptcy Code defines "insider" to include an officer, director and "person in control of the debtor", but the definition is open-ended. A person not listed in the definition of "insider" may be a non-statutory insider. The statutory term “person in control” requires actual control. However, actual control is not necessary to qualify as a non-statutory insider. Otherwise, “person in control” would virtually eliminate the concept of nonstatutory insider. Rather, a nonstatutory insider includes anyone not dealing at arms’ length with the debtor, such that its conduct should be subject to closer scrutiny. In this case, the supplier’s ability to coerce the debtor into unnecessary and disadvantageous transactions showed that the parties were not dealing at arms’ length, making the supplier a nonstatutory insider, even though the supplier had the right under its credit agreement to call its credit line or require payment of the bank loan increase to itself. The court may equitably subordinate a claim if the creditor engaged in inequitable conduct that injured creditors or conferred an unfair advantage on the creditor and if subordination is not inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code. Subordination of a non-insider’s claim requires more egregious conduct, but an insider’s conduct is rigorously scrutinized. Here, the supplier was an insider, and its conduct was sufficiently egregious to constitute inequitable conduct. The conduct harmed creditors because it forced the debtor into increased and unnecessary equipment purchases that provided no value to creditors, resulting in increased interest expense that further depleted the estate, and it induced lenders to increase the bank loan. Therefore, the court equitably subordinates the claim, but only to the claims of other creditors, not to equity interests, because subordination to equity would be inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code. Schubert v. Lucent Techs. Inc. (In re Winstar Comm’ns, Inc.), 554 F.3d 382 (3d Cir. 2009).

6.2.wwwww Court equitably subordinates claim of bank that was overly aggressive in selling an unnecessary loan to the debtor. The debtor was a luxury resort development that was initially almost debt free. The bank approached the debtor with a new “financial product” that would allow the debtor to borrow $375 million and loan or dividend $209 million to shareholders. The bank would get a fee for making the loan and would syndicate the loan. The bank conducted legal due diligence but very limited financial due diligence, relying only on projections. Complete financial due diligence would have revealed that the debtor was missing projections substantially in the year of the loan and had negative cash flow for several earlier years. The bank also developed a new appraisal method that would support the loan size when traditional appraisal methods would not. After the loan was made, the debtor made a demand loan to the controlling shareholder $209 million without documentation other than a journal entry. The shareholder took the distribution as a loan in part because taking a dividend would have resulted in negative equity accounts and would have required sharing the proceeds with other shareholders. The bank knew of these facts when the loan was made. The debtor then fell behind in its accounts payable but did not demand any funds from its shareholder to cover expenses, selling assets at a discount to cover cash flow shortages. The court may equitably subordinate a claim if the creditor engaged in inequitable conduct that injured other creditors or conferred an unfair advantage on the creditor and if subordination is not inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code. A showing of gross and egregious conduct is required to subordinate a non-insider’s claim. Because the bank earned fees for selling the loan and earned higher fees the larger the loan, and because the developers could take profits out in advance, the bank encouraged developers to take unnecessary loans, and the bank and the developer benefited from the loan, though the other creditors bore the risk of loss. The bank could not have believed that the debtor could service the loan. The bank’s “naked greed” for fees and “complete disregard” for the debtor and others who were subordinated to the bank’s first lien position shocks the court’s conscience and meets the first standard for equitable subordination. The debtor’s failure satisfies the second standard. But the court subordinates the loan only to unsecured claims, not to membership interests, because doing so would be inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code. Credit Suisse v. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Yellowstone Mtn. Club, LLC), Adv. Proc. 09-00014 (Bankr. D. Mont. May 12, 2009) (matter settled; op. vacated, June 29, 2009).

6.2.xxxx Postpetition well plugging expense is entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor stopped operating several oil wells several years before bankruptcy. State law requires an owner to plug a well that has not been operated for over a year. After bankruptcy, the state commission plugged the wells and sought reimbursement of the cost as an administrative expense. Section 503(b)(1) allows administrative expense priority to actual and necessary costs and expenses of administering the estate. The activity for which the claimant seeks priority must benefit the estate. “Benefit” is an element of “actual and necessary”. Midlantic Nat’l Bank v. N.J. Dept. of Env’tl. Prot., 474 U.S. 494, 507 (1986), held that an estate must comply with state law “that is reasonably designed to protect the public health or safety from identified hazards”. 28 U.S.C. § 959(b) requires the trustee to comply with applicable state law. The estate is therefore subject to the obligation to plug the wells, even though the plugging obligation arose prepetition. Because the state commission undertook to fulfill the estate’s postpetition obligation, its right to reimbursement for fulfilling the obligation is entitled to administrative expense priority. In re Am. Coastal Energy, Inc., 399 B.R. 805 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2009).

6.2.yyyy Court may bifurcate claim for goods and services to grant administrative expense priority under section 503(b)(9). Section 503(b)(9) grants administrative expense priority to a claim for “the value of any goods received by the debtor within 20 days before” bankruptcy. Here, the claimants provided a mix of goods and services to the debtor. One claimant plowed snow from the debtor’s plants and salted and sanded the areas from which snow had been plowed. Another took scrap plastic from the debtor and processed it into plastic pellets that it resold to the debtor. Another repaired electric machines for the debtor, providing both parts and labor to the repair. Section 503(b)(9) applies by its terms only to goods received by the debtor, not to services. Because the Bankruptcy Code does not define “goods”, the court may use the UCC’s definition of “goods” in section 2–105. Although the UCC may require categorization of a transaction for some purposes as one involving goods or services, section 503(b)(9) does not appear to require categorization of a transaction giving rise to a claim as a whole as one for the sale of goods for the resulting claim to qualify for administrative expense priority. Therefore, the court may dissect any transaction that might qualify for administrative expense priority into its constituent parts of goods and services. Finally, the goods need not be subject to reclamation under U.C.C. section 2–702 or Bankruptcy Code section 546(c) to qualify for administrative expense treatment under section 503(b)(9), as the latter section contains no such requirement. Applying these principles, the portion of the snowplower’s claim for salt and sand, the entire claim for plastic pellets and the portion of the repair company’s claim for parts are entitled to administrative expense priority. In re Plastech Eng’d Prods., Inc., 397 B.R. 828 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2008).

6.2.zzzz Equitable subordination requires injury to other creditors. A bank held a $900,000 claim secured by several real estate parcels owned by two individual debtors. The debtors’ bankruptcy trustee unsuccessfully attempted to negotiate a deal with the bank to reduce its claim substantially in exchange for allowing the bank to foreclose. The two individual debtors secretly formed a corporation which separately negotiated with the bank and purchased the claim for $16,500. The bankruptcy court found misconduct in the debtors’ failure to disclose their interest in the corporation and to file a claim transfer statement under Rule 3001 and equitably subordinated the secured claim to all unsecured claims. Section 510(c) permits equitable subordination where the creditor has been guilty of misconduct resulting in injury to other creditors and subordination is not inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code. Equitable subordination is remedial, not punitive, and may be applied only to the extent necessary to redress the injury that the misconduct caused. It is unclear whether the debtors engaged in misconduct here, as claims trading is entirely permissible, but their efforts at secrecy suggest they thought they were doing something wrong. Still, their conduct did not injure other creditors. If they had not purchased the claim, the unsecured creditors’ recoveries still would have been subject to satisfaction of the secured claim. The only creditor that might have been injured was the bank, which willingly sold its claim and was not complaining. Therefore, subordination is improper. In re Kreisler, 546 F.3d 863 (7th Cir. 2008).

- 6.2.aaaaa Reclaiming inventory vendor takes priority over secured creditor. An inventory vendor sold goods to the debtor shortly before bankruptcy and demanded reclamation promptly after bankruptcy. The debtor in possession proposed that each vendor be granted an administrative expense priority claim “in the amount (if any) of its allowed reclamation claim”. Promptly after the filing of the case, the debtor in possession obtained postpetition DIP financing, secured by all inventory, that was used to pay off an existing secured loan that was also secured by inventory. Later in the case, the debtor in possession liquidated, and all inventory was sold, with the proceeds used to pay the DIP lender. The vendor asserted an administrative expense claim. The debtor in possession objected on the ground that the vendor did not have a valid reclamation right. A vendor’s reclamation right is subject to “the rights of a ... good faith purchaser or lien creditor”. U.C.C. § 2-702’s reclamation theory is that the vendor has been defrauded by an insolvent buyer. Under that theory, the defrauded vendor’s rights are superior to those of the buyer to use the goods to pay other creditors. Therefore, the secured creditor’s inventory lien did not defeat the vendor’s reclamation right, and the vendor’s priority claim should be allowed. Phar-Mor, Inv. v. McKesson Corp., 534 F.3d 502 (6th Cir. 2008).
- 6.2.bbbbbb WARN Act claims for prepetition termination are not entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor terminated employees immediately before bankruptcy, on the date of the filing of the petition, without providing WARN Act’s 60-day notice. The employees asserted WARN Act damages for 60 days’ pay. Section 503(b)(1)(A) grants administrative expense priority to “the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate, including ... wages and benefits awarded pursuant to a judicial proceeding ... as back pay attributable to any period of time occurring after commencement of the case under this title, as a result of a violation of Federal or State law by the debtor, without regard to the time of the occurrence of unlawful conduct on which such award is based or to whether any services were rendered”. The WARN Act claims’ priority is based on the period to which the wages are “attributable”, that is, when they accrue and vest. WARN’s purpose is “to provide a form of statutory severance pay”. Severance pay that is pay in lieu of notice (rather than pay at termination based on length of service) vests at the time of termination. WARN Act claims vest at time of termination and are unrelated to length of service. As such, they vest at termination. Because termination here was before the commencement of the case, the claims are prepetition claims and not entitled to administrative expense priority. Henderson v. Powermate Holding Corp. (In re Powermate Holding Corp.), 394 B.R. 765 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).
- 6.2.ccccc Multi-employer pension plan’s withdrawal liability claim for postpetition plan withdrawal is not entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor was a participant in a multi-employer plan that was underfunded as of the petition date. The debtor in possession ceased operations and thereby withdrew from the plan two years after the petition date, which resulted in the imposition of withdrawal liability calculated as the withdrawing employer’s portion of the plan underfunding as of the withdrawal date. The Sixth Circuit has previously held that a withdrawal liability claim arises upon withdrawal. CPT Holdings, Inc. v. Local 73, 162 F.3d 405 (6th Cir. 1998). However, a claim is not entitled to administrative expense priority simply because it arises postpetition. Priority entitlement requires that the claim arise from a transaction with the estate and that directly and substantially benefits the estate. The withdrawal liability amount depends heavily on external factors, including the plan portfolio’s investment returns and the applicable discount rate, none of which bear any relation to the services employees render to benefit the estate. Moreover, withdrawal liability accrues only upon withdrawal, not as employees perform services. Therefore, the withdrawal liability claim does not meet the test for administrative expense priority. Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), grants administrative priority to an expense that does not directly benefit the estate if the claim arises from the estate’s postpetition operation. However, Reading applies only to claims arising from torts or intentional misconduct. Therefore, it does not require administrative priority for the withdrawal liability claim. United Mine Workers of Am. 1974 Plan and Trust v. Lexington Coal Co. (In re HNRC Dissolution Co.), 396 B.R. 461 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

6.2.ddddd Section 510(b) subordinates note purchase agreement termination fee. The debtor entered into a letter of intent with a lender, which contemplated an agreement under which the lender would purchase senior subordinated secured notes from the debtor. The letter of intent entitled the lender to a fee as liquidated damages if the debtor terminated the letter of intent. Before the debtor and the lender entered into the note purchase agreement, creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The creditor filed a claim for the fee. Section 510(b) requires that “a claim ... for damages arising from the purchase or sale” of a security of the debtor “be subordinated to all claims or interests that are senior to or equal to the claim or interest represented by such security ...”. Courts have construed section 510(b) and the phrase “arising from” broadly to encompass transactions that have a causal link to a purchase of securities. The Bankruptcy Code includes “note” in the definition of security. Therefore, the fee claim under the letter of intent is a claim for damages arising from the purchase of a security of the debtor, even though the purchase never occurred. Although only secured claims are senior or equal to the claim that would have been represented by the note, the court subordinates the claim to the level of general unsecured claims, rather than to a level between secured and general unsecured claims. In re Patriot Aviation Servs., Inc., 396 B.R. 780 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2008).

6.2.eeeee Equitable subordination requires actual harm to creditors. The debtor experienced severe cash flow problems. After other financing options fell through, the largest shareholders, who were also officers, directors and guarantors of a portion of the existing debt, made a new loan, secured by the franchisee royalty streams, intellectual property rights and other intangible property. When severe cash flow problems persisted, the debtor sought a loan from a bank, who declined, but agreed to lend to the shareholders so they could lend to the debtor. The shareholders agreed, if the loan were secured by the same collateral that secured the first loan and if their prior guarantee reimbursement claims were similarly secured. The board discussed the new financing need, the bank formally approved the loan 10 days later, and two days later the board was given one day’s notice of a special telephonic meeting. Management informed the board at the meeting that without additional funds, the debtor could not meet payroll and would default on a secured loan. The independent audit committee and all non-interested directors approved the transaction, which was disclosed in SEC filings. The debtor used the loan proceeds to pay unsecured creditors and keep the company in operation. The debtor filed chapter 11 nine months later. The creditors’ committee sought equitable subordination of the shareholders’ secured claims and quantified damages based in part on a theory of deepening insolvency. The bankruptcy court found that the shareholders, as fiduciaries, engaged in inequitable conduct in the second transaction, based largely on the hurried, eleventh hour manner in which they sought board approval, and their conduct conferred an unfair advantage on them, and that by securing the loan with the debtor’s “crown jewel” asset, the shareholders “grabbed for as much as they could get[,] and they got it all.” Finally, the bankruptcy court found that taking collateral for the pre-existing guarantees in connection with the second loan also resulted in “unfair advantage”. The court, however, did not find that any of the actions resulted in actual harm to creditors nor that the debtor’s insolvency had deepened. Equitable subordination requires the claimant to have engaged in inequitable conduct that resulted in injury to the creditors or conferred an unfair advantage on the claimant. Because equitable subordination is remedial, not penal, a “claim should be subordinated only to the extent necessary to offset the harm which the debtor or its creditors have suffered as a result of the inequitable conduct.” The court found that creditors were not harmed, because the proceeds of the second loan were used to pay unsecured creditors and to fund the debtor’s continued operations. Although some unsecured creditors were unpaid while others were paid, unsecured creditors as a whole did not suffer harm. In addition, creditors did not suffer harm from the shareholders’ taking collateral to secure their prior personal guarantee reimbursement claims because no reimbursement claims ever arose. Although the court did not reach the viability of “deepening insolvency” as a theory of damages, it agreed with the increasing number of courts that have criticized and rejected the theory. Wooley v. Faulkner (In re SI Restructuring, Inc.), 532 F.3d 355 (5th Cir. 2008).

6.2.fffff WARN Act claims for prepetition termination are not entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor terminated employees five days before bankruptcy without providing WARN Act’s 60-day notice. The employees asserted WARN Act damages for 60 days’ pay, which would have run 55 days into the postpetition period. Section 503(b)(1)(A) grants administrative expense priority to “the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate, including (i) wages ... for services rendered after the commencement of the case; and (ii) wages and benefits awarded pursuant to a judicial proceeding ... as back pay attributable to any period of time occurring after commencement of the case under this title, as a result of a violation of Federal or State law by the debtor, without regard to the time of the occurrence of unlawful conduct on which such award is based or to whether any services were rendered”. Priorities must be clearly stated, and Congress is presumed not to write on a clean slate to change settled interpretations of the bankruptcy law. WARN Act claims based on prepetition termination are not “actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate”. In addition, because clauses (i) and (ii) of section 503(b)(1)(A) are joined by “and”, even though they are in an “including” list, both requirements must be met. The claims here did not meet clause (i)’s requirement that they be for “services rendered after the commencement of the case”. Though the WARN Act claim is calculated based on 60 days’ wages, this mathematical formula does not make the wages for postpetition services. In re First Magnus Fin. Corp., 390 B.R. 667 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2008).

6.2.ggggg Section 510(b) subordinates an employment agreement stock-based compensation claim. The creditor’s compensation included an annual cash salary and the grant of common stock and warrants. When the debtor wrongfully terminated the creditor, the creditor obtained a judgment that included the value of the loss of unvested stock and warrants. Section 510(b) subordinates a claim “for damages arising from the purchase or sale” of a security of the debtor. “Purchase” is construed broadly. The grant of stock and warrants is a “purchase”, because the creditor exchanged his labor for the securities. A claim “arises” from the purchase if there is a nexus between the purchase and the claim, even if the claim arises after the purchase. Thus, the claim arose from the creditor’s purchase of the securities even though the debtor breached the creditor’s employment agreement after the creditor acquired the securities. Finally, a court may look behind a judgment to determine whether the underlying facts meet a Bankruptcy Code provision’s conditions. Here, though the creditor had reduced the claim to judgment, the facts underlying the judgment involve a claim that arose from the purchase of a security of the debtor, which requires the court to subordinate the claim. The court distinguishes these facts from the case where the debtor issues a note before bankruptcy to pay for securities that it agrees to repurchase, because the debtor’s obligation there arises from a fixed debt obligation, not from the creditor’s decision to take an equity risk. The Liq. Trust of U.S. Wireless Corp., Inc. v. Wax (In re U.S. Wireless Corp., Inc.), 384 B.R. 713 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).

6.2.hhhhh Super-priority DIP loan is not an administrative expense. The debtor in possession obtained approval for a DIP loan under section 364(c), which permits the court to approve financing “(1) with priority over any or all administrative expenses of the specified in section 503(b) or 507(b) of this title”, (2) a lien on unencumbered property, or (3) a junior lien on encumbered property, if the debtor in possession “is unable to obtain unsecured credit allowable under section 503(b) of this title as an administrative expense”. At the end of the case, there remained only unencumbered assets. The DIP lender objected to confirmation under section 1129(a)(9)(A) on the ground that its claim was an administrative expense for which the plan did not provide payment. The DIP may borrow under section 364(c) only if granting the lender an administrative expense claim is inadequate to induce the lender to lend. Section 364(c)(1) expressly permits such a loan priority over “any and all administrative expenses”. Therefore, a loan granted super-priority status under section 364(c) cannot be an administrative expense. The plan must still provide for payment, as the claim has priority over administrative expenses, but section 1129(a)(9)(A) does not apply. In re Mayco Plastics, Inc., 379 B.R. 691 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2008).

- 6.2.iiii Section 510(b) does not subordinate “make-whole” payments based on stock price. The debtor purchased a business from a creditor and paid for the purchase with a combination of cash, notes, and stock. Under the purchase agreement, if the stock price did not reach a certain value three years after the purchase, the debtor would pay the creditor/seller a “make whole” payment equal to the aggregate shortfall created by the stock price. The make-whole amount is not a damage claim arising from the purchase or sale of a security or caused by fraud or securities law violation. It is simply a purchase price adjustment. Therefore, section 510(b) does not subordinate the claims. Although the court posits that the creditor was not an investor and was not speculating on the debtor’s success, the court does not acknowledge that the creditor took an express equity value risk. In re Nationsrent, Inc., 381 B.R. 83 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).
- 6.2.jjjj Section 510(b) subordinates a claim related to continuing to hold stock. The debtor maintained a pension plan for its employees. The employees’ contributions were invested in the debtor’s stock, and the debtor’s contributions were made in stock. The debtor embarked on a risky venture. The plan trustees, who were also officers and directors of the debtor, decided not to diversify the plan’s holdings but to leave them all in the debtor’s stock. After bankruptcy, the plan beneficiaries sued the trustees for breach of fiduciary duty relating to that decision. The trustees filed indemnification claims against the debtor. If section 510(b) applies to a claim, then it applies equally to an indemnification claim arising out of the underlying claim. The decision to hold the stock arose from the plan’s initial acquisition of the stock. The initial acquisition was a “purchase” because the employees exchanged the value of their labor for contributions to the plan, even though they did not choose for the contribution to be used to acquire the stock. Therefore, the claim meets section 510(b)’s subordination requirements that it be for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor. In re Touch Am. Holdings, Inc., 381 B.R. 95 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).
- 6.2.kkkk A creditor/director’s acquisition of a bank loan at par and declaration of default after resigning does not warrant equitable subordination. A minority shareholder and director, who did not control the board but who served part of the time as the debtor’s CEO, loaned funds to the debtor. The debtor had also borrowed from a bank. When the debtor began to fail, the creditor resigned from the board, bought the bank’s loan at par, and issued a notice of default on both loans on the same day. The debtor soon filed a bankruptcy petition. Equitable subordination requires inequitable conduct resulting in injury to creditors or in an unfair advantage. Acquisition of the bank loan at par, which did not require debtor approval, and declaring a default after resigning did not breach any duty to the debtor, because there was no evidence of self-dealing while acting on behalf of the debtor, and is not inequitable conduct. Nelson v. Repository Techs., Inc. (In re Repository Techs., Inc.), 381 B.R. 852 (N.D. Ill. 2008).
- 6.2.iiiii Section 510(b) does not subordinate a prepetition litigation claim for damages arising from a breached contract for compensation measured by the value of the debtor’s stock. Section 510(b) subordinates claims for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor. It should be construed broadly to implement its remedial policy of preventing a disappointed equity holder from sharing with creditors in the distribution of the debtor’s assets. Here, nine years before bankruptcy, the debtor retained a financial advisor to assist in an initial public offering. The debtor agreed to pay the advisor “4% of the final valuation in the form of [debtor’s] common stock”. After the debtor breached the agreement, the advisor obtained a judgment against the debtor for the value of the stock it would have received, rather than for the stock itself. Such a judgment, rendered years before bankruptcy, established a money debt, not an interest as a stockholder, which the advisor specifically rejected long before bankruptcy. The court focuses more on the advisor's pursuit of a money judgment rather than of the debtor's common stock. It interprets the contract as providing for compensation measured by the stock's value when issued, not as providing for compensation in the form of stock. The court therefore denies subordination of the claim under section 510(b). Racusin v. Am. Wagering, Inc. (In re Am. Wagering, Inc.), 493 F.3d 1067 (9th Cir. 2007).

6.2.mmmmm Section 503(b)(9) administrative priority applies to secured claims as well as unsecured claims. The debtor received goods from the supplier cooperative within 20 days before bankruptcy. The supplier's claim was secured by the supplier's stock that the debtor owned. The collateral did not prevent the supplier from having an administrative priority claim under section 503(b)(9). That section does not by its terms apply only to unsecured claims. In the absence of any such limitation, the supplier's claim is entitled to the priority. Brown & Cole Stores, Inc. v. Assoc. Grocers., Inc. (In re Brown & Cole Stores, Inc.), 375 B.R. 873 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

6.2.nnnnn Debtor's workers' compensation reimbursement obligation is not entitled to the tax priority. The debtor employer self-insured its workers' compensation obligations. After bankruptcy, it defaulted on payments owing to injured workers, thereby obligating the state compensation fund to step in and pay the workers. When it did, the employer became liable to reimburse the fund. The fund's claim is for an excise tax, but it is not on "a transaction occurring during the three years immediately preceding the date of the filing of the petition", as section 507(a)(8)(E) requires for it to be entitled to priority. Rather, the "transaction" is the event that causes the fund to become liable and creates the employer's reimbursement obligation, which occurred postpetition. Therefore, it is not entitled to tax priority treatment under the plan. (The parties had stipulated that the claim would not be an administrative expense, so the court does not analyze section 507(a)(2)'s applicability.) Calif. Self-Insurers' Sec. Fund v. Lorber Indus. of Calif. (In re Lorber Indus. of Calif.), 373 B.R. 663 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

6.2.ooooo Third party's postpetition attorney's fees for the estate's suit are not entitled to administrative expense priority. Before bankruptcy, the debtor sued a third party on various contract and tort theories. After bankruptcy, the trustee continued to pursue the action. The defendant filed a proof of claim for its postpetition attorney's fees under a state prevailing party attorney's fee rule and asserted its claim was entitled to administrative expense priority. Under Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), a third party damaged by the estate's activities may assert an administrative expense priority claim against the estate if fundamental fairness requires the claim's recognition. The Ninth Circuit has rejected application of the fundamental fairness doctrine to postpetition attorney's fee claims arising out of a prepetition cause of action, at least where the trustee's pursuit of the claim is not frivolous or meritless. Because the trustee's pursuit here was neither, the attorney's fee claim is not entitled to administrative expense priority. In re Sec. Aviation, Inc., 374 B.R. 720 (Bankr. D. Alaska 2007).

6.2.ppppp Postpetition termination does not elevate an accrued severance payment to administrative expense liability. The debtor in possession terminated one of its senior managers after bankruptcy without cause. The manager was a beneficiary under various unfunded retirement plans, under which benefits had vested prepetition. Benefits were payable monthly after the manager's retirement, but if the manager were terminated without cause then benefits were payable as a lump sum. The debtor in possession sold the division for which the manager worked postpetition, and the manager was terminated without cause, so the manager was entitled to a lump sum payment. Under the Second Circuit's pre-Code decision in In re Straus-Duparquet, Inc., 386 F.2d 649 (2d Cir. 1967), a severance payment that is a new obligation that arises as a result of termination is entitled to administrative expense priority, because the obligation arises out of the DIP's actions, compensates for the hardship associated with termination, and is earned by reason of the termination. A benefit that accrues before bankruptcy is not entitled to administrative expense priority, whether or not it is characterized as a severance payment and whether or not it become payable upon severance. Therefore, the manager's lump sum claim was not entitled to administrative expense priority. Supplee v. Bethlehem Steel Corp. (In re Bethlehem Steel Corp.), 479 F.3d 167 (2d Cir. 2007).

6.2.qqqq A nonprofit debtor's state unemployment fund reimbursement obligation is not a priority tax. The state's unemployment insurance law, in accordance with the Federal Unemployment Tax Act, permits a nonprofit employer to reimburse the state unemployment fund for payments actually made to the employer's discharged employees, rather than to pay unemployment insurance contributions, which are taxes. To participate in the reimbursement program, a nonprofit with annual compensation expense above $100,000 must post a surety bond to secure its reimbursement obligations. An obligation is a tax if it is involuntary, imposed universally by the legislature under the state's police or regulatory power on all similarly situated entities, and for public purposes. A nonprofit's reimbursement obligation is not for public purposes and is not imposed universally on all similarly situated entities, because it is imposed solely to reimburse the government for expenses incurred on behalf of the nonprofit. In addition, the Bankruptcy Code grants tax claims priority in part because the government is an involuntary creditor that cannot protect itself in advance. The ability to require a surety bond permits the government to protect its ability to collect the reimbursement obligation. Therefore, the reimbursement obligation is not a tax entitled to priority under section 507(a)(8). Mich. Unemployment Ins. Agency v. Boyd (In re Albion Heath Servs.), 360 B.R. 599 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

6.2.rrrr Retiree health insurance claims are entitled to priority under section 507(a)(5). The debtor had contracted with Aetna to administer its self-insured employee health plan. Employees and retirees submitted all medical claims to Aetna, who examined and paid them and sought reimbursement from the debtor. At the petition date, the debtor owed unpaid employee and retiree medical claims and an unreimbursed amount to Aetna. Section 507(a)(5) grants priority to "unsecured claims for contributions to an employee benefit plan (A) arising from services rendered within 180 days before the date of the filing of the petition ... but only (B) for each such plan, to the extent of (i) the number of employees covered by each such plan multiplied by [$10,950]; less (ii) the aggregate amount paid to such employees under paragraph (4)" The limitation to "services rendered within 180 days" refers to the services Aetna rendered, not solely to employee (or retiree) services. Section 507(a)(5), by integrating with section 507(a)(4), recognizes that employees exchange current wages for employee benefit plans, such as health insurance. The retirees exchanged current wages for medical benefits, just as current employees do, and therefore are covered in the same way. The retirees are the most vulnerable people with employee benefit plan claims, so it makes sense that Congress would have intended to cover them. Therefore, the retirees' claims, as well as Aetna's reimbursement claims for retiree medical expense payments, are entitled to priority under section 507(a)(5). In addition, the interpretation of the word "employees" in determining that retirees are entitled to the priority requires that they similarly be included in the "employees" whose number calculates the cap. Moreover, inclusion of the retirees' claims in the priority while excluding their numbers in calculating the cap would dilute the priority recoveries of both retirees and current employees. Therefore, calculation of the aggregate priority cap under section 507(a)(5) must include the number of retirees, even though they are not included in the number of employees covered under section 507(a)(4). In re Consol. Freightways Corp. of Del., 363 B.R. 110 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2007).

6.2.ssss Claim for promise to deliver common stock in the debtor is subordinated. In a severance agreement with its CEO, the debtor agreed to exchange its common shares for common shares in another company that the CEO held. The debtor failed to deliver its shares. The CEO sued, but before trial, the debtor filed chapter 11. The CEO's claim against the debtor is subordinated under section 510(b) as a claim “for damages arising from the purchase or sale of” a security of the debtor. The CEO agreed to take the benefits and risks of stock ownership rather than the certainty of a cash payment and, consistent with the language and rationale of section 510(b), should not be able to elevate his relationship to a creditor claim. The stock acquisition claim arises from an attempted, though uncompleted, “purchase,” so the claim falls within section 510(b). Rombro v. Dufrayne (In re Med Diversified, Inc.), 461 F.3d 251 (2d Cir. 2006).

6.2.ttttt Section 510(b) does not subordinate a prepetition litigation claim for damages arising from a breached contract to issue stock. Section 510(b) subordinates claims for damages arising from the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor. It should be construed broadly to implement its remedial policy of preventing a disappointed equity holder from sharing with creditors in the distribution of the debtor’s assets. Here, nine years before bankruptcy, the debtor retained a financial advisor to assist in an initial public offering. The debtor agreed to pay the advisor in the form of common stock. After the debtor breached the agreement, the advisor obtained a judgment against the debtor, for the value of the stock it would have received, rather than for the stock itself. Such a judgment, rendered years before bankruptcy, established a money debt, not an interest as a stockholder, which the advisor specifically rejected long before bankruptcy. The court focuses more on the long period before bankruptcy during which the advisor sought a money judgment rather than on the nature of the underlying contract, under which the advisor had agreed to take equity risk, and denies subordination of the claim under section 510(b). Racusin v. Am. Wagering, Inc. (In re Am. Wagering, Inc.), 465 F.3d 1048 (9th Cir. 2006), reh’g granted, op. w’drawn and replaced, 493 F.3d 1067 (9th Cir. 2007).

6.2.uuuuu Claim for administrative expense under a collective bargaining agreement must meet section 503(b) standards. The debtor’s collective bargaining agreement required its employees to be “on call” and provided for compensation if they were available, whether or not the debtor actually used their services. After filing chapter 11, the debtor in possession kept the employees on call but did not use their services until the debtor in possession obtained an order approving rejection of the collective bargaining agreement. Section 503(b)(1) limits administrative expenses to claims for “the actual and necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate.” Section 1113 prohibits a debtor in possession from unilaterally altering the terms of a collective bargaining agreement. Following the majority view, the court rules that section 1113 does not specifically override the requirements of section 503(b), unlike section 1114, which specifically grants administrative expense priority to retiree benefits. Therefore, for claims under a collective bargaining agreement to receive priority, the services must be rendered after bankruptcy and must be necessary to preserve the estate. The former requirement were met based on the services performed—the employees’ being on call—not on the debtor in possession’s actions. Otherwise, the debtor in possession could skirt the anti-modification provision of section 1113 by unilateral action. The employees also met the second test, because their on-call availability to provide the services until the rejection decision was necessary to preserve the debtor’s opportunity to reorganize. Finally, because section 1113 prohibits unilateral modification, the contract remained binding until court approval of the rejection, not just until the debtor in possession filed the rejection motion. Therefore, the employees were entitled to administrative expense priority for their pay for the post-petition, pre-rejection period. Peters v. Pikes Peak Musicians Ass’n (In re Colorado Springs Symphony Orch. Ass’n), 462 F.3d 1265 (10th Cir. 2006). Accord Peters v. Enterasys Networks, Inc. (In re Native Am. Sys., Inc.), 351 B.R. 135 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2006) (creditor remained available postpetition and prerejection to perform services under a prepetition contract).

6.2.vvvvv Allegations of corporate looting state a claim for equitable subordination. The creditors’ committee’s complaint alleged that the debtor’s parent corporation looted the debtor’s assets by selling the debtor’s assets, causing the proceeds to be diverted to the parent, backdating the debtor’s note to the parent and related authorizing board resolutions, and causing the debtor to guarantee the parent's bank debt. These allegations state a claim for equitable subordination of the parent's claim. Such a claim is not dependent on a claim for alter ego liability or piercing the corporate veil. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Am. Tower Corp. (In re Verestar, Inc.), 343 B.R. 444 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

6.2.wwwww Workers' compensation insurance premiums are not entitled to priority under section 507(a)(5). The debtor's workers' compensation insurance company filed a claim for unpaid prepetition premiums and sought priority under section 507(a)(5) for "contributions to an employee benefit plan." The Bankruptcy Code "aims, in the main, to secure equal distribution among creditors, [and] preferential treatment of a class of creditors is in order only when clearly authorized by Congress." "[P]rovisions allowing preferences must be tightly construed," because granting priority to one reduces both priority for other priority creditors and equal treatment for all. Because of the close linkage between the wage priority in section 507(a)(4) and the employee benefit plan priority in section 507(a)(5), "employee benefit plan" should be construed to encompass employer obligations that substitute for wages or other direct compensation to workers. Workers' compensation systems, by contrast, protect employees but also protect employers from tort liability. They substitute for tort recovery and liability, rather than for compensation. ERISA's definition of employee benefit plans is not relevant to the analysis, because section 507(a)(5) contains no indication that the phrase should be construed by reference to other statutes. Therefore, unpaid workers' compensation insurance premiums are not entitled to priority under section 507(a)(5). Howard Delivery Serv., Inc. v. Zurich Am. Ins. Co., 547 U.S. 651, 126 S. Ct. 2105, 165 L. Ed. 2d 110 (2006).

6.2.xxxxx Administrative rent claim may be equitably subordinated. The debtor's principal rented real property to the debtor, which the debtor in possession and the trustee occupied after bankruptcy. The principal/lessor and the debtor were convicted of money laundering and other crimes, resulting in a forfeiture of a substantial portion of the property of the estate to the United States. The court equitably subordinates the principal's administrative rent claim. It determines that section 510(c), which authorizes subordination, is not limited to prepetition claims, and that the inequitable conduct need not be related directly to the claim. The court then finds that the facts satisfy the three grounds for imposing equitable subordination: The principal's conduct was inequitable. It harmed creditors; in this case, it harmed only a priority creditor, but that was adequate. Finally, subordination is not inconsistent with any Bankruptcy Code provision, particularly section 365(d)(3) or (4), requiring prompt payment of administrative rent, because neither those provisions nor section 510(c) limits equitable subordination of administrative rent. Bala v. Kaler (In re Racing Servs., Inc.), 340 B.R. 73 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

6.2.yyyyy Consumer deposit priority applies to full, as well as partial, advance payment. The creditor paid in full in advance for the debtor contractor's services in constructing a pool for the creditor's home. The contractor did not complete the project. The creditor's claim was entitled to priority under section 507(a)(7), even though the creditor had paid in full. The priority for "deposits" is not limited to partial payments. Salazar v. McDonald (In re Salazar), 430 F.3d 992 (9th Cir. 2005).

6.2.zzzzz Administrative expense claim may arise from prepetition agreement. The debtor and the creditor each owned a working interest in an oil well. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession used the creditor's portion of well receipts in the administration of the case. The creditor's claim to the proceeds is entitled to administrative expense priority. Even though the contract was a prepetition agreement, the "transaction" giving rise to the claim occurred postpetition, when the debtor in possession denied the creditor access to the profits, which should have been distributed. The retained profits benefited the estate, because the debtor in possession used the profits in the operation of the business. Therefore, the creditor's claim is entitled to administrative expense priority. Robert M. Hallmark & Assocs., Inc. v. Athens/Alpha Gas Corp. (Athens/Alpha Gas Corp.), 332 B.R. 578 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2005).

6.2.aaaaaa ESOP stock redemption note may not be equitably subordinated. Based on cases from 1919 and 1920, the First Circuit has categorically subordinated notes a debtor issued to redeem its stock. Based on the enactment of section 510(c) (authorizing equitable subordination) and the Supreme Court's decisions in United States v. Noland, 517 U.S. 535 (1996) and United States v. CF&I Fabricators of Utah, Inc., 518 U.S. 213 (1996), the First Circuit abrogates its precedents and rules that subordination must be determined on a case-by-case basis. Although it continues to suggest in general that a note issued to redeem stock should be subordinated, it rules here that a note issued to redeem a retired employee's stock ownership interest under an ERISA-qualified and regulated Employee Stock Ownership Plan should not be subordinated. Merrimac Paper Co. v. Harrison (In re Merrimac Paper Co.), 420 F.3d 53 (1st Cir. 2005).

6.2.bbbbbb Court may equitably subordinate a claim in the hands of an innocent transferee. The bank was a member of a lending syndicate. Separately, it engaged in a transaction with the debtor that may have contributed to the misstatement of the debtor's financial statements, securities fraud, and harm to numerous other creditors. After bankruptcy, it sold its loan syndicate claim to an unrelated third party who had had no contacts with the debtor before bankruptcy. The court may subordinate the claim in the hands of the transferee. Section 510(c) addresses subordination of claims, not of creditors. Transfer of a claim does not change the claim's rights or disabilities. Moreover, permitting transfer to cleanse a claim of the subordination risk would permit the transferring creditor to obtain a recovery on the claim, which would then share pro rata with other claims in the case, and prevent compensation to the other claims' holders. Purchasers of claims against debtors are on notice that claims are subject to increased scrutiny in bankruptcy and possible disallowance and have means to protect themselves against the transferor in the transfer documentation. A good faith defense analogous to the good faith purchaser defense in section 550 is not available, because section 550 is limited to good faith transferees of property transferred in avoided transfers, and the consideration for protection of transferees against a claim by the estate does not apply equally to claims against the estate. Enron Corp. v. Avenue Special Situations Fund II, LP (In re Enron Corp.), 333 B.R. 205 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).

6.2.cccccc Court may equitably subordinate a claim that is unrelated to the creditor's misconduct. The bank was a member of a lending syndicate. Separately, it engaged in a transaction with the debtor that may have contributed to the misstatement of the debtor's financial statements, securities fraud, and harm to numerous other creditors. The court may equitably subordinate the bank's claim under the syndicated loan even though that claim is wholly unrelated to the bank's conduct that caused the debtor and its creditors harm. Equitable subordination is a remedy designed to compensate creditors for another creditor's misconduct and to ensure an equitable distribution of the estate. It does not require that the misconduct be related to the claim sought to be subordinated. The focus is on compensating other creditors for the injury, which the court may effect from whatever source. Enron Corp. v. Avenue Special Situations Fund II, LP (In re Enron Corp.), 333 B.R. 205 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).

6.2.dddddd Section 510(b) subordinates but does not disallow claims. Under a prepetition merger agreement, the debtor had agreed to pay for a target's shares by issuing its own shares. If the market price of its own shares at the time of payment was less than a specified amount, it would have to pay more shares, up to a maximum, and top off any balance with cash. The debtor filed chapter 11 before the payment and rejected the merger agreement. The target's former shareholders sought recovery, subordinated under section 510(b), on a parity with the debtor's own shareholders. The recovery was proper because the target's former shareholders held an allowable claim for damages for rejection of the merger agreement, measured by the calculation formula based on stock price contained in the merger agreement. Failure to allocate some of the equity's recovery under the plan to the target's former shareholders would have amounted to disallowance of the claim, not just subordination, which is all that section 510(b) requires. Kaiser Group Int'l, Inc. v. Pippin (In re Kaiser Group Int'l, Inc.), 326 B.R. 265 (D. Del. 2005).

6.2.eeeeeee Claim arising from failure to pay stock compensation is subordinated. The debtor hired the creditor to manage the debtor's IPO. The creditor's compensation was $150,000 in cash and 4.5% of the debtor's stock. The debtor fired the creditor before issuing the stock to him. He sued for money damages and was awarded a substantial sum. The debtor filed bankruptcy and sought to subordinate his claim under section 510(b). The creditor argued that because he sought only damages in the prepetition litigation, not stock, and because the claim had been reduced to judgment before bankruptcy, section 510(b) did not apply. The BAP rejects both arguments. First, the court may look behind the judgment to determine the nature of the underlying claim for purposes of applying a substantive Bankruptcy Code section such as section 510(b). Second, section 510(b) specifically refers to "a claim . . . for damages arising from the purchase or sale" of the debtor's stock, and the definition of claim is a "right to payment, whether or not such right is reduced to judgment." Third, the creditor took equity risk by agreeing to be paid in stock rather than cash. The claim here is therefore within section 510(b)'s reach and is subordinated. American Wagering, Inc. v. Racusin (In re American Wagering, Inc.), 326 B.R. 449 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 2005).

6.2.fffff Indenture "X-clause" prevents subordinated debt holders from receiving warrants in reorganized debtor. Generally, an indenture for subordinated debt prohibits the subordinated debt holders from recovering anything until senior debt holders are paid in full in cash. If they do, they must turn the recovery over to the senior debt holders. An "X-clause" in the indenture permits the subordinated holders to receive a reorganized debtor's securities that are junior to the securities received by the senior debt holders on their claims. Although the form of the clause is ambiguous on this point, it permits such recovery only when the securities that the senior debt holders recover fully compensate the senior holders. In this case, they did not, and the senior creditors did not accept the plan. Therefore, even though the senior holders received cash, common stock, and warrants, and even though the warrants were junior to the common stock, the subordinated holders could not recover any warrants. Deutsche Bank AG v. Metromedia Fiber Network, Inc. (In re Metromedia Fiber Network, Inc.), 416 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 2005).

6.2.gggggg Workers compensation carrier's premium claim is entitled to priority under section 507(a)(4). In a per curiam decision, the Fourth Circuit follows the Ninth Circuit and disagrees with the Sixth, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits in ruling that unpaid workers compensation insurance premiums incurred in the 180-day period before bankruptcy are entitled to the "contribution to an employee benefit plan" priority of section 507(a)(4). The 2-1 decision produced three opinions. One concludes that the phrase "contribution to an employee benefit plan" unambiguously includes workers compensation insurance premiums because the insurance is for the benefit of the employees. The other two conclude that the phrase is ambiguous and criticize the first opinion for selective review of dictionaries to find otherwise. They both review the legislative history but reach opposite conclusions on whether the premiums are included. One relies in part on an analogy to ERISA to conclude that workers compensation insurance is an employee benefit plan. The other argues that priorities are to be narrowly construed and that the insurance protects the employers from statutory workers compensation liability, not the employee. Howard Delivery Serv., Inc. v. Zurich Am. Ins. Co. (In re Howard Delivery Serv., Inc.), 403 F.3d 228 (4th Cir. 2005).

6.2.hhhhhh Unpaid health insurance premiums for COBRA coverage are entitled to priority. The debtor had terminated numerous employees well before bankruptcy. Many of them maintained COBRA coverage after termination through the debtor's health insurance provider and paid the debtor for their coverage. The health insurance provider was unpaid at the time of the debtor's bankruptcy for coverage within the 180 days before bankruptcy. Based on the Fourth Circuit's recent decision granting section 507(a)(4) priority to workers compensation insurance claims, the court grants priority to the health insurance provider's claim. The court construes "for services provided within 180 days before" bankruptcy as applying to the provider's, not the just employees', services. Ivey v. Great-West Life & Annuity Ins. Co. (In re J.G. Furniture Group, Inc.), 405 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2005).

- 6.2.iiiii Disappointed bidder's expenses are not limited by break-up fee standard. A disappointed bidder sought reimbursement of its expenses (attorney's fees and expenses) under section 503(b)(1) as an administrative expense claim because its activities conferred a benefit on the estate. The allowable amount is limited only by the reasonableness of the expenses, not by the typical percentage analysis that is applied to a break-up fee. AgriProcessors, Inc. v. Fokkena (In re Tama Beef Packing, Inc.), 321 B.R. 496 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2005).
- 6.2.jjjjj Court authorizes critical vendor payments under Kmart standards. The debtor in possession apparel manufacturer's fabric suppliers and others refused to ship more product without payment for certain prepetition amounts owing. The debtor in possession had negotiated a deal with the suppliers that they would accept payment of 77.5% of their prepetition claims, waive the balance of 22.5%, ship new goods on ordinary trade terms during the case, and retain their reclamation rights. In exchange, the debtor in possession would pay the 77.5% amount and waive any preference claims. Applying the standards set forth in In re Kmart Corp., 359 F.3d 866 (7th Cir. 2004), the court determines that the agreement is reasonable, that the vendors would not ship without the agreement, that the vendors' goods were unique, and that the payment would benefit disfavored creditors, because the debtor in possession could not get timely shipment of substitute goods and because it would support the debtor in possession's agreement to sell its business under section 363, which required that the debtor in possession maintain operations. The order was issued approximately one month after the date of the filing of the petition. In re Tropical Sportswear Int'l Corp., 320 B.R. 15 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2005).
- 6.2.kkkkk Reclamation creditors are entitled to administrative expense claims where secured inventory lender had been paid in full. The debtor in possession obtained a reclamation order upon the filing of the chapter 11 case, which provided that valid reclamation claims would be entitled to administrative expense priority. A lender had a security interest in all inventory, whose value was more than adequate to pay the secured claim in full. After the inventory had been liquidated, the debtor in possession objected to allowance of the reclamation claims as administrative expenses, arguing that the reclamation creditors' interests were subordinate to the lender's security interest and therefore not valid. The court reviews the case law on the competing interests of secured and reclamation creditors, noting the "plain meaning" line, which reads 546(c) as entitling the reclamation creditor to an administrative expense, and the "valuation" line, which grants administrative expense priority only if the inventory value is sufficient to pay the secured claim. The court adopts the former interpretation, but notes also that because the secured lender was paid in full here, the reclamation creditors were entitled to assert their administrative claims even under the valuation line. The court also finds an equitable estoppel against the debtor in possession on account of the first-day reclamation order. In re Georgetown Steel Co., LLC, 317 B.R. 340 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2004).
- 6.2.iiiii A nonprofit debtor's unemployment compensation reimbursement obligation is not a priority tax. Under New Jersey law, as authorized by Federal law, a nonprofit employer may choose not to make quarterly unemployment tax contributions but instead to reimburse the state if the state makes unemployment compensation payments to the nonprofit's terminated employees. The debtor's reimbursement obligation is not a tax that is entitled to priority. A tax is an involuntary exaction imposed for general public purposes. Unemployment contribution obligations are such an exaction, because the funds benefit the government generally, whether or not the nonprofit's employees are terminated. The reimbursement obligation, however, is imposed to repay the government for the actual cost of unemployment compensation directly related to the nonprofit's terminated employees and is not for general governmental purposes. Reconstituted Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. New Jersey Dep't of Labor (In re United Healthcare Sys., Inc.), 396 F.3d 247 (3d Cir. 2005).

6.2.mmmmmm Postpetition, preconversion tax claim is entitled to administrative expense priority in chapter 13. The debtors operated their business in chapter 11 for over a year, but did not pay FICA and FUTA taxes during the case. They discontinued their business, found employment, and converted their cases to chapter 13. The tax claims were entitled to administrative expense priority in the chapter 13 cases. Section 348(d) provides that a claim that arises during a chapter 11 case is treated as a prepetition claim after conversion, except for administrative expense claims. This section takes precedence over section 1305, which requires that tax claims filed under section 1305 be determined and allowed under section 502 as if they had arisen prepetition. Section 1305 does not, however, address priority, only allowability. Section 348(d) preserves the tax claims' priority status. United States v. Fowler (In re Fowler), 394 F.3d 1208 (9th Cir. 2005).

6.2.nnnnnn Fraudulent transfer action attorney's fee award against trustee is entitled to administrative priority. The chapter 7 trustee brought an unsuccessful action under section 544(b) and the Alaska Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act to avoid a prepetition transfer. Under Alaska law, the defendant in such an action is entitled to attorney's fees. The court grants the fee award administrative expense priority in the chapter 7 case. Noting mixed signals from Ninth Circuit case law on the issue, the court concludes that the fundamental fairness rationale behind the holding of Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), requires that the estate, for whose benefit the trustee brought the action, should be liable for the fees as an expense of administration. In re Good Taste, Inc., 317 B.R. 112 (Bankr. D. Alaska 2004).

6.2.oooooo Taxes owing under a late-filed tax return are not entitled to priority. The chapter 13 debtor had not filed income tax returns for six years before bankruptcy but did so shortly after filing, in order to obtain plan confirmation. Section 507(a)(8) and section 523(a)(1) reflect a "delicate balance" among the public interest in collecting taxes, protection of creditors from excessive tax claims, and the debtor's fresh start and so must be read together. Section 507(a)(8)(A)(iii) grants priority to income taxes "other than a tax of a kind specified in section 523(a)(1)(B) or 523(a)(1)(C) of this title, not assessed before, but assessable . . . after, the commencement of the case." Section 523(a)(1)(B) excepts a tax from discharge if a required return was filed late "and after two years before" the petition date. The quoted phrase is open-ended, including returns filed after the petition date, as contrasted with a closed-ended phrase such as "within two years before" the petition date. Therefore, the taxes in this case for the oldest three years, for which returns were filed after the petition date, were excepted from discharge under section 523(a)(1)(B) and therefore not entitled to priority under section 507(a)(8)(A)(iii). Savaria v. United States (In re Savaria), 317 B.R. 396 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).

6.2.pppppp Nonimpairment by reinstatement eliminates a default's effects as to all parties, not just the debtor. The holders of the senior secured notes were entitled to a prepayment penalty upon default and acceleration. The holders of the subordinated secured notes had agreed not to receive payment on their notes while any amounts remained owing under the senior notes. The debtor's plan provided for cure and reinstatement of the senior notes, thereby erasing the effect of the default and relieving the debtor of the prepayment penalty obligation. The senior note holders were not entitled to recover the prepayment penalty from the subordinated note holders' recovery, because the de-acceleration and reinstatement of the senior notes entirely eliminated the prepayment penalty obligation as to all parties, not just as to the debtor. MW Post Portfolio Fund Ltd. v. Norwest Bank Minnesota (In re ONCO Inv. Co.), 316 B.R. 163 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004).

- 6.2.qqqqqq Stock repurchase note must be equitably subordinated. When the debtor's former officer retired, the debtor repurchased the stock the officer owned in his ESOP account, paying part in cash and part with a note. The debtor was solvent at the time. Before the note was paid off, the debtor filed chapter 11. The officer's claim is equitably subordinated under section 510(c), even though the officer did not engage in any inequitable conduct. As a matter of venerable First Circuit case law, all stock repurchase claims must be equitably subordinated. Though ERISA governs ESOPs, nothing in ERISA restricts subordination, because the claim is strictly on a note issued by the debtor. Harrison v. Merrimac Paper Co. (In re Merrimac Paper Co.), 317 B.R. 215 (D. Mass. 2004).
- 6.2.rrrrrr Highway heavy truck fee is a priority excise tax. Internal Revenue Code section 4481 imposes fees on a heavy truck that uses the highways for more than 5000 miles per year, based on the truck's weight. The fee is a tax, because it is a mandatory financial burden to support the government; that a truck owner may choose to use the truck less than 5000 miles per year does not make the impost any less mandatory. It is not a fee because it is not in exchange for a benefit that is not shared by others who do not pay the fee. The tax is an excise tax, because it is an indirect tax on an activity or transaction, not a direct tax on persons or property. The excise tax here is entitled to priority because the operation of the trucks on the highway constitutes the transaction subject to tax, and the transaction occurred within one year before the petition date. Trustees of the Trism Liquidating Trust v. Internal Revenue Serv. (In re Trism, Inc.), 311 B.R. 509 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2004).
- 6.2.ssssss Gift certificates are "deposits" under section 507(a)(6). The debtor had sold gift certificates. It sought to classify the holders' claims under its plan as general unsecured claims, arguing that "deposit," as used in the section 507(a)(6) consumer deposit priority, applies only to partial payments for goods. The court finds no such limitation and grants the claims priority. In re WW Warehouse, Inc., 313 B.R. 588 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2004).
- 6.2.tttttt Equitable subordination in Ponzi scheme case requires inequitable conduct. A creditor of a Ponzi scheme debtor's affiliate rolled its loan into a loan to the debtor, with an interest rate and other terms similar to those promised to the equity investors in the Ponzi scheme. The equity investors sought equitable subordination of the creditor's claim. The Tenth Circuit refused, holding that the creditor's position and actions did not amount to inequitable conduct, which was required for equitable subordination. In its opinion, the court expressly limit application of its prior "no fault" subordination decision, In re CF&I Fabricators, Inc., 53 F.3d 1155(10th Cir. 1995), rev'd on other grounds, 518 U.S. 213 (1996), to tax penalties. Sender v. Bronze Group, Ltd., 380 F.3d 1292 (10th Cir. 2004).
- 6.2.uuuuuu Rule of Explicitness is overruled. The First Circuit concludes that the Rule of Explicitness, a rule of New York law that permits a senior creditor to be paid postpetition interest ahead of a subordinated creditor in a bankruptcy distribution if the subordination agreement is explicit on the point, violates the Bankruptcy Code, because it is a state-made rule that applies only in bankruptcy, thereby disrupting the bankruptcy distribution scheme that Congress established. Instead, the court must apply the general rules of construction of contracts under New York law to determine the parties' intent in the subordination provision. The court remands to the bankruptcy court to conduct the factual inquiry necessary to determine that intent. The decision is directly contrary to In re Southeast Banking Corp., 156 F.3d 1114 (11th Cir. 1998). HSBC Bank USA v. Branch (In re Bank of New England Corp.), 364 F.3d 355 (1st Cir. 2004).
- 6.2.vvvvvv Insurer is entitled to fringe benefit priority for payments made within 180 days before bankruptcy. The debtor terminated the employment of its employees more than 180 days before bankruptcy, but many of them continued their health insurance coverage under COBRA until the petition date. The health insurer merely administered the plan; the debtor reimbursed the insurer for all claims paid, up to a stop-loss amount. The insurer sought priority for unreimbursed payments it had made to former employees within 180 days before bankruptcy. The court awards the priority. Section 507(a)(4), the fringe benefit priority, is not limited to claims of employees, as the section 507(a)(3) priority is, because it does not refer to claims earned for wages, salaries, etc., but rather to “claims for contributions to an employee benefit plan.” In addition, the section grants priority to such claims “arising from services rendered within 180 days before the date of the filing of the petition,” without limiting the nature of the services rendered. Because the insurer is entitled to the priority, it is reasonable to conclude that the reference is to the services that the insurer, not the employees, rendered, so the payments made within that period are entitled to priority. Ivey v. Great West Life & Ann. Ins. Co., 308 B.R. 752 (M.D.N.C. 2004).

6.2.wwwww Landlord’s claim for removal of property at the end of the lease is not entitled to administrative expense priority. Section 365(d)(4) requires a trustee to “timely perform all obligations ... arising from and after the order for relief ... until such lease is assumed or rejected.” Under Ninth Circuit precedent, the landlord has an administrative expense priority for any such obligations that are unperformed. In this case, the lease required the debtor to remove improvements from the real property upon termination or expiration of the lease. The debtor in possession rejected the lease without removing the property, and the landlord sought an administrative expense claim for the damages. Applying a “bright-line rule” for entitlement to administrative expense priority, the Ninth Circuit grants the landlord only a prepetition claim. Section 365(d)(4) applies only until rejection; the lease termination occurred only on rejection; and the removal obligation arose only on termination, so it did not come within the time period covered by section 365(d)(4). K-4, Inc. v. Midway Engineered Wood Prods., Inc. (In re TreeSource Ind., Inc.), 363 F.3d 994 (9th Cir. 2004).

6.2.xxxxx A reclaiming creditor takes priority over new DIP loan. The debtor’s prepetition secured lender refinanced its loan under a debtor in possession loan facility. Under the DIP loan, the entire prepetition loan was paid off, and the lender took new liens to secure the DIP loan. Although the reclamation claims asserted against the debtor at the petition date would have been subject to the liens of the prepetition lender as a bona fide purchaser, they were not subject to the subsequent lien imposed in favor of the DIP lender and therefore were valid reclamation claims, entitled to be paid under section 546(c). In re Phar-Mor, Inc., 301 B.R. 482 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2003).

6.2.yyyyy Reclamation claims are subordinate to new DIP financing. A reclamation claimant has a right to an administrative claim or lien under section 546(c) only to the extent that it has a valid claim against the debtor outside of bankruptcy. An over-secured creditor may satisfy its claim out of any of its collateral, including inventory that is subject to a right of reclamation, and is not required to marshal for the benefit of the reclamation creditors. Moreover, the reclamation creditors have claims against only their specific goods, not generally against a surplus upon the payoff of the secured creditor’s claim. Therefore, the use of the inventory to secure a new DIP facility, the proceeds of which would pay off the prepetition secured lender, amounts to an undifferentiated sale of the inventory in favor of the prepetition secured creditor and renders the reclamation claims valueless. In re Dairy Mart Convenience Stores, Inc., 302 B.R. 128 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003). Accord In re Pittsburgh-Canfield Corp., 305 B.R. 688 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2003).

6.2.zzzzz Claim under a stock put agreement is not subordinated. Because of disputes between the debtor’s two principal stockholders, one stockholder agreed to sell its stock back to the debtor. It entered into a stock put agreement, under which it would retain a 4% interest and have the right to put the balance of the stock to the debtor for a fixed price for a fixed period of time, subject to acceleration upon the occurrence of certain financial condition events. The stock purchase agreement provided that the seller would have no further management, control or voting rights. The triggering events occurred before the petition date, and the stockholder put the stock to the debtor. The debtor sought subordination of the former stockholder's claim under section 510(b). The district court construes the Third Circuit's decision in In re Telegroup, Inc., 281 F.3d 133 (3d Cir. 2002), as creating a hypothetical test, under which the claim should be subordinated if it was indistinguishable from a hypothetical securities fraud claim. The court finds that this claim is not, because the stockholder gave up all management, control, and voting rights and did not stand to lose if the stock declined (even though the stockholder stood to gain if the stock appreciated). Raven Media Investments LLC v. DirecTV Latin America, LLC (In re DirecTV Latin America, LLC), 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2425 (D. Del. 2004).

6.2.aaaaaaa Securities “non-purchase” claim is subordinated. The claimants contributed equity to the debtor at its formation and were promised the issuance of shares. Later, the controlling shareholder issued shares to himself but not to the claimants. Still later, the controlling shareholder sold the corporation to a third party at a substantial profit. The claimants sued the controlling shareholder and the corporation for the damages they suffered as a result of not having the shares. They obtained a state court judgment against both the controlling shareholder and the corporation. After the corporation filed bankruptcy, it sought to subordinate the claimants' claims under section 510(b). The court rules that there must be some “causal nexus” between the sale and the damages for subordination under section 510(b). The court finds the nexus in the issuance (sale) of the shares to the controlling shareholder resulting in the damages to the claimants. Relying also on the policy underlying section 510(b) that only investors should bear the risk that equity interests will be wiped out by fraud, the court subordinates the claims. In re PT-One Communications, Inc., 304 B.R. 601 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2004).

6.2.bbbbbbb Equitable subordination of non-insider claim requires substantial showing. Lehman Brothers, Inc. provided a warehouse financing line to First Alliance Mortgage Company, which was found to have engaged in fraudulent sales practices to the detriment of sub-prime borrowers. Lehman's warehouse line was secured by First Alliance mortgages. The bankruptcy trustee sought equitable subordination of Lehman's claim, because Lehman provided the line at a time when it knew or reasonably should have known of the debtor's illegal conduct in securing the mortgages. The district court denies equitable subordination. Equitable subordination is a remedial, not a penal, measure and should be used only sparingly. In the case of a non-fiduciary, non-insider, gross and egregious conduct, tantamount to fraud, misrepresentation, over reaching, spoliation or conduct involving moral turpitude are required before a court will equitably subordinate a claim.” Lehman's participation in the debtor's scheme, while reprehensible, did not rise to that level in a way that harmed other creditors of the debtor. Accordingly, the remedial measure of equitable subordination was not warranted. The court notes that subordination of a non-insider, non-fiduciary claim is rarely if ever imposed. Austin v. Chisick (In re First Alliance Mortgage Co.), 298 B.R. 652 (C.D. Cal. 2003); aff'd sub nom. Henry v. Lehman Comm'l Paper, Inc. (In re First Alliance Mortgage Co.), 471 F.3d 977 (9th Cir. 2006).

6.2.ccccccc State penalties for non-payment of postpetition wages are entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor-in-possession failed to pay certain wages, resulting in the imposition of a state Labor Code penalty in the employees favor. The penalty is entitled to administrative expense priority, because it was imposed for failure of the debtor-in-possession to comply with postpetition obligations in the operation of its business. Gonzales v. Gottlieb (In re Metro Fulfillment, Inc.), 294 B.R. 306 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).

6.2.dddddddd Debtor-in-possession need not contract directly for services to be liable for an administrative expense claim. The debtor-in-possession's affiliate, a chapter 11 debtor in a related but unconsolidated case, had contracted prepetition with Verizon to provide telecommunication services. Before bankruptcy, the affiliate transferred the Verizon-served markets to the debtor, who continued to serve those markets. Neither entity had notified Verizon. The affiliate continued to deal directly with Verizon, acting as agent for the debtor. Verizon sought an administrative expense claim against both debtors for postpetition services rendered. The court reviewed the two tests that must be satisfied for payment of an administrative expense: “benefit to the estate” and “a transaction with the debtor-in-possession.” The court rules that the services did not benefit the estate of the affiliate. The debtor-in-possession argued that although it received the benefit, it did not enter into a transaction as debtor-in-possession with Verizon. Understandably, the court did not want to leave Verizon without a remedy for the services it had provided. The court determines that the “transaction with the debtor-in-possession” requirement may be met where the debtor-in-possession knowingly desires and accepts the postpetition benefit. In re Adelpia Business Solutions, Inc., 296 B.R. 656 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003).

6.2.eeeeeee Credit card charge-backs do not entitle card processor to consumer deposit priority. Before bankruptcy, the debtor took numerous credit card deposits from consumers for its services. The debtor submitted the credit card charges to a processor, who paid the debtor the amount of the charges and submitted the charges to and received payment from the card issuing banks. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, the customers, who had not received the services, sought reimbursement from the card issuing banks, which sought reimbursement from the processor. The reimbursements were required under the Fair Credit Billing Act and the agreements among the customer, the banks, and the processor. Under the circumstances, the processor subrogated to the claims of the customers against the debtor. Even though the agreements also provided for an assignment of the claims to the processor, the assignment was not voluntary but was required by law and the other agreements. Under the circumstances, the court treated the transaction as a subrogation, with the result that section 507(d), which prohibits subrogation to a priority, applied. The court denied priority to the processor. Nova Information Systems, Inc. v. Premier Operations, Ltd. (In re Premier Operations), 294 B.R. 213 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

6.2.ffffff Equitable subordination may be only remedial, not punitive. The creditor's egregious breach of fiduciary duty in the case resulted in the equitable subordination of its claim. In determining the amount that should be subordinated, the Third Circuit rules that “a claim should be equitably subordinated only to the extent necessary to offset the harm suffered by the debtor and its creditors as a result of the inequitable conduct.” In this case, a significant portion of the harm that the other creditors suffered was the attorneys' fees that the estate incurred in litigating not only the subordination of the claims but also other aspects of the creditors' conduct. Thus, the claim was subordinated to the extent necessary so that the distribution to the creditor would be reduced by the amount of attorneys' fees incurred. The court specifically includes the attorneys' fees incurred as a result of the creditor repeatedly relitigating issues which the court found to be inequitable conduct. Citicorp Venture Capital, Ltd. v. Committee of Creditors, 323 F.3d 228 (3d Cir. 2003).

6.2.ggggggg Shareholder loans are not automatically recharacterized or subordinated. The shareholder had previously capitalized the debtor with $10 million. When the debtor became financially distressed and could not obtain funds from any other source, it approached the shareholder for a $300,000 loan. The shareholder agreed, but insisted upon collateral. Bankruptcy soon followed. Other creditors sought recharacterization or equitable subordination. The court rules that a shareholder loan at a time of financial distress should not automatically be recharacterized, because the test for undercapitalization as one of the factors in determining recharacterization must be determined as of the inception of the business, rather than at the time of the loan. In addition, the debtor's inability to obtain a loan from any other source should not result in automatic recharacterization, despite some authorities to the contrary. Finally, the claim should not be subordinated by reason of the lender's insider status. The taking of a security interest is not such inequitable conduct as to require subordination, nor does undercapitalization at the time of the loan constitute inequitable conduct that requires subordination. Farr v. Phase-I

Molecular Toxicology, Inc. (In re Phase-I Molecular Toxicology, Inc.), 287 B.R. 571 (Bankr. D.N.M. 2002).

6.2.hhhhhhh Retention bonuses are denied administrative expense priority. Before bankruptcy, the debtor promised employees retention bonuses if they worked until the closing of certain retail stores. The debtor filed chapter 11 before the stores were closed. The employees continued working until closure and sought administrative expense priority for their retention bonuses on the grounds that they were not earned until the stores were closed and the employees were terminated. The Third Circuit requires pre-petition and post-petition proration of the retention bonus amounts on the grounds that the pre-petition services do not qualify under the standard of section 503(d)(1) as actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate. Former Employees v. Hechinger Investment Co. (In re Hechinger Investment Co.), 298 F.3d 219 (3d Cir. 2002).

6.2.iiiii Post-petition rent is not entitled to a super-priority. Administrative rent under a non-residential lease of real property that section 365(d)(3) requires to be paid is not entitled to priority over the expenses of administration of a superceding chapter 7 case. Similarly, if the chapter 11 estate is insolvent, the administrative rent payable under section 365(b)(3) shares pro rata with other chapter 11 administrative expenses. Kir Temecula v. LPM Corp. (In re LPM Corp.), 300 F.3d 1134 (9th Cir. 2002).

6.2.jjjjj Litigation costs are awarded first priority status. The trustee sued to recover a fraudulent transfer and lost. The bankruptcy court awarded the defendants costs. The First Circuit rules that the costs, awarded under chapter 123 of title 28, are entitled to first priority under section 507(a)(1), because of the express reference to chapter 123 in section 507(a)(1), whether or not the costs would qualify as administrative expenses under section 503(b). Brandt v. Lazard Freres & Co. (In re HealthCo International, Inc.), 310 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2002).

6.2.kkkkkkk Equitable subordination and fraudulent transfer claims dismissed. The creditors committee sued the debtor's bank lenders on claims of equitable subordination and fraudulent transfer arising out of the lenders' providing new financing to the debtor in connection with the debtor's issuance of subordinated notes and the acquisition of three businesses. In granting the lenders' motion to dismiss the complaint, the court provides a thorough yet succinct primer on the law of equitable subordination and alter ego liability. In addition, the court rules that the loan, note issuance, and acquisition transactions should not be collapsed, again providing a solid summary of the law governing when transactions should be collapsed. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Morgan Stanley & Co., Inc. (In re Sunbeam Corp.), 284 B.R. 355 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2002).

6.2.iiiii Tax lien subordination under section 724 applies only to statutory liens. Under section 724(b), "a lien that secures a tax" is subordinated to payment of certain priority claims. Construing what it considers ambiguous language in the provision, the Ninth Circuit rules that the subordination provision applies only to statutory tax liens. Therefore, in a case where the IRS received an adequate protection lien in return for turning over funds that it held to secure taxes, the subordination provision did not apply. Barstow v. United States (In re Markair, Inc.), 308 F.3d 1038 (9th Cir. 2002).

6.2.mmmmmmm Tax lien subordination to priority claims is limited. Section 724(b) subordinates a tax lien to certain priority claims, to the extent of the amount of the tax lien. The Ninth Circuit construes section 724(b)(2) to limit the amount of priority claims that may be paid from property securing the tax lien to the dollar amount of the secured tax claim. Therefore, if there is a surplus after payment of the tax lien and any other secured claims, the funds go to the tax claimant rather than to priority claimants. North Slope Borough v. Barstow (In re Markair, Inc.), 308 F.3d 1057 (9th Cir. 2002).

6.2.nnnnnnn Unemployment benefit reimbursement obligations are not entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor non-profit corporation was obligated by state law to reimburse the state for unemployment benefits that the state paid to workers terminated after the filing of the chapter 11 case. The First Circuit rules that the reimbursement payments are administrative expenses only to the extent that they are attributable to work done after the petition. The court reasons that the unemployment compensation would have been paid to the employees even if they had been terminated on the date of the filing of the petition, so that post-petition termination does not increase the priority of the state's reimbursement claim, relying on In re Mammoth Mart, Inc., 536 F.2d 950 (1st Cir. 1976). Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Boston Regional Medical Center, Inc. (In re Boston Regional Medical Center, Inc.), 291 F.3d 111 (1st Cir. 2002).

6.2.0000000 Post-petition interest on an administrative tax claim has administrative priority. Following four other circuits and overruling the B.A.P., the First Circuit rules that interest accrued during a case on an administrative expense tax claim that is entitled to priority under section 503(b)(1)(B)(i) is also entitled to administrative expense priority, despite the language in section 726(a)(5) that subordinates post-petition interest on claims. The court finds the statutory language ambiguous and so relies on legislative history, historical context (including the Supreme Court's decision in Nicholas v. United States, 384 U.S. 678 (1966)), and statutory policy. United States v. Yellin (In re Weinstein), 272 F.3d 39 (1st Cir. 2001).

6.2.ppppppp Court strictly limits payment of critical vendors. On the debtor's motion for payment of critical vendors, the court finds that other than section 105, the Bankruptcy Code does not authorize such payments and that the case law does not give a court broad powers to approve payment of pre-petition claims. The court rules, however, that claims may be paid if necessary to performance of the debtor-in-possession's fiduciary duty to preserve and maximize the value of the estate. The court requires that the debtor show that it is critical that the debtor deal with the claimant, that failure to deal with the claimant risks the possibility of harm or loss of economic advantage that is disproportionate to the amount of the claimants pre-petition claim, and that there is no practical or legal alternative by which the debtor can obtain goods or services from the claimant (such as by a deposit, C.O.D., or assumption of a contract). In re Coserv, L.L.C., 273 B.R. 487 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2002).

6.2.qqqqqqq Non-profit's unemployment payments in lieu of insurance contributions is not a tax. Under the Federal unemployment insurance scheme, as implemented by the states, non-profit organizations may choose to reimburse the state directly for an unemployment payment the state must make to the non-profit's former employees. The First Circuit holds, in a case of first impression, that the reimbursement obligation is not a "tax," as used in section 507(a)(8). The reimbursement payments do not defray the cost of government, but are straight dollar-for-dollar reimbursements of unemployment benefits paid. Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Boston Regional Medical Center, Inc. (In re Boston Regional Medical Center, Inc.), 291 F.3d 111 (1st Cir. 2002).

6.2.rrrrrrr Workers compensation "excise tax" liability arises upon injury. The Arizona Workers Compensation Statute provides for payment of an injured worker from a special fund and for liability on the uninsured employer to reimburse the fund. The Ninth Circuit previously determined that the reimbursement obligation is an "excise tax," within the meaning of section 507(a)(8)(E)(ii). In re Camilli, 94 F.3d 1330 (9th Cir. 1996). In this decision, the Ninth Circuit determines that the excise tax is incurred upon the worker's injury. An excise tax on a transaction occurring more than three years before bankruptcy is dischargeable. In this case, because the injury occurred more than three years before the debtor's bankruptcy, the reimbursement obligation to the state's special fund was discharged. DeRoche v. Arizona Industrial Commission (In re DeRoche), 287 F.3d 751 (9th Cir. 2002).

6.2.ssssss Section 724 subordinates only statutory tax liens. Section 724(b) subordinates "a lien ... that secures an allowed claim for a tax" to certain priority claims that would otherwise be junior to the lien. The district court rules that this provision does not subordinate a judicial lien in favor of the IRS, because the provision applies only to statutory tax liens. The court relies on references later in the section to "such tax lien" and to the legislative history, which uses the same language. Barstow v. IRS, 272 B.R. 710 (D. Alaska 2001).

6.2.tttttt Over-secured creditor's unreasonable attorney's fees claim bifurcated. Georgia law permits a creditor, upon a default, to claim attorneys fees equal to 15% of the loan. Here, the creditor made the claim before bankruptcy, so it was entitled to an allowed claim for that amount under section 502(b). The creditor's claim was over-secured, so the creditor sought allowance of the attorneys fees as part of its secured claim under section 506(b). The court rules that the attorneys fees claim must be bifurcated, so that the portion that is "reasonable" is entitled to treatment as a secured claim under section 506(b), while the balance is allowed as a general unsecured claim. Welzel v. Advocate Realty Investments, LLC (In re Welzel), 275 F.3d 1308 (11th Cir. 2001).

6.2.uuuuuu Claim for failure to register stock is subordinated under section 510(b). In purchasing assets from the claimant, the debtor agreed to register the common shares given in payment of the purchase price. The debtor did not do so and filed bankruptcy before the claims were registered. The claimants asserted a breach of contract claim. The Third Circuit subordinates the claim under section 510(b), holding that because the claim arose under the contract for the purchase of the common stock, the claim "arises from the purchase or sale" of the stock, as provided in section 510(b), is one "arising." Baroda Hill Investments, Ltd. v. Telegroup, Inc. (In re Telegroup, Inc.), 281 F.3d 133 (3d Cir. 2002).

6.2.vvvvvv Court subordinates claim for failure to register stock. The claimants sold their company to the debtor for cash and stock of the debtor. In a supplement, the debtor agreed to have an initial public offering or to register the shares within 18 months. Instead, the debtor filed chapter 11. The court subordinates the creditor's claim. Following the Third Circuit's broad subordination decision in In re Telegroup, Inc., 281 F.3d 133 (3d Cir. 2002), the court rules that the claim is in connection with the purchase or sale of securities of the debtor, because the creditors received some stock in the debtor in exchange for selling the shares in their company through the debtor. The court dismisses the argument that the claim arises from a supplement rather from the initial share purchase agreement as a basis that the claim did not arise from the purchase of the debtor's stock. Frankum v. International Wireless Communications Holdings, Inc. (In re International Wireless Communications Holdings, Inc.), 279 B.R. 463 (D. Del. 2002).

6.2.wwwwww Securities fraud "retention" claim is subordinated under section 510(b). The investor claimed that he would have sold his securities but for the debtor's fraudulent concealment of information concerning the debtors' true financial condition. He asserts the claim for damages arising from failing to sell as a claim in the chapter 11 case. The Tenth Circuit rules that the claim for fraudulent retention of the securities must be subordinated under section 510(b). Looking to the broad policy of section 510(b) to subordinate all investor claims related to the debtor's illegal conduct with respect to securities, the Tenth Circuit finds that the claim is one "arising from the purchase or sale" of the securities, linking the damages to the original purchase of the security. Allen v. Geneva Steel Co. (In re Geneva Steel Co.), 281 F.3d 1173 (10th Cir. 2002).

6.2.xxxxxxx Stock merger agreement is a contract to issue securities of the debtor. The debtor agreed to acquire the seller's business for $200,000 in cash, assumption of $500,000 of liabilities, and issuance of shares in three installments worth $3.5 million. Before all shares were issued, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The court concludes that because the obligation to issue shares, was the lion's share of the consideration for the merger, the merger agreement constituted a contract to issue a security of the debtor and as such could not be assumed under section 365(c)(2). The court departs from the narrower construction of section 365(c)(2) in In re Teligent, 268 B.R. 723 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.), and rules that because it cannot be assumed, the contract must be rejected. In re Ardent, Inc., 275 B.R. 122 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2001).

6.2.yyyyyyy Section 506(c) surcharge is paid directly to the administrative claimant. During the course of the chapter 11 case, debtor's counsel incurred $50,000 in fees to try to sell the collateral; a potential purchaser advanced $150,000 under section 364(c)(1) to permit the property to continue operating. After the sales failed and the property was sold at auction, the secured creditor and the debtor's counsel entered into an agreement permitting the debtor's counsel to be paid $50,000 from the collateral as a surcharge under section 506(c). The superpriority administrative claimant objected. The Ninth Circuit rules that by reason of Hartford Underwriters, 530 U.S. 1 (2000), the administrative claimant had no standing to object to the surcharge settlement. Moreover, the distribution of the surcharge directly to the debtor's counsel was appropriate, because the result to the administrative claimant should not depend on whether the trustee expended money to benefit the secured creditors collateral or simply incurred a debt to an administrative claimant. The carve out of the collateral must be paid directly to the claimant who benefited the secured creditor. Debbie Reynolds Hotel & Casino, Inc. v. Calstar Corp., Inc. (In re Debbie Reynolds Resorts, Inc.), 255 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2001).

6.2.zzzzzzz Creditor's post-petition attorney's fees under a pre-petition contract are not entitled to administrative expense priority. The chapter 7 trustee sued a creditor post-petition for breach of contract but was unsuccessful in his action. The contract contained a prevailing party attorney's fees clause, so the bankruptcy court awarded the creditor attorney's fees but declined to grant administrative expense priority to the fees. Basing its ruling on a policy analysis of Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), the Fifth Circuit rules that the creditor is not entitled to administrative expense priority for its attorney's fees. The court does not base its decision primarily on the fact that the contract was a pre-petition contract, for it notes that the trustee commenced the action post-petition, nor on the fact that the trustee did not commit a wrongful act (as in Reading). Rather, it bases its ruling on a balancing of potential injury to the creditor and the other unsecured creditors, who would be substantially penalized by an award of administrative expense priority. Total Niatome Corp. v. Jack/Wade Drilling, Inc. (In re Jack/Wade Drilling, Inc.), 258 F.3d 385 (5th Cir. 2001).

6.2.aaaaaaa Post-petition unemployment taxes relating to pre-petition employment is not entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor self-insured its unemployment insurance, paying amounts to the state retroactively based on unemployment benefits that the state paid to laid-off workers, based on their pre-layoff wages. Shortly after filing bankruptcy, the debtor laid-off most of its employees. The state began paying unemployment benefits to the employees and filed an administrative expense priority claim against the debtor. The B.A.P. rejects the state's argument that the state's date of payment of the benefits is the triggering event for administrative expense priority, looking instead to the pre-petition entity as the employer who incurred the liability to the state for the unemployment benefits. Commonwealth v. Boston Regional Medical Center, Inc. (In re Boston Regional Medical Center, Inc.), 265 B.R. 838 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

6.2.bbbbbbb Section 510(b) takes precedence over section 541(d). A purchaser of securities from the debtor alleged that the purchase had been induced by fraud, such that the court should impress a constructive trust on the purchaser's funds still held by the debtor at the time of bankruptcy. The debtor argued that section 510(b) subordinated a claim for rescission of the purchase of securities. The purchaser argued that section 541(d) prevented the property from becoming property of the estate, because of the debtor's fraud and the purchaser's right to the imposition of a constructive trust, so the debtor never obtained an equitable interest in the funds. The court rules that section 510(b) evidences a Congressional policy to subordinate all securities purchase rescission and claims, even where a constructive trust is alleged. NationsBank, N.A. v. Commercial Financial Services, Inc. (In re Commercial Financial Services, Inc.), 268 B.R. 579 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. 2001).

6.2.ccccccc Indenture subordination provision enforced. The debtor's subordinated indenture contained the standard "double dividend" provision, under which the distribution to the subordinated noteholders is diverted to the senior noteholders until the senior notes are paid in full. Under the terms of the indenture, the double dividend provision applied only in the event of the dissolution, liquidation, reorganization, or distribution of the assets of the debtor, but another provision, simply prohibiting payments on the subordinated notes, applied in all other circumstances. The Ninth Circuit overruled the objection of an unsecured creditor that the double dividend provision, triggered by the bankruptcy or dissolution language of the indenture constituted an invalid ipso facto clause that changed the rights of the debtor upon the filing of the bankruptcy. The Ninth Circuit therefore does not address the issue of whether the indenture is an executory contract to which section 365(e) applies nor the enforceability of the subordination agreement under section 510(a). Spieker Properties, L.P. v. SPFC Liquidating Trust (In re Southern Pacific Funding Corp.), 268 F.3d 712 (9th Cir. 2001).

6.2.dddddddd When is an administrative property tax incurred? Section 503(b)(1)(B)(i) grants administrative expense priority to a tax "incurred by the estate," unless the tax is of a kind specified in section 507(a)(8). The latter section grants pre-petition priority to "a property tax assessed before the commencement of the case." In this case, the tax record date, which determined valuation of the property, occurred on January 1; the debtor filed chapter 11 on January 15; the city council voted the amount of the property tax on May 19; and the tax year began July 1. The Sixth Circuit rules that the tax was "incurred" when imposed by the city council, because that was when the property owner became personally liable for the property tax. The property tax was not "assessed" before the commencement of the case, because the test of when a tax is assessed is essentially the same as when it is incurred. In addition, the taxing agency did not have a contingent claim at the January date of the filing of the petition, because no right to payment, contingent or otherwise, existed until the city imposed the tax. City of White Plains v. A & S Galleria Real Estate, Inc. (In re Federated Department Stores, Inc.), 270 F.3d 994 (6th Cir. 2001).

6.2.eeeeeeee A senior lienor does not owe a fiduciary duty to a junior lienor. Once the chapter 11 case failed, the senior creditor, whose lien extended to accounts, inventory, equipment, and real property, foreclosed. The junior lienor, whose lien extended only to accounts and the real property, brought an action against the senior for damages for the senior's failure to marshal and for breach of fiduciary duty. The court rules that marshaling is an equitable doctrine that can be asserted only at the time of the foreclosure on the assets. More importantly, the court rules that a senior secured creditor does not have any fiduciary duty to a junior secured creditor, because the parties are involved in a commercial transaction in which the senior does not act for the junior's benefit and the junior does not place any special confidence or trust in the senior in the transactions. Simmons Foods, Inc. v. Capital City Bank, Inc., 270 B.R. 295 (D. Kan. 2001).

6.2.ffffff Severance payment is not entitled to administrative expense priority. Shortly after filing chapter 11, the debtor terminated an executive whose employment contract provided for a severance payment of one year's salary and moved to reject the contract. The executive sought administrative expense priority for the severance payment. The Tenth Circuit rejected the claim. Reasoning that priorities must be narrowly construed, the court ruled that the debtor's liability for the payment arose at the time the contract was entered into by the debtor, not the debtor in possession; that the consideration the executive provided the debtor for the severance payment was given prepetition; and that the short period of postpetition employment did not provide adequate consideration to the estate to support administrative expense priority. Bachman v. Commercial Financial Services, Inc. (In re Commercial Financial Services, Inc.), 246 F.3d 1291 (10th Cir. 2001).

6.2.gggggggg Section 510(b), subordinating securities claims, should be read broadly. The claimants sold their companies to the debtor in exchange for the debtor's stock, which was never issued. The Ninth Circuit subordinates the claimants' claims under section 510(b), ruling that section 510(b) applies to any purchase or sale of equity securities, not just to claims for violation of the securities laws, that physical possession of the stock certificates is not required as a condition to subordination, nor is an actual sale required for subordination. The claimants had already transferred the assets to the debtor and received either the stock or the promise of stock in exchange. They could not, on those facts, convert their claim into a general unsecured claim. American Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Nugent (In re Betacom of Phoenix, Inc.), 240 F.3d 823 (9th Cir. 2001).

6.2.hhhhhhhh Section 510(b) subordination applies to claims for debtor's fraud after purchase of notes. The creditor asserted that the debtor's fraud lulled the creditor into holding senior bonds rather than selling them. The Tenth Circuit B.A.P. rules that the claim must be subordinated under section 510(b), giving a broad reading to the statutory language requiring subordination of claims arising from the purchase or sale of a security, based on the policy underlying section 510(b). Allen v. Geneva Steel Co. (In re Geneva Steel Co.), 260 B.R. 517 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

6.2.iiiiiii Section 510(b) subordination does not require disallowance in a subsidiary's case. The creditor owned Dragon Systems, Inc., which merged into a subsidiary of the debtor, and received common stock of the parent in the merger transaction. Both the debtor and its subsidiary filed chapter 11. The creditor filed claims in both cases, acknowledging that section 510(b) required subordination of its claims in each case to the level of common stock in each case, even though it held common stock only in the parent corporation. The subsidiary argued that the claim should be completely subordinated to the level of common stock in the parent company. The bankruptcy court overruled the debtor's objection, ruling that section 510(b) applies separately in each of the two cases and that the debtor's position would require disallowance, rather than subordination, of the claim in the subsidiary's case. Learnout & Hauspie Speech Products, N.V. v. Baker (In re Learnout & Hauspie Speech Products, N.V.), 264 B.R. 336 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001).

6.2.jjjjjjjj Post-petition interest on post-petition taxes is subordinated. The Trustee was late in filing tax returns for the estate, incurring interest on the administrative expense taxes. Departing from the Eleventh Circuit's interpretation of sections 503(b) and 726(a), the First Circuit B.A.P. rules that the Bankruptcy Code subordinates to 726(a)(5) priority any post-petition interest incurred on a post-petition tax, effectively holding that the statutory language changes the result from the Bankruptcy Act case of Nicholas v. United States, 384 U.S. 678 (1966). United States v. Yellin (In re Weinstein), 251 B.R. 174 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2000).

6.2.kkkkkkkk Only the trustee may recover administrative expenses from collateral. The Supreme Court reads section 506(c) literally to permit only a trustee to recover administrative expenses from a creditor's collateral. It denied recovery to the insurance company that insured the debtor's operations during the chapter 11 case, although the operations and the insurance ultimately inured to the benefit of the secured creditor from whose collateral the insurer sought recovery. Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 120 S. Ct. 1942 (2000).

- 6.2.iiiii Court limits superpriority claim for lack of adequate protection. Under section 507(b), if the trustee provides adequate protection of a secured creditor's lien and the protection turns out to be inadequate, the creditor is entitled to a superpriority administrative expense for the inadequacy. In this case, however, the court holds that where the secured creditor sought but was denied any provision of adequate protection, if the court was wrong and the creditor should have received additional protection, the creditor's claim will not be entitled to a superpriority administrative expense status. LNC Investments, Inc. v. First Fidelity Bank, 247 B.R. 38 (S.D.N.Y. 2000).
- 6.2.mmmmmmm Claim for breach of registration rights agreement is subordinated under section 510(b). When the creditor purchased debentures from the debtor, the debtor granted registration rights both in the purchase agreement and in a separate registrations rights agreement. The bankruptcy court subordinated the claim for failure to register the debentures on demand under section 510(b) as a claim "arising from the purchase" of the debentures, reasoning that the debtor would not have failed to register the debentures and the creditor would not have incurred any damages if the creditor did not purchase the debentures in the first place. In re Nal Financial Group, Inc., 237 B.R. 225 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1999).
- 6.2.nnnnnnn Reclamation rights defined. The rights of a seller of goods to the debtor who delivered a prepetition reclamation notice under UCC Section 2-702 is subject to the right of a lender with a security interest in inventory, who qualifies as "good faith purchaser" under section 2-702(3), even though the lender terminated funding before the reclaimed goods were shipped. In addition, the debtor's disposition of the goods, with the proceeds paid to the lender, cut off the reclaiming creditor's rights. As a result, the reclaiming creditor was entitled to neither an administrative priority claim nor a lien under section 546(c). Galey & Lord, Inc. v. Arley Corp. (In re Arlco, Inc.), 239 B.R. 261 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1999).
- 6.2.ooooooo Late filed priority claims retain priority in chapter 7. Resolving an apparent conflict between section 726(a)(1) ("claims of the kind specified in ... 507") and section 726(a)(3) ("any allowed unsecured proof of claim which is tardily filed"), the Fourth Circuit rules that late-filed priority claims retain their priority under section 726(a)(1). This decision follows the decisions of the Second, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits, and departs from the contrary decision of the Fifth Circuit. Cooper v. Internal Revenue Service, 167 F.3d 857 (4th Cir. 1999).
- 6.2.ppppppp A punitive criminal fine is not an administrative expense. The debtor in possession was convicted of criminal violations of environmental laws and fined as punishment. The punitive fine was disallowed as an administrative expense because it was not part of the cost of operating or preserving the estate. The court distinguished civil penalties or other fines that may be compensatory rather than punitive. Pennsylvania Department of Environmental Resources v. Tri-State Clinical Laboratories, Inc., 178 F.3d 685 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 6.2.qqqqqqq An insider's receipt of note payments may constitute inequitable conduct. The board of the debtor adopted resolutions agreeing not to pay loans made by the directors before loans made by an unrelated creditor, thereby subordinating the directors' claims. When the debtor got in financial trouble, the debtor paid the directors' claims first. The court subordinated the directors' claims, finding that the payment was inequitable conduct that resulted in injury to the outside creditor. Goode v. Hagerty (In re Systems Impact, Inc.), 229 B.R. 363 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1998).
- 6.2.rrrrrrr Liquidation surplus goes to the debtor, not its shareholders. Creditors were paid in full in this chapter 7 case, and the official equity committee (probably left over from a failed chapter 11 case) argued for subordination of a preferred stockholder's interest. The court holds that the surplus goes to the debtor, as required by section 726(a)(6), not to the stockholders, so the court did not reach the equitable subordination issue. Holders of Class C Common Stock v. Kauthar Sdn. Bhd. (In re Rimsat, Ltd.), 229 B.R. 910 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 1998).

6.2.ssssssss Prepetition attachment may be perfected only by judgment. The creditor obtained a prejudgment attachment more than 90 days before bankruptcy, but did not obtain the state court judgment required to perfect the attachment lien. A postpetition judgment after relief from the automatic stay would have perfected the lien. In this case, however, the parties stipulated to the allowance of the creditor's claim in the bankruptcy court. The bankruptcy court and the B.A.P. held that the allowance of the claim was the equivalent to a judgment, perfecting the attachment lien, but the Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that the process for allowance of a claim was less protective of the debtor than the process for obtaining judgment in state court. As a result, the allowance did not perfect the judgment. Diamant v. Kasparian (In re Southern California Plastics, Inc.), 165 F.3d 1243 (9th Cir. 1999).

6.2.tttttttt WARN Act liability is an administrative expense. The debtor in possession terminated employees without giving a proper WARN Act notification. Relying on cases determining the priority of severance pay obligations, rather than on a classification of the WARN Act liability as back pay, the court grants the obligation administrative expense priority. In re Beverage Enterprises, Inc., 225 B.R. 111 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1998).

6.2.uuuuuuuu Real property tax billing date does not determine priority status. Section 365(d)(3) requires the debtor to perform all obligations under a real property lease arising after the order for relief. In this case, the lease required the debtor to pay real property taxes within one month after being billed by the landlord. The landlord billed the debtor after the order for relief for prepetition real property taxes. In a case of first impression at the court of appeals level, the Seventh Circuit holds that the period to which the taxes relate determines whether the taxes are entitled to administrative expense priority under section 365(d)(3). In this case, they were not. In re Handy Andy Home Improvement Centers, Inc., 144 F.3d 1125 (7th Cir. 1998).

6.2.vvvvvvvv Section 510(a) overrules the Rule of Explicitness. The Rule of Explicitness had prohibited senior creditors from receiving postpetition interest and costs out of a distribution to subordinated creditors unless the indenture specifically made clear that the subordination applied to postpetition interest. The Eleventh Circuit rules that section 510(a), which requires enforcement of subordination agreements "according to applicable non-bankruptcy law" overrules the Rule of Explicitness, which was an equitable doctrine developed by the bankruptcy courts. The specific holding of the case is of limited interest, because a current indenture form includes an explicit provision subordinating claims to postpetition interest. More interestingly, the court states, without explicit discussion, that a principle that applies only in bankruptcy is rendered inapplicable by Congress' reference to applicable non-bankruptcy law in section 510(a). Chemical Bank v. First Trust of New York (In re Southeast Banking Corp.), 156 F.3d 1114 (11th Cir. 1998).

6.2.wwwwwww Subordination of a claim under section 510(b) requires an actual purchase or sale. The creditors had agreed to sell their stock in the debtor to the debtor's new parent, but the sale was never consummated. The creditor's claims were not subordinated under section 510(b), which requires an actual purchase or sale as a condition to subordination, following the Supreme Court's analogous construction of Section 10(b) of the '34 Act in Blue Chip Stamps v. Manner Drug Stores, 421 U.S. 723 (1975). Nugent v. American Broadcasting System, Inc. (In re Betacom of Phoenix, Inc.), 225 B.R. 703 (D. Ariz. 1998).

6.2.xxxxxxxx Securities fraud indemnification claims are subordinated. The claims of the officers and directors for reimbursement on account of securities fraud claims are not entitled to administrative priority, because the activities giving rise to the claims all occurred pre-petition. Claims of underwriters for indemnification are subordinated under section 510(b), because they arise out of the purchase or sale of a security of the debtor, and section 510(b) is not limited to the claims of stockholders. In re Mid-American Waste Systems, Inc., 228 B.R. 816 (Bankr. D. Del. 1999).

6.2.yyyyyyyy Court equitably subordinates claims purchased by insider. A director, on behalf of a major creditor whom the director represented on the board, purchased substantial claims against the debtor “(1) for the dual purpose of making a profit and being able to influence the reorganization in its own self interest (2) with the benefit of non-public information acquired as a fiduciary, and (3) without disclosure to the bankruptcy court, the board, the creditor’s committee or the selling noteholders.” Finding the conduct “a paradigm case of inequitable conduct by a fiduciary,” the court of appeals affirmed the bankruptcy court’s decision limiting the creditor’s recovery on the claims to the amount paid, but remanded for further factual findings as to whether additional equitable subordination, such as limiting the allowed amount of the claims to the amount paid, was appropriate. Committee of Creditors v. Citicorp Venture Capital, Ltd., 160 F.3d 982 (3d Cir. 1998).

6.2.zzzzzzzz Undercapitalization alone does not justify equitable subordination. In the absence of inequitable conduct, fraud, or deceit, or some other form of conduct causing harm to other creditors by a corporation’s insiders, loans made by insiders to under-capitalized corporation will not be subject to equitable subordination. The opinion contains a thoughtful discussion of the different kinds of undercapitalization. In re Lifschultz Fast Freight, 132 F.3d 339 (7th Cir. 1997).

6.2.aaaaaaaa Postpetition attorneys’ fees incurred under prepetition contract are not entitled to administrative expense priority. Before bankruptcy, the debtor sued Hayden and obtained a judgment under a contract that had an attorneys’ fees clause. After bankruptcy, the state appellate court reversed the judgment and ordered the debtor to pay Hayden’s attorneys’ fees. Because the contract was entered into pre-petition, the fees arose out of a transaction with the debtor rather than the debtor in possession. The court thus denied administrative expense priority for the fees that Hayden incurred post-petition. The court overruled a prior Ninth Circuit B.A.P. decision, In re Madden, 185 B.R. 15 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1995), which had concluded that the continued prosecution of the case by the estate subjected the estate to an independent administrative expense obligation. Abercrombie v. Hayden Corp. (In re Abercrombie), 139 F.3d 755 (9th Cir. 1998).

6.2.bbbbbbbbbb An exchange for new value during the involuntary gap need not be simultaneous. During the involuntary gap, the debtor transferred $10,000 to an existing unsecured creditor to assist in obtaining funding. Some months later, the new funding was provided, before the order for relief. The court holds that the subsequent loan satisfied the requirements of section 549(b). Yancy v. Varner (In re Pucci Shoes, Inc.), 120 F.3d 38 (4th Cir. 1997).

6.2.ccccccccc Employment tax on pre-petition wages is a pre-petition claim. The debtor paid wages before bankruptcy but filed her petition before the quarterly due date for the employment taxes on the wages paid. Holding that the employment taxes are incurred when the payment of wages was made, rather than when the tax return and the taxes were due to be paid, the Ninth Circuit holds the taxes to be pre-petition priority taxes owing by the debtor rather than administrative expenses owing by the estate. The debtor was not liable, however, for employment taxes on wages paid by the chapter 11 estate. The taxes were administrative expenses allowable against the estate. Bellus v. United States, 125 F.3d 821 (9th Cir. 1997).

6.2.ddddddddd PBGC claim for plan contributions receives limited priority. Despite Treasury regulations that impose a single plan contribution debt on an employer at year-end, the bankruptcy court may divide the claim into different priorities based on the policies of the Bankruptcy Code. Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation v. Sunarhauserman, Inc. (In re Sunarhauserman, Inc.), 126 F.3d 811 (6th Cir. 1997).

6.2. eeeeeeeee U.S. trustee fees granted priority. Following the decision of the Eighth Circuit, the Ninth Circuit rules that the unpaid quarterly chapter 11 fees of the United States trustee share pro rata with chapter 7 administrative expenses in a case that is converted from chapter 11 to chapter 7. U.S. Trustee v. Endy (In re Endy), 104 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1997).

6.2. ffffffff Mortgagee subordinated to mechanic's lien. A mortgagee's extensive involvement, in a construction project, including reviewing plans, draw requests, and change orders and its ability to object to any draw request, was conduct sufficient to result in the subordination under state mechanic's lien law of the mortgage to mechanic's lien securing the claim of the unpaid contractor. Exectech Partners v. Resolution Trust Corporation (In re Exectech Partners), 107 F.3d 677 (8th Cir. 1997).

7. CRIMES

7.1.a Proceeds of criminal activity that are untraceably commingled in a debtor's bank account are not subject to forfeiture. A law firm partner conducted a Ponzi scheme through his law firm. The Ponzi scheme proceeds were deposited into law firm bank accounts and commingled over several years with legitimate fees that the firm earned. Because of the number of deposits and withdrawals from the account, the Ponzi scheme proceeds could not be traced. Upon the partner's conviction, the law firm bank accounts were forfeited to the government under criminal forfeiture statutes, which provide for forfeiture of property that is involved in, derived from or proceeds of criminal activity. The law firm's bankruptcy trustee sought to set aside the forfeiture on the ground that the bank accounts were property of the law firm, not of the guilty partner, and were not derived from or proceeds of the Ponzi scheme and therefore were not subject to forfeiture. Property obtained as the result of a crime, and any traceable property, is forfeitable, effective as of the time of the crime. However, the government may forfeit proceeds only when it establishes "the requisite nexus between the property and the offense." Where the proceeds are commingled and cannot be traced, the government cannot show the requisite nexus and therefore cannot forfeit the bank accounts. U.S. v. Rothstein, 717 F.3d 1205 (11th Cir. 2013).

7.1.b Nondisclosure of an unenforceable option may violate 18 U.S.C. § 152. The debtor was a defendant in state court litigation. Because he needed cash, he sold a vacant lot to a friend for its full market value of $220,000, with an oral agreement that the friend would sell it back to the debtor in a year. The debtor lost the state court litigation and filed a chapter 7 case. The debtor did not disclose the oral repurchase agreement in his statement of affairs or at the 341 meeting. Shortly after the 341 meeting, the debtor caused an affiliate to purchase the lot from the friend for $235,000. Section 521 requires disclosure of all assets. Under 18 U.S.C. § 152, concealing an asset or making a false oath in a bankruptcy case is a felony. The oral repurchase agreement was unenforceable under the statute of frauds, so the asset may have been worthless. But section 521 requires disclosure of all assets, no matter what the debtor's opinion of value. Moreover, the statute of frauds is an affirmative defense; it does not render the agreement invalid. Therefore, the debtor's failure to disclose the agreement was a crime. U.S. v. Kurlermann, 708 F.3d 722 (6th Cir. 2013).

7.1.c Section 510(b) does not subordinate a claim under a tax agreement for tax benefits that accrue based on the debtor's profits. Seven years before bankruptcy, the debtor's former parent spun off the debtor through an IPO of the debtor's stock. In connection with the spin-off, the debtor and its parent entered into a tax agreement, which required the debtor to pay the parent any benefits that the debtor received from use of tax net operating loss carry-forwards that the debtor had at the spin-off. The parent filed a claim in the debtor's bankruptcy case for damages for breach of the tax agreement in an amount equal to the tax benefits the debtor had received and not paid to the parent. Section 510(b) subordinates any claim "for damages arising from the purchase or sale" of a security of the debtor. The courts construe section 510(b) broadly, but only consistent with its intent and purpose, which was to subordinate the claim of a holder who took on a shareholder's risk and return expectations or seeks to recover a contribution to the debtor's equity pool. The risk analysis is the more important consideration and requires section 510(b)'s application if the claimant expected to profit from its agreement with the debtor and participate in corporate profits. Courts look through the form of the agreement and consider all related agreements in a transaction in determining whether the claimant relied on an equity participation. However, the fact that an agreement was part of an equity-related transaction does not require subordination of any resulting claim. Here, the parent did not contract for a return based on profits or stock price performance. It contracted only for a claim based on tax benefits. Even though the tax benefits arose based only on the debtor's profits, the claim was not for a share of profits. Therefore, section 510(b) does not apply. CIT Group Inc. v. Tyco Int'l Ltd. (In re CIT Group Inc.), 460 B.R. 633 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

- 7.1.d 18 U.S.C. § 157 requires specific intent to defraud an identifiable victim. A non-attorney advertised that he could stop tenants' evictions in unlawful detainer actions their landlords had brought against them. Instead, he filed chapter 13 petitions for them. He was indicted under 18 U.S.C. § 157, which was added as a bankruptcy crime in 1994. Section 157 makes criminal a scheme or artifice intended to defraud when the person files a title 11 petition or document in a title 11 case or makes a false or fraudulent representation or claim concerning or in relation to a title 11 proceeding, before or after the filing of the petition. It is patterned on the mail fraud statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1341, and thus requires specific intent to defraud a specific identifiable victim or group of victims. Unlike 18 U.S.C. § 152, which applies to fraudulent activities in the bankruptcy case itself, section 157 applies to activities in a bankruptcy case to further a nonbankruptcy scheme to defraud. Here, the government charged an intent to defraud the landlords but proved only an intent to defraud the tenants out of the fees that he charged them. The proof was therefore inadequate to convict. United States v. Milwitt, 475 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2007).
- 7.1.e Debtor's attorney convicted for mail fraud. The attorney for the debtor-in-possession negotiated a sale of property of the estate without disclosing that the debtor's principal would receive a lucrative employment contract from the buyer, even though the employment agreement was not really binding on the buyer. The letters between the lawyer and the buyer were sufficient to convict the lawyer of mail fraud. United States v. Rosen, 130 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 1997).

8. DISCHARGE

8.1 General

- 8.1.a Chapter 11 discharges a reorganized debtor who continues in business for only a limited time. The debtor confirmed a plan that provided for continuation of its business for a limited period, ending in a wind-down and liquidation of its then-remaining assets. Section 1141(d) denies a discharge to a corporate debtor that does not engage in business after plan consummation if the plan provides for liquidation of all or substantially all property of the estate. Even a temporary continuation of business after consummation suffices to permit a discharge. Because the plan here provides for continuation of the business, albeit for a limited time, discharge is proper. NexPoint Advisors, L.P. v. Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P.), ___ F.4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 23237 (5th Cir. Aug. 19, 2022).
- 8.1.b Taggart v. Lorenzen applies to chapter 11 confirmation order. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan, which provided for reinstating a home mortgage. The reorganized debtor paid according to the plan's terms, but the lender, based on faulty records, continued to send notices claiming the loan was in default and later began foreclosure. The debtor moved in the bankruptcy court for civil contempt penalties against the lender for violating the plan confirmation order. Taggart v. Lorenzen, 139 S. Ct. 1739 (2019), held that violations of the stay included in a discharge order must be evaluated under the general process for evaluating a civil contempt citation. Because a chapter 11 confirmation order serves the same purpose as a chapter 7 discharge order, the same standard should apply—whether there is a fair ground of doubt about whether the conduct violates the order. The standard is an objective one; advice of counsel is not a defense. Beckhart v. Newrez LLC, 31 F.4th 274 (4th Cir. 2022)

- 8.1.c Section 523(a) exceptions to discharge apply to a nonconsensual subchapter V plan. The creditor obtained a prepetition judgment for willful and malicious injury against the corporate subchapter V debtor, which the creditor sought to except from discharge. Section 1192(2) excepts from discharge under a nonconsensual subchapter V plan any debt “of the kind specified in section 523(a).” Section 523(a) excepts certain debts of an individual debtor, including a debt for willful and malicious injury, from a discharge granted under section 1192. Section 1192(2) refers to kinds of debts, without regard to the kind of debtor, and not to kinds of debtors, and so should be construed to apply equally to corporate and individual debtors. In addition, the structure of chapter 11’s general discharge provision, which distinguishes between individual and corporate debtors, contrasts with section 1192(2), which does not distinguish. Identical language in chapter 12 has been construed to apply to corporate debtors. Finally, Congress reasonably traded off dischargeability for the elimination of the absolute priority rule in a nonconsensual subchapter V plan. Therefore, the debt is not dischargeable. Cantwell-Cleary Co. v. Cleary Packaging LLC (In re Cleary Packaging LLC), 36 F.4th 509 (4th Cir. 2022).
- 8.1.d Court may award debtor attorneys’ fees for appeal from order granting sanctions for discharge injunction violation. The creditor violated the discharge injunction. The debtor sought contempt sanctions, which the court awarded, along with attorneys’ fees. The creditor appealed. The district court affirmed but remanded for clarification of one aspect of the ruling. The bankruptcy court clarified, and the debtor sought an additional award of attorneys’ fees for the appeal, which the bankruptcy court and the district court both denied. Section 524 operates as an injunction. For violation of an injunction, a court who issued the injunction may award sanctions, including attorneys’ fees incurred in enforcing the injunction and including fees incurred on an appeal. The debtor need not seek appellate fees from the appellate court, because the fees are incurred only because of the initial stay violation and are awardable even if the contemnor’s appeal is not frivolous. Law Offices of Francis J. O’Reilly, Esq. v. Selene Fin., L.P. (In re DiBattista), 33 F.4th 698 (2d Cir. 2022).
- 8.1.e 1992 Coal Act obligations are claims that are discharged. The Coal Industry Retiree Health Benefit Act of 1992 imposed retiree health benefit obligations on coal companies and their affiliates. Companies who had signed wage agreements with the United Mine Workers of America before then were required to continue to provide health benefits to employees by paying premiums to the Combined Benefit Fund in an annual amount determined by the Commissioner of Social Security to provide benefits directly through individual employer plans. Those companies that did not provide benefits directly were required to pay premiums to the 1992 UMWA Benefit Plan. The Act gave the plan trustees the right to enforce these obligations. A group of related companies, including a coal company, confirmed a chapter 11 plan in 1995, discharging all claims that arose before the plan effective date and not provided for in the plan. In 2015, the reorganized coal company again filed a chapter 11 case, and the bankruptcy court terminated obligations to provide retiree benefits under the Coal Act. The plan trustees sought to require related companies, who were debtors in the 1995 chapter 11 cases, to provide health benefits to the coal company’s employees and retirees or to pay premiums to the 1992 Plan. A claim includes a right to payment, even if contingent, unliquidated, unmatured, or unenforceable, and a right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance where such breach gives rise to a right to payment, even if contingent, unliquidated, unmatured, or unenforceable. A claim arises when a debtor's liability is based on past conduct and there is an established relationship between an identifiable claimant and the past conduct. The debtors' liability for Combined Plan premiums arose before the 1995 effective date from the debtors' past conduct of conducting coal mining operations, even though the future premiums were not yet due (unmatured) and their amounts were not yet determined (unliquidated). Therefore, they were discharged. So too the obligations to provide health benefits or pay premiums to the 1992 Plan. The plan trustees held a right in 1995 to an equitable remedy for breach of the companies' obligations to provide health benefits, and breach of that obligation gave rise to a right to payment, even though the right was unmaturing, presently unenforceable, and unliquidated. It too was discharged. U.S. Pipe and Foundry Co., LLC v. Holland (In re U.S. Pipe & Foundry Co.), 32 F. 4th 1324 (11th Cir. 2022).

- 8.2 Taggart v. Lorenzen applies to violations of chapter 11 plan confirmation orders. The debtors confirmed a chapter 11 plan that provided for reinstatement of payments on a home mortgage, although the amount of payments required was unclear. The new mortgage servicer determined that the debtors had not made payments during the chapter 11 case and began foreclosure proceedings. The debtors sought a contempt citation for violating the plan's terms. Taggart v. Lorenzen, 139 S. Ct. 1795 (2019), held that a civil contempt citation for violating a chapter 7 discharge order required the same findings as any contempt citation for violating an injunction. A "bankruptcy court's authority to enforce its own orders ... derives from the same statutes and the same general principles the Supreme Court relied on in Taggart." Therefore, the Taggart standard applies equally to any contempt proceeding for violating a chapter 11 plan's terms. Beckhart v. Newrez, LLC, ___ F.4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 10287 (4th Cir. Apr. 15, 2022).
- 8.2.a Section 523(a) exceptions to discharge do not apply to a nonconsensual subchapter V plan. The creditor obtained a prepetition judgment against the corporate subchapter V debtor, which the creditor sought to except from discharge. Section 523(a) excepts certain debts from the discharge of an individual debtor under section 1192. Section 1192(2) excepts from discharge under a nonconsensual subchapter V plan any debt "of the kind specified in section 523(a)." The reference to section 1192 in section 523(a) means that the limitation of the exceptions to discharge in section 523(a) applies to individual debtors and that the exceptions do not apply to a corporate debtor. Cantell-Cleary Co. v. Cleary Packaging LLC (In re Cleary Packaging LLC), 630 B.R. 466 (Bankr. D. Md. 2021).
- 8.2.b Signing of guaranty creates dischargeable contingent debt. The debtor personally guaranteed his company's debts to a supplier. He did not list the supplier as a creditor in his schedules. After his no-asset bankruptcy and discharge, his company continued to purchase from the guaranteed supplier but later failed to pay the supplier for those purchases. A discharge applies to all debts that arose prepetition. Under controlling circuit precedent, when a debt arises is based on the conduct test, not the state-law focused accrual test. Conduct is measured by the existence of a prepetition relationship. Here, the signing of the guaranty, rather than the making of the guaranteed loan, established the relationship and was the conduct under which the contingent claim arose, so the claim was potentially dischargeable. However, under section 523(a)(3)(A), the claim of a creditor who did not receive timely notice of the bankruptcy is not discharged, except in a no-asset case. Therefore, the lack of notice to the supplier does not except the debt from discharge. Reinhart FoodService L.L.C. v. Schlundt (In re Schlundt), ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 2577 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. Aug. 19, 2021).
- 8.2.c Discharge does not release a fraudulent transfer claim against the debtor's transferee. The debtor fraudulently transferred assets to his wife. The debtor's lessor avoided the fraudulent transfer and obtained a judgment against both the debtor and the wife. The lessor's claim was partially paid under the debtor's chapter 11 plan, and the debtor received a discharge. The wife later filed her own bankruptcy. The landlord filed a claim in her case. Section 502(b)(1) allows a claim except to the extent unenforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. A discharge does not extinguish a liability but only provides a defense and an injunction against collection. In addition, a discharge does not release any other entity. Therefore, the fraudulent transfer claim, which was based on the landlord's claim against the husband, was neither satisfied nor extinguished by the husband's discharge, and the landlord's claim against the wife is preserved. Lariat Cos., Inc. v. Wigley (In re Wigley), 951 F.3d 967 (8th Cir. 2020).

- 8.2.d Bankruptcy court should determine whether discharge bars postdischarge litigation. After the debtor's bankruptcy, a dispute between a creditor and the individual debtor's LLC, which the debtor's trustee had abandoned, proceeded in state court. The creditor obtained a judgment against the LLC and then sought to prosecute an alter ego claim against the debtor. The creditor filed an adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy court for a determination that pursuing the action would not violate the discharge injunction. Courts advise creditors to seek the court's guidance when an action might be construed to violate the automatic stay or the discharge injunction. More generally, courts provide guidance on whether the conduct of a party subject to an injunction would violate the injunction. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court should rule on whether the action would violate the discharge injunction. Sterling-Pacific Lending, Inc. v. Moser (In re Moser), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 1037 (9th Cir. B.A.P. Apr. 15, 2020).
- 8.2.e Court may not sanction a party for violating the discharge injunction if the party had an objectively reasonable belief that the conduct was permitted. Before bankruptcy, creditors sued the debtor and his transferee to recover an LLC interest that the LLC operating agreement required be offered first to the creditors. During the litigation, the debtor filed bankruptcy and received a discharge. The litigation continued against the debtor's attorney, but the debtor participated to a degree in opposing the relief the creditors sought. After the creditors prevailed, they sought attorneys' fees from the transferee and from the debtor. While the discharge injunction prohibits collection on a discharged debt, a creditor may pursue a debtor for post-discharge attorneys' fees if the debtor returns to the fray after discharge. The creditors relied on this exception. While the attorneys' fees petition was pending, the debtor moved in the bankruptcy court to hold the creditors in contempt for violating the discharge injunction. Later, the state court determined that the debtor had returned to the fray and granted the petition against the debtor, but the state appeals court reversed. The bankruptcy court also found the debtor had returned to the fray, but on appeal, the district court reversed, finding the creditors in contempt for violating the discharge injunction. Section 524(a)(2) provides the discharge operates as an injunction, and section 105(a) gives the bankruptcy court power to issue any order or judgment necessary to carry out other Bankruptcy Code provisions. Because these specific provisions are transplanted from the general rules that govern how courts enforce injunctions, they bring with them those rules. Courts enforce injunctions through the power to cite for civil contempt, which a court should not impose "where there is a fair ground of doubt as to the wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct." The standard is an objective one, not dependent on the defendant's subjective belief that its conduct was permitted, although a good faith belief might help to determine an appropriate sanction. These standards apply equally to civil contempt for violation of the discharge injunction. The court remands the case for the court below to determine whether the conduct here met the standard. Taggart v. Lorenzen, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 1795 (2019).
- 8.2.f Covenant not to compete is enforceable against debtor after discharge. The debtor agreed not to compete with his employer for five years. Within a year after the agreement, the employer fired the debtor. The debtor filed a chapter 7 case and received his discharge. He then got a job that competed with his former employer, who sued to enforce the covenant. A claim is a right to payment or an equitable remedy for breach of performance if the breach gives rise to a right to payment. A debt is a liability on a claim. The chapter 7 discharge releases only debts that arise before the petition date. A covenant not to compete is enforceable by an injunction. The employee may not pay money to escape the injunction or the covenant. Therefore, the covenant is not a debt and is not discharged. An executory contract is one in which performance remains to some degree on both sides. The employer had no remaining performance obligations. Therefore, the covenant is not a rejectable executory contract. Even if it were, the trustee's rejection relieves only the trustee, not the debtor, from future performance. Therefore, the court finds the covenant enforceable. Cybertron Int'l, Inc. v. Capps (In re Capps), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 2221 (Bankr. D. Kan. July 26, 2018).

- 8.2.g Intentional act is a willful violation of the discharge injunction, despite a good faith belief to the contrary. After the debtor received a discharge, the IRS claimed that the debtor's tax obligations had not been discharged and began collection activity. The debtor brought an adversary proceeding to determine dischargeability. The U.S. Attorney defending the action failed to produce evidence to support the IRS's position, resulting in summary judgment for the debtor. The debtor then sued the IRS under IRC section 7433 for having violated the discharge injunction. Section 7433 grants a debtor a right to damages if any officer or employee of the IRS "willfully violates any provisions of section 362 ... or section 524." The court construes the phrase "willfully violates" according to its ordinary meaning, the context of the phrase in the statute, its accepted meaning in 1998 when Congress enacted section 7433, and the policy of protecting a debtor's fresh start, which appeared to have animated Congress's enactment of the section. A violation is "willful" when the act alleged to violate the injunction is intentional and done with knowledge of the injunction, even if the actor had a good faith belief that the act did not violate the injunction. Here, the IRS knew of the stay and intentionally took collection action. Even though the IRS believed in good faith that the tax debts had not been discharged, its action was intentional and therefore "willful." The debtor may recover damages for the violation of the injunction. IRS v. Murphy, 892 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2018).
- 8.2.h Good faith belief that the discharge injunction does not apply prevents contempt finding. Before bankruptcy, creditors sued the debtor and his transferee to recover an LLC interest that the LLC operating agreement required be offered first to the creditors. During the litigation, the debtor filed bankruptcy and received a discharge. The litigation continued against the attorney, but the debtor participated to a degree in opposing the relief the creditors sought. After the creditors prevailed, they sought attorneys' fees from the transferee and from the debtor. While the discharge injunction prohibits collection on a discharged debt, a creditor may pursue a debtor for post-discharge attorneys' fees if the debtor returns to the fray after discharge. The creditors relied on this exception. While the attorneys' fees petition was pending, the debtor moved in the bankruptcy court to hold the creditors in contempt for violating the discharge injunction. Later, the state court determined that the debtor had returned to the fray and granted the petition against the debtor, but the state appeals court reversed. The bankruptcy court also found the debtor had returned to the fray, but on appeal, the district court reversed, finding the creditors in contempt for violating the discharge injunction. A court may hold a creditor in contempt for violating the discharge injunction if the creditor knew the injunction applied and intended the actions that violated the injunction. Here, because the creditor had a good faith belief—even though ultimately wrong—that the debtor had returned to the fray and the injunction did not apply, the creditor did not know the injunction applied, so first test is not satisfied. Lorenzen v. Taggart (In re Taggart), 888 F.3d 438 (9th Cir. 2018).
- 8.2.i Bankruptcy court may deny arbitration of an action to enforce the discharge injunction. A bank that had charged off the debtor's credit card debt and reported the charge off to the credit reporting agencies did not report the discharge to the agencies. The debtor alleged the failure to report the discharge operated as an act to collect the discharged debt, because debtors would be more inclined to pay the charged-off debts to clear their credit reports. The debtor brought a class action against the bank for damages for violation of the discharge injunction. The credit card agreement required arbitration of disputes arising from the agreement. The Federal Arbitration Act establishes a federal arbitration policy in favor of arbitration, but in a core proceeding in bankruptcy, the bankruptcy court has discretion not to order arbitration where arbitration would present an inherent conflict with the Bankruptcy Code. The discharge injunction embodies the fundamental fresh start policy of the Code. Requiring arbitration to enforce the discharge could seriously jeopardize the effectiveness of the discharge. The bankruptcy courts have the power to enforce their own orders, including the discharge order. Therefore, arbitration of disputes involving violation of the discharge injunction presents an inherent conflict with a central policy of the Code, and a bankruptcy court may properly exercise discretion to deny arbitration. Anderson v. Credit One Bank, N.A. (In re Anderson), 884 F.3d 382 (2d Cir. 2018).

- 8.2.j Confirmation order discharges attorneys' fees under prepetition contract incurred in postconfirmation litigation. The debtor contracted with a contractor to build on the debtor's land. The contract included a prevailing party attorneys' fees provision. The debtor failed to pay the contractor, who filed a mechanics lien and sued to foreclose. The debtor filed a chapter 11 petition. During the case, the debtor and the contractor settled. They agreed that the litigation would continue till final judgment, and the judgment would determine the contractor's treatment under the plan. The settlement agreement reserved the issue of whether the contractor was entitled to attorneys' fees and included mutual releases of all claims that existed as of the settlement agreement date. After confirmation, the contractor prevailed in the mechanics lien litigation and sought an award of attorneys' fees. A confirmation order discharges a debtor from all claims that arose before the confirmation order. A claim arises when the claimant can "fairly or reasonably contemplate the claim's existence even if a cause of action has not yet accrued under nonbankruptcy law." Here, the contractor could and did contemplate the attorneys fees claim, which therefore the confirmation order discharged. In re Ybarra, 424 F.3d 1018, 1026-27 (9th Cir. 2005), held the discharge did not apply to post-bankruptcy attorneys' fees claims where the prepetition litigation was settled in the bankruptcy case and the debtor "returned to the fray" after bankruptcy. This was not such a case, as this litigation was continuous litigation that began before bankruptcy, was sanctioned during the bankruptcy and concluded after. Picerne Constr. Corp. v. Castellino Villas, A.K.F. LLC (In re Castellino Villas, A.K.F. LLC), 836 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 2016).
- 8.2.k Discharge applies equally to prepetition contingent claims that become fixed post-effective date when the reorganized debtor sues. Mortgage originators sold the debtor mortgages under prepetition contracts that provided for the originators to recover attorneys' fees from the debtor if the debtor breached covenants not to sue, notice and cure provisions or forum selection clauses. The court issued a bar date that applied to all "claims," as defined in section 101(5). The creditors did not file proofs of claim to assert any claim for attorneys' fees. The plan discharged all claims arising before the effective date and enjoined their prosecution but preserved all claims the debtors had against the originators. The disclosure statement and a plan supplement made clear the post-reorganization liquidating trust's intent to sue the originators. After the effective date, the trust sued the originators for breaching the mortgage sale contracts. The originators counterclaimed for attorneys fees. Generally, a claim arises upon contract execution. The attorneys' fee claims here arose upon execution of the mortgage sale contracts and were contingent claims as of the petition date. They were subject to the discharge. In re Ybarra, 424 F.3d 1018, 1026-27 (9th Cir. 2005), held that such contingent claims were revived if the post-reorganization debt "returned to the fray" by bringing a claim against the creditor after the plan effective date. The statute does not incorporate that exception, so the court declines to adopt it here. However, the creditors still may assert their fee claims as defenses or setoffs to the trust's claims. Rescap Liquidating Trust v. PHH Mortgage Corp. (In re Residential Capital, LLC), 558 B.R. 77 (S.D.N.Y. 2016).
- 8.2.l Chapter 9 plan does not discharge employees. Before the city's bankruptcy, a police officer harmed a resident, who sued the city and the officer under 28 U.S.C. § 1983 for use of excessive force and other constitutional claims. The city's bankruptcy stayed the action. State law requires a municipality to indemnify an employee for any claim arising out of an employee's act or omission occurring within the scope of employment. After the city's plan's confirmation, the city notified the officer that it was assuming the officer's defense and would indemnify the officer for any damages. The action proceeded to judgment against only the officer. The plan and the confirmation order discharged claims that arose before confirmation but did not contain a third-party discharge of the officer and did not refer to indemnification claims. The city's indemnification of the officer did not transform the resident's claim into a claim against the city. Therefore, the plan confirmation order did not discharge the resident's claim against the officer or limit it to the distribution it would have received as an allowed claim in the case. The city undertook the indemnification obligation after confirmation. As a result, it was a postbankruptcy claim that was not discharged. Deocampo v. Potts, 836 F.3d 1134 (9th Cir. 2016).

- 8.2.m Discharge does not affect liquidating trust's liability for post-effective date action against prepetition contract counterparty. The debtor purchased mortgages under a correspondent client agreement that granted attorneys' fees to the prevailing party in any legal action between the debtor and the seller. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan that rejected the agreement, preserved the successor liquidating trust's right to pursue claims against mortgage sellers and provided a discharge of all claims arising before the plan's effective date. The confirmation order enjoined creditors from pursuing discharged claims. Neither the debtor nor the estate had brought claims against the mortgage seller before the effective date, and the seller had not filed a proof of claim in the case. After the effective date, the liquidating trust sued the seller for breach of contract and indemnification under the client agreement. The seller counterclaimed for attorneys' fees under the contract, and the trust moved to enjoin the action as violating the discharge. The discharge covers a claim, whether or not contingent, that arose before the effective date. A claim does not arise before the effective date merely because the agreement under which it arises is a prepetition contract. A claim resulting from action that the reorganized debtor (or its successor) takes after the effective date does not arise prepetition, because a reorganization is not intended to shield the reorganized debtor from its post-reorganization activities, nor is a contract counterparty required to "guess" whether a reorganized debtor might breach a contract after reorganization and then file a contingent claim against the possibility. If the reorganized debtor returns to the fray after the effective date, then the debtor's obligations under the contract are post-discharge claims that survive the reorganization and discharge. Administrative expense priority case law applies only to obligations incurred by the estate in the administration of the case and is not relevant to the analysis here. Therefore, the court denies the motion to enjoin the counterclaims. In re Residential Cap., LLC, 541 B.R. 202 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 8.2.n Section 108(c)'s statute of limitations tolling ends upon general discharge, even for claims that are not discharged. The plaintiff's husband died from an asbestos-related disease during the debtor's chapter 11 case. The debtor's plan created an asbestos trust, vested the trust with authority to bring claims on behalf of all asbestos personal injury claimants against the reorganized debtors who were insured under a particular insurance policy, and discharged the debtor from all other claims. The trust brought a claim against one of the reorganized debtors over three years after the plan's effective date but while the case was still open. The state statute of limitations for a tort claim is three years. Upon filing a bankruptcy petition, the automatic stay prohibits the commencement or continuation of an action or proceeding asserting a prepetition claim against the debtor. The stay continues until the case is closed or dismissed or until a discharge is granted. Section 1141(d) grants a corporate chapter 11 debtor a discharge effective upon confirmation. Section 108(c) tolls a statute of limitations to bring claims against the debtor until "30 days after notice of the termination or expiration of the stay under section 362 ... with respect to such claim." Section 108(c) operates as of the general discharge date, not on a claim-by-claim basis. Therefore, the statute of limitations tolling for the plaintiff's claim ended on plan confirmation and the discharge, even though plaintiff's claim was not discharged. Barraford v. T&N Ltd., 17 F. Supp. 3d 96 (D. Mass. 2014).
- 8.2.o Only the bankruptcy court that grants the discharge may enforce it. The debtor emerged from a chapter 11 case in Delaware and received its discharge. Years later, some claimants brought a class action against the debtor in Florida state court based on pre-confirmation conduct. The reorganized debtor promptly brought an action in the Florida bankruptcy court for a declaration that the claims had been discharged and to enjoin the claimants from continuing the state court action. A bankruptcy court has in rem jurisdiction to issue the discharge and the discharge injunction. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1334(e), only the court in which the bankruptcy case is pending has the in rem jurisdiction. A creditor who attempts to collect a discharged debt violates the court's discharge order. A bankruptcy court may enforce its own order. The court may enforce a discharge against anyone, whether or not within the territorial jurisdiction of the issuing court, because the order is based on the court's in rem jurisdiction and therefore extends to the whole world, as long as the bankruptcy notice complies with Constitutional due process requirements. Moreover, the issuing court may enforce its order only by a contempt citation, not by issuing a another injunction to order compliance with an existing injunction. However, only the issuing court may enforce the order. Other courts are without jurisdiction to do so. A reorganized debtor may assert the discharge as an affirmative defense in the state court action, may remove the case to the local bankruptcy court and seek transfer to the home bankruptcy court or may reopen the bankruptcy case to obtain relief to enforce the injunction. But the Florida bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to grant any of the relief that the reorganized debtor sought there. In the interest of justice, the court transfers the debtor's action to the Delaware bankruptcy court. Alderwoods Group, Inc. v. Garcia, 682 F.3d 958 (11th Cir. 2012).

- 8.2.p Corporation may not reaffirm a debt without complying with section 524's procedures. The debtor had guaranteed its non-debtor affiliates' debts. After it confirmed its chapter 11 plan, it entered into a new contract with the guaranteed creditor to pay any new claims the creditor might have against the debtor in exchange for the creditor's agreement not to assert any claims for nine years and a new contract to pay the creditor any damages the creditor incurs, and it reaffirmed its guarantee of its affiliates' debts in exchange for the creditor's agreement not to assert claims for nine years. Section 524 makes unenforceable a debt if the consideration for the debt is based in whole or in part on a discharged debt unless the debtor and the creditor comply with procedures set forth in that section, to protect debtors from making unwise contracts to pay discharged debts. Although the contracts here involved new consideration—the agreement not to sue for nine years—part of the consideration was the discharged debt. Section 524 applies equally to a corporate debtor. Therefore, the agreements are not enforceable. Sandburg Fin. Corp. v. American Rice, Inc. (In re American Rice, Inc.), 2011 U.S. App. LEXIS 19590 (5th Cir. Sept. 22, 2011).
- 8.2.q Section 525(b) does not prohibit a private employer from refusing to hire based on bankruptcy. The debtor applied for a job, but the prospective employer rejected him, citing his prior bankruptcy as the reason. Section 525(b) does not permit a private employer to “terminate the employment of, or discriminate with respect to employment against” a debtor solely because of the debtor's bankruptcy. By contrast, section 525(a) does not permit a governmental unit to “deny employment to, terminate the employment of, or discriminate with respect to employment against” a debtor solely because of the debtor's bankruptcy. The difference in the two provisions is dispositive. The court may not probe Congress's intentions or purpose where its language is clear, as it is here. Accordingly, section 525(b) does not prohibit a private employer from discriminating in hiring based on a prior bankruptcy. Meyers v. Toojay's Mgmt. Corp., 640 F.3d 1278 (11th Cir. 2011); accord, Burnett v. Stewart Title, Inc. (In re Burnett), 635 F.3d 169 (5th Cir. 2011).
- 8.2.r Post-discharge prosecution for prebankruptcy fraud and collection under a restitution order does not violate the discharge injunction. Before bankruptcy, the debtor defrauded the creditor in a several financial transactions. The creditor did not seek to except the debt from discharge under section 523(a)(2), and the debt was discharged. After bankruptcy, the creditor contacted the prosecutor, who agreed to prosecute the debtor for securities fraud and to seek a restitution order under which the debtor would be obligated to pay the creditor. The prosecutor did so and obtained a conviction and the restitution order payable to the creditor. Section 523(a)(7) excepts from discharge a debt owing to or for the benefit of a governmental unit for a fine, penalty or forfeiture and not in compensation for actual pecuniary loss. The exception covers a restitution order. A restitution order by its nature is payable to or for the benefit of a governmental unit and not in compensation, because its purpose is rehabilitative and deterrent, which benefits the government, and is therefore not compensatory. Section 524(a) enjoins any act to collect a discharged debt. Contacting the prosecutor where the purpose is to coerce payment of a debt and where the criminal claim is frivolous or unsubstantiated violates the discharge injunction. Here, however, the prosecutor obtained a conviction, so the claim was clearly neither frivolous nor unsubstantiated. Therefore, the contact did not violate the discharge injunction. Williams v. Meyer (In re Williams), 439 B.R. 679 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2010).

- 8.2.s Section 525(b) does not prohibit a private employer from refusing to hire based on bankruptcy. The debtor applied for a job, but the prospective employer rejected him, citing his prior bankruptcy as the reason. Section 525(b) does not permit a private employer to “terminate the employment of, or discriminate with respect to employment against” a debtor solely because of the debtor’s bankruptcy. By contrast, section 525(a) does not permit a governmental unit to “deny employment to, terminate the employment of, or discriminate with respect to employment against” a debtor solely because of the debtor’s bankruptcy. Although “discriminate with respect to employment against” could be read broadly to prohibit denial of employment based on bankruptcy, the omission of the specific prohibition against denying employment, which is found in section 525(a), means that Congress did not intend that prohibition to apply to private employers. Therefore, the prospective employer’s refusal to hire based on bankruptcy did not violate the anti-discrimination provision of section 525(b). Rea v. Federated Investors, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 25501 (3d Cir. Dec. 15, 2010).
- 8.2.t Plan obligations fully substitute for prepetition debt. The debtor owed a supplier on prepetition invoices under a contract. The debtor in possession and the supplier negotiated an assumption of the contract without payment of unpaid prepetition amounts, which were included among unsecured obligations to be paid under the plan. The order approving the assumption agreement enjoined the supplier from drawing any letter of credit to satisfy the prepetition invoices, and the plan discharged all prepetition obligations. The debtor’s principal posted a letter of credit to the supplier to back the reorganized debtor’s obligations to the supplier. When the reorganized debtor defaulted under the plan debt, though not on postpetition invoices, the supplier drew on the postpetition letter of credit. The principal sued the supplier for return of the drawn amount on the ground that the draw violated the assumption order. A plan is a contract that supersedes all prepetition obligation and replaces them with obligations under the plan. Accordingly, the letter of credit draw did not violate the order approving the contract assumption, because the draw satisfied only plan obligations, not the prepetition invoices. Elec. Reliability Council of Tex. v. May (In re Tex. Comm’l Energy), 607 F.3d 153 (5th Cir. 2010).
- 8.2.u Plan provision disallowing postpetition interest prevents accrual of postpetition interest against debtor’s insurer. The creditor sued the debtor before bankruptcy for a work-related injury, for which the debtor carried liability insurance. The debtor’s plan provided that each insured claim should be tried and liquidated in the appropriate nonbankruptcy court, with the debtor as only a nominal defendant, and any judgment to be paid solely from insurance proceeds. In the postconfirmation litigation that the plan authorized, the creditor secured a judgment against the debtor. The plan disallowed postpetition interest. The state where the injury occurred is not a direct action state, so the creditor did not have a direct claim against the insurer. Rather, the insurer is liable only to the extent the debtor is liable. Allowance of postpetition interest is a question of bankruptcy law, which preempts state law on this issue. Therefore, the creditor is not entitled to postpetition interest from the insurer. The limitation does not effect a third-party release, because the insurer is liable only to the extent that the debtor is liable. Hathaway v. Raytheon Eng’rs & Constr’s, Inc. (In re Wash. Group Int’l, Inc.), 432 B.R. 282 (D. Nev. 2010).

- 8.2.v State may not debar contractor for nonpayment of prepetition workers' compensation premiums. The debtor's business relied exclusively on state contracts. It failed to pay its workers' compensation premiums, and its insurance was canceled. The state issued a stop work order and a three-year debarment of the debtor, as required by state statute. After the debtor's chapter 11 petition, the debtor in possession obtained workers' compensation insurance, and the state revoked the stop work order, but not the debarment. The debtor in possession sought an injunction against enforcement of the debarment order. Section 525(a) prohibits a governmental unit from discriminating against a debtor in employment, licensing or similar grant on account of bankruptcy or nonpayment of a prepetition debt. Even before the enactment of section 525(a), the Supreme Court found such discrimination to violate the Supremacy Clause, in Perez v. Campbell, 402 U.S. 637 (1971). In F.C.C. v. NextWave Personal Communications Inc., 537 U.S. 293 (2003), the Supreme Court rejected an argument that a regulatory motive could justify a governmental unit's discrimination on account of bankruptcy or nonpayment. Therefore, the state may not enforce the debarment order based on the debtor's prepetition nonpayment of its insurance premiums and its loss of workers' compensation insurance. Enviro. Source Corp. v. Mass. Div. of Occ. Safety (In re Enviro. Source Corp.), 431 B.R. 315 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2010).
- 8.2.w Section 525(b) does not prohibit an employer from refusing to hire because of a bankruptcy. After receiving a discharge, the debtor applied for employment with a private employer. The prospective employer refused to hire because of the debtor's prior bankruptcy. Section 525(b) provides that a private employer may not "terminate the employment of, or discriminate with respect to employment against" a current or former debtor on account of the bankruptcy. By contrast, section 525(a) provides that a governmental unit may not "deny employment to, terminate the employment of, or discriminate with respect to employment against" a current or former debtor on account of the bankruptcy. Although refusal to hire might constitute discrimination with respect to employment, the contrast between section 525(b) and section 525(a) shows that Congress did not intend section 525(b) to prohibit a private employer from denying employment to a former debtor on account of the bankruptcy. Rea v. Federated Investors, 431 B.R. 18 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2010).
- 8.2.x Discharge injunction applies only to creditors. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan, which provided a complete discharge and enjoined all creditors from any act to collect or recover any discharged debt. The plan required the debtor to file a statement with the court shortly after the effective date to provide creditors assurance that the debtor had fully disclosed all assets. The plan gave creditors 10 years to pursue a claim arising from a misrepresentation in the statement. The debtor filed the statement. Shortly before the 10 years' expiration, a third party who was not a creditor but who had dealt with the debtor after confirmation wrote to creditors to advise them that the 10 year-period was about to expire and inviting them to contact the third party. Several did, but none contacted the debtor or initiated any proceedings against the debtor. The debtor reopened the bankruptcy case and sought sanctions against the third party for violating the discharge injunction. The discharge injunction, both in section 524 and in the confirmation order in this case, applies only to creditors and is intended to prohibit only collection actions against the debtor. Because the third party was not a creditor and none of the creditors' actions involved any contact with the debtor, the third party did not violate the injunction in such a manner as to warrant sanction, although the court could enjoin the third party from any further action. Solow v. Kalikow (In re Kalikow), 602 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2010).
- 8.2.y State may declare restitution or reimbursement to be punitive and therefore nondischargeable. The state bar disbarred the debtor. The state bar law requires a disbarred lawyer to pay the costs of the disbarment proceedings. Section 523(a)(7) excepts from discharge a penalty "payable to and for the benefit of a governmental unit and [] not in compensation for actual pecuniary loss". The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals had previously held that such costs assessed against a debtor were dischargeable. The state legislature amended the statute to add that the costs “are penalties ... to promote rehabilitation and to protect the public” specifically to make clear the costs are punitive and nondischargeable in bankruptcy. A state’s penal and rehabilitative interests are sufficient to place even a restitution award within section 523(a)(7)’s scope. Therefore, the costs are nondischargeable. State Bar v. Findley (In re Findley), 593 F.3d 1048 (9th Cir. 2010).

8.2.z A creditor’s continuing trespass claim is discharged where state law authorizes asserting the claim at any time. The debtor installed fiber optic cable on the creditor’s land. The creditor sued for trespass. When the debtor later filed bankruptcy, the creditor did not file a proof of claim. After plan confirmation and discharge, the creditor sought to continue the prepetition action. The debtor sought an injunction. State law recognizes a continuing trespass and permits a plaintiff to sue at any time for past, present and future damages. Because the creditor could have asserted a claim in the bankruptcy case for the future damages arising from the continuing trespass, plan confirmation discharged the claim, and the discharge injunction applied to the creditor’s action. Browning v. MCI, Inc. (In re WorldCom, Inc.), 546 F.3d 211 (2d Cir. 2008).

8.2.aa Chapter 11 discharge is not effective against creditor who did not receive notice. The debtor’s customer disputed its debt to the debtor before bankruptcy and, in the correspondence about the dispute, asserted that it had claims against the debtor in excess of the amount the debtor claimed against the customer. The debtor did not list the customer as a creditor in its chapter 11 case, but the customer’s president was aware of the chapter 11 case. After plan confirmation, the debtor terminated the customer’s service, and the customer sued the debtor to enjoin the termination and for damages for the defective prepetition products and services. A known creditor is entitled to formal notice of the case as provided in the Bankruptcy Rules. A creditor is “unknown” if its claim is “merely conceivable, conjectural or speculative” and is “known” if the existence (though not necessarily the amount) of its claim can be discovered through “reasonably diligent efforts”. Here, a reasonably diligent inquiry would have revealed the correspondence with the customer in which it asserted its claim, so it was a “known creditor” entitled to formal notice. The customer’s president’s actual knowledge of the case did not suffice as the required notice. Due process requires “notice reasonably calculated under all the circumstances, to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action.” Due process is informed by statutory or rule notice requirements, because those requirements provide a creditor notice of what it may expect and may rely upon. Finally, section 523(a)(3), which discharges an individual debtor from claims held by creditors who had actual knowledge of the case, does not apply to corporations, so creditors of a corporation may rely on an expectation of formal notice, rather than being bound by actual knowledge. Because the customer did not receive the required notice here, its claim is not discharged, and the discharge injunction does not apply. Arch Wireless, Inc. v. Nationwide Paging, Inc. (In re Arch Wireless, Inc.), 534 F.3d 76 (1st Cir. 2008).

8.2.bb Plan confirmation discharges lien on property dealt with by the plan. The court allowed a judgment lien creditor’s proof of claim as unsecured, because the lien property was of insufficient value to satisfy a senior security interest. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan that provided for the holder of the senior security interest to retain its lien but did not provide anything for the junior judgment lien claim. The plan also provided that confirmation discharges the debtor from all pre-consummation claims. The case was converted to chapter 7 before full consummation of the plan. Confirmation discharged the judgment lien. Section 1141(c) provides, “except as otherwise provided in the plan or in the order confirming the plan, after confirmation of a plan, the property dealt with by the plan is free and clear of all claims and interests of creditors ...”. These facts met all section 1141(c)’s requirements for lien discharge: the plan was confirmed, the property was dealt with by the plan, the lien holder participated in the case by filing a proof of claim, and the plan did not preserve the lien. The post-confirmation conversion to chapter 7 did not require otherwise, even though the plan provided for discharge only upon consummation, because the “except” clause in section 1141(c) does not permit a plan to “re-set” the discharge date from confirmation, as section 1141(c) provides, to a different date, such as the plan effective date. Elixir Indus., Inc. v. City Bank & Trust Co., (In re Ahern Enterps., Inc.), 507 F.3d 817 (5th Cir. 2007).

- 8.2.cc A chapter 13 filing does not toll the six- (now eight-) year bar on successive chapter 7 discharges. The debtor filed chapter 7 in 1996 and received a discharge. She filed chapter 13 cases in 1999, 2000, and 2001. Each case was dismissed without the debtor's completing payments or receiving a discharge. The cases were pending a total of 2 years, 234 days. Six months after her third chapter 13 case was dismissed, the debtor filed a chapter 7 case. The total time between the filing of her first and second chapter 7 petitions was 7 years, 139 days. A creditor obtained a judgment against the debtor in 2001, before her third chapter 13 case, but did nothing to enforce the judgment after the case was dismissed. Section 727(a)(8) bars a discharge if the debtor "has been granted a discharge under [chapter 7 or 11] in a case commenced within six [now 8] years before the date of the filing of the petition." The bar is not subject to equitable or other tolling for the time the debtor was in a chapter 13 case, because it is not a statute of limitations. It does not begin to run when a creditor's claim accrues or is discovered, and it does not set a time in which a creditor may assert its claim. As shown in this case, the creditor here obtained its judgment five years after the first chapter 7 case and after two of the debtor's three chapter 13 cases and would obtain a procedural windfall if it were able to take advantage of a tolling period from those two cases. Therefore, the provision is not tolled by a chapter 13 case and does not bar the debtor's discharge. Tidewater Fin. Co. v. Williams, 498 F.3d 249 (4th Cir. 2007).
- 8.2.dd Court adopts the "prepetition relationship" test to deny discharge of future claim. The debtor manufactured amusement park rides. The chapter 11 plan provided for sale of substantially all the debtor's assets to a new corporation, with the same management, which assumed the debtor's secured debts. Shortly after the plan's effective date, a ride that the debtor manufactured and sold to an operator prepetition injured a rider, who had no prior contact with the debtor or any of its rides. The plan and the confirmation order discharged all claims "which arose, accrued, or grew out of acts performed by the Debtors before the Effective Date". The injured rider argued that the plan did not discharge the claim. The courts have used three principal tests to determine whether a plan discharges future claims such as this one. They all focus on whether the injured party's claim is a "right to payment" as defined in section 101(5). The minority accrual test, set forth in In re Frenville Co., Inc., 744 F.2d 332 (3d Cir. 1984), looks to whether the right to payment accrued prepetition under nonbankruptcy law. Under the conduct test, the claim arises at the time of the debtor's conduct giving rise to the alleged liability. The prepetition relationship (or "narrow conduct") test is a variation on the conduct test and determines that there is a claim when the debtor and the claimant have a specific relationship when the conduct occurred or when the claim is within the fair contemplation of the parties. The plan discharges a claim only if there is a claim at the time of bankruptcy (or, in some cases, at confirmation). In this case, although the debtor's conduct in manufacturing the ride occurred prepetition, the injured rider had no connection with the debtor before the post-effective date injury. Applying the prepetition relationship test, the court concludes that the plan did not discharge the rider's claim. The plan also did not discharge the operator's tort indemnification claim against the debtor. The prepetition relationship test requires a prepetition connection or relationship related to the claim. The operator had a prepetition contractual relationship with the debtor, but the operator here seeks to pursue the reorganized debtor for a tort contribution claim. The tort relationship between the debtor and the operator did not arise until the accident and injury occurred, so the operator's tort claim did not arise until after the effective date. (The court, in an extensive and careful review of the future claims case law, repeats the case law's focus on whether there is a "claim" or a "right to payment" under section 101(5) as of the petition date, rather than on the more important question under sections 727 and 1141 of when the claim (or right to payment) arises. In each of these situations, there is a "claim", else the creditor would not be seeking payment, but the discharge operates based on when the claim arises.) Finally, the state court may consider successor liability issues, because the plan did not provide for unknown future claimants through a channeling injunction or other means and therefore cannot release a buyer from potential successor liability. White v. Chance Indus., Inc. (In re Chance Indus., Inc.), 367 B.R. 689 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2006).

- 8.2.ee Plan discharge injunction may not bar forward-looking regulatory enforcement actions. The debtor's plan confirmation order discharged all claims, enjoined any action or proceeding "with respect to any [prepetition] Claim," and retained "exclusive jurisdiction of all matters arising out of, or related to, the Chapter 11 Case and the [Plan]." The CFTC filed a proof of claim for the debtor's prepetition violations of the Commodity Exchange Act. The debtor in possession objected to the claim, the CFTC did not appear, the claim was "expunged and discharged," and the bankruptcy court retained jurisdiction over "all matters arising out of" the objection. The CFTC later brought a separate action in district court to enjoin future violations of the CEA, basing its claim for an injunction on the debtor's prepetition conduct. Neither the confirmation order nor the claim disallowance order prevented the district court from exercising jurisdiction based on the CEA. The district court action sought to enjoin only future (post-confirmation) conduct and did not seek damages for prepetition violations. It was therefore outside the scope of the confirmation order and the claim disallowance order. Moreover, the bankruptcy court may "retain" only such jurisdiction as it has, and a plan confirmation order may not expand its jurisdiction to overtake the jurisdiction that Congress granted the district court to enforce the CEA. Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. NRG Energy, Inc., 457 F.3d 776 (8th Cir. 2006).
- 8.2.ff A discharge may apply only to claims for which proof may be filed. The debtor filed a prepackaged chapter 11 case on February 28. The court set an April 19 prepetition claims filing bar date. The court confirmed the plan on April 30 and set a July 1 bar date for administrative claims arising between February 28 and April 30. The plan became effective on May 13 and purported to discharge all claims arising on or before the effective date. Three female employees of the debtor claimed that they suffered from gender discrimination upon the debtor's payment of certain similarly situated male employees in January, but that they did not learn of the discrimination until "late April or early May." The bankruptcy court may not discharge a claim arising between the confirmation date and the effective date (April 30 to May 13) without permitting a proof of claim to be filed for the claim. Therefore, the claims arising during that period are not discharged. ZiLOG, Inc. v. Corning (In re ZiLOG, Inc.), 450 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006).
- 8.2.gg Knowledge of the discharge injunction may not be presumed as a matter of law. The creditor and her counsel had notice of the bankruptcy case and of the confirmation order. They nevertheless filed a post-confirmation action against the debtor based on pre-confirmation claims. The court may not award sanctions on summary judgment, that is, without a full evidentiary hearing, because knowledge of the discharge injunction that is embodied in a confirmation order may be inferred after trial as a matter of fact, but is not a presumption implied in law. Although a party with notice of a bankruptcy may be charged with knowledge of the automatic stay for purposes of awarding damages under section 362(i), a court may not hold a party in contempt unless the party had specific knowledge of the applicable order, not merely knowledge implied in law. Therefore, contempt sanctions against the creditor and her counsel are unwarranted. ZiLOG, Inc. v. Corning (In re ZiLOG, Inc.), 450 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006).
- 8.2.hh Chapter 11 plan confirmation discharges continuing trespass claim. Years before bankruptcy, the debtor laid fiber optic cable over the creditor's land, and the creditor sued for trespass. The statute of limitations barred the suit, but the creditor claimed continuing trespass. Any such claim, even if valid under state law, was discharged by plan confirmation. Int'l Paper Corp. v. MCI WorldCom Network Servs., Inc., 442 F.3d 633 (8th Cir. 2006). See also Browning v. MCI, Inc. (In re WorldCom, Inc.), 339 B.R. 836 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), aff'g. 320 B.R. 772 (Bankr.

S.D.N.Y. 2005) (fiber optic cables were a permanent rather than a continuing trespass, and any claim for trespass was therefore prepetition and discharged.).

- 8.2.ii Discharge did not release liability for post-discharge patent infringement. A patent holder sued the debtor for infringement before bankruptcy. After the district court granted the patent holder's motion for a default, the debtor filed bankruptcy. The district court stayed the action but resumed it after discharge on the patent holder's claim that the debtor continued to infringe after discharge. However, the district court dismissed the action because of the discharge. The Ninth Circuit reverses. The discharge does not affect the postdischarge infringement, because it applies only to claims that arise before the date of the discharge. Hazelquist v. Guchi Moochie Tackle Co., 437 F.3d 1178 (9th Cir. 2006).
- 8.2.jj Chapter 11 discharge is not effective against creditor who did not receive notice. The debtor's customer disputed its debt to the debtor before bankruptcy and, in the correspondence about the dispute, asserted that it had claims against the debtor in excess of the amount the debtor claimed against the customer. The debtor did not list the customer as a creditor in its chapter 11 case, but the customer's president was aware of the chapter 11 case. After plan confirmation, the debtor terminated the customer's service, and the customer sued the debtor to enjoin the termination and for damages for the defective prepetition products and services. The action does not violate the discharge injunction. A creditor is entitled to formal notice of the case. A discharge is not effective against a creditor who did not receive the constitutionally required "notice reasonably calculated under all the circumstances, to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action." Because the customer did not receive notice here, its claim is not discharged, and the discharge injunction does not apply. In re Arch Wireless, 332 B.R. 241 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2005).
- 8.2.kk Permanent trespass claim is discharged. The debtor installed fiber optic cable over the creditor's land before bankruptcy. After confirmation of the debtor's chapter 11 plan, the creditor sought to enforce a claim for a continuing trespass against the debtor. The creditor's claim was barred by the chapter 11 discharge. Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, which applied to determine the nature of the creditor's claim, the trespass was a "permanent" trespass, one that is completed by a single act. The continuing presence of the cable on the creditor's land did not transform the trespass into a continuing trespass, which requires additional continuing injury to the creditor. A permanent trespass claim gives rise to a right to payment at the time of the trespass. Because the trespass here occurred prepetition, the creditor's claim was discharged. MCI, Inc. v. West (In re WorldCom, Inc.), 328 B.R. 35 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).
- 8.2.ll Post-confirmation loan is dischargeable upon conversion to chapter 7. The creditor loaned the debtor money to consummate the chapter 11 plan. The plan ultimately failed, and the creditor successfully moved to convert the case to chapter 7. The creditor also sued the debtor in state court to collect the loan. The debtor asked the bankruptcy court to enjoin the creditor from suing on the debt, arguing that it was discharged in the chapter 7 case. The injunction was proper. Because section 348(d) treats post-chapter 11, pre-conversion debts (other than for purposes of section 503) as though they arose before the date of the filing of the petition, the debt is discharged. The chapter 11 trustee had abandoned some property to the debtor during the chapter 11 case. The property was not dealt with in the chapter 11 plan and was therefore not available for distribution in the subsequent chapter 7. The fact that less than all of the debtor's property was available for creditors in the chapter 7 case does not change the result on the discharge issue. Murdock v. Holquin, 323 B.R. 275 (N.D. Cal. 2005).
- 8.2.mm Failure to schedule creditor does not create grounds for denial of discharge. The debtor did not schedule his principal creditor, who discovered the omission later and moved the court to vacate the discharge on the ground that it was obtained through fraud. The creditor argued that if it had notice of the case, it would have searched for assets and perhaps found concealed assets or other grounds for objection to the discharge, so the debtor's intentional omission of the creditor from the schedules resulted in the debtor obtaining the discharge through fraud. The creditor did not, however, make any showing that it had conducted the asset search after it learned of the case or investigated any other grounds for discharge denial. The court concludes, therefore, that the creditor failed to show that the mere failure to list the creditor, even if intentional or fraudulent, allowed the debtor to obtain the discharge when he otherwise would not have obtained it. White v. Nielsen (In re Nielsen), 383 F.3d 922 (9th Cir. 2004).

- 8.2.nn Section 524(g) is the exclusive authority for an asbestos channeling injunction. The plan proposed a channeling injunction protecting non-debtor affiliates of the debtor who were making substantial contributions to an asbestos claimants' trust. Because the proposed channeling injunction did not meet the requirements of section 524(g), in that the protected parties were not debtors and their potential asbestos liability was not derivative of the debtor's, the court authorized the plan injunction under section 105(a). The court of appeals reverses, holding that an asbestos channeling injunction may be issued only if the terms of section 524(g) are met. The court reasons that the specific provision of section 524(g) controls the more general provision of section 105(a) and that the injunction in favor of non-debtors would grant a third-party release in violation of section 524(e). In re Combustion Eng'g, Inc., 391 F.3d 190 (3d Cir. 2004).
- 8.2.oo Six-year bar runs from petition date to petition date, not conversion date. The debtor filed a chapter 13 case within six years after the petition date of his prior chapter 7 case. More than six years after the prior chapter 7 petition date, the debtor converted the chapter 13 case to chapter 7. Section 727(a)(8) bars a discharge in a chapter 7 case commenced within six years after the date of the filing of the petition commencing a prior chapter 7 case in which the debtor received a discharge. Under section 348, the conversion does not effect a change in the date of the filing of the petition or the commencement of the case. Therefore, the six-year bar applied from the petition date, not the conversion date, and the discharge is denied. Interestingly, the court also dismissed the case, without cause other than the denial of discharge. In re Hiatt, 312 B.R. 150 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2004).
- 8.2.pp Shareholder's diversion of secured creditor's collateral does not bar discharge. Section 727(a)(2) provides for denial of discharge if the debtor, with fraudulent intent, transfers, removes, or conceals "property of the debtor" within one year before bankruptcy. In this case, the corporation's secured creditor objected to the shareholder's discharge because the shareholder had caused the corporation to divert the proceeds of the creditor's collateral and use the proceeds in the operation of the business. Because the collateral was property of the corporation, not of the debtor, the objection to discharge could not be sustained. Northeast Neb. Econ. Dev. Dist. v. Wagner (In re Wagner), 305 B.R. 472 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2004)
- 8.2.qq Honest motive to protect some creditors by diverting funds does not preclude denial of discharge. Section 727(a)(2) provides for denial of discharge if the debtor, within one year before bankruptcy, transferred property of the debtor with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Here, the debtor suffered a bank account attachment by one creditor. The debtor opened a new bank account at another bank, diverting rents he collected from his tenants to the new account, so that he could continue to pay the mortgages on the rental properties. The attaching creditor argued that the debtor transferred the rents with actual intent to hinder or delay the creditor. The debtor argued that his motive was to protect the mortgagees, because payment of their claims was necessary to preserving the debtor's property. The court rules that an honest motive to prefer one creditor by itself is not a ground for denying discharge, but if the creditor can prove that the debtor's intent was to hinder or delay another creditor, denial is proper. Cadle Co. v. Marra (In re Marra), 308 B.R. 628 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).

- 8.2.rr Debtor’s attorney’s prepetition retainer is discharged. Before bankruptcy, the consumer debtor signed a retainer agreement with his lawyer, promising to pay the fee in installments beginning before bankruptcy and ending after bankruptcy. The debtor’s discharge under section 727(b) discharges the fees. Section 329(b), which gives the bankruptcy court authority to determine the reasonableness of the promised fees, does not detract from the broad reach of the discharge. What is more, the retainer can not be divided into pre- and post-petition portions, permitting nondischargeability of the post-petition portion, because the retainer agreement itself did not provide either for such division or for hourly services, and the Bankruptcy Code treats the agreement as one claim. The court notes the split with the Ninth Circuit’s decision in In re Biggar, 110 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 1997). Bethea v. Robert J. Adams & Assoc., 352 F.3d 1125 (7th Cir. 2003).
- 8.2.ss Bankruptcy Rule 9024 permits the court to vacate a discharge order. Section 1328(e) permits a court to revoke a discharge “only if (1) such discharge was obtained by the debtor through fraud; and (2) the requesting party did not know of such fraud until after such discharge was granted.” Here, the debtor received a tax refund shortly after the chapter 13 trustee had filed a certificate of completion of payments under the plan. Had the trustee known of the tax refund, it would have been property that the trustee would have distributed under the plan, because it related to the prior year, when the debtor was still making payments of its disposable income under the plan. The trustee moved to vacate, not revoke, the discharge under Rule 9024, based on mistake. The bankruptcy court grants the motion and the Tenth Circuit affirms. It reasons that “vacate,” which was temporary in this case, differs from “revoke,” and that the bankruptcy courts should not be prohibited from correcting their mistakes, despite the statutory language. The court notes the risk of fraud or sharp dealing by debtors if the result were different and concludes that the trustee was not under an obligation to investigate whether the debtors had received the tax refund before the trustee filed his certificate of completion. Midkiff v. Stewart (In re Midkiff), 342 F.3d 1194 (10th Cir. 2003).
- 8.2.tt Equitable tolling applies to discharge limitation. Section 727(a)(2) requires denial of discharge if a debtor made a transfer with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors within one year before filing bankruptcy. Here, the debtor filed chapter 13 a few days after making a fraudulent transfer. His case was dismissed after more than a year, and he subsequently filed a new chapter 7. Relying on the Supreme Court’s equitable tolling decision in Young v. United States, 535 U.S. 43 (2002), which tolled the period for determining the priority of tax claims, the court determines that the one-year period in section 727 should similarly be tolled. The court reasons that the creditors were prevented from protecting their claims during the pendency of the chapter 13 case. Womble v. Pher Partners (In re Womble), 299 B.R. 810 (N.D. Tex. 2003).
- 8.2.uu Discharge injunction does not prevent action against co-debtor. The debtor failed to carry workers compensation insurance. One of his employees was severely injured and sued before the Worker’s Compensation Appeals Board. The debtor filed bankruptcy before the WCAB order became final. After the bankruptcy court entered the debtor’s discharge, the injured employee sought a modification of the automatic stay or of the discharge injunction to complete the WCAB proceeding so that he could recover from the Uninsured Employer Fund. The B.A.P. rules that the automatic stay expired upon entry of the discharge, that the discharge injunction cannot be modified because it is statutory (a concurrence argues that this ruling is pure dicta), and that the pursuit of the claim nominally against the debtor before the WCAB solely to reach the proceeds of the UEF does not violate the discharge injunction, because it does not seek a determination of the personal liability of the debtor on the debt. In addition, even if the resulting judgment and the UEF’s reimbursement claim against the debtor is non-dischargeable, the discharge injunction does not prohibit it, because the discharge injunction does not apply to non-dischargeable debt. Ruvacalba v. Munoz (In re Munoz), 287 B.R. 546 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).

- 8.2.vv F.C.C. cancellation of NextWave licenses is improper discrimination. Section 525(a) prohibits a governmental unit from revoking a license “solely because” the debtor “has not paid a debt that is dischargeable in a case under this title.” After NextWave filed chapter 11 and failed to pay for its F.C.C. licenses, the F.C.C. cancelled them, on the grounds that the payment for the licenses was part of the regulatory scheme and that the F.C.C. had only regulatory motives in causing cancellation. The Supreme Court sets aside the F.C.C.’s action, holding that whatever the F.C.C.’s motive, the cancellation arose solely from NextWave’s non-payment of the debt, and that there is no regulatory purpose exception to section 525. The Supreme Court also rules that NextWave’s obligation was a dischargeable debt, even though it was also a regulatory condition to retention of the license. F.C.C. v. NextWave Personal Communications Inc., 537 U.S. 293 (2003).
- 8.2.ww A public housing lease may not be revoked under section 525(a). The debtor was a lessee in a public housing project operated by a governmental unit. After the debtor’s bankruptcy, the lease of the housing unit was automatically rejected under section 365(d)(1), and the past rent claim was discharged. The public housing authority attempted eviction. The debtor claimed that eviction would constitute improper discrimination that is prohibited by section 525(a). Construing the conflict between section 365, which requires that a debtor cure defaults to assume a lease, and section 525(a), which prohibits a governmental unit from discrimination with respect to a grant based solely on the debtor’s non-payment of a discharged debt, the Second Circuit concludes that the non-discrimination provision takes priority, because the lease is a “grant” and because of the need to protect the debtor’s fresh start. Stoltz v. Brattleboro Housing Authority (In re Stoltz), 315 F.3d 80 (2d Cir. 2002).
- 8.2.xx False social security number on a petition warrants denial of discharge. The debtor used a false social security number on her petition and did not disclose her correct number. The district court rules that this statement was material, in that it could have led to discovery of substantial information concerning the administration of the case. In addition, it provides grounds for revocation of the discharge under section 727(d) on the grounds that the discharge was obtained by fraud. The court construes “obtained” broadly to mean that the discharge would not have been obtained had the fraud been uncovered before the time for filing a complaint to object to the discharge, rather than that the fraud resulted in obtaining the discharge. Tighe v. Valencia (In re Guadarrama), 284 B.R. 463 (C.D. Cal. 2002).
- 8.2.yy The discharge injunction does not create a private right of action. The debtor brought a class action for damages arising from the creditor’s violation of the discharge injunction of section 524. The Ninth Circuit concludes that neither section 524 nor section 105 creates a private right of action but that violation of the discharge injunction is punishable only by contempt. Neither can the debtor pursue a claim for violation of the discharge injunction under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, because to permit the FDCPA claim would effectively grant the debtor a private right of action for a discharge injunction violation. Walls v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 276 F.3d 502 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 8.2.zz Use of section 105 limited in discharge complaint. The creditor appeared to prove grounds necessary to deny the debtor his discharge. However, the creditor’s complaint was, in the view of the bankruptcy court, deficient to support the allegations. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court denied the discharge under section 105. The bankruptcy appellate panel reverses, concluding that the court could not fashion an independent ground for denial of discharge under section 105, and therefore the order was neither “necessary” nor “appropriate” as required for application of section 105. Accordingly, the B.A.P. remanded to the bankruptcy court to determine whether the discharge should be denied under one of the grounds enumerated in section 727. Yadidi v. Herzlich (In re Yadidi), 274 B.R. 843 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).

- 8.2.aaa Employer may not discriminate on hiring based on prior bankruptcy. Section 525(b) prohibits discrimination “with respect to employment” against a former debtor, unlike section 525(a) under which a governmental unit may not “deny employment to . . . or discriminate with respect to employment against” a former debtor. Nevertheless, in a case in which a debtor was given an offer of employment that was revoked after the prospective employer reviewed her credit report, the court gives a broad reading to section 525(b) and permits the action for denial of employment to proceed. Leary v. Warnaco, Inc., 251 B.R. 656 (S.D.N.Y. 2000).
- 8.2.bbb Section 105 authorizes enforcement of the section 524 discharge injunction. A creditor attempted collection of a discharged debt in violation of the section 524 discharge injunction. The debtor brought an action in district court for damages. The court of appeals rules that section 105 grants the district court authority to enforce section 524 by contempt powers that permit remedial monetary sanctions. Moreover, because the injunction was statutory, not individually crafted by the bankruptcy judge, any court could enforce the injunction, not just the issuing court. The district court could refer the matter to the bankruptcy court under 28 U.S.C. § 157. Finally, the remedies available under section 105 preempted any state law claim for unjust enrichment. Besette v. Avco Financial Services, Inc., 230 F.3d 439 (1st Cir. 2000).
- 8.2.ccc Section 105 provides no remedy for violation of the discharge injunction. The Sixth Circuit holds that section 105 does not provide a basis for a remedy for violation of section 524 contrary to the First Circuit’s decision in Besette. Pertuso v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 233 F.2d 416 (6th Cir. 2000).
- 8.2.ddd Frenville lives! After confirmation of a plan, plaintiffs brought an action against the debtor for injuries arising from the debtor’s environmental contamination of a site near the plaintiffs’ homes. In determining whether when the claims arose for purposes of the discharge, the Third Circuit reaffirms In re M. Frenville Co., Inc., 744 F.2d 332 (3d Cir. 1984), and looks to the state tort law to determine when the claims accrued. Jones v. Chemetron Corp., 212 F.3d 199 (3d Cir. 2000).
- 8.2.eee Overpayment of attorneys’ fees under invalid fee agreement held non-dischargeable. The Second Circuit rules that for purposes of the defalcation exception to discharge, section 523(a)(4), an attorney acts in a fiduciary capacity with respect to the client. In this case, the attorney accepted a fee under a fee agreement that was ultimately held by the state court to be invalid. Such conduct constituted a defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity. The Andy Warhol Foundation for Visual Arts, Inc. v. Hayes (In re Hayes), 183 F.3d 162 (2d Cir. 1999).
- 8.2.fff Failure to keep records may bar discharge even without intent to conceal. Denial of discharge under section 727(a)(3) can be based on a failure to keep adequate financial records, even though the debtor does not intend to conceal his financial condition by failure to keep records. The debtor is held to reasonable commercial standards in keeping records, and requiring the trustee to reconstruct the debtor’s entire financial condition from boxes of documents can constitute grounds for denial of discharge. Peterson v. Scott (In re Scott), 172 F.3d 959 (7th Cir. 1999).
- 8.2.ggg A case need not be reopened to discharge an unlisted debt. Despite some confusion by the lower courts in this area, the Sixth Circuit has ruled that in a no asset case in which no bar date is set, an unlisted debt is discharged, whether or not the debtor purposely omitted the debt from the schedules. Reopening the case to amend the schedules to add the creditor has no effect, and any such motion to reopen should be denied. Zirnhelt v. Madaj (In re Madage), 149 F.3d 467 (6th Cir. 1998).
- 8.2.hhh Discharge denied on alter ego grounds. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme through two closely-held corporations, which the court found were her alter egos. Even though section 727(a)(2) provides for denial of discharge upon transfer of property of the debtor, the court denied discharge based on the alter ego theory. Compton v. Bonham (In re Bonham), 224 B.R. 114 (Bankr. D. Alaska 1998).

- 8.2.iii Failure to disclose valueless contraband is grounds for denial of discharge. Within weeks after filing bankruptcy, the debtors were arrested for and plead guilty to possession of about 15 pounds of marijuana that had been growing on their property for over two years. The debtors did not disclose the marijuana on their schedules. Even though the property would have been valueless to creditors, the court held that the concealment was fraudulent because the debtor stood to benefit from non-disclosure and therefore denied the discharge under paragraphs (2)(A) and (4)(A) of section 727(a). Fokkena v. Tripp (In re Tripp), 224 B.R. 95 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 1998).
- 8.2.jjj Attorney-client privilege prevents objection to discharge. While an attorney was representing a client in a dissolution proceeding, the client admitted that he had concealed assets. The client failed to pay the lawyer and filed bankruptcy, again hiding the same assets. The lawyer objected to discharge, but the bankruptcy appellate panel ruled that the lawyer learned of the concealment by a privileged conversation, which could not be revealed in pursuing an objection to discharge. Dubrow v. Rindlisbacher (In re Rindlisbacher), 225 B.R. 180 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).
- 8.2.kkk Post-confirmation sanctions not discharged. Before bankruptcy, the debtor commenced litigation against its insurance company. After plan confirmation, the trial court granted summary judgment against the debtor and awarded attorneys' fees as sanctions to the insurance company defendant for the debtor's bad faith in bringing and pursuing the litigation. Because the award was issued after confirmation of the debtor's chapter 11 plan and was not within the actual or presumed contemplation of the parties at the time of the filing of the chapter 11 case, the claim was treated as a claim that arose after confirmation and was therefore not discharged. Big Yank Corporation v. Liberty Mutual Fire Ins. Co. (In re Water Valley Finishing, Inc.), 139 F.3d 325 (2d Cir. 1998).
- 8.2.iii Creditor may collect attorney's fees on discharged claim. After discharge of the debtor's obligation, the debtor sued the creditor on matters relating to the loan, which had an attorney fees clause. Despite the discharge, the debtor was liable for attorney fees in the lawsuit. The creditor's attorney fee claim was contingent before the discharge, but because the contingency was not based "upon what others might do," because the debtor "returned to the fray and used the contract as a weapon," the attorney's fee claim was not subject to the discharge. Siegel v. Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corp., 143 F.3d 525 (9th Cir. 1998).
- 8.2.mmm Discharge objection deadline clarified. Bankruptcy Rule 4004(a) requires a complaint objecting to discharge to be filed within 60 days after the first scheduled meeting of creditors and requires the discharge to be entered "forthwith if no complaint is filed." Section 727(d)(1) permits a creditor to request revocation of a discharge within one year after the discharge is granted if the "discharge was obtained through the fraud of the debtor, and the requesting party did not know of such fraud until after the granting of such discharge." In this case, the discharge was entered 80 days after the bar date, and the creditor learned of the debtor's fraud after the expiration of the 60-day period but before the discharge was entered. A complaint objecting to discharge within one year after entry of the discharge was timely, even though the creditor knew of the fraud before the entry of the discharge. Citibank, N.A. v. Emery (In re Emery), 132 F.3d 892 (2d Cir. 1998).
- 8.2.nnn Pre-petition attorneys' fees are dischargeable. The attorney for the debtor was to receive his fees in installments after the filing of the debtor's chapter 7 petition. The Ninth Circuit holds that the debtor's obligation to the attorney was dischargeable. Hessinger & Associates v. U.S. Trustee (In re Biggar), 110 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 1997).

- 8.2.ooo Bank account withdrawal as a transfer. An individual debtor withdrew funds from a bank account to hinder an attaching creditor and stash the cash under the mattress. Departing from the ruling of the Seventh Circuit in In re Agnew, 818 F.2d 1284 (7th Cir. 1987), the Ninth Circuit holds that the withdrawal from the account was a “transfer” for purposes of the fraudulent transfer grounds for denial of discharge under section 727(a)(2). Bernard v. Sheaffer (In re Bernard), 96 F.3d 1279 (9th Cir. 1996).
- 8.2.ppp Insider status may survive resignation as director and officer. An individual who was the sole shareholder, director, and president of a corporate debtor, who managed the corporate debtor’s day-to-day operations and established its policies and knew “everything about the corporation that there possibly was to know” remained an insider for purposes of an objection to the discharge of the individual in his own bankruptcy under section 727(a)(7), even though the predicate acts for denial of discharge occurred after the individual’s resignation as president and director of the corporate debtor. The definition of insider is not limiting and “encompasses anyone with a single `sufficient close relationship with the debtor that his conduct is made subject to closer scrutiny than those dealing at arm’s length with the debtor.’ [citing legislative history].” In re Krehl, 86 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 1996).
- 8.2.qqq Partners are fiduciaries. For purposes of the exception to discharge contained in section 523(a)(4) (defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity), a partner is a fiduciary to the other partners. Moreover, defalcation includes innocent as well as intentional or negligent failure to properly account for money held in a fiduciary capacity. Lewis v. Scott (In re Lewis), 97 F.3d 1182 (9th Cir. 1996).

8.3 Third Party Releases

- 8.3.a Fifth Circuit reaffirms limitation on plan exculpation but permits a bankruptcy court gate-keeping function for post-confirmation litigation, The debtor’s principal was particularly litigious. Shortly after the petition date, the court replaced him with an independent board, which effectively acted as a trustee, and a CEO. The debtor confirmed a plan that provided for continuation of the debtor’s business through a managing general partner and the creation of a liquidating trust to pursue litigation recoveries for unpaid creditors. It provided for exculpation of the board, the CEO, the reorganized debtor, the trust, and the creditors committee members, except for acts constituting gross negligence or willful misconduct, and imposed an injunction against litigation against any of them without prior bankruptcy court approval that the litigation stated a colorable claim. Section 524(e) provides that a discharge does not release a nondebtor from any claims. However, chapter 11 permits exculpation of only the debtor, a trustee, and the committee for conduct during the chapter 11 case and in implementing the plan. The independent directors acted effectively as a chapter 11 trustee and are therefore entitled to limited qualified immunity and exculpation. Exculpation of any other parties violates section 524(e). Therefore, the exculpation of the reorganized debtor and the post-consummation trust are impermissible. Under the Barton doctrine, a bankruptcy court may perform a gatekeeping function by requiring leave of court before litigation against estate fiduciaries. Therefore, the gatekeeping injunction in this case is permissible, even for parties who are not exculpated. NexPoint Advisors, L.P. v. Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P.), ___ F.4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 23237 (5th Cir. Aug. 19, 2022).
- 8.3.b Chapter 11 plan release of an “affiliate” does not include a creditor’s direct claims against the affiliate. The debtor leased a retail store. Its parent unconditionally guaranteed the lease. Because of the pandemic, the debtor never opened the store and filed chapter 11. The plan released claims of creditors against affiliates (among others) that arise out of or relate to the debtor. The release should be read to release only claims that are derivative of the debtor’s claims, not an independent obligation, such as a guarantee, that the parent owed to the lessor. 605 Fifth Prop. Owner, LLC v. Abasic, S.A., 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41123 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 8, 2022).

- 8.3.c Only the district court has constitutional authority to approve nonconsensual third-party releases under a plan. The debtor and its shareholders, directors, and officers contributed substantially to the nation's opioid epidemic. It proposed a plan under which the individuals, who did not file bankruptcy petitions, would have contributed $4.4 billion and received broad nonconsensual releases from any liability related to the marketing, sale, and distribution of opioids, including direct claims against them by creditors of the debtor and including claims for fraud and claims of governmental units for nonpecuniary loss penalties. Under section 157 of title 28, the district court may refer proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a bankruptcy case to the bankruptcy court. But Article III prohibits a bankruptcy court from issuing a final order in litigation that is not a constitutionally core proceeding (arising under or arising in) without the parties' consent. A nondebtor's claim against another nondebtor is not a core proceeding. An order providing for a release of such a claim finally determines the claim. Without consent, a bankruptcy court does not have constitutional authority to determine such a claim, even if such determination occurs without adjudication of the claim. Therefore, a third-party release under a plan may be approved only by the district court, even if the approval occurs within a core proceeding such as plan confirmation. In re Purdue Pharma, L.P., ___ B.R. ___ (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 12, 2021).
- 8.3.d A bankruptcy court has subject matter jurisdiction to approve third-party releases if the released claims are related to the bankruptcy case. The debtor and its shareholders, directors, and officers contributed substantially to the nation's opioid epidemic. It proposed a plan under which the individuals, who did not file bankruptcy petitions, would have contributed $4.4 billion and received nonconsensual broad releases from any liability related to the marketing, sale, and distribution of opioids, including direct claims against them by creditors of the debtor and including claims for fraud and claims of governmental units for nonpecuniary loss penalties. Section 1334(b) of title 28 gives the district court jurisdiction over proceedings related to a bankruptcy case. Related-to jurisdiction reaches any proceeding that could have any conceivable effect on the estate. A release of third-party claims that, unless released, could result in reimbursement or contribution claims against the estate, that could cause the estate to incur material fees or expenses in defending the claims, or that could result in depletion of estate assets are sufficiently related to the bankruptcy case to be within the court's related-to jurisdiction. However, the third party's contribution of funds to the reorganization, standing alone, does not create related-to jurisdiction. Here, at a minimum, litigation of the claims could have generated indemnification claims and would have required the estate to incur substantial expenses in addressing the claims. Therefore, proceedings on the claims are related to the case, whether or not the individuals contributed funding for the plan. In re Purdue Pharma, L.P., ___ B.R. ___ (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 12, 2021).
- 8.3.e The Code does not authorize third-party releases under a plan. The debtor and its shareholders, directors, and officers contributed substantially to the nation's opioid epidemic. It proposed a plan under which the individuals, who did not file bankruptcy petitions, would have contributed $4.4 billion and received nonconsensual broad releases from any liability related to the marketing, sale, and distribution of opioids, including direct claims against them by creditors of the debtor and including claims for fraud and claims of governmental units for nonpecuniary loss penalties. Section 1123(a)(5) permits a plan to contain provisions providing for the plan's implementation relating to the use or disposition of property of the estate. Because it deals only with property of the estate, it does not authorize a third-party release simply because the releases might generate plan funding from the releasees. Section 1123(a)(6) permits a plan to include any provision not inconsistent with the other terms of the Code, and section 105(a) permits the court to issue any order necessary to carry out the provisions of the Code. These provisions could authorize a third-party release only if the release is not inconsistent with or necessary to carry out other provisions of the Code. No other provision of the Code authorizes a third-party release. Nor does the Code's silence on third-party releases imply any authority, and there is no residual authority on which the court may rely. As a comprehensive system for adjusting debtor-creditor relations, the Code would have addressed the issue if it were permitted. Moreover, section 523(a) excepts from discharge certain claims against an individual debtor, including claims for fraud and for certain governmental penalties. A third-party release that includes claims that would be nondischargeable is inconsistent with the Code. Section 524(e) provides that a discharge does not release a nondebtor's liability on a claim against the debtor. Because the claims here are direct claims against the third parties, not claims on which the debtor is liable, section 524(e) does not apply. For all these reasons, the court rules the plan's third-party release provisions are impermissible. In re Purdue Pharma, L.P., ___ B.R. ___ (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 12, 2021).

- 8.3.f A bankruptcy court does not have authority to grant third-party releases without the claimants' consent to the bankruptcy court's adjudication of the claims. The debtor sold its assets and proposed a liquidation plan that provided broad third-party releases, particularly securities class action claims against directors and officers. The disclosure statement and ballots made clear that non-voting equity holders, who received nothing under the plan, and voting creditors could opt out of the releases. In providing notice of the releases and the opt-out right, the court focused only the securities class action litigation, not on all the other possible claims that the broad releases might cover and did not provide notice to those other potential claimants. The bankruptcy court does not have constitutional authority to hear and determine non-core claims without the parties' consent. Although a bankruptcy court has in rem jurisdiction over property of the estate, third-party claims are not property of the estate, and the bankruptcy court may not determine them. For these reasons, it does not have constitutional authority to determine the claims by releasing them without the parties' consent to its authority. An opportunity for third-party claimants to opt-out in plan voting does not constitute sufficient consent to the court's authority or to the releases to permit the bankruptcy court to determine the claims, because consent may not generally be based on inaction. Therefore, the bankruptcy court should have issued a report and recommendation to the district court to consider the third-party releases. Patterson v. Mahwah Bergen Retail Group, Inc. ___ B.R. ___, 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7431 (E.D. Va. Jan. 13, 2022).
- 8.3.g Court disapproved third-party releases under liquidating plan. The debtor sold its assets and proposed a liquidation plan that provided broad third-party releases, particularly securities class action claims against directors and officers. The disclosure statement and ballots made clear that non-voting equity holders, who received nothing under the plan, and voting creditors could opt out of the releases. In providing notice of the releases and the opt-out right, the court focused only the securities class action litigation, not on all the other possible claims that the broad releases might cover, and did not provide notice to those other potential claimants. In the Fourth Circuit, approval of third-party releases requires an identity of interests between the releasee and the debtor, contribution of substantial assets, importance to the reorganization, overwhelming plan acceptance, payment of substantially all of the classes affected by the release, an opportunity for non-settling claimants to recover in full and specific factual findings supporting the foregoing. Satisfaction of these factors means the releases are integral to the plan. The bankruptcy court did not make adequate findings on these factors. Moreover, a liquidating plan under which the releasees do not make any contribution does not satisfy the test. Therefore, the court disapproves the releases and, under the plan's severability provision, severs them from the plan. Patterson v. Mahwah Bergen Retail Group, Inc. ___ B.R. ___, 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7431 (E.D. Va. Jan. 13, 2022).
- 8.3.h Actual notice of a third-party release satisfies due process, despite lack of formal notice. The creditor was injured by a valet driver after dropping off his car at a hotel. He sued the valet company, the hotel owner, and several affiliates of the hotel, including the hotel operator, in state court. The hotel owner filed a chapter 11 case. Its plan provided for a third-party release and related injunction in favor of the affiliates, all of which it had indemnified under the various agreements relating to the hotel's operation. The creditor received a copy of the plan and disclosure statement, which described the releases, but did not receive the notice required under Bankruptcy Rule 2002(c)(3), which requires specific notice of any injunction provided for in the plan. The creditor did not object to the releases. Due process requires that a creditor receive notice. Although the Rules require a specific form of notice, the Rules are only procedural, and actual notice satisfies due process. Therefore, the release and injunction bind the creditor. Jackson v. Le Centre on Fourth, LLC (In re Le Centre on Fourth, LLC), ___ F.4th ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 33845 (11th Cir. Nov. 15, 2021).

- 8.3.i Standard to approve litigation settlement bar order differs from standard to approve chapter 11 plan third-party release. The chapter 11 creditors committee settled claims against the debtor's former officers and directors. The court approved the settlement, which included a bar order that released them from any claims directly or indirectly related to the bankruptcy. A bar order in ordinary litigation, whether or not in the bankruptcy court, differs from a third-party release under a chapter 11 plan. A court may approve a bar order if it is integral to the settlement agreement, that is, if the settling defendants would not have settled without it. By contrast, a court may approve a third-party release under a plan only if it is necessary for the reorganized entity to succeed. Here, because the agreement settled ordinary litigation claims and the bar order was necessary to the settlement, the court properly approved it. Markland v. David (In re Centro Group, LLC), ___ Fed. App'x ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 32962 (11th Cir. Nov. 5, 2021).
- 8.3.j Ninth Circuit approves plan exculpation. The confirmed plan contained an exculpation provision that released parties closely involved in negotiating, drafting, and confirming the plan from any claims, except claims arising from willful misconduct or gross negligence. Section 524(e) provides that a discharge of a debt does not affect the liability of any other entity on the debt." The Ninth Circuit has construed that section to prohibit third party releases of creditors' claims. However, exculpation does not address creditors' claims against the debtor, which are discharged by a confirmation order. It addresses claims that might arise in the hard-fought, litigious arena of a chapter 11 case and so is not addressed by section 524(e). Therefore, the court affirms the plan confirmation order, which approved the exculpation clause. Blixseth v. Credit Suisse, 961 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2020).
- 8.3.k Article III does not prevent a bankruptcy judge from confirming a plan with a third-party release of related-to claims. As part of a global settlement, the debtor's plan provided for a substantial contribution by its shareholders and a non-consensual third-party release of all claims that creditors might have against them. Even as a non-Article III judge, a bankruptcy judge may resolve matters that are integral to the restructuring of the debtor-creditor relationship, which includes actions that stem from the bankruptcy itself or necessarily are resolved in the claims allowance process. The focus is on the content of the proceeding addressing the matter and is not limited to the context of the claims allowance process. Here, the issue is the confirmation of the plan, which is integral to the restructuring of the debtor-creditor relationship. As such, the judge had the constitutional authority to confirm the plan and release the third-party claims. In re Millennium Lab Holdings II, LLC, 945 F.3d 126 (3d Cir. 2019).
- 8.3.l Equity receivership court may issue a bar order against third-party investor claims. A federal equity receiver asserted claims against insurance brokers arising from an enormous Ponzi scheme in which the brokers played a material role. Numerous scheme investors, most of whom had claims in the receivership estate, sued the brokers in other courts for essentially the same conduct as the receiver alleged in the receivership action. The receiver settled with the brokers, who insisted on a bar order from the receivership court enjoining the investors from pursuing their claims against the brokers. A receivership is designed to take control of all a debtor's assets, including the debtor's claims against third parties, and to distribute them equitably among the debtor's creditors. A receivership solves the collective action problem by channeling all assets and claims into a central forum and controlling the race among creditors to recover on their claims ahead of other creditors. That purpose also informs the court's power to channel claims against third parties, especially where, as here, the claims arise from a singular scheme, not isolated acts, to perpetrate the Ponzi scheme. Because of the finite resources at issue in the litigation, permitting the investors to seek recovery from the defendant brokers for the same conduct for which the receiver seeks recovery would resurrect the collective action problem. The bar order is within the receivership court's jurisdiction and is appropriate because the investors will share in the recoveries through their allowed claims in the receivership. The bar order also does not deprive the investors of their property (their claims against the brokers) without due process. Instead, they participate in the receivership both procedurally and substantively, where their property interests are protected. Therefore, the court affirms the bar order. Zacarias v. Stanford Int'l Bank, Ltd., 945 F.3d 883 (5th Cir. 2019).

- 8.3.m Opt-out third-party release provision is not consensual. The debtor's plan provided that general unsecured creditors would receive no recovery but that they would be deemed to release certain third parties if they did not opt out of the release provision. The notices and ballots gave a clear description of the instructions for opting out. Creditors may agree to release third parties under a plan without condition, but nonconsensual releases are permitted only upon certain conditions. Under basic contract law, the court may infer consent to the releases only if the creditors accepted a benefit knowing the debtor expected compensation (the release), the debtors led the creditors to believe consent could be manifested through silence and they remained silent intending to consent, or consent can be presumed based on the parties' prior conduct. Because the creditors were to receive no recovery under the plan, there was no evidence of prior dealings, and the court could not find the creditors' failure to opt out evidenced an intent to consent, the releases were not consensual and could not be approved. In re Emerge Energy Servs. LP, ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 3717 (Bankr. D. Del. Dec. 5, 2019).
- 8.3.n Court disapproves nonconsensual third-party releases of claims the debtor would assume under the plan. The debtors' plan incorporated a settlement agreement with nondebtor affiliates under which the affiliates would pay a substantial amount to the debtors in settlement of various claims the debtors asserted against them and for the debtors' assumption of all the affiliates' liabilities arising from their operation as part of the debtors' business, including environmental obligations. Several creditors, including governmental units whose potential future environmental claims remained contingent, objected to the approval of the disclosure statement on the ground that the releases rendered the plan unconfirmable on its face. In the Sixth Circuit, a bankruptcy court may approve a nonconsensual third-party release if, among other things, there is an identity of interest between the debtor and the third party and the release is essential to the reorganization. Those conditions are met where the debtor is primarily liable to the third parties and the releases protect entities that are secondarily liable and would have indemnification claims against the debtor that must be released to return the debtor to viability. Here, the affiliates were primarily liable for the released claims, and the debtor was assuming the liability, not being protected from it. Accordingly, the releases do not meet the Sixth Circuit's standards of an identity of interest and necessity to the reorganization, so the court denies approval of the disclosure statement. In re FirstEnergy Solutions Corp., 606 B.R. 720 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2019).
- 8.3.o Equity receivership court may issue a bar order against third party claims. A federal equity receiver asserted claims against insurance brokers arising from an enormous Ponzi scheme in which the brokers played a material role. Numerous scheme investors, most of whom had claims in the receivership estate, sued the brokers in other courts for essentially the same conduct as the receiver alleged in the receivership action. The receiver settled with the brokers, who insisted on a bar order from the receivership court enjoining the investors from pursuing their claims against the brokers. A receivership is designed to take control of all a debtor's assets, including the debtor's claims against third parties, and to distribute them equitably among the debtor's creditors. A receivership solves the collective action problem by channeling all assets and claims into a central forum and controlling the race among creditors to recover on their claims ahead of other creditors. That purpose also informs the court's power to channel claims against third parties, especially where, as here, the claims arise from a singular scheme, not isolated acts, to perpetrate the Ponzi scheme. Because of the finite resources at issue in the litigation, permitting the investors to seek recovery from the defendant brokers for the same conduct for which the receiver seeks recovery would resurrect the collective action problem. The bar order is within the receivership court's jurisdiction and appropriate because the investors will share in the recoveries through their allowed claims in the receivership. The bar order also does not deprive the investors of their property (their claims against the brokers) without due process. Instead, they participate in the receivership both procedurally and substantively, where their property interests are protected. Therefore, the court affirms the bar order. Zacarias v. Stanford Int'l Bank, Ltd., ___ F.3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 21764 (5th Cir. July 22, 2019).

- 8.3.p Equity receivership court may not issue a bar order against third party claims. A federal equity receiver asserted claims against directors and officers arising from an enormous Ponzi scheme and against managers and employees for their role in the scheme and to recover compensation they were paid. The directors, officers, managers, and employees all asserted claims against the debtor's insurance carriers under various policies. Substantial disputes existed over, among other things, whether the policies covered the employees and the amount of policy limits. The receiver settled with the carriers, who paid an amount that would have resolved the policy limits dispute. The settlement was contingent on a bar order from the district court enjoining the employees, among others, from pursuing any coverage claims against the carriers and from pursuing any statutory or tort claims against the carriers that were not based on or limited in amount by the policies, such as claims for bad faith refusal to defend. In addition, the settlement precluded the employees from filing claims against the receivership estate. A receivership estate may include all the debtor's property, and the district court has exclusive jurisdiction, as well as broad powers and discretion, over the estate. The insurance policies and their proceeds were properly property of the receivership. But the court's jurisdiction and discretion are limited. Courts look to bankruptcy law principles for guidance on the limits in a receivership, since bankruptcy law was derived from receivership principles. Thus, the receivership's claims are only those that address injury to the debtor, and the receivership estate does not include third parties' assets. Because the insurance policies and their proceeds are property of the estate, the district court may enjoin claims against the carriers but must permit claimants to share in the estate. However, because the receivership estate does not include the claims the managers and employees held against the insurers, the district court may not bar their assertion against the carriers. S.E.C. v. Stanford Int'l Bank, Ltd., ___ F.3d ___, 2019 U.S. App. LEXIS 18111 (5th Cir. June 17, 2019).
- 8.3.q Court limits nonconsensual third party releases. The debtor's plan provided for broad consensual and nonconsensual releases, including non-consensual releases of any claim by a creditor or shareholder arising prepetition against the debtor's audit committee members or against the debtor's prepetition and postpetition lender and plan purchaser. The audit committee members navigated a difficult and complex situation in effecting the restructuring, and the lender enabled the successful plan through its purchase of the debtor's assets. A court may approve a nonconsensual third party release only in rare cases when it is an important part of a reorganization plan. A bankruptcy court has in rem jurisdiction over the debtor and its assets, including claims by and against the debtor, and may adjudicate or release any such claims. The claims subject to the proposed releases were neither by or against the debtor but were property of third parties. The bankruptcy court's jurisdiction over civil proceedings related to a title 11 case does not permit the court to grant the releases, since there is no "proceeding" over which it has jurisdiction. Subject matter jurisdiction is insufficient to give the court power over the claims of third parties, who are subject to the court's exercise of personal jurisdiction only upon proper service of process. Mere notice is insufficient. Even if the court had personal jurisdiction over the third parties, it would not have power to order releases, only power to adjudicate the claims. Imposing a third party release takes the third party's property without recognition of any of the third party's procedural or substantive rights. Finally, the proposed releases here of audit committee members for possible securities law violations go beyond the discharge they could obtain in their own personal bankruptcies, since liability for certain securities law violations are excepted from discharge. The work the proposed releasees did to reorganize the debtor might be worthy of a bonus, but from the debtor, not indirectly from the property of the third parties whose claims are being released. Nor does such work support the treatment of this case as the "rare case" where the releases are an important part of the plan. That the released claims might be frivolous or without merit also does not support the releases, especially because the court has no means to assess whether unasserted claims are meritless. Therefore, the court denies the non-consensual third party releases. In re Aegean Marine Petroleum Network, Inc., 599 B.R. 717 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2019).

- 8.3.r A plan release follows claims and interests and binds transferees. The plan provided for distributions to shareholder of funds remaining after creditors were paid in full and provided a broad release of any claim in any way related to or arising out of or in connection with the bankruptcy, except for a claim arising from gross negligence or willful misconduct. After plan confirmation, the reorganized debtor sold its assets, as contemplated in the plan, distributed proceeds to creditors, and announced a distribution to shareholders. After the distribution record date but before the distribution, a buyer bought a substantial number of shares, expecting that the plan distribution would follow FINRA rules, under which the buyer would have been entitled to the distribution. The debtor's officers did not follow the FINRA rules, which the plan terms overrode, and did not disclose they were not following FINRA rules. The buyer sued the officers for negligence, breach of fiduciary duty, nondisclosure, and securities fraud. A plan may release claims that arise from the execution of the plan, as these claims did. The plan releases applied to the holders of claims and interests, and they followed the claims and interests upon sale or other transfer. Therefore, the release bound the buyer and protected the officers from the claims. Zardinovsky v. Artic Glacier Income Fund (In re Artic Glacier Int'l Inc.), 901 F.3d 1162 (3d Cir. 2018).
- 8.3.s Bankruptcy court may constitutionally release third-party claims. The debtor's plan provided for releases by a nonconsenting creditor of his claim against shareholders, plan proponents, and other creditors. A court considers a third-party release under a plan in connection with confirmation, which is a core proceeding. The proceeding does not address the released claims' merits, only plan confirmation, to permit reorganization of the debtor's finances, which thus permits releases only of claims that are related to the debtor or the case. The order's effect on claims beyond the bankruptcy case does not render the jurisdiction non-core. Bankruptcy courts' authority to issue final orders in core proceedings is constitutional. Resolving claims against third parties that are integral to a reorganization is core to the bankruptcy function. Therefore, a bankruptcy court may issue a final plan confirmation order releasing third-party claims. Lynch v. Lapidem Ltd. (In re Kirwan Offices S.á.R.L.), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 176898 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 12, 2018).
- 8.3.t Article III does not prevent a bankruptcy judge from confirming a plan with a third-party release of related-to claims. As part of a global settlement, the debtor's plan provided for a substantial contribution by its shareholders and a non-consensual third-party release of all claims that creditors might have against them. As a non-Article III judge, a bankruptcy judge does not have constitutional authority to issue orders unless the issue stems from the bankruptcy itself or would necessarily be resolved in the claims allowance process. Determining whether the order meets that test depends on the proceeding, not on its incidental effects on claims over which the bankruptcy court might or might not have jurisdiction. Here, the issue is the confirmation of the plan, which stems from the bankruptcy itself and is governed strictly by the Bankruptcy Code and bankruptcy case law determining when a third-party release under a plan is permissible. The third-party release arose in the context of the bankruptcy court's confirmation of the plan, and the court's determination of whether to approve the release was based solely on the applicable standards for approving a settlement and release under a plan, not on the substantive merits of the released claim. As such, the judge had the constitutional authority to confirm the plan and release the third party claims. Opt-Out Lenders v. Millennium Lab Holdings II, LLC (In re Millennium Lab Holdings II, LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 162249 (D. Del. Sept. 21, 2018).
- 8.3.u Plan may not grant third-party release of claims of non-voting creditors. The debtor's plan provided broad third-party releases of claims by any creditor who was entitled to accept or reject the plan and that did not reject. The disclosure statement notified creditors clearly of that provision. Based on general contract law principles, a third-party release under a plan to which a creditor consents is binding on the creditor. But under such principles, silence does not constitute consent absent a duty to speak, except in limited circumstances, including when silence would be misleading. The disclosure statement's warning to creditors did not create in the creditors a duty to speak. Accordingly, a creditor's failure to reject the plan or the release did not constitute consent to the release. In re SunEdison, Inc., 576 B.R. 453 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).

- 8.3.v Bankruptcy court has limited jurisdiction to grant broad third-party release. The debtor's plan provided broad third-party releases of all the debtor's directors, officers, employees, professionals, and underwriters, and of many of its lenders and all their directors, officers, employees, and professionals, from all claims arising through the plan's effective date, related to the debtor and its chapter 11 case, and asserted or assertable by third parties. The debtor had indemnification obligations to some but not all of the proposed releasees. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to approve a settlement that provides for the release, and therefore an injunction against assertion of, third party claims against a non-debtor, only if the outcome of the released claim might have any conceivable effect on the estate. Assertion of a third-party claim might have a conceivable effect on the estate if the debtor indemnified the defendant or if the defendant made a substantial contribution to the estate in exchange for the release. Here, the release is broader than the debtor's indemnification obligations, and the debtor did not have indemnification obligations to many of the proposed releasees. Under these circumstances, the court refuses to approve the release. In re SunEdison, Inc., 576 B.R. 453 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 8.3.w A third party may not purchase a third-party release solely by making a contribution to the estate. The debtor's plan provided broad third-party releases of all claims by non-objecting creditors against the debtor, the committee, the lenders, and all their directors, officers, employees, and professionals in any way related to the debtors, the plan, or the chapter 11 case. A bankruptcy court's jurisdiction is limited. Its related-to jurisdiction reaches only to claims whose outcome could have any conceivable effect on the estate. If neither the debtor nor the estate has an indemnification obligation to a potential releasee, then the third party's claim against the potential releasee could not have any conceivable effect on the estate. That the claim arose in or in connection with the chapter 11 case is not sufficient to create jurisdiction. The bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to approve a release of the claim. A bankruptcy court should not permit a third party to purchase a release simply by making a contribution to the estate if the other requirements, both jurisdictional and substantive, are not otherwise present. The court denies approval of the releases to that extent. Moreover, a creditor's non-objection to the release or even its consent cannot confer subject matter jurisdiction on the court to approve the release and make it binding. In re Midway Gold US, Inc., 575 B.R. 475 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2017).
- 8.3.x Court approves securities fraud claim bar order in settlement of shareholder derivative action. The debtor's management engaged in fraud. Shareholders sued directors and officers for violation of the securities laws, and other shareholders sued directors and officers derivatively on behalf of the debtor for breach of fiduciary duty, waste and gross mismanagement. The debtor had a wasting D&O liability policy, so litigation defense costs reduced the amount payable for liability. After bankruptcy, the trustee removed the derivative action to the bankruptcy court and entered into a settlement with one officer that was conditioned upon the bankruptcy court's issuance of a bar order to protect that defendant in the securities fraud action. A bankruptcy court may issue a bar order if it encourages settlement, the settlement is fair and reasonable and satisfies certain non-exclusive factors, including that the barred claims are interrelated with the settled claims. Claims may be interrelated even if the estate does not own both claims. Here, the settled derivative claims and the unsettled securities fraud claims arose out of the same operative facts. Therefore, the court may issue the bar order. Brophy v. Salkin, 550 B.R. 595 (S.D. Fla. 2016).
- 8.3.y Third party release in plan requires specificity. Before bankruptcy, an employee asserted a Fair Labor Standards Act claim against the debtor and its principal in the district court. The chapter 11 filing stayed the litigation. The debtor's plan provided a release of "officers and directors of the Debtor and the shareholder," without further elaboration. Under section 524(e), a discharge does not release third parties, but a plan that provides such a specific discharge or release is binding if the confirmation order is not reversed on appeal. Specificity requires more than the generic statement in this plan, such as by identifying the released parties or claims by name. Therefore, the plan did not effectively discharge the FLSA claim against the debtor's principal. Hernandez v. Larry Miller Roofing, Inc., 628 Fed. Appx. 821 (5th Cir. 2016).

- 8.3.z Bankruptcy court may issue a bar order against a securities fraud case in a D&O breach of fiduciary duty settlement. The debtor's audit committee members resigned after management obstructed the committee's investigation into matters raised by an SEC investigation. Senior management then abandoned their legal obligations to the debtor, which the state then dissolved. A plaintiff brought a securities class action against the debtor and its management, and another plaintiff brought an action against the directors and officers for breach of fiduciary duty, waste, and gross mismanagement. Only one officer defended; the others had fled the country. The debtor had a "wasting" D&O insurance policy, which was being depleted by the one officer's defense of the litigation. Creditors filed an involuntary bankruptcy petition, which stayed both actions. The trustee negotiated a settlement of the fiduciary duty action with the insurer and the one officer conditioned on the bankruptcy court's issuing a bar order against continued pursuit of the securities class action. Under Eleventh Circuit law, the bankruptcy court may issue a bar order if, among other things, the non-debtor third-party claims that are to be barred are "interrelated" with the estate's claims. A claim is interrelated if it arises from the same set of facts and is against the same defendants. The barred claim need not be property of the estate or dependent on estate claims to be interrelated. Here, the securities class action claims and the fiduciary duty claims arise out of the same set of operative facts, including those underlying the SEC investigation and the company's response. Therefore, the claims are interrelated, and the bankruptcy court may issue the bar order. Brophy v. Salkin, 550 B.R.595 (S.D. Fla. 2015).
- 8.3.aa Eleventh Circuit adopts Dow Corning factors to permit third-party releases. The principals of a professional engineering and surveying firm created real estate development companies and guaranteed their loans. The companies failed, and the lender pursued the principals, ultimately acquiring stock in the engineering firm. The firm filed a chapter 11 petition and proposed a plan under which the principals would continue business as a new entity, which would pay the lender for the debtor's stock with a promissory note with interest. The plan provided a release of the principals from any creditor's claims. All classes of creditors accepted the plan; the lender (as stockholder) rejected the plan. The majority view among the courts of appeals is that a plan may provide a non-consensual third party release under limited circumstances in unusual cases. The Eleventh Circuit adopts the Sixth Circuit's In re Dow Corning, 280 F.3d 468 (2002), non-exclusive, non-mandatory factors to determine when to permit such a release of the principals. The circumstances here satisfy a sufficient number of the Dow Corning factors to permit the release: the identity of interests between the reorganized debtor and the principals; their contribution to the plan by continuing to work for the reorganized debtor; protecting them from the lender's continued litigation was essential to providing them adequate time and concentration to conduct the reorganized debtor's business and service its clients; and all classes other than the lender, whose interests were fully compensated, accepted the plan. In addition, the court required the principals to drop their litigation against the lender, so that the release would not unfairly prejudice the lender. SE Prop. Holdings, LLC v. Seaside Eng'ring and Surveying, Inc. (In re Seaside Eng'ring and Surveying, Inc.), 780 F.3d 1070 (11th Cir. 2015).
- 8.3.bb Plan release of debtor's shareholder is related to claim against debtor, so confirmation order is res judicata. The debtor and its shareholder guaranteed its landlord's building loan. The lender filed a proof of claim on the guarantee and, under a settlement with the debtor, received an allowed claim. The debtor's plan provided for the shareholder to contribute a large secured claim and cash to the reorganization. In exchange, the plan provided, “all holders of claims agree to a general release of” the shareholder. After confirmation, the lender sued the guarantors (other than the debtor). A confirmation order is res judicata as to all claims that were or could have been raised in the case. For res judicata to apply, the prior judgment must, among other things, involve the same parties or their privies and the same cause of action. Claims are part of the same cause of action when they arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions. The allowed claim in the chapter 11 case and the guarantee claim arose out of the same series of transactions related to the loan, and the debtor and its shareholder were closely related. Therefore, the plan release meets the res judicata requirements and bars the lender’s post-confirmation action against the shareholder. Iberiabank v. Geisen (In re FFS Data, Inc.), 776 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2015).

- 8.3.cc Securities class action plaintiff does not have standing to object to third-party release. The plaintiff sued the debtor and its directors and officers in a securities class action before bankruptcy. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, the district court stayed the action as to the debtor. The district court next designated the plaintiff as lead plaintiff in the class action, but had not yet certified the class when the debtor proposed its plan, which contained an opt-out third-party release of all claims against the directors and officers. The plaintiff opted out of and objected at the confirmation hearing to the release, both on his own behalf and on behalf of the putative class. The bankruptcy court may apply Bankruptcy Rule 7023 (incorporating Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 23) in a contested matter and so may certify a class for purposes of an objection to confirmation. The plaintiff did not request application of Rule 23. His designation as lead plaintiff applied only in the class action, not in the bankruptcy case, and any fiduciary duty to class members he had as lead plaintiff affected only his conduct in the securities class action. Therefore, he did not have standing to object to confirmation on behalf of the class. He did not have standing to object to the release, because he opted out and it therefore did not affect him. And if he had standing to opt out on behalf of the class, then for the same reason, he would not have had standing to object to the release on behalf of the class. Lucas v. Dynegy, Inc. (In re Dynegy, Inc.), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 78479 (S.D.N.Y. Jun. 4, 2013).
- 8.3.dd Fourth Circuit permits third-party releases in a plan with specific factual findings to support them. A non-profit debtor proposed a plan that released its officers and directors from claims arising before the effective date, including prepetition claims. The bankruptcy court confirmed the plan and approved the releases, finding that the case was quite a unique case, there were legitimate interests for approving the provisions, the potential for mischief by disgruntled creditors was high, the debtor’s obligations to indemnify its directors could result in substantial legal costs, and the provisions would prevent an end run around the plan. Reaffirming its prior decisions and departing from other circuits, the Fourth Circuit rules that section 524(e) does not prohibit third party releases. To permit such a release in a plan, the bankruptcy court need not find a precise fit with the Circuit’s prior precedents nor with any other multi-factor test. It may determine what factors may be relevant in each case. However, the court must make specific factual findings in support of its decision and its application of the factors. The bankruptcy court’s general statements here did not suffice to support the release’s approval or meaningful appellate review. Behrmann v. Nat’l Heritage Found., 663 F.3d 704 (4th Cir. 2011).
- 8.3.ee Due process protections prevent a section 363 sale order from releasing future claims. The debtor manufactured truck bodies. During its chapter 11 case, it sold its assets comprising the truck-body production line under section 363 to a competitor, who continued the line. The sale order provided that the sale was free and clear of all claims, including “all debts arising in any way in connection with any acts of the debtor” and that the buyer would not, by virtue of the sale, have any successor liability arising from the asset purchase. After bankruptcy, a truck driver was injured in a truck that the debtor (not the successor) had manufactured and sued the successor under the product-line exception to the general rule against an asset buyer’s successor liability.

Due process requires that notice reasonably calculated to apprise interested parties of the action precede any order that affects a person's rights. A court cannot provide any notice at all to a person who is injured after a bankruptcy case is closed because of the debtor's prepetition conduct. Therefore, barring such a victim's claim, whether against the debtor or a successor, violates the victim's due process rights to notice. The court declines to address whether the appointment of a future claims representative would permit release of future claims. Morgan Olson L.L.C. v. Frederico (In re Grumman Olson Indus., Inc.), 467 B.R. 694 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

- 8.3.ff A bar order in a plan to protect settling defendants in multiple defendant litigation does not provide an improper third-party release. In nonbankruptcy litigation against multiple defendants, a settling defendant risks a contribution or reimbursement claim asserted by nonsettling defendants against whom the plaintiff later obtains a judgment. In such cases, courts have fashioned a bar order, which prohibits a nonsettling defendant from asserting a claim for contribution or reimbursement against a settling defendant. The bar order provides some protection to a nonsettling defendant by providing an appropriate reduction in any judgment that the plaintiff may obtain against it. Such an order is increasingly common in partial settlements in multiple-defendant litigation. Here, the chapter 11 plan incorporated a settlement with some of the defendants in LBO-driven fraudulent transfer litigation and a bar order to protect them from contribution and reimbursement claims that might be asserted by nonsettling defendants who were later found liable. A plan may release a nondebtor only in extraordinary cases involving fairness and necessity to the reorganization. The bar order here does not release or prevent claims against the nonsettling defendants but only reduces their potential liability by an amount that takes account of the recovery had from the settling defendants. Therefore, it is not an impermissible third-party release. Incidentally, the judgment reduction provision is also consistent with section 550(d), which limits the trustee to a single satisfaction on an avoiding power recovery claim. In re Tribune Co., 464 B.R. 126 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).
- 8.3.gg Third party release requires "opt in" and may be required as a condition to distribution under the plan. The debtor's plan provided for a third party release by each creditor who did not, on its ballot, opt out of the release. If the creditor opted out, the creditor was not entitled to receive any consideration under the plan. The court does not have jurisdiction to grant a third party release. A third party release under a plan may come only from a creditor's decision to grant the release. Failure to return a ballot does not sufficiently evidence the creditor's decision to grant a release. Therefore, a release may be effected only by an "opt in" ballot through which a creditor affirmatively agrees to the release. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 442 B.R. 314 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).
- 8.3.hh Court approves exculpation of committee members but not plan sponsors and successor entities. One affiliated debtor was an operating business; the other was a single purpose entity that owned timberland that secured bonds. The debtors proposed a joint plan that provided for the transfer of each debtor's assets to new companies created and owned by two plan sponsors. One plan sponsor was unrelated to the debtors. The other held a large unsecured claim against the operating debtor. The plan provided for exculpation of the plan sponsors, the new companies and the unsecured creditors' committee and its members from liability related to proposing, implementing and administering the plan, except for liability resulting from gross negligence or willful misconduct. Section 524(e) releases only the debtor, not co-liable third parties, and is not intended to provide releases for negligent conduct that occurs during a chapter 11 case or in plan consummation. Exculpation amounts to a release. Therefore, a plan may not exculpate parties other than the debtor or the committee from liability. The discharge may protect the debtor. Section 1103(c) may protect committee members, because it implies they have qualified immunity for actions within the scope of their duties. Bank of N.Y. Trust Co., N.A. v. Official Unsecured Creditors' Comm. (In re Pac. Lumber Co.), 584 F.3d 229 (5th Cir. 2009).

- 8.3.ii Court rejects third party releases under a plan. The debtors liquidated in chapter 11, with the plan providing that all assets would be transferred to another entity in which the debtors would have only a minority interest. The second lien creditor and related entities provided funding for the other entity. The plan provided for exculpation of the creditor for any acts arising in or related to the chapter 11 case and for a complete release of the creditor by all other creditors for any claims against the creditor related to the debtor. The creditor refused to fund without the broad releases. Following the Seventh Circuit's In re Airdigm Comm'ns, Inc., 519 F.3d 640 (7th Cir. 2008), decision, the court rules that section 524(e) does not prevent third party releases, but section 105(a) authorizes them only to the extent appropriate. The court reviews decisions from all other courts of appeals that have addressed the issue and concludes that third party releases for prepetition conduct are appropriate only in mass tort where the releasees provide substantial contributions to the plan and notes that Airdigm permitted a third party release only of claims arising in the bankruptcy case. (The court notes, "inclusion in a plan of reorganization of a narrow release of claims relating to the bankruptcy case ... now appears to be de rigueur in cases filed in New York and Delaware [fn 13: The Southern District of New York and the District of Delaware ... are the cradle of innovation. Once a new tactic, pleading or provision, gets approved for use in New York or Delaware, it seems to spread across the country like a highly contagious virus.]"). Airdigm does not authorize broad third party releases of non-bankruptcy related claims, does not expand the bankruptcy court's powers under section 105(a) and permits a bankruptcy-related release only as to "participating creditors". Here, the releasing creditors do not receive any consideration for the releases, the plan is essentially a liquidation, the releases run in favor of the creditor's affiliates, who do not appear to be funding the plan, as well as a senior secured creditor and the bankruptcy court does not have a jurisdictional basis to provide releases for claims arising outside the bankruptcy process. Therefore, the court denies confirmation. In re Berwick Black Cattle Co., 394 B.R. 448 (Bankr. C.D. Ill. 2008).
- 8.3.jj Court may grant third-party release for plan-related activities when "appropriate". The debtor's plan released the entity that financed the plan from liability for "any act or omission arising out of or in connection with ... the confirmation of this Plan ... except for willful misconduct". There was adequate proof that the entity would not finance the plan without the release. Section 524(e) provides that a "discharge of a debt of the debtor does not affect the liability of another entity on ... such debt". This provision is definitional, unlike its mandatory predecessor, Bankruptcy Act section 17, which provided that the "discharge of a debt of the debtor shall not affect the liability of another entity". It merely describes the discharge's effect and does not prohibit a third party release. Section 1123(b)(6) permits a plan to contain "any appropriate provision not inconsistent with the applicable provisions of this title" and therefore permits a third party release if "appropriate". Whether a release is appropriate is fact-intensive. Here, the release was limited to claims arising out of the reorganization and did not include willful misconduct, and there was adequate evidence that the financier required this release as a condition to financing the plan, which would have failed otherwise. Therefore, the release is appropriate. Airadigm Comm'ns, Inc. v. Fed. Comm'ns Comm'n (In re Airadigm Comm'ns, Inc.), 519 F.3d 640 (7th Cir. 2008).
- 8.3.kk Bankruptcy court lacks jurisdiction to enjoin actions against a third party that do not affect the estate. The Manville chapter 11 plan contained a broad injunction to protect Manville's insurer from further litigation over asbestos-related claims. By enjoining all claims "arising out of" or "related to" the policies, the bankruptcy court "meant to provide the broadest protection possible to facilitate global finality for [the insurer] as a necessary condition to its significant contribution to the Manville estate". Years later, plaintiffs still filed state court actions against the insurer, not under the policies or for amounts for which the insurer was liable under the policy, but rather for common law or statutory claims for fraud relating to litigation defenses and to nondisclosure. The insurer sought interpretation and enforcement of the plan injunction to stop the litigation. A bankruptcy court has continuing jurisdiction to interpret and enforce its own orders but not to interpret or expand its orders beyond its underlying jurisdiction. A bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to enjoin actions against an insurer that are derivative of the debtor's rights and therefore would deplete funds that would otherwise be property of the estate. It does not, however, have jurisdiction to enjoin actions against an insurer to protect it from its own conduct where a finding of liability would not affect the estate or where the action is not derivative of the policy. In this case, although the state court actions are related to the underlying policies, they are directly against the insurer, not in the right of the debtor as insured, and do not affect policy proceeds or the estate. Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to reach these actions in the original plan injunction nor to extend it to cover them now. The insurer's contribution to the plan does not affect the analysis, because permitting such a result would permit parties to create subject matter jurisdiction by consent. The court notes the risk of abuse in enjoining claims against third parties, even those who contribute to the plan. Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Chubb Indem. Ins. Co. (In re Johns-Manville Corp.), 517 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 2008).

- 8.3.ii Channeling injunction is generally impermissible outside of a plan. The estate asserted claims for indemnification and defense costs reimbursement under its directors and officers liability policies. The insurer disputed the claims. The debtors' directors and officers also asserted claims under the policies. The aggregate of the claims exceeded policy limits. The policies were "first come, first served" policies, so that whichever insured successfully asserted claims under the policies first would get paid, leaving the others without policy proceeds to recover. After plan confirmation, the estate proposed to settle with the insurer by selling the insurer all of the estate's claims under the policies for a cash payment that was less than the amount of the remaining policy limits. The settlement also called for the order approving the sale and settlement to enjoin the other policy claimants from asserting any further claims against the insurer under the policies. A channeling injunction may be permissible in rare cases when it is an essential or dominant part of resolving a chapter 11 case. Full payment of claims may also support a channeling injunction. Neither of those factors is present in this case. The plan had already been confirmed, and the settlement did not involve full payment of claims in the case or even of claims under the policies. Therefore, the court refuses to approve the settlement's channeling injunction. In re Adelphia Comm'ns Corp., 364 B.R. 518 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).
- 8.3.mm Third party release of insurance company is not warranted; separate classification is. The debtor was a law firm that was subject to numerous malpractice claims. The malpractice carrier proposed to contribute a substantial amount to the plan, which would be used to pay separately classified malpractice claims. The court determines that because the insurer had an obligation to pay up to the policy limits to the estate, its contribution under the plan did not provide a basis for a third party release. Similarly, the court disapproves the third party release in favor of the partners, because there was no showing that the partners' contribution was substantial. Nevertheless, the court permits separate classification of the malpractice claims from the general trade claims, because the insurance proceeds were available only to the malpractice claimants. In re Mahoney Hawkes, LLP, 289 B.R. 285 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2002).
- 8.3.nn Third party releases are appropriate in unusual circumstances. The Sixth Circuit permits a plan to release, and enjoin claims against, a non-debtor, even as to non-consenting creditors, in unusual circumstances. The court overrules the bankruptcy court's reasoning that the Supreme Court's decision in Grupo Mexicano v. Alliance Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308 (1999), prohibits such a release, because the Sixth Circuit finds authority for the release not in general equitable jurisprudence but rather in the express terms of the Bankruptcy Code found in section 1123(a)(6) and in section 105(a). However, a release of non-consenting creditors' claims against a non-debtor is permissible only if the following seven factors are present: (1) identity of interests between the debtor and the released non-debtor party (2) the non-debtor's contribution of substantial assets to the reorganization (3) that the injunction is essential to the reorganization (4) that the affected class has voted overwhelmingly to accept the plan (5) full payment (or a mechanism providing for substantially full payment) of the affected classes (6) an opportunity for non-settling claimants to recover in full, and (7) the bankruptcy court's specific factual findings in support of its conclusions. Class 5 Nevada Claimants v. Dow Corning Corp. (In re Dow Corning Corp.), 280 F.3d 648 (6th Cir. 2002).

- 8.3.oo Court restricts scope of plan exculpatory clause and release. The plan contained a release of all claims by the debtor against its officers, directors, employees, professionals and creditors. It also contained an exculpation clause that released all claims by anyone against the same entities for their conduct in the chapter 11 case and their participation in the formulation and confirmation of the plan, except for claims arising from willful misconduct or gross negligence. The court rejects the breadth of both. As to the former, the court holds that a showing of substantial contribution by the non-debtor party to the assets of the reorganization and that the release is essential to the reorganization, among other things, are required for a release by the debtor of its claims against third parties. The court permits the release, however, as to certain creditors, who bargained for it in connection with the plan negotiations. The court also restricts the exculpation clause to the extent that it releases claims against creditors for their conduct in the reorganization case, as distinguished from their conduct in connection with the formulation and confirmation of the plan. In re Genesis Health Ventures, Inc., 266 B.R. 591 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001).
- 8.3.pp Non-mass tort settlement channeling injunction approved. The court approved a settlement of a trustee's claim against the debtor's law firm for pre-petition malpractice where the settlement agreement included the issuance of a channeling injunction to prohibit lawsuits by creditors against the law firm. The court required notice to all creditors before approval of the settlement and limited the injunction to claims that were derivative of the debtor's claims against the law firm. In re Mrs. Weinberg's Kosher Foods, Inc., 278 B.R. 358 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2002).
- 8.3.qq Third party releases are overturned. The plan released all claims of securities class action plaintiffs against the debtor's directors and officers. Without reaching the issue of whether the third party releases were ever permissible in a chapter 11 plan, the Third Circuit rules that the releases here do not have "the hallmarks of permissible non-consensual releases – fairness, necessity to the reorganization, and specific factual findings to support these conclusions," and reverses the provision of the plan providing for the releases. Gillman v. Continental Airlines (In re Continental Airlines), 203 F.3d 203 (3d Cir. 2000).
- 8.3.rr Third party releases disapproved. A plan for a corporate debtor that provided releases of all creditor claims against officers and directors could not be approved. The plan instead would be construed to provide for such releases only by creditors who accepted the plan or accepted any distribution under the plan. In re Zenith Electronics Corp., 241 B.R. 92 (Bankr. D. Del. 1999); accord In re Dow Corning Corp., 1999 Bankr. LEXIS 1647 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1999) (but limiting releases only to those creditors who accepted the plan).
- 8.3.ss Third party releases permitted. In a general partnership chapter 11 case, the general partners made substantial contributions to fund the plan, which provided for the release of claims of creditors against the partners who made contributions. Distinguishing a partnership from a corporation on the ground that the partners were liable to creditors by reason of the nature of the partnership, not by reason of any independent liability, the court approves a release of all partners who contributed under the plan of all claims by all creditors of the partnership. In re Keck, Mahin & Cate, 241 B.R. 583 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1999).
- 8.3.tt Third party release under a plan is res judicata in subsequent litigation. The debtor's plan provided for releases of its principals. It was confirmed, and no appeal was taken. On an appeal from a judgment in an action by creditors against the principals, the Ninth Circuit holds that the confirmation of the plan was res judicata as to the release of the principals, citing Stoll v. Gottlieb, 305 U.S. 165 (1938), even though the release provision might not have withstood an attack on a direct appeal. Trulis v. Barton, 107 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 1995).

8.4 Environmental and Mass Tort Liabilities

- 8.4.a CERCLA response cost claim arises when the debtor deposited waste. The debtor contributed waste to a hazardous waste site in the 1950s and 1960s. It filed chapter 11 in 1992 and confirmed a plan, which provided for discharge of all claims that arose before the effective date. In 2017, the EPA issued a decision and decree for remedial action at the site against a group of settling defendants. The settling defendants brought an action for contribution against potentially responsible parties, including the debtor. A claim for contribution lies only when the plaintiff and the defendant are both liable on the same claim, in this case, to the United States. If the United States' claim against the debtor arose before the plan effective date, it was discharged, and a contribution claim would not lie. Under the "underlying acts" approach the Fourth Circuit has adopted, a claim arises when the acts underlying the claim occurred. Here, the underlying acts were the deposit of waste in the hazardous waste site in the 1950s and 1960s. The claim arose then, which was before the plan's effective date, and therefore was discharged. 68th St. Site Work Group v. Airgas, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 196178 (D. Md. Oct. 12, 2021).
- 8.4.b Noncompensable environmental penalties resulting from fraudulent reports are dischargeable. The debtor filed false reports with the air quality regulator, who filed a proof of claim for fines for air quality violations and false reports and filed an action in state court for the same amounts. The plan provided for limited distributions to unsecured creditors and a discharge for the reorganized debtor. Section 1141(d)(6) makes nondischargeable a debt "of a kind specified in paragraph (2)(A) or (2)(B) of section 523(a) that is owed to a domestic governmental unit." Those paragraphs except from discharge debts "for money, property, services, or an extension of credit, to the extent obtained by ... false pretenses, a false representation, or actual fraud." A debt is nondischargeable under this section only for loss or damage the creditor sustained as a result of the false pretenses or fraud. The penalties here are noncompensable and so are dischargeable. S. Coast Air Qual, Mgmt. Dist. v. Exide Techs. (In re Exide Techs.), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50662 (D. Del. Mar. 24, 2020).
- 8.4.c A RCRA or Clean Water Act injunction is not a claim. The debtor operated a farm. An environmental organization had sued the debtor under the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act and the Clean Water Act for an injunction against continued pollution of a stream. Neither RCRA nor the CWA authorizes a polluter to pay monetary damages in lieu of taking action to stop polluting or authorize a plaintiff to seek monetary damages. Under the Bankruptcy Code, a claim is a right to payment or "a right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance if such breach gives rise to a right to payment." The RCRA and CWA claims do not give rise to any right to payment. Therefore, they are not claims. Sound Rivers, Inc. v. Taylor (In re Taylor), 572 B.R. 592 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2017).
- 8.4.d Dischargeability of an environmental injunction depends on the alternative remedies the agency has under the statute it used to obtain the injunction. The debtor had acquired and operated on a manufacturing site from which the debtor and the prior owners had discharged pollutants into the groundwater. The debtor ceased operations at the site long before its bankruptcy. However, local groundwater pollution remained, and it threatened to migrate and damage additional groundwater sources. The debtor entered into agreements with the state environmental department to remediate the property under the state's water quality act, even though at that time it no longer owned the site. The water quality act permits the state to require clean-up but does not provide for the state to remediate and seek reimbursement. The state's hazardous waste act and CERCLA authorize such a procedure, but the state did not invoke either of those statutes. A claim includes a right to an equitable remedy if breach of performance gives rise to a right to payment.

An environmental injunction is a claim and is therefore dischargeable based on, among other things, whether the pollution is ongoing and whether the enforcing agency has a right to payment in lieu of enforcing the injunction. Whether an enforcing agency has an alternative right to payment depends on the statute under which the agency moves. Even though the agency might have an alternative right to payment under some statute, the court may consider its right to payment only under the statute the agency is using. Otherwise, all environmental injunctions would be dischargeable, because the state (or federal government) always has the right to remediate a site to protect the public health. Here, the state acted only under the water quality act, which did not give it an alternative right to payment. In addition, an injunction aimed at preventing further environmental damage, even directed at a site at which the debtor no longer operates or even owns, is not a claim, as a land owner has no right to pay to pollute. Therefore, the injunction is not a claim and is not dischargeable. Mark IV Indus., Inc. v. New Mexico Enviro. Dept. (In re Mark IV Indus., Inc.), 459 B.R. 173 (S.D.N.Y. 2011).

- 8.4.e Environmental remediation obligation for which the state does not have a damage remedy is nondischargeable. The debtor owned and operated a business for many years. It sold the property on which it operated but continued to operate under an agreement with the buyer for another year. The operations over the years resulted in substantial environmental contamination to the ground. The debtor and the state environment department negotiated a remediation plan, which the debtor began implementing before bankruptcy. The debtor and the department disputed whether remaining pollutants on the property were continuing to migrate to ground water. The state's environmental statute under which the department required the debtor to remediate the pollution, did not permit the department to sue for money damages for clean up expenses, although another statute permitted the department to seek compensation if a polluter did not remediate and the department were required to do so in the polluter's stead. The department filed a proof of claim in the debtor's chapter 11 case. An obligation is dischargeable only if it is a "debt", that is, a liability on a "claim", which is a right to payment or to an equitable remedy if the remedy gives rise to a right to payment. Application of the definition to environmental remediation obligations has bedeviled the courts. The general rule is that an environmental remediation obligation is not a dischargeable debt if the debtor is capable of performing the remediation and if the pollution is on-going or, if it is not on-going, if the environmental agency does not have the option of seeking payment in place of enforcing a remediation decree. Here, the debtor has continued access to the site, through the cooperation of the buyer, to perform remediation. Although it is unclear whether the pollution is on-going, the department does not have the option of pursuing a damages remedy under the statute that it is using to enforce the remediation option. Even though it might have that option under another statute, the absence of a damages remedy under the particular statute disqualifies the obligation from being a debt, and the debt is nondischargeable. Mark IV Indus., Inc. v. N.M. Enviro. Dept. (In re Mark IV Indus., Inc.), 438 B.R. 460 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 8.4.f RCRA cleanup order, which may not be satisfied by payment of money damages, is not a discharged claim. Years after the debtor emerged from a chapter 11 reorganization, the EPA sought an injunction under the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA) ordering the debtor to clean up a major hydrocarbon spill on land the debtor's predecessor in interest formerly owned. The debtor had no internal capability to clean up the spill and would have had to hire an outside firm to perform the work. The debtor's chapter 11 discharge released the debtor from every claim, which is defined as including "a right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance if such breach gives rise to a right to payment". This language applies to an equitable claim that can be satisfied by a money judgment if the equitable remedy is unavailable, for example, if the defendant has already sold the property that was to be conveyed to the plaintiff. To qualify within the definition, the equitable remedy must give rise to a right to payment to the holder of an equitable remedy. Thus, an injunction that requires the defendant to expend funds to a third party to comply, such as the injunction sought here, does not qualify as a "claim" if the plaintiff is not entitled to payment in lieu of the injunction. RCRA permits only an injunction, not a money damage claim, for nonperformance of a cleanup obligation. Therefore, the equitable remedy the EPA sought was not discharged in the debtor's chapter 11 case. The court distinguishes Ohio v. Kovacs, 469 U.S. 274 (1985), on the basis that the defendant there had not complied with the injunction and the state had obtained the appointment of a receiver to obtain the money needed to pay for the cleanup, thereby creating a claim for money damages. U.S. v. Apex Oil Co., 579 F.3d 734 (7th Cir. 2009).

- 8.4.g Nondebtors may not sue asbestos legal representative for determination of non-liability. The debtor's non-debtor subsidiary brought a declaratory judgment action in federal district court against the debtor's future claimants' legal representative, who was appointed in the debtor's chapter 11 case, for a determination that the subsidiaries were not liable to future claimants for the debtor's asbestos liabilities under successor liability or alter ego theories. The legal representative cannot bind future claimants in a nonbankruptcy action, because his appointment is limited to the application of section 524(g) in the bankruptcy case. In addition, he does not act as a guardian ad litem for the future claimants. Therefore, the court dismisses the action. G-I Holdings, Inc. v. Bennet (In re G-I Holdings, Inc.), 328 B.R. 691 (D.N.J. 2005).
- 8.4.h Contingent claim arising under a prepetition indemnification agreement is discharged. Long before bankruptcy and long before the passage of any environmental laws, the debtor acquired real property from the creditor and indemnified the creditor in writing, in very broad language, for any losses relating to the property. Although the creditor filed a proof of claim against the debtor for other matters, it did not file a proof of claim for anything related to the indemnification agreement. After bankruptcy, state environmental laws were enacted that would have made the creditor liable for activities on the property, and the creditor sought indemnification from the debtor. Finding that the claim was a simple contract claim on the indemnification agreement, which arose at the time of the signing of the indemnification agreement, the Second Circuit holds that the contingent claim was discharged in the debtor's bankruptcy. Olin Corp. v. Riverwood Int'l Corp. (In re Manville Forest Products Corp.), 209 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2000).
- 8.4.i Late mass tort claimants permitted to participate in plan settlement fund. The mass tort debtor reorganized, creating a fund for the mass tort claimants, many of whom were not known at the time the chapter 11 plan was confirmed in 1986. Because they were unknown and an exhaustive noticing procedure would have been prohibitively expensive, the court excluded unknown tort claimants from the bar date. In an action twelve years later to require the subsequently identified tort claimants to share in the ample fund rather than pursue claims against the reorganized debtor, the court holds that the claimants have prepetition claims. Because the bar date did not apply to them, they are permitted to file claims, which are not considered late file, and to share in the settlement fund, rather than pursuing full recovery on their claims against the reorganized debtor. Finally, discrediting In re M. Frenville Co., 744 F.2d 332 (3d Cir. 1984), the court holds that the subsequent tort claimants had claims that were discharged by the confirmation order. Emons Industries, Inc. v. Allen (In re Emons Industries, Inc.), 220 B.R. 182 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1998).
- 8.4.j CERCLA claims not discharged; RCRA claims discharged. Applying its decision in In re Chicago, Milwaukee, St. P. & Pac. R.R., 974 F.2d 775 (7th Cir. 1992) (a Bankruptcy Act case) to the Bankruptcy Code chapter 11 case of A.M. International, Inc., the Seventh Circuit ruled that CERCLA response costs of which the claimant was unaware by the time of the bar date in the chapter 11 case were not discharged by the confirmation of the plan. On the other hand, an order under section 7002 of RCRA directing the former debtor to clean up a site cannot, under RCRA, be converted into a monetary obligation, so it is not a claim that was discharged in the debtor's prior chapter 11 case. A.M. International, Inc. v. Datacard Corporation, 106 F.3d 1342 (7th Cir. 1997).

- 8.4.k CERCLA contribution claim discharged in Bankruptcy Act case. The reorganization plan of the Reading Company under section 77 of the former Bankruptcy Act was confirmed with an order that contained a discharge injunction, three weeks after Congress enacted CERCLA. Because the United States EPA had knowledge at the time CERCLA was enacted of the particular hazardous site, of the Reading Company's connection to that site, and of Reading Company's reorganization, the claim was discharged in the case. As a result, the claim of Conrail against the Reading Company for contribution, which relies by its nature on the joint liability of two parties to a third party (in this case, the United States), could not be pursued against the Reading Company. In re Reading Company, 115 F.3d 1111 (3d Cir. 1997).

9. EXECUTORY CONTRACTS

- 9.1.a A deferred payment settlement agreement is not an executory contract. The debtor settled a large claim by agreeing to make installment payments over time. After the debtor completed payments, the creditor would release the claim, but it maintained the claim until the payments were made. Section 365 permits the debtor to assume an executory contract. An executory contract is one under which performance remains due to some extent on both sides, such that a material breach by one party would excuse performance by the other. Under this settlement agreement, the creditor had no obligations it could breach. Therefore, the contract was not executory under section 365, and the debtor in possession may not assume it. In re Svenhard's Swedish Bakery, ___ B.R. ___, 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 3583 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. Dec. 19, 2022).
- 9.1.b Section 365(b)'s "cure, compensate, and assure" provision applies to nonmaterial defaults. The debtor's landlord complained to the debtor of several nonfinancial defaults relating to the debtor's use of the premises. When the landlord threatened enforcement action, the debtor filed a chapter 11 petition. During the case, it paid rent into an escrow account. When the court ruled that it was not entitled to do so, the debtor paid the rent to the landlord and later, upon becoming aware of the requirement, paid the landlord a late payment penalty. The debtor then moved for approval of assumption of the lease. If there has been a default under a lease, section 365(b) conditions approval of assumption of a lease on cure of the default, compensation for any loss occasioned by the default, and adequate assurance of future performance. Because section 365(b) speaks only of a "default," it is not limited to material defaults or defaults that have already been cured. However, where the default is nonfinancial and the only form of adequate assurance is the debtor's reaffirmation of its obligations under the lease, the assumption process adequately provides such assurance. Smart Cap. Invs. I v. Hawkeye Entert., LLC (In re Hawkeye Entert., LLC), 49 F.4th 1232 (9th Cir. Sept. 23, 2022).
- 9.1.c A surety bond is not an executory contract. Before bankruptcy, the debtor obtained surety bonds to guarantee performance of its obligations to mineral rights lessors. The surety's obligations to the lessors were irrevocable, but once it issued the bonds, it had no further obligations to the debtor, only to the guaranteed lessors. In connection with obtaining the bonds, the debtor entered into indemnification agreements with the surety, obligating the debtor to pay the surety or provide collateral under certain circumstances. Under its chapter 11 plan, the debtor assumed all contracts not rejected. The surety bonds were not among the contracts listed for rejection. After the effective date, the reorganized debtor defaulted on some of the leases, the lessors demanded payment from the surety, and the surety demanded the reorganized debtor reimburse it or post collateral. An executory contract is one under which "performance remains due to some extent on both sides and ... the failure of either party to complete performance would constitute a material breach" that would excuse the other party's further performance. Here, whether or not the surety had remaining performance obligation to the debtor, the bonds are irrevocable, so the debtor's failure to perform under the indemnity agreement would not constitute a breach excusing the surety's performance to the lessors. Therefore, the contract is not executory, it was not assumed under the plan, and the surety may not enforce any obligations under the indemnity agreement against the reorganized debtor. Argonaut Ins. Co. v. Falcon V, L.L.C. (In re Falcon V, L.L.C.), 44 F.4th 348 (5th Cir. 2022).

- 9.1.d Assumption is not a ratification. The debtor in possession assumed an executory contract that it alleged was procured by fraud and subject to rescission. Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, ratification waives any right to void or rescind a contract for fraud, but the ratification must be an unequivocal expression of intent to forego any ability to void the contract. Section 365 permits assumption of an executory contract. Although court approval is required, the approval process is a summary proceeding that addresses only the debtor in possession's business judgment and cure of any defaults. Assumption is cum onere—with all burdens and benefits. Therefore, by assumption, the debtor in possession does not lose its right to challenge the validity of the contract. Astria Health v. Cerner Corp. (In re Astria Health), 640 B.R. 758 (Bankr. E.D. Wash. 2022).
- 9.1.e Bankruptcy court may authorize rejection of FERC-regulated filed-rate contract. The debtor natural gas producer had contracted with a pipeline company to transport its gas. They filed the contract with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Under the filed rate doctrine, the contract became legally binding as though FERC had specifically approved it, and it could not be modified or abrogated without FERC's approval. Fearing the debtor might file bankruptcy, the pipeline company sought, and FERC granted, orders determining that it had exclusive jurisdiction over the contract and that the contract could not be rejected in the debtor's bankruptcy case without FERC approval, which would be based on the public interest under its regulatory authority. The next day, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case, and its plan proposed rejection of the contract. The bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction over the debtor's and the estate's property, including contracts. Rejection amounts to a breach, for which damages will lie, nothing more. It does not change or rescind the contract. As such, rejection does not violate the filed rate doctrine, as the counterparty's damage claim is determined based on the filed rate. Therefore, FERC does not have exclusive jurisdiction over rejection of filed rate contracts, and the bankruptcy court may approve rejection. Gulfport Energy Corp. v. F.E.R.C., 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 19986 (5th Cir. July 19, 2022).
- 9.1.f Court approves retroactive approval of lease rejection. The debtor vacated the premises on the lease expiration date, although the landlord claimed the debtor had exercised a lease extension option. The debtor filed a chapter 11 petition six days later. Because of the landlord's extension claim, the debtor in possession filed a motion the day after the petition date for approval of the rejection of the lease, effective as of the petition date or the motion date. The Court of Appeals has approved retroactive approval of lease rejection under section 105(a) on the ground that such an order may be necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of section 365(d)(3) and (4) to encourage prompt surrender of premises and lease rejection. In Roman Catholic Diocese v. Acevedo Feliciano, 140 S. Ct. 696 (2020), in a per curiam opinion that followed prior decisions, the Supreme Court rejected the use of nunc pro tunc orders except to correct the record to reflect what actually happened on an earlier date. However, in other precedents, the Court had also permitted such orders where the delay in issuing an order was due to the court's delay, not the parties', so that neither party would be prejudiced by the courts' delay. The Ninth Circuit was presumably aware of these precedents when it approved retroactive rejection approval. Moreover, retroactive approval is rooted in the Bankruptcy Code because of a court's power under section 105(a), does not "revise" history by a later order, and is necessitated only by the court approval process, not by the parties. Accordingly, the court approves rejection retroactive to the motion date, which is the date on which the debtor in possession unequivocally expressed its decision to reject. In re Player's Poker Club, Inc., 636 B.R. 811 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2022).
- 9.1.g U.S. government may waive Anti-Assignment Act. The debtor leased a hotel and related facilities from a "non-appropriated fund instrumentality" of the United States. The lease and contract prohibited assignment without the government's consent, which consent was not to be unreasonably withheld. The debtor in possession moved for approval of the assumption of the lease and related contracts. Section 365(c) prohibits assumption of a contract that is non-assignable under applicable non-bankruptcy law. The federal Anti-Assignment Act prohibits assignment of a contract with the U.S. government without the government's consent. Under applicable circuit law, the court applies the "hypothetical test" to determine whether the debtor in possession may assume a contract or lease that is otherwise non-assignable. Here, the hypothetical test would ordinarily prohibit contract assumption. But the government may waive the Anti-Assignment Act and may do so prospectively. By limiting its power in the lease to reject assignments, the government waived the assignment prohibition of the Anti-Assignment Act. In re Minesen Co., 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 3178 (Bankr. D. Haw. Nov. 17, 2021).

- 9.1.h Rejection relieves the estate from an arbitration agreement. The debtor's limited partnership agreement provided for arbitration of disputes. The debtor in possession rejected the agreement. Later, it sued some of the limited partners, who demanded arbitration of the claims. Rejection of an executory contract relieves the estate from any specific performance obligation under the contract. An arbitration agreement within a contract is really a separate contract, not merely an enforcement mechanism in the case of a breach. Therefore, rejection relieves the estate from the obligation to arbitrate. Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P. v. Dondero (In re Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P.), ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 3314 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. Dec. 3, 2021).
- 9.1.i Remaining covenants that do not go to a contract's essence do not make the contract executory. The debtor contracted with a movie producer to produce a film, which the producer did. The contract provided for contingent consideration based on the film's profits over time. However, the debtor was not obligated to pay the contingent compensation if the producer was in breach of its continuing obligations not to interfere with the debtor's intellectual property in the film, indemnify the debtor for breach of reps and warranties, and limit assignment of the contract. Six years later, the debtor filed a chapter 11 petition. Under its plan, it sold its business, including the contract with the producer, to a buyer, who refused to pay the producer any arrearages owing under the contract. An executory contract is one under which a party's material breach would excuse the other party's remaining performance. If a party has substantially performed the essence of the contract, that party's future breach is not material. Here, the producer substantially performed the contract obligations by producing and delivering the film. Although the parties can contract around the rule by designating certain obligations as material and providing for termination upon breach, the producer's remaining obligations did not go to the essence of the contract, and their breach would not excuse the debtor's remaining performance. They were merely covenants or conditions precedent to continued payment of contingent consideration. Therefore, the contract was not executory, and the buyer was not required to cure the unpaid prepetition amounts the debtor owed. Spyglass Media Grp., LLC v. Bruce Cohen Prods. (In re Weinstein Co. Holdings, LLC), 997 F.3d 497 (3d Cir. 2021).
- 9.1.j A surety bond is not an executory contract. Before bankruptcy, the debtor obtained surety bonds to guarantee performance of its obligations to mineral rights lessors. The surety's obligations to the lessors were irrevocable, but once it issued the bonds, it had no further obligations to the debtor. In connection with obtaining the bonds, the debtor entered into indemnification agreements with the surety, obligating the debtor to pay the surety or provide collateral under certain circumstances. Under its chapter 11 plan, the debtor assumed all contracts not rejected. The surety bonds were not among the contracts listed for rejection. After the effective date, the reorganized debtor defaulted on some of the leases, the lessors demanded payment from the surety, and the surety demanded the reorganized debtor reimburse it or post collateral. An executory contract is one under which "performance remains due to some extent on both sides and ... if the failure of either party to complete performance would constitute a material breach." Here, the surety had no remaining performance obligation to the debtor, and because the bonds are irrevocable, the debtor's failure to perform under the indemnity agreement would not constitute a breach excusing the surety's performance to the lessors. Therefore, the contract is not executory, it was not assumed under the plan, and the surety may not enforce any obligations under the indemnity agreement against the reorganized debtor. Argonaut Ins. Co. v. Falcon V, L.L.C., ___ B.R. ___, 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 188686 (M.D. La. Sept. 29, 2021).

- 9.1.k Court order enforcing contract makes the contract not executory. The debtor contracted to sell a liquor license. The sale required city council approval, which the contract required the debtor to request. The buyer put the purchase price in escrow, to be released on closing. The debtor breached. The buyer obtained a state court order requiring the debtor to cooperate with the buyer in obtaining approval, make the request to the council, and close the sale upon approval. The debtor made the request but filed a chapter 11 petition three days before the approval hearing and moved for approval to reject the contract. A contract is executory if performance remains on both sides, failure of which would constitute a material breach that would relieve the other party of further performance. When a court orders performance of a contract, any remaining performance obligation of the party is ministerial, because the court may enforce the order and cause the performance. Therefore, a contract obligation that has been reduced to judgment is no longer executory. In addition, applying a purchase price to a contract where the only remaining contingency to doing so is not within the parties' control is a ministerial act. Therefore, the contract itself, regardless of the court order, is not executory. The court denies the rejection motion. In re Bennett Enters., 628 B.R. 481 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2021).
- 9.1.l Rejection terminates granted rights that are useful solely in contract performance. The debtor contracted with a pipeline company to use a pipeline the company was constructing to deliver oil and gas to a collection point. Under the contract, the debtor exclusively dedicated, granted, and committed to the performance of the contract all the debtor's interests in specified mineral leases, all gas and water produced or delivered from the leases, and all the debtor's future interests in certain wells, and agreed not to deliver any gas from those properties to any other pipeline company. Upon filing chapter 11, the debtor in possession moved for court approval to reject the contract. The pipeline company claimed the dedication survived rejection. Under Mission Product Holdings, Inc. v. Tempnology, LLC, 139 S. Ct. 1652 (2019), rejection operates only as a breach and not as a rescission or avoiding power that allows a debtor in possession to recapture rights already granted to the contract counterparty. Here, the contract counterparty cannot use the dedicated and granted rights unless the debtor continues to perform under the contract. Rejection relieves the debtor of future performance, rendering the dedicated rights useless to the counterparty, except as a way to enforce the contract's exclusivity provision, which rejection relieves the debtor from performing. Therefore, the counterparty may not retain the dedicated and granted interests after rejection. Caliber N. Dak., LLC v. Nine Point Energy Holdings, Inc. (Nine Point Energy Holdings, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___ (D. Del. July 30, 2021).
- 9.1.m Specific performance order renders a contract non-executory. The debtor contracted to sell land, subject to town approval of a subdivision. The debtor interfered with the buyer's efforts to obtain town approval. The buyer sued in state court, obtaining a specific performance order requiring the debtor to obtain the zoning variance necessary to gain subdivision approval. The debtor filed a chapter 11 petition and moved to reject the contract. A specific performance judgment cannot be an "executory contract," because the order transforms the parties' unperformed obligations into non-material or ministerial acts to follow the court's order. Here, the order did not require conveyance of title only because title could not be conveyed until the variance and the subdivision approval were obtained. The order implied a requirement to convey title once those conditions were satisfied. Moreover, an obligation to convey title does not render a contract executory, because state law results in an equitable conversion of title once a contract becomes subject to a specific performance order. Therefore, the court denies the debtor's motion to reject the contract. In re Brick House Props., LLC, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 1585 (Bankr. D. Utah June 11, 2021).
- 9.1.n Prepetition contract repudiation renders contract not executory. Six months before bankruptcy, the debtor cancelled the remaining open purchase orders under a supply contract, claiming the supplier had provided parts that did not comply with contract specifications. The supplier disputed the debtor's claim and right to cancel the remaining purchase orders, but the parties did no further business after the cancellation. An executory contract is one under which some performance remains due on both sides. Where a party clearly repudiates a contract, the other party is relieved of any remaining performance obligation. Therefore, the contract is no longer executory. In re Cornerstone Valve LLC, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 1120 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. April 27, 2021).

- 9.1.o Sixth Circuit treats retention of possession under section 365(h) as assumption by the tenant of the lease. The debtor entered into five integrated agreements. One sold a power plant to an operator. A second required the operator to provide power to the debtor. A third leased the land underlying the plant to the operator for $1 per year. And a fourth provided the debtor a guarantee from the operator's parent. In its bankruptcy, the debtor in possession rejected all five agreements. The operator elected under section 365(h) to remain in possession of the leased premises for the lease's remaining term. After the term expired, the debtor's successor, who acquired the land, brought a claim against the parent under its guarantee for environmental damages to the land. Rejection constitutes a breach. Rejection and assumption operate on the contract as a whole, not any single part or provision, including all integrated agreements that are treated as a single contract. Here, when the operator elected to assume the benefits of the lease by remaining in possession for the balance of the term, it also assumed all other obligations under the integrated agreements. Therefore, the parent remained liable on the guarantee, despite the debtor's rejection/breach of the agreements. EPLET, LLC v. DTE Pontiac N., LLC, ___ F.3d ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 253 (6th Cir. Jan. 5, 2021).
- 9.1.p A contingent duty or obligation under a contract may be sufficiently material to render the contract executory. The debtor financed its credit card receivables by selling existing and future receivables to a counterparty under a sale and servicing agreement. In the agreement, the debtor agreed to continue to sell future receivables and to service them. The counterparty agreed to make continuing payments based on the sale of the new receivables. The agreement contained "trigger events," the occurrence of which would terminate the counterparty's obligation to make payments to the debtor, but only temporarily. A debtor in possession may reject an executory contract. An executory contract is one under which the breach of an obligation of one party would excuse the other party's performance. Where the contract provides for termination upon a party's breach of an obligation, the obligation is a material one for these purposes. Where an obligation's termination is temporary, subject to reinstatement upon the obligee's cure, the obligation remains material for these purposes. A contingent obligation is also sufficient to render a contract executory. Therefore, the sale and servicing agreement is an executory contract the DIP may reject. In re Avianca Holdings S.A., 618 B.R. 684 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2020).
- 9.1.q Lehman flip clauses are safe harbored and enforceable. The debtor entered into several transactions involving a credit default swap between the debtor and synthetic collateralized debt obligation SPVs (issuers), which issued notes under an indenture. The notes' proceeds were held as collateral for the issuers' obligations under both the notes and the swaps. The swaps provided that payments under were subject to the priority provisions of the indentures. The indentures contained a waterfall specifying which party would receive collateral proceeds based on the event that triggered the collateral liquidation and distribution. Because the debtor defaulted by its bankruptcy, the priority favored the noteholders, whereas it would have favored the debtor if the noteholders had defaulted. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, indenture trustees for some of the note issues sent a notice of default and termination under the swaps. After termination, the indenture trustees liquidated the collateral and distributed the proceeds to the noteholders. An executory contract is a contract under which the obligations of the debtor and the counterparty are so far unperformed that the failure of either to complete performance would constitute a material breach excusing performance of the other. The swaps' outstanding payment obligations make them executory contracts. Section 365(e) prohibits the enforcement after the commencement of the debtor's case of a contractual provision that modifies or terminates a debtor's rights under an executory contract based on "the commencement of a case under this title.” However, section 560 exempts swap agreements from the prohibition of section 365(e) and permits “termination, liquidation, or acceleration” of a swap agreement. A swap agreement includes terms and conditions incorporated by reference. Because the swap incorporated the indenture’s priority provisions by reference, they were protected by the section 560 safe harbor. “Liquidation” is not limited to determining the amount of the claims under the swap (liquidating the claim amount), but rather includes liquidating any collateral and distributing proceeds. Otherwise, the safe harbor would be of little benefit to swap counterparties. Lehman Bros. Special Financing Inc. v. Branch Banking & Tr. Co. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 970 F.3d 91 (2d Cir. 2020).

- 9.1.r Surety bond is not an executory contract. Before bankruptcy, the debtor obtained surety bonds to secure performance obligations under various agreements. At the petition date, the debtor had not defaulted under the agreements. The surety filed a proof of claim for a contingent unliquidated amount. The plan did not list the surety bond agreements as rejected but provided that all executory contracts that were not rejected were assumed. After the plan effective date, the reorganized debtor missed payments on some of the bonds. The surety demanded additional collateral. The debtor refused. An executory contract is one for which performance remains due to some extent on both sides and if at the petition date, the failure of either party to complete performance would constitute a material breach excusing the other party’s performance. A surety bond is a tripartite agreement among the debtor, the surety, and the debtor’s contract counterparty. The surety agrees to pay the counterparty if the debtor defaults but owes no further performance to the debtor. Therefore, the surety bond is not an executory contract. In re Falcon V, L.L.C., 620 B.R. 256 (M.D. La. 2020).
- 9.1.s Unscheduled executory contract is deemed rejected after 60 days. The chapter 7 individual debtor had a two-year contract for satellite service. In her schedules, she listed an unpaid amount owing to the satellite company but not the contract. An executory contract the trustee does not assume within 60 days after the order for relief is automatically rejected. The rejection is automatic, whether or not the debtor listed the contract as an executory contract on Schedule G, as long as the counterparty is listed as a creditor so the trustee has notice of the relationship, the creditor had notice of the bankruptcy, and the failure to list was not to intentionally conceal the contract. Rejection is a breach of the contract; the resulting damage claim is determined as those it arose immediately before the commencement of the case. A discharge releases the debtor from all debts that arose prepetition or that are determined as if they arose prepetition. Because the debtor listed the satellite company, the trustee had notice of the relationship, the company had notice of the bankruptcy, and the debtor did not intentionally conceal the contract, the contract was deemed rejected after 60 days, and the debtor was discharged from all obligations under the contract. Medley v. Dish Network, LLC, 958 F.3d 1063 (11th Cir. 2020).
- 9.1.t Shopping center lease assignment financial condition requirements are independent of the lease’s assignment terms. The debtor in possession proposed to assign a shopping center anchor tenant lease to a newly-formed entity. The lease gave the tenant broad latitude in assigning or subletting the premises, not requiring the assignee to use the premises for anything similar to the tenant’s business and not containing any tenant mix restriction. But the lease imposed a financial restriction—the landlord would release the tenant from liability after an assignment only if the assignee had a minimum net worth. Section 365(f) permits a debtor in possession to assign a real property lease but requires, among other things, that the assignee provide adequate assurance of future performance. Section 365(b)(3) imposes additional requirements on assignment of a shopping center lease—(A) that the assignee’s financial condition and operating performance be similar to the debtor’s when the lease was signed, and (D) that assignment will not disrupt any tenant mix or balance in the shopping center. The statute does not define the phrase “tenant mix and balance.” Therefore, because the tenancy contemplated by the lease is part of the center’s tenant mix, the court may construe the phrase by reference to any tenant mix or balance requirements in the lease, regardless of the debtor’s particular use of the premises. The assignee here met that requirement. However, subparagraph (A) requires a specific financial condition of the assignee as a condition to assignment—similarity to the debtor's financial condition and operating performance at the time of the original lease. Lease provisions relating to future assignment do not override subparagraph (A)'s specific requirements. Those provisions are independent requirements for assignment. Even though the assignee appeared to meet the lease conditions for release of liability upon assignment, the assignee did not meet the independent statutory requirements. Therefore, the court denies the motion to assign. MOAC Mall Holdings LLC v. Transform Holdco LLC (In re Sears Holdings Corp.), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34717 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 27, 2020).

- 9.1.u A gas gathering and production agreement can be a covenant running with the land. The debtor had a lease of mineral rights, including an easement to access the minerals. It entered into an agreement with the creditor to construct an oil and gas gathering system. Under the agreement, the debtor granted the creditor an easement over its own easement to build the system and agreed to deliver all minerals extracted from the lease to the creditor at specified prices. The agreements state they are covenants running with the land and are intended to bind successors. The parties recorded the agreements in the land records office. Section 365 permits a debtor in possession to reject an executory contract but not a covenant running with the land, despite on-going performance obligations under such a covenant. A covenant runs with the land under Oklahoma law if the agreement touches and concerns real property, the covenanting parties are in privity, and the parties intend the covenant to bind successors. A covenant touches and concerns real property if there is a logical connection between the benefit to be derived from enforcement and the property, that is, if the covenant affects the value of the owner's interest in the land. In this case, the gathering agreement enhances the debtor's ability to sell extracted minerals and also restricts the debtor's ability to sell the minerals it extracts from its leasehold, which is real property, and therefore affects the value of the leasehold. Therefore, the covenant touches and concerns the leasehold. Because the debtor transferred an easement to the creditor in connection with the agreement, the parties are in horizontal privity. Finally, the agreement provides that the parties intend successors to be bound. Therefore, the gathering agreement is a covenant that runs with the debtor's real property interest and may not be rejected. Alta Mesa Holdings, LP v. Kingfisher Midstream, LLC (In re Alta Mesa Res., Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 3859 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Dec. 20, 2019).
- 9.1.v A gas gathering and production agreement can be a covenant running with the land. The debtor owned land with mineral rights. It sold a portion of the land. The debtor and buyer entered into a gas gathering and production agreement under which the buyer would gather and process for sale the natural gas the debtor produced from the debtor's land. The agreement stated the parties' intent that it was a covenant running with the debtor's land. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession moved to sell the land free and clear of the agreement. Under applicable law (Utah), a covenant runs with the land if it touches and concerns the land, there is privity of estate between the initial covenantor and covenantee, the parties intend the covenant to run with the land, and the covenant is in writing. The agreement itself satisfied the latter three requirements. The touch-and-concern requirement requires the covenant to enhance or burden the land's value or that "its performance or nonperformance will so affect the use, value or enjoyment of the land itself that it must be regarded as an integral part of the property." Because the agreement directly diminishes the debtor's interest in the mineral rights, the covenant touches and concerns the land. Section 363(f) permits sale free and clear of an interest in property if, among other things, the property could be sold under applicable nonbankruptcy law free and clear or the interest holder could be compelled to accept a money satisfaction. A covenant that runs with the land is an integral part of the property, so neither of those conditions apply. Section 365 permits assumption of an executory contract but requires cure of pre-assumption defaults. A covenant that runs with the land is not an executory contract, because it is an integral part of the land. Therefore, the buyer need not cure the debtor's pre-assumption defaults. Monarch Midstream, LLC v. Badlands Prod. Co. (In re Badlands Prod. Co.), 608 B.R. 854 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2019).
- 9.1.w Bankruptcy court has paramount jurisdiction over rejection of FERC-regulated power purchase agreement. The debtor had entered into several power purchase agreements that it no longer needed, because its reorganization contemplated its exit from the business of selling electricity at retail. Upon filing its chapter petition, it sought to enjoin FERC from any action regarding the contracts, including any proceeding to prevent rejection in the chapter 11 case or to require the debtor to perform the contracts. Under the filed rate doctrine, a contract that is subject to FERC regulation and that is filed with FERC has been held to be like a federal regulation over which FERC has exclusive jurisdiction and that FERC may enforce by a specific performance order. However, because of chapter 11's strong policy favoring financial rehabilitation, FERC's jurisdiction must yield in part. Accordingly, for purposes of the Bankruptcy Code, a filed rate contract is an ordinary contract that is susceptible to rejection, and the bankruptcy court has concurrent jurisdiction with FERC to determine whether a contract may be rejected. Because of the importance of reorganization and the role Congress has given the bankruptcy court, its jurisdiction is primary, while FERC may still exercise jurisdiction over matters other than whether the debtor in possession may reject the contract, and may be heard on public interest issues in the bankruptcy court. And because of Congress's policy under the Federal Power Act to regulate power contracts, in determining whether to authorize rejection, the bankruptcy court must apply a higher standard than the business judgment standard, considering the impact of assumption or rejection on the public interest, including the effect on consumers and tangential contract provisions to ensure the equities balance in favor of the court's decision. F.E.R.C. v. FirstEnergy Solutions Corp. (In re FirstEnergy Solutions Corp.), 945 F.3d 431 (6th Cir. 2019).

- 9.1.x Medicaid provider agreement is not an executory contract. In its chapter 11 case, a hospital moved to sell all its assets and to transfer its state Medicaid provider agreements. The state objected on the ground that the provider agreements were executory contracts and could not be assigned without assumption and cure of substantial outstanding amounts as required under section 365. A provider agreement is a mechanism by which a hospital may receive payments from the state for medical services. Its terms are entirely governed by statute and regulation, impose only statutory and regulatory obligations on the provider, and impose no obligations on the state. As such, the provider agreements are not contracts but are statutory entitlements or licenses that may be sold under section 363, free and clear of any claims. In re Verity Health Sys. Of Calif., Inc., 606 B.R. 843 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2019).
- 9.1.y An ipso facto clause in tail coverage on a prepetition D&O policy is unenforceable. The debtor had a directors' and officers' liability insurance policy that permitted it to purchase "tail" or run-off coverage. The policy expired shortly after the petition date, but the carrier renewed the policy for another year. Within a month, the debtor in possession purchased three-year tail coverage as an endorsement to the policy. The endorsement excluded certain claims related to bankruptcy or insolvency. A liquidating trust sued directors for claims based on events that led to the bankruptcy. The carrier denied coverage, based on the exclusion. Section 365(e) prohibits termination or modification of any rights under an executory contract based on the insolvency or financial condition of the debtor—an ipso facto clause. As of the petition date, the policy was an executory contract, and the renewal was merely an extension of the contract, not a new contract. The tail coverage arose from an endorsement and therefore was also a part of the original policy, not a separate contract. As such, the ipso facto clause prohibition applied to the policy. Because the exclusion was based on the insolvency or financial condition of the debtor, it was unenforceable, and coverage applied. CMH Liquidating Trust v. Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. (In re Community Mem. Hosp.), ___ B.R. ___ (E.D. Mich. July 23, 2019) (unrept'd).
- 9.1.z Rejection is a breach, not a rescission. The debtor gave a distributor a time-limited non-exclusive limited license to use the debtor's trademarks. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession rejected the agreement with the distributor, who then asserted its rights under section 365(n) to retain licensed intellectual property. Section 365(n) provides that a licensee under a rejected license of intellectual property may retain its rights to the licensed intellectual property. However, rejection is not rescission; under section 365(g), it is only a breach, effective as of immediately before the commencement of the case. After rejection, the same consequences follow as apply under applicable nonbankruptcy law after a breach. A breach does not permit a breaching trademark licensor to rescind a trademark license. Therefore, the licensee retains all rights granted under the contract. Mission Prod. Holdings, Inc. v. Tempnology, LLC, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 1652 (2019).

- 9.1.aa FERC does not have concurrent jurisdiction over an electric utility DIP's rejection of an executory power purchase agreement. As required by applicable state law, the electric utility debtor announced its intention to file a chapter 11 petition 15 days before filing. During that 15-day period, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission issued an order finding that it had concurrent jurisdiction with the bankruptcy court over whether the debtor in possession may reject any of its power purchase agreements and whether the DIP and the reorganized debtor may be required, despite rejection, to continue to perform as required in the public interest. After the chapter 11 petition, the DIP sought declaratory relief that the bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction to authorize rejection under section 365 and to determine the effect of rejection. Section 365 grants the bankruptcy court authority to authorize rejection. Any concurrent jurisdiction in FERC that permits FERC to order continued performance would effectively undo the effect of rejection by converting the obligation arising from breach of the contract into a obligation treated the same as the obligations under an assumed contract. Therefore, FERC's order violates the Bankruptcy Code and is unenforceable in the chapter 11 case. PG&E Corp. v. F.E.R.C. (In re PG&E Corp.), ___ B.R. ___, case no. 19-30088 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. June 7, 2019).
- 9.1.bb A postpetition tail D&O policy is a continuation of a prepetition insurance policy and subject to section 365. The debtor purchased a one-year directors' and officers' liability insurance policy before bankruptcy. It expired shortly after the petition date. The debtor in possession renewed the policy for one year and soon thereafter purchased a three-year tail policy, which would cover claims made during the three-year period. Each policy was identical, except for dates of coverage and premium amount, and each contained an endorsement that excluded coverage for acts that resulted in insolvency or bankruptcy. The prepetition policy was an executory contract of the debtor. Under section 365(e), an executory contract provision that modifies or terminated the contract based on the debtor's insolvency, bankruptcy, or financial condition is unenforceable. Section 365(e) does not apply to a postpetition contract. However, here, because the postpetition policy was a mere continuation of the prepetition policy, both policies gave the insured the right to purchase the tail coverage, and the tail coverage was an endorsement to the postpetition policy, the tail coverage was a continuation of the prepetition policy to which section 365 should apply. CMH Liq. Trust v. Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. (In re Community Memorial Hosp.), ___ B.R. ___ (E.D. Mich. July 23, 2019).
- 9.1.cc Deemed rejection in a chapter 7 case under section 365(d)(1) applies to unscheduled contracts and leases. Before bankruptcy, the debtor settled patent litigation that claimed the debtor's machines infringed a patent. Under the settlement, the debtor received a license to use its machines for a royalty. The debtor did not list the license agreements in its schedules or statements of financial affairs. More than 60 days after the debtor's chapter 7 petition, the trustee sold the debtor's assets to its secured lender. The sale included a generic assignment under section 365 of all executory contracts. The licensor later learned of the sale and sought to enjoin the purchaser's use of the machines. Under section 365(d)(1), an executory contract is deemed rejected in a chapter 7 case if the trustee does not assume it within 60 days after the order for relief. Unlike section 554 which addresses abandonment of property and does not apply to contracts and leases, section 365(d)(1) does not contain an exception for contracts or leases the debtor does not schedule. Therefore, the licenses were deemed rejected before the sale. RPD Holdings, L.L.C. v. Tech Pharmacy Servs. (In re Provider Meds, L.L.C.), 907 F.3d 845 (5th Cir. 2018).
- 9.1.dd Ordinary course modification of ordinary course executory contract does not require court approval. The debtor had contracted in the ordinary course of its business to manufacture a boat for a buyer. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession and the buyer agreed to modify the specifications for the boat. Section 365 permits the DIP to assume or reject an executory contract. It provides the DIP a one-sided option to deal with the contract; the counterparty remains bound until the DIP elects. When the DIP and the counterparty agree to modify a contract, the DIP no longer wields section 365's coercive powers, so the protections of the counterparty are not necessary. Where the contract and the modification are in the ordinary course of the debtor's business, section 363(c) permits the DIP to modify the contract. The court enforces the modification and permits the buyer to take possession of the board in accordance with the modified contract. In re Stiletto Mfg., Inc., 588 B.R. 762 (Bankr. E.D. N.C. 2018).

- 9.1.ee Chapter 7's automatic rejection of an executory contract after 60 days prevents assumption and assignment. The debtor did not schedule a license agreement. The chapter 7 trustee sold all the debtor's assets, including all executory contracts, more than 60 days after the case's conversion to chapter 7. The licensor later sued the buyer for infringing the licensor's intellectual property rights by using them without a license. Section 365(d) provides that an executory contract is automatically rejected 60 days after the order for relief in a chapter 7 case, unless the court extends the 60-day period. Because the sale occurred more than 60 days after the chapter 7 order for relief, the license agreement was automatically rejected and no longer property of the estate. The trustee had no authority to sell it. The debtor's failure to schedule the license does not affect the 60-day period, because the trustee is responsible to investigate the debtor's financial affairs, whether or not scheduled. Therefore, the buyer acquired no rights in the license. RPD Holdings, L.L.C. v. Tech Pharmacy Servs. (In re Provider Meds, L.L.C.), ___ F.3d ___, 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 30600 (5th Cir. Oct. 29, 2018).
- 9.1.ff Contract rejection releases the nondebtor counterparty from any liability for a postpetition breach. The liquidating trustee under a chapter 11 plan sued the debtor's supplier for postpetition violations of the supply agreement, which the debtor in possession had rejected during the chapter 11 case. After the petition date, an executory contract is enforceable by the debtor in possession but not against the debtor in possession. Rejection of the contract constitutes a breach as of the time immediately before the filing of the petition. A breach relieves the counterparty of any future performance obligations. As a result, the rejection relieved the supplier of any liability for postpetition breach, even a breach that occurred before actual rejection. Lauter v. Citgo Petroleum Corp., ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21065 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 8, 2018).
- 9.1.gg Rejection terminates licensee's right to use licensed trademark. The debtor in possession rejected a contract that provided the counterparty a perpetual, royalty-free, non-exclusive license of patents and technology, an exclusive distributorship of certain products within a limited territory, and a license to use the debtor's trademark. Section 365(g) treats rejection as a breach, converting rights under the contract to a prepetition damages claim. However, section 365(n) permits an intellectual property licensee, in lieu of accepting a damages claim, "to retain its rights (including a right to enforce any exclusivity provision of such contract ...) ... to such intellectual property." As defined in section 101, "'intellectual property' means trade secret, invention, process, design, or plan protected under title 35, patent application, plant variety, work of authorship protected under title 17, or mask work protected under chapter 9 of title 17." Section 365(n) addresses only intellectual property, as defined. Therefore, the "exclusivity" provision referenced in the parenthetical applies only to license exclusivity provisions for intellectual property, not all exclusivity provisions in the contract, such as distribution rights. Therefore, section 365(n) does not protect the licensee's exclusive distributorship rights. The "intellectual property" definition does not include trademarks. Rejection relieves the estate of performance obligations to unburden a reorganizing debtor or enhance the value of assets sold to a third party. A trademark license requires the licensor to monitor quality and otherwise protect the mark, else the licensor forfeits the mark. Allowing the licensee to retain trademark use after rejection would undermine a central purpose of section 365, because it would impose on the estate the continued monitoring obligations. Therefore, section 365(n) does not override section 365's general applicability to trademarks, and rejection terminates the licensee's right to use the trademark. Mission Prod. Holdings, Inc. v. Tempnology, LLC (In re Tempnology, LLC), 879 F.3d 389 (1st Cir. 2018).

- 9.1.hh Rejection of distributorship agreement terminates distribution rights but not right to use licensed trademark. The debtor gave a distributor time-limited exclusive rights to distribute its patented and trademarked products within a territory. It also granted a non-exclusive, perpetual, irrevocable, fully-paid license to exploit its products, inventions, designs, works of authorship, and other intellectual property and separately granted a non-exclusive limited license to use the debtor's trademarks during the distribution period. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession rejected the agreement with the distributor, who then asserted its rights under section 365(n) to retain licensed intellectual property. Section 365(n) provides that a licensee under a rejected license of intellectual property may retain its rights to the licensed intellectual property. The agreement here deals with more than an intellectual property license. The licensee's right to retain its intellectual property rights does not extend to all rights under the agreement. Therefore, the licensee's section 365(n) rights do not protect its distribution rights. The Code's definition of "intellectual property" does not include trademarks. Therefore, section 363(n) does not protect a licensee's right to continue to use trademarks after rejection. However, rejection is not rescission; under section 365(g), it is only a breach. Outside of bankruptcy, a breach does not terminate a licensee's right to use a trademark; following Sunbeam Prods., Inc. v. Chicago Am. Mfg, LLC, 686 F.3d 372 (7th Cir. 2012), the result does not differ in bankruptcy. Therefore, the licensee retains the right to use the trademark after rejection. Mission Prods. Holdings, Inc. v. Old Cold, LLC (In re Old Cold, LLC), 559 B.R. 809 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2016).
- 9.1.ii Waiver of commodity contract ipso facto clause might also waive safe harbor protection. The debtor supplied a commodity to its customer under a five-year contract. The contract permitted the customer to terminate the contract for the debtor's insolvency or bankruptcy under a standard ipso facto clause. In connection with the debtor's bond issuance, the customer agreed that it would not terminate the supply contract under the ipso facto clause for bankruptcy if the debtor was performing all its contractual obligations. After the debtor's bankruptcy, the customer claimed that the debtor had not performed and sought to terminate the contract under the ipso facto clause. Section 556 permits a contract counterparty who is a commodity broker or forward contract merchant to terminate a commodity contract "because of a condition of the kind specified in section 365(e)(1)" despite section 365(e)'s prohibition on such termination. The conditions specified in section 365(e) include insolvency and bankruptcy and the other terms in a standard ipso facto clause. Here, the supplier had waived the right to terminate under the ipso facto clause if the debtor was performing and therefore sought to terminate only because of the debtor's alleged nonperformance. Nonperformance is not a condition of the kind specified in section 365(e). Therefore, section 556's safe harbor did not apply to permit termination. In re La. Pellets, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 2679 (Bankr. W.D. La. Jul. 22, 2016).
- 9.1.jj Tenant who remains in possession under rejected lease may recoup amounts owing from debtor in possession landlord from the rent reserved under the lease. The debtor leased a portion of its premises for a nightclub. The lease required the tenant to pay percentage rent and to pay the debtor for capital improvements to the space and required the landlord to pay the tenant a portion of the capital expenses to the extent the percentage rent exceed specified thresholds. The debtor in possession rejected the lease. The tenant elected under section 365(h) to remain in possession. The debtor in possession then sold the real property free and clear of all claims and interests except for the tenant's rights under section 365(h). Section 365(h) permits a tenant to remain in possession of a leasehold under a rejected lease and, as its sole remedy, offset any damages resulting from the landlord's post-rejection nonperformance against the rent reserved under the lease. Rejection is a debtor's determination not to perform, not a termination, and does not alter the parties' substantive rights. Rejection relieves the debtor landlord from its affirmative obligations under the lease, other than the obligation to allow continued possession and the tenant's use and quiet enjoyment, except to the extent that failure to perform would interfere with the tenant's possession, use and quiet enjoyment. But rejection does not relieve the tenant of its obligations under the lease if it remains in possession. Recoupment allows one party to reduce its payment obligation to another for amounts the other owes it arising from the same transaction. Here, the lease required the landlord to reimburse the tenant a portion of the capital expenses. Although the sale of the premises was free and clear of all claims and interests, the tenant's recoupment right under the lease arises from the same transaction that gives rise to its rent obligation. Therefore, the tenant may recoup its claim for that payment from the rent it owes under the lease. IDEA Boardwalk, LLC v. Polo N. Country Club, Inc. (In re Revel AC, Inc.), 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 3805 (Bankr. D.N.J. Oct. 21, 2016).

9.1.kk Ipsa facto clause invalidation does not apply to a cross-default caused by the debtor's parent's filing. The debtor entered into several transactions involving a credit default swap between the debtor and synthetic collateralized debt obligation SPVs (issuers), which issued notes under an indenture. The notes' proceeds were held as collateral for the issuers' obligations under both the notes and the swaps. Some security agreements (Type 1) provided that the security interest of the debtor, as swap counterparty, had priority over the security interest of the noteholders, unless the debtor defaulted under the swap and amounts became payable after sale of the collateral, in which case the priority "flipped" to the noteholders. Other security agreements (Type 2) did not specify whether the debtor or the noteholders had priority rights in the collateral but specified in a waterfall which party would receive collateral proceeds based on the event that triggered the collateral liquidation and distribution. The debtor's parent guaranteed the debtor's performance under the swaps. The parent filed bankruptcy, defaulting the swaps. The debtor filed bankruptcy three weeks later. Indenture trustees for some of the note issues sent a notice of default under the swaps upon the parent's bankruptcy filing; others waited until after the debtor's filing. After termination, the indenture trustees liquidated the collateral and distributed the proceeds to the noteholders. An executory contract is a contract under which the obligations of the debtor and the counterparty are so far unperformed that the failure of either to complete performance would constitute a material breach excusing performance of the other. The swaps' outstanding payment obligations make them executory contracts. Section 365(e) prohibits the enforcement after the commencement of the debtor's case of a contractual provision that modifies or terminates a debtor's rights under an executory contract based on "the commencement of a case under this title." Because the prohibition applies after the commencement of the debtor's case, it does not prohibit prepetition modification based on the parent's earlier bankruptcy case. Accordingly, the court refuses to apply the "singular event" theory suggested in dictum in Lehman Bros. Special Financing Inc. v. BNY Corp. Trustee Servs. Ltd. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 422 B.R. 407 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010). Therefore, termination notices given before the commencement of the debtor's case did not modify any rights after the commencement of the case and do not violate section 365(e)'s anti-ipsa facto provisions. However, a termination notice given after commencement in a Type 1 transaction does violate section 365(e), because it flips priority and therefore modifies rights postpetition. A postpetition termination notice in a Type 2 transaction does not, because the priority is not established until the event of default occurs and the termination notice is given, so there is no postpetition modification. Lehman Bros. Special Financing Inc. v. Bank of Am., N.A. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 553 B.R. 476 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016).

9.1.ii Court authorizes contract rejection under business judgment standard in dueling bankruptcies. The debtor in possession moved to reject an executory contract. The contract counterparty, a debtor in possession in an unrelated case in a different district, had moved in its case to assume the contract. The "business judgment" standard governs the court's approval of contract rejection; a "balancing of the equities" test does not apply. The business judgment standard does not consider rejection's effect on the contract counterparty, even if the counterparty is a debtor in possession in its own bankruptcy. Therefore, once the debtor in possession shows that rejection is based on a sound exercise of business judgment, the court may authorize rejection, despite the counterparty's bankruptcy. The parties did not address whether rejection might violate the stay in the other case. In re Noranda Aluminum, Inc., 549 B.R. 725 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2016).

- 9.1.mm Contingent self-executing release obligation is a material obligation for the purpose of determining whether a contract is executory. The debtor condominium developer and the homeowners association settled disputes by agreeing that the debtor would transfer common areas to the association, and that the association, upon delivery of the deed, automatically releases the debtor. Before it delivered the deed, the debtor filed a bankruptcy petition and moved to reject the contract. A contract is executory if material performance remains on both sides, such that one party's failure to perform would excuse the other's performance. Here, the debtor has the material obligation to convey the property, while the association has the material obligation to release the debtor. A contingent obligation remains an obligation, even though the contingency might not occur. The self-executing nature of an obligation does not affect whether it remains executory, because it remains a duty. Here, the contingent nature of the duty to release and its self-executing nature do not render the contract non-executory. In re Spoverlook, LLC, 551 B.R. 481 (Bankr. D.N.M. 2016).
- 9.1.nn Trustee may reject pre-paid contract for legal services and recover unused fees. The debtor paid his attorney a non-refundable, earned-upon-receipt $60,000 retainer before bankruptcy to defend expected nondischargeability litigation. The engagement agreement required the debtor to pay costs and expenses that the attorney incurred in the defense. After bankruptcy, the trustee rejected the engagement agreement and demanded a refund of the retainer. Section 541(a)(1) includes as property of the estate any interest of the debtor in property. Because the debtor paid the retainer in full before bankruptcy and the attorney was entitled to it under nonbankruptcy law, the retainer was not property of the estate. However, the debtor's right to legal services became property of the estate. An executory contract is one under which material performance remains due on both sides, such that one party's failure to perform would excuse the other party's performance. The attorney had the continuing obligation to defend the litigation; the debtor had the obligation to pay costs and expenses. Both obligations were material. Therefore, the contract was executory, and the trustee may reject it. Rejection constitutes a breach, not a termination or a rescission. The estate's rights under the contract against the counterparty remain. In this case, those rights include a right to a refund of the "unused" portion of the retainer. Therefore, the attorney must pay the trustee the amount "remaining" on the retainer as of the date the trustee terminated the attorney's services. Ulrich v. Schian Walker, P.L.C. (In re Boates), 551 B.R. 428 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2016), reh'g denied, 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 2541 (9th Cir. B.A.P., July 8, 2016).
- 9.1.oo Aircraft surrender under section 1110 does not require compliance with lease surrender terms. Shortly after commencement of the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession moved to reject aircraft leases and surrender the leased airframes and engines. The debtor had changed engines on some of the airframes, so some leased airframes had engines that were not leased from the same lessor, and the originally matching airframes and engines were in different locations. Section 1110(c) requires the debtor in possession to surrender and return equipment immediately under a lease rejected under section 365. However, it requires no more. Section 365's purpose is to permit the estate to abandon burdensome property and to excuse compliance with burdensome obligations. Requiring the debtor in possession to comply with burdensome lease provisions after lease rejection would be inconsistent with that purpose. Therefore, the debtor in possession may make the equipment available to the lessor as is, where is, for the lessor to pick up. The court rules that any claim the lessor might have from the debtor in possession's noncompliance with the lease surrender provisions should be addressed in the claims allowance process, not as part of the lease rejection. In re Republic Airways Holdings Inc., 547 B.R. 578 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016).

- 9.1.pp Debtor in possession may reject midstream oil & gas gathering agreement, which does not run with the land. The debtor had entered into an agreement with a midstream gas processor. Under the agreement, the debtor “dedicated” to the agreement’s performance all the gas it produced from a designated area and agreed to deliver the gas to the processor. The processor agreed to gather, treat and re-deliver the gas to the debtor using a facility the processor agreed to construct on a mutually agreed tract of land the debtor transferred under a separate conveyance. The debtor agreed to make monthly payments and to deliver a minimum amount of gas or make deficiency payments. The gathering agreement stated the debtor’s dedication to the processor of the gas to the agreement’s performance and its obligation to pay the gathering fee were covenants running with the land. The debtor in possession moved to reject the gathering agreement as an executory contract. A debtor in possession may not reject a covenant running with the land, because the covenant is part of the real property conveyance. For a covenant to run with the land, it must, among other requirements, result from “horizontal privity” and touch and concern the land. Horizontal privity requires simultaneous existing interests or mutual privity between the original parties to a conveyance. A covenant touches and concerns the land if it affects the nature, quality or value of the estate in the land or reduces the promisor’s legal rights in the land and increases the value of the promisee’s interest as owner of the land. The debtor’s obligations here did not arise from its conveyance to the processor, did not reserve any rights in the land in a conveyance and did not convey any real property rights to the processor. The processor’s rights are only in the gas extracted from the land; extracted minerals are not real property under applicable state law. The debtor’s dedication of the gas to the processor affects only the minerals extracted from the land, not the land itself. Therefore, the debtor’s obligations under the gathering agreement are not covenants running with the land. (The court issues its ruling only as a preliminary ruling for the parties’ guidance, because a determination of property rights under an executory contract or of disputed facts requires an adversary proceeding.) In re Sabine Oil & Gas Corp., 547 B.R. 66 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016), aff’d sub nom. HPIP Gonzales Holdings, LLC v. Sabine Oil & Gas Corp. (In re Sabine Oil & Gas Corp), 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38204 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 10, 2017).
- 9.1.qq Section 365(n) does not protect an exclusive right to distribute patented products. The debtor granted a distributor the exclusive right to market and distribute its patented products within a defined territory. The agreement also granted the distributor a nonexclusive license to use, reproduce, modify and create derivative works based on the debtor’s products. The debtor in possession moved to reject the agreement. Section 365(n) permits a licensee of intellectual property under a rejected contract to retain its right to use the intellectual property free from the trustee’s interference. Section 365(n) protection is limited to intellectual property rights, not to distribution rights. Section 365(n) does not convert an exclusive right to sell patented products into a protected right to the intellectual property itself. Therefore, the distributor does not retain the exclusive distribution right after the debtor in possession’s rejection of the agreement. However, it retains the nonexclusive right to use, reproduce, modify and create derivative works based on the debtor’s products, because those arise from the debtor’s intellectual property license to the distributor. In re Tempnology, LLC, 541 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D.N.H. 2015).
- 9.1.rr Section 1113 permits rejection of an expired collective bargaining agreement. The National Labor Relations Act prohibits an employer from changing terms and conditions of employment unilaterally after a collective bargaining agreement’s expiration unless the employer and the union have bargained to impasse. The debtor’s collective bargaining agreement expired a few days after it filed its chapter 11 petition. After an unsuccessful attempt to negotiate modifications, the debtor in possession moved to reject its obligations under the CBA. Section 1113 permits the trustee to reject a collective bargaining agreement after complying with notice, information, negotiation and court approval processes, giving the bankruptcy judge the authority to balance the needs of the reorganization against the labor interests that the NLRA protects. If section 1113 did not apply to an expired CBA whose obligations the NLRA continues, the bankruptcy judge would lose that authority to the NLRB, contrary to Congress’ intent to place authority in the bankruptcy court to facilitate reorganization. Therefore, section 1113 applies to the employer's on-going obligations that the NLRA imposes after expiration of a CBA. In re Trump Entertainment Resorts, 810 F.3d 161 (3d Cir. 2016).

- 9.1.ss Section 502(b)(6) lease termination damages cap does not apply to amounts that would have been owing had the lease not been terminated. The lessee breached the lease before bankruptcy. The landlord obtained a judgment in state court against the lessee and the guarantor for unpaid rent, pre- and post-judgment interest, and attorneys' fees. The landlord obtained an additional judgment against the guarantor for recovery of a fraudulent transfer from the lessee. The guarantor filed a chapter 11 case. The landlord filed a proof of claim for amounts owing on the lease judgment and on the fraudulent transfer judgment. Section 502(b)(6) caps a landlord's claim "for damages resulting from the termination of a lease of real property." To determine whether a claim arising from a prepetition lease termination is subject to the cap, the court should ask whether, assuming all other conditions remain constant, the landlord would have the same claim against the tenant if the lease had not been terminated. If so, then the claim does not arise from termination. Here, the landlord would have a claim for pre-termination rent and interest and for attorneys' fees related to prepetition rent, even if the lease had not been terminated. The landlord would not have had a claim for post-termination future rent or for interest on that amount. The fraudulent transfer claim amount duplicates the breach of lease judgment amount and is separately disallowed for that reason. Lariat Cos., Inc. v. Wigley (In re Wigley), 533 B.R. 267 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2015).
- 9.1.tt Debtor in possession may not assume trademark license without licensor's consent. The debtor licensed its trademark under a license agreement that required the debtor to maintain certain quality standards and prohibited assignment. Before bankruptcy, the licensor brought a state court action to terminate the license based on the debtor's violation of quality standards. The debtor proposed a plan that would have provided for conversion of the secured lender's debt to equity and for assumption of the license agreement. The licensor sought stay relief to pursue the termination action. A trademark license is an executory contract. Section 365(c) prohibits assumption of an executory contract if applicable law excuses the counterparty from accepting performance from an entity other than the debtor, whether or not the contract prohibits assignment. The hypothetical test measures assumability by assignability, whether or not the debtor in possession intends to assign the contract. Although section 365(f)(1) invalidates antiassignment clauses, section 365(c) permits them but only when nonassignability is based on the identity of the contracting party. Federal trademark law prohibits assignment of a trademark license without the licensor's consent, to protect the licensor's ability to police the quality of the trademarked goods or services. Therefore, trademark nonassignability is based on the contracting party's identity, so section 365(c) applies, prohibiting assumption. The court grants stay relief. In re Trump Entertainment Resorts, Inc., 526 B.R. 116 (Bankr. D. Del. 2015).
- 9.1.uu Trademark rejection does not deprive the licensee of the right to use. The debtor licensed its trademark to third-party licensees. It sold its assets, including its trademarks but not the license agreements, in a sale under section 363 free and clear of all interests. The debtor in possession moved to reject the licenses after the sale closed. The licensees objected, claiming a right to continued use of the trademark. Section 365(n) permits an intellectual property licensee under a rejected license to retain the right to use the intellectual property after rejection. The definition of "intellectual property" does not include trademarks. But the definition does not purport to be exclusive, and the legislative history says that trademarks were excluded from the definition to allow the courts to develop equitable treatment in this situation. Moreover, rejection should not act as an avoiding power or a sword, only as a shield to protect a reorganizing debtor from continuing obligations. Section 363(f) permits a debtor in possession to sell assets free and clear of interests. The specific rule of section 365 controls the general authority that section 363(f) grants, so it does not supersede section 365's protection of a licensee's right to use intellectual property.

Therefore, neither rejection nor the order authorizing sale of the trademark free and clear of other interests deprives the licensee of the right to continued use of the trademark. In re Crumbs Bake Shop, Inc., 522 B.R. 766 (Bankr. D. N.J. 2014).

- 9.1.vv Employees are not “interested parties” under section 1113(d). The court approved the debtor in possession’s rejection under section 1113 of its collective bargaining agreement. The debtor and the union then entered into a new collective bargaining agreement that settled all outstanding grievances, including the grievances of a particular employee group, which the bankruptcy court also approved. The employee group members appealed from the orders. Section 1113 permits a debtor in possession to reject a collective bargaining agreement. Section 1113(d)(1) permits only an “interested party” to be heard in a rejection proceeding. Section 1113’s purpose is to force the DIP to negotiate in good faith with the union, which represents the employees, not with the employees themselves. Bargaining with the employees apart from the union might violate federal labor law, and permitting individual employee involvement would upset the balance that section 1113 creates. Therefore, the employee group members are not interested parties who are entitled to be heard in the section 1113 proceeding. Supplement B Pilot Beneficiaries v. AMR Corp. (In re AMR Corp.), 523 B.R. 415 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 9.1.ww Section 365(d)(5) gives a lessor an automatic administrative expense claim for rent arising from and after 60 days after the order for relief. The equipment lessor filed an administrative expense claim for postpetition rent. The debtor in possession contended the lease was a secured financing and the estate did not use the equipment during the case in a way that benefited the estate. Section 503(b)(1) allows an administrative expense claim for the actual and necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate. The claimant has the burden of establishing benefit to the estate. Section 365(d)(5) requires the trustee to perform all the debtor’s obligations under a personal property lease arising from and after 60 days after the order for relief, unless the court orders otherwise, based on the equities of the case. The trustee has the burden of showing equities of the case. Accordingly, rent arising from and after 60 days after the order for relief is entitled to allowance as an administrative expense unless the trustee shows otherwise. Therefore, to consider the lessor’s claim properly, the court must first determine whether the transaction is a true lease or a secured financing. If the former, then the court must allow rent arising from and after 60 days after the order for relief as an administrative expense unless the trustee shows otherwise based on the equities of the case. The claimant has the burden of showing entitlement to an administrative expense claim for the 60-day period or, if the transaction is a secured financing, for the entire postpetition period. GE Capital Comm’l, Inc. v. Sylva Corp., Inc. (In re Sylva Corp., Inc.), 519 B.R. 776 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2014).
- 9.1.xx Trademark license agreement that is part of a business sale is not an executory contract. As part of a sale of part of its business, the debtor licensed trademarks to the buyer under a license agreement that was signed and effective at the same time as the asset purchase agreement. The debtor’s chapter 11 plan assumed the license agreement. A plan may assume an executory contract. Under the Countryman definition, an executory contract is one under which both parties’ obligations “are so far unperformed that the failure of either to complete performance would constitute a material breach excusing the performance of the other.” The definition includes the concept of substantial performance. If a party has substantially performed, the party’s later nonperformance would not excuse the other party from performance but would only give rise to a damage claim. Related agreements signed at the same time covering the same transaction should be treated as a single contract. Here, though performance by both parties remained under the license agreement, the sale and purchase of the business constituted substantial performance of the integrated agreement. The debtor’s remaining obligations under the license agreement concerned only one aspect of the sale, and nonperformance would not have excused the buyer from further performance under the license agreement. Therefore, the license contract is not an executory contract and could not be assumed. Lewis Bros. Bakeries Inc. v. Interstate Brands Corp. (In re Interstate Brands Corp.), 751 F.3d 955 (8th Cir. 2014).

- 9.1.yy Court reconciles apparent conflict between sections 363(f) and 365(h). The plan provided for rejection of the debtor’s lease to a tenant of real property and sale of the underlying property free and clear of the tenant’s interest. Section 365(f) permits the trustee to sell property of the estate free and clear of a third party’s interest if, among other reasons, “(1) applicable nonbankruptcy law permits sale” free and clear of the interest or “(5) [the interest holder] could be compelled, in a legal or equitable proceeding, to accept a money satisfaction of such interest.” A leasehold estate is an interest in property. Section 365(h) provides that upon a trustee’s rejection of a lease, the tenant may “retain its rights under such lease ... that are in or appurtenant to the real property for the balance of the term.” A lease gives a tenant a property interest, which the tenant may retain even if the trustee rejects the lease. Rejection is not an avoiding power. But it protects the tenant only to the extent of the tenant’s nonbankruptcy rights and does not impair the trustee’s Bankruptcy Code rights to deal with the property, for example, to avoid an unperfected or fraudulently transferred interest or, therefore, to sell free and clear under section 363(f). Based on the “active” voice in the lead-in to section 363(f), section 363(f)(1) should be read narrowly to apply only when applicable nonbankruptcy law would permit the property’s owner, not any other third party such as a foreclosing creditor, to sell free and clear of the interest. Section 363(f)(5) should be read the same way for the same reason, especially because the broader reading would render paragraphs (1) through (4) superfluous. Where the buyer has notice of the lease, such as by the tenant’s possession, the seller will not be able to sell free and clear under nonbankruptcy law. Therefore, the trustee may not do so here. If the trustee could, the tenant would be entitled to adequate protection of his interest. The most reasonable adequate protection for a tenant is to permit him to remain in possession for the remainder of the lease term. Dishi & Sons v. Bay Condos LLC, 510 B.R. 696 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 9.1.zz Trustee may draw letter of credit under which the debtor is the beneficiary. The debtor contracted with an engineering firm to construct a plant. The firm arranged for a bank to issue a letter of credit to the debtor to secure the firm’s performance. The debtor did not draw the letter of credit before bankruptcy. The trustee sued the debtor’s attorney for malpractice for failing to advise the debtor to draw the letter of credit before bankruptcy, arguing that section 365(c)(2) prohibited a postpetition draw. Section 365(c)(2) prohibits a trustee from assuming “any executory contract ... of the debtor ... to make a loan, or extend other debt financing or financial accommodations, to or for the benefit of the debtor.” The independence principle governs a letter of credit. Each of the three relationships—between the applicant and the issuer, the issuer and the beneficiary, and the beneficiary and the applicant—is independent of the other. The relationship between the issuer and the beneficiary is not a contract, because there are no mutual obligations; the beneficiary may but is not required to give notice of draw. Even if it were a contract, it is not an executory contract, because the beneficiary cannot breach any obligation that would relieve the issuer from its obligation to the beneficiary. And a letter of credit under which the debtor is the beneficiary is not a contract to make a loan, extend debt financing or financial accommodation to the debtor. These terms describe a relationship of granting credit to the debtor; section 365(c)(2)’s purpose is to protect a lender from the debtor’s deteriorated creditworthiness. Therefore, the letter of credit is not an executory contract of the debtor to extend financial accommodations to or for the benefit of the debtor. The benefit of the letter of credit passes to the estate, which may draw. So the debtor’s attorney did not commit malpractice by failing to advise the debtor to draw before bankruptcy. Rafool v. Evans, 497 B.R. 312 (C.D. Ill. 2013).
- 9.1.aaa Section 365(d)(4) applies only to a lease under which the debtor is in possession. The first debtor assumed and assigned the lease to an affiliate debtor, which assigned the lease to a third debtor, before its bankruptcy. After the assignment, the second debtor filed bankruptcy again.

The court determined that it retained payment obligations to the landlord under the lease, which the second debtor then rejected. Later, the third debtor filed bankruptcy. It moved to assume the lease. Section 365(a) permits the debtor in possession to assume or reject an executory contract or unexpired lease. Section 365(d)(4) automatically rejects a nonresidential real property lease under which the debtor is the lessee if it is not timely assumed and then requires the debtor in possession to surrender possession to the landlord. A lessee is one in possession of real property under a lease. Section 365(d)(4) requires surrender of possession, confirming that it applies to one who is in possession. A lease assignment divests the assignor of any further interest in the leasehold and creates privity of estate between the landlord and the assignee. Rejection is only a breach, not a termination or rescission. Here, the second debtor was not the lessee, because it had assigned its leasehold to the third debtor and was no longer in possession of the real property. Therefore, section 365(d)(4) did not apply in the second debtor's bankruptcy case, so the rejection did not terminate or rescind the lease. The third debtor was the lessee and was entitled to assume the lease in its bankruptcy case. John Hilsman Invs., LLC v. Quality Props., LLC, 500 B.R. 105 (N.D. Ala. 2013).

- 9.1.bbb Section 560 safe harbor protects liquidation methodology. The debtor entered into an interest rate swap agreement that permitted the counterparty to determine the termination amount upon a default under one method for most defaults and a different method if the debtor's default was nonpayment or bankruptcy. Section 365(e) renders unenforceable a contract provision that is triggered by the debtor's bankruptcy. However, section 560 provides that "the exercise of a contractual right to ... to cause the liquidation, termination, or acceleration of [a] swap agreement ... shall not be stayed, avoided, or otherwise limited by operation of any provision of this title." As used in section 560, "liquidation" means fixing an otherwise uncertain amount. The choice of liquidation method is integral to liquidation, and the nondefaulting party's use of a particular method is a contractual right that may not be limited by the Bankruptcy Code. The method is not ancillary to the contractual right, as is a "flip clause," which changes priority rights in collateral upon a bankruptcy, distinguishing this case from Lehman Bros. Special Fin. Inc. v. Ballyrock ABS CDO 2007-1 Ltd., 452 B.R. 31 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011). Therefore, the counterparty may use the alternative calculation method. Mich. State Housing Devel. Auth. v. Lehman Bros. Derivative Prods. Inc. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 502 B.R. 383 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 9.1.ccc Trustee may assign previously assumed lease. The debtor in possession assumed a real property lease. Later, it moved to assign the lease, despite the lease's anti-assignment provision. Section 365(d)(4) limits the time within which a trustee or debtor in possession may assume a lease. Section 365(f)(2) permits a trustee to assign a lease if, among other things, "the trustee assumes the lease." Section 365(f)(3) overrides a lease's anti-assignment provision so that a trustee may assign the lease. Section 365(d)(4) addresses only assumption, not assignment. Section 365(f)(2)'s use of the present tense does not imply that assumption and assignment must be contemporaneous. Although a trustee must assume a lease cum onere, it does not require that the trustee waive any bankruptcy protections that would apply to the lease. Therefore, section 365(f)(3) continues to apply during the bankruptcy case, so the trustee may assign the previously assumed lease despite its anti-assignment provision. In re Eastman Kodak Co., 495 B.R. 618 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 9.1.ddd Purchase orders may be rejected separately from a master purchase agreement. The debtor entered into a master purchase agreement with a parts supplier. The master purchase agreement set forth general terms and conditions but did not authorize or obligate either party to purchase or sell parts, which would be authorized by separate purchase orders. A debtor in possession may assume or reject only a complete contract, not parts of a contract. Whether various contractual relationships are separate or indivisible is a question of applicable nonbankruptcy law. Applicable nonbankruptcy law (here, Kansas law) looks to the parties' intent. A contract is divisible where performance is divided into more than one part, the number of parts due from each party is the same and each party's performance of a part is the agreed exchange for the other party's part. Here, the master purchase agreement acted as an option contract, giving the debtor the right to buy parts from the supplier but not obligating it to do so. Therefore, each purchase order under the agreement was a separate contract that could be assumed or rejected independently of the other purchase orders. In re Hawker Beechcraft, Inc., 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 2409 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. June 13, 2013).

- 9.1.eee Reorganized debtor retains rights as licensee despite discharge of related obligations. In exchange for a perpetual, royalty-free technology license to produce aircraft parts, the debtor agreed to indemnify the licensor for any liability resulting from any alleged design defect. In the debtor's later chapter 11 case, it did not assume or reject the license agreement, and the licensor did not file a proof of claim. After plan confirmation, the reorganized debtor refused to indemnify the licensor for a claim, the licensor sent notice of license termination and the licensor sued the debtor for damages and for a declaration that the debtor had no license or other rights to the licensor's intellectual property. The license agreement was not an executory contract because only the debtor had remaining obligations. Therefore, the license agreement continued to bind the debtor, though confirmation discharged the debtor from any prepetition claims. A claim arises prepetition if the debtor's conduct giving rise to the claim occurred prepetition or if the parties had a prepetition relationship. The licensor's indemnification claims under the agreement arose prepetition because the relevant conduct here is the debtor's execution of the license agreement, and the parties had a prepetition relationship. Therefore, plan confirmation discharged the licensor's indemnification claim, so the licensor could not terminate the agreement based on the debtor's failure to abide by the indemnification agreement after confirmation. However, the licensor retains any claim against the debtor for post-confirmation violation of the licensing agreement. Lycoming Engines v. Superior Air Parts, Inc. (In re Superior Air Parts, Inc.), 487 B.R. 728 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2012).
- 9.1.fff Solar power supply contract is a forward contract. The debtor contracted to supply electricity to an electric utility from a solar power plant that the debtor would construct. The contract fixed the price of electricity, based on a very small production operating cost ($200,000 annually) and a very large capital cost ($50 million). The supply obligation started three years after PUC approval of the contract and ended 20 years after first supply. The debtor failed to post cash collateral required under the contract, the utility sent a notice of default and within the cure period, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The debtor moved for a determination of the applicability of the automatic stay to the utility's postpetition termination of the contract. Section 556 protects any contractual right of a forward contract merchant to liquidate, terminate or accelerate a forward contract, despite the automatic stay. Section 101(25) defines "forward contract." To meet the definition, the contract's subject must be primarily a commodity, not primarily ancillary services related to the commodity, the contract must have a maturity date more than two days after the contract date, the quantity and time elements should be fixed at contracting and the contract must have a relation to the financial markets. Although the largest part of the cost of producing the electricity for sale was the capital cost of building the debtor's facility, the only thing that the utility purchased under the contract was electricity, which is a commodity. The contract did not have a formal "maturity date," but based on its 20-year term, it would mature more than two days after contracting. The contract contemplated a minimum quantity of electricity over the contract term and specified a price. Finally, because the utility's contract to purchase solar power from the debtor was part of the utility's hedging strategy, the contract bore a relation to the financial markets. Therefore, the contract is a forward contract, and the automatic stay does not prohibit its postpetition termination. Clear Peak Energy, Inc. v. So. Calif. Edison Co. (In re Clear Peak Energy, Inc.), 488 B.R. 647 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2013).
- 9.1.ggg Plan confirmation does not discharge a licensee's right to use a trademark or vest the trademark in the reorganized debtor free and clear of the license. The debtor had licensed a trademark to a purchaser of a portion of the debtor's business. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession attempted to reject the license agreement. By the parties' agreement, the court decided the rejection motion after plan confirmation. The plan did not provide any particular treatment for the creditor or the trademark but relied instead on the rejection motion. The court determined the license agreement was not an executory contract and so denied the rejection motion. The reorganized debtor filed an action for a declaratory judgment that the trademark vested in the reorganized debtor under the plan free and clear of the license or that the licensee's right to use the trademark was a claim that was discharged under the plan. Section 1141(c) provides that "property dealt with by the plan" is free and clear of all claims and interests of creditors. The provision applies only where the plan actually deals with the property. The general statutory provision releasing creditors' claims and interests is insufficient "dealing" to release the trademark from the licensee's license. Under section 1141(d), confirmation discharges a debtor of all claims and interests that arose before confirmation. The Bankruptcy Code defines "claim" broadly as any right to payment or right to equitable remedy for breach of performance. The definition is not unlimited. A relationship gives rise to a right to payment only if there is some event that triggers a right to payment or if there is a breach of performance. Here, the licensee had no right to payment before confirmation, and the debtor had not committed a breach of performance that would have given rise to an equitable remedy. Therefore, the licensee had no claim that confirmation discharged. Its mere licensee interest in the trademark was not itself a claim. Therefore, the licensee retains the right to use the trademark without interference resulting from the debtor's chapter 11 case or plan. Exide Techs. v. Enersys Del., Inc. (In re Exide Techs.), 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 66 (Bankr. D. Del. Jan. 8, 2013).

- 9.1.hhh Terminated lease that still may be revived is "unexpired". The debtor filed its bankruptcy petition the day after its commercial landlord obtained a warrant of eviction for the premises. The landlord obtained stay relief two months later and obtained execution of the warrant. It then sought postpetition rent and attorneys' fees. Under applicable state law, a warrant of eviction cancels the lease and annuls the landlord-tenant relationship, but until execution of the warrant, the court may vacate it for good cause, thereby reinstating the lease. Under section 365(a), the trustee may assume or reject an unexpired lease, and under section 365(d)(3), must perform all the debtor's obligations under the lease until rejection. A lease remains "unexpired" if the tenant still has the power under nonbankruptcy law to revive its interest in the lease. In this case, the state court could, on the trustee's request, vacate the warrant, thereby reinstating the lease. Therefore, the lease was unexpired at the petition date. However, the lease was terminated. The court of appeals remands to the bankruptcy court to determine whether such a terminated lease is presumptively rejected or the trustee must affirmatively obtain rejection. Super Nova 330 LLC v. Gazes, 693 F.3d 138 (2d Cir. 2012).
- 9.1.iii Whether an employment contract is an executory contract is determined as of the petition date. The debtor in possession terminated the employee's employment after bankruptcy. It later rejected the employee's employment contract under the chapter 11 plan. The employee filed a proof of claim within 30 days after rejection but long after the ordinary claims bar date. Courts generally determine whether a contract is executory as of the petition date, without regard to postpetition events. Here, that rule should apply. Otherwise, a debtor in possession could terminate employment after the claims bar date and thereby prevent the employee from filing a proof of claim for rejection damages. In re Ellipsat, Inc., 480 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2012).
- 9.1.jjj Trademark license rejection does not deprive the licensee of the right to use. The debtor contracted with a manufacturer to produce the debtor's product for sale to the debtor's customers. It licensed its trademark to the manufacturer. The license permitted the manufacturer to sell the product on its own if the debtor did not itself purchase the product. Three months later, creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The trustee sold the debtor's business and rejected the manufacturing and license agreement. Section 365(a) permits a trustee to reject an executory contract. Section 365(g) provides, “the rejection of an executory contract ... constitutes a breach of such contract”. Outside bankruptcy, a breach does not terminate the non-breaching party’s rights under a contract. Section 365(g) transports that result into bankruptcy, while protecting the debtor from specific performance as a remedy. Rejection is not the functional equivalent of rescission, nor is it an avoiding power. Section 365(n) protects a licensee’s right to use “intellectual property”, as defined. The definition does not include trademarks. The “omission is just an omission”. It does not create an implication that trademarks, unprotected under section 365(n), are vulnerable under section 365 generally. Section 365’s general principles apply to trademark licenses as they do to all other executory contracts. Therefore, the trustee’s rejection does not prevent the manufacturer from using the licensed trademark. Sunbeam Prods., Inc. v. Chicago Am. Mfg, LLC, 686 F.3d 372 (7th Cir. 2012).

- 9.1.kkk Debtor’s prepetition breach does not make a contract non-executory. The debtor entered into a technology license agreement with a licensee that required substantial continuing performance from both parties as of the petition date. The debtor committed material breaches of the agreement before bankruptcy. Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, the breaches excused the licensee from further performance under the agreement. Under the Countryman definition, for purposes of section 365, an executory contract is one “under which the obligation of both the bankrupt and the other party to the contract are so far unperformed that the failure of either to complete performance would constitute a material breach excusing performance of the other.” Outside of bankruptcy, where one party has committed a material breach, the other party is excused from performance. Accordingly, a court might conclude that where the debtor has breached, the nondebtor party is excused from performance, so that the nondebtor party no longer has any obligations under the contract. However, such a reading would render all breached contracts non-executory, essentially eviscerating section 365. Importantly, Countryman observed that a contract in which the nondebtor party had no further obligation should not be considered an executory contract, because the estate has whatever benefit it was entitled to under the contract, and the only remaining performance is a liability of the debtor, as to which assumption would serve no purpose other than to elevate a general unsecured claim’s priority. Thus, the Countryman definition should be read to exempt from the definition only those contracts under which the debtor has already received the full benefit of the nondebtor party’s performance before bankruptcy. Under that interpretation, the license agreement here remained executory. In re Kemeta, LLC, 470 B.R. 304 (Bankr. D. Del. 2012).
- 9.1.iii Rejection of master lessee’s lease permits master lessor to terminate sublease. Before bankruptcy, the debtor lessee subleased real property to an unrelated third party. The master lease permitted the lessor to terminate it if the lessee became the subject of a bankruptcy case. The sublease provided that it terminates if the master lease terminates. In the debtor’s chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession did not timely assume the lease, which was then deemed rejected under section 365(d)(4). Section 365(d)(4) requires the trustee to surrender possession upon such a deemed rejection, which could create a conflict with section 365(h), which protects a sublessee’s right to possession of real property under a rejected lease. Rejection constitutes a breach, not a termination. Section 365(e) prohibits a lessor from terminating a lease because of the lessee’s bankruptcy. However, once the lease is rejected, it is no longer property of the estate and is not protected by the automatic stay. Section 365(e) applies only during the bankruptcy case and does not affect the lessor’s rights outside of bankruptcy. Therefore, applicable nonbankruptcy law governs the master lessor’s rights against the sublessee. In this case, Alabama law permits the lessor to enforce the ipso facto clause and to terminate the master lease based on the rejection and consequent breach. The sublease then automatically terminates, because of the sublease provision that so provides. Cahaba Forests, LLC v. Hay, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13877 (M.D. Ala. Feb. 6, 2012).

- 9.1.mmm Contract counterparty’s claim for WARN Act liability resulting from contract rejection is a prepetition claim. The debtor in possession rejected a transportation agreement with a trucking company. The trucking company laid off its employees immediately after the rejection. The employees sued the trucking company in state court for a WARN Act violation. The trucking company sought permission from the bankruptcy court to cross-claim in the state court against the debtor in possession either as a controlling employer or for contribution. Under section 365(g), any claim arising from rejection of an executory contract is treated as a prepetition claim. Even though the liability that the trucking company may have incurred to its employees as a result of the rejection of the transportation agreement occurred postpetition, the trucking company’s claim against the debtor arising from the rejection is treated as a prepetition claim, and pursuit of such a claim is permissible only by filing a proof of claim in the bankruptcy case. Grocery Haulers, Inc. v. The Great Atlantic & Pac. Tea Co, Inc. (In re The Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., Inc.), 2012 WL 264187 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 30, 2012).
- 9.1.nnn Contract that limits debtor’s right to assign claims to a section 524(g) trust is unenforceable. Before bankruptcy, the debtor entered into a settlement agreement with its general liability insurer relating to asbestos claims. The debtor warranted that it had not assigned and would not assign any claims against the insurer and that it would not assist others in pursuing claims against the insurer. The agreement required arbitration of disputes. As its asbestos woes mounted, the debtor began negotiations with its other insurers and with asbestos claimants over a possible bankruptcy plan, which would provide for assigning contribution claims that other insurers might have against the settling insurer to the debtor, who would assign them under a plan to an asbestos trust under section 524(g). The insurer filed a proof of claim for breach of the settlement agreement, alleging that the negotiations for the debtor’s receipt of claims against the insurer and their assignment to the asbestos trust violated the settlement agreement’s anti-assignment provision. Public policy prohibits enforcement of a debtor’s prepetition waiver of bankruptcy rights, to prevent astute creditors from routinely requiring such waivers. The settlement agreement provisions therefore were unenforceable to the extent that they would have prohibited the debtor from proposing or confirming a plan that used section 524(g)’s benefits, and any claim for breach of such a provision should be disallowed. Continental Ins. Co. v. Thorpe Insulation Co. (In re Thorpe Insulation Co.), 671 F.3d 1011 (9th Cir. 2012).
- 9.1.ooo Sublease termination defeats subtenant’s attornment obligation. The debtor leased real property from the owner and subleased it to the tenant. The sublease required the tenant to attorn to the owner if the owner “terminates the Master Lease [or] otherwise succeeds to the interest of” the debtor under the lease. In the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession rejected the lease and the sublease, stating in its rejection motion that it intended to treat the sublease as terminated under section 365(h). The tenant responded that it too intended to treat the sublease as terminated under section 365(h). The owner objected, but its objection was overruled. The owner then sought to enforce the attornment provision against the tenant. Attornment requires a tenant to be the tenant of a new landlord if the landlord succeeds to the prior owner’s rights. Here, the tenant agreed to attorn if the owner terminates the lease or succeeds to the debtor’s interest in the lease. Neither happened. Rather, not only by the rejection but also by agreement between the debtor and the tenant, the sublease terminated. Therefore, the tenant was released from any further obligation, either to the debtor or to the owner. Green Tree Servicing, LLC v. DBSI Landmark Towers, LLC, 652 F.3d 910 (8th Cir. 2011).
- 9.1.ppp A debtor in possession may not assign a trademark license without the licensor’s consent. The debtor sublicensed a trademark. Upon the expiration of the sublicense, the debtor contracted with the sublicensor to perform services related to the trademarked goods, which the debtor performed until its chapter 11 case. In the case, the debtor in possession moved for authority to assign the services agreement as part of a sale of its business. The sublicensor, arguing that the agreement still amounted to a trademark sublicense, objected. A debtor in possession may assume and assign an executory contract even if the contract prohibits or restricts assignment, unless “applicable law” entitles the counterparty to refuse to accept performance from the assignee. The court explains at length why trademark law would entitle a trademark licensor to do so but ultimately determines that the agreement is not a trademark license, so the debtor in possession may assign it. In re XMH Corp., 647 F.3d 690 (7th Cir. 2011).

- 9.1.qqq A contract whose default termination provision requires additional postpetition action to terminate becomes property of the estate. The debtor’s lease provided that if the debtor did not cure the default within 60 days after notice, “this Agreement may be terminated and all of the rights of [the debtor] shall cease ... and [the counterparty] may at once take possession” Before bankruptcy, the debtor’s contract counterparty sent notice of termination for default under the contract provision. Creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor before the expiration of the notice period. Under section 365(a), the trustee may assume an executory contract of the debtor, but a contract that has terminated by its terms before bankruptcy or that expires or terminates by its terms after bankruptcy may not be assumed, because it is no longer an executory contract of the debtor. Because this contract provided only that it “may be terminated”, additional action by the counterparty was required before the contract terminated. The petition was filed before the expiration of the notice period. The automatic stay prohibited the counterparty from taking the additional action. As a result, the contract became property of the estate, and the trustee could assume it. C.O.P. Coal Devel. Co. v. C.W. Mining Co. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 641 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2011).
- 9.1.rrr Contract assumption does not require cure of provision requiring payment of other creditors. The debtor’s plan proposed to assume an executory supply contract that required the debtor to stay current with all obligations to other vendors. The contract counterparty objected to assumption on the ground that the plan did not provide for cure of the default of that provision. A plan may provide for assumption of an executory contract if, among other things, all defaults under the contract, other than financial or insolvency-type defaults, are either cured or promptly will be cured. However, a cross-default provision in a contract, such as the provision here requiring that the debtor remain current with other vendors, is inherently suspect, because it may prevent assumption of a contract because of defaults under entirely separate agreements. Enforcement of such a provision would contravene the bankruptcy policy against enforcement of ipso facto clauses and impermissibly hamper reorganization. Therefore, the plan may provide for assumption without payment of all other vendors’ claims. In re Jennifer Convertibles, Inc., 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 342 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Feb. 4, 2011).
- 9.1.sss “Actions in furtherance” of bankruptcy, without board action, may be an ISDA event of default. The parties’ interest rate swap agreement on the 1987 ISDA form provided that an event of default would occur if a party “is dissolved”, “becomes insolvent or fails of is unable or admits in writing its inability generally to pay its debts as they become due”, “institutes or has instituted against it a proceeding seeking ... relief under any bankruptcy or insolvency law”, “has a resolution passed for its winding up or liquidation” or “takes any action in furtherance of, or indicating its consent to, approval of, or acquiescence in, any of the foregoing acts”. One party encountered severe financial difficulty, resulting in enormous loans from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to keep it afloat. Before it received the loans, it began bankruptcy preparations. After it received the loans, it began to take steps to wind down and liquidate its business. After announcing further losses, it again instructed its attorneys to prepare for an imminent bankruptcy. A second round of FRBNY loans prevented a bankruptcy. The bankruptcy preparations were “actions in furtherance of” instituting a proceeding seeking bankruptcy relief. The contract did not require corporate action to trigger an event of default, just “any action in furtherance”. Similarly, the termination of businesses and steps to wind down operations were in furtherance of winding up or liquidation and similarly triggered an event of default. Brookfield Asset Mgmt., Inc. v. AIG Fin. Prods. Corp., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103272 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 29, 2010).

- 9.1.ttt Bankruptcy Code preempts state law restricting debtor’s successor’s right to contract. During bankruptcy, the debtor in possession car manufacturer rejected dealership contracts, with the court’s approval, and sold its remaining business to a successor. Several states adopted laws requiring the successor to grant a dealer franchise to a rejected dealer before granting a franchise to anyone else in the same geographic area. Congress may preempt state law expressly, by occupying the field or where local law conflicts with federal law or makes it impossible for a party to enjoy rights granted under federal law. The Bankruptcy Code reflects comprehensive federal regulation of bankruptcy and the adjustment of rights between a debtor and its creditors. The state statutes would conflict with that regulation and would prevent the successor from enjoying rights that it obtained in the debtor’s bankruptcy case. Therefore, the state statutes are unconstitutional as applied to the successor. Old Carco LLC v. Kroger (In re Old Carco LLC), 442 B.R. 196 (S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 9.1.uuu Joint debtors’ LLC agreement is not an executory contract, and their interests become property of the estate. Individual debtors filed a joint petition. They owned all the membership interests in an LLC. The applicable LLC statute defines a member’s interest as the right to share profits and losses and receive distributions of assets and provides that an assignment does not entitle the assignee to participate in management. However, section 541(a)(1) includes in property of the estate all of the debtors’ interests in property, including contract rights, which include rights to participate in management. An executory contract is one under which the obligations of both parties are so far unperformed that the failure of either to complete performance would constitute a material breach and excuse the other party’s performance. Here, the only parties to the LLC agreement are the joint debtors in the case; there is no “other party”. Therefore, application of executory contract analysis does not serve any of the purposes of section 365, and all the debtors’ interests, including their management rights, became property of the estate. Fursman v. Ulrich (In re First Protection, Inc.), 440 B.R. 821 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2010).
- 9.1.vvv Section 365(d)(3) requires payment of postpetition semiannual farm rent even though the land provided no benefit to the estate. The debtor farmer’s land lease required two annual payments, on April 1 and December 1 of each year. The debtor filed bankruptcy on November 29, after he had harvested the annual crop. The debtor in possession rejected the lease the following March. Section 365(d)(3) requires that a debtor in possession “timely perform all the obligations of the debtor ... arising from and after the order for relief under any unexpired lease of nonresidential real property, until such lease is assumed or rejected, notwithstanding section 503(b)(1)”. The section is unambiguous that the debtor in possession must pay December 1 rent payment obligation, which arose after the order for relief. Section 503(b) allows administrative expenses, including, in section 503(b)(1), the costs and expenses of preserving the estate. Section 365(d)(3) excludes section 503(b)(1), but not the general statement of section 503(b), from consideration, and “including” is not limiting. Therefore, even though the land provided no benefit to the estate because the year’s crop had already been harvested, section 503(b) grants the section 365(d)(3) payment obligation administrative expense priority. Burival v. Roehrich (In re Burival), 613 F.3d 810 (8th Cir. 2010).
- 9.1.www Trustee may not reject prepetition court specific performance order. The debtor contracted to sell real property but defaulted. The buyer obtained a final order of specific performance before the debtor filed bankruptcy. An executory contract is one under which the parties’ obligations “are so far unperformed that the failure of either complete performance would constitute a material breach excusing performance of the other”. A prepetition specific performance order renders the underlying contract non-executory; the order is deemed to have “executed” the contract. Where a prepetition order can be expressed as a claim, it is subject to discharge in the bankruptcy, thereby preventing a party with an equitable remedy that can be reduced to money from obtaining more favorable treatment in bankruptcy. In this case, however, the specific performance order could not be reduced to money, because it involved the transfer of a unique parcel of land. Therefore, the order is not a claim, the executory contract has been performed and the trustee may not reject the contract and resell the land. In re Acevedo, 2010 Bankr. LEXIS 2915 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Sept. 10, 2010).

- 9.1.xxx Debtor in possession may not reject substantially performed trademark license agreement. The debtor had sold a business line 10 years before bankruptcy and entered into several agreements that were still in force as of the bankruptcy filing. One agreement was a trademark licensing agreement that gave the buyer a perpetual, royalty free license of the debtor's trademark in the operation of the business line and obligated the debtor not to use the trademark in that business line. The debtor desired to reenter that business line. It moved to reject the agreement as an executory contract so that it would no longer be bound by the obligation not to use the trademark. An executory contract is one under which sufficient performance remains on both sides so that the failure to perform would constitute a material breach excusing the other party's performance. Under New York law, which governed this contract, a breach is material and excuses the other party's performance only if the contract has not been substantially performed. In this case, the ongoing obligation not to use the trademark in a single business line and associated obligations on the buyer did not amount to substantial performance, which had already been rendered in connection with the sale itself. Therefore, the contract was not an executory contract and could not be rejected. Judge Ambro's concurrence argues that rejection should not permit the debtor in possession to rescind a trademark license, even though trademarks are not within the scope of intellectual property that section 365(n) protects, but it does not address rejection's effect on the debtor's obligation not to use the trademark. In re Exide Techs., 607 F.3d 957 (3d Cir. 2010).
- 9.1.yyy Estate is liable for postpetition "stub rent" as an administrative expense. The debtor filed its chapter 11 petition on June 9. It had not paid rent due on June 1. The debtor in possession immediately began going out of business sales, which proved financially successful. The debtor in possession paid rent due on July 1, but disputed its obligation to pay "stub rent" for the period from June 9 to June 30 as an administrative expense. Section 365(d)(3) requires a trustee to perform all the debtor's obligations under a lease, "notwithstanding section 503(b)(1)". The "notwithstanding" clause excuses only the lessor's compliance with section 503(b)(1) to demand performance of postpetition obligations. It does not exclude section 503(b)(1)'s operation on leases. Section 503(b)(1) entitles a third party to an administrative expense for providing something of benefit to the estate. The debtor in possession's use of the leased premises for 21 days in June provided a benefit, so the lessor is entitled to an administrative expense for the reasonable value of the premises for that period. In re Goody's Family Clothing Inc., 610 F.3d 812 (3d Cir. 2010).
- 9.1.zzz Section 1114's restriction on modification of retiree benefit plans applies to plans that by their terms permit modification. The debtor provided retiree benefits for retirees under collective bargaining agreements, but the agreements permitted the debtor to modify the benefits at any time. The debtor in possession moved under section 363(b) to terminate retiree benefits but did not move to terminate under section 1114 or comply with any of section 1114's negotiation requirements. Section 1114(e) provides, "[n]otwithstanding any other provision of this title, the trustee shall pay and shall not modify any retiree benefits" without court approval or retiree representative agreement. The plain language of section 1114 prohibits modification, even if the plan itself permits it. The legislative history does not suggest otherwise and in fact supports the plain language, and the result is not absurd, even though it grants retirees greater protection in bankruptcy than they had before bankruptcy. Therefore, the debtor in possession may not modify the retiree benefits without compliance with section 1114. IUE-CWA v. Visteon Corp. (In re Visteon Corp.), 612 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2010).

9.1.aaaa Municipality may reject collective bargaining agreement in a chapter 9 case without regard to section 1113. The municipal debtor moved to reject a collective bargaining agreement (CBA) with one of the city’s unions. Sections 103(f) and 901 specify which Bankruptcy Code sections apply in a chapter 9 case. Section 365 applies, but section 1113 does not. Therefore, the limitations on rejection of CBA’s that apply in a chapter 11 case under section 1113 do not restrict a municipal debtor’s ability to reject a CBA. The standards set forth in NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 465 U.S. 513 (1984), apply instead. Section 903 preserves a state’s ability to control its municipalities, “by legislation or otherwise”, in a chapter 9 case. A municipality may file a chapter 9 case only if specifically authorized under state law. However, when a state authorizes a municipality to file a chapter 9 case, its authorization constitutes a declaration that the benefits of chapter 9 take precedence over control of its municipalities. Therefore, it may not restrict which aspects of chapter 9 are available to the municipality. In addition, federal law may preempt state law, and the Bankruptcy Code does so in general. It does so here as well, even though regulation of municipal labor relations is traditionally an area subject to state control. In any event, the state statute authorizing the city to file chapter 9 here does not explicitly identify state labor law as an exception of the general grant of authority to file. I.B.E.W. v. City of Vallejo (In re City of Vallejo), 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67598 (E.D. Cal. June 14, 2010).

9.1.bbbb Ipso facto* clause prohibition applies to a priority “flip” clause in a synthetic CDO. The U.S. debtor entered into a credit default swap with a synthetic collateralized debt obligation SPV (CDO), which issued notes. The notes’ proceeds were held as collateral for the CDO’s obligations under both the notes and the swap. The security agreement, which was governed by English law, provided that the security interest of the debtor, as swap counterparty, had priority over the security interest of the noteholders, unless the debtor defaulted under the swap and amounts become payable after sale of the collateral. The debtor’s U.S. parent guaranteed the debtor’s performance under the swap. The parent filed bankruptcy, defaulting the swap. The debtor filed bankruptcy three weeks later. The collateral trustee issued a notice of default and terminated the swap one month later, citing the debtor’s bankruptcy (rather than the parent’s bankruptcy) as the event of default. An executory contract is a contract under which the obligation of the debtor and the counterparty are so far unperformed that the failure of either to complete performance would constitute a material breach excusing performance of the other. The swap’s outstanding payment obligations make it an executory contract. The United States has a strong interest in having a U.S. bankruptcy court resolve issues of bankruptcy law that protect a U.S. debtor more than the foreign law governing the contract would protect the U.S. debtor. Therefore, section 365 protections apply. Section 365(e) prohibits the enforcement of a contractual provision that modifies or terminates a debtor’s rights under a contract based on “the commencement of a case under this title”. Section 365(e) prevented the priority reversal, because it became effective only upon disposition of the collateral, which had not occurred as of the debtor’s bankruptcy. In addition, the default notice specified the debtor’s, not the parent’s, bankruptcy as the event of default. Even if the reversal became effective upon the parent’s bankruptcy filing, section 365(e) prevented it. The parent commenced “a case” under the Bankruptcy Code. Because of the close relationship between the parent and the subsidiary in these cases, the commencement of the parent’s case was sufficient to invoke section 36(e)’s protection and invalidate the priority reversal as against the debtor. Lehman Bros. Special Financing Inc. v. BNY Corp. Trustee Servs. Ltd. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 422 B.R. 407 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

9.1.cccc Debtor in possession may exercise expiring option within 60 days after the order for relief under section 108(b). The debtor had an option to purchase loans secured by real property. The option had a firm expiration time and a “time is of the essence” provision. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case the day before the option expired. Whether a contract is an executory contract for purposes of section 365 is determined at the petition date, and in general a debtor in possession may assume or reject a contract at any time before plan confirmation. However, the debtor in possession may not assume a contract under section 365 after it expires, because nonperformance after expiration of a “time is of the essence” deadline constitutes a default, which is not curable under state law. Section 365(b)(1)(A)-(C) does not permit cure of nonmonetary defaults, except those relating to a penalty provision or to real property leases. Therefore, the debtor in possession here may not assume the option because it cannot cure the default arising upon the option deadline’s expiration. Under section 108(b), if an agreement fixes a period in which the debtor may “cure a default, or perform any other similar act” and the period has not expired as of the petition date, the period is extended to at least 60 days after the order for relief. Although the agreement does not permit cure of a default within a fixed period, it permits a “similar act”, which includes exercising the option. Therefore, the debtor in possession may exercise the option within 60 days after the order for relief, despite the inapplicability of section 365. In re Empire Equities Capital Corp., 405 B.R. 687 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

9.1.dddd A nondebtor party may stop performance upon a rejection motion and claim resulting damages upon a later assumption motion. The debtor leased real property and subleased it to another tenant. The sublease contemplated that the tenant would take possession and make improvements to the space, that the lease would start four months after the debtor delivered possession and that the rent obligation would start three months after the lease start date. The subtenant planned to use the space as part of a larger campus and had sequenced its improvements and moving as part of a larger move process. The debtor filed its chapter 11 case 10 days after the subtenant took possession. Two days later, the debtor in possession moved to reject both the master lease and the sublease. The subtenant immediately stopped construction of the improvements and re-planned and re-sequenced its move process. In doing so, it incurred expenses to relocate employees and lease other space. Two months later, the debtor in possession reached agreement with the master lessor to assume and assign both the master lease and the sublease to the master lessor. Assumption would have permitted the subtenant to resume construction and move into the space approximately seven months later than originally expected. To assume a lease, a debtor in possession must cure defaults and compensate for actual pecuniary loss that the lessee incurred as a result of any default. The lessee acted reasonably in stopping construction and re-planning its campus move. Therefore, the expenses the subtenant incurred in re-planning were allowable and must be paid to compensate the subtenant. In addition, the subtenant’s rental obligation would not begin until seven months after the date originally contemplated. Because the debtor in possession could not compensate all such losses and still provide adequate assurance of future performance, the court denies the motion to assume and assign the sublease. In re DBSI, Inc., 405 B.R. 698 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).

9.1.eeee A debtor in possession may reject an executory contract despite state law that imposes limits on termination. The debtor in possession automobile manufacturer sought authority to reject dealer franchise agreements in connection with the sale of its business. State laws restrict an automobile manufacturer’s ability to terminate franchise agreements by imposing waiting periods, vehicle buy-back requirements, “good cause” hearings, limitations on permissible termination grounds and termination fees or enhanced damage claims. In addition, the federal Automobile Dealers Day in Court Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1221, authorizes damages for bad faith termination of a dealer agreement. Section 365 authorizes rejection, that is, authorization of non-performance, of executory contracts. Section 365 and other Bankruptcy Code sections contain express limitations on rejection, or the effect of rejection, of certain contracts, such as collective bargaining agreements and leases of real property. In addition, certain other federal statutes, such as the Federal Power Act, impose a public interest consideration in certain regulated contractual relationships. In the absence of such a federal statute, the standard for rejection of an executory contract is the business judgment rule, not a public interest standard. The business judgment standard does not require that the debtor in possession make the best business decision or even one that the court would make, only a reasonable business decision. It also does not consider the effect of rejection on the contract counterparty or its community. The ADDCA does not evidence a federal public interest, as it provides only for damages, not a regulatory scheme. A federal law preempts a state statute that interferes with or is contrary to federal law. Preemption may be express or may result from Congressional action that occupies a field of regulation or legislation or that is in conflict with the state law. The state dealer protection laws provide only economic regulation and protection, not protection against any imminent health or safety risks. They conflict with the Bankruptcy Code's authorization to a debtor in possession not to perform executory contracts. The Bankruptcy Code therefore preempts them. Finally, section 959(a) of title 28, which requires a debtor in possession to abide by all applicable nonbankruptcy laws in the operation of a business, does not restrict section 365's scope. Because the debtor in possession demonstrated sound business judgment in rejecting the dealer agreements, the court grants its motion to approve rejection. In re Old Carco LLC, 406 B.R. 180 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

9.1.ffff The court may approve contract rejection without consideration of the public interest. The debtor processes chicken. It contracts with growers to grow the chicken for processing. One of its plants was losing money because of low prices for processed chicken. The only way to reduce losses was to reduce the plant's production. The debtor in possession could reduce production by rejecting some grower contracts or by renegotiating most or all grower contracts to reduce volumes. The debtor chose to reject 26 grower contracts. The rejection would have devastating effects on the growers whose contracts were selected and perhaps on their communities as well. The debtor in possession selected contracts for rejection based on a "tournament" system, which was the system the debtor had used to measure cost per pound of grown chicken, based on the five most recent flocks, with some adjustments for extraordinary events, such as diseased flocks. The growers alleged that the debtor in possession selected the contracts for rejection either in retaliation for grower organizing actions or in violation of the Packers and Stockyard Act (PSA) or because the selected growers were largely Hispanic. Generally, the court should approve a rejection motion if the debtor in possession used reasonable business judgment in deciding to reject. The court must place itself in the decision maker's shoes and determine whether the decision maker's assumptions were reasonable and whether the conclusions are reasonable. The court may not second guess the debtor in possession's selection of one business strategy that leads to rejection over another business strategy that does not, or one contract selection method over another, as long as the selections are rational and reasonable. However, a decision based on retaliation or ethnic discrimination would not be rational and therefore not reasonable. In this case, the counterparties did not present probative evidence that any such factors motivated the debtor in possession's selections. In addition, the court need not consider the effect on the counterparty or the public interest in determining whether the decision is reasonable, unless there is a specific federal statute that evinces a contrary policy. Examples include the Federal Power Act, which regulates pricing and contract formation and termination among wholesale power generators and their customers, as construed in In re Mirant Corp., 378 F.3d 511 (5th Cir. 2004), or the "law of the shop" that collective bargaining agreements create under the National Labor Relations Act, as applied in N.L.R.B. v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 465 U.S. 513 (1984). The PSA does not impose a similar regulatory regime here, because it does not regulate contracts between growers and processors. In re Pilgrim's Pride Corp., 403 B.R. 413 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2009).

9.1.gggg Auto dealer customer finance contracts are not non-assumable financial accommodation contracts. The debtor car dealer had agreements with auto finance companies under which they would buy car loans that the dealer originated with its customers and that met certain underwriting criteria. The dealer retained no liability for amounts owing on the car loans. The agreements were terminable at will by the finance companies. After the debtor filed its chapter 11 case, the finance companies terminated the contracts. Section 365(c) prohibits assumption of a contract "to make a loan, or extend other debt financing or financial accommodations, to or for the benefit of the debtor". Section 365(c) does not define what a financial accommodation is, but the term should be construed narrowly. Otherwise, all contracts that involved any extension of credit to the debtor would qualify, and the subsection would largely eviscerate section 365's provisions authorizing assumption of executory contracts. Section 365(c) applies only where credit extension to the debtor party is the contract's principal purpose. Here, because the finance agreements were solely for the sale of customer loan contracts and did not involve extending credit to the debtor at all, section 365(c) does not apply. Applicable nonbankruptcy law permits a party to a contract that is terminable at will to terminate only in good faith. In light of the strong bankruptcy policy of section 365(e), which prohibits enforcement of a contract termination provision based on the filing of a chapter 11 petition or the debtor's financial condition, termination based on the debtor's chapter 11 filing is not in good faith. In addition, because the contract is property of the estate, termination violates the automatic stay. Therefore, the finance companies must continue to purchase conforming paper from the debtor in possession until the contract is rejected or the finance companies obtain stay relief. In re Ernie Haire Ford, Inc., 403 B.R. 750 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2009).

9.1.hhhh Mortgage sale and servicing agreement is severable. The debtor originated and serviced mortgage loans. The debtor had entered into a master sale and servicing agreement with a buyer providing for the debtor to sell loans periodically and for a subsidiary to service the loans. The agreement required the debtor to repurchase nonconforming loans. The servicing subsidiary agreed to indemnify the buyer for losses resulting from the debtor's failure to repurchase nonconforming loans. The buyer intended the repurchase indemnity obligation to permit it to terminate the subsidiary's servicing agreement and move its money out of the subsidiary when the debtor's enterprise was in financial distress. As of the petition date, the buyer had no unperformed obligations under the agreement, so the agreement was not an executory contract. The debtor in possession subsidiary sought to sell the servicing agreement without repurchasing nonconforming loans that the debtor parent had sold to the buyer before bankruptcy. Under section 363(f), the debtor in possession may sell an asset free and clear of interests, which include claims and setoff rights, but not free of rights, such as recoupment, arising under the same agreement. If the sale and servicing agreement were a single agreement, then the debtor in possession could not sell free and clear of the repurchase obligation. Applicable nonbankruptcy law determines whether the sale portion or the agreement was severable from the servicing portion. Agreements are severable if the nature and purposes of the agreements differ, the consideration for each is separate and the parties' obligations are not interrelated. Sale and servicing are different purposes, the price to purchase the loans was separate from the consideration for servicing the loans, and the sale obligations were independent of the servicing obligations. A cross-default provision between two agreements permits the non-debtor party to impose on the estate the cost of a substantially unrelated agreement and therefore is insufficient in and of itself to integrate two otherwise severable agreements. This "cross-default rule" carries out section 365(f)'s rule against anti-assignment clauses but applies equally to non-executory contracts and is reflected in section 363(l). Because the indemnity provision was intended as a financial early warning signal, it should be treated as an ipso facto clause rather than as integrating the agreements. Therefore, the debtor in possession may sell the servicing agreement without assuming or curing the repurchase obligation under the sale agreement. DB Structured Prods., Inc. v. Am. Home Mortgage Holdings, Inc (Am. Home Mortgage Holdings, Inc.), 402 B.R. 87 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).

9.1.iiii Municipal debtor may reject collective bargaining agreement under Bildisco standard. The chapter 9 municipal debtor sought approval to reject a collective bargaining agreement under section 365. State law restricts a municipality's ability to modify a collective bargaining agreement. The State had consented to the municipality's chapter 9 filing. The State cannot condition its consent on any limitation on the municipality's use of chapter 9's powers, because once the State consents, the Bankruptcy Code preempts any otherwise applicable State law. Section 1113 does not apply in a chapter 9 case. The only applicable standard, therefore, for rejection of a collective bargaining agreement is that set forth in N.L.R.B. v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 465 U.S. 513 (1984), which applies to this case. In re City of Vallejo, 403 B.R. 72 (Bankr. E.D. Ca. 2009).

9.1.jjjj Whether a contract is executory is determined as of the petition date. The debtor had entered into a contract with a developer for the construction and sale-leaseback of a retail store. After bankruptcy, the developer completed construction and tendered the purchase price and the previously agreed form of lease to the debtor in possession. The debtor in possession moved to reject the contract. The contract was executory as of the commencement of the case. Section 365 gives the debtor in possession until confirmation or until an earlier date that the court orders to decide whether to assume or reject a contract. The contract's postpetition expiration by its own terms or the debtor in possession's action in terminating the contract can render a contract that was executory at the petition date no longer executory. In those circumstances, the debtor in possession may not assume or reject the contract, because it is no longer an executory contract. But permitting the non-debtor party's postpetition action, such as tendering full performance under the contract, to cause the contract no longer to be an executory contract would improperly allow the non-debtor party to deprive the debtor in possession of the breathing spell and evaluation period that section 365 provides. Therefore, whether the contract is executory is determined at the petition date, and whether the debtor in possession may assume or reject is not based on any action that the non-debtor may have taken during the case. Accordingly, the debtor in possession here may reject the contract as an executory contract, keep the real estate, and relegate the counterparty's rights to a general unsecured claim. COR Route 5 Co., LLC v. Penn Traffic Co. (In re Penn Traffic Co.), 524 F.3d 373 (2d Cir. 2008).

9.1.kkkk Lease determines when an indemnity obligation arises. Before bankruptcy, the debtor contracted but did not pay for work on its leased premises. The contractor filed a mechanics lien after bankruptcy and sued the landlord to foreclose the lien. The landlord incurred attorney's fees and the cost of a bond to release the lien. The lease required the debtor to keep the property free of liens and to indemnify the landlord from loss or costs, including attorney's fees, arising from the recordation of any liens. Section 365(d)(3) requires the debtor in possession to "timely perform all the obligations of the debtor ... arising from and after the order for relief under any unexpired lease of nonresidential real property until such lease is assumed or rejected". "Obligation", as used in this section, differs from a state "cause of action", which accrues as defined by state law, or a "claim", which is a Bankruptcy Code defined term that includes contingent and unmatured rights to payment. Rather, the lease determines what an obligation is and when it arises, which does not depend on an accrual approach. Here, the debtor breached the obligation to keep the property free from liens prepetition, because a mechanics lien arises on the property when the work is performed, even though the lien is not perfected until later. Therefore, section 365(d)(3) did not require the debtor in possession to perform the obligation to keep the property free of liens. However, the obligation to indemnify arose when the landlord incurred the loss and costs, which was postpetition. Section 365(d)(3) therefore requires the debtor in possession to pay the fees incurred after bankruptcy and before rejection. In re Designed Doors, Inc., 389 B.R. 832 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2008).

9.1.iiiii Lessor under a rejected lease must mitigate damages, but only to the extent of actual mitigating recoveries. The debtor rejected a personal property lease. Applicable nonbankruptcy law requires a lessor to mitigate damages. The lessor relet the property for the same rent to another lessee for a longer term, but the other lessee failed soon thereafter. Section 502(b)(1) disallows a claim to the extent it is unenforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Because the claim would be unenforceable to the extent the lessor did not mitigate its damages, the lessor's claim will be similarly disallowed in a bankruptcy case. However, a rejection damages claim is determined as of the petition date, and mitigation can occur only after rejection. Even so, the lessor's post-rejection actual mitigation, rather than a hypothetical mitigation as of the petition date, applies to claim allowance. In addition, the bankruptcy court must use the actual results of the lessor's mitigation, if that is available as of the time of claim allowance. Here, because the later lessee breached, the lessor's claim is reduced only by the amount the lessor actually collected from the later lessee, not by the amount the lessor contracted to collect. Giant Eagle, Inc. v. Phar-Mor, Inc., 528 F.3d 455 (6th Cir. 2008).

9.1.mmmm Whether an LLC operating agreement is an executory contract must be determined on the facts of each case. The debtor was a non-managing 48.5% member in an LLC. The debtor had no ongoing obligations under the LLC operating agreement. The operating agreement provided for the LLC's dissolution upon a member's bankruptcy. Whether an LLC operating agreement is an executory contract depends on whether the agreement's terms meets the definition of an executory contract, that is, whether there are obligations on both parties, the breach of which by one would excuse performance by the other. Here, there were no such obligations, so the operating agreement was not an executory contract. As such, section 365(e)'s anti-ipso facto provisions do not apply, and the bankruptcy caused the LLC to dissolve. Meiburger v. Endeka Enterps., L.L.C. (In re Tsiaoushis), 383 B.R. 616 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2007).

9.1.nnnn Workers' compensation insurance policy is not an executory contract. The debtor's workers' compensation policy was to expire two weeks after the petition date. The policy required the debtor to reimburse the insurer for the policy deductible amounts and the insurer to pay all claims incurred during the policy period. The DIP agreed to assume and extend the policy for four months and to post cash collateral to secure its reimbursement obligation. No objection was filed, and the bankruptcy court approved. The unreimbursed deductible amounts later far exceeded the collateral posted, but nearly all amounts arose from prepetition injuries. Later, the chapter 7 trustee sought to revise the assumption order to limit the collateral's use to unreimbursed deductibles for postpetition injuries. The policy was not an executory contract, because the insurer was obligated to pay prepetition claims whether or not the debtor complied with or violated its reimbursement obligation. Therefore, the assumption order was improper as authorizing something the Bankruptcy Code does not permit, and the order would thus be interpreted to permit reimbursement only of postpetition injury deductibles. Zurich Am. Ins. Co. v. Int'l Fibercom, Inc. (In re Int'l Fibercom, Inc.), 503 F.3d 933 (9th Cir. 2007).

9.1.oooo Debtor in possession may assume a patent license. A patent licensor moved to require the debtor in possession to reject the patent license or for stay relief to permit the licensor to terminate it. The debtor was not in default under the license (except for the bankruptcy filing). The license permitted the debtor to assign it with the licensor's consent, not to be unreasonably withheld. The debtor in possession had not moved yet to assume or assign the license. Though the statute prohibits a "trustee" from assuming a non-assignable contract, the rule for a debtor in possession differs. A debtor in possession's performance does not deprive the licensor of its bargain, as might be the case with a trustee's performance. As the Supreme Court noted in NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 465 U.S. 513, 528 (1984), for certain purposes, "it is sensible to view the debtor-in-possession as the same 'entity' which existed before the filing of the bankruptcy petition." Therefore, the debtor in possession may assume the license, and the court denies the licensor's motion. In re Aerobox Composite Structures, LLC, 373 B.R. 135 (Bankr. D. N. Mex. 2007).

9.1.pppp Assignment requires adequate assurance of performance of material and economically significant contract terms. The debtor acquired a Tulsa warehouse facility from a customer and contemporaneously entered into a long-term agreement to supply the customer goods "from the Tulsa Facility". The customer required supply "from the Tulsa Facility" to maintain employee and electronic ordering system continuity. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession moved to assign the supply agreement, but, with the assignee's consent, rejected the Tulsa facility lease, so the assignee would supply the customer from another facility. Section 365(f) permits a DIP to assign the agreement if it can provide "adequate assurance of future performance” by the assignee. The adequate assurance requirement applies only to contract terms that are “material and economically significant”. A contract term is material if it was integral to the bargained-for exchange. It is economically significant if performance is required to give the contract counterparty the full benefit of its bargain. Here, the “Tulsa Facility” clause was integral to the supply agreement. Not enforcing it would burden the customer in an economically significant way by depriving it of the expediency it expected from the Tulsa facility. Therefore, the DIP may not assign the contract without compliance with the clause. In re Fleming Cos., 499 F.3d 300 (3d Cir. 2007).

- 9.1.qqqq The debtor in possession may not assume a franchise agreement that licenses a trademark. The debtor was a franchisee. The franchise agreement contained a license of the franchisor’s trademark. Under the Lanham Act, a nonexclusive trademark license is absolutely nonassignable. Section 365(c)(1) therefore prohibits the debtor in possession from assuming the franchise agreement. The prohibition in section 365(c)(1) applies equally to debtors in possession and to trustees, because DIPs have all the rights and powers, and are subject to all the duties and obligations, of a trustee. Unless the license agreement itself permits assignment, the DIP may not assume the franchise agreement. Wellington Vision, Inc. v. Pearle Vision, Inc. (In re Wellington Vision, Inc.), 364 B.R. 129 (S.D. Fla. 2007).
- 9.1.rrrr Contract rejection does not cause a reversion of transferred assets. The debtor recording company entered into a recording contract with a singer. The contract provided for the singer’s transfer of copyrights to the debtor; in exchange, the debtor would record, distribute, and promote the singer’s recordings and would pay royalties on the copyrights. The debtor in possession rejected the agreement in its chapter 11 case. Rejection does not rescind the contract. It only relieves the debtor in possession of executory obligations, such as the obligations to distribute and promote recordings and to pay royalties. It does not unwind fully executed portions of the rejected contract, and it does not obligate the debtor in possession to return property that has been transferred to it under the contract. Thompkins v. Lil’ Joe Records, Inc., 476 F.3d 1294 (11th Cir. 2007).
- 9.1.ssss Debtor may assume a partnership agreement even after the expiration of the default cure period. The debtor general partner defaulted under the partnership agreement. The default permitted the limited partner to remove the general partner, after notice and an opportunity to cure the default. The limited partner gave notice, and the general partner failed to cure within the agreement’s cure period, but the limited partner’s subsequent attempt to remove the general partner was technically deficient. The general partner filed chapter 11 shortly thereafter. Because the removal was ineffective, the automatic stay prevented the limited partner from removing the general partner after bankruptcy. The partnership agreement is an executory contract that the general partner could assume. Even though the default cure period had expired, the debtor may cure and assume, as long as the contract had not been effectively terminated before bankruptcy. In re St. Casimir Dev. Corp., 358 B.R. 24 (S.D. N.Y. 2007).
- 9.1.tttt Unscheduled executory contract rides through a chapter 11 case. The debtor omitted an executory contract from its schedules. The debtor confirmed a 100% payment plan, which also did not mention the contract. Contract litigation, which had been stayed pending settlement negotiations during the chapter 11 case, restarted after plan confirmation. The contract rode through the chapter 11 case, even though it was not scheduled. Section 1123(b) permits but does not require assumption or rejection of all executory contracts. Section 1141(b) vests all property of the estate in the reorganized debtor, except as provided in the plan or the confirmation order. Whether the debtor is judicially estopped from pursuing its claim against the contract counterparty in the state court litigation is for the state court to decide, not the bankruptcy court. In re JZ, LLC, 357 B.R. 816 (Bankr. D. Ida. 2006), aff’d sub nom. Diamond Z Trailer, Inc. v. JZ L.L.C. (In re JZ L.L.C.), 371 B.R. 412 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

9.1.uuuu Bankruptcy court may enjoin a strike under a rejected RLA-governed collective bargaining agreement. Section 1113 permits a trustee to reject a collective bargaining agreement or to impose modifications only with court approval. The Railway Labor Act explicitly requires the parties to maintain the status quo, under Section 6, and implicitly under Section 2 (First), after an agreement has expired, and thereby prevents unilateral modifications and a strike. In addition, Section 2 (First) explicitly requires the parties to make all reasonable efforts to make and maintain agreements. The Norris-LaGuardia Act deprives federal courts of jurisdiction to enjoin a strike, except in limited circumstances, including to enforce the RLA's provisions. In this case, the debtor in possession obtained court approval to reject and to impose modifications, after the employees had rejected their union's contract modification recommendations. The employees threatened a strike, and the DIP sought to enjoin them. Section 1113 authorizes the court to impose new terms, which is inconsistent with the RLA's status quo requirements applicable to a breached contract. Therefore, the rejection of an RLA-governed collective bargaining agreement constitutes an abrogation of the contract, not a mere breach, as would be the case for a non-labor contract or perhaps even for an NRLA-governed labor contract. The status quo provisions therefore no longer apply. The requirement to make all reasonable efforts to make an agreement continues to apply, however, and the court may enjoin the breach of that requirement. Northwest Airlines Corp. v. Assoc. of Flight Attendants-CWA (In re Northwest Airlines Corp.), 483 F.3d 160 (2d Cir. 2007).

9.1.vvvv Contract rejection is governed by the business judgment rule and does not require compliance with nonbankruptcy notice requirements. The debtor in possession independent practice association terminated a contract with a provider physician during bankruptcy in accordance with the contract's terms. The physician filed an adversary proceeding alleging violations of state law governing contracts with provider networks. The DIP then moved to reject the contract. The nonbankruptcy business judgment rule applies equally to the business judgment to reject an executory contract. The bankruptcy court should presume that the DIP "acted prudently, on an informed bases, in good faith, and in the honest believe that the action taken was in the best interests of the bankruptcy estate" and should approve rejection unless the DIP's "conclusions that rejection would be advantageous is so manifestly unreasonable that it could not be based on sound business judgment, but only on bad faith, or whim or caprice." The court need not weigh the adverse effect of rejection on the other party unless the effect is so disproportionate to the advantage to the estate that it shows that rejection could not be a sound business judgment. The DIP need not comply with any contractual or nonbankruptcy law notice requirements for contract termination, because the power to reject supersedes any such requirement. Rejection does not, however, affect substantive rights, so the estate may be subject to claims for termination, even arising from rejection, such as for retaliatory termination. Agarwal v. Pomona Valley Med. Grp. (In re Pomona Valley Med. Grp.), 476 F.3d 665 (9th Cir. 2007).

9.1.wwww "Surrender" in section 502(b)(6) may require landlord consent. An individual subleased stores to his closely held corporation. After the individual defaulted under one lease, his lessor sued. In the action, the individual stipulated with the lessor for return of the premises. After further litigation, the lessor obtained a judgment against the individual for unpaid rent and for future damages for breach. After the litigation concluded and about three years after the individual turned over possession to the lessor, the individual and his closely held corporation agreed to sell the assets related to the business. The buyer insisted that the sale occur through chapter 11 cases, which both the individual and the corporation filed. An auction ensued in the cases, and the final price permitted payment in full of all individual and corporate creditors, with a surplus for the individual. The individual objected to the lessor's claim under section 502(b)(6). Although section 502(b)(6) was intended to protect creditors from the dilutive effect of large landlord claims, it applies equally in a surplus case, and the court may not change that result using equitable powers under section 105(a). (The court may, however, examine whether the debtor filed bankruptcy in bad faith, without need for bankruptcy relief, simply to impose the landlord damages cap, and may dismiss if that is the case.) In this case, the individual debtor turned over possession of the premises prepetition. The turnover did not constitute “surrender” or “repossession” for purposes of section 502(b)(6)(A). Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, “surrender” occurs only when the landlord accepts it. Because the landlord here accepted possession but did not accept lease termination and instead continued to pursue its lease damages claim, it did not accept surrender. The landlord damages cap therefore runs from the petition date, and the rent for the post-turn-over, prepetition period is treated as accrued, unpaid rent that is not subject to the cap. 1500 Mineral Spring Assocs., LP v. Gencarelli, 353 B.R. 771 (D.R.I. 2006).

9.1.xxxx Contract rejection damages are determined as of the petition date. The debtor had entered into a supply contract one month before the date of the filing of the petition. The debtor in possession continued to perform under the contract for one year postpetition, until the supply price rose substantially, and then rejected the contract. Section 502(g) provides that a claim for rejection damages “shall be determined, and shall be allowed ... or disallowed ..., the same as if such claim had arisen before the date of the filing of the petition.” To give the word “determined” meaning separate from “allowed or disallowed,” the section must be interpreted as requiring calculation of damage claims as of the petition date, not the rejection date. Therefore, the counterparty’s damage claim is disallowed, as there was no price movement in the short period between the contract date and the petition date. The counterparty should protect itself from such a risk by a motion under section 365(d)(2) to fix a time for the debtor in possession to assume or reject the contract. Taunton Mun. Lighting Plant v. Enron Corp. (In re Enron), 354 B.R. 652 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

9.1.yyyy Court denies implied assumption and refuses to order assumption as a remedy for lack of notice. The debtor in possession sold its assets in a section 363 sale. The sale contract and notice provided that contracts to be assumed would be listed and counterparties would receive direct notice. The chapter 11 plan then provided for rejection of all contracts that were not assumed. Several contract counterparties did not receive adequate notice of the sale or of procedures relating to contract assumptions in the sale, but they were not included on any assumption list. They nevertheless provided post-sale services to the buyer under the contracts, who took the services and paid for them at the contract rates. The liquidating trustee under the plan later sued the counterparties to recover preferences. Under In re Superior Toy & Mfg. Co., 78 F.3d 1169 (7th Cir. 1996), a counterparty to an assumed contract is not liable under the preference statute for prepetition contract payments. Superior Toy does not protect the counterparties here. The buyer’s use of the contracts did not amount to an implied assumption, which requires court approval under section 365. Nor would the court order the contracts assumed as a remedy for lack of notice, as the assumption decision rests with the trustee or debtor in possession. Gray v. Western Envtl. Servs. & Testing (In re Dehon, Inc.), 352 B.R. 546 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2006).

9.1.zzzz Rejection does not terminate a lease. The debtor rejected a real property lease. The lessor filed a claim for damages. The lessor’s secured lender had a security interest in rents owing under the lease, but not in damages arising from lease termination. Rejection operates only as a breach of the lease but does not terminate the lease. Termination requires some other, affirmative lessor action. Attempting to relet the premises alone does not suffice. The lessor took no other action in this case. Therefore, the secured lender’s security interest in the rents attached to the debtor’s payment on the lease rejection damage claim. Cal. Pub. Employees Retirement Sys. v. Stanton (In re CP Holdings, Inc.), 349 B.R. 189 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

9.1.aaaa Deferred rent is not subject to the section 502(b)(6) cap on lessor’s damages. Section 502(b)(6) caps a lessor’s claim for damages resulting from termination of a real property lease but does not cap a claim for “any unpaid rent due under such lease, without acceleration,” on the petition date. Where a lease provides for deferred rent, which accrues during the lease term but is not payable until later, and the lessee files bankruptcy before the date on which it is payable, the cap does not apply. In this provision, “due” means owing, not matured. The deferred rent is past rent that is not subject to the cap. RM 18 Corp. v. Aztex Ass’n (In re Malease 14FK Corp.), 351 B.R. 34 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2006).

9.1.bbbbb A cross-default clause does not integrate economically separate agreements. The debtor airline leased airport facilities from the city. In a separate transaction some years later, the city issued non-recourse tax exempt bonds, the proceeds of which were loaned to the airline to finance the airline’s construction of facilities at the airport. The airline’s unsecured note obligation to the city was pledged to the bondholders, and the city had no liability on the bonds beyond what the airline paid on its note obligation. The airline’s reorganization plan restructured the note obligation. The airport lease cross-defaulted if the airline defaulted under the note obligation. The city argued that the airline could assume the lease only if it cured the note obligation default. The loss of the lease would cause substantial economic harm to the airline. Non-enforcement of the cross-default provision would not affect the city’s obligation to the bondholders, its ability to finance in the future, or airport operations or finances. Whether a cross-default clause is enforceable as a condition to cure and assumption depends on whether the two agreements are economically interdependent, that is, whether the consideration for one agreement supports the other. A statement of intent that the agreements be integrated cannot overcome economic realities, and a cross-default clause cannot integrate otherwise severable agreements. The court must look to the economic substance of the deal. The court rejects section 365(f)’s anti-assignment prohibition and the bankruptcy court’s equitable power as bases for refusing to require cure of a cross-default clause, adopting instead an analysis that determines the scope of the contract to be assumed. Here, the airport facilities lease was not economically linked to the bonds in a way that the city would lose the benefit of its lease bargain if the airline did not pay the bonds. Therefore, the airline could assume the lease without curing the note obligation default. United Air Lines, Inc. v. U.S. Bank Trust N.A. (In re UAL Corp.), 346 B.R. 456 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006).

9.1.ccccc An unexercised option is not an executory contract. As of the petition date, the debtor had an option to require a lender to purchase and lease equipment to it. The debtor did not assume or reject the option under the confirmed plan, which revested all of the estate’s assets in the debtor. Under the Countryman definition, which applies in the Fourth Circuit, an option is not an executory contract because the debtor has no performance obligation unless and until it exercises the option. The definition of executory contract for purposes of section 365(c)(2), relating to financial accommodation contracts, does not differ from the general definition applicable under section 365. The option was only an asset of the debtor’s estate and revested in the debtor upon reorganization. The reorganized debtor may therefore exercise the option. BNY Cap. Funding LLC v. US Airways, Inc. 345 B.R. 549 (E.D. Va. 2006).

9.1.ddddd The court may enjoin an airline union strike after the debtor-air carrier rejects a collective bargaining agreement. Section 6 of the Railway Labor Act, which applies to labor relations between an air carrier and its unions, requires a mediation process under the National Mediation Board before an employer may unilaterally impose changes in employment terms or conditions or a union may strike. Despite the anti-injunction provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, a court may enjoin unilateral action if the employer or union violates the “status quo” requirements of section 6. A bankruptcy court may authorize rejection of a collective bargaining agreement under section 1113 and authorize the debtor in possession to impose changes in employment terms and conditions unilaterally only if it determines that the union did not act in good faith in rejecting the debtor in possession-employer’s proposal for the changes, the changes are required for the survival of the debtor, and rejection is fair and equitable. By imposing the changes after bankruptcy court approval, the debtor does not violate or terminate the section 6 mediation process, because Congress specifically authorized the court to approve the action. The union is therefore required to continue to comply with the status quo requirements of that section, and the court may enjoin a strike that would violate its section 6 obligations. In this case, the injunction is warranted because the inability of the airline to impose the changes could lead to its economic demise. The result differs significantly from the operation of section 6 and the ability of a solvent employer to make unilateral changes during the section 6 mediation procedure, because section 1113 permits the employer, subject to extensive substantive and procedural requirements, to make changes once authorized by the bankruptcy court, and from the operation of section 1113 and the Norris-LaGuardia Act in the context of the National Labor Relations Act, which does not have a similar mediation procedure and status quo requirement. Northwest Airlines Corp. v. Ass'n of Flight Attendants (In re Northwest Airlines Corp.), 349 B.R. 338 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

- 9.1.eeeee Installment land sale contract is an executory contract under Ohio law. Under Ohio law, once a purchaser has paid more than 20% of the purchase price or has paid for more than five years, the seller may not obtain a forfeiture under the contract but must undertake a judicial foreclosure proceeding to divest the purchaser of its rights under the contract. Under Sixth Circuit's application of the Countryman test, an installment land sale contract is an executory contract, because breach of the purchaser's continuing payment obligation would excuse the seller from further performance, and the seller's failure or impairment of its ability to deliver title would excuse the purchaser from making further payments. The Ohio statute affects only the seller's remedies and does not alter the underlying nature of the installment land sale contract as an executory contract under the Countryman test. O'Brien v. Ravenswood Apts. (In re Ravenswood Apts.), 338 B.R. 307 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).
- 9.1.fffff Remedies for rejection of a land purchase contract. The debtor agreed in writing to lease 70% of a parcel to a tenant and later (but before the lease term began) agreed orally to sell the tenant the entire parcel. The buyer occupied the 70% parcel and, with the debtor's consent mortgaged the entire parcel to finance improvements. The debtor filed chapter 11 and rejected the sale agreement. Section 365(i) permits a buyer in possession under a rejected contract to sell real estate either to surrender possession and claim for damages or to remain in possession, tender the balance of the purchase price, offset by any damages, and complete the sale, despite the rejection. Specific performance under applicable nonbankruptcy law is therefore not available, because the federal bankruptcy remedy preempts the field of remedies for a breach arising from rejection. Here, however, the buyer went into possession under the lease, not under the purchase agreement, so section 365(i) is not available. The debtor also moved to reject the lease. Because the buyer was in possession under the lease, section 365(h), which allows a lessee to remain in possession following a debtor-lessor's lease rejection, applies. Finally, the buyer has a dischargeable claim for the sale agreement rejection. Although the buyer had a specific performance right under nonbankruptcy law, the right can be reduced to a monetary claim. In re Nickel Midway Pier, LLC, 341 B.R. 486 (D.N.J. 2006).
- 9.1.ggggg Fifth Circuit adopts "actual test," requires stay relief before contract termination. The debtor had entered into a Western States Power Pool Agreement with Bonneville Power Administration to sell power to BPA at BPA's option. When the debtor filed chapter 11, BPA terminated the agreement. The debtor in possession sought rescission of the termination and damages for an automatic stay violation. The agreement is not a "safe harbor" forward contract, because BPA cannot be a forward contract merchant, because it is not a "person," as the forward contract merchant definition requires. BPA may not terminate the agreement under the section 365(e)(2)(A) exception to the ipso facto termination prohibition. Although the federal Anti-Assignment Act may apply to this agreement, it does not in fact apply, because the debtor in possession made no attempt to assume or assign the contract, and the ipso facto exception applies only to actual facts, not to hypothetical situations. The reference to "applicable law" in that exception “must apply to a set of circumstances; BPA creates smoke and erects mirrors when it argues that a contract not assignable as a matter of law, even if no such assignment existed in fact and no excuse existed in fact for the nondebtor party to refuse acceptance of performance in a particular situation, satisfies the language chosen by Congress in drafting the § 365(e)(2)(A) exception.” In so adopting the “actual test” for the exception, the court rejects the more equivocal reasoning of the First Circuit’s Summit Land decision and rules that the language is unambiguous. Finally, BPA may not terminate a non-safe harbor contract without automatic stay relief, even if the ipso facto termination exception applies, to assure orderly administration of the estate. Bonneville Power Admin. v. Mirant Corp. (In re Mirant Corp.), 440 F.3d 238 (5th Cir. 2006).

- 9.1.hhhhh UCC true lease test requires determination of parties’ reasonable expectations at the time of the lease. The debtor leased telecommunications equipment before bankruptcy. In the subsequent bankruptcy, the debtor in possession attempted to recharacterize the lease as a secured transaction. UCC section 1-201(37) provides a “bright line” test for determining that a transaction under which the lessee is obligated for a lease term that is not subject to termination is a security interest if one of four conditions is met. One of those conditions is that the lessee has an option to acquire the property for nominal consideration at the end of the lease. Consideration may be nominal if it is less than the lessee’s reasonably predictable cost of performing under the lease. That is, if the economic realities are that the lessee would exercise the purchase option rather than return the equipment, the consideration is nominal. In applying the test, the court must determine the reasonably predictable (that is, the anticipated or projected) cost of performance, as of the time of the transaction, not as of the expiration of the term, because whether a transaction is a lease or security interest is determined as of the time of transaction, not at some later time. This examination does not return to an “intent of the parties” analysis, because the parties’ expectations at the time reflect the economic realities surrounding the transaction, which determines whether it is a lease or security interest. WorldCom, Inc. v. Gen. Elec. Global Asset Mgmt. Servs. (In re WorldCom, Inc.), 339 B.R. 56 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).
- 9.1.iiiii Trademark license rejection deprives licensee of further use of the mark. In connection with a sale of assets, the debtor licensed a trademark to the buyer. The sale agreement, the license agreement, and other related agreements were an integrated contract. Nevertheless, even though the license agreement was part of that contract, the license agreement was an executory contract, because there were unperformed material obligations relating to use, restrictions on use, and maintenance of the registration on the trademark. In authorizing the rejection, the court must not substitute its judgment for the debtor in possession’s judgment, if the debtor in possession engaged in a sufficiently thorough and considered decision-making process (although the court then proceeded to consider each of the factors of the rejection decision independently). Upon rejection, the right to use the trademark reverts to the estate. Even though rejection does not terminate the license agreement, it relieves the debtor in possession of the obligations to protect the mark and not interfere with its use by the licensee. Rejection’s benefit is the estate’s reacquisition of the right to use the mark. Without that, rejection would not offer meaningful relief, which would be an absurd result. However, the court allows the licensee a two-year transition period to mitigate any harsh result on the licensee. In re Exide Techs., 340 B.R. 222 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).
- 9.1.jjjjj Right of first refusal in an LLC operating agreement, which is not executory, is enforceable. The debtor owned a 20% interest in an LLC. The LLC operating agreement did not impose any present performance obligations on the debtor, only contingent future obligations if certain events occur. The operating agreement is therefore not within the Seventh Circuit’s narrow definition of “executory contract.” The operating agreement contained a right of first refusal, under which the LLC and the other members had a right to purchase the debtor’s interest if the debtor attempted to sell it to a third party. The right was not contingent on the debtor’s financial condition or whether the debtor was in bankruptcy. The provision was therefore not an invalid ipso facto clause under section 365(e) or (f). Moreover, even if it were, section 365 does not apply, because the agreement is not an executory contract. In re Capital Acqs. & Mgmt. Corp., 341 B.R. 632 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006).

9.1.kkkkk Trademark license agreement is not assumable. Under the “hypothetical test,” a debtor in possession may not assume an executory contract if the contract is nonassignable as a matter of nonbankruptcy law, unless the counterparty consents. Thus, a debtor in possession may not assume a copyright license or a non-exclusive patent license. The same rule applies to a non-exclusive trademark license. It is the same kind of intellectual property, governed by similar federal law, and protects the licensor against the ability of a non-exclusive licensee to sublicense or assign the intellectual property. N.C.P. Mktg. Group, Inc. v. Blanks (In re N.C.P. Mktg. Group, Inc.), 337 B.R. 230 (D. Nev. 2005).

9.1.lllll Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to authorize rejection of power purchase agreements. The debtor provided electric power under wholesale contracts that are subject to FERC’s jurisdiction. The debtor in possession moved to reject the contracts under section 365 because the contract sale prices were substantially below market. It offered to continue to supply the customers, but at market prices. Under the filed rate doctrine, FERC has exclusive jurisdiction over rates charged under such contracts. Under the Bankruptcy Code, a bankruptcy court has broad power to permit the rejection of a contract, but only if rejection does not interfere with the jurisdiction of a regulatory agency or if the Bankruptcy Code specifically authorizes the interference. Authorizing rejection of these contracts would interfere with FERC’s jurisdiction and the filed rate doctrine, in part because the rejection was motivated by the debtor in possession’s desire to change the price at which it would supply power to the customers, not by its desire to exit the business entirely. The case therefore differs from the Fifth Circuit’s decision in In re Mirant Corp., 378 F.3d 511 (5th Cir. 2004), which authorized rejection where the debtor in possession did not seek price renegotiation. The wholesale price of electricity is an issue solely for FERC. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have subject matter jurisdiction to authorize rejection of these power purchase contracts. Calif. Dep’t of Water Res. v. Calpine Corp. (In re Calpine Corp.), 337 B.R. 27 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

9.1.mmmmm Abandonment of a contract terminates any interest in the contract. The debtor had contracted to build a methane gas recovery facility on a landfill and, separately, to sell the gas. The debtor’s lenders had a security interest in both contracts (among other assets). The debtor breached both contracts. The debtor’s chapter 11 trustee settled disputes with the landfill operator and the gas purchaser over the debtor’s breaches by agreeing to accept a small payment and a release of claims from both counterparties and to give up the estate’s right to the gas. The lenders proposed instead that they waive a portion of their secured claim, make a larger payment to the estate, and indemnify the estate against the counterparties’ claims, in exchange for the trustee’s abandonment of the right to collect the gas. The lenders would then use their security interest to step into the debtor’s shoes to complete the facility and sell the gas. Abandonment would not, however, transfer the rights to the lenders. First, only an asset can be abandoned, not a liability. The trustee could therefore not abandon the debtor’s obligation to perform under the contract. Nor could the trustee abandon the entire contract as a single property interest. Unlike abandonment of tangible property, abandonment of a contract causes the contract to cease to exist. In re Resource Tech. Corp., 430 F.3d 884 (7th Cir. 2005).

9.1.nnnnn Entire interest in LLC becomes property of the estate. The operating agreement for the LLC in which debtor had an interest, as supported by state law, provides that a member’s bankruptcy divests the member’s right to participate in management or operation of the LLC, leaving the member with only an economic interest. Section 541(c) preempts both state law and the operating agreement on this point, so that the debtor’s trustee succeeds to the debtor’s full interest as a member. In addition, because the operating agreement imposes no continuing obligations on the debtor, the agreement is not an executory contract. (See the court's prior decision in this case, 319 B.R. 200 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2005).) Therefore, the limitations of sections 365(c) and (e) do not apply to restrict the trustee's ability to obtain information from the LLC or to participate fully as a member. Movitz v. Fiesta Invs., LLC (In re Ehmann), 334 B.R. 437 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2005).

9.1.00000 Bankruptcy court permits going out of business sales despite lease restrictions.

The debtor's leases prohibited the debtor from conducting going out of business sales. Nevertheless, the debtor in possession sought authority to conduct such sales. The court grants the authority. First, a restriction on such sales is based on the insolvency or financial condition of the debtor and is therefore not enforceable under section 365(b)(2). Second, section 363(b) governs use of property of the estate, not section 365. When the lease has not been assumed, its terms do not bind the debtor in possession, and section 365 does not apply. Section 363 requires that the debtor in possession provide the landlord adequate protection, which can be accomplished by reasonable restrictions on the sales without need for strict compliance with the lease. In re Friedman's, Inc., 336 B.R. 880 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2005).

9.1.ppppp Section 365(g) is limited to determining claim priorities, not contractual rights.

Before bankruptcy, the debtor licensed its trademark to a manufacturer, who was permitted under the license to sell the product to its own customers directly, with the debtor's permission. After bankruptcy, without assuming the license agreement, the debtor in possession agreed with the manufacturer to amend the license agreement to allow the manufacturer to sell without the debtor's permission. The amendment provided that if the debtor committed a new and material breach of the agreement, the manufacturer would be entitled to continue to use the trademarks without permission. The debtor in possession sold its assets to an unrelated entity and rejected the license agreement. The rejection constituted a new material breach, but section 365(g), which deems a rejection breach to have occurred immediately before bankruptcy, does eliminate the effect of the amendment on a theory that the rejection breach occurred before the amendment. Section 365(g)'s main purpose is to determine claim priorities, not to determine the contracting parties' contractual rights. Therefore, the manufacturer retained the trademark license. A & L Labs., Inc. v. Bou-Matic LLC, 429 F.3d 775 (8th Cir. 2005).

9.1.qqqqq Court disallows setoff under an unassumed executory contract. The debtor entered into a prepetition contract with a collection agency, under which the agency collected delinquent amounts from the debtor's clients. The agency remitted the entire collection to the debtor, who then paid the agency its percentage, although the contract authorized setoff. At the petition date, the debtor owed the agency for prepetition collections. The day after the petition date, the debtor in possession cancelled its contract with the agency, though it did not appear to reject it. The agency continued to make collections and offset the amounts collected against its prepetition claim against the debtor, rather than remitting the amounts to the estate. The agency may not offset these amounts, because the claim was prepetition and the debt was postpetition and therefore not mutual. Because the debtor in possession terminated the agency contract and did not retain the agency, the agency's work was as a volunteer, and it was not entitled to compensation. Universal Guar. Life Ins. Co. v. Health Receivables Mgmt., Inc. (In re Health Mgmt. Ltd. P'ship.), 332 B.R. 360 (Bankr. C.D. Ill. 2005).

9.1.rrrrr Remedies for rejection of a land purchase contract. The debtor agreed to lease 70% of a parcel to a tenant and separately agreed to sell the tenant the entire parcel. The buyer occupied the 70% parcel and, with the debtor's consent mortgaged the entire parcel to finance improvements. The debtor filed chapter 11 and rejected the purchase agreement. Section 365(i) permits a buyer in possession under a rejected contract to sell real estate to surrender possession and claim for damages or to remain in possession, tender the balance of the purchase price, offset by any damages, and complete the sale, despite the rejection. Specific performance under applicable nonbankruptcy law is therefore not available, because the federal bankruptcy remedy preempts the field of remedies for a breach arising from rejection. The buyer has a dischargeable claim, despite the availability of a specific performance right under nonbankruptcy law, because the right can be reduced to a monetary claim. Finally, the buyer's year-round possession of a significant portion of the property and the right to mortgage the property qualifies it for the relief in section 365(i), despite some mechanical problems with implementing the language of section 365(i) for a buyer in only partial possession. In re Nickel Midway Pier, LLC, 332 B.R. 262 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2005).

- 9.1.sssss Surety bond is not an executory contract. The surety issued bonds to guarantee the debtor construction contractor's performance on construction jobs. The surety sought stay relief to cancel the bonds after bankruptcy, arguing that the bonds were financial accommodation contracts that section 365(c)(2) prohibits the debtor in possession from assuming. The Countryman test concludes that a contract is executory if the contract remains so far unperformed on both sides that a material breach by one party would excuse performance by the other. In this case, the debtor had no remaining performance obligation to the surety; all premiums had been paid. Moreover, the debtor's breach would not excuse the surety from future performance. Indeed, the debtor's breach triggers the surety's obligation to perform to the project owner. Finally, even if the contract were executory, it is not a covered financial accommodation contract, because the surety had already extended the financial accommodation to or for the benefit of the debtor before bankruptcy. United Surety & Indem. Co. v. Maxon Eng'g Servs., Inc. (In re Maxon Eng'g Servs., Inc.), 324 B.R. 429 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2005).
- 9.1.ttttt Section 365(e) protects the estate, not a co-obligor. A surety company issued, in favor of the debtor's creditor, a bond on which the debtor was jointly liable. Upon the debtor's bankruptcy, the creditor made demand on the bond and sued the surety company for payment. The surety company argued that section 365(e) prevented the creditor from demanding payment based on the debtor's bankruptcy filing. Without addressing whether the surety bond was an executory contract, the court concludes that the section 365(e) prohibition on enforcement of ipso facto clauses does not apply to protect a non-debtor party to a contract. Therefore, the surety was liable to the creditor, despite the debtor's bankruptcy. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Greenwich Ins. Co., 417 F.3d 193 (1st Cir. 2005).
- 9.1.uuuuu Prepetition consent permits contract assignment, despite section 365(c). The debtor was a party to a patent license agreement that permitted the debtor to assign the agreement upon a sale of the debtor's entire business. Normally, patent law makes a patent agreement non-assignable, and section 365(c) would therefore prohibit assignment, because section 365(c) makes a contract non-assignable if applicable nonbankruptcy law prohibits assignment and the counterparty does not consent. However, the non-debtor counterparty's consent in the contract itself takes the contract out of the patent law prohibition on assignment, so section 365(c) does not apply. In re Quantegy, Inc., 326 B.R. 467 (Bankr. M.D. Ala. 2005).
- 9.1.vvvvv Contract rejection does not affect arbitration provision. The debtor sought to prevent arbitration of its dispute with its contract counterparty by arguing that upon rejection of the contract, the arbitration clause no longer applied. However, rejection constitutes a breach, no more, and a party should not be able to excuse itself from performing a contract term (the arbitration agreement) by its own breach. Therefore, the arbitration clause continues to apply after rejection. Madison Foods, Inc. v. Fleming Cos., Inc. (In re Fleming Cos.), 325 B.R. 687 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).
- 9.1.wwww Rejection claim is determined as of the petition date, not the rejection date. The debtor had issued its lenders warrants to purchase its common stock. As provided in the plan, the debtor in possession rejected the warrant contracts immediately after confirmation. The creditors' damage claim is based on the difference between the debtor's stock price immediately before the date of the filing of the petition and the warrant exercise price. Section 365(g) makes rejection effective immediately before the date of the filing of the petition, and section 502(g) provides that a rejection damage claim shall be determined and allowed the same as if the claim had arisen before the date of the filing of the petition. These provisions expressly override applicable nonbankruptcy law, embodied in UCC section 2-713, which provides for calculation of damages based on market price as of the time when the contract party learns of the breach. Bank of Montreal v. American HomePatient, Inc. (In re American HomePatient, Inc.), 414 F.3d 614 (6th Cir. 2005).

- 9.1.xxxxx Whether a contract is executory is not necessarily determined as of the petition date. The debtor had entered into an agreement with a developer for the construction and sale-leaseback of a retail store. After bankruptcy, the developer completed construction and tendered the purchase price and the previously agreed form of lease to the debtor in possession. The debtor in possession moved to reject the contract. Although the contract may have been executory as of the commencement of the case, whether it was an executory contract that could be rejected under section 365 should be determined as of the date of the motion to reject. By then, the only remaining performance was the debtor in possession's, not the developers. Although the developer had remaining obligations—it had not yet actually paid the purchase price or leased the property to the debtor—it had been prevented from performing them only by the debtor in possession's refusal to perform. Under contract law, a party may not deprive another of contractual rights by virtue of its own breach. Under the Countryman test, a contract is executory if it is so far unperformed that the nonperformance by one party would excuse performance by the other. The debtor in possession's refusal to perform was a contract breach, so the developer's nonperformance did not excuse the debtor's nonperformance. Therefore, the contract was not executory and could not be rejected. In re Penn Traffic Co., 322 B.R. 63 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).
- 9.1.yyyyy The “hypothetical test” does not apply to a debtor in possession’s assumption of a contract or lease. The debtor’s lease contained a standard ipso facto clause, allowing the lessor to terminate upon the lessee/debtor’s bankruptcy filing. The debtor in possession moved to assume the lease. Section 365(c)(1) provides that “a trustee may not assume or assign” an executory contract or unexpired lease if applicable law excuses the non-debtor party “from accepting performance from . . . an entity other than the debtor or the debtor in possession.” This limitation does not apply to a debtor in possession’s assumption of a contract of lease. Although section 1107(a) grants a debtor in possession all of the rights and powers of a trustee, “subject to any limitations on a trustee,” a debtor in possession is not the equivalent of a trustee. Because a trustee is an entity other than the debtor in possession, section 365(c)(1) must be read differently when a debtor in possession moves to assume (although not to assign) a contract or lease. Otherwise, the section 365(c)(1) limitation would effectively read “a debtor in possession may not assume a contract if the counterparty is excused from accepting performance from an entity other than the debtor in possession.” Such a reading would be nonsensical. Therefore, the debtor in possession may assume a contract, despite an ipso facto clause. In re Footstar, Inc., 323 B.R. 566 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005). By the same reasoning, the non-debtor counterparty may not terminate the contract or lease, despite section 365(e)(2). Although section 365(e)(2) was not amended in 1984 in parallel with the amendment to section 365(c)(1), the result is the same. The lessor cannot be excused from accepting performance from the trustee (as provided in section 365(e)(2)). Section 365(e)(2) does not apply because there is no trustee, and the section cannot be applied hypothetically without confounding Congress’ intent to prevent enforcement of ipso facto clauses. In re Footstar, Inc., 337 B.R. 785 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).
- 9.1.zzzzz Federal law determines that section 365 applies only to true leases; state law determines whether a lease is a true lease. The debtor leased facilities from the city for a rent that equaled the debt service on the municipal bonds that the city issued to finance the construction of the facilities. The debtor in possession challenged the lease, claiming it was a disguised financing, and that section 365 therefore does not apply. Whether the word “lease” in section 365 applies to transactions that are leases in form or only in substance is a question of federal law. Congress intended section 365 to apply only to true leases, that is, leases that have the economic substance of a lease, not just the form. However, state law determines whether the economic substance of a particular lease is of a true lease or of a secured financing (unless state law looked only to form, because that would conflict with Congressional policy in section 365). California law applies to this transaction. It should be determined by state court decisions, rather than bankruptcy court decisions. Under California law, the lease is a secured financing: The rent is measured by the amount borrowed and is payable whether or not the tenant continues to occupy the facility. The payment includes interest only during the term of the lease and a balloon payment at the end. The debtor acquired the facility at the end of the lease for no additional consideration, and the lease terminates early if the debtor pays off the entire loan amount. United Air Lines, Inc. v. HSBC Bank USA, 416 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2005).

9.1.aaaaaa “Economic realities” test does not apply to determination of true lease. The debtor leased facilities from the city for a rent that equaled the debt service on the municipal bonds that the city issued to finance the construction of the facilities. The debtor in possession challenged the lease, claiming it was a disguised financing. The district court overrules the bankruptcy court’s application of the economic realities test to determine whether the transaction is a true lease or a disguised financing. Instead, applicable nonbankruptcy law applies. Under applicable Colorado law here, the intent of the parties at the time of the transaction determines the characterization of the transaction. The most important factor is whether the lessee obtains any equity in the leased property, such as through a below-market or nominal price purchase option. Here, the debtor/lessee had no such equity, so the transaction was a true lease. United Air Lines, Inc. v. HSBC Bank USA, 322 B.R. 347 (N.D. Ill. 2005), but see United Air Lines, Inc. v. HSBC Bank USA, 416 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2005).

9.1.bbbbbb Personal property lessor’s postpetition claim under the lease is an administrative expense. The debtor leased a telephone system. The debtor in possession stopped paying on the lease after the chapter 11 filing and stopped using the system during the chapter 11 case. The lessor did not seek payment until 13 months after the filing. The lessor was entitled to a claim under section 365(d)(10) for the entire period during the chapter 11 case commencing 61 days after the order for relief, even though it did not seek payment earlier. The lessor now sought immediate payment of the amount owing. The court notes the majority view, which holds that a personal property lessor is entitled to an administrative expense claim that arises directly under section 365(d), not under section 503(b), because section 365(d) says that the lessor is entitled to a claim “notwithstanding section 503(b)(1),” and the minority view, which holds that the lessor does not have an administrative expense claim, but only an obligation of the trustee, which the lessor must either seek to enforce or lose. The court tracks a middle course, finding that the lessor has an administrative expense claim under section 503(b), not under section 503(b)(1) which bases the claim on “use and occupancy” of leased premises. Otherwise, the lessor could not be paid under the Bankruptcy Code’s priority scheme, because section 507 provides for first priority only for administrative expenses allowed under section 503. The lessor is therefore to be treated to the same as other administrative expense claimants. Its claim is not necessarily entitled to immediate payment during the case, because a general administrative expense claim is not entitled to superpriority, and the claim is subordinated to chapter 7 administrative expenses under section 726(b). In addition, the bankruptcy court may not make an equitable adjustment under section 365(d)(10) of the lessor’s claim when the trustee fails to perform. The court may modify only the trustee’s actual performance, including the trustee’s ongoing payment obligation. CIT Communications Fin. Corp. v. Midway Airlines Corp. (In re Midway Airlines Corp.), 406 F.3d 229 (4th Cir. 2005).

- 9.1.cccccc Lessor collaboration to collect postpetition aircraft lease payments under section 1110 does not violate the antitrust laws. The bankruptcy judge enjoined aircraft lessors from taking possession of aircraft under section 1110, because the debtor in possession asserted that by acting in concert to collect amounts owing, the lessors violated the antitrust laws. Characterizing that claim as “thin to the point of invisibility,” the court concludes that competition occurs at the time credit is extended and would continue during the chapter 11 case by allowing the debtor in possession and the lessor to compete in the market for leasing aircraft. Allowing the debtor in possession to assert an antitrust claim here would result in a monopsony, by prohibiting the lessor from dealing with any other potential lessees for the aircraft. United Airlines, Inc. v. U.S. Bank N.A., 406 F.3d 918 (7th Cir. 2005).
- 9.1.dddddd An LLC operating agreement is not an executory contract. The debtor was a nonmanaging member of an LLC. The operating agreement imposed no obligations or duties on nonmanaging members but did make member’s interests nontransferable unless the managing member admitted the transferee as a member. Because of the absence of reciprocal obligations, the agreement was not an executory contract, so section 365(c) and (e)(2) did not apply to restrict transfer of the debtor’s interest to the trustee. Rather, section 541(c)(1) applied to make the restriction on transfer into the estate unenforceable, so the trustee succeeded to all of the debtor’s rights under the agreement. Movitz v. Fiesta Invs., LLC (In re Ehmman), 319 B.R. 200 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2005).
- 9.1.eeeeeee Court may authorize retroactive lease rejection. The debtor in possession moved for approval of the rejection of a lease of nonresidential real property on the date of the filing of the petition, sought a prompt hearing and rejection retroactive to the date of the filing of the motion, because a large rent payment was due between the motion and hearing dates. The court may properly authorize retroactive rejection based on the equities of the case, whether or not the landlord has regained possession. In this case, because the debtor had never occupied the premises, the debtor acted very promptly after the filing of the case and the motion, and the landlord’s motive in opposing retroactive rejection was to run up administrative rent rather than to gain access to the premises to permit reletting, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in authorizing rejection that was retroactive to the date of the filing of the motion. Pacific Shores Dev., LLC v. At Home Corp. (In re At Home Corp.), 392 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 9.1.fyyyyy Defaulting party may collect termination payment under power supply agreement. The debtor and its customer entered into a power supply agreement using the Western States Power Pool (WSPP) standard form agreement. Under the WSPP agreement, upon a termination of the contract, the relative positions of the parties are calculated based on current market prices for electricity, and the “out-of-the-money” party must pay the net position to the “in-the-money” party. When the debtor defaulted, the customer terminated the agreement. The debtor, who was in-the-money, sought payment from the customer, who defended on the grounds that it should not have to pay the defaulting party under Utah law, which governs the contract. However, Utah law requires the enforcement of the express terms of the contract. As this contract provided for the non-defaulting party to pay the debtor, the court enforces the contract according to its terms. Mirant Americas Energy Marketing, LP v. Vernon (In re Mirant Corp.), 319 B.R. 489 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2004).
- 9.1.gggggg Whether a lease is a “true lease” is determined under state law. Property rights in bankruptcy are determined under state law, unless a clear federal interest requires that federal law apply. The legislative history of section 365 does not manifest such a clear federal interest, so determining whether a lease is a “true lease” to which section 365 applies is based on state law. In this case, to finance improvements at a municipal airport, the debtor entered into a lease/lease-back transaction, under which it leased its airport facility to a municipal agency. The municipal agency issued tax-exempt bonds, the proceeds of which were used to construct improvements on the airport property. It leased the property back to the debtor for rental payments equal to the debt service payments on the municipal bonds. The lease-backs terminated upon payment of the bonds. Under applicable state law, the transactions were true leases, based on the intent of the parties. The triple-net nature of the lease terms, the matching of the rent to a debt repayment schedule, and the debtor's ability to terminate the lease by a lump sum payment of the remaining rent did not render the transaction a disguised security interest. HSBC Bank USA v. United Air Lines, Inc., 317 B.R. 335 (N.D. Ill. 2004).

- 9.1.hhhhhh Debtor in possession may not reject executory portions of a non-severable contract. Before bankruptcy, the debtor entered into an agreement to purchase the creditor's power plants and a related agreement to supply power to the creditor from those plants for a period of years at a below-market price. The pricing of the asset purchase agreement and of the power purchase agreement were related. Accordingly, the court concludes that the agreements are not severable. Because they are not severable and because the parties have already performed the asset purchase agreement in full, the debtor in possession may not reject its remaining executory obligations under the power purchase agreement. In re Mirant Corp., 318 B.R. 100 (N.D. Tex. 2004).
- 9.1.iiiii Rejection of a FERC-regulated power purchase agreement may be permitted only under the public interest standard. The debtor in possession sought approval of the rejection of a FERC-regulated power purchase agreement. Because rejection might implicate FERC approval, the filed rate doctrine, and the risk of interruption of electric service to the power purchaser's customers, the court imposes a standard for approval of rejection that is higher than the business judgment standard. When applying the higher standard, the court would give FERC an opportunity to investigate and to appear and be heard. The court would require that the debtor in possession show that the contract burdens the estate, that the equities balance in favor of rejection, and that the debtor could not reorganize without rejection. If rejection would compromise the public interest in any respect, lead to unjust or excessive rates, or cause any disruption in the supply of electricity, rejection would not be approved. In re Mirant Corp., 318 B.R. 100 (N.D. Tex. 2004).
- 9.1.jjjjjj Partial assumption and assignment of collective bargaining agreement permitted by union's failure to object. The buyer of the estate's assets assumed the collective bargaining agreement, but only as to claims arising after the closing of the sale, leaving pre-closing obligations as the estate's liability. After closing, the buyer refused to honor pre-closing obligations, and the union won an arbitration award, which the buyer moved the bankruptcy court to vacate. The assumption and assignment was not an improper partial assumption because the union did not object to the terms of the assumption and assignment at the sale hearing. What's more, the partial assumption did not impose the entire obligation of the agreement on the buyer, only the portion that it had agreed to assume. The court therefore vacated the award. Tenet Healthcare Philadelphia, Inc. v. National Union of Hosp. Employees (In re Allegheny Health, Educ. and Res. Found.), 383 F.3d 169 (3d Cir. 2004).
- 9.1.kkkkkk Section 1113 applies to an expired collective bargaining agreement. The debtor in possession began negotiations with its union well before the expiration date of the collective bargaining agreement, providing the union with adequate information as required under section 1113 and making reasonable proposals. The debtor in possession did not reach an agreement before the CBA expired. The union argued that the CBA's expiration made section 1113 inapplicable and that the company would have to bargain to impasse before it could unilaterally change terms and conditions of employment and would then be subject to an unfair labor practice charge if it did so unreasonably. The court overrules the union's arguments and permits rejection, because the company remained subject to the contract terms until impasse, even after expiration. A debtor in possession should not be penalized with the risk of an unfair labor practice charge nor be pressured into an early rejection decision by an impending contract expiration. In re Ormet Corp., 316 B.R. 662 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2004).

- 9.1.iiiii Coal Act benefits may be modified under section 1114. After a failed attempt at reorganizing, the debtor proposed a liquidating plan, under which it would sell assets free and clear of Coal Act obligations to retirees. Because the Coal Act applies generally to all coal operators, while section 1114 applies only to operators in chapter 11 who meet stringent requirements to permit modification of benefits, section 1114's modification authority takes precedence over the Coal Act's modification prohibition. Section 1114's requirement that the proposed modification be "necessary to permit reorganization" must be read as "necessary to confirmation of a plan" so as not to require a conversion to chapter 7 when a chapter 11 liquidating plan is appropriate. In re Horizon Natural Res. Co., 316 B.R. 268 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2004).
- 9.1.mmmmmm Swap counterparty need not terminate immediately after bankruptcy to preserve right to terminate. During the seven weeks after the bankruptcy filing, the debtor and its swap agreement counterparty engaged in negotiations over a buy-out of the swap agreement. When the negotiations were unsuccessful, the counterparty terminated the swap agreement under section 560 and the exception to the automatic stay in section 362(b)(17). The counterparty did not waive its right to terminate because of the delay. The termination was still as a result of the bankruptcy filing, as permitted by section 560. In re Mirant Corp., 314 B.R. 346 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2004).
- 9.1.nnnnnn Debtor in possession not required to defend landlord in prepetition personal injury action. Under its real property lease, the debtor had agreed to indemnify the landlord and hold him harmless from any claims of third parties arising from the debtor's occupation of the premises or its operations on the premises. Before bankruptcy, a tort plaintiff sued the debtor and the landlord for personal injury on the premises. After bankruptcy, the automatic stay prevented the suit from moving forward against the debtor but not against the landlord. The landlord sought to require the debtor in possession to continue to defend and pay the landlord's attorney's fees under section 365(d)(3), arguing that the obligations to do so arose after the date of the filing of the petition. The court rules otherwise, holding that the defense obligation arose prepetition, and, as a matter of state (Texas) law, the indemnification obligation did not arise until the landlord's liability to the tort plaintiff became fixed and certain, such as by judgment, and not before. Therefore, the attorney's fee demand was premature. In re FFP Operating P'ship, 2004 Bankr. LEXIS 896 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2004).
- 9.1.oooooo Treatment under section 365 requires "true lease." To finance improvements at various municipal airports, the debtor entered into lease/lease-back transactions, under which it leased its airport facility to a municipal agency. The municipal agency issued tax exempt bonds, the proceeds of which were used to construct improvements on the airport property. It leased the property back to the debtor for rental payments equal to the debt service payments on the municipal bonds. The lease-backs terminated upon payment of the bonds. The lease-backs were not true leases, because the municipal agency did not have any of the benefits or risks of ownership at the end of the lease-back term. Accordingly, section 365 and the landlord protections of sections 365(d)(3) and (d)(4) did not apply. United Airlines, Inc. v. HCS Bank USA (In re UAL Corp.), 307 B.R. 618 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2004), rev'd, 317 B.R. 335 (N.D. Ill. 2004).
- 9.1.pppppp Fourth Circuit adopts "hypothetical test" to prohibit assumption of non-assignable contracts. Following the Third, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits, the Fourth Circuit adopts the hypothetical (or "literal") test in construing section 365(c)(1). As a result, an executory contract that is nonassignable as a matter of applicable nonbankruptcy law, whatever the contract itself provides, may not be assumed, even by a debtor in possession in a chapter 11 case. The provision applies only where the applicable law imposes nonassignability based on the identity of the contracting party rather than on a general prohibition on assignment. In this case, the licensed software was copyrighted, and the Copyright Act prohibits assignment of a nonexclusive copyright license. Thus, the debtor in possession could not assume the nonexclusive software license agreement. RCI Tech. Corp. v. Sunterra Corp. (In re Sunterra Corp.), 361 F.3d 257 (4th Cir. 2004).

9.1.qqqqqq Contractual consent to assignment does not render contract assumable. A nonexclusive software license could be assigned, under the express terms of the license, to a successor in interest to substantially all of the debtor's assets. The debtor in possession argued that this contract provision permitted it to assume the contract in its chapter 11 case, despite the prohibition on assumption and assignment of this kind of contract in section 365(c). The Fourth Circuit disagrees, holding that a consent to assignment does not constitute a consent to assumption. RCI Tech. Corp. v. Sunterra Corp. (In re Sunterra Corp.), 361 F.3d 257 (4th Cir. 2004).

9.1.rrrrrr Credit card processing agreement is not a financial accommodation contract. Under a credit card processing agreement and the rules and agreements governing the VISA and MasterCard networks, if a merchant incurs chargebacks to its customers, for example, by reason of customer returns of merchandise or the merchant's inability to deliver a prepaid service, the card processor bears the risk of loss. It must advance funds to the customers' card-issuing banks and seek recovery from the merchant. This contingent obligation, even if characterized as a guarantee of the merchant's obligations on the chargebacks, does not make the processing agreement an executory contract to extend financial accommodations to the merchant/debtor, which may not be assumed under section 365(c)(2). To determine whether the contract is a financial accommodation contract, the court must evaluate the entire contract, not just whether the contract has incidental financial accommodation terms, such as short extensions of credit. The test is an objective one, not based on the principal purpose of the contract or the parties' intent. This contract provided for processing credit card payments that had been made by the debtor's customers, and the contingent chargeback obligation did not render it an unassumable financial accommodation contract. In re United Airlines, Inc., 368 F.3d 720 (7th Cir. 2004).

9.1.ssssss Shopping center lease use restriction is enforced. The debtor operated an auto parts store in a shopping center. The lease restricted the use of the premises to the sale of auto parts. The debtor in possession sought to assign the lease to a discount clothing retailer, and the landlord objected. The court enforced the restrictive use covenant under section 365(b)(3)(C), under which adequate assurance of performance of a shopping center lease requires that the assumption or assignment be "subject to all the provisions thereof, including ... a ... use ... provision." This section prevails over section 365(f)(1)'s general anti-assignment prohibition because it is more specific. Although the lease required the tenant to use the premises only under a specific trade name, the landlord did not press that ground against assignment, and the court did not reach whether that provision would be enforceable. Congress Fin. Corp. v. West Town Ctr. LLC (In re Trak Auto Corp.), 367 F.3d 237 (4th Cir. 2004).

9.1.tttttt Landlord's claim for removal of property at the end of the lease is not entitled to administrative expense priority. Section 365(d)(3) requires a trustee to "timely perform all obligations ... arising from and after the order for relief ... until such lease is assumed or rejected" Under Ninth Circuit precedent, the landlord has an administrative expense priority for any such obligations that are unperformed. In this case, the lease required the debtor to remove improvements from the real property upon termination or expiration of the lease. The debtor in possession rejected the lease without removing the property, and the landlord sought an administrative expense claim for the damages. Applying a "bright-line rule" for entitlement to administrative expense priority, the Ninth Circuit grants the landlord only a prepetition claim. Section 365(d)(3) applies only until rejection; the lease termination occurred only on rejection; and the removal obligation arose only on termination, so it did not come within the time period covered by section 365(d)(3). K-4, Inc. v. Midway Engineered Wood Prods., Inc. (In re TreeSource Ind., Inc.), 363 F.3d 994 (9th Cir. 2004).

9.1.uuuuuu Swap contract safe harbor applies only to contract termination, not litigation.

Before bankruptcy, the debtor had entered into a swap contract, which the counterparty terminated under the safe harbor of section 560 shortly after the debtor filed chapter 11. The swap required a settlement payment upon contract termination, based on market prices. In this case, the counterparty became liable to the debtor for the payment. After termination, the counterparty challenged the validity of the contract and of the termination by bringing a state court action against the debtor. The bankruptcy court rules that the action is stayed. The swap contract safe harbor in section 560 applies only to termination based on bankruptcy or financial condition, not for any other reason such as contract invalidity, and does not apply to litigation over the contract, which must be centralized in the bankruptcy court. In re Enron Corp., 306 B.R. 465 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2004).

9.1.vvvvvv True lease or security interest? The debtor had entered into an agreement for the counterparty to install energy saver light fixtures. The debtor would pay the counterparty over a period of up to eight years based on the expected energy cost savings. At the end of the term of the agreement, the counterparty had the option of removing the equipment and replacing it with equipment comparable to the prior equipment originally, abandoning the equipment or negotiating with the debtor for an additional lease term or for a buyout. The cost of removal would have exceeded the value of the equipment removed. After bankruptcy, the debtor sought to recharacterize the agreement as a disguised security interest, while the counterparty sought treatment as a lessor. The court determines the transaction is a disguised security interest. It relies on the 1995 version of section 1-201(37) of the UCC. The agreement does not meet the bright line test for recharacterization of a security interest, because the lease term does not exceed the useful life of the equipment, the debtor does not have a nominal purchase or re-lease option, and the debtor is not contractually bound to renew the lease or to become the owner of the goods. Nevertheless, because the economics and the lease negotiation dynamics dictate that counterparty must abandon the equipment at the end of the lease term, the court determines that the transaction is a disguised security interest. The court notes the departure in the 1995 version of the UCC from the “intent of the parties” test to the “economic realities of the transaction” test. The court discounts the importance of the accounting and tax treatment of the transaction. Duke Energy Royal, LLC v. Pillowtex Corp. (In re Pillowtex, Inc.), 349 F.3d 711 (3d Cir. 2003).

9.1.wwwwww Federal Anti-Assignment Act does not bar contract assumption. The debtor had a contract to supply power to the Bonneville Power Administration. The BPA argued that the Federal Anti-Assignment Act, 41 U.S.C. § 15, bars assumption or assignment of the contract and that the Act is enforceable under section 365(c)(1). The court concludes that the Anti-Assignment Act does not prohibit assumption because otherwise a debtor in possession would not be able to assume any agreements with the United States or its agencies. In addition, assumption gives the government what it bargains for because a debtor in possession is the same business with which it contracted. Finally, the court concludes that the 1984 amendment to section 365(c)(1)(A) was designed to permit a debtor in possession to assume otherwise unassignable contracts. The court notes that Congress’s failure to enact a comparable amendment to section 365(e) does not permit the counterparty to terminate a nonassumable contract. It reasons that section 365(c)(1) limits the trustee’s rights and powers and therefore had to be amended to prevent application of section 1107(a), under which the debtor in possession’s rights and powers are identical to those of a trustee. Section 365(e)(2) does not similarly limit a right or power and may not be used by a counterparty as an offensive weapon to penalize an estate. In re Mirant Corp., 303 B.R. 319 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2003).

- 9.1.xxxxxx Stay relief to permit contract termination is denied. The debtor’s counterparty sought stay relief to permit contract termination under an ipso facto clause. If the counterparty terminated the contract, it could retain the debtor’s deposit and would have an additional claim. If it could not and the contract expired by its terms, the counterparty would have to refund the deposit to the estate and would not have a claim. The counterparty’s desire for such a windfall did not constitute cause for relief from the automatic stay. In re Mirant Corp., 303 B.R. 319 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2003).
- 9.1.yyyyyy Post-petition, pre-rejection rent may not be prorated. The debtor rejected its real property lease on November 3. It attempted to pay only one-tenth of a month’s rent, prorating the rent for November. The Seventh Circuit rules that because the obligation to pay November rent arose on November 1, section 365(b)(3) obligates the debtor in possession to pay the month’s rent in full. The Seventh Circuit rejects application of In re Handy Andy Home Improvements Centers, Inc., 144 F.3d 1125 (7th Cir. 1998), which permitted proration of real property taxes that arose pre- and post-petition but that were billed post-petition, on the ground that Handy Andy involved pre-petition claims. Here, section 365(b)(3) explicitly requires performance of post-petition obligations that arise before rejection. Ha-lo Ind., Inc. v. Centerpoint Props. Trust, 342 F.3d 794 (7th Cir. 2003).
- 9.1.zzzzzz Denial of a motion to reject a collective bargaining agreement is res judicata. The debtor negotiated with the union, could not reach an agreement, and brought a motion to reject the collective bargaining agreement. The court denied the motion. The debtor then made a new proposal to the union, taking into consideration the court’s ruling on the first motion. The union rejected the second proposal, and the debtor filed another motion to reject. The court rules that the ruling on the first motion was res judicata, precluding the debtor from seeking ever again to reject the agreement in the case. The court imposes this result so as to prevent the debtor in possession from using the court to advise it on what kind of proposal will support rejection. In re Fulton Bellows & Components, Inc., 301 B.R. 723 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2003).
- 9.1.aaaaaa Real property lease rejection is effective as of date of motion. Because the debtor in possession did not wish to incur administrative rent under section 365(b)(3), it filed a motion to reject the lease on the petition date and sought an order making the rejection effective as of the date of the filing of the motion. On appeal, the district court rules that the bankruptcy court’s order making the rejection retroactive was not an abuse of discretion. The court rules that whether to make a rejection effective as of the motion date is a question for the discretion of the bankruptcy court. In this case, because the only issue was whether the debtor should be liable for administrative rent, the bankruptcy court properly authorized the early rejection date. Pacific Shores Dev., LLC v. At Home Corp. (In re At Home Corp.), 292 B.R. 195 (N.D. Cal. 2003).
- 9.1.bbbbbb Buyer of debtor’s intellectual property loses right to royalties. The buyer of the debtor’s business acquired the debtor’s intellectual property but specifically excluded a license of that property to a third party. The debtor in possession rejected the license agreement, but the licensee elected to retain the license and continue to pay royalties under section 365(n). Section 365(n)(2) leaves the royalties with the debtor, even though the buyer owns the intellectual property, because that section requires the licensee to make “royalty payments due under such contract,” which means that the royalties are connected to the contract, not the intellectual property. The court rejects an analogy to section 365(h), on the grounds that real property issues are “fraught with state law property principles not applicable in the intellectual property context.” Schlumberger Resource Mgmt. Servs., Inc. v. Cellnet Data Systems, Inc. (In re Cellnet Data Systems, Inc.), 327 F.3d 242 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 9.1.cccccc Section 1114 prohibits modification of retiree benefits. The debtor provided retiree health benefits before bankruptcy. The benefits plan permitted the debtor to modify or terminate the benefits at any time. Nevertheless, once the debtor had filed its chapter 11 case, section 1114 prohibits the termination of benefits without compliance with the procedures set forth in that section. In re Farmland Industries, Inc., 294 B.R. 903 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2003).

- 9.1.ddddddd Court may permit “ride through” of unassumable executory contract. Once the bankruptcy court determined that the debtors could not assume a license agreement under section 365(c)(1), the debtors sought to amend their plan to delete any reference to the contract and allow it to ride through the chapter 11 case. The court traces the history of “ride through” and notes that all prior decisions involved contracts that were inadvertently left unassumed or unrejected. When confronted in this case with the counterparty’s motion to require the debtor to reject the contract, the court notes the potential anomaly under which a debtor would have fewer rights in bankruptcy than outside of bankruptcy, which it finds inconsistent with the reorganization principles of chapter 11. The court ultimately determines that an order fixing a time within which to assume or reject under section 365(b)(2) is entirely discretionary and that the court may instead refuse to set a time and allow the contract to ride through, subject to any rights after bankruptcy that the parties would have under the contract. In re Hernandez, 287 B.R. 795 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2002).
- 9.1.eeeeeee To assume a contract, debtor need not cure non-monetary defaults, but ... . The debtor/lessor leased computer equipment under a lease that it wished to assume under its plan. The debtor had failed to deliver some of the equipment, substituting loaner equipment instead. The lessee objected to assumption on the grounds that the non-monetary defaults could not be cured, as decided in In re Claremont Acquisition Corp., 113 F.3d 1039 (9th Cir. 1997). The First Circuit B.A.P. rejects this reading of section 365(b)(2)(D), holding that the non-monetary defaults need not be cured to assume the lease. However, under the Second Circuit’s decision in Orion Pictures Corp. v. Showtime Networks, Inc., 4 F.3d 1095 (2d Cir. 1993), the monetary damages that the lessee might have suffered from the debtor’s non-monetary breach would have to be determined in the context of an evidentiary hearing in a court of competent jurisdiction. Thus, the debtor assumed the leases without a determination of its ultimate liability for cure. Eagle Ins. Co. v. BankVest Cap. Corp. (In re BankVest Cap. Corp.), 290 B.R. 443 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 9.1.fyyyyyy Property held by Qualified Like-kind Exchange Intermediary must be conveyed to the buyer. The debtor was a Qualified Intermediary for like-kind exchange transactions under section 1031 of the Internal Revenue Code. Its client had completed all of its obligations under the like-kind exchange agreement. The only remaining performance at the time of the debtors’ bankruptcy was for the debtor to convey the purchased real property to the client. On the client’s complaint for specific performance, the court rules that the like kind exchange contract is no longer an executory contract, because the only remaining performance is the transfer of title and because the trustee held only bare legal title to the property. Accordingly, the court orders specific performance. Manty v. Miller & Holmes, Inc. (In re Nation-wide Exchange Services), 291 B.R. 131 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2003).
- 9.1.ggggggg Trustee may not assign exclusive distributorship agreement to counterparty manufacturer’s direct competitor. The debtor was the exclusive distributor for a specialty steel. In its chapter 11 case, the debtor sold all of its assets to a direct competitor of the specialty steel manufacturer. The manufacturer objected. The court disallows the assignment, relying on U.C.C. section 2-210(2), which prohibits assignment of contracts in certain limited circumstances. The court rules that assignment of such an exclusive distributorship agreement to the manufacturer’s direct competitor would violate U.C.C. section 2-210(2) and that section 365(c)(1)(A) of the Bankruptcy Code permits application of section 2-210(2), because it makes the contract non-assignable as a matter of state law. In re Nedwick Steel Co., Inc., 289 B.R. 95 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2003).

- 9.1.hhhhhh Section 365(d)(3) applies only when the debtor is the lessee. The debtor leased space to a sub-tenant. Because of the debtor's non-performance of its obligation as sub-lessor, the sub-tenant incurred substantial expense for which it sought payment as an administrative expense. In disallowing the claim, the court determines that section 365(d)(3), which requires the trustee to "perform all the obligations of the debtor ... arising from and after the order for relief under any unexpired lease of non-residential real property," applies only where the debtor is the lessee. Einstein/Noah Bagel Corp. v. Smith's (In re BCE West, L.P.), 319 F.3d 1166 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 9.1.iiiii Section 365(n) does not apply to trademarks. After reviewing the legislative history that specifically excludes trademarks from the definition of "intellectual property" in section 101(35A), the bankruptcy court concludes that the protection of section 365(n) for intellectual property licensees does not protect trademark licensees. Accordingly, the debtor's rejection of a trademark licensing agreement deprives the non-debtor licensee of the right to continue to use the trademark. The court reasons that by excluding trademarks from section 365(n) protection, Congress intended that the harsh Lubrizol rule (In re Richmond Metal Finishers, Inc.), 756 F.2d 1043 (4th Cir. 1985), apply, thereby depriving the licensee of any right to use the trademark. The licensee retains only a claim for damages. Raima U.K. Ltd. v. Centura Software Corp. (In re Centura Software Corp.), 281 B.R. 660 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2002).
- 9.1.jjjjjj Partner's bankruptcy did not dissolve partnership. The Third Circuit notes the split in the case law on whether the bankruptcy of a general partner dissolves a partnership or whether section 365(e)(1) (invalidating ipso facto clauses) prevents the operation of the Uniform Partnership Act provision that causes dissolution of a partnership upon a bankruptcy filing. It does not reach the question, however, because it finds that in this case, neither the debtor nor his partner treated the partnership as dissolved upon the filing and in fact took action after bankruptcy consistent with continuation of the partnership's business. Section 365(e)(2)(A) and section 365(c)(1)(A) permit assumption of an otherwise non-assumable personal services contract if the counter party consents. In this case, there was consent by conduct, so the court concluded that the partnership had not been dissolved. Waskob v. Waskob (In re Waskob), 305 F.3d 177 (3d Cir. 2002).
- 9.1.kkkkkk "Support agreement" is not enforceable in bankruptcy. To provide credit support to the debtor's lenders, the debtor's parent agreed in a "Support Agreement" to invest funds in the debtor as needed to support the lender's loan and provide funds necessary to make payments on the loan. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, the lender sought to enforce the support agreement against the parent. The district court ruled for the parent, holding that the support agreement is "a contract to make a loan, or extend other debt financing or financial accommodations, to or for the benefit of the debtor, or to issue a security of the debtor." Such a contract may not be assumed under section 365(c)(2) and therefore could not be enforced either by the debtor or by the lenders for whose benefit the contract was made, once the debtor had filed bankruptcy. Chase Manhattan Bank v. Iridium Africa Corp., 197 F. Supp. 2d 120 (D. Del. 2002).
- 9.1.iiiii Assumption of contract validates preference. The debtor had entered into a merger agreement before bankruptcy. The merger agreement provided for deferred payment of a portion of the purchase price. The deferred portion was paid before bankruptcy within the preference period. The confirmed plan provided that all contracts not rejected were assumed. Under this provision, the court holds that the merger agreement was assumed and that as a result, the creditor did not receive a greater percentage than it would have received in a chapter 7 liquidation. The court ruled that the greater percentage test is applied taking into account the effect of assumption, even though in a chapter 7 case, the contract would not have been assumed. Philip Servs. Corp. v. Luntz (In re Philip Servs. (Delaware), Inc.), 284 B.R. 541 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).

- 9.1.mmmmmmm Non-creditor competitor does not have standing to object to assumption of contract. The debtor moved to assign its rental car concession agreements to an affiliate. Two of its competitors, who were not creditors in the debtor's case objected. The court rules that non-creditors do not have standing to object to the assumption and assignment of a contract. In re ANC Rental Corp., Inc., 277 B.R. 226 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).
- 9.1.nnnnnnn Section 365(f)(1) anti-assignment clause is narrowly construed. The debtor sought to assume and assign an airport rental car concession agreement. A local statute prohibited the undertaking of a concession at an airport without the written consent of the airport authority. The bankruptcy court rules that this provision does not prohibit assignment of the contract. It rules that the language in section 365(f)(1) that invalidates anti-assignment clauses states a broad rule, to which the anti-assumption language of section 365(c)(1) makes only a narrow exception. The (c)(1) exception applies only if "the applicable law specifically states that the contracting party is excused from accepting performance from a third party under circumstances where it is clear from the statute that the identity of the contracting party is crucial to the contract or public safety is at issue." In re ANC Rental Corp., Inc., 277 B.R. 226 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).
- 9.1.ooooooo Purchaser of intellectual property does not receive royalties from rejected license agreements. The purchaser acquired all of the assets of the debtor, including its intellectual property. The debtor had granted an exclusive license outside the United States to a licensee. Because the debtor was unable to provide the service required under the license agreement, the debtor rejected the agreement. At the same time, the purchase excluded the agreement and any assets or liabilities related to that licensee from its purchase. After rejection, the licensee elected to retain the license to the intellectual property under section 365(n)(2)(B) and make net license royalty payments. On a dispute between the debtor and the purchaser over the entitlement to the net license royalty payments, the court rules that the exclusion of the license agreement from the purchase entitled the debtor to the royalty payments, despite the purchaser's acquisition of all of the debtor's intellectual property. The court reasons that section 365(n)(2)(B) requires the licensee to "make all royalty payments due under the contract," which requires the payments to be made to the party to the contract (the debtor), not the owner of the intellectual property. What is more, rejection did not terminate the debtor's rights under the agreement. Schlumberger Resource Mgmt. Servs, Inc. v. Cellnet Data Systems, Inc. (In re Cellnet Data Systems, Inc.), 277 B.R. 588 (D. Del. 2002).
- 9.1.ppppppp Bankruptcy-related delay in option exercise permits price increase. The debtor had an option to purchase real property from the optionor. The option agreement specifically provided that if there was a delay in the exercise of the option beyond a specified date, the option price would increase by $5,000 per day. The debtor filed bankruptcy the day before the specified date and, relying on the 60 day extension under section 108(b), exercised the option 60 days later. The debtor moved to strike the daily price increase as being an invalid ipso facto clause under section 365(e)(1). The Eleventh Circuit overrules the debtor's objection. The court rules that the delay provision is not an invalid ipso facto clause because it is not conditioned solely on insolvency or bankruptcy, even though the parties agreed that the price increase provision was included in the option agreement expressly because of the possibility that the debtor might file bankruptcy and seek a delay in the exercise of the option. Yates Development, Inc. v. Old Kings Interchange, Inc. (In re Yates Development, Inc.), 256 F.3d 1285 (11th Cir. 2001).
- 9.1.qqqqqqq Boilerplate plan provision providing for contract assumption is ineffective. The reorganization plan contained the usual boilerplate provision that all contracts not previously rejected are assumed. The Fifth Circuit rules that such a plan provision is ineffective, because section 1123(b)(2) makes assumption of contracts under a plan "subject to section 365." Section 365(a) requires court approval of the assumption. Therefore, the general boilerplate is ineffective. The same is true with respect to rejection of contracts under a catch-all boilerplate provision in the plan. McGee v. Stumpf (In re O'Connor), 258 F.3d 392 (5th Cir. 2001).

- 9.1.rrrrrrr A partnership agreement is not assumable. Under Louisiana law, a partner cannot make a third person a member of the partnership without his partner's consent. Therefore, a partnership agreement in Louisiana is unassumable under section 365(c)(1), which prohibits assumption of contracts that are not assignable as a matter of law. The Fifth Circuit rules in addition that the provision is not limited to personal service contracts. McGee v. Stumpf (In re O'Connor), 258 F.3d 392 (5th Cir. 2001).
- 9.1.sssssss An unassumed contract passes through bankruptcy after confirmation of a chapter 11 plan to the debtor. The plan did not provide for the assumption of a partnership agreement, and the trustee did not assert a right to the economic interest of the debtor/partner under the partnership agreement. The chapter 11 plan provided for a liquidating trust to collect the assets of the debtor and distribute them to creditors, but characterized the liquidating trust as the "reorganized debtor." Because the partnership agreement was not assumed (and was not assumable) under the plan, it passed through bankruptcy to the individual debtor, not to the liquidating trust. To hold otherwise would permit the partnership agreement to be assumed by the trustee in violation of section 365(c)(1). The court suggests that the result might be different if the debtor continued to operate after reorganization and was in fact the reorganized debtor. McGee v. Stumpf (In re O'Connor), 258 F.3d 392 (5th Cir. 2001).
- 9.1.ttttttt Court enjoins declaration of lease default to prevent letter of credit draw. The debtor had obtained a letter of credit in favor of the landlord to secure the debtor's obligations under the lease. The letter of credit required the lessor to certify as a condition to draw that the debtor had failed to pay or perform one or more of its obligations under the lease. At the date of the filing of the petition, the debtor was current on all rent. The only default the landlord asserted was the filing of the bankruptcy petition. Upon the debtor's motion for a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction, the court enjoined the lessor from declaring a default, on the grounds that the ipso facto clause default was unenforceable in bankruptcy. As a result, the lessor was effectively prohibited from drawing under the letter of credit. In re Metrobility Optical Systems, Inc., 268 B.R. 326 (Bankr. D.N.H. 2001).
- 9.1.uuuuuuu Section 365(d)(3) protects a note payable under a lease. The tenant/debtor borrowed $600,000 at the time of entering into the lease and agreed to repay it as "further rent" under the lease. The first payment became due after bankruptcy but before the debtor rejected the lease. The Ninth Circuit rules that the payment is entitled to administrative expense priority under section 365(d)(3), because that section requires performance of "all the obligation of the debtor ... arising from and after the order for relief." The obligation does not, however, include statutory interest, because that obligation was imposed by the state statute, not by the lease. Cukierman v. Uecker (In re Cukierman), 265 F.3d 846 (9th Cir. 2001).
- 9.1.vvvvvvv A merger agreement with a non-compete provision is an executory contract. A shareholder had sold his business to the debtor. Part of the sale consideration was deferred, and the shareholder agreed not to compete for several years. Although the debtor's only obligation was the payment of money, the contract was executory under the stricter Countryman Test, because breach by either side would have excused performance by the other side. In re Teligent, Inc., 268 B.R. 723 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2001).
- 9.1.wwwwww A contract for the sale of a business is not a contract "to issue a security of the debtor." The debtor agreed to buy a business in exchange for its own stock. A portion of the consideration was paid upon closing, with the balance deferred. Under the contract, the seller agreed not to compete with the debtor. The debtor filed bankruptcy before the expiration of the non-compete clause and the due date of the deferred purchase price. The bankruptcy court rules that the agreement is not a contract “to issue a security of the debtor,” because the principal purpose of the contract was for the sale of the business to the debtor. The issuance of the debtor’s stock was incidental, much in the way that a contract to sell the debtor goods or services on credit does not constitute a contract to extend debt financing to the debtor. The court rejects the debtor’s argument that the prohibition in section 365(c)(2) is limited to newly issued stock, ruling that treasury stock previously re-acquired by the corporation would come within the prohibition. The court also concludes that the word “issue” applies to the debtor corporation, not to the third party, omitting the possibility that an underwriter might be considered an “issuer” of the debtor stock. In re Teligent, Inc., 268 B.R. 723 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2001).

9.1.xxxxxxx Lease obligation arises when billed for purposes of section 365(d)(3). In a break with the Seventh Circuit’s ruling in In re Handy Andy, 144 F.3d 1125 (7th Cir. 1998), the Third Circuit rules that the obligation of the debtor to reimburse the real property lessor for real property taxes “arises” for purposes of section 365(d)(3) when the lease says it arises, in this case, upon the lessor’s presentation of a bill for the taxes to the debtor. Because the landlord presented the bill for pre-petition taxes after the date of the order for relief, the taxes were payable as an administrative expense. Centerpoint Properties v. Montgomery Ward Holding Corp. (In re Montgomery Ward Holding Corp.), 268 F.3d 206 (3d Cir. 2001).

9.1.yyyyyyy Notice of contract assumption was deficient. In connection with a sale of its assets, the debtor served notice of its assumption and assignment of contracts to the other contracting party, without directing it to any particular officer (as required under Bankruptcy Rule 7004(b)(3)) or to the individual at the other contracting party with whom the debtors had previously dealt. The court finds the service inadequate. What is more, prior effective service of a notice of assumption and of assignment to an earlier bidder, who was not the ultimately successful bidder, was inadequate, because the other contracting party had specific and valid business reasons for objecting to the successful bidder, although it did not object to the initial, unsuccessful bidder. In re Golden Books Family Entertainment, Inc., 269 B.R. 300 (D. Del. 2001).

9.1.zzzzzzz A covenant not to compete is enforceable after rejection. The debtor rejected a franchise agreement, which contained a covenant not to compete. Because the rejection constituted only a breach of the contract and not a termination, the covenant not to compete, which remained effective after the franchisee breached, continued to bind the debtor in possession. The court did not address whether the obligation under the covenant not to compete was discharged. Sir Speedy, Inc. v. Morse, 256 B.R. 657 (D. Mass. 2000).

9.1.aaaaaaa Prepetition waiver of right to reject contract is unenforceable. In its second chapter 11 case reorganization plan, TWA entered into a ticket agreement that proved to be a substantial financial drain on the airline. But the agreement, which was part of the chapter 11 plan, prohibited rejection in a subsequent bankruptcy case. Nevertheless, in its third chapter 11 case, TWA moved to approve the rejection. The court permitted the rejection, holding that a prepetition waiver of the right to reject an executory contract is not enforceable, even when that agreement is entered into in a prior chapter 11 case. In permitting the rejection, the court also rejected the other party’s judicial estoppel and res judicata arguments, reaffirmed the business judgment rule for rejection, and rejected the claim that the court must consider the effect of rejection on the other contracting party. In re TransWorld Airlines, Inc., 261 B.R. 103 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001).

9.1.bbbbbbb Post-petition lease performance obligation applies only to lessees. Section 365(d)(3) requires the trustee to timely perform all of the debtor’s post-petition obligations under an unexpired lease of non-residential real property. In a case of apparent first impression, the bankruptcy court rules that the section applies only to a debtor lessee, not a debtor lessor, based on the last sentence of the section, which provides that acceptance of performance does not constitute a waiver “of the lessor’s rights” under the lease. In re BCE West, L.P., 257 B.R. 304 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2000); aff’d, 246 B.R. 578 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

- 9.1.ccccccc An LLC Agreement is not an executory contract. Under applicable Virginia law, the bankruptcy of an LLC member disassociates the member from the LLC but does not affect his economic interest in the company. Because the LLC Agreement in this case imposed no obligations on the member and permitted the member to resign at any time, the LLC Agreement was not an executory contract, and the provisions of sections 365(c) and (e), which might have otherwise restricted the enforceability of the provision that disassociates the member upon the filing of bankruptcy, did not apply. In re Garrison-Ashburn, L.C., 253 B.R. 700 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2000).
- 9.1.dddddddd Contract rejection does not waive defenses to the contract. The trustee rejected one of the debtor’s executory contracts. The creditor filed a proof of claim for rejection damage, to which the trustee objected. The court rejected the creditor’s arguments that the trustee’s rejection created a conclusive statutory breach of contract claim and permitted the trustee to object to the claim on the grounds of the invalidity of the underlying contract. Durkin v. Benedor Corp. (In re G.I. Industries, Inc.), 204 F.3d 1276 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 9.1.eeeeeeee Estate owes full month’s rent for lease rejected during the month. The debtor rejected the lease of non-residential real property and vacated the premises on the second day of the month. Because of the requirement of section 365(d)(3), which requires the trustee to “timely to perform all the obligations of the debtor . . . arising from and after the order for relief” the estate was liable for the full month’s rent to the lessor, even though the premises were occupied for only two days of the month. Koenig Sporting Goods, Inc. v. Morse Road Co. (In re Koenig Sporting Goods, Inc.), 203 F.3d 986 (6th Cir. 2000).
- 9.1.fyyyyyyy Discharge does not affect executory contract assumption cure claims. The discharge granted under section 1141(d) does not include cure amounts owing under executory contracts assumed under the plan. Century Indem. Co. v. NCG Settlement Trust (In re National Gypsum Co.), 208 F.3d 498 (5th Cir. 2000).
- 9.1.gggggggg Plan confirmation does not nullify executory contract cure requirement. The debtor’s plan listed a contract cure amount at $0. The creditor had not previously filed a proof of claim. The debtor argued that the cure amount claim was discharged under section 1141 upon plan confirmation. The court holds otherwise, ruling that the non-debtor is not required to file a proof of claim until after rejection of the contract and that the failure to file did not subject the claim for a cure amount to discharge. Century Indem. Co. v. NGC Settlement Trust (In re National Gypsum Co.), 208 F.3d 498 (5th Cir. 2000).
- 9.1.hhhhhhhh Contract to make a loan; termination; rejection; termination fee. Foothill Capital’s revolving loan agreement contained an early termination premium and permitted Foothill to terminate under various circumstances, including the filing of a bankruptcy petition, without notice of election and without demand. The court rejected Foothill’s argument that because its contract to make a loan was non-assumable under section 365(c)(2), rejection was inevitable and therefore the contract was terminated upon the filing of the bankruptcy. It also rejected Foothill’s argument that Foothill’s “silent” termination of the contract after bankruptcy entitled it to receive the early termination premium, ruling that had determination been automatic upon the filing or had Foothill given notice to the debtor of termination, it might have been able to collect its premium. Finally, the court rejects Foothill’s arguments that the early termination premium was a contingent claim that became fixed after bankruptcy and that the early termination premium was an allowable charge under section 506(b). Foothill Cap. Corp. v. Official Unsecured Creditors Committee of Midcom Communications, Inc., 245 B.R. 296 (E.D. Mich. 2000).

- 9.1.iiiiiii Assignment of less than all of a contract prevents release of the debtor. In selling its business, the chapter 11 debtor assigned a collective bargaining agreement to the purchaser, except that the purchaser was not obligated to assume the debtor's obligation to pay retroactive wage increases. Because the assignment was of less than all of the obligations under the contract, section 365(k) did not apply, and the debtor was not absolved of liability. In addition, because the contract was a collective bargaining agreement and the elimination of the retroactive wage payment obligation did not comply with section 1113, the modification was ineffective, and the debtor remained liable. American Flint Glass Workers Union v. Anchor Resolution Corp. (In re Anchor Resolution Corp.), 197 F.3d 76 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 9.1.jjjjjjj Prepetition agreement for sale of assets is not enforceable. The debtor entered into an agreement to sell all its assets in a chapter 11 case. The agreement was expressly made subject to the bankruptcy court's approval. The court ultimately ordered a sale to a different purchaser. Because of the court-approval contingency in the agreement, the agreement was not enforceable, and the purchaser's claim for damages for breach of contract was disallowed. In re Big Rivers Electric Corp., 233 B.R. 726 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 1998), aff'd, 223 B.R. 739 (W.D. Ky. 1998).
- 9.1.kkkkkkk Termination of a post-petition lease creates an administrative expense claim. The debtor-in-possession entered into a real property lease during the case. After conversion to chapter 7, the trustee terminated the lease and returned possession to the landlord. The landlord's claim for damages for breach of the lease was entitled to administrative expense priority, because the lease itself was an "actual and necessary expense" of preserving the estate, even though the future rent claim was not. The trustee could not, however, reject the lease under 365, which applies only to prepetition contracts, nor did the landlord damages cap of section 502(b)(6) apply, also because it applies only to prepetition leases. However, the claim is a chapter 11 administrative expense rather than the higher priority chapter 7 expense. Devan v. Simon DeBartolo Group, L.P. (In re Merry-Go-Round Enterprises, Inc.), 180 F.3d 149 (4th Cir. 1999).
- 9.1.iiiii Debtor in possession may not assume nonassignable contract. As a matter of federal law, a patent license is personal and nondelegable. In a narrow reading of Section 365(c)(1), the Ninth Circuit joins the Third and Fourth Circuits in adopting the "hypothetical test" to govern assumption of executory contracts. Under that test, a debtor-in-possession may not assume an executory contract over the other party's objection if applicable law would bar assignment to a hypothetical third party, even if the debtor-in-possession has no intention of assigning the contract. The Ninth Circuit thus rejects the view of the First Circuit, which adopted the so-called "actual test." Perlman v. Catapult Entertainment, Inc. (In re Catapult Entertainment, Inc.), 165 F.3d 747 (9th Cir. 1999).
- 9.1.mmmmmmm An agreement under section 1110 elevates lease obligations to administrative expense priority. If an airline makes an agreement under section 1110 to keep and pay for aircraft, then all rent accruing after the petition date is calculated at the rate set forth in the lease, even though fair rental value may be less, and is payable until return of the aircraft. In addition, an obligation to perform maintenance upon return is an administrative expense. Interface Group-Nevada, Inc. v. Trans World Airlines, Inc. (In re Trans World Airlines, Inc.), 145 F.3d 124 (3d Cir. 1998).
- 9.1.nnnnnnn Real estate purchase option is not necessarily an executory contract. Reversing its prior decision in Gill v. Easebe Enterprises (In re Easebe Enterprises), 900 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir.

1990), the Ninth Circuit en banc determines that whether a real estate option agreement is an executory contract is a question of fact to be determined as of the petition date. If the option has not yet been exercised, it is not an executory contract at the petition date. If the option has been exercised, then the obligations of both parties have come into play as under a normal real estate purchase contract, and the contract is an executory contract that is subject to section 365.

Unsecured Creditor's Committee v. Southmark Corporation (In re Robert L. Helms Construction & Development Co., Inc.), 139 F.3d 702 (9th Cir. 1998) (en banc).

- 9.1.00000000 Chapter 11 aircraft lessee may cure post-petition lease defaults. The debtor in possession complied with section 1110, curing pre- and postpetition defaults under its aircraft leases within 60 days after the date of the order for relief. Later, the debtor in possession defaulted on the leases. The aircraft lessors sought immediate relief from the stay and repossession. The district court holds that once the cure has been made within 60 days as required by section 1110, any subsequent default is governed by the general terms of the Bankruptcy Code governing the automatic stay and unexpired leases, not by section 1110. Western Pacific Airlines, Inc. v. GATX (In re Western Pacific Airlines, Inc.), 219 B.R. 305 (D. Colo. 1998). On a motion for reconsideration, the court reaffirms its decision and takes the lessors and amici curiae to task for a “sky-is-falling” assault on the prior ruling. 221 B.R. 1 (D. Colo. 1998).
- 9.1.pppppppp Unrejected collective bargaining agreement is deemed assumed. The chapter 11 debtor in possession did not reject its collective bargaining agreement before the case was converted to chapter 7. Because section 1113 permits rejection “only in accordance with the provisions of this section,” which were not followed in this case, the collective bargaining agreement “was assumed in bankruptcy as a result of the [debtor’s] failure to reject it in accordance with section 1113.” As a result, all pre-petition claims for contributions to pension plans became administrative expenses. Adventure Resources, Inc. v. Holland, 137 F.3d 786 (4th Cir. 1998).
- 9.1.qqqqqqqq Section 1113 does not apply to a modification after a sale of the debtor’s business. The buyer of the debtor’s business negotiated a modification of the collective bargaining agreement with the Union, reducing certain payments. The modifications were made contingent upon closing of the sale of the debtor’s business and assumption by the buyer of the collective bargaining agreement. The Union nevertheless sought to hold the debtor liable for the loss it suffered. The court rules that section 363(k) absolves the debtor of any liability and that this modification is not subject to section 1113, which speaks of modifications only by the trustee of debtor in possession and only before assumption of the contract. In addition, the listing of the contract in a notice of assumption, with a cure amount of zero dollars, binds the Union. In re Anchor Resolution Corp., 218 B.R. 330 (Bankr. D. Del. 1998).
- 9.1.rrrrrrrr Lease option may be exercised before assumption. Where a real property lease contains a renewal option that may be exercised only if the lessee/debtor is not in default, the debtor in possession may exercise the renewal option without assuming the lease and without curing any default, because to hold otherwise would effectively shorten the time within which the debtor in possession could decide to assume or reject the lease. Coleman Oil Co., Inc. v. The Circle K Corporation (In re The Circle K Corporation), 127 F.3d 904 (9th Cir. 1997).
- 9.1.ssssssss Anti-assignment restriction does not affect debtor in possession. A patent license is normally not assignable. Where the debtor proposes a plan that provides for the acquisition of its stock by a unrelated entity and its continuance as a going concern, section 365(c) does not prevent assumption of the patent license, because the debtor in possession is not a legal entity that is materially distinct from the pre-petition debtor and because the acquisition of the debtor’s stock by a third party does not constitute an assignment of an executory contract with the debtor. Institut Pasteur v. Cambridge Biotech Corporation, 104 F.3d 489 (1st Cir. 1997).

9.1.ttttttt Store closing is an incurable default. The debtor's franchise agreement gave the franchisor authority to terminate if the debtor/franchisee failed to operate the business for seven consecutive business days. The Ninth Circuit held that such a default could not be cured (because the store could not be reopened on the days it had been closed) and therefore the contract could not be assumed. Worthington v. General Motors Corp. (In re Claremont Acquisition Corp., Inc.), 113 F.3d 1029 (9th Cir. 1997).

9.1.uuuuuuu Real estate option agreement is an executory contract. A panel of the Ninth Circuit explains in detail why Gill v. Easebe Enterps. (In re Easebe Enterps.), 900 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1990), was incorrect in holding that all options to purchase real estate are executory contracts governed by section 365 and compliments the B.A.P. on its extensive opinion criticizing Easebe. Nevertheless, the Ninth Circuit reverses, being bound by Easebe, and reaffirms the rule in the Ninth Circuit that all real estate purchase option agreements are executory contracts. Unsecured Creditors' Committee v. Southmark Corp. (In re Robert L. Helms Constr. and Dev. Co., Inc.), 110 F.3d 1470 (9th Cir. 1997).

10. INDIVIDUAL DEBTORS

10.1 Chapter 13

10.1.a Confirmation objection is not necessary to preserve a creditor's right to challenge the plan. Before bankruptcy, the debtor had pledged his car to a pawn broker as security for a small loan, delivering the certificate of title but retaining possession of the car. State law gives the borrower 30 days after the loan's due date to redeem, but after that, it provides that the goods are automatically forfeited to the pawn broker. Just before the redemption period expired, the debtor filed chapter 13 with a plan that treated the pawn broker as fully secured and provided for payment under the plan, with interest. Before the confirmation hearing, the pawn broker filed a stay relief motion to recover the car, claiming that the Georgia statute had vested title in the pawn broker upon the expiration of the redemption period (or at least upon the expiration of the Bankruptcy Code's 60-day extensions of time for the debtor under section 108(a)). Before the stay relief hearing, the bankruptcy court held the confirmation hearing and confirmed the plan. The court heard the stay relief motion three months later. The pawn broker did not object to confirmation or appeal the confirmation order. Section 1327(a) provides that a confirmed plan binds the debtor and all creditors. However, the creditor was not required to file a formal objection to confirmation to preserve its rights; it had preserved its position by its pre-confirmation stay relief motion. Thus, it was not bound by the confirmation order and could challenge the debtor's ownership of the car through its stay relief motion based on the Georgia forfeiture statute. Title Max v. Northington (In re Wilber), 876 F.3d 1302 (11th Cir. 2017).

10.1.b State forfeiture statute operates after bankruptcy to divest estate of property. Before bankruptcy, the debtor had pledged his car to a pawn broker as security for a small loan, delivering the certificate of title but retaining possession of the car. State law gives the borrower 30 days after the loan's due date to redeem, but after that, it provides that the goods are automatically forfeited to the pawn broker. Just before the redemption period expired, the debtor filed chapter 13. Section 541(a) provides that all of the debtor's interests in property as of the commencement of the case become property of the estate. So the debtor's redemption right became property of the estate at the commencement of the case. But property of the estate is not static. It can be added to or subtracted from during the case. Because property interests are created and defined by state law, the Georgia statute determines what property interest the debtor and the estate had. It operated to divest the estate of ownership of the car when the redemption period expired. The automatic stay prohibits any act to obtain possession of property of the estate, among other things, but it does not stay the running of a redemption period, as section 108 covers that issue. And it does not prevent property interests from “evaporating,” where no “act” is involved. Thus, the car ceased to be property of the estate before plan confirmation, and the plan could not treat the pawn broker as a creditor secured by property of the estate. Title Max v. Northington (In re Wilber), 876 F.3d 1302 (11th Cir. 2017).

- 10.1.c Debtor may not void wholly underwater lien under chapter 7. The debtor’s home was worth less than the first mortgage lien. In his chapter 7 case, he moved to strip off the second lien under section 506(d). Section 506(d) voids a lien securing a claim that is not an allowed secured claim. Section 506(a) provides that an allowed claim is an allowed secured claim to the extent of the collateral’s value and is an allowed unsecured claim for the balance. A straight statutory reading would permit the debtor to void the junior mortgage. But Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410 (1992), held that “allowed secured claim” means an allowed claim that is secured by a lien, whatever the value, so a debtor may not strip down a partially underwater lien. That ruling compels the same result here: the junior mortgagee has an allowed secured claim that the debtor may not void. Bank of America, N.A. v. Caulkett, 575 U.S. ___, 135 S. Ct. 1995 (2015).
- 10.1.d Debtor is entitled to car ownership cost deduction only if the debtor has actual expenses for a loan or lease. The chapter 13 debtor owned a car free and clear of any loan or lease and therefore had no actual loan or lease payments. Chapter 13 requires that a debtor devote his or her “disposable income” to plan payments. “Disposable income” is “current monthly income” minus “amounts reasonably necessary to be expended” for “maintenance and support”. For an above-median income debtor, such amounts are “the debtor’s applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor’s actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides”. The Local Standards include a table for Car Ownership Costs, which the IRS guidelines say is based on average loan and lease costs and is disallowed if the taxpayer does not have loan or lease costs. The word “applicable” in the expense definition limits the expense deduction to those expenses that are applicable to the debtor, in part because the phrase defines the more general standard, “amounts reasonably necessary to be expended”. The use of “actual” in the expense definition does not detract from this interpretation, because such expenses may be deducted only to the extent actually incurred, whereas the Car Ownership Cost may be deducted based on the Local Standards, whether or not that is the debtor’s actual cost, as long as the debtor has some such cost. Finally, disallowing the expense deduction where the debtor does not incur any ownership cost comports with the statute’s policy to require debtors to pay all of their disposable income under a plan. Therefore, the debtor is not entitled to the Car Ownership Cost deduction. Ransom v. FIA Card Servs., N.A., 562 U.S. 61, 131 S. Ct. 716, 178 L. Ed. 2d 603 (2011).
- 10.1.e “Projected disposable income” must take account of known or virtually certain changes in the debtor’s circumstances. The debtor received a buy-out payment from her former employer within six months before her chapter 13 petition, inflating her “current monthly income” substantially above the income from her new job and placing her above the means test cutoff. She filed a plan that did not provide for full payment of her unsecured debts and proposed to pay only her disposable income calculated based on actual income and actual expenses, rather than the higher amount that would result from using “current monthly income” and section 707(b)(2)-allowed expenses. The debtor could not afford to make plan payments of the higher amount. The trustee objected to confirmation. Section 1325(b)(1) requires the court to deny confirmation of a plan that does not pay unsecured claims in full unless, as of the effective date, it provides for payment to creditors of all the debtor’s “projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period”. Section 1325(b)(2) defines “disposable income” as “current monthly income” minus certain charitable contributions, business expenses and amounts reasonably necessary to be expended for maintenance or support of the debtor and dependents.

Amount reasonably necessary for support is calculated as actual expenses, unless the debtor's current monthly income is above the means test. The statute does not, however, define "projected". Therefore, "projected" should be given its ordinary meaning, requiring the court to look into the future (whereas "current monthly income" is strictly a backward-looking concept). As such, in determining compliance with the "projected disposable income" test, the court must take account of known or virtually certain changes to the debtor's income or expenses as of confirmation. In this case, the lower amount calculated as of the confirmation hearing date that the plan proposed to pay, not the higher amount based on the petition date means test calculation, was the debtor's projected disposable income, and the plan could be confirmed. Hamilton v. Lanning, 560 U.S. 505, 130 S. Ct. 2464, 177 L. Ed. 2d 23 (2010).

- 10.1.f State-based median income test does not violate the Uniformity Clause. BAPCPA applies certain Bankruptcy Code provisions, including section 707(b)'s means test and section 1325(b)'s plan payment requirement and applicable commitment period, based on the debtor's state's median income. The Constitution authorizes Congress to enact "uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies". The Uniformity Clause requires geographic uniformity, that is, uniform application of federal law to treatment of a debtor's obligations throughout the country, regardless of the state in which the debtor resides or the bankruptcy court sits, even though applicable state law may have differing effects on debtors from state to state. The difference in treatment based on federal statistics of median income does not differ from differences in treatment resulting from the application of different state exemption or other nonbankruptcy laws. The state median income test therefore does not violate the Uniformity Clause. Schultz v. U.S., 529 F.3d 343 (6th Cir. 2008).
- 10.1.g Section 1322(b) permits a debtor to cure a default over a reasonable time, despite section 108(b)(2)'s 60-day cure limit. Section 108(b)(2) permits a trustee to cure a default within 60 days after the order for relief if as of the petition date, the debtor could have cured the default. Section 1322(b)(3) permits a chapter 13 plan to cure a default, and section 1322(b)(5) permits a plan to cure a default "within a reasonable time ... on any ... claim on which the last payment is due after the date on which the final payment under the plan is due." Section 1322(c)(1) permits a plan to cure a default on a claim secured by a lien on the debtor's principal residence until the "residence is sold at a foreclosure sale". Here, the debtor was purchasing his Montana principal residence under a contract for deed. The seller had given notice of default within 30 days before the debtor filed chapter 13. Under Montana law, the debtor had 30 days to pay the entire remaining balance of the contract, failing which the seller would become the property owner again. Under this procedure, section 1322(c)(1) does not apply, because there is no "foreclosure". However, section 1322(b)(5) does apply, despite the 60-day limit in section 108(b)(2). Section 108(b) is a provision of general applicability, while section 1322(b) is directed specifically at chapter 13 plans and therefore controls the general provision. Frazer v. Drummond (In re Frazer), 377 B.R. 621 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).
- 10.1.h Bad faith may forfeit debtor's right to convert to chapter 13. The debtor filed chapter 7. He failed to disclose assets. When the trustee discovered the assets and sought recovery, the debtor converted his case to chapter 13 under section 706(a) by filing a notice of conversion. Rule 1017(c)(2) treats the notice as a motion, which the bankruptcy court denied based on the debtor's bad faith in concealing assets. The Supreme Court affirms. Section 706(a) grants a debtor the right to convert, but section 706(d) limits the right to a debtor eligible to be a debtor under the target chapter. If a debtor files a chapter 13 case in bad faith, the court may dismiss under section 1307(c). The court's determination to dismiss for bad faith pre-petition (or pre-conversion) conduct "is tantamount to a ruling that the individual does not qualify as a debtor under Chapter 13" and therefore does not meet section 706(d)'s eligibility requirement. A bad faith determination should be limited, however, to "atypical" or "extraordinary" cases, so as not to affect the vast majority of filers who are "honest but unfortunate debtors." In addition, section 105(a) gives the court the power to issue any order to prevent an abuse of process and is adequate to authorize denial of a conversion motion. A dissent relies on the plain language of section 706(a) and questions whether bad faith is properly treated as an eligibility issue and whether section 105(a) should override the section 706(a)'s express conversion authorization. Marrama v. Citizens Bank of Mass., 549 U.S. 365 (2007).

- 10.1.i Debtor's right to convert from chapter 7 to chapter 13 is not absolute. In his schedules, the chapter 7 debtor did not disclose assets and prepetition transfers. When the chapter 7 trustee questioned him about them at the 341 meeting, the debtor moved to convert to chapter 13 under section 706(a), which provides that "the debtor may convert" the case to chapter 13 "at any time" if the debtor is eligible for chapter 13 and the case has not previously been converted. The court denies the motion to convert because of the debtor's bad faith conduct. Section 105(a) authorizes the bankruptcy court to take action "necessary or appropriate to ... prevent an abuse of [the bankruptcy] process," and the Code's policy is not to shelter those who would play fast and loose with the bankruptcy process. Therefore, the word "may" in section 706(a) should be construed as being used in the conditional sense (that is, "might"), not as an authorization, making the right to convert not absolute. Marrama v. Citizens Bank of Mass. (In re Marrama), 430 F.3d 474 (1st Cir. 2005).
- 10.1.j A chapter 13 debtor does not have avoiding powers. The debtor sued a creditor under section 544(a) seeking to avoid the creditor's unperfected lien. The debtor does not have standing to do so, however. Section 544(a) grants the avoiding power to the trustee. Section 1303 gives a debtor rights and powers in a chapter 13 case, but the avoiding powers are not among them. The Code authorizes a debtor to pursue avoiding power actions in certain circumstances, such as under section 522(g). The omission of a comparable provision in chapter 13 suggests the debtor does not have this power. The absence of a direct grant in section 1302 of avoiding powers to the trustee does not imply that they are vested in the debtor. Therefore, the court dismisses adversary proceeding. Hansen v. Green Tree Servicing, LLC (In re Hansen), 332 B.R. 8 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2005).
- 10.1.k Rents are real property collateral for purposes of the section 1322(b)(2) anti-modification clause. Section 1322(b)(2) prohibits modification under a chapter 13 plan of a mortgage that is secured solely by real property that is the debtor's principal residence. In this case, the lender took a second mortgage on the debtor's principal residence and on rents. Under applicable New Jersey law, rents are real property. They therefore do not disqualify the mortgage from the anti-modification provision of section 1322(b)(2). In addition, an escrow that the lender maintains for taxes and insurance does not disqualify the mortgage from protection, because the debtor retains no interest in the escrowed property, and it is therefore not collateral for the loan. In re Ferandos, 402 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 2005).
- 10.1.l Postpetition, preconversion tax claim is entitled to administrative expense priority in chapter 13. The debtors operated their business in chapter 11 for over a year, but did not pay FICA and FUTA taxes during the case. They discontinued their business, found employment, and converted their cases to chapter 13. The tax claims were entitled to administrative expense priority in the chapter 13 cases. Section 348(d) provides that a claim that arises during a chapter 11 case is treated as a prepetition claim after conversion, except for administrative expense claims. This section takes precedence over section 1305, which requires that tax claims filed under section 1305 be determined and allowed under section 502 as if they had arisen prepetition. Section 1305 does not, however, address priority, only allowability. Section 348(d) preserves the tax claims' priority status. United States v. Fowler (In re Fowler), 394 F.3d 1208 (9th Cir. 2005).

- 10.1.m Right to convert from chapter 7 to chapter 13 is not absolute. The well-educated and well-paid debtor had engaged in protracted efforts, including six prior bankruptcy petitions, for nine years to prevent paying his ex-wife alimony or support and to prevent her from receiving property awarded in their divorce proceeding. When he moved to convert his current chapter 7 case to chapter 13, the court balked, finding that he had lied his way through the trial on the motion, was completely untrustworthy, and sought conversion only to avoid discharge and dischargeability litigation. A chapter 13 case therefore could not be filed or pursued in good faith. Acknowledging the split in the case law on the issue, the court rules that under the circumstances, the right to convert is not absolute, and the motion is properly denied. Copper v. Copper (In re Copper), 314 B.R. 628 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).
- 10.1.n Debtor’s absolute right to dismiss chapter 13 case does not prevent court from imposing conditions. The debtors filed a face-sheet only chapter 13 case and failed to file the schedules within 15 days or to appear at the 341 meeting. The U.S. Trustee moved to dismiss; a secured creditor moved to dismiss “with prejudice,” that is, with a bar to the debtor’s refiling for 180 days. The debtors then filed their own motion to dismiss under section 1307(b). The court acknowledges that the debtors’ motion takes precedence over the other motions, because section 1307(b) gives the debtors an absolute right to dismiss a chapter 13 case at any time. But the court may make the dismissal with prejudice, as the creditor requests. In this case, the creditor fails to establish that the dismissal should be with prejudice, but the court notes that the creditor’s filing of a stay relief motion would have required the dismissal to be with prejudice, under section 109(g). In re Wyatt, 317 B.R. 159 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2004).
- 10.1.o Prepetition chapter 13 attorney’s fees may be paid under section 330(a). Section 330(a)(4)(B) authorizes the court to award attorney’s fees in a chapter 13 case “for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case.” This language is not limited to postpetition services and therefore encompasses prepetition services that are rendered “in connection with the bankruptcy case.” Those services include counseling the debtor about the filing and preparation of necessary papers, such as the petition, the schedules, and the chapter 13 plan. Section 507(a)(1) grants first priority to claims allowed under section 503(b), which includes compensation allowed under section 330, and section 1322(a)(2) requires payment of priority claims in full under the plan. Therefore, the allowed compensation for prepetition services in connection with the case must be paid in full under the plan. In re Busetta-Silvia, 314 B.R. 218 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).
- 10.1.p Right to convert from chapter 7 to chapter 13 is absolute. The debtor filed his chapter 7 case in bad faith and had filed and dismissed a chapter 13 case while his chapter 7 case was pending. The trustee had filed an action to recover $60,000 that the debtor had fraudulently transferred. The debtor then filed a motion under section 706(a) to convert his case to chapter 13. The right to convert under section 706(a) is absolute, as long as the debtor meets the eligibility standards for chapter 13 and the requirements of that section that the case not previously have been converted. The debtor’s prior conduct does not provide a basis to deny the motion to convert. If the debtor is unable to propose or confirm a chapter 13 plan or if the facts “are sufficiently egregious to support an argument that the § 706(a) conversion right should be overridden,” then the court may reconvert to chapter 7, even on its own motion, because there is no right to remain in chapter 13 once the case has been converted. The purpose of the motion requirement in Bankruptcy Rule 1017(f)(2) is to determine eligibility, not to create discretion in the court to deny the conversion on grounds other than those stated in section 706(a). Croston v. Davis (In re Croston), 313 B.R. 447 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).
- 10.1.q Right to convert from chapter 7 to chapter 13 is not absolute. In extreme circumstances, such as where the debtor is guilty of misconduct, such as inadequate asset disclosure, and seeks conversion from chapter 7 to chapter 13 after the trustee threatens or takes action against the debtor, the court may deny conversion. The bankruptcy court should consider the totality of the circumstances in determining whether extreme circumstances exist that warrant denial of conversion. Marrama v. Citizens Bank (In re Marrama), 313 B.R. 525 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2004).

- 10.1.r Supreme Court adopts “prime plus” calculation for secured creditor cram down. The bankruptcy court proposed a cram down chapter 13 plan to restructure a 21% secured auto loan at a 9.5% interest rate, calculated as the bank prime rate of 8% plus a risk factor increase of 1.5%. The Supreme Court affirms. Four Justices endorse the prime-plus approach the bankruptcy court used. They reason that any other approach does not adequately reflect Congress’s intentions, focuses too much on the lender, and is administratively difficult to implement. They adopt an objective standard, based on the present value of the payment stream, rather than a subjective standard, based on the lender’s identity, preferences, costs, or other individual circumstances. And they place the burden on the lender to show the bankruptcy court any required upward risk adjustment to the prime rate, in part because they believe the lender is better able to sustain it. Mr. Justice Thomas concludes, based on a narrow reading of the statute, that the court may use a risk-free rate. Because the 9.5% plan rate here exceeds the risk-free rate, he would also affirm. The dissent would adopt the presumptive rate approach, where the original contract interest rate is presumed correct, subject to a showing why the bankruptcy court should depart in either direction from the presumptive rate. Eight Justices (the plurality and the dissent) conclude that the interest rate must be adjusted upward for the nonpayment risk. All nine Justices reject a rate based on the lender’s cost of funds and the coerced loan approach, under which the court determines the interest rate the lender would receive if it forecloses on its collateral and reinvests the proceeds in a new loan. Therefore, the prime-plus approach should apply. Till v. SCS Credit Corp., 541 U.S. 465 (2004).
- 10.1.s Chapter 13 plan may not strip down a lien unless payments on the secured claim are to be completed during the plan. Section 1322(b)(2) permits a plan to modify a secured claim, except one secured solely by the debtor’s principal residence. Section 1322(b)(5) permits a plan to cure defaults and maintain payments on a long-term secured claim beyond the plan payment period. But a plan may not modify a secured claim under section 1322(b)(2) and then extend payments under section 1322(b)(5). In this case, the debtors owned commercial real estate that was worth less than the secured claim. They bifurcated the claim under section 506(a) and proposed payment of the secured claim according to its terms under section 1322(b)(5) at the full monthly payment amount for a period extending beyond the plan payment period. Such a plan is impermissible, because the strip down constitutes a modification that brings the claim under section 1322(b)(2). Enewally v. Washington Mut. Bank (In re Enewally), 368 F.3d 1165 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 10.1.t 180-day deadline to revoke confirmation is absolute, but might not bar dismissal. The debtor lied on her bankruptcy schedules about her income and assets, but in a way that would have put a creditor on notice of the lie. 180 days after confirmation of the debtor’s chapter 13 plan, creditors moved to revoke confirmation on the ground that it was obtained by fraud. Later, the creditors moved to revoke confirmation on the ground that the debtor lied about her debts and was ineligible for chapter 13 under its debt limits. The 180-day deadline to seek revocation of confirmation is absolute, despite the debtor’s fraud, and fraud is the only ground to obtain revocation. In this case, although the debtor obtained confirmation by fraud about her assets and income, those issues could have been litigated at the confirmation hearing, because the creditors, had they been diligent in investigating, would have uncovered the lie. Nor can they evade the 180-day limit by seeking revocation under section 105(a) or under Rule 9024 (incorporating Fed. R. Civ. P. 60), which expressly bars its use to revoke confirmation. They could, however, seek dismissal or conversion under section 1307 more than 180 days after confirmation based on the lie about debts and eligibility, because dismissal is not time-limited, and there was nothing that would have put the creditor on notice of the lie. Therefore, res judicata did not apply. Chapter 11’s dismissal provision is the same as chapter 13's for these purposes. Duplessis v. Valenti (In re Valenti), 310 B.R. 138 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).

- 10.1.u Chapter 13 debtor has standing to pursue avoiding powers. The debtors had granted a security interest in the proceeds of a personal injury action. After the debtors filed a chapter 13 case, they collected the proceeds of the action. Their chapter 13 plan provided for them to avoid the security interest so that they could use the proceeds to fund the plan. The creditor objected to the subsequent avoidance action on the ground that only the trustee may pursue avoiding power claims in chapter 13. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. rejects the plan provision in the chapter 13 plan as a basis for the debtor's standing to pursue the claim and similarly rejects the trustee's assignment, without court approval, of the avoiding power claim to the debtors as a basis for standing. It then rejects a narrow construction of chapter 13 in favor of a holistic approach. Reviewing the extensive case law surrounding this and related issues in chapter 13, the B.A.P. concludes that the debtor retains avoiding powers concurrently with the trustee and that the bankruptcy court can regulate any mischief that may result from any disagreement between the debtor and the trustee over whether an action should be pursued. Tellingly, the B.A.P. notes the potential anomaly of a case in which a debtor has limited future income with which to fund a plan and a potentially large avoiding power cause of action. Because of the best interest test and the avoidability of the transfer in a chapter 7 case, the debtor could not confirm a plan without avoiding the transfer, suggesting that the debtor should have the power to avoid it. Houston v. Eiler (In re Cohen), 305 B.R. 886 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).
- 10.1.v Chapter 13 plan may modify wholly undersecured claim. Joining all the other courts of appeal that have addressed the issue, the Ninth Circuit rules that the provision of section 1322(b)(2) that prohibits modification under a chapter 13 plan of a secured claim that is secured only by the debtor's residence does not prohibit modification of a claim that is wholly undersecured. The Ninth Circuit reasons that, under section 506(a), "secured claim" is a term of art and that a creditor whose claim is wholly undersecured does not hold a secured claim. (In the course of its opinion, the Ninth Circuit expresses concern about the failure of the bankruptcy court to follow B.A.P. decisions and recommends the Judicial Council consider an order clarifying whether the bankruptcy courts must follow the decisions of the B.A.P.) Zimmer v. PSB Lending Corp. (In re Zimmer), 313 F.3d 1220 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 10.1.w Chapter 13 plan may modify short term mortgage. Section 1325(a)(5) permits a chapter 13 plan to bifurcate a secured claim, as provided under section 506(a), and pay the unsecured portion only the percentage being paid to general unsecured claims. However, section 1322(b)(2) prohibits modification of a claim "secured only by a security interest in real property that is the debtor's principal residence." As construed in Nobelman v. American Savings Bank, 508 U.S. 324 (1993), section 1322(b)(2) prohibits bifurcation or modification of a mortgage claim. However, section 1322(c)(2) permits a plan to "provide for payment of the claim as modified pursuant to section 1325(a)(5)" notwithstanding section 1322(b)(2), if the claim is secured by a security interest in the debtor's principal residence but "is due before the date on which final payment under the plan is due." The Eleventh Circuit rules that section 1322(c)(2) permits bifurcation and modification of a short term mortgage, disagreeing with the Fourth Circuit's decision in In re Witt, 113 F.3d 508 (4th Cir. 1997). American General Finance, Inc. v. Paschen (In re Paschen), 296 F.3d 1203 (11th Cir. 2002).
- 10.1.x Bankruptcy court may not augment confirmation requirements. The debtors' chapter 13 plan met all six of the statutory confirmation requirements of section 1325(a). Nevertheless, the bankruptcy court imposed an additional requirement, that the debtors furnish periodic financial reports to the trustee, to permit the trustee to monitor whether the debtors had additional disposable income. The Seventh Circuit reverses the bankruptcy court's order, holding that the confirmation requirements set forth in section 1325(a) are exclusive and may not be expanded. Petro v. Mishler, 276 F.3d 375 (7th Cir. 2002).

- 10.1.y Creditor may apply chapter 13 payments to post-petition interest on non-dischargeable debts. The Code of Federal Regulations provides for application of payment on student loans first to costs, then to accrued interest, and finally to principal. Student loans are non-dischargeable in chapter 13. When a debtor's plan provides for payment on a student loan, the agency may file a claim only for principal and pre-petition interest, but may apply the payments received to post-petition interest, thus not reducing principal at all. In reaching this conclusion, the court reasons that other creditors are not disadvantaged, because the agency's claim is not greater than it would otherwise be under section 502(b)(2), that the debtor should not obtain any better treatment with respect to a non-dischargeable claim by filing a chapter 13 than if he did not, and, in dictum, that the scope of the defined term "claim" differs in scope from "debt." Kielish v. Educational Credit Management Corp (In re Kielish), 258 F.3d 316 (4th Cir. 2001).
- 10.1.z Chapter 13 estate continues past confirmation. After confirmation, the debtor moved for authority to sell property that had reverted in the debtor under the plan and under section 1327(b) free and clear of claims of creditors. On a motion to determine the disposition of the proceeds of the property that were in excess of the secured claim, the First Circuit holds that property of the estate reverts at the time of confirmation, but the estate "continues to be funded by the debtor's regular income and post-petition assets as specified in section 1306(a)." As a result, the proceeds were estate property and available to pay the debtor's unsecured claims under the plan. Barbosa v. Soloman, 235 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 2000).
- 10.1.aa "Estate transformation" rule applies upon confirmation of Chapter 13 plan. Chapter 13 contains conflicting provisions on whether post-confirmation earnings remain property of the estate or revert in the debtor upon confirmation of the chapter 13 plan. Following the "estate transformation" approach previously adopted by the Seventh Circuit, the Eleventh Circuit rules that the debtor's post-confirmation earnings revert in the debtor except to the extent necessary to fulfill the terms of the confirmed chapter 13 plan. Telfair v. First Union Mortgage Corp., 216 F.3d 1333 (11th Cir. 2000).
- 10.1.bb Rights of a chapter 20 debtor limited. The debtor filed chapter 7 and discharged the unsecured liability on an undersecured mortgage. The debtor then filed chapter 13 and sought to sell the property, turning over the proceeds to the mortgagee. Because such a plan deprived the mortgagee of its right to foreclose under state law, even though that right arguably had no greater economic value than what was proposed under the plan, the plan impermissively modified the rights of a secured creditor in the debtor's principal mortgage, contrary to Nobelman v. American Savings Bank, 508 U.S. 324 (1993). In re Kirschner, 216 B.R. 417 (Bankr. W.D. Wisc. 1997).
- 10.1.cc Chapter 13 plan may not bifurcate short-term home mortgage. Nobelman v. American Savings Bank, 508 U.S. 324 (1993), prohibited bifurcation of a claim secured by the debtor's principal residence. Congress then amended section 1332(c)(2) to permit modification of secured claims where the last payment is due during the term of the plan. Nevertheless, the Fourth circuit holds that a short-term home mortgage may still not be bifurcated, based on a narrow textual reading of the amendment. Witt v. United Companies Lending Corp. (In re Witt), 113 F.3d 508 (4th Cir. 1997).
- 10.1.dd Chapter 13 plan may be modified to cure post-petition arrearages. The Supreme Court's decision in, does not preclude a bankruptcy court from approving a modification of a chapter 13 plan where the debtor has missed postpetition interest payments to a creditor secured by a home mortgage. In this case, the debtor proposed to cure the arrearages over six months. The court also approves the inclusion of a "drop dead" clause in the order, over the debtor's objection, if the debtor misses any further payments. Mendoza v. Temple-Inland Mortgage Corp. (In re Mendoza), 111 F.3d 1264 (5th Cir. 1997).

10.1.ee A chapter 13 debtor may not exercise the avoiding powers. LaBarge v. Benda (In re Merrifield), 214 B.R. 363 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).

10.2 Dischargeability

10.2.a A discharge does not release future liability on a guarantee. The individual debtor personally guaranteed debts to a supplier of the debtor's corporate restaurant business. Years later, the debtor filed a chapter 7 bankruptcy and received a discharge, but the restaurant continued to operate and purchase from the supplier, and the debtor did not terminate the guarantee. Later, the restaurant closed with an outstanding balance owing to the supplier. The supplier sought payment from the debtor under the guarantee. A chapter 7 discharge releases any claim that arose before the discharge. A "claim" means right to payment, including contingent and unmatured rights. Under applicable state law, a claim under a guarantee arises only when a debt subject to the guarantee is incurred. Therefore, the supplier's claim for the postpetition future advances was not contingent, and did not arise, prepetition. As such, the debtor's discharge did not release liability for guaranteed postpetition advances. Reinhart Foodservice LLC v. Schlundt, 646 B.R. 478 (E.D. Wis. 2022).

10.2.b Takings Clause claims are not dischargeable in a municipal bankruptcy case. The debtor confirmed a plan under PROMSEA Title III, which parallels chapter 9. Numerous creditors asserted claims under the Fifth Amendment for takings of their property before the bankruptcy. Section 944(b) provides for a general discharge. However, the Constitution's Bankruptcy Clause is subject to the Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause, and a bankruptcy case may not effect a taking without compliance with the Fifth Amendment. The Takings Clause provides a specific remedy for a taking—just compensation. Therefore, it is not dischargeable in a bankruptcy case. Fin. Oversight & Mgmt. Bd. v. Cooperativa de Ahorro (In re Fin. Oversight & Mgmt. Bd.), 41 F.4th 29 (1st Cir. 2022).

10.2.c A PACA claim is dischargeable. The debtor purchased produce from a supplier who was registered under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act but did not pay for the produce. PACA provides that produce received by a buyer and all proceeds "shall be held ... in trust for the benefit of all unpaid suppliers ... until full payment of the sums owing." The PACA regulations provide that trust assets "are to be preserved as a nonsegregated 'floating' trust" and that "[c]ommingling of trust assets is contemplated." Section 523(a)(4) excepts from discharge any debt for "fraud or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity." This discharge exception applies only to a technical trust, where there is a trustee who holds an identifiable res for the benefit of an identifiable beneficiary. In addition, the trust relationship must impose sufficient trust-like duties on the trustee, including the duty to segregate trust assets and not use them for non-trust purposes, and the trust relationship must have been created before the act or fraud or defalcation creating the debt. PACA establishes the trustee, the res, and the beneficiary, but because it permits commingling and use of trust assets for non-trust purposes, it does not sufficiently impose trust-like duties on the trustee to qualify as a technical trust. As a result, any trust results only from the act or fraud or defalcation and does not exist before hand. Therefore, a PACA trust is not a technical trust who breach gives rise to a discharge exception under section 523(a)(4). Spring Valley Produce, Inc. v. Forrest (In re Forrest), 47 F.4th 1229(11th Cir. Aug. 31, 2022).

10.2.d State bar client security fund reimbursement obligation is dischargeable. An attorney was disbarred after he embezzled money from his clients. The state bar has a client security fund that reimburses clients for any such losses and then subrogates to the clients' claims against the attorney. Section 523(a)(7) makes nondischargeable any debt for a fine or penalty payable to or for the benefit of a governmental unit that is not in compensation for actual pecuniary loss. Here, the fact that the client security fund steps in to pay the client victim does not make its claim, through subrogation, against the attorney not in compensation for actual pecuniary loss. To the contrary, the claim is precisely to compensate for the loss. Therefore, it is dischargeable. Kassas v. State Bar of Calif., 49 F.4th 1158 (9th Cir. 2022).

- 10.2.e Takings Clause claims are not dischargeable in a municipal bankruptcy. The municipal debtor condemned properties. The owners asserted claims for the value of the properties. The debtor proposed a plan that treated the claims as general unsecured claims that were subject to adjustment under the plan. The Fifth Amendment provides that private property may not “be taken for public use, without just compensation.” It imposes a condition on condemnation and a specific remedy, unlike other constitutional provisions that do not state a remedy for their violation. Bankruptcy laws are subordinate to the Fifth Amendment; Congress’ bankruptcy power does not permit taking a creditor’s interest in property during or as a result of a bankruptcy without just compensation. But impairment of a claim arising from a prepetition taking would effect the same result and is therefore equally prohibited. Therefore, discharge of a takings claim would violate the constitution and is not permitted. Fin. Oversight & Mgmt Bd. v. Cooperativa de Ahorro Y Credito Abraham Rosa (In re Fin. Oversight & Mgmt Bd.), 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 19736 (1st Cir. July 18, 2022).
- 10.2.f FCC nonpecuniary penalty is nondischargeable in a chapter 11 case. The telecommunications provider debtor defrauded customers. The FCC brought an action against the debtor, in which the debtor agreed to reimburse customers and pay a civil penalty to the FCC, which was not defrauded and did not suffer loss. Section 1141(d)(6) makes nondischargeable in a corporate case any debt that would be excepted from discharge under section 523(a)(2), which excepts from discharge in an individual case any debt for money, property, or services to the extent obtained by fraud or false pretenses. In Cohen v. de la Cruz, 523 U.S. 213 (1998), the Supreme Court held that nonpecuniary loss penalties (in that case, treble damages) arising from a debtor’s fraud fell within section 523(a)(2) because “to the extent obtained by” modifies “money, property, or services,” not “any debt.” Because section 1141(d)(6) makes section 523(a)(2) applicable in a corporate chapter 11 case, the FCC penalty is nondischargeable. U.S. v. Fusion Connect, Inc. (In re Fusion Connect, Inc.), 634 B.R. 22 (S.D.N.Y. 2021).
- 10.2.g Section 523 discharge exceptions do not apply in a non-individual subchapter V case. A corporate subchapter V debtor confirmed a plan under section 1191(b), the subchapter V cramdown provision. Creditors brought a nondischargeability complaint. Section 1192 provides that if the plan is confirmed under section 1191(b), “the court shall grant the debtor a discharge of all debts ... except any debt ... of the kind specified in section 523(a).” Section 523(a) provides that a “discharge under section ... 1192 ... does not discharge an individual debtor from any debt” listed in the subsection. Because section 523(a) applies only to individual debtors, the reference to it in section 1192 does not apply to non-individual debtors. The court therefore dismisses the dischargeability complaint. Gaske v. Satellite Rests. Inc. (In re Satellite Rests. Inc.), 626 B.R. 871 (Bankr. D. Md. 2021).
- 10.2.h Dischargeability exceptions do not apply in corporate subchapter V case. The corporate debtor sought confirmation of its plan under section 1191(b), the cramdown provision. Section 1192, rather than section 1141(d), provides for the debtor’s discharge under a plan confirmed under section 1191(b). It provides for “a discharge of all debts provided in section 1141(d)(a)(A) ... except any debt ... of the kind specified in section 523(a).” Section 523(a) provides, “A discharge under section ... 1192 ... does not discharge an individual debtor from any debt” described in one of 19 paragraphs. Because section 523(a) applies only to an individual debtor, the debts of the kind specified in that section are only debts owing by an individual. Just as in a non-subchapter V chapter 11 case, a subchapter V corporate debtor’s discharge is not subject to the exceptions to discharge contained in section 523(a). Gaske v. Satellite Restaurants Inc. Crabcake Factory USA (In re Satellite Restaurants Inc. Crabcake Factory USA), ___ B.R. ___. 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 652 (Bankr. D. Md. Mar. 19, 2021).

- 10.2.i Discovery sanctions are dischargeable. The debtor attorney incurred discovery sanctions, payable to her client’s adversary. She refused to pay. The State Bar initiated disciplinary proceedings against her for her failure to obey the court’s order that she pay and ultimately suspended her from practice, with reinstatement contingent on payment of the sanctions. Shortly after the state supreme court affirmed the disbarment order, she filed a bankruptcy petition and sought to discharge the sanctions. Section 523(a)(7) makes nondischargeable any debt that is “for a fine, penalty, or forfeiture payable to and for the benefit of a governmental unit, and is not compensation for actual pecuniary loss.” These discovery sanctions were payable to a private party—the adversary in the litigation in which they were imposed—not a governmental unit, and they were in compensation for the party’s litigation expenses related to the discovery violations. Kelly v. Robinson, 479 U.S. 36 (1986), which involved a criminal restitution payment to the government for the benefit of the victim, does not require otherwise. Kelly was based on the Court’s “deep conviction” and a “background of an established judicial exception,” not on the language of section 523(a)(7). The statutory language does not cover these discovery sanctions, which are therefore dischargeable. Albert-Sheridan v. State Bar (In re Albert-Sheridan), 960 F.3d 1188 (9th Cir. 2020).
- 10.2.j Penalty to government for fraud on consumers is dischargeable under sections 523(a)(2)(A) and 1141(d)(6). The debtor defrauded telephone consumers. The FCC required the debtor to refund money to consumers and imposed a civil penalty in favor of the United States, some of which remained unpaid when the debtor filed its chapter 11 case. In an individual case, section 523(a)(2)(A) renders nondischargeable a debt for money, property, or services, to the extent obtained by actual fraud. In a chapter 11 case, section 1141(d)(6) renders nondischargeable such a debt owed to a domestic governmental unit. The discharge exception encompasses exemplary and punitive damages resulting from fraud, not just compensatory damages. However, it covers only debts incurred by actual common law fraud on the creditor. The penalty here is a statutory claim arising from a fraud perpetrated on the consumers, not the government, and not a common law fraud case to recover for the government’s own injury. Therefore, the debt is dischargeable. U.S. v. Fusion Connect, Inc. (In re Fusion Connect, Inc.), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 1803 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. July 9, 2020).
- 10.2.k Court applies Brunner narrowly and discharges student loans. The debtor borrowed for college and law school. The debtor qualified under the means test of section 707(b) for chapter 7. His living expenses of approximately $4,000 per month exceed his monthly income of approximately $2,500 at the time of the bankruptcy. While the debtor’s loans were in deferment or forbearance, no payments were due, and no late fees were charged. When deferment ended, the loan went into income-based repayment for a year before going back into forbearance, and the debtor made payments during the year and thereafter, despite forbearance. The debtor made one payment under standard repayment terms before the loan went into default and was accelerated. To be eligible for a monthly repayment plan after the default, the debtor would have to rehabilitate the loan by agreeing to make nine voluntary, reasonable, and affordable monthly payments during 10 consecutive months. Such an agreement was not before the court. In re Brunner, 831 F.2d 395 (2d Cir. 1987), permits discharge of an educational loan under the undue hardship test of section 523(a)(8) only if based on current income and expenses, the debtor cannot maintain a minimal standard of living, additional circumstances exist indicating this state of affairs is likely to persist for a significant portion of the repayment period, and the debtor has made a good faith effort to repay the loans. The debtor cannot maintain a minimal standard of living with $1,500 monthly negative income. Because the loan was accelerated and fully due as of bankruptcy, there was no remaining repayment period, so that state of affairs was likely to last through the remaining repayment period. Brunner’s good faith prong speaks to past payments, not to future potential agreements to repay or to the debtor’s reason for taking the loan or filing bankruptcy. Here, the debtor made most loan payments when due and even some that were not due. He meets the good faith effort test, and the court discharges the loans. Rosenberg v. N.Y. State Higher Educ. Servs. Corp. (In re Rosenberg), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 73 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Jan. 7, 2020).

- 10.2.l Private non-qualified student loans are dischargeable. The debtor obtained a loan to study for the bar exam. Several years later, he filed bankruptcy and sought to discharge the loan. Section 523(a)(8) excepts from discharge (A)(i) an educational benefit overpayment or loan made, insured or guaranteed by a governmental unit ...; or (ii) an obligation to repay funds received as an educational benefit, scholarship, or stipend; or (B) any other educational loan that is a qualified educational loan, as defined in section 221(d)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code.” The lender agreed the debtor’s loan did not qualify under (A)(i) or (B). “Educational benefit” in (A)(ii) must be read in context with “scholarship or stipend.” Those terms apply to benefits that are contingently repayable, for example, if a student does not remain employed with the employer who advanced the loan or does not complete a program funded by the school. It cannot be read broadly to include direct loans without rendering (A)(i) and (B) largely superfluous. Therefore, it does not apply to private, non-qualified educational loans. Crocker v. Navient Solutions, L.L.C., 941 F.3d 206 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 10.2.m Environmental penalties resulting from false reports may be dischargeable. The debtor operated its factory in violation of environmental protection laws and filed false reports with the environmental regulator about the violations. The regulator claimed that it would have shut the factory earlier if the debtor had filed accurate reports. The regulator imposed daily fines for the violations and filed a proof of claim in the debtor’s chapter 11 case for the amount of the fines. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan and emerged as a going concern. Section 1141(d) generally provides for a comprehensive discharge upon plan confirmation, but section 1141(d)(6) excepts from a corporate debtor’s discharge a debt “of a kind specified in paragraph (2)(A) or (2)(B) of section 523(a) that is owed to a domestic governmental unit.” Sections 523(2)(A) and (B) except from discharge “any debt ... for money, property, [or] services ... to the extent obtained by (A) false pretenses, a false representation, or actual fraud” or a false financial statement. It extends to any debt arising from the fraud, including penalties, but the creditor must show a loss or damages as a proximate result of the misrepresentation or fraud. In this case, the fines do not represent any loss or damage incurred by the regulator resulting from the false reports. And the regulator’s claim that it would have shut down the facility earlier but for the false reports is too attenuated to show damages or loss resulting from the misrepresentations or fraud. Therefore, the debt is dischargeable. In re Exide Techs., 601 B.R. 271 (Bankr. D. Del. 2019).
- 10.2.n A statement about an asset is a “statement respecting financial condition.” To induce his lawyer to continue working on his case without paying currently, the debtor told his lawyer that he was expecting a large tax refund. The refund turned out to be smaller, and the debtor did not tell his lawyer once he received it, continuing to deceive his lawyer into thinking it would become available. As a result, the lawyer kept working. When the case was over, the lawyer presented a large bill, which the debtor could not pay. The debtor filed bankruptcy. Finding out the truth about the tax refund, the lawyer sought to except his claim against the debtor from discharge. Section 523(a)(2)(A) excepts from discharge a debt incurred through fraud, false representation, or false pretenses, except a “false statement respecting the debtor’s financial condition.” Section 523(a)(2)(B) excepts from discharge a false statement respecting the debtor’s financial condition only if the statement is in writing. “Respecting” has a broad meaning, including about, relating to, and connected with. A statement about an asset is a statement “respecting” financial condition and is broader than “a statement of financial condition,” which would include assets and liabilities. A statement about a major asset has a direct relationship to financial condition and therefore is a statement respecting financial condition. Because the debtor’s statement was not in writing, the debt is dischargeable. Lamar, Archer & Cofrin, LLP v. Appling, 584 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 1752 (2018).
- 10.2.o Debt for third party’s violation of securities laws is nondischargeable under section 523(a)(19). An arbitrator found the debtor liable to an investor in the debtor’s company based on securities law violations. The state court confirmed the award. The debtor claimed the award found only that he was liable for a third party’s securities law violation, not that he violated the securities laws. The investor sought to have the debt declared nondischargeable under section 523(a)(19), which makes nondischargeable a “debt ... that is for the violation of any of the Federal securities laws ... and results ... from any judgment ... entered in any Federal or State judicial or administrative proceeding.” Based on the grammatical structure of paragraph (19), and unlike other nondischargeability provisions in section 523(a), it does not require that the debtor have violated the securities laws, only that the debtor’s liability be “for the violation of” securities laws. Therefore the debt is nondischargeable. Lunsford v. Process Techs. Servs., LLC (In re Lunsford), 848 F.3d 963 (11th Cir. 2017).

- 10.2.p Actual fraudulent transfer constitutes “actual fraud” for purposes of nondischargeability under section 523(a)(2)(A). The individual debtor owned at least a 30% interest in a company that purchased goods from a creditor. After the purchases, the debtor caused the purchaser to transfer substantial amounts of cash to other companies that the debtor owned and controlled, leaving the purchaser unable to pay the creditor. The debtor admitted the transfers were actual fraudulent transfers. The creditor sued the debtor, claiming that the transfers were “actual fraud” for purposes of a state statute that allows a creditor to hold a shareholder liable for corporate debt. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, the creditor sought to have the debt declared nondischargeable under section 523(a)(2)(A) as a debt “for money, property [or] services ... to the extent obtained by ... false pretenses, a false representation, or actual fraud.” Actual fraud does not require a representation and is a ground for nondischargeability separate from false pretenses and false representation. An actual fraudulent transfer involves the transferor’s actual fraud. The statute does not require that the property be obtained by the debtor; an actual fraudulent transfer’s recipient might obtain the fraudulently transferred property by fraud if the recipient had the requisite intent. In any event, the statute does not apply only where the fraud occurred at the transaction’s inception, and, since an actual fraudulent transfer comes within section 523(a)(2)(A)’s scope, the lower court must determine whether the debt was obtained by the asset-transfer scheme. Husky Int’l Electronics, Inc. v. Ritz, 578 U.S. ___, 136 S. Ct. 1581 (2016).
- 10.2.q State bar-ordered fee repayment obligation is dischargeable. The debtor took advance fees from a client in violation of a state bar rule. The client demanded repayment. When the debtor did not comply, the client filed a state bar complaint. The state bar ordered repayment and suspended the debtor from practice until the fee was repaid. After making a few payments, the debtor filed a chapter 7 case. The state bar refused to reinstate her, despite section 525(a), arguing that the repayment obligation was nondischargeable under section 523(a)(7), which applies to “a fine, penalty, or forfeiture payable to and for the benefit of a governmental unit, and is not compensation for actual pecuniary loss.” Although the debt does not qualify under this test, Kelly v. Robinson, 479 U.S. 36 (1986), held that a criminal restitution obligation payable to and for the benefit of the crime victim qualified in part because the obligation was a fine or penalty and was for benefit of the state’s interest in rehabilitation and punishment rather than primarily for the victim’s compensation. Kelly has spawned conflicting decisions about its reach, especially in dealing with state bar sanctions. In this case, however, the obligation was solely to compensate the victim, not a fine or penalty. Therefore, it is dischargeable. Scheer v. State Bar (In re Scheer), 819 F.3d 1206 (9th Cir. 2016).
- 10.2.r Nonpayment of ERISA contributions is not defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity. The debtor was the principal of a company that agreed to contribute to an ERISA-governed union welfare plan. The plan agreement provided that all contributions required to be paid were plan assets. When the company failed to make contributions, the debtor signed a promissory note to the plan. Unable to pay the note, he filed a chapter 7 case. The plan sought to hold the debt nondischargeable under section 523(a)(4), which makes nondischargeable a debt for defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity. Section 523(a)(4) applies only if the fiduciary relationship exists before nonpayment of the debt, not as a result of the nonpayment. Under ERISA, a person responsible for or who has control over plan assets is an ERISA fiduciary. Here, the asset is the plan's claim against the debtor, not the contribution that the debtor or his company did not make, despite the plan agreement provision. The debtor did not have control over the claim; the plan did. Therefore, the debtor was not an ERISA fiduciary with respect to the unpaid contributions, and the plan's claim is dischargeable. Bos v. Board of Trustees, 795 F.3d 1006 (9th Cir. 2015).

- 10.2.s Relator may bring a nondischargeability action against a chapter 11 corporate debtor at any time. A relator filed a qui tam action under the False Claims Act against the corporate debtor before bankruptcy, alleging that the debtor falsely certified certain military components that it sold to the government. Such an action entitles the relator, if successful, to attorneys' fees from the defendant and to a bounty from the government. More than 60 days after the 341 meeting, the relator filed a nondischargeability action under section 1141(d)(6). Section 1141(d)(6) denies a corporate debtor a discharge "from any debt ... of a kind specified in paragraph (2)(a) or (2)(B) of section 523(a) that is owed to a domestic governmental unit, or owed to a person as the result of an action filed under [the False Claims Act]" The separation of the two clauses by a comma and their parallel construction make them independent, so that the phrase referencing section 523(a) applies only a debt owed to a governmental unit, and the reference to the False Claims Act applies only to a debt owed to a person, that is, a nongovernmental unit. Section 523(c) and Bankruptcy Rule 4007(c) together provide that a debt specified in section 523(a)(2) is dischargeable unless the creditor brings a nondischargeability action against the debtor within 60 days after the 341 meeting. Section 523(c) applies to "the debtor," whose antecedent is the "individual debtor" referenced in section 523(a). It does not apply to a corporate debtor. Moreover, section 1141(d)(6) incorporates only section 523(a)(2), not any of the rest of section 523. Therefore, the relator's nondischargeability filing more than 60 days after the 341 meeting does not bar his claim. The relator has standing to bring the nondischargeability complaint, because he has an interest in the qui tam action in his own right, not merely as an agent of the government. U.S. ex rel. Minge v. Hawker Beechcraft Corp. (In re Hawker Beechcraft, Inc.), 515 B.R. 416 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 10.2.t Debtor's derivative liability for an excise tax is nondischargeable. The debtor was derivatively liable for an excise tax the state imposed on his corporation. Under section 523(a)(1)(A), "a discharge does not release an individual debtor from any debt ... for a tax ... of the kind and for the periods specified in section ... 507(a)(8)" Section 507(a)(8) specifies "an excise tax on ... a transaction" occurring within a three-year limitation period. An excise tax is a tax imposed on the manufacture, sale or use of goods or on an occupation or activity. The tax is imposed on the activity, not on an entity, and the identity of the entity liable for the tax does not change its character as an excise tax. Therefore, even though the debtor was only derivatively liable for the tax, it remained an excise tax and was nondischargeable. Rizzo v. State of Mich., Dept. of Treas. (In re Rizzo), 741 F.3d 703 (6th Cir. 2014).
- 10.2.u Debt arising from a third party's securities law violation is dischargeable. The debtor invested in a Ponzi scheme and withdrew fictitious profits. The state securities regulator shut down the Ponzi scheme as a violation of the state's securities laws and sued the investors under those laws, obtaining a judgment against the debtor for unjust enrichment. Section 523(a)(19)(A) renders nondischargeable a debt for "violation of ... any State securities laws, or any regulation or order issued under such ... State securities laws." Exceptions to discharge should be narrowly construed. The purpose of section 523(a)(19)(A) is to prevent discharge of a securities law violator's debts, not the debts of an innocent who was caught up in an illegal scheme. It therefore applies only to a debtor whose debt arose from the debtor's securities law violation and not to this debtor, who was not charged with any such violation. Okla. Dept. of Securities ex rel. Faught v. Wilcox, 691 F.3d 1171 (10th Cir. 2012).
- 10.2.v Defalcation requires a known breach of a known fiduciary duty. The debtor was a trustee of a trust. He borrowed from the trust for his own benefit and repaid all the loans. When the beneficiaries learned of the loans, they sued and received a judgment against the debtor for damages arising from his self-dealing. Under section 523(a)(4), a debt for fraud or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity is nondischargeable. Defalcation does not require fraud, embezzlement or misappropriation. However, it requires more than an innocent mistake or mere negligence. It requires a known breach of a known fiduciary duty, such that the conduct can be objectively described as reckless. The debtor's conduct here met that standard, so the debt is nondischargeable. Bullock v. Bankchampaign (In re Bullock), 670 F.3d 1160 (11th Cir. 2012).

- 10.2.w Section 523(a)(19) nondischargeability for securities fraud applies only to a culpable debtor. The SEC pursued securities fraud charges against an individual and obtained appointment of a receiver and a disgorgement order. The individual had paid an attorney for work that the attorney had not yet performed, so the disgorgement order required the attorney to return the excess payments, even though the attorney had not violated any securities laws. Before the attorney did so, however, he filed bankruptcy. Section 523(a)(19) excepts from discharge “a debt for the violation of any of the Federal securities laws”. In this context, “for” is ambiguous, because the provision does not specify whether the conduct giving rise to nondischargeability must have been the debtor’s conduct, as some (but not all) other exceptions to discharge do. The debt here for disgorgement of the proceeds of a securities law violation by another was not “for” the violation of the securities laws. In addition, to promote the Code’s fresh start principle, exceptions to discharge should be narrowly construed. The Code discharges an “honest but unfortunate debtor”. To apply the exception here would violate that principle, because the debtor was innocent of any violation. Therefore, the debt is discharged. Sherman v. S.E.C. (In re Sherman), 658 F.3d 1009 (9th Cir. 2011).
- 10.2.x Nonpayment of taxes alone is insufficient evidence to show a willful attempt to evade or defeat. The debtor filed complete and accurate income tax returns for four prepetition years that were more than three years before her bankruptcy, but she did not pay any of the tax shown as owing on the returns. After her bankruptcy, the United States sought to collect the taxes, but produced no evidence, other than the nonpayment, to support nondischargeability. Section 523(a)(1)(C) renders nondischargeable any tax “with respect to which the debtor ... willfully attempted to evade or defeat such tax”. The provision requires proof of two elements: conduct and mental state. Failure to file a return or pay taxes satisfies the conduct element of evading or defeating the tax. The mental element requires a showing of willfulness, that is, that the nonpayment was knowing and deliberate. Evidence of nonpayment alone is not sufficient to show willfulness. The government must show that the debtor had the ability to pay and chose to spend the money for other purposes. In this case, the absence of evidence of willfulness rendered the taxes dischargeable. United States v. Storey, 640 F.3d 739 (6th Cir. 2011).
- 10.2.y Knowing and intentional nonpayment of taxes constitutes a willful attempt to evade or defeat. The debtor was a real estate salesman. The debtor did not file tax returns for tax years 1998 through 2002, because he could not afford to pay both the taxes due and obligations arising from his divorce. He filed the returns in 2003 and then made several attempts with the IRS to address the taxes, first by an offer in compromise that was rejected and later, after the IRS attempted to levy, by an installment payment plan. His attorney threatened bankruptcy in correspondence relating to the offer in compromise. The debtor was employed consistently during all relevant years and earned over $100,000 each year (except for one). Between 2003 and his bankruptcy in 2006, he bought a house, but titled it in his new wife’s name, sold the house and used the proceeds, including a significant profit, to buy another, also in his wife’s name, and formed a corporation to receive his sales commissions after the IRS levied. Section 523(a)(1)(C) renders nondischargeable any tax “with respect to which the debtor ... willfully attempted to evade or defeat such tax”. The provision requires proof of two elements: conduct and mental state. Nonpayment alone is insufficient to satisfy the conduct requirement, but nonpayment coupled with failure to file a return does. The mental state condition requires a showing that the debtor had a duty, knew of the duty and voluntarily and intentionally violated the duty. Inadvertent mistakes do not satisfy the condition. Here, the debtor's failure to file returns because he knew he could not afford to pay, the titling of the houses in his wife's name and the creation of a corporation to receive his sales commissions all showed that the debtor knew of the duty and voluntarily and intentionally violated it. The taxes are therefore nondischargeable. U.S. v. Mitchell, 633 F.3d 1320 (11th Cir. 2011).

- 10.2.z Corporate insider's debt to corporate creditor is not excepted from discharge for defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity. The debtor was the sole shareholder and president of an advertising agency. The agency received payments from a customer for ad placements but did not pay for the ads, which the customer then paid. The customer sought to hold its claim against the president nondischargeable under section 523(a)(4) as a claim for defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity, on the theory that as an officer of an insolvent corporation, the president owed a fiduciary duty to creditors. The state law standard for determining whether an individual is a fiduciary does not govern whether the individual is a fiduciary for purposes of section 523(a)(4), which is a matter of federal law. Section 523(a)(4) should be construed narrowly. The fiduciary relationship must have existed before the debt was incurred, not as a result of the debt's incurrence. In addition, the fiduciary relationship must be express, not implied at law, unless the debtor held ultimate power over the creditor sufficient to create a fiduciary relationship. A mere debtor-creditor relationship at arms' length does not suffice. Therefore, the debt is discharged. Follett Higher Educ. Group, Inc. v. Berman (In re Berman), 629 F.3d 761 (7th Cir. 2011).
- 10.2.aa Ponzi scheme's net winner's disgorgement obligation is nondischargeable. The debtor invested in a Ponzi scheme and received fictitious profits from the operator. The Oklahoma Department of Securities brought an action against him under the Oklahoma Uniform Securities Act for unjust enrichment to recover the fictitious profits and obtained a disgorgement judgment. The debtor then filed a chapter 7 case. Section 523(a)(19) makes nondischargeable any debt "that is for the violation of any ... of the State securities laws ... and results ... from any judgment". The discharge exception does not specify that it applies only to a violation by the debtor. The Ponzi scheme operator violated the Securities Act. The Act authorizes disgorgement from an investor who directly benefited from a securities law violation, even if the violation was by a third party. Although exceptions to discharge are generally narrowly construed, this exception should be broadly construed to carry out its express purpose to protect investors. Therefore, it applies to the disgorgement judgment against the debtor, which is nondischargeable. Okla. Dep't of Sec. v. Mathews, 423 B.R. 684 (W.D. Okla. 2010).
- 10.2.bb A claim against the debtor retains its nondischargeable character when it is revived after a preference recovery. Within 90 days before his bankruptcy, the debtor repaid his employer funds that the debtor had embezzled. The trustee avoided and recovered the payment as a preference. The employer timely filed a dischargeability complaint. Section 502(h) provides that a claim arising from the trustee's recovery of an avoided transfer "shall be determined, and shall be allowed under ... this section or disallowed under ... this section, the same as if such claim had arisen" before the petition date. Although the references in section 502(h) to "allowed" and "disallowed" refer to the revival of the claim against the estate, the reference to "determine" expands section 502(h)'s reach to include revival of the claim against the debtor for dischargeability purposes, because section 523 refers twice to "determination of dischargeability". Therefore, when the employer repaid the preference to the estate, its claim against the debtor, including its nondischargeability, was revived. Busseto Foods, Inc. v. Laizure (In re Laizure), 548 F.3d 693 (9th Cir. 2008).
- 10.2.cc Nondischargeability for willful and malicious conduct requires an intentional tort. The debtor breached a settlement agreement with a creditor, which resulted in injury to the creditor. A debt for “willful and malicious injury” is nondischargeable. “Willful and malicious injury” requires an intentional tort. The Bankruptcy Code contemplates intentional breaches of contracts, either by the bankruptcy filing itself or by contract rejection. In addition, contract law permits a party to breach if it concludes the damages for which it will be liable are preferable to performance. Thus, an intentional breach of contract, no matter how willful and malicious, does not render the resulting liability nondischargeable unless the conduct also constitutes a tort under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Lockerby v. Sierra, 535 F.3d 1038 (9th Cir. 2008).

- 10.2.dd A horse & buggy is not a vessel. In the early morning hours after New Year’s Eve, Mr. Schmucker was driving his horse and buggy while intoxicated on the roads of Indiana when he failed to stop at a through way. A car traveling on the through way struck Mr. Schmucker’s buggy, seriously injuring the car’s passenger. The passenger sought to have Mr. Schmucker’s debt to her held nondischargeable under section 523(a)(9), which makes nondischargeable any debt arising from “the debtor’s operation of a motor vehicle, vessel, or aircraft” while intoxicated. “Vessel” does not include a horse and buggy. Although “vessel” might be defined to include any container, such a definition could include “coffee cups, flower pots, and grocery carts, all of which could cause injury and, quite conceivably, be operated while under the influence.” Therefore, given the context in which the term is used, and given the “vessel” definition in 1 U.S.C. § 3, its meaning is limited to boats and similar watercraft. Young v. Schmucker (In re Schmucker), 376 B.R. 256 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 2007); aff’d 409 B.R. 477 (N.D. Ind. 2009).
- 10.2.ee Some misconduct is required to qualify as “defalcation”. The debtor was a 50% shareholder with another individual in an insurance agency, which was deeply indebted. The other shareholder died. The debtor continued to collect premiums in the agency to pay off the agency’s debt but also formed a new agency for new business. After the other shareholder’s estate’s lengthy but unsuccessful negotiations with the debtor to sell its 50% interest in the old agency to the debtor, the estate sued the debtor for misappropriation of the old agency’s funds and goodwill. The state court ruled that the debtor had breached his fiduciary duty by co-opting the old agency for his own and the new agency’s enrichment and awarded the estate a substantial judgment against the debtor. The estate sought to hold the claim nondischargeable in the debtor’s subsequent bankruptcy. The court notes the split among the circuits on the meaning of “defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity” under section 523(a)(4) (innocent or negligent misappropriation in the Fourth, Eighth, and Ninth Circuits; some level of wrongful conduct in the Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Tenth Circuits; and scienter in the First Circuit) and follows the First Circuit’s standard. The state court’s findings against the debtor therefore do not rise to a defalcation. Defalcation requires “some portion of misconduct, akin to the level of recklessness required for scienter” in the securities laws. This standard is consistent with the requirement that the Supreme Court has imposed of narrowly interpreting nondischargeability grounds in section 523(a). Denton v. Hyman (In re Hyman), 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 21249 (2d Cir. Sept. 6, 2007).
- 10.2.ff Tenth circuit construes “statement of financial condition” in section 523(a)(2)(B) narrowly. Section 523(a)(2)(B) makes nondischargeable a debt for money obtained by use of a “statement ... respecting the debtor’s financial condition,” but only if the statement is in writing. Section 523(a)(2)(A), by contrast, makes a debt incurred by false pretenses, false representation, or actual fraud nondischargeable, whether or not in writing, but only if the representation is not a “statement respecting the debtor’s financial condition.” In this case, the debtor orally represented to her lender that she owned specified real and personal property and that she would soon receive a new loan from her brother from which to repay the loan. Both representations were false. When the lender found a different name on the real property title records, the debtor explained that the name was hers. In fact, it was really her sister-in-law’s. The lender sought nondischargeability under (A). The debtor defended on the ground that the statements were respecting her financial condition. The Tenth Circuit adopts a narrow interpretation of “statement respecting the debtor’s financial condition” as a statement “going to the debtor’s overall financial net worth or financial condition.” The debtor’s statements here concerning property ownership and the expectation of a new loan do not meet that definition, so the debt is nondischargeable. Caldwell v. Joelson (In re Joelson), 427 F.3d 700 (10th Cir. 2005).

- 10.2.gg Judgment solely for emotional distress is dischargeable. The creditor had obtained a judgment in state court against the debtor for emotional distress arising from the debtor’s fraud. The debtor had not obtained any money, property, services, or an extension or renewal of credit from the creditor. Accordingly, the debt is dischargeable, because section 523(a)(2) applies only when the debtor has acquired one or more of such things from the fraud. Nunnery v. Rountree (In re Rountree), 330 B.R. 166 (E.D. Va. 2004).
- 10.2.hh Post-discharge attorney’s fees for continuing prepetition litigation are not discharged. The debtor had sued her employer before bankruptcy. She claimed the action as exempt and pursued it unsuccessfully after the order for relief. Under state law and her employment agreement, her former employer obtained an award of attorney’s fees against her. The postpetition portion of the fees—the portion incurred after the order for relief—was not discharged. Although postpetition fees arising out of prepetition claims may be discharged, where the debtor “returns to the fray” after the order for relief to pursue litigation against the adverse party, the debtor converts any relationship of the fees to the pre-bankruptcy period to a postpetition relationship. The fees therefore “arise” after the order for relief. The standard for determining that the fees relate to postpetition and therefore post-discharge activities differs from the standard for determining whether the fees would be entitled to administrative expense priority if asserted against the estate, because the policies underlying the discharge and the priority provisions differ, the one relating to the debtor’s personal liability for the debtor’s postpetition acts, the other affecting benefit to the estate and the effect on recoveries of other creditors. Boeing North American, Inc. v. Ybarra (In re Ybarra), 424 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2005).
- 10.2.ii Bail bondsman’s bail debts are nondischargeable. The debtor was a commercial bail bondsman, who filed a bankruptcy case with unpaid bail debts to the Superior Court. Disagreeing with the Fourth and Fifth Circuits, the Third Circuit holds the debts nondischargeable under section 523(a)(7). They are payable to a governmental unit and are not in compensation for actual pecuniary loss. They are also a “forfeiture,” because they constitute a loss payable by reason of failure to perform an obligation. Dobrek v. Phelan, 419 F.3d 259 (3d Cir. 2005).
- 10.2.jj Eighth Circuit expands “undue hardship” requirement for student loan discharge. The debtor suffered depression, made significantly worse by the pressure and stress of $142,000 in student loans. Although she earned a regular income and had some disposable income with which to pay a portion of the loans, the court discharged them as an undue hardship. The Eighth Circuit has previously rejected the Brunner three-factor test (Brunner v. N.Y. State Higher Educ. Serv. Corp., 831 F.2d 395 (2d Cir. 1987)) and adopted instead a “totality of the circumstances” test in determining whether repayment of a student loan constitutes an undue hardship. Here, the court expands the concept of undue hardship to include non-financial hardship. Even if the debtor could afford to repay a portion of the loans, the bankruptcy court may consider the medical hardship repayment would pose. Reynolds v. Pennsylvania Higher Educ. Assist. Agency (In re Reynolds), 425 F.3d 526 (8th Cir. 2005).
- 10.2.kk Section 523(a)(19) applies to cases pending at the date of enactment. Congress added section 523(a)(19) in the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 to make judgments, orders, or decrees for violation of the securities laws nondischargeable. Here, the debtor had filed bankruptcy before enactment of Sarbanes-Oxley, but the court’ held the hearing on nondischargeability after enactment. The general rule is that the court must apply the law in effect at the time it rules. However, the court considers whether application of this provision to a pending case would be an improper retroactive application. It concludes that a debtor does not become entitled to a discharge just by filing a bankruptcy petition, so the debtor had no vested rights as of the petition date, and the additional nondischargeability ground did not increase the debtor's liability. Therefore, it was proper to apply the provision to the pending case. Harvey v. Lewandowski (In re Lewandowski), 325 B.R. 700 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2005).

- 10.2.ii BAPCPA's amendment of section 523(a)(19) applies to cases in which the court has already made a prior determination of dischargeability. In a case filed in 2004, a creditor sued to have the debtor's securities fraud debt excepted from discharge. The court denied the motion on December 29, 2004, because the claim was not yet reduced to judgment, as section 523(a)(19) then required. Congress amended the provision on April 20, 2005 to apply to claims whether reduced to judgment before or after the date of the filing of the petition. The creditor moved for reconsideration even though the claim had not yet been reduced to judgment in state court, so the discharge injunction would not apply and he could continue to pursue the action in state court. The court holds the debt nondischargeable, because Congress specifically provided for the amendment to become effective immediately. Accordingly, it applied to this pending case, despite the court's prior contrary determination. In re Weilein, 328 B.R. 553 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 2005).
- 10.2.mm Sanctions under Rule 11 and 28 U.S.C. § 1927 are nondischargeable. The attorney brought an action on behalf of his client against the creditor. The court found that it was unreasonable for the attorney to do so, because there was no colorable claim that the action was not time barred. The court awarded sanctions under Rule 11 and 28 U.S.C. § 1927. When the attorney later filed bankruptcy, the sanctions were nondischargeable as a claim arising from a willful and malicious injury under section 523(a)(6). The trial court had found a "clear violation" of Rule 11 and that the action "was unwarranted." Although the trial court did not make a finding that the action was willful and malicious, its findings that the litigation was unreasonable and vexatious satisfied the willful and malicious standard of section 5256(a)(6) and would be binding on the bankruptcy court. Ball v. A.O. Smith Corp., 321 B.R. 100 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).
- 10.2.nn Sixth Circuit adopts straight Brunner test, rejects modified version. Previously, the Sixth Circuit had adopted a modified Brunner test in determining whether to permit discharge of a student loan. The court considered additional factors, such as amount, interest rate, expenses and standard of living, income and ability, and attempts to maximize repayment ability. The court recognizes, however, that the additional factors are all easily subsumed within the three Brunner factors of ability to maintain a minimal standard of living, likelihood that the adverse circumstances will persist for a significant portion of the repayment period, and a prior good faith effort to repay, and so concludes that it will henceforth apply the Brunner test in an unmodified form. Applying it here, the court rules the debtor's debt nondischargeable. The debtor had a master's degree, but he served only as the pastor of a start-up church, earning $10,000 per year. Under the circumstances, he could not show that his current circumstances will persist throughout the repayment period, nor that the circumstances were beyond his control. "Choosing a low paying job cannot merit undue hardship relief." Oyler v. Educational Credit Mgmt. Corp., 397 F.3d 382 (6th Cir. 2005).
- 10.2.oo IRS living standards do not apply to student loan dischargeability hardship determination. A student loan may be discharged only if repayment would impose an undue hardship on the debtor. Under the Brunner test, repayment imposes an undue hardship only if, among other things, the debtor cannot maintain a minimal standard of living if required to repay. In determining what constitutes a minimal standard of living, the IRS Collection Financial Standards, which the IRS uses to evaluate the ability of taxpayers to repay past due taxes, do not provide the proper test. First, the IRS Standards do not focus on a "minimal" standard of living, but rather on adequate means to provide basic living expenses, and do not include such expenses as healthcare. Second, the IRS Standards are variable based on the taxpayer's family size and income, permitting higher expenses for higher income individuals. Such variability is inconsistent with the minimal standard of living test. Third, the IRS Standards do not provide for other expenses that the courts have permitted under the minimal standard test. The court rejects the creditor's argument that the IRS Standards provide a ceiling on allowable expenses, holding that the court must make an independent evaluation of the debtor's needs and expenses. Educational Credit Mgmt. Corp. v. Howe (In re Howe), 319 B.R. 886 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).

- 10.2.pp Court may not declare nondischargeability of civil contempt sanction in advance. The bankruptcy court imposed a civil contempt sanction on the corporate debtor's principal for failing to turn over the corporation's property to the trustee and declared that the sanction would be nondischargeable in the principal's subsequent personal bankruptcy, if the principal later filed. The Ninth Circuit vacates the nondischargeability order, ruling that a bankruptcy court may determine nondischargeability only in the obligor's own personal bankruptcy, not in a case of a related entity, such as here. It notes, however, that a civil contempt sanction is generally nondischargeable under section 523(a)(7) where it is imposed to uphold the dignity and authority of the court (a conclusion of uncertain validity) and that the bankruptcy court may so note in its order so as to make a future bankruptcy court aware of the issue. Hansbrough v. Birdsell (In re Hercules Enters., Inc.), 387 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 10.2.qq Creditor may recover nondischargeable attorney's fees under sections 523(a)(2) and (a)(6) if state law permits. The Supreme Court's decision in Cohen v. de la Cruz, 523 U.S. 213 (1998), permits attorney's fees in nondischargeability proceedings under section 523(a)(2) if the fees would have been recoverable in a nonbankruptcy court on the underlying claim. The same rule should apply to nondischargeability proceedings under section 523(a)(6). Bertola v. Northern Wisconsin Produce Co., Inc. (In re Bertola), 317 B.R. 95 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).
- 10.2.rr Transferee liability for taxes is nondischargeable to the same extent as the underlying taxes. Some years after the debtor dissolved his corporation and succeeded to its assets and liabilities, he filed a chapter 7 petition. Upon a later audit, the IRS determined that the corporation had not filed an income tax return for one year and assessed the debtor for the taxes owing under the Internal Revenue Code's transferee liability provision, section 6901(a). The resulting liability was nondischargeable as a debt for a tax, because section 6901(a) provides only a mechanism for collecting a tax, not a new liability or obligation. McKeowen v. Internal Revenue Serv., 370 F.3d 1023 (10th Cir. 2004).
- 10.2.ss False statement about an insider does not necessarily amount to a false financial statement for nondischargeability purposes. The debtor was a general partner in a partnership; the creditor was a limited partner. The debtor purchased the creditor's partnership interest with a note, but defrauded the creditor by concealing the nature and amount of assets the partnership owned at the time of sale. Although the fraud was related to an insider, it did not relate to the insider's financial condition, so the debt was nondischargeable under section 523(a)(2)(A). The creditor did not need to show a written misrepresentation, as required by section 523(a)(2)(B). Section 523(a)(2)(B) was primarily designed to limit the rights of creditors who routinely require submission of financial statements, and this was not that kind of case. Rose v. Lauer (In re Lauer), 371 F.3d 406 (8th Cir. 2004).
- 10.2.tt Debtor's revocation of assignment of military retirement pay is not embezzlement or larceny. The debtor had retired from the military and was receiving a pension. He "sold" the pension to Structured Investments Co. for a lump sum. Because the relevant federal statute prohibits assignment of the benefits, the debtor agreed to direct to the government to deposit the monthly payments into his account, which Structured swept each month, remitting a portion back to the debtor. Just before bankruptcy, the debtor revoked the deposit instructions. Structured sought nondischargeability on the ground that the debtor had embezzled Structured's property.

The bankruptcy court determines that the purported assignment of the benefits was void under the federal statute, so the payments the debtor received were not Structured's property. Structured Invs. Co., LLC v. Price (In re Price), 313 B.R. 805 (Bankr. E.D. Ark. 2004).

- 10.2.uu Secured taxes (including postpetition interest) are nondischargeable. Section 523(a)(1) excepts from discharge "any debt ... for a tax ... of the kind and for the periods specified in ... section . . . 507(a)(8), whether or not a claim for such tax was filed or allowed." Section 507(a)(8) grants priority to "allowed unsecured claims of governmental units" for certain taxes. Joining with the Eleventh Circuit and splitting with the Tenth, the Ninth Circuit concludes that secured taxes are excepted from discharge. It concludes that the cross-reference in section 507(a)(8) is to the type of tax, not to the type of claim. It reasons that unsecured taxes are excepted from discharge whether or not allowed and that the taxes should similarly be nondischargeable, whether or not unsecured. As a result, postpetition, pre-confirmation interest on a secured tax claim was not discharged under the chapter 11 plan. Miller v. United States, 363 F.3d 999 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 10.2.vv Hiding money from the IRS results in nondischargeable taxes. A debt for a tax "with respect which the debtor willfully attempted in any manner to evade or defeat such tax" is nondischargeable under section 523(a)(1)(C). In this case, the debtor had reported the taxes owing on his tax returns but failed to pay them. In negotiations with the IRS, he failed to disclose the existence of nominee bank accounts, where he had hidden the bulk of his cash. Though he had promised payment of the taxes from certain settlements he was about to receive, he also hid the settlement payments and did not pay the taxes. In addition to proving that the debtor engaged in affirmative acts to avoid payment, the government had to prove that "the debtor voluntarily, consciously, and knowingly" evaded payment. These standards apply not only to an attempt to defeat assessment of the tax, but also an attempt to defeat payment of a tax already assessed. The taxes were therefore nondischargeable. Stamper v. United States (In re Gardner), 369 F.3d 551 (6th Cir. 2004).
- 10.2.ww B.A.P. interprets "statement of financial condition" in section 523(a)(2)(B) narrowly. Section 523(a)(2)(B) makes nondischargeable a debt for money obtained by use of a "statement . . . respecting the debtor's financial condition," but only if the statement is in writing. Section 523(a)(2)(A), by contrast, makes a debt incurred by false pretenses, false representation, or actual fraud nondischargeable, whether or not in writing, but only if the representation is not a "statement respecting the debtor's financial condition." In this case, the debtor orally represented to her lender that she owned specified real and personal property and that she would soon receive a new loan from her brother from which to repay the loan. Both representations were false. When the lender found a different name on the real property title records, the debtor explained that the name was hers. In fact, it was really her sister-in-law's. The lender sought nondischargeability under (A). The debtor defended on the ground that the statements were respecting her financial condition. The Tenth Circuit B.A.P. adopts a narrow interpretation of "statement respecting the debtor's financial condition" as a statement "of a debtor's net worth, overall financial health, or ability to generate income." It finds the statements concerning property ownership and the expectation of a new loan do not meet that definition and rules the debt nondischargeable. Cadwell v. Joelson (In re Joelson), 307 B.R. 689 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).
- 10.2.xx A debt for fraud is not dischargeable as a willful and malicious injury. Generally, a ground for exception to discharge is nonexclusive of other grounds, and a creditor may plead one or more than one ground in seeking to hold a particular debt nondischargeable. In this case, the creditor contended that the debtor's oral representation about his financial condition, which would not render the debt nondischargeable under section 523(a)(2), nevertheless should be nondischargeable under section 523(a)(6) as a debt for willful and malicious injury. The creditor argued that fraud is an intentional tort, which section 523(a)(6) is intended to cover. The court rejects the contention, holding that permitting a creditor to seek nondischargeability under the willful and malicious injury provision when the injury is a loss caused by a fraudulent oral statement concerning the debtor's financial condition would permit a creditor to circumvent the strict requirement of section 523(a)(2)(B) that any misstatement regarding financial condition be in writing as a condition to nondischargeability. Berkson v. Gulevsky (In re Gulevsky), 362 F.3d 961 (7th Cir. 2004).

10.2.yy Brunner's "additional circumstances" need not be exceptional. The debtor was 51 years old, earned a moderate living for her community, expected to retire in 13 years (which would result in a reduction in her income), and had maximized her earnings potential in her community. She had no physical or mental disabilities, and there were no exceptional circumstances that interfered with her ability to repay her student loans. However, she had taken a deferral for 12 years, during which interest charges grew so that the loan was beyond her ability to repay. The Brunner test permits discharge only if the debtor cannot afford to repay and maintain a minimal standard of living, "additional circumstances exist indicating that this state of affairs is likely to persist for a significant portion of the repayment period of the student loans," and the debtor made a good faith effort to repay. The second prong does not require exceptional circumstances, such as physical or mental disability, only a showing that the circumstances are "tenacious and demonstrate insurmountable barriers to the debtor's financial recovery and ability to pay for a significant portion of the repayment period." In this case, the facts that the debtor's income had topped out and that she was facing retirement during the repayment period met this test. Nys v. Educational Credit Mgmt. Corp. (In re Nys), 308 B.R. 436 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004).

10.2.zz Unpaid chapter 11 attorney's fees are discharged in subsequent chapter 7 case. The individual debtor incurred attorney's fees during his chapter 11 case, which the attorney sought to collect from the debtor after his chapter 7 discharge. The chapter 7 discharge applies to all debts incurred before the date of the chapter 7 order for relief, which is the conversion date in a case converted from another chapter. Section 348(d) requires that claims against the debtor or the estate incurred during the chapter 11 case, except administrative expense claims, be treated for all purposes as though they were incurred prepetition. Though this provision exempts administrative expenses from this requirement, it does not prohibit treatment of administrative expenses the same as prepetition claim. If it did, it would unnecessarily conflict with the chapter 7 discharge provision. Therefore, the fees were discharged. Fickling v. Flower, Medalie & Markowitz (In re Fickling), 361 F.3d 172 (2d Cir. 2004).

10.2.aaa Postpetition, non-administrative chapter 11 claims are not discharged. A chapter 11 plan for an individual debtor must except from discharge any postpetition claims that are for the personal benefit of the debtor, rather than the debtor in possession or estate. They are not allowable as administrative expenses under section 503, because they are not incurred on behalf of the estate and do not provide any benefit to the estate. They are not allowable under section 502, which applies only to prepetition claims. Chapter 11 does not contain any provisions that allow a plan to deal with postpetition, non-administrative claims, and, because the claims cannot be allowed claims, their holders do not have any means of voting or objecting to the plan. Therefore, even though section 1141(d)(1)(A) contemplates discharge of all claims that arose before plan confirmation, a plan that does not except such claims from discharge is not filed in good faith, as required by section 1129(a)(3), and should not be confirmed. The court's opinion applies similar reasoning to postpetition, non-administrative tax claims and the application of section 505(a) (determination of estate's tax liability) and section 523(a)(1) (nondischargeability of tax claims). In re Shin, 306 B.R. 397 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2004).

10.2.bbb Debtor's fee agreement does not limit recovery under section 523(d). The debtor paid her attorney a flat fee of $595 for the bankruptcy case, $200 of which was allocated to the defense of possible nondischargeability actions. A creditor brought a nondischargeability action that was not substantially justified, entitling the debtor to an award of fees under section 523(d).

The language of section 523(d) is modeled on similar language in the Equal Access to Justice Act. As such, the debtor is entitled to an award of attorney's fees regardless of the fee arrangements between the debtor and her attorney. What's more, the debtor is entitled to receive attorney's fees for making the motion to receive fees. Sears Roebuck & Co. v. Dayton (In re Dayton), 306 B.R. 322 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2004).

- 10.2.ccc Tenth Circuit adopts softer Brunner test. The Tenth Circuit adopts the Second Circuit's Brunner test in determining dischargeability of student loans, rather than the Eighth Circuit's "totality of the circumstances" test. In doing so, however, the court criticizes lower courts that have applied the Brunner test too harshly. The court rules that permanent disability is not required as a condition to discharge, that "good faith attempt to repay" does not require a certain percentage or minimum amount of prior repayment, and that "a certainty of hopelessness" is not required as part of the determination that the hardship is likely to persist for a significant period of the repayment period. The court also permits consideration of other factors beyond the three stated and encourages lower courts to apply the test to carry out Congress's policy that student loans be discharged in hardship cases. Educational Credit Management Corp. v. Polleys, 356 F.3d 1302 (10th Cir. 2004).
- 10.2.ddd Unpaid tuition and fees are dischargeable. The student attended college but did not timely pay various fees and tuition. After the college obtained a judgment against the student, she filed bankruptcy and sought to have debt declared dischargeable. The Seventh Circuit concludes that the debt was not a "loan" as that term is used in section 523(a)(8). In order for it to be a loan, there must be a contract whereby one party transfers money, goods, or services to the other and intends an extension of credit to be repaid at a later time. This was not such a case. In re Chambers, 348 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 2003).
- 10.2.eee Tax penalties on nondischargeable taxes are dischargeable. The debtor had agreed with the IRS to an open extension of time to assess taxes for tax years that ended more than three years before the petition date. Accordingly, the taxes were nondischargeable under section 523(a)(1)(A). The tax penalties on those taxes, however, were dischargeable. The exception to discharge in section 523(a)(7) permits discharge of tax penalties for dischargeable taxes or for taxes "imposed with respect to a transaction or event that occurred before three years before the date of the filing of the petition." The court construes the latter phrase to include the filing of the income tax return for the tax year in question as the "transaction or event" and permits discharge of the related tax penalties. Miller v. Internal Revenue Service (In re Miller), 300 B.R. 422 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2003).
- 10.2.fff Corporate officer is not a fiduciary under section 523(a)(4). Section 523(a)(4) renders nondischargeable a debt for defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity. A corporate officer that misuses corporate funds is a fiduciary based on a relationship arising from an express or technical trust that is required to come within the terms of section 523(a)(4). Cal-Micro, Inc. v. Cantrell (In re Cantrell), 329 F.3d 1120 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 10.2.ggg Contempt citation excepted from discharge as willful and malicious injury. The individual debtor breached a union contract by hiring non-union employees. The district court ordered restitution for the breach and ordered future compliance with the contract. The debtor later hired non-union employees again. The district court imposed sanctions for violation of the prior order. The first award was dischargeable, because an intentional breach of contract is not by itself "willful and malicious injury," and the union did not show that the debtor intended to injure the union by the conduct. However, knowing violation of a court order resulting in contempt sanctions constituted willful and malicious injury, because the violation was knowing and was substantially certain to inflict injury on the union. Williams v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (In re Williams), 337 F.3d 504 (5th Cir. 2003).

- 10.2.hhh Post petition attorney's fees are discharged. Before bankruptcy, the debtor had brought an action against her former employer. After bankruptcy, and after some preliminary litigation about whether she could exempt the action, she exempted it and continued to pursue it. She ultimately lost, and the state court awarded attorney's fees against her. In a sharply divided opinion, the Ninth Circuit B.A.P. attempts to construe confusing Ninth Circuit precedent on the dischargeability of the post petition attorney's fees that the state court awarded against the debtor. It concludes that because the action was based on prepetition conduct and was commenced prepetition, the attorney's fees should be discharged. It concludes, however, that the discharge injunction did not apply to the grant of attorney's fees, because the grant occurred in a creditor's post petition defensive action in a prepetition suit brought by the debtor. Ybarra v. Boeing North American, Inc. (In re Ybarra), 295 B.R. 609 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 10.2.iii Nevada law applied to enforceability of gambling debt. The debtor incurred gambling debt in Nevada and later filed bankruptcy in California. The casino sought to have the debt held non-dischargeable. The bankruptcy court dismissed the complaint on the ground that the debt was not enforceable in California. The B.A.P. reverses, holding that Nevada law applies to a gambling debt incurred in Nevada. Therefore, the casino may try the non-dischargeability claim in the California bankruptcy court. Mandalay Resort Group v. Miller (In re Miller), 292 B.R. 409 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 10.2.jjj Debtor must meet Brunner hardship test for partial disallowance of student loan. In Brunner v. New York, 831 F.2d 395 (2d Cir. 1987), the Second Circuit set out the widely accepted test for determining whether a debtor meets the "undue hardship" requirement for discharge of a student loan. In this case, the Eleventh Circuit adopts the Brunner test, as have the Third, Fourth, Seventh, and Ninth (differing from the Sixth and Eighth Circuits). The bankruptcy judge granted the debtor a partial discharge without specifically making the Brunner findings. In a case of apparent first impression, the Eleventh Circuit rules that the Debtor must meet the Brunner undue hardship test even for a partial discharge. Hemar Ins. Corp. v. Cox (In re Cox), 338 F.3d 1238 (11th Cir. 2003).
- 10.2.kkk Debt novation agreement does not preclude non-dischargeability. The creditor sued the debtor in state court for fraud but settled for a lesser amount, including a cash payment and a promissory note, and released all underlying claims. The debtor defaulted on the note and filed bankruptcy. The creditor sought to have the note declared non-dischargeable on the grounds that it was for a debt incurred by fraud. The Supreme Court, relying on its prior decision in Brown v. Felsen, 442 U.S. 127 (1979), concludes that despite the release, the underlying debt may have been incurred by fraud and the settlement does not preclude the creditor from pursuing non-dischargeability on that ground as a matter of bankruptcy law, although the court leaves to the lower courts the question of whether state court principles of claim preclusion would prevent such a claim of fraud. Archer v. Warner, 123 S. Ct. 1462 (2003).
- 10.2.iii State statute may not declare certain debts non-dischargeable. A Colorado statute provides that any liability for certain automobile accidents are for "willful and malicious injuries," which would make them non-dischargeable under section 523(a)(6). Such a state legislative determination would preempt the exclusive jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts to determine whether the grounds for non-dischargeability have been met in a particular case, and the statute may not be enforced to render debts non-dischargeable. Farmers Ins. Exchange v. Mills (In re Mills), 290 B.R. 822 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2003).
- 10.2.mmm An agent's fraud may render a debt non-dischargeable. The debtor's husband defrauded the creditor, who obtained a state court judgment against the debtor and her husband. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, the creditor sought to have the debt declared non-dischargeable as a debt incurred by actual fraud. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. rules that the marital relationship alone does not give rise to such a principal/agent relationship that fraud of the agent may be imputed to the principal (here, the debtor). However, the bankruptcy court found, and the B.A.P. affirms, that the debtor and her husband were actually partners in a business partnership. Because each partner is the agent of the other, the fraud could be imputed, and the debt was non-dischargeable. Tsurukawa v. Nikon Precision, Inc. (In re Tsurukawa), 287 B.R. 515 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).

10.2.nnn First Circuit sets high standard for defalcation. A debt is non-dischargeable under section 523(a)(4) if the debt is “for fraud or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity, embezzlement, or larceny.” In a case of first impression on an issue that has split other circuits, the First Circuit construes “defalcation” narrowly to require more than innocent mistake, negligence, or civil recklessness, requiring instead “some degree of fault, closer to fraud, without the necessity of meeting a strict specific intent requirement.” Accordingly, a debtor who served as trustee of an express trust and breached a duty of loyalty to the trust, causing payment of his own expenses out of the trust for his own personal benefit, was guilty of defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity, and the resulting debt was non-dischargeable. By contrast, the loss that the trust and its beneficiaries suffered by the debtors flawed and negligent judgments in administering the trust were not reckless and therefore did not constitute a defalcation. Rutanen v. Baylis (In re Baylis), 313 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2002).

10.2.ooo ERISA contribution obligations were non-dischargeable in the bankruptcy of the employer’s president. The employer was owned and controlled by two individuals. In the months before bankruptcy, the employer did not make required pension and welfare plan contributions, although it made numerous payments to or for the personal benefit of the two individual shareholders, directors, and officers. One of the individuals subsequently filed bankruptcy. The pension plan sought to hold the individual liable for the plan contributions and to hold the obligation non-dischargeable under section 523(a)(4) (fraud or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity). The court rules that the individual was a plan fiduciary, that the debt owing from the employer corporation to the plans were plan assets, that the failure to pay the plan constituted a defalcation (which the court rules is broadly defined to include ordinary negligence or mistake), that the individual was therefore personally liable to the funds for breach of his fiduciary duty, and that the obligation was non-dischargeable because it arose from defalcation. Hunter v. Philpott (In re Philpott), 281 B.R. 271 (Bankr. W.D. Ark. 2002).

10.2.ppp Corporate officer’s guarantee debt is non-dischargeable under section 523(a)(4). The individual debtor was the shareholder, director, and officer of a travel agency, which had entered into an Agent Reporting Agreement with Airlines Reporting Corporation. The Agreement provided that the travel agent would hold ticket proceeds in trust for ARC. The individual guaranteed the agency’s obligations to ARC. When the agency did not hold the funds in trust for ARC and, with its individual shareholder, filed bankruptcy petitions, ARC sought to hold the individual’s debt non-dischargeable for defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity under section 523(a)(4). Over a vigorous (and well reasoned) dissent, the Fourth Circuit rules that the individual did not owe a fiduciary duty to ARC but that he did owe a duty to his travel agency, which owed a fiduciary duty to the creditor, which the individual caused the travel agency to breach. Those facts, combined with the personal guaranty, made the debt one for defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity even though the fiduciary capacity was not to the creditor. Airlines Reporting Corporation v. Ellison (In re Ellison), 296 F.3d 266 (4th Cir. 2002).

10.2.qqq Once non-dischargeable, always non-dischargeable. Section 523(b) provides that a debt that was excepted from discharge in a prior case under section 523(a)(1) (taxes) (a)(3) (unscheduled), or (a)(8) (educational loans) may be discharged in a subsequent case. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. reads this section as an exception to the general rule that a debt excepted from discharge in a prior case is always non-dischargeable under principles of res judicata. In this case, the debtor failed to schedule the creditor in the prior case. The discharge was granted. Later, the bankruptcy court concluded that the creditor's debt should be excepted from discharge under due process principles. The debtor did not appeal that judgment, but several years later filed another bankruptcy, seeking to discharge the creditor's debt. Because the debt was excepted from discharge in the prior case, it is excepted from discharge in the current case. Paine v. Griffin (In re Paine), 283 B.R. 33 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).

10.2.rrr A non-dischargeability complaint under section 523(a)(3) may be barred by laches.

Section 523(a)(3)(B) excepts from the deadline of section 523(c) certain complaints to determine non-dischargeability by a creditor whose claim has not been listed or scheduled and who does not receive notice or knowledge of the bankruptcy case to permit timely filing of a non-dischargeability complaint. Bankruptcy Rule 4007(b) permits such a complaint to be filed "at any time." The Ninth Circuit rules that despite the "at any time" language, a creditor may be barred by laches from bringing a non-dischargeability complaint under section 523(a)(3)(B). However, the debtor must make a heightened showing of the unreasonableness of the creditor's delay and the prejudice to the debtor, because it was the debtor's omission of the creditor's claim on the schedules in the first place that permitted the creditor the longer time to file the non-dischargeability complaint. Beaty v. Selinger (In re Beaty), 306 F.3d 914 (9th Cir. 2002).

10.2.sss Pre-bankruptcy waivers are against public policy. In settlement of an action for repayment of a loan and for fraud, the debtor agreed that she would not file a bankruptcy petition and that if she did, the debt arising from the settlement agreement would be non-dischargeable and the bank would have immediate relief from the automatic stay to enforce the settlement agreement and a security interest granted to secure payment. Fourteen months later, the debtor filed bankruptcy. The bank argued non-dischargeability on the ground of fraud and collateral estoppel based on the settlement in the pre-bankruptcy lawsuit. The Ninth Circuit rules that it is against public policy for a debtor to waive pre-petition protection of the Bankruptcy Code, including all three waivers contained in the settlement agreement. The Ninth Circuit also rules that because the fraud was not admitted in the settlement agreement, nor was it necessary to the debtor's liability in the pre-petition action, collateral estoppel did not apply. Bank of China v. Huang, 275 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2002).

10.2.ttt Chapter 13 filing tolls three-year look-back for income tax dischargeability. The debtor had filed a chapter 13 within three years after an income tax return was due, entitling the tax claim to priority and non-dischargeability. The debtor later dismissed the chapter 13 case and filed a chapter 7 case more than three years after the tax return was due. The Supreme Court holds that the pendency of the chapter 13 case, which prevented the IRS from enforcing the tax claim against the debtor, tolled the three-year period of section 507(a)(8)(A). The Supreme Court characterizes the three year period as a statute of limitations and applies the doctrine of equitable tolling to conclude that it would be inequitable to permit the statute to run while the IRS was prohibited from taking collection action. Young v. United States, 535 U.S. 43 (2002).

10.2.uuu Laches does not apply to a non-dischargeability complaint for an unsecured debt. Bankruptcy Rule 4007(a) permits a complaint to determine dischargeability under section 523(a)(3)(B) (unsecured claims) to be filed "at any time." Because of this Rule, the debtor may not assert laches as a defense to a non-dischargeability complaint for an unsecured claim even where, as in this case, the complaint was brought only after the creditor lost on his complaint to deny discharge under section 727. Selinger v. Beaty (In re Beaty), 268 B.R. 839 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

10.2.vvv Covenant not to compete is not discharged. Under Iowa law, a breach of a covenant not to compete may give rise to a claim for money damages for past violations, but the plaintiff may obtain an injunction for future violations only if money damages are inadequate. The Sixth Circuit concludes, therefore, that equitable relief is not an alternative to a right to payment for future injuries. Accordingly, the right to an equitable remedy does not give rise to a right to payment (as required for it to be included in the definition of claim under section 101(5)(B)), and the covenant not to compete is not discharged. Kennedy v. Medicap Pharmacies, Inc., 267 F.3d 493 (6th Cir. 2001).

- 10.2.www Due process for dischargeability requires more than mere knowledge of bankruptcy case. The debtor terminated its pension plan during its chapter 11 case, giving notice to all individual pension claimants that the termination would not affect their rights. Years later, a retired employee sued the debtor for reduction in pension benefits by reason of the termination. The debtor defended on discharge grounds. Holding that Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank, 339 U.S. 306 (1950), requires an analysis of the particular facts of each case to determine whether notice of the bankruptcy was adequate, the Fifth Circuit rejects a rule that mere knowledge of the bankruptcy case is adequate to bar unfiled claims. The Fifth Circuit rules that due process requires the debtor to refrain from assuring potential claimants that their rights will not be adversely affected during bankruptcy proceedings, lest the claimant be falsely lulled into not filing a proof of claim. Christopher v. Kendavis Holding Co. (In re Kendavis Holding Co.), 249 F.3d 383 (5th Cir. 2001).
- 10.2.xxx Vicarious fraudulent liability is non-dischargeable. One of three partners in an accounting firm defrauded a client by diverting the client's cash to his own use. The two innocent partners received no benefit from the money. In the bankruptcy of the two innocent partners, the client sought to have the claim declared non-dischargeable. Holding that the receipt of a benefit is not a requirement of the non-dischargeability statute, the Fifth Circuit holds the debts non-dischargeable. Deodati v. M.N. Winkler & Assocs. (In re M.N. Winkler & Assocs.), 239 F.3d 746 (5th Cir. 2001).
- 10.2.yyy Rooker-Feldman doctrine does not permit review of state court dischargeability determination. The creditors, who were not listed on the debtor's list of creditors, sued the debtors in state court two years after the debtor's discharge. The state court concluded that the debt was not discharged under section 523(a)(3). The bankruptcy court refused to rule otherwise, based on the Rooker-Feldman doctrine, relying to a degree on the Ninth Circuit panel decision in In re Gruntz, 166 F.3d 1020 (9th Cir. 1999), before it was withdrawn and overruled en banc. The court also did not credit section 524(a), which voids non-bankruptcy court judgments as part of the discharge injunction. In re Toussaint, 259 B.R. 96 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2000).
- 10.2.zzz Fraud exception to discharge is broader than a fraudulent misrepresentation. The debtor was a participant in her brother's actual fraudulent transfer to her of assets subject to the brother's creditors' security interests. When she filed bankruptcy, the creditors sought to have the claim against her for receiving the fraudulent transfer declared nondischargeable under section 523(a)(2) as a "debt for money, property, or services obtained by actual fraud." The court rules that her participation in a fraudulent transfer, even though it did not involve a false representation or a material omission, constituted actual fraud for purposes of section 523(a)(2). McClellan v. Cantrell, 217 F.3d 890 (7th Cir. 2000).
- 10.2.aaaa Willful attempt to evade or defeat payment of taxes creates a nondischargeable claim. Reversing its prior panel ruling, 174 F.3d 1222 (11th Cir. 1999) and its prior decision in In re Haas, 48 F.3d 1153 (11th Cir. 1995), the Eleventh Circuit joins four other circuits in ruling that a willful attempt to evade or defeat payment of taxes is non-dischargeable under section 523(a)(1)(C), not just a willful attempt to evade or defeat a tax. In this case, because the debtor had made fraudulent transfers into trust to evade payment of the taxes, the court concluded that the outstanding tax debt was non-dischargeable, acknowledging that something more than mere non-payment is required for non-dischargeability. Griffith v. United States (In re Griffith), 206 F.3d 1389 (11th Cir. 2000).

- 10.2.bbbb Court awards debtor attorney's fees under section 523(d). Finding a pervasive pattern of creditors bringing dischargeability complaints under section 523(a)(2) alleging fraud based on the debtor's inability to repay credit card charges and advances to obtain unwarranted settlements, the bankruptcy court reiterates its previously announced high burden of proof for such complaints and holds the creditor liable for attorney's fees under section 523(d) on the ground that the creditor should have known not to bring such a complaint solely to obtain settlement leverage. Universal Bank N.A. v. Rocco (In re Rocco), 239 B.R. 297 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1999).
- 10.2.cccc SEC disgorgement claim is non-dischargeable. In an expansive reading of section 523(a)(2)(A), the Eleventh Circuit rules that the amount owing to the SEC in a civil disgorgement action for securities fraud falls within the fraud exception to discharge. The court substitutes the concept of materiality under the securities laws for the concept of reliance under general fraud principles in applying the discharge exception. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Bilzerian (In re Bilzerian), 153 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 1998).
- 10.2.dddd Chapter 11 does not discharge ERISA withdrawal liability for a post-confirmation withdrawal. Reading "contingent" in the definition of "claim" in section 101(4) narrowly, the Sixth Circuit rules that the possibility that a chapter 11 debtor might withdraw from a multi-employer pension plan after confirmation is not enough to render the potential withdrawal liability "contingent" before confirmation so as to make the potential liability a dischargeable claim. CPT Holdings, Inc. v. Industrial and Allied Employees Union Pension Plan, Local 73, 162 F.3d 405 (6th Cir. 1998).
- 10.2.eeee Punitive damages for fraud are not dischargeable. The debtor fraudulently obtained money from the creditor, who obtained treble damages against the debtor under state law. The treble damages as well as the actual compensatory damages were nondischargeable under section 523(a)(2)(A) as a "debt ... for money ... to the extent obtained by ... fraud." Parsing the language of the statute, reviewing prior practice under the Bankruptcy Act, and discerning Congress's policy in excepting debts for fraud from discharge, the Supreme Court concludes that the "debt" for "money to the extent obtained by fraud" is for the full amount of compensatory and punitive damages. Cohen v. De La Cruz, 118 S. Ct. 1212 (1998).
- 10.2.ffff "Willful and malicious injury" means intentional tort. The creditor had a judgment against the doctor/debtor for gross negligence and reckless medical malpractice. The debt was not non-dischargeable as "willful and malicious injury" under section 523(a)(6). The phrase does not cover acts done intentionally that cause injury, only acts done with actual intent to cause injury, that is, intentional torts. Kawaauhau v. Geiger, 118 S. Ct. 974 (1998).
- 10.2.gggg Oral statements transcribed by creditor are not a "written financial statement." The credit card company took the debtor's application and financial information over the phone and input the information into the company's computer. Such information is not a "statement in writing ... respecting the debtor's ... financial condition," as required by the section 523(a)(2)(B) false financial statement exception to discharge. The Tenth Circuit holds forth on the duty of a creditor to be prudent in investigating the risk of extension of credit. Bellco First Federal Credit Union v. Kaspar (In re Kaspar), 125 F.3d 1358 (10th Cir. 1997).
- 10.2.hhhh Medical malpractice is not "willful and malicious injury." A doctor's negligence, even reckless, does not rise to the level of a "willful" injury for purposes of the section 523(a)(6) ground of nondischargeability. Willfulness requires an intentional tort, that is, and intention to commit harm, not merely an intentional act that results in harm. Geiger v. Kawaauhau (In re Geiger), 113 F.3d 848 (8th Cir. 1997), cert. granted.

10.2.iii Medical malpractice is not “willful and malicious injury” or fraud in a fiduciary relation. The doctor misperformed amniocentesis. The doctor-patient relationship does not create a fiduciary relationship for purposes of nondischargeability under section 523(a)(4). “Willful and malicious” for purposes of section 523(a)(6) requires a wrongful act which necessarily produced harm. Thus, neither ground prevents discharge of the malpractice judgment. However, the doctor’s representation of the need for amniocentesis to the mother of the injured creditor could give rise to fraud under section 523(a)(2), even though the debt was not for “money obtained” and the allegedly representation was not made “to the creditor.” Lee-Benner v. Gergely (In re Gergely), 110 F.3d 1448 (9th Cir. 1997).

10.2.jjjj Creditors have only one chance to litigate dischargeability in a converted case. The creditor filed a dischargeability complaint after the deadline in the chapter 11 case, and the complaint was dismissed. The case was converted, and a new deadline was set as part of the notice to creditors of the 341 meeting. The creditor filed another dischargeability complaint in the chapter 7 case. The B.A.P. holds that the first dismissal constituted an adjudication on the merits, barring the creditor from bringing the dischargeability action in the chapter 7 case. The B.A.P. distinguishes the situation in which a creditor does not file a complaint in the chapter 11 case, as there is then no adjudication on the merits preceding the chapter 7 case filing. Marino v. Classic Auto Refinishing, Inc. (In re Marino), 213 B.R. 846 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).

10.3 Exemptions

10.3.a Court may not surcharge exempt property based on debtor’s misconduct. The debtor reported two liens on his homestead, which left less equity than the homestead exemption amount. The second lien was fraudulent. If invalidated, there would be equity for the estate. The trustee discovered the fraud and sued to invalidate the lien. A defendant appeared, but the court found, after lengthy litigation, that the “defendant” was most likely the debtor in sheep’s clothing. The trustee sought to surcharge the debtor’s exemption with the litigation cost. Section 105(a) authorizes the court to issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 105(a) does not authorize the bankruptcy court, through its equitable powers, to override any specific statutory provision. Section 522 authorizes the debtor to exempt property, subject to “meticulous—if not mind-numbingly detailed—enumeration of exemptions and exceptions.” The detail confirms that those are the only permitted exceptions to exemptions. Fashioning additional exceptions under section 105(a) would contravene those specific Code provisions. The bankruptcy court must exercise its equitable powers within the Code’s statutory limits and therefore may not surcharge the debtor’s exemptions based on the debtor’s misconduct. The bankruptcy court has other powers to respond to debtor misconduct, including denial of discharge, sanctions under Rule 9011 and its inherent powers, and the debtor may be subject to criminal prosecution. Law v. Siegel, 571 U.S. ___, 134 S. Ct. 1188 (Mar. 4, 2014).

10.3.b Michigan’s bankruptcy-specific exemption scheme is constitutional. Michigan permits a debtor in a bankruptcy case to elect the federal exemptions under section 522(d), the general state exemptions or more generous, bankruptcy-specific state exemptions. In general, states retain the power to act in bankruptcy-related matters where Congress has declined to act or where it has permitted the states to act. Section 522(b) permits a state to make the federal exemption scheme of section 522(d) unavailable to debtors in that state. It neither permits nor prohibits any other state-based exemption schemes and thus shows that Congress has not restricted the states’ authority to prescribe bankruptcy-specific exemptions. Second, the Uniformity Clause provides a substantive limit on bankruptcy laws. It requires geographic, not personal, uniformity. It does not require uniformity between bankruptcy debtors and non-bankruptcy debtors, only among bankruptcy debtors within the same state. Therefore, a federal bankruptcy law may incorporate applicable state law without violating uniformity. Third, federal law may preempt state law if preemption is explicit, if Congress occupies the field or if it is impossible for a party to comply with both federal and state law simultaneously. Section 522(b) does not explicitly preempt a bankruptcy-specific exemption statute. States' authority to opt out shows that Congress did not occupy the field. And it is not impossible for a debtor to comply with Michigan's three-option exemption scheme. Therefore, there is no preemption. Michigan's bankruptcy-specific exemption scheme is constitutional. Richardson v. Schafer (In re Schafer), 689 F.3d 601 (6th Cir. 2012).

- 10.3.c Michigan bankruptcy-only exemption statute violates the Bankruptcy Clause. Michigan did not opt out of federal exemptions under section 522(d) but enacted separate state exemptions for debtors in bankruptcy. The Constitution's Bankruptcy Clause permits Congress to enact uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. The Constitution imposed the uniformity requirement to prevent disparate state laws and "replace a hodgepodge of bankruptcy relief with one national system". It therefore restricts the states' power to legislate. Uniformity is geographic, not personal. Within a state, bankruptcy and non-bankruptcy debtors and their creditors must receive the same treatment. Therefore, the different treatment for those who file bankruptcy is unconstitutional. Richardson v. Schafer (In re Schafer), 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 564 (6th Cir. B.A.P. Feb. 17, 2011).
- 10.3.d The trustee is entitled to postpetition appreciation in exempt assets. The debtor's equity interest in his encumbered home was less than the applicable homestead exemption. He claimed the interest as exempt. Three years later, the real property had appreciated to a value that exceeded his exemption and the mortgage. The bankruptcy case was still open, so the trustee moved to sell the house to realize the value over the lien and exemption amounts. Section 522(b)(1) permits a debtor to exempt an interest in property, not the property itself, up to the amount of the allowable exemption. Thus, where the total fair market value of the property exceeds the allowable exemption, the excess remains property of the estate, whether the excess existed at the petition date or resulted from postpetition appreciation. The debtor may petition under section 554(b) for abandonment of the asset, but absent abandonment, the asset remains property of the estate that the trustee may sell. Gebhart v. Gaughan (In re Gebhart), 621 F.3d 1206 (9th Cir. 2010).
- 10.3.e Trustee need not object to debtor's valuation of exempt property. The debtor claimed property as exempt. The debtor valued the property at less than the maximum allowed exemption and listed her valuation in the exemption claim. The trustee did not object within the 30-day period permitted under Bankruptcy Rule 4003(b) but later moved to sell the property for more than the debtor's valuation and more than the permitted exemption amount. Section 522(l) provides that "unless a party in interest objects, the property claimed as exempt [on the Schedules] is exempt". Section 522(d) provides that the debtor's exemption is the debtor's interest, not to exceed a specified dollar amount, not an unlimited interest in the property. Where the debtor claims an exemption of a value of property that is less than the limit, the exemption claim is proper, up to that value, so the trustee need not object to the exemption claim to preserve his right to object to the valuation. To preserve her right to claim the full property in kind as exempt and still require the trustee to raise any valuation objection within the 30-day period, the debtor must value the property either as "unknown", as "100% of fair market value" or at a dollar value above the exemption limits. Schwab v. Reilly, 560 U.S. 770, 130 S. Ct. 2652 (2010).
- 10.3.f Bankruptcy Code does not preempt bankruptcy-only state exemption scheme. West Virginia opted out under section 522(b) of the Bankruptcy Code's federal exemption scheme and enacted, in addition to its general exemption scheme for judgment debtors, a bankruptcy-only exemption scheme that is similar but not identical to the Bankruptcy Code's federal exemptions. A federal law preempts a state law if Congress expressly declares an intention to preempt, if Congress “occupies the field” by the breadth of the federal legislation or if the state law actually conflicts with federal law. However, federal law does not preempt where Congress expressly authorizes state law on the subject. Here, section 522(b) expressly authorizes the states to opt out of the federal exemption scheme, which is “an express delegation to the states of the power to create state exemptions in lieu of the federal bankruptcy exemption scheme” without restriction. Sheehan v. Pevich, 574 F.3d 248 (4th Cir. 2009).

- 10.3.g Bankruptcy court may not surcharge exempt property as remedy for noncompliance with turnover order. The bankruptcy court ordered the debtors to turnover nonexempt funds to the estate. The debtors refused. The trustee sought to surcharge the debtors’ exempt retirement funds in the amount of the withheld funds. Section 105(a) authorizes a bankruptcy court to enforce its orders but does not authorize an order that is inconsistent with the Code. The Bankruptcy Code authorizes a debtor to exempt certain assets from property of the estate but contains limited exceptions, in sections 522(c) and (k), that permit otherwise exempt assets to be used to satisfy prepetition claims. A surcharge order is inconsistent with the Code’s exemption scheme, because it would engraft an additional non-statutory exception. Therefore, the court may not surcharge the debtors’ exemption for failure to comply with the turnover order. Scrivner v. Mashburn (In re Scrivner), 535 F.3d 1258 (10th Cir. 2008).
- 10.3.h Applying debtor’s prior domicile state’s exemptions does not violate the Uniformity Clause. Section 522(b)(3) requires a debtor who has moved within 730 days before filing a bankruptcy petition to use the exemption laws of his or her prior state or, if that requirement renders the debtor ineligible for any state’s exemptions, then to use the federal exemptions under section 522(d). Here, the debtor moved from California to Montana within that 730-day period and claimed California exemptions. Section 522(b)(3) does not violate the Uniformity Clause. The Uniformity Clause requires either geographic uniformity (that is, that the statute apply equally to all similarly situated persons throughout the United States) or class uniformity (that is, that the statute apply equally to all members of a defined class, even though its application may vary from state to state due to the incorporation of state law). Here, the statute applies equally to all debtors who move within 730 days before bankruptcy and thus satisfies the uniformity requirement. Drummond v. Urban (In re Urban), 375 B.R. 882 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).
- 10.3.i $125,000 homestead cap does not apply to homestead acquired through regular mortgage payments. The debtors bought their home more than five years before bankruptcy. They continued to make regular monthly mortgage payments, thereby increasing the equity in their home. They claimed the home equity as exempt under Texas’s generous homestead exemption law. A creditor objected to the claim under section 522(p), which limits to $125,000 “any interest that was acquired by the debtor during the 1215-day period” before bankruptcy. The provision does not apply to ordinary increase in equity resulting from mortgage payments, because the increase in equity is not an “interest” that a debtor “acquires.” In re Blair, 334 B.R. 374 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2005).
- 10.3.j Limitation on recently acquired homestead applies only in non-opt-out states. Section 522(p), added by BAPCPA 2005, limits a homestead claim “as a result of electing under subsection (b)(3)(A) to exempt property under State or local law” to $125,000 if the homestead was acquired within 1215 days before the date of the filing of the petition. The court reasons that a debtor claims a homestead “as a result of electing under subsection (b)(3)(A)” only in those states that have not opted out from the federal election scheme under section 522(b)(2), because in opt-out states, the debtor claims a homestead only under state law and does not make an election. In re McNabb, 326 B.R. 785 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2005).
- 10.3.k An IRA is exempt. The debtors had interests in IRAs, which they attempted to exempt under section 522(b)(10)(D), which exempts “a right to receive a payment under a stock bonus, pension, profitsharing, annuity, or similar plan or contract on account of illness, disability, death, age or length of service.” The trustee argued that the debtors could withdraw funds from their IRAs at any time, subject only to a 10% tax penalty, so withdrawals from an IRA are not based on age. The Supreme Court rules that the tax penalty is a substantial restriction on early withdrawal, so that the right to receive payment under the plan is on account of age. An IRA is “similar” to a pension plan for the same reason. It is intended as income replacement after retirement. Therefore, the IRAs are exempt. Rousey v. Jacoway, 125 S. Ct. 1561 (2005).

- 10.3.l Florida homestead withstands attack from creditor asserting sanctions claim under section 303(i); judicial lien may be avoided. The debtor had filed an involuntary petition in bad faith against JRH in Michigan. The Michigan bankruptcy court dismissed the petition and awarded over $4 million in sanctions against the debtor under section 303(i). The debtor promptly bought a homestead in Florida for $2.8 million. The Michigan bankruptcy court found that the Florida property did not qualify as a homestead, because the sanctions order under section 303(i) preempted Florida homestead law, and ordered the debtor to sell the property to satisfy the sanctions award. When the debtor could not obtain a stay pending appeal of the Michigan order, he filed a chapter 11 case in Florida. The Florida bankruptcy court upholds the exemption claim despite the Michigan court’s prior ruling, because the sanctions order is no different from an ordinary money judgment, which would not preempt the homestead law. In re Adell, 321 B.R. 562 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2005). In addition, JRH had obtained a judgment lien against the real property under Florida law. The debtor sought to avoid it under section 522(f)(1). The debtor may avoid the lien, no matter what its source or the nature of the underlying claim, for example, even if the claim were nondischargeable. Therefore, the lien may be avoided under section 522(f)(1). In re Adell, 321 B.R. 573 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2005).
- 10.3.m Debtor may avoid a judicial lien that impairs an exemption that is senior to a consensual lien. The creditor obtained and perfected a judicial lien on the debtor’s homestead, which the debtor refinanced without payoff of the senior judicial lien. After bankruptcy, the debtor could avoid the judicial lien on the ground that it impaired her exemption, even though it was the subsequent grant of a consensual lien that over-encumbered the property and impaired the exemption. The arithmetic formula in section 522(f)(2)(A) dictates the results, despite any policy arguments to the contrary. When applied to this situation, the judicial lien impairs the exemption, because the sum of the liens and the debtor’s exemption exceeds the value of the property. Moldo v. Charnock (In re Charnock), 318 B.R. 720 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004).
- 10.3.n Michigan tenancy by the entirety law “preserved.” The filing of a bankruptcy petition in Michigan does not sever a tenancy by the entireties, and the former practice in Michigan will prevail. In re Spears, 313 B.R. 212 (W.D. Mich. 2004), rev’g 308 B.R. 793 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2004).
- 10.3.o IRA is not exempt. The debtors had rolled over a 401(k) account from their prior employers into IRAs. A pension or similar plan is exempt under section 522(d)(10)(E) only if, among other things, payments under the plan are “on account of illness, disability, death, age, or length of service.” Because an IRA holder can withdraw the funds at any time, albeit with serious adverse tax consequences, an IRA does not qualify as exempt under this provision. Rousey v. Jacoway (In re Rousey), 347 F.3d 689 (8th Cir. 2003).
- 10.3.p Bankruptcy filing terminates tenancy by the entirety. Following a close textual analysis of the Bankruptcy Code and the Michigan law of tenancy by the entireties, the court concludes that the filing of a bankruptcy petition by only one spouse terminates the tenancy by the entirety, because the filing of the petition effects the transfer of the debtor’s interest in the property to the estate, thus severing the tenancy and converting it into a tenancy in common. The court rejects the application of the state law property rule despite Butner v. United States, 440 U.S. 48 (1979), because that case excepted the application of state law where a compelling federal interest required otherwise. The court concludes that the Bankruptcy Code's language evidences just such a compelling federal interest and a Congressional determination to sever the tenancy upon the creation of the estate. As a result, the debtor may not rely on the Trickett procedure (In re Trickett, 14 B.R. 85 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 1981)), which permitted joint creditors to file joint proofs of claims against the estate, which were to be paid from the proceeds of the entireties property, sold under section 363(h), with any surplus returned to the debtor as an exemption. Instead, the debtor may claim an exemption only in the estate's undivided equity (net after secured and joint claims) in the former entireties property, which the trustee may sell under section 363(h), returning to the nondebtor spouse one-half of the proceeds. Joint and separate creditors would both share in the aggregate estate on the same basis. That is, joint creditors would not have a special claim to the former entireties property proceeds. The court notes the result would be different under New York entireties law, because New York treats the unilateral transfer of an entireties interest differently from Michigan. In re Spears, 308 B.R. 793 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2004).

- 10.3.q Court permits surcharge of exemptions as remedy for asset concealment. Days before bankruptcy, the debtors sold a car and a boat for $8,500. They did not report the sales, reported and exempted only $1,500 of the cash proceeds on their schedules, and did not explain the loss of the remaining proceeds. When the trustee found out, he successfully sought to deny the debtors' discharge. The trustee subsequently sought to surcharge the debtors' exemptions by $7,000. The surcharge was not barred by res judicata, because the issues on an objection to discharge are different from those on an exemption surcharge motion and, because of the Rule 4004(a) deadline for objecting to discharge, must be brought much earlier than an exemption surcharge motion. Despite the absence of statutory authorization, the exemption surcharge was within the bankruptcy court's equitable powers when reasonably necessary to protect the integrity of the bankruptcy process and prevent excess exemption claims, because it allowed the bankruptcy court to prevent the debtors from effectively gaining additional exemptions (the ones claimed plus the hidden funds) by concealing their assets. Latman v. Burdette, 366 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 10.3.r Conversion of non-exempt assets to exempt assets before bankruptcy is not per se fraudulent. On the eve of bankruptcy, the debtor transferred non-exempt IRA funds into an exempt pension plan. The trustee attacked the transfer as a fraudulent transfer. The Ninth Circuit, reaffirming its 1971 Bankruptcy Act ruling in Wudrick v. Clements, 451 F.2d 988 (9th Cir. 1971), holds that deliberate conversion of non-exempt assets to exempt assets just before bankruptcy will not, by itself, support a finding of fraud or support avoidance as a fraudulent transfer. Gill v. Stern (In re Stern), 317 F.3d 1111 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 10.3.s Entireties property is exempt in a consolidated joint case. The husband and wife debtors filed a joint case. They owned their home in tenancy by the entirety. They each had separate unsecured creditors and no joint creditors other than the mortgage lender. The bankruptcy court ordered substantive consolidation of their cases. Nevertheless, because the entireties property was exempt from process under applicable non-bankruptcy [Virginia] law, even the substantive consolidation of the estates, which is strictly a bankruptcy remedy, did not defeat the debtors' exemption claim. Bunker v. Peyton (In re Bunker), 312 F.3d 146 (4th Cir. 2002).
- 10.3.t Debtor may avoid judicial lien on former homestead. The creditor obtained a judicial lien on the debtor's residence, which the debtor claimed as exempt in its subsequent chapter 7 case. After the trustee sold the residence, the debtor sought to avoid the fixing of the judicial lien so that it could receive the benefit of the proceeds of sale and the debtor's exemption. The Ninth Circuit rules that because the debtor avoids "the fixing" of the lien rather than the lien itself, neither the debtor nor the estate need own the property at the time the debtor brings the action to avoid the fixing of the lien. It is sufficient if the estate owns the property at the time of the filing of the petition or at the time of the commencement of the action. Culver, LLC. v. Chiu (In re Chiu), 304 F.3d 905 (9th Cir. 2002).

10.3.u State law increase in exemptions may be constitutionally applied to existing debt. Colorado increased the dollar amount of its exemptions after the creditor extended credit. The debtors sought to avoid a lien on their exempt property under section 522(f). After first ruling that the debtors were entitled to exemptions in effect on the date of the filing of the petition (rather than on the date the loan was made), the court upholds against constitutional challenge the application of the increased exemptions in the case. In re Larson, 260 B.R. 174 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2001).

10.3.v Chapter 13 debtor may exercise avoiding powers to recover exemption. In a case of apparent first impression at the Court of Appeals level, the Fifth Circuit holds that a chapter 13 debtor may exercise the trustee's avoiding powers under section 522(h) when the requirements of that section are met, even though a chapter 13 debtor may not normally exercise the avoiding powers of a trustee. Realty Portfolio, Inc. v. Hamilton (In re Hamilton), 125 F.3d 292 (5th Cir. 1997).

10.4 Reaffirmation and Redemption

10.4.a Debtor may use liquidation value to redeem collateral. In Associates Commercial Corp. v. Rash, 520 U.S. 953 (1997), the Supreme Court required use of "replacement value" to value collateral for purposes of a cram down under section 1325(a)(5)(B), basing its decision on the second sentence of section 506(a) that value must be "determined in light of the purpose of the valuation and of the proposed disposition or use of such property." It reasoned that the chapter 13 debtor was keeping the car—a replacement-type use—and that the creditor was subject to a double risk, that of collateral deterioration and of debtor nonperformance under the plan, justifying the higher replacement value. In redemption, however, the creditor does not have either risk, as redemption requires a lump sum payment and terminates any continuing creditor interest in the asset. Redemption effectively works as a foreclosure, with the creditor receiving the auction value of the collateral without attendant processing and storage costs. Therefore, liquidation value is the appropriate measure of value. Weber v. Wells Fargo Auto Fin., Inc. (In re Weber), 332 B.R. 432 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2005).

10.4.b Third Circuit permits "ride through." Breaking the tie in the circuit split on this issue (Second, Fourth, Ninth and Tenth vs. First, Fifth, Seventh and Eleventh), the Third Circuit sides with the former group in holding that section 521(2)(A) does not limit a consumer debtor to the three options of exemption, reaffirmation, or surrender but permits a debtor to maintain payments on a secured installment contract and retain the collateral. The court concludes that section 521(2)(C), which provides that section 521(2) is not intended to affect substantive rights, requires that section 521(2)(A) not be read so as to preclude options that the debtor had available before its enactment in 1984. Price v. Delaware State Police FCU (In re Price), 370 F.3d 362 (3d Cir. 2004).

10.4.c Creditor may "link" reaffirmation of secured and unsecured claims. The debtor owed a credit union on his home mortgage and on two unsecured claims. The credit union agreed to reaffirmation of the mortgage only if the debtor also reaffirmed the unsecured claims. The bankruptcy court found the credit union's conduct inherently coercive and in violation of the automatic stay and imposed sanctions as well as an order effectively requiring the credit union to accept reaffirmation of the mortgage claim alone. The B.A.P. affirmed. The First Circuit reverses. It rejects a per se rule that linkage of reaffirmation of a secured and unsecured claim is inherently impermissible. It also concludes that the credit union's conduct was not impermissibly coercive, because it did not violate the automatic stay to require the debtor to choose an all or nothing approach. Jamo v. Katahdin F.C.U., 283 F.3d 382 (1st Cir. 2002).

- 10.4.d "Tying" of reaffirmation agreements violates the stay. The credit union held the debtor's mortgage as well as several unsecured loans. As a condition to permitting reaffirmation of the mortgage, the credit union demanded reaffirmation of the unsecured loans as well and threatened to foreclose on the mortgage if the debtor did not reaffirm all loans. The First Circuit B.A.P. holds that this conduct violates the automatic stay. Although it is permissible to solicit a reaffirmation agreement, and the creditor is under no obligation to agree to reaffirmation, it is impermissible to tie reaffirmation of the two loans together. Katahdin Federal Credit Union v. Jamo (In re Jamo), 262 B.R. 159 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2001).
- 10.4.e Ninth Circuit approves "ride through" of secured debt. Joining the Second, Fourth, and Tenth Circuits and parting company with the Fifth, Seventh, and Eleventh Circuits, the Ninth Circuit interprets section 521(2) of the Bankruptcy Code as procedural and non-exclusive, thus preventing a secured creditor from foreclosing on collateral where the debtor keeps all payment current and the only default is the filing of the bankruptcy. On that basis, the court affirms the bankruptcy court's refusal to approve the debtor's reaffirmation agreement. McClellan Federal Credit Union v. Parker (In re Parker), 139 F.3d 668 (9th Cir. 1998).
- 10.4.f Disclosure required for reaffirmation agreements. In yet another installment of Sears' ongoing problems with reaffirmation agreements, Judge Bernstein in the Eastern District of New York reopens a case, strikes counsel's verification of a reaffirmation agreement as inadequate and inaccurate, voids the reaffirmation agreement and orders detailed disclosure (akin to Regulation Z) for all future reaffirmation agreements. In re Bruzzese, 214 B.R. 444 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1997).
- 10.4.g Second Circuit approves "ride through." The Second Circuit affirmed the bankruptcy judge's decision denying relief from the stay to a creditor where the debtor has agreed to continue making payments on his car loan. Capital Communications Federal Credit Union v. Boodrow (In re Boodrow), 126 F.3d 43 (2d Cir. 1997).

11. JURISDICTION AND POWERS OF THE COURT

11.1 Jurisdiction

- 11.1.a The "close nexus" test for post-confirmation related-to jurisdiction does not apply to core proceedings. The plan discharged all claims that arose before the effective date. Shortly before the effective date, the plan sponsor and the not-yet-existing successor to the debtor agreed to pay the sponsor's financial advisor a contingent fee based on future financings. After the effective date, the financings occurred, but the debtor and sponsor did not pay the fee. The advisor sued, and the reorganized debtor asked the bankruptcy court to enjoin the action as violating the discharge order. The bankruptcy court's jurisdiction extends to proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in a title 11 case (core proceedings) or related to a title 11 case. After confirmation, jurisdiction narrows, so that related to jurisdiction continues only if the proceeding has a close nexus to the underlying bankruptcy case. However, the close nexus test does not apply to a core proceeding. The bankruptcy court's core proceeding jurisdiction continues after confirmation unabated. Interpreting and enforcing a discharge order is a core proceeding, because it is based on rights under title 11. Moreover, the bankruptcy court always has jurisdiction to interpret and enforce its orders. Therefore, the court has jurisdiction to enjoin the litigation. Mesabi Metallics Co., LLC v. B. Riley FBR, Inc. (In re Essar Steel Minn., LLC), 47 F.4th 193 (3d Cir. 2022).
- 11.1.b Arbitration agreement does not apply to avoidance actions. The debtor contracted with a professional adviser for prebankruptcy workout services. They were unsuccessful, at least in part because of the adviser, and the debtor filed a chapter 7 case. The agreement contained a broad arbitration agreement. The trustee brought an action against the adviser asserting state law claims for breach of fiduciary duty aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty, negligence/professional malpractice, fraud, civil conspiracy, unjust enrichment, and breach of contract and Bankruptcy Code claims to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers and preferences under sections 547 and 548(a)(1) and for recovery of all transfers under § 550. The Federal Arbitration Act favors enforcement of arbitration agreements. The trustee's state law claims that arise under the agreement between the debtor and the adviser are governed by the agreement, including the arbitration provision. However, the trustee's avoiding power claims are brought on creditors' behalf under claims created by the Bankruptcy Code, independent of any contract. As such, the agreement's arbitration provision does not bind the trustee, and he may bring the claims in the bankruptcy court. Fort v. Kibbey (In re Oaktree Med. Centre, P.C.), 640 B.R. 649 (Bankr. S. Car. 2022).

11.1.c Bankruptcy court has constitutional authority to order attorneys' fee disgorgement.

Debtor's counsel did not disclose fees received from the debtor's principal and was evasive and contradictory when the bankruptcy court asked him about it. The bankruptcy court denied his fee application and ordered disgorgement of fees already paid. The bankruptcy court has constitutional and statutory authority to issue final orders in title 11 proceedings in matters that arise in the title 11 case. Payment of legal fees is strictly governed by Bankruptcy Code provisions, not on common law or other nonbankruptcy law sources, even though some of the fees were paid by the nondebtor principal. Therefore, the bankruptcy court acted within its authority in ordering disgorgement. In re Greenville Ave LLC, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 10468 (3d Cir. Apr. 19, 2022).

11.1.d Bankruptcy Code does not preempt tortious interference claim against nondebtor who caused the debtor to violate its contract in a way that affects the bankruptcy.

The single asset real estate debtor took out a mortgage loan, which prohibited other borrowings and certain other corporate actions that would make the Bankruptcy Code's single asset real estate provisions inapplicable. When the debtor encountered financial difficulty, its principals caused it to borrow more money and violate the other loan covenants so that it would not qualify for SARE treatment under the Code. When the state court lifted a temporary stay of foreclosure on the mortgage, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case and ultimately proceeded to confirm a plan under which the lender acquired the property through a credit bid. The lender initially moved to dismiss the case as filed in bad faith, but when the bankruptcy court ruled the motion premature, it withdrew the motion. It later sued the principals for tortious interference with the contract between the lender and the borrower, claiming damages from the breaches resulting in a longer, more expensive, and lower value result in the bankruptcy case. Federal law may preempt otherwise applicable state law either expressly or by implication. Implied preemption results when federal law occupies the field or when the state law stands as an obstacle to the implementation of the federal law. Because the state action here was between only nondebtors and the Code does not suggest a Congressional intent to interfere with state court authority to provide traditional tort remedies among nondebtors, field preemption does not apply. Because the action between the nondebtors addressed only actions before the bankruptcy, which did not interfere with the bankruptcy or assert any bankruptcy-related claims such as a bad faith or abusive filing, the maintenance of the action does not stand as an obstacle to the conduct of the bankruptcy case, and obstacle preemption does not apply. Sutton 58 Assoc LLC v. Pilevsky, ___ N.Y. ___ (Nov. 24, 2020).

11.1.e Bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction to determine what constitutes property of the estate.

Long after a bankruptcy case concluded, some creditors sued the debtor and others in state court, alleging that the debtor had hidden assets from the bankruptcy trustee and had transferred his assets to the other defendants. Under section 554, property of the estate remains property of the estate unless abandoned or otherwise administered. Undisclosed property is not automatically abandoned under section 554. Under sections 544, 548, and 550, the trustee may avoid and recover fraudulently transferred property. Whether the creditors had standing to bring the state court action depended on whether the property they sought to recover was property of the estate. Section 1334(e)(1) of title 28 gives the district court (and, by reference, the bankruptcy court) exclusive jurisdiction over all property of the debtor as of the commencement of the case and of the estate. Therefore, the bankruptcy court had exclusive jurisdiction to determine whether the undisclosed assets and the fraudulent transfer claims the creditors asserted were property of the estate and could not leave to the state court the determination of the creditors' standing. Hafen v. Adams (In re Hafen), 616 B.R. 570 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2020).

11.1.f Court has related to, but not arising in, jurisdiction to enjoin actions against nondebtor.

The debtor pharmaceutical manufacturer was accused by numerous individuals and governmental units of causing the opioid epidemic in the United States and was a defendant in over 2500 actions around the country, for which attorneys' fees were running about $100 million per year. The debtor's owner and former CEO was named as a defendant in most of those actions. The debtor had negotiated a tentative but somewhat incomplete deal, which included a material contribution from the former CEO, with a steering committee of plaintiffs and was continuing to work toward a final agreement. The debtor filed a chapter 11 petition to focus the negotiations and develop a chapter 11 plan based on the tentative agreement. It sought an injunction against continued prosecution of the actions against the former CEO, who had not filed a bankruptcy case. Section 105(a) allows a bankruptcy court to enjoin actions against nondebtors where the injunction would play an important part in the reorganization or the action to be enjoined would have an immediate adverse economic consequence for the estate. A bankruptcy court has "related to" jurisdiction over any proceeding whose outcome could conceivably affect the estate, including altering rights, liabilities, options, or freedom of action or affecting the administration of the estate. The proceeding need not involve claims that are derivative of the debtor's rights or liabilities, as long as there is a strong interconnection between the third-party action and the bankruptcy case. Thus, the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over any action against a debtor and an accused co-tortfeasor. The actions against the former CEO is subject to "related to" jurisdiction because a finding of liability is likely to affect the debtor's defenses and because the former CEO likely had indemnification and contribution claims against the debtor for any liability, which would be allowable in the bankruptcy case. However, the bankruptcy court does not have "arising in" jurisdiction, which cannot be based on a "boot-strap" argument arising from the court's exercise of its discretion under section 105(a). Here, the actions met the standard for an injunction: there was a reasonable likelihood of a successful reorganization, the actions would cause imminent irreparable harm to the estate, the balance of harms favor the debtor and its reorganization, and the public interest supports the injunction. Accordingly, the court enjoins the litigation. Dunaway v. Purdue Pharmaceuticals L.P. (In re Purdue Pharmaceuticals L.P.), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 U.S. Dis. LEXIS 143799 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 11, 2020).

11.1.g A nunc pro tunc order is limited to reflecting a prior event, not making an order retroactive. A defendant in an action removed a case from the state trial court to the district court because of the chapter 11 filing of another defendant. The bankruptcy court dismissed the defendant's chapter 11 case, but the district court did not remand the case to the state court until several months later. When it did, its order stated it "shall be effective as of" the day the bankruptcy court dismissed the chapter 11 case. In between the dismissal and the remand, the state trial court issued orders against several of the defendants, which the defendants appealed. Upon removal, the state court completely loses jurisdiction, which is not restored until the case is remanded. A court may not make an order retroactive, that is, making the remand effective before the court ordered it. A court may issue a nunc pro tunc order to reflect what happened earlier, but not to reflect something as happening earlier. Therefore, the state court did not have jurisdiction to issue the challenged orders, and they are vacated. Roman Catholic Archdiocese of San Juan v. Acevedo Feliciano, 589 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 696 (2020).

- 11.1.h Only the home court may enforce the discharge injunction. The debtor obtained a discharge in Texas. A private student loan lender pursued him after his discharge, so he brought an action in the Texas bankruptcy court to declare the loan discharged and to enforce the discharge injunction. Another debtor who had received his discharge in Virginia joined the action and sought class certification. Generally, only the court issuing an injunction may enforce compliance, because the contempt power protects the dignity and authority of the issuing court. Although the discharge order does not contain an injunction, which is statutory, the same rule applies. Accordingly, only the bankruptcy court that issued the discharge may enforce the discharge injunction. Class certification to include debtors from other districts is improper. Crocker v. Navient Solutions, L.L.C., 941 F.3d 206 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 11.1.i A counterclaim that addresses allowability of the claim is a constitutionally core proceeding that is not subject to arbitration. The loan agreement between the debtor and her lender had an arbitration clause. After the debtor filed her chapter 13 petition, the creditor filed a proof of claim asserting amounts owing under the loan. The debtor filed an adversary proceeding objecting to the claim and asserting counterclaims on behalf of herself and all other similarly situated debtors, claiming her loan violated state usury laws and seeking affirmative recovery. The Federal Arbitration Act requires a federal court to enforce an arbitration agreement unless Congress has shown an intention to preclude waiver of judicial remedies. Congress shows such an intention if compelling arbitration would inherently undermine a statute's animating purpose. One of the Bankruptcy Code's animating purposes is to facilitate the efficient reorganization of an estate through the centralization of disputes concerning a debtor's legal obligations. Thus, if a proceeding is constitutionally core, arbitration would inherently conflict with the Code's purposes. An objection to claim is constitutionally core, and a proceeding to recover money that shares common questions of fact and law with the claim and seeks to reduce or recoup the amount claimed is also constitutionally core. Because the counterclaims here challenged the legality of the underlying loan and therefore directly sought to reduce the allowable amount of the claim, the proceeding was constitutionally core. Arbitration would inherently conflict with an animating purpose of the Code, so the bankruptcy court properly denied arbitration. Allied Title Lending, LLC v. Taylor, ___ B.R. ___, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 183729 (E.D. Va. Oct. 22, 2019).
- 11.1.j Jurisdiction attaches at the time of filing. The debtor in possession sued a creditor, who did not have a presence in the state where the action was pending, in the district court, fixing related-to jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b) and serving process under Bankruptcy Rule 7002, which permits nationwide service of process. The debtor in possession then sold the claim; as a result, the claim was no longer related to the bankruptcy case. Federal subject matter jurisdiction is determined at the time the action is filed. Because the district court had related-to jurisdiction at filing, the later transfer of the claim did not divest it of jurisdiction. Similarly, service of process is governed by the rule applicable when the plaintiff effects service. Although Civil Rule 4 permits service only on a defendant that could be served in the state under state law, service under Rule 7004 was proper and binding, despite the claim transfer. Double Eagle Energy Servs., L.L.C. v. MarkWest Utica EMB, L.L.C., 936 F.3d 260 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 11.1.k Court refuses to enforce arbitration clause in an action to avoid transfers and object to a claim. The creditor filed a proof of claim for amounts owing under an agreement that contained an enforceable arbitration clause. The reorganized debtor filed a 35-count adversary proceeding objecting to the proof of claim and asserting avoiding power and other claims for affirmative recovery and as offsets to the proof of claim. Under the Federal Arbitration Act, an arbitration clause is enforceable in a bankruptcy case except to the extent the underlying nature of the proceeding derives from the Code and enforcement would conflict with the Code's purposes, such as the equitable and expeditious administration of the case, centralized resolution of pure bankruptcy issues, protection against piecemeal litigation, and a bankruptcy court's power to enforce its own orders. Because the adversary proceeding primarily seeks avoidance of voidable transfers and disallowance of a proof of claim, enforcing the arbitration clause would conflict with the Code's purpose of equitable and expeditious distribution of assets. Therefore, the court declines to enforce the arbitration clause. Phelan v. Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Acis Cap. Mgmt., L.P.), 600 B.R. 541 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2019).

- 11.1.l Bankruptcy court may issue final judgment in fraudulent transfer action. The chapter 11 plan created a liquidating trust, which sued a non-claimant in the bankruptcy court to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer. Section 157(b)(2) of title 28 includes a list of "core" proceedings, including an action to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer. In Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, 492 U.S. 33 (1989), the Supreme Court applied the Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial to a fraudulent transfer action pending before a bankruptcy judge. Although the Court discussed Article III and the judicial power and found the two issues similar and based on similar antecedents, it decided the "sole issue" of the jury trial right and left "for future decision" whether Article III allows a jury trial to be held before a non-Article III bankruptcy judge. In Stern v. Marshall, 564 U.S. 462 (2011), the Court issued a narrow ruling that "Congress, in one isolated respect, exceeded" its Article III power. The "isolated respect" in Stern was not a fraudulent transfer action, and in a later case, Exec. Benefits Ins. Agency v. Arkison, 573 U.S. 25 (2014), the Court "assume[d], without deciding, that the fraudulent conveyance claims in this case are Stern claims." Because the statute designates a fraudulent transfer action as a core proceeding in which a bankruptcy judge may issue a final judgment and the Supreme Court has not directly held otherwise, the bankruptcy court may issue a final judgment. Paragon Litigation Trust v. Noble Corp. PLC (In re Paragon Offshore PLC), 598 B.R. 761 (Bankr. D. Del. 2019).
- 11.1.m Bankruptcy court may not enjoin insurers' claims against settling insurer. The debtor owned several insurance policies that funded asbestos claims against the debtor. The debtor's insurers had equitable contribution claims against each other and had entered into a cost sharing agreement that apportioned defense and indemnity costs. In its chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession proposed to sell one of the policies to the issuing insurer, free and clear of all claims of other insurers, so that the issuing insurer would no longer be liable to the other insurers for any claims arising from injured parties' claims against the debtor, and to enjoin the other insurers from pursuing any such claims. Section 105(a) grants the bankruptcy court the power to issue orders necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. In In re American Hardwoods, Inc., 885 F.2d 621 (9th Cir., 1989), and In re Lowenschuss, 67 F.3d 1394 (9th Cir. 1995), the Ninth Circuit held section 524(e) deprives bankruptcy courts of the power to release third party claims, that is, claims against others. That rule applies even in the context of a proposed sale under section 363(f) free and clear of interests. Therefore, the court may not enjoin the other insurers' claims against the settling insurer as part of the sale. In re Fraser's Boiler Serv., Inc. ___ B.R. ___, .2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37840 (W.D. Wash. March 8, 2019).
- 11.1.n Plan's exclusive jurisdiction provision does not trump contract's arbitration clause. The debtor's prepetition contract provided for arbitration of all disputes arising out of or related to the contract or to any transactions contemplated under the contract. The chapter 11 plan rejected the contract, preserved all claims against the counterparty, vested the claims in a liquidating trust, granted the bankruptcy court exclusive jurisdiction over litigation of the claims "to the fullest extent permitted by law," and preserved all the counterparty's rights and defenses. The Federal Arbitration Act validates arbitration agreements and requires the federal courts to enforce them. Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 8(c)(1) (made applicable by Bankruptcy Rule 7008) provides a right to arbitrate is an affirmative defense. The plan's exclusive jurisdiction provision does not supersede the arbitration provision, because the "extent permitted by law" limitation and the preservation of the counterparty's rights and defenses protect the counterparty's right to arbitrate, which is an affirmative defense. Therefore, the court orders arbitration of the claim. Paragon Litigation Trust v. Noble Corp PLC (In re Paragon Offshore PLC), 588 B.R. 735 (Bankr. D. Del. 2018).

- 11.1.o Bankruptcy court may not, under 28 U.S.C. § 1631, transfer an action over which it does not have jurisdiction. After confirmation, the liquidating trustee filed an action against a third party. The defendant moved to dismiss for want of post-confirmation jurisdiction. The bankruptcy court granted the motion. The trustee moved to transfer the case under 28 U.S.C. § 1631 to a district court in which the action could have been brought. Section 1631 requires “a court as defined in section 610 of this title [that does not have] jurisdiction ... if it is in the interest of justice, [to] transfer such action ... to any other such court in which the action ... could have been brought.” Section 610 defines “court” to include the district courts but not the bankruptcy courts. The bankruptcy court is a unit of the district court, which hears matters the district court refers to it. The reference order covers only matters over which the bankruptcy courts have jurisdiction. Because the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction, the action was not referred, and the bankruptcy court lacked any authority to act on the litigation. Therefore, it could not transfer the action to another court. Troisio v. Erickson (In re IMMC Corp.), 909 F.3d 859 (3d Cir. 2018).
- 11.1.p Withdrawal of proof of claim does not defeat bankruptcy court’s equitable jurisdiction. The creditor filed a proof of claim. The trustee sued the creditor to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer. The creditor withdrew its claim and moved for withdrawal of the reference on the ground that the bankruptcy court did not have authority to issue a final judgment on an avoiding power claim. Section 502(d) mandates disallowance of a claim of a creditor that has received and not returned an avoidable transfer and has not returned it to the estate. The bankruptcy court may determine the allowability of a claim, including a section 502(d) objection, under its equitable jurisdiction, which precludes a creditor’s right to a jury trial on the avoiding power claim, because the allowability determination necessarily determines avoidability. A court’s jurisdiction and authority is determined when the action is commenced. Because the creditor’s claim was on file when the trustee brought the avoiding power action, the court then had authority to determine the allowability of the claim, including whether the creditor had received an avoidable transfer. The creditor’s withdrawal of its claim did not change that authority or divest the bankruptcy court of its equitable authority to rule on the avoidability complaint. Picard v. BAM L.P. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 127 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Jan. 18, 2019).
- 11.1.q Neither the bankruptcy court’s exclusive jurisdiction over property nor section 904 preclude stay relief. An operating municipal debtor’s bondholders sought stay relief to move for a receiver in state court. Section 904 prohibits the court “by any stay, order, or decree, in the case or otherwise,” from interfering with the debtor’s political or governmental powers or any property or revenues. Its purpose is to limit only the federal court’s powers, as a means of respecting state sovereignty. The prohibition is limited to the bankruptcy court itself. It does not preclude the court from granting stay relief to permit another court with jurisdiction under local law to interfere. Any other reading would effectively nullify section 362(d), which authorizes stay relief. Similarly, the bankruptcy court’s exclusive jurisdiction over property of the debtor and of the estate under 28 U.S.C. § 1334(e) permits the bankruptcy court to control which court addresses and manages activities necessary for reorganizing the debtor and protecting the property rights of secured creditors. It does not preclude stay relief. Ad Hoc Group of PREPA Bondholders v. The Financial Oversight & Mgmt. Bd. For Puerto Rico (In re The Financial Oversight & Mgmt. Bd. For Puerto Rico), 899 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2018).
- 11.1.r A bankruptcy court may issue a consent directive. The debtor in an involuntary case hid assets before bankruptcy. He was under indictment, living in France, and had successfully opposed an extradition request. The trustee sought an order requiring the debtor to sign a “consent directive,” which is a letter addressed to banks generally, asking the bank to report to the trustee on any accounts that debtor might have at that bank. It allows the trustee to find assets around the world despite bank secrecy laws, because it purportedly comes from the debtor and thereby waives secrecy. The Supreme Court has ruled that a consent directive is not testimonial and therefore does not violate the Fifth Amendment. A trustee has a duty under section 704(a)(1) to collect property of the estate and under section 704(a)(4) to investigate the debtor's financial affairs. The debtor has a duty under section 521(a)(4) to surrender to the trustee all property of the estate and all related books and records and under section 521(a)(3) to cooperate with the trustee to enable the trustee to perform the trustee's duties. The trustee may seek discovery under Rule 2004, Section 105(a) authorizes the court to issue orders to carry out Code provisions. Based on all these provisions, a bankruptcy court has authority to issue a consent directive. Rigby v. Mastro (In re Mastro), 585 B.R. 587 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2018).

- 11.1.s Bankruptcy judge has constitutional authority to sanction counsel for contempt for disobeying orders in the bankruptcy case. The bankruptcy judge ordered counsel under section 542(e) to provide information regarding his representation of numerous chapter 13 debtors to determine whether disgorgement under section 329 was required. Counsel made no sincere effort to comply. After notice and a hearing, the court sanctioned counsel for contempt, prohibiting him from filing any chapter 13 cases in the district for six months and requiring him to take 12 hours of ethics education. Under Article III, without the defendant's consent, a bankruptcy court may not issue a final judgment against a defendant on a state-law claim or cause of action that is not resolved in ruling on the defendant's proof of claim. Because the bankruptcy judge's orders were issued under Bankruptcy Code provisions and related to actions in bankruptcy cases, the sanctions order was not based on a state law claim or cause of action but arose in the bankruptcy case. A bankruptcy judge has constitutional authority to issue such an order. Critique Servs., LLC v. Reed (In re Reed), 888 F.3d 930 (8th Cir. 2018).
- 11.1.t Bankruptcy court may not release maritime lien on ship that is subject to admiralty court's in rem jurisdiction. An injured seaman sued his employer in personam and its ship in rem in admiralty in the district court. An injured seaman's claim for "maintenance and cure" after an injury operates as a maritime lien on the ship. After the district court acquired in rem jurisdiction over the ship, the employer filed a chapter 7 petition. The district court stayed proceedings because of the bankruptcy automatic stay, but the bankruptcy court granted stay relief to permit the liquidation of the claim. The bankruptcy court then approved a sale of the ship free and clear of the seaman's maritime lien, and the trustee then claimed that the seaman's claims became moot. Section 362(a)(4) stays "any act to create, perfect, or enforce any lien against property of the estate." However, under an 1898 Supreme Court decision, a seaman's maritime lien is a "sacred lien," and in general, maritime liens differ from liens on land-based assets. Because Congress did not overrule this principle by expressly including maritime liens in section 362(a)(4), the stay does not apply to maritime liens. The court that first obtains in rem jurisdiction over an asset prevents another court from obtaining jurisdiction over the asset. Once the district court acquired in rem jurisdiction over the ship, the bankruptcy court did not have in rem jurisdiction to adjudicate the seaman's maritime lien. Even if it did, a maritime lien stays with the ship until extinguished through the application of admiralty law, and a bankruptcy court may release such a lien only under admiralty law, not under the bankruptcy power. Because the seaman did not submit to admiralty jurisdiction in the bankruptcy court, the court's free and clear sale order did not release the lien. Barnes v. Sea Haw. Rafting, LLC, 886 F.3d 758 (9th Cir. 2018).
- 11.1.u The bankruptcy court has no power to transfer an action over which it does not have jurisdiction. The liquidating trustee filed an action for breach of fiduciary duty against the debtor's former directors. The bankruptcy court concluded it did not have jurisdiction. The trustee moved for transfer to the district court for a different district which, the trustee claimed, had jurisdiction. Section 1631 of title 28 permits "a court as defined in section 610" of title 28 to transfer an action over which it lacks jurisdiction "to any other such court in which the action ... could have been brought at the time it was filed or noticed." Section 610 provides: "As used in this chapter the word 'courts' includes the courts of appeals and district courts of the United States, the United States District Court for the District of the Canal Zone ... Guam [and] the Virgin Islands, the United States Court of Federal Claims, and the Court of International Trade."

Bankruptcy courts are constituted under a different chapter of title 28 than the other listed courts. Their authority is more circumscribed than the district courts'. Their position as units of the district court do not bring them within section 1631, because Congress created them as separate courts for these purposes. By reference to section 610, Congress was specific in what courts were included within the power to transfer. Bankruptcy courts were not included. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have authority to transfer the case. IMMC Corp. v. Erickson (In re IMMC Corp.), U.S. Dist. LEXIS 203 (D. Del. Jan. 2, 2018).

- 11.1.v The Rooker-Feldman doctrine does not prevent a fraudulent transfer action arising from a state court judgment. The debtor paid the state a substantial sum for a gaming license. When the debtor failed to comply with some of the license's terms, the state instituted proceedings before the gaming commission to revoke the license. The state's appellate courts affirmed the commission's decision to revoke the license, and the debtor lost the license. It then filed a chapter 11 petition and, as debtor in possession, sued the state to avoid the loss of the license without compensation as a fraudulent transfer. The Rooker-Feldman doctrine deprives federal courts of actions that are essentially appeals of state court judgments. It applies when the federal plaintiff lost in state court before the federal suit was filed, complains of injuries from the state court judgment, and invites the federal court to review and reject the state court judgment. A fraudulent transfer action, which seeks recovery for a transfer without reasonably equivalent value, does not challenge the underlying validity of the state court judgment but only its effect on the bankruptcy estate. Therefore, it does not meet the last requirement for the doctrine's application, and the action may proceed. Phila. Entertainment & Dev. P'ners, LP v. Comm. Of Pa. (In re Phila. Entertainment & Dev. P'ners, LP), 879 F.3d 492 (3d Cir. 2018).
- 11.1.w Article III does not prevent a bankruptcy judge from confirming plan with a third-party release of related to claims. As part of a global settlement, the debtor's plan provided for a substantial contribution by its shareholders and a non-consensual third-party release of all claims that creditors might have against them. As a non-Article III judge, a bankruptcy judge does not have constitutional authority to issue orders resolving claims arising under the bankruptcy court's related to jurisdiction but does have authority to issue orders resolving core proceedings, including plan confirmation proceedings. The latter category includes an order in a core proceeding that is based on bankruptcy law, even one that has a direct and substantial effect on a related proceeding, such as a confirmation order that releases claims over which the bankruptcy court has only related to jurisdiction or no jurisdiction at all. Here, the third party release arose in the context of the bankruptcy court's confirmation of the plan, and the court's determination of whether to approve the release was based solely on the applicable standards for approving a settlement and release under a plan, not on the substantive merits of the released claim. As such, the judge had the constitutional authority to confirm the plan and release the third party claims. In re Millennium Lab Holdings II, LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2017 Bankr. LEXIS 3419 (Bankr. D. Del. Oct. 3, 2017).
- 11.1.x Bankruptcy court may enjoin creditors from pursuing state court claims. Creditors obtained judgments against two entities that had fraudulently transferred their assets to newly-formed entities, which continued to operate the same business. Upon attempting to enforce the judgments, the creditors learned of the transfers and filed a successful involuntary bankruptcy petition against one of the transferee companies. In the case, the creditors and the trustee pursued fraudulent transfer claims against the other transferee and numerous other individuals and entities involved in the fraudulent transfers. The bankruptcy court dismissed all claims against one individual. Later, the remaining parties settled all claims. The bankruptcy court approved the settlement only on the condition that the creditors' claims against the dismissed individual in any other court be enjoined. The bankruptcy court has power to issue an injunction against any action over which it would have subject matter jurisdiction. Its jurisdiction includes any proceeding "related to" the case. A proceeding is related to a case if the proceeding could conceivably have any effect on the estate, its assets, its liabilities, or its administration. The claims against the dismissed individual, including those not resolved by the dismissal, could affect the estate's recovery on its fraudulent transfer claims arising out of the fraudulent transfer transaction, so the bankruptcy court has authority to enjoin the claims. The All Writs Act authorizes federal courts to "issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of their respective jurisdictions." The Anti-Injunction Act prohibits enjoining proceedings in state court except as expressly authorized by Congress, where necessary in aid of the court's jurisdiction, or to protect or effectuate its judgment. To the extent of the dismissed claims, the injunction here protected the bankruptcy court's judgment dismissing those claims. The injunction against pursuing the other claims were necessary in aid of the court's related to subject matter jurisdiction over the other claims. Therefore, the bankruptcy court may properly enjoin the creditors from pursuing the claims. Estate of Jackson v. Schron (In re Fundamental Long Term Care, Inc.), 873 F.3d 1325 (11th Cir. 2017).

- 11.1.y Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction over a dispute arising from a section 363 sale agreement. The debtor in possession sold its assets in a section 363 sale. The sale agreement required the buyer to offer employment to the debtor in possession's employees and to pay severance pay to any it did not employ. The order approving the sale retained jurisdiction in the court to interpret and enforce the agreement and determine any disputes arising under or relating to the agreement. The buyer terminated two employees upon the closing. The employees sued the buyer in the bankruptcy court for severance pay. Section 1334(b) grants district courts jurisdiction over proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a title 11 case. A proceeding arises under title 11 when title 11 creates the cause of action. A proceeding is related to a title 11 case when the outcome could have any conceivable effect on the case. A proceeding arises in a title 11 case when, by its nature and independent of the particular factual circumstances, it would have no existence outside of bankruptcy. That an issue actually arose in a title 11 case, such as the severance pay dispute here, does not provide jurisdiction if the issue, by its nature, could equally have arisen outside of a bankruptcy case. Such a dispute is common under asset purchase agreements outside of bankruptcy, so the dispute here does not arise in the title 11 case. A court order may not "retain" jurisdiction that it does not have, so the order's retention of jurisdiction provision to resolve disputes under the contract does not expand the court's jurisdiction or permit the court to hear the action. Therefore, the court dismisses the action for lack of jurisdiction. Gupta v. Quincy Med. Ctr., 858 F.3d 657 (1st Cir. 2017).
- 11.1.z "Related to" jurisdiction includes a proceeding that impacts in any way on the handling and administration of the estate. The chapter 7 trustee sued the debtor's shareholder to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer. During the litigation, the trustee's law firm hired the judge's fiancé. The shareholder moved to disqualify the judge. Ultimately, the judge recused himself. The shareholder sued the trustee's law firm in state court for conspiracy to obstruct justice and fraudulent corruption of the judicial process. The law firm removed the action to the bankruptcy court, which granted a motion to dismiss and certified the order for direct appeal to the court of appeals. A bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a bankruptcy case. An action arises under title 11 if title 11 provides the rule of decision. It arises in a title 11 case if it could exist only in the bankruptcy context. Neither condition applies here, since judicial misconduct can exist in any context. A proceeding is related to a bankruptcy case not only if its outcome could conceivably have any effect on the estate's assets or liabilities, but also if it impacts in any way on the handling and administration of the estate. Because the action alleged that the law firm's conduct affected the handling of the bankruptcy case, the bankruptcy court had related to jurisdiction. Wortley v. Bakst, 844 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2017).
- 11.1.aa Bankruptcy court does not have "related to" jurisdiction over a fraudulent transfer defendant's cross-claims. The Ponzi scheme trustee sued an account holder to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers and to recover fees the account holder's custodian received as a subsequent transferee. The account holder cross-claimed against the custodian for fraud, negligence, and breach of contract, among other claims. The holder argued its defense of the trustee's avoiding power claims—lack of knowledge of the fraud—and its claims against its custodian were based on the same facts. A bankruptcy court has related to jurisdiction over a proceeding whose outcome might have a conceivable effect on the estate. Here, the account holder's claim against the custodian would have no effect on the estate. Even common facts in the avoiding power claim and the cross-claim are insufficient to establish an effect on the estate where the outcome of the cross-claim will not affect the estate's assets or claims. Therefore, the court dismisses the cross-claim. Picard v. HSBC Bank PLC (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 561 B.R. 334 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016).

- 11.1.bb Bankruptcy court may not hear challenge to Medicare provider agreement termination. The Secretary of Health and Human Services, acting through the Commissioner of Social Security, notified the debtor nursing home that she would terminate its Medicare and Medicaid provider agreements. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The bankruptcy court enjoined termination, determined that the Secretary did not have proper grounds to terminate the agreements, and ultimately confirmed a plan that substituted the injunction under the confirmation order for the original injunction. 42 U.S.C. § 405(h) prohibits review of the Secretary's termination decision except as provided in the Medicare statute and prohibits any action against the Commissioner of Social Security "under section 1331 or 1346 of Title 28 to recover on any claim arising under this subchapter." Section 1334 of title 28 grants the district courts pervasive bankruptcy jurisdiction, so at first glance, it does not appear to be included in section 405(h)'s prohibition. However, section 405(h) derived from an unenacted codification of a prior version of the section that referenced a prior title 28 section, which included a reference to the bankruptcy jurisdictional statute. Unenacted codifications may not change a statute's meaning, and Congress's later enactment of the erroneous codification should not be read to adopt a change. Therefore, the section 405(h) prohibition continues to preempt bankruptcy jurisdiction over challenges to the Commissioner's determinations. Fla. Agency for Health Care Admin. v. Bayou Shores SNF, LLC (In re Bayou Shores SNF, LLC), 828 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2016).
- 11.1.cc Section 904 prohibits a bankruptcy court from remedying municipality's constitutional violation. After the city filed its chapter 9 case, its water department disconnected some of its residents' water supplies for nonpayment. The residents sued in the bankruptcy court for declaratory and injunctive relief to restore their service, alleging violations of constitutional procedural due process and equal protection rights, among other things. Section 904 provides, "Notwithstanding any power of the court ... the court may not, by any stay, order, or decree, in the case or otherwise, interfere with—(1) any of the political or governmental powers of the debtor; (2) any of the property or revenues of the debtor; or (3) the debtor's use or enjoyment of any income-producing property." Although a municipality's governmental powers do not include the power to violate the Constitution, section 904 provides that the remedy for the violation does not lie in the bankruptcy court. Section 904's prohibition is thorough, to protect federal-state relations in the context of the complete financial overhaul undertaken in a chapter 9 case. While a federal court may enforce constitutional rights against a municipality in general, it may not do so in a chapter 9 case, because of the risk such a power would vest in the court overseeing the debt adjustment proceeding. Lyda v. City of Detroit, Mich. (In re City of Detroit, Mich.), 841 F.3d 684 (6th Cir. 2016).
- 11.1.dd Barton applies to creditors committee members, but not to prepetition claims. The former lawyer of the chapter 11 debtor's former principal became creditors committee chair. After the bankruptcy, the former principal sought to bring claims against the lawyer for using confidential information to his detriment in the bankruptcy and in various tort and contract claims for the prepetition representation. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), deprives a federal court of jurisdiction over a claim against an officer that a court has appointed for actions the officer took in an official capacity unless the appointing court grants leave to sue. The bankruptcy court concluded Barton applied to committee members, denied the former principal permission to bring the claims in district court and heard and dismissed the claims. The creditors committee's role overlaps with the trustee's role in efforts to maximize the estate's value. In addition, a committee performs various tasks related to and in support of administering the case. Therefore, the Barton doctrine should apply equally to committee members. But Barton does not cover claims for prepetition conduct, which the former principal may bring in district court without leave of the bankruptcy court. Blixseth v. Brown (In re Yellowstone Mountain Club, LLC), 841 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2016).

- 11.1.1.ee Bankruptcy court may adjudicate claims against a committee member for postpetition conduct. The former lawyer of the chapter 11 debtor's former principal became creditors committee chair. After the bankruptcy, the former principal sought to bring claims against the lawyer for using confidential information to his detriment in the bankruptcy and in various tort and contract claims for the prepetition representation. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), deprives a federal court of jurisdiction over a claim against an officer that a court has appointed for actions the officer took in an official capacity unless the appointing court grants leave to sue. The bankruptcy court concluded Barton applied to committee members, denied the former principal permission to bring the claims in district court and heard and dismissed the claims. Stern v. Marshall, 564 U.S. 462 (2011), limits the bankruptcy court's power to adjudicate traditional common law claims but not core proceedings that stem from the bankruptcy itself, even if they involve traditional tort or contract claims. By their nature, Barton claims concern actions taken in a bankruptcy officer's official capacity and therefore cannot exist independently of the bankruptcy case. Therefore, the former principal's claims against the lawyer for postpetition conduct stem from the bankruptcy case itself, so Stern does not preclude the bankruptcy court from adjudicating them. Blixseth v. Brown (In re Yellowstone Mountain Club, LLC), 841 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2016).
- 11.1.1.ff Bankruptcy court's preliminary injunction is not appealable as of right. In an adversary proceeding to determine whether the estate or a creditor had rights to income from certain property of the estate, the bankruptcy court issued a preliminary injunction prohibiting disbursement of the income pending resolution of the parties' rights. The debtor in possession appealed. Section 158(a) of title 28 grants the district courts jurisdiction (1) over appeals from final judgments, orders, and decrees of the bankruptcy court and (2), with leave of court, over appeals from interlocutory orders and decrees. Courts have construed section 158(a)(2) in the same manner as the parallel section for appeals from the district court's interlocutory orders, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), which grants the courts of appeals jurisdiction, with leave of court, over such appeals. As a condition to granting leave to appeal, courts of appeals require that the case present a controlling question of law as to which there is a substantial ground for difference of opinion and whose resolution would materially advance the ultimate resolution of the litigation. Section 1292(a)(1) grants the courts of appeals jurisdiction over appeals from preliminary injunctions. Some district courts have imported section 1292(a)(1) into their consideration of appeals from a bankruptcy court's preliminary injunction, finding that such an order is appealable as of right, as a district court's preliminary injunction is. Here, however, the court declines to give section 158(a)(2) such a reading, relying on section 158(a)(2)'s plain language, which requires leave of court for any appeal from a bankruptcy court's interlocutory order or decree. Finding no controlling question of law, the court denies leave to appeal. Gilman v. Goldberg (In re Goldberg), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143401 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 17, 2016).
- 11.1.1.gg Failure to raise Stern objection might constitute malpractice. A creditor challenged the debtor's discharge and claimed that property that the debtor held in a trust established in his mother's name should be property of the estate. The bankruptcy court granted the creditor's motion. Before briefs were due in the appeal to the district court, the Supreme Court decided Stern v. Marshall, 564 U.S. 463 (2011), holding that a bankruptcy court could not enter judgment in this kind of matter. The debtor's counsel did not raise a Stern objection in his briefs to the district court. He also did not raise a Stern objection in his appeal to the court of appeals until his reply brief. The court of appeals determined that the debtor waived the issue. After suffering judgment, the debtor sued his attorney for malpractice for failing to object to jurisdiction timely. A malpractice action lies when an attorney fails to exercise a reasonable degree of care and skill, but not for mere errors of judgment. Here, the attorney did not act reasonably in delaying the Stern objection, because the right to make it was settled law by the time of the appeals. Stevens v. Sharif, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102165 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 4, 2016).

11.1.1h A BAP may not issue or deny a petition for a writ of mandamus. The bankruptcy court denied the debtor's third attempt to sanction a creditor for a stay violation. The debtor sought mandamus from the BAP, which the BAP denied before the creditor even expressed a consent or objection to the appeal to the BAP. Section 1651(a) of title 28, the All Writs Act, authorizes "all courts established by Act of Congress [to] issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of their respective jurisdictions." Section 158(b) of title 28 states the "judicial council of a circuit shall establish a bankruptcy appellate panel service ... to hear and determine, with the consent of all the parties, appeals [from bankruptcy court orders] unless the judicial council finds" otherwise, based on specified statutory standards. Based on section 158(b), bankruptcy appellate panels are temporary panels subject to the judicial council's determination and are neither courts nor established by Act of Congress. Therefore, the BAP did not have authority under the All Writs Act to issue a writ of mandamus. In addition, the BAP did not yet have jurisdiction, because a BAP's jurisdiction arises only by the parties' consent, so any writ it issued would not have been in aid of its jurisdiction. The court vacates the BAP's denial of the writ. Judge Bybee "emphatically" dissents. Ozenne v. Chase Manhattan Bank (In re Ozenne), 818 F.3d 514 (9th Cir.), vacated on other grounds, 841 F.3d 810 (9th Cir. en banc 2016).

11.1.1i Bankruptcy court may enjoin nonbankruptcy litigation to further dispute resolution and reorganization. The parent guaranteed a substantial amount of the subsidiary's debt. The parent engineered transactions to relieve itself of many of the guarantees, including causing transfers of the subsidiary's assets. Guaranteed creditors sued the parent on the guarantees. The subsidiary filed chapter 11, asserted fraudulent transfer claims against the parent arising out of the asset transfers, and asked the bankruptcy court to enjoin the creditors' action against the parent. Section 105(a) authorizes the bankruptcy court to "issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions" of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 105(a) grants bankruptcy judges extensive equitable powers to enable them to perform their statutory duties. One of the Code's central objectives is successful dispute resolution and reorganization. A bankruptcy judge may issue an order to further that objective as long as another Code provision does not limit the judge's power or discretion. The bankruptcy judge's authority to issue such an injunction is not limited to cases where the claims in the bankruptcy case and in the nonbankruptcy forum arise out of the same acts or involve the same parties. Here, the creditors' litigation against the parent could drain it of resources available to satisfy the estate's fraudulent transfer claim and thereby impair the subsidiary's ability to resolve disputes, distribute value to its creditors (including the guaranteed creditors), and reorganize. Therefore, the bankruptcy court may enjoin the guarantee litigation if it finds that negotiations in the chapter 11 case by enjoining the guarantee litigation might further that result. Caesars Entertainment Operating Co., Inc. v. BOKF, N.A. (In re Caesars Entertainment Co., Inc.), 808 F.3d 1186 (7th Cir. 2015).

11.1.1j District court may refer proceeding over which it has diversity jurisdiction to bankruptcy court. The chapter 7 trustee (a lawyer) advised a client that it might acquire property that the estate had forfeited. Later, the trustee learned that the estate had not forfeited the property and so advised the other client not to pursue its acquisition. The other client refused. The trustee sued the other client in bankruptcy court to prevent it from proceeding. The other client then sued the trustee for malpractice in federal court under diversity jurisdiction. The district court referred the matter to the bankruptcy judge to hear and determine under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a), which permits the district court to refer a proceeding that arises under title 11 or arises in or relates to a case under title 11. A bankruptcy judge may not constitutionally hear and determine a claim that is not a public rights claim. Although the line between a public rights and private rights claim is unclear, a claim that arises under nonbankruptcy law and is “not necessarily resolvable by a ruling on the creditor’s proof of claim in bankruptcy,” Stern, 131 S. Ct. at 2611, is not a public rights claim, and the bankruptcy court may not determine it without the parties’ consent, even if the claim is factually intertwined with proceedings in the bankruptcy case. The malpractice claim arises under state law and will not be resolved by a ruling on the plaintiff’s proof of claim, because the plaintiff is not a creditor and did not file a proof of claim. Therefore, the district court may not refer this action to the bankruptcy judge to hear and determine. Section 157(a) does not implicate the bankruptcy judge’s jurisdiction, only the allocation of responsibility between the district court and the bankruptcy judge, so it does not matter whether the proceeding is “related to” the bankruptcy case. Section 1334(b) does not provide the district court jurisdiction if the proceeding is not related to the bankruptcy case, but the district court has diversity jurisdiction in this proceeding and, having jurisdiction, may refer the proceeding to the bankruptcy judge for a report and recommendation. Loveridge v. Hall (In re Renewable Energy Dev. Corp.), 792 F.3d 1274 (10th Cir. 2015).

11.1.kk Bankruptcy court may exercise in rem jurisdiction to hear adversary proceeding claiming automatic stay violation by foreign defendant. The debtor issued a credit default swap in connection with a complex synthetic collateralized debt obligation transaction. As part of the transaction, the swap counterparty issued notes and used the proceeds to post collateral with a collateral trustee to secure the counterparty’s obligation under the swap. Upon termination of the swap, the trustee was to liquidate and distribute the collateral to the debtor, if the counterparty’s default terminated the swap, or to the counterparty’s noteholders, if the debtor’s or its parent guarantor’s default terminated the swap. U.K. law governed all transaction documents, all transaction parties other than the debtor and its parent guarantor and the collateral were all located in England or Ireland, and all parties consented to U.K. jurisdiction to resolve disputes under the documents. The parent’s bankruptcy defaulted the swap. The counterparty gave a swap termination notice and required the trustee to liquidate and distribute the collateral to the counterparty, which it did. The debtor in possession sued to recover the collateral, claiming that its distribution to the counterparty violated the automatic stay. The counterparty moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. Personal jurisdiction requires that the defendant have minimum contacts with the forum related to the transaction and that the exercise of jurisdiction be reasonable. Simply dealing with a citizen or resident of the forum is generally not sufficient minimum contacts, nor is taking action that will have an effect in the forum. In addition, the court may not base a personal jurisdiction finding on a stay violation, which is the ultimate finding the action seeks. The court therefore concludes that it does not have personal jurisdiction over the counterparty defendant. A bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction of all property of the debtor and property of the estate, wherever located, as of the commencement of the case. A debtor’s security interest in collateral and its interest in an executory contract is property of the estate. Therefore, the court may exercise in rem jurisdiction to resolve the action. The court does not resolve what authority in rem jurisdiction gives it in the particular circumstances of the case. Lehman Bros. Special Financing Inc. v. Bank of America N.A. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 535 B.R. 608 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

11.1.ii Trial court relies on equitable mootness to deny motions to share in plan distributions. The debtor automobile manufacturer filed its chapter 11 case and sold substantially all its assets under section 363 40 days after the petition date, when its financing ran out and it would have had to cease operations if the sale had not closed. Over the objections of numerous contract and tort creditors, the sale order authorized a sale free and clear of all claims and interests and specifically protected the purchaser from successor liability claims. The purchaser expressly assumed some obligations, including product liability and warranty claims for cars manufactured before the chapter 11 case, but expressly excluded other tort liabilities resulting from issues with those cars. Five years after the sale, the purchaser revealed a previously concealed design defect in about 27 million prepetition cars, which had resulted in injury or death to numerous individuals and which were the subject to federal mandatory safety recall requirements and notices. At least 24 engineers, managers, and internal lawyers knew of the defect prepetition. The debtor in possession had not sent notice to the 27 million car owners but relied on broad publication notice. After the purchaser revealed the defect, several class actions were initiated against the purchaser on successor liability theories, among others, and the plaintiffs sought leave to file late proofs of claims and to share in the trust established to distribute estate assets to prepetition creditors. The trust reserved only enough assets for distribution on disputed claims and had distributed the balance. In addition, trust interests had already been distributed, and many had been traded in the market. For strategic reasons, the plaintiffs did not seek to stay any further distributions from the trust pending the hearing on their claims. Due process requires the best notice practicable under the circumstances, reasonably calculated to apprise people of the pendency of an action and to permit them to assert objections. Publication may suffice for unknown creditors, but direct notice is required for creditors whose identity the debtor in possession knows or can ascertain with reasonable effort. If notice to a creditor is inadequate, the creditor must show prejudice from the lack of notice to obtain relief from the order. Because of the debtor's internal knowledge of the defect, its danger, and the recall notice obligation, owners of the affected cars were known creditors; failure to give them notice violated their due process rights, so the court permits the late claims filings. Equitable mootness permits a court to deny relief whose implementation would be impractical, imprudent, or inequitable. The doctrine is not limited to appeals; it also applies at the trial court level to any request for relief that would upset settled expectations arising from an earlier order in the case. In the Second Circuit, a court should apply equitable mootness unless the court can still order effective relief, the relief will not affect the debtor's re-emergence as a revitalized corporate entity nor unravel complex transactions so as to knock the prop out from under the reorganization or create an unmanageable or uncontrollable situation for the court, the potentially affected parties had a chance to participate in the proceeding, and the party seeking relief pursued a stay or other remedy to prevent execution of the objectionable order. Here, the court could permit the new claimants to share in the trust, but the trust had no unallocated assets, so such relief would be impossible without taking distributions or potential distributions away from other claimants who had relied on the trust's terms. If it were possible, the relief would not affect the liquidating debtor's re-emergence as a revitalized corporate entity. However, it would knock the props out from under the bargain underlying the trust, its reserves, and the distribution of trust assets. The potentially affected parties did not receive notice of the proceedings, though their interests were protected by similarly situated parties who effectively articulated the mootness argument, preventing any prejudice to parties who did not receive notice. Finally, the plaintiffs chose not to protect their position by seeking a stay. Therefore, the court denies relief on equitable mootness grounds. In re Motors Liquidation Co., 529 B.R. 510 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

- 11.1.mm Section 105(a) permits the court to fashion a remedy where the Code and applicable agreements do not provide an answer. The multinational debtor filed chapter 11 case in the U.S., a CCCA proceeding in Canada, and for administration in England. The consolidated enterprise owned a substantial patent portfolio, which it sold in an auction that was coordinated between the Canadian and U.S. courts. None of the agreements among the debtors' affiliates allocated the portfolio's value or the beneficial ownership among the subsidiaries, and because the assets spanned different jurisdictions, there was no controlling law allocating the sale proceeds among the estates. Section 105(a) provides that the court may "issue any order, process or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions" of the Bankruptcy Code. Under the circumstances, fashioning an allocation among the various estates was within the court's authority under section 105(a). (The court rejects all parties' proposed allocation methods and, in agreement with the Canadian court, allocates instead pro rata based on the amount of allowed unsecured claims at each estate, without double counting, leaving to each estate the means of dividing and distributing the proceeds among their separate creditors.) In re Nortel Networks, Inc., 532 B.R. 494 (Bankr. D. Del. 2015).

11.1.nn Bankruptcy judges may hear Stern claims with the parties' consent. As a discovery abuse sanction, the bankruptcy court awarded judgment against the debtor on objections to discharge and on a claim that a trust for which the debtor was the trustee was the debtor's alter ego. The debtor had not objected before the bankruptcy judge to his statutory or constitutional authority to do so, but objected on appeal. Article III, section 1 of the Constitution vests the judicial power of the United States in judges who hold office during good behavior and whose salaries may not be diminished. Bankruptcy judges are appointed by the court of appeals for 14-year terms. They may hear only matters referred by the district court, which may withdraw a reference at any time on its own or a party's motion. As non-Article III judges, they may not issue a judgment in a matter involving private rights, whether core or non-core, if it does not involve resolution of the party's claim against the estate (a Stern claim) and, without the parties' consent, may only propose findings of fact and conclusions of law to the district court in non-core proceedings. But they may hear and determine core proceedings that do not involve adjudication of private rights. Article III reflects structural separation of powers concerns as well as a personal right. Although a party may waive personal constitutional rights, including the right to trial before an Article III court, a party may not waive structural protections. Determining whether a scheme threatens structural protections requires analysis of practical considerations rather than application of formal rules. Here, bankruptcy judges serve as officers of the Article III district courts and hear matters solely on reference by the district courts, who may withdraw a reference at any time. Their ability to hear Article III matters is limited to a narrow class of common law claims as an incident to their primary adjudicative function. There is no indication that Congress gave bankruptcy judges authority to aggrandize itself or humble the Article III judiciary. Therefore, the system and the parties' consent do not implicate structural concerns, and the parties' consent constitutionally permits a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine a Stern claim. Wellness Int'l Network, Ltd. v. Sharif, 575 U.S. ___, 135 S. Ct. 1932 (2015).

11.1.oo Order denying plan confirmation is not a final order. The court denied confirmation of a chapter 13 plan based solely on a legal issue that had split courts within the circuit but gave the debtor a chance to propose an amended plan. The debtor appealed the denial to the BAP, which heard the appeal as an interlocutory appeal under section 158(a)(3) of title 28. After the BAP affirmed, the debtor appealed to the court of appeals. The BAP did not certify the appeal for immediate review under section 158(d)(2). The court of appeals dismissed the appeal under section 158(d)(1), which permits an appeal only of a final order, because the underlying bankruptcy court order was not a final order. An order's finality in a bankruptcy case is measured at the "proceeding" level, not at the level of the entire bankruptcy case, and an order is final if it disposes of a discrete dispute within the larger case. Here, the "proceeding" is the process of attempting to confirm a plan, which only a confirmation order can conclude, not an order denying confirmation with leave to amend. Plan confirmation changes the status quo, finally affecting the parties' rights, while denial changes little. Therefore, an order denying confirmation with leave to amend the plan is not a final order. Where the court denies confirmation solely on a legal issue, a debtor's protection is to seek first level interlocutory review under section 158(d)(3) and certification for interlocutory review to the court of appeals under section 158(d)(2). Bullard v Blue Hills Bank, 575 U.S. ___, 135 S. Ct. 1686 (2015).

11.1.pp Bankruptcy court may exercise personal jurisdiction in stockbroker liquidation over account holder. Based on a meeting with the debtor's representative in France, the French defendant opened an account with the debtor stockbroker in New York to invest in the U.S. stock market. The customer account agreement was written in French, governed by French law and signed in France. The defendant withdrew funds from the account by contacting the stockbroker in New York but never traveled to the United States to deal with the account. The trustee sued to avoid withdrawals as fraudulent transfers. A U.S. court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant who has at least minimum contacts with the United States if the exercise of personal jurisdiction comports with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice, considering such factors as the potential burden on the defendant, the forum state's interest in adjudicating the dispute, the plaintiff's interest in obtaining convenient and effective relief, the judicial system's interest in efficiency and in furthering social policies. The defendant's decision to open a New York account to invest in the U.S. stock market provide sufficient contacts with the United States for the exercise of personal jurisdiction. The French aspects of the customer account agreement and the defendant's absence from the United States do not undermine the sufficiency of the contacts. The United States has a strong interest in enforcing its fraudulent transfer laws, and the trustee has a significant interest in expeditious resolution of the dispute. Therefore, the trustee has established a prima facie case that exercise of personal jurisdiction over the defendant in the United States comports with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice and is reasonable. Picard v. Estate of Igoin (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 525 B.R. 871 Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

- 11.1.qq U.S. correspondent bank account does not subject account holder to personal jurisdiction. The debtor Bahraini bank made short-term Bahraini law-governed investments in Bahrain in U.S. dollars through two Bahraini investment banks. The investments matured after the bank's chapter 11 filing. The investment banks offset their obligations to return the invested funds against the debtor's other obligations to them. The investment banks did not maintain offices, staff or telephone numbers in the United States and never solicited or conducted business or advertised in the United States. One of the banks maintained a New York bank correspondent account, through which it directed the debtor to transfer the funds to the investment bank; the other did not but directed the debtor to send funds through the investment bank's Bahraini commercial bank's correspondent account at a New York bank. The debtor's plan vested the right to pursue estate causes of action with the chapter 11 committee, which sued the investment banks for violating the automatic stay and for the return of the investments. A U.S. court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant if the defendant had minimum contacts with the United States and exercising jurisdiction would be reasonable and not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. Determining minimum contacts includes consideration of whether the defendant purposefully availed itself or doing business in the United States and could foresee being hailed into court there. Maintaining a correspondent account at a U.S. bank is not alone minimum contacts, nor is receiving funds in the United States. The passive receipt of funds is not a volitional act of doing business in the United States but rather the act of the transferor. Here, the defendants' only contact with the United States was their receipt of funds through New York correspondent bank accounts. Moreover, because the investments were made in Bahrain and governed by Bahraini law, neither investment bank could reasonably have expected to be hailed into court in the United States. A plaintiff may take jurisdictional discovery to uncover additional facts to support a personal jurisdiction claim if the complaint's allegations make a sufficient start toward showing personal jurisdiction and needs discovery to fill any holes, but not based on the speculation that the plaintiff will find sufficient facts to support personal jurisdiction. Here, the committee offered no support for its claim that discovery would fill holes in its complaint, only that it sought discovery to establish jurisdiction. Therefore, the court dismisses the complaint. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Bahrain Islamic Bank (In re Arcapita Bank, B.S.C.(C)), 529 B.R. 57 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 11.1.rr Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction over ERISA plan trustee's compensation from the plan. The debtor maintained an ERISA-qualified defined benefit plan for its employees. The chapter 7 trustee assumed plan administration responsibilities as required under section 704(a)(11). After completing administration and disbursing plan funds to plan participants, the trustee applied for bankruptcy court approval of his compensation, which was to be paid in part from plan assets (which are not property of the estate) and in part from the estate. Under ERISA, plan fees are not subject to prior court approval, but the Department of Labor, which administers ERISA, may sue a trustee who receives unreasonable compensation. The DOL objected to the bankruptcy court's determination of plan-paid compensation on the ground that ERISA does not require prior court approval and the DOL should not be bound by any such ruling. Section 1334(b) grants the bankruptcy court jurisdiction over core proceedings (those that arise under title 11 or arise in the case) and proceedings that are related to the case. Although section 704(a)(11) requires the trustee to serve as plan administrator, the plan and ERISA, not the Bankruptcy Code, govern the trustee's conduct as plan administrator. Therefore, issues of compensation from the plan do not arise under title 11. The compensation issue does not arise in the case, because plan administrator compensation issues typically arise outside of bankruptcy and do not depend on a bankruptcy case for their existence. Because ERISA authorizes the trustee to pay compensation from plan assets, any bankruptcy court compensation order is superfluous and can have no effect on the estate, so the court does not have "related to" jurisdiction. As a result, the trustee's desire, using the trustee's quasi-judicial immunity, to protect himself from a later DOL claim of excess compensation is not a sufficient potential effect on the estate to confer "related to" jurisdiction. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to rule on the trustee's request for compensation from plan assets. Kirschenbaum v. U.S. Dept. of Labor (In re Robert Plan Corp.), 777 F.3d 594 (2d Cir. 2015).

- 11.1.ss Bankruptcy court's "related to" jurisdiction does not divest other courts of jurisdiction. The debtor assigned a promissory note to a third party. Later, the debtor settled with the note's issuer and soon filed a chapter 11 case. It did not list the note in its schedules. Still later, the assignee sued the issuer in federal district court. Section 1334(b) grants the district courts non-exclusive jurisdiction over proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11. "Related to" jurisdiction includes any proceeding that conceivably could have an effect on the bankruptcy estate. However, such jurisdiction is not exclusive and does not divest a nonbankruptcy court of jurisdiction to hear the proceeding. Moreover, section 1334(b) grants jurisdiction to the district court, which automatically refers proceedings to the bankruptcy court by general order. Failure to refer does not deprive the district court of jurisdiction. Wellness Wireless Inc. v. Infopia Am., L.L.C., 606 Fed. Appx. 737 (5th Cir. 2015).
- 11.1.tt Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to enjoin successor liability claim. When the debtor encountered financial difficulties, it granted a security interest in all its assets to its principal, who transferred the lien to a new corporation. Six months later, the debtor surrendered its assets to the new corporation. Creditors sued the principal and the new corporation in state court. The debtor filed a chapter 7 case the following year. The trustee sued the principal and the new corporation to avoid and recover the transfer as a fraudulent transfer. The trustee settled the action and dismissed it without prejudice. After the trustee closed the bankruptcy case, the creditors revived their state court claims against the principal and the new corporation, who then asked the bankruptcy court to enforce the settlement by enjoining the action. A bankruptcy court has "related to" jurisdiction over a proceeding that could conceivably have any effect on the estate or could affect the debtor's rights, liabilities, options, or freedom of action and affects the estate's administration. The proceeding to enforce the settlement cannot affect the estate, because once the case is closed, the trustee's actions are abandoned and are no longer property of the estate, and there are no longer any assets to administer. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction and properly dismissed the proceeding. In re E.C. Morris Corp., 523 B.R. 77 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2014).
- 11.1.uu Bankruptcy court has subject matter jurisdiction over an action that could augment a foreign estate. A European company undertook a dividend recapitalization with proceeds of euro and U.S. dollar notes. A U.S.-based bank underwrote the U.S. dollar notes. The proceeds were transferred to the London-based shareholder, a private equity fund, who transferred a portion of the dividend to its U.S. investors. The company later failed and was subject to liquidation in England. The liquidators obtained recognition of the London proceeding in the U.S. under chapter 15 and brought a fraudulent transfer claim under state law, without reference to section 544(b), against the private equity fund. A bankruptcy court has “related to” subject matter jurisdiction over a proceeding that might have any conceivable effect on the bankruptcy estate. A chapter 15 case does not create an estate, but it acts in aid of an estate in a foreign proceeding. A bankruptcy court has “related to” jurisdiction over a proceeding that might have a conceivable effect on the foreign estate. Because this action could recover substantial funds for the foreign estate, the bankruptcy court has subject matter jurisdiction. Hosking v. TPC Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Hellas Telecomm’ns (Luxembourg) II SCA), 524 B.R. 488 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

11.1.vv No specific personal jurisdiction over a fraudulent transfer action against a non-U.S. defendant whose only U.S. contact was as transferor. A European company undertook a dividend recapitalization with proceeds of euro and U.S. dollar notes. A U.S.-based bank underwrote the U.S. dollar notes. The proceeds were transferred to the London-based shareholder, a private equity fund, who transferred a portion of the dividend to its U.S. investors. The company later failed and was subject to liquidation in England. The liquidators obtained recognition of the London proceeding in the U.S. under chapter 15 and brought a fraudulent transfer claim against the private equity fund. If a defendant has limited contacts with the forum, a court may exercise specific personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant only if the plaintiff’s injury was proximately caused by the defendant’s contacts with the forum or if the contacts that relate to the cause of action are more substantial. Here, the only contact was through the issuance of the dollar notes and the defendant’s distribution of its dividend to its U.S. investors. The former does not create specific personal jurisdiction, because the defendant did not participate in the issuance; the latter does not create specific personal jurisdiction for a fraudulent transfer claim, because the defendant’s only contact with the United States in the distribution was as transferor, not as transferee. Therefore, the court dismisses the action for lack of personal jurisdiction. Hosking v. TPC Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Hellas Telecomm’ns (Luxembourg) II SCA), 524 B.R. 488 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

11.1.ww Securities class action plaintiff does not gain automatic class standing in the defendant’s chapter 11 case. The plaintiff’s securities class action was stayed when the corporate defendant filed a chapter 11 case. The district court named the plaintiff as lead plaintiff in the class action, but denied his request to be named lead plaintiff for the bankruptcy case. He did not seek class representative or lead plaintiff status in the bankruptcy case or seek application of the class action rules there. The chapter 11 plan provided for a third-party release of claims against the individual defendants but permitted creditors to opt out of the release. The plaintiff opted out but objected to confirmation to the extent it included the release. Because the release did not bind the plaintiff, he could not object to confirmation on his own behalf. He also could not object on behalf of the class, because the district court did not grant him authority to act as lead plaintiff anywhere other than in the securities class action, and he did not obtain authority to act in the chapter 11 case from the bankruptcy court. Therefore, the lead plaintiff did not have standing in the bankruptcy court, and the court dismisses the appeal from denial of his objections. Lucas v. Dynege Inc. (In re Dynege Inc.), 770 F.3d 1064 (2d Cir. 2014).

11.1.xx Case dismissal does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to award committee counsel fees. The court dismissed the chapter 11 case without condition or jurisdictional reservation and closed the case. A short time later, committee counsel filed a compensation application. A debtor remains liable after dismissal for debts incurred during administration. Committee counsel fees are not owing until the court awards them under section 330. The court has jurisdiction over proceedings arising in or related to a bankruptcy case. A fee request is both. Dismissal does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to tie up loose ends such as the fee request. Therefore, the court should consider the fee application. It may award the fees, creating the debtor’s obligation to counsel, but may not order payment, as there is no estate after dismissal. If the court awards the fees, counsel may pursue collection after dismissal in the state courts. In re Sweports, Ltd., 777 F.3d 364 (7th Cir. 2014).

11.1.yy Litigation trustee is not entitled to a jury trial on avoiding power claim against creditor who filed a proof of claim. The debtor's plan created a litigation trust to pursue avoiding power claims. The trustee sued a creditor who had filed proofs of claim on fraudulent transfers and other claims. Under section 502(d), the court must disallow the claim of a creditor who has received and not returned an avoidable transfer. The litigation is therefore part of the claims allowance process and of the restructuring of debtor-creditor relations, is equitable, and therefore does not give the creditor defendant a right to a jury trial. A debtor who invokes the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction to seek protection from creditors does not have a greater right. The litigation trustee is the representative of the estate in pursuing the avoiding power claims and therefore stands in the estate's shoes for purposes of determining a jury trial right. Because the estate does not have such a right where the creditor has filed a proof of claim, the litigation trustee does not either. U.S. Bank N.A. v. Verizon Commc'ns, Inc., 761 F.3d 409 (5th Cir. 2014).

11.1.zz Case dismissal deprives court of jurisdiction to award committee fees. The court dismissed the chapter 11 case without condition or jurisdictional reservation and closed the case. A short time later, committee counsel filed a compensation application. Committee counsel compensation is payable only under section 330, and compensation payable under section 330 is payable only from the estate. Case dismissal reverts property of the estate in the debtor, unless the court orders otherwise. Without an estate, the court cannot order payment of compensation from the estate. Any order would be only advisory. A federal court may not issue an advisory opinion. Therefore, the court may not consider the fee application. In re Sweports, Ltd., 511 B.R. 522 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2014).

11.1.aaa An unconstitutional core proceeding should be treated as a non-core proceeding. The trustee sued in the bankruptcy court to recover a fraudulent transfer from a defendant who had not filed a proof of claim. The bankruptcy judge granted the trustee summary judgment. The defendant appealed to the district court, which conducted a de novo review, determined that there were no disputed issues of material fact, and affirmed. Section 157(b) of title 28 authorizes a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine core proceedings, which expressly include proceedings to recover fraudulent conveyances. But Article III prohibits a non-Article III bankruptcy judge from issuing a final judgment in a "Stern v. Marshall" action (131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011)), that is, an action to augment the estate against a third party who has not filed a claim against the estate. Section 157(c)(1) permits a bankruptcy judge to hear noncore proceedings and recommend proposed findings and conclusions to the district court, who must then review them de novo and enter judgment. Section 157(c)(1) does not directly cover a proceeding that is defined as "core" but that may not constitutionally be determined by a non-Article III judge. However, the 1984 act that enacted section 157 contained a severability provision: Any holding that the 1984 act or its application to any person or circumstance was invalid does not affect the remainder of the act or its application to other persons and circumstances. Classification in section 157(b) of fraudulent conveyance proceedings as core is constitutionally invalid. Therefore, section 157(c) and its report and recommendation procedure apply to those proceedings. The bankruptcy judge here did not characterize his ruling as a report and recommendation. But by giving the bankruptcy judge's ruling de novo review, the district court treated it as such and therefore fulfilled constitutional requirements. Section 157(c)(2) authorizes a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine a noncore proceeding with all the parties' consent. The Court does not address whether the defendant consented, what is required to evidence consent, or whether consent vitiates any constitutional objection to the bankruptcy judge's authority. Executive Benefits Ins. Agency v. Arkison, 573 U.S. ___, 134 S. Ct. 2165 (2014).

- 11.1.bbb Plan’s retention of jurisdiction provision is not a consent under section 157(c)(2). Before bankruptcy, the debtor sued its landlord in state court for breach of the debtor’s lease. After bankruptcy, the landlord removed the action and filed an adversary proceeding against the debtor asserting claims under the lease. The debtor assumed the lease under its plan. The plan retained jurisdiction for the bankruptcy court to hear and determine all pending adversary proceedings and all claims against or on behalf of the debtor. The litigation between the debtor and the landlord continued after the effective date and after the final decree in both actions over the lease’s interpretation and over cure amounts. The district courts have subject matter jurisdiction over core proceedings and over proceedings that are related to a case under title 11. The district courts may refer related proceedings to the bankruptcy judges to hear and recommend proposed findings and conclusions, and parties may consent to a bankruptcy judge’s issuance of a final judgment in a related proceeding, but a bankruptcy judge may not determine a related proceeding without the parties’ consent. Plan confirmation narrows bankruptcy jurisdiction to proceedings that have a close nexus to the plan’s interpretation or implementation. A plan’s retention of jurisdiction cannot expand the bankruptcy court’s statutory jurisdiction. In addition, it cannot constitute consent to a bankruptcy judge’s determining a related proceeding. Bankruptcy Rules 7008(a) and 7012(b) provide the proper means for evidencing a party’s position on whether a proceeding is core or related and whether the party consents to the bankruptcy judge’s determining the matter. N.Y. Skyline, Inc. v. Empire State Bldg. Trust Co. (In re N.Y. Skyline, Inc.), 512 B.R. 159 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 11.1.ccc Exceptions to Barton doctrine are limited to cases of harm to third parties. A federal district court receiver took possession of and operated the debtor’s business for 16 months before filing a bankruptcy petition for the debtor in the same district. The trustee sued the receiver for improper disbursement of receivership funds to the creditor in the district court action and to recover, on preference and fraudulent transfer grounds, the receiver’s payment of his own compensation. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), deprives a court of subject matter jurisdiction to hear a claim against a receiver appointed by another court. The Barton doctrine has two principal exceptions. A receiver may be sued without leave of court under 28 U.S.C. § 959(a) with respect to acts or transactions in carrying on the receivership property’s business. However, this exception is limited to claims by third parties for harm to them, not harm to the receivership estate, which is under the sole supervision of the receivership court. A receiver may also be sued for an ultra vires act, but this exception is also limited. It applies only to a receiver’s wrongful seizure of a third party’s property. Therefore, the trustee’s claims for improper disbursements and to recover avoidable transfers are not within either exception. However, rather than dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, the bankruptcy judge issues a report and recommendation to the district court requesting the district court to consider the trustee’s request to proceed with the litigation, withdraw the reference to hear it, grant Barton relief to permit the bankruptcy judge to hear it, or dismiss the case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Kaliner v. Antonoplos (In re DMW Marine, LLC), 508 B.R. 497 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2014).
- 11.1.ddd Tax Injunction Act precludes bankruptcy court enforcement of sale free and clear order against taxing authority. The state imposes an unemployment tax at a rate based on an employer’s experience. The experience rating transfers to a buyer that continues the business with mostly the same employees and assets. In this case, the estate sold all of its operating assets as a going concern asset sale, and the buyer continued the debtor’s business. The sale was free and clear of all claims, including all rights based on any successor liability. The state imposed an unemployment tax rate on the buyer based on the debtor’s experience rating. State law provides a taxpayer an administrative procedure to challenge an experience rating, but the buyer did not use the procedure. Instead, the buyer moved the bankruptcy court for enforcement against the state of the sale order. The Tax Injunction Act prohibits the district courts from enjoining the assessment, levy or collection of any state tax where a plain, speedy and efficient remedy is available in state court. Its purpose is to prevent a federal court from interfering with state tax collection. It deprives the federal courts of subject matter jurisdiction over state tax disputes. A court generally has jurisdiction to enforce its own orders, but not when a specific federal statute deprives it of subject matter jurisdiction. State law gave the buyer a plain, speedy and efficient remedy to challenge the experience rating. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to enjoin the state from collecting the tax from the buyer based on the debtor's prior experience rating. In re Old Carco LLC, 505 B.R. 151 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.), rev'd, 2014 WL 6790781 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).

11.1.eee Bankruptcy court may not hear and determine ERISA plan trustee's compensation.

The debtor maintained an ERISA-qualified defined benefit plan for its employees. The chapter 7 trustee assumed plan administration responsibilities as required under section 704(a)(11). The court had ruled that the trustee's compensation, whether from the plan or the estate, was subject to bankruptcy court approval. After completing administration and disbursing plan funds to plan participants, the trustee applied for bankruptcy court approval of his compensation, which was to be paid in part from plan assets (which are not property of the estate) and in part from the estate. Under ERISA, plan fees are not subject to prior court approval, but the Department of Labor, which administers ERISA, may sue a trustee who receives unreasonable compensation. The DOL objected to the bankruptcy court's determination of plan-paid compensation on the ground that ERISA does not require prior court approval and the DOL should not be bound by any such ruling. Section 1334(b) grants the bankruptcy court jurisdiction over core proceedings (those that arise under title 11 or arise in the case) and proceedings that are related to the case. Although section 704(a)(11) requires the trustee to serve as plan administrator, the plan and ERISA, not the Bankruptcy Code, govern the trustee's conduct as plan administrator. Therefore, issues of compensation from the plan do not arise in the case or under title 11. Because ERISA authorizes the trustee to pay compensation from plan assets, any bankruptcy court compensation order is superfluous and can have no effect on the estate, so the court does not have related to jurisdiction. The trustee's desire, using the trustee's quasi-judicial immunity, to protect himself from a later DOL claim of excess compensation is not a sufficient potential effect on the estate to confer related to jurisdiction. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to rule on the trustee's request for compensation from plan assets. U.S. Dept. of Labor v. Kirschenbaum, 508 B.R. 257 (E.D.N.Y. 2014).

11.1.fff A nonparty may not remove an action to the bankruptcy court. In a matrimonial dissolution action, the court appointed a receiver over the husband's property, including his 1/3 interest in a corporation that owned real property that was leased to a third party. The receivership order authorized the receiver to take possession of the real property and liquidate it. The receiver brought an eviction proceeding against the tenant. While that action was pending, the corporation filed a bankruptcy case. Over the receiver's objection, the bankruptcy court ordered the receiver to turn over the interest in the debtor and the control of the real estate to the estate. The debtor then removed the eviction action and those claims in the matrimonial dissolution action under which the receiver sought to operate and liquidate the debtor's real estate. Under section 1452(a) of title 28, "a party may remove any claim or cause of action in a civil action ... to the district court ... if such district court has jurisdiction of such claim or cause of action under section 1334 of this title." The debtor was not a party to either of the removed actions. Therefore, the court remands the actions to the state court. In re Queen Elizabeth Realty Corp., 502 B.R. 17 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

11.1.ggg Bankruptcy judge may not constitutionally determine core proceeding even with litigants' consent. The debtor in possession sued a defendant in the bankruptcy court on state law non-core contract and tort claims, consenting to the bankruptcy court's issuing final judgment. After unsuccessfully attempting to withdraw the consent and then losing the litigation in the bankruptcy court, the debtor in possession appealed, arguing that the bankruptcy court lacked constitutional authority to issue final judgment. Article III vests judicial power in judges whose tenure is during good behavior and whose salaries may not be reduced. Article III protects litigants' personal interests in an independent judiciary but also, importantly, protects structural interests in the separation of powers. Bankruptcy judges are not Article III judges. Therefore, even though section 157(c)(2) permits a litigant to consent to a bankruptcy judge's issuing a final judgment in a non-core proceeding, Article III's structural protections prevent the court from constitutionally permitting it. However, because section 157(c)(2) expressly permits a bankruptcy judge to issue proposed findings and conclusions in a non-core proceeding, the court of appeals remands for that purpose. BP RE, L.P. v. RML Waxahachie Dodge, L.L.C. (In re BP RE, L.P.), 735 F.3d 279 (5th Cir. 2013).

- 11.1.hhh Creditor may bring a proceeding under section 105. Three creditors brought fraudulent transfer actions in state court against a transferee. The defendant brought an action in the bankruptcy case to enjoin the creditors from pursuing their fraudulent transfer action on the ground that the fraudulent transfer actions are property of the estate. Section 105(a) authorizes the court to issue any order, process or judgment that is necessary to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 105(b) permits the court to act sua sponte. Section 105(a)'s literal language does not limit the court to acting only on motion of the trustee, and section 105(b) confirms that the court may act even if the trustee does not request action. Therefore, a creditor may seek an order under section 105(a) when the creditor's rights are threatened and when necessary to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. GTCR Golder Rauner, LLC v. Scharrer (In re Fundamental Long Term Care, Inc.), 501 B.R. 770 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2013).
- 11.1.iii Party may not waive Article III, section 1 structural issue in private rights matter; bankruptcy court may not hear any proceedings in a private rights core proceeding. As a discovery abuse sanction, the bankruptcy court awarded judgment against the debtor on objections to discharge and on a claim that a trust of which the debtor was the trustee was the debtor's alter ego. The debtor had not objected to the bankruptcy court's statutory or constitutional authority to do so, but objected on appeal. Article III, section 1 of the Constitution vests the judicial power of the United States in judges who hold office during good behavior and whose salaries may not be diminished. Article III reflects structural separation of powers concerns. A bankruptcy judge is not an Article III judge and therefore does not have authority to issue a judgment in a matter involving private rights, whether core or non-core, if it does not involve resolution of the party's claim against the estate. Although a party may waive constitutional rights that are personal, the party may not waive structural protections. A structural interest is not present where the statutory scheme's intrusion upon the judiciary's province is no more than de minimis. Intrusion is de minimis where the adjudicator addresses a narrow, specialized area and enforcement resides with an Article III court, but is more than de minimis where the action is "the stuff of traditional actions at common law tried by the courts at Westminster in 1789." This is such an action. Although section 157(c) permits the parties to consent to the bankruptcy judge's determination of a non-core proceeding, it does not permit consent to the determination of a core proceeding. Therefore, a party may not waive an Article III, section 1 objection to a bankruptcy judge's determination in a core proceeding. Moreover, in a matter in which the bankruptcy judge may not constitutionally issue a final judgment, section 157(c) does not authorize the bankruptcy judge to issue proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, nor to conduct any pretrial proceedings. Therefore, if the alter ego claim is a core proceeding, the district court must conduct all proceedings in the action. Wellness Int'l Network, Ltd. v. Sharif, 727 F.3d 751 (7th Cir. 2013).
- 11.1.jjj Bankruptcy court does not have authority to rule on state law counterclaims to a fee application that present independent legal issues. The chapter 13 debtor objected to his attorneys' fee application and asserted counterclaims for malpractice, breach of fiduciary duty and violation of the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act (DTPA). The facts underlying the fee application and each of the three claims were the same, though the legal issues differed. The bankruptcy court denied all three claims and entered final judgment against the debtor. The counterclaims are core proceedings under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(C). Under Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011), the bankruptcy court may not hear and determine such a counterclaim as a core proceeding that is not necessarily resolved in the claims allowance process. Though the Stern opinion stated that its holding was narrow, its reasoning was broad, implicating separation of powers concerns. Therefore, a litigant may not by consent cure the deficiency. A ruling on a fee application necessarily determines that the professional did not commit malpractice or breach a fiduciary duty to the estate. Therefore, the bankruptcy court had authority to hear and determine the debtor's malpractice and breach of fiduciary duty counterclaims. However, the DPTA state law counterclaim requires at least a legal, if not a factual, showing that differs from the legal issues that the court must resolve to allow a fee application and determine malpractice and breach of duty claims. The court's determination of facts in ruling on the fee application and the malpractice and breach of duty claims is final and binding on the debtor. But the court's ruling on the legal issues that the DPTA claim presents goes beyond the bankruptcy court's authority. Therefore, the court of appeals remands the DPTA claim to the district court to determine whether it has the authority to rule on this core proceeding that is beyond the bankruptcy court's authority. Frazin v. Haynes & Boone, L.L.P. (In re Frazin), 732 F.3d 313 (5th Cir. 2013).

11.1.kkk Bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to determine whether unemployment tax rating follows buyer in sale free and clear. The chapter 7 trustee sold all the debtor's business assets. The order approving the sale provided that the sale was "free and clear of all liens, claims, encumbrances and interests." After the sale, the state department of labor, which had notice of the sale motion and hearing, applied the debtors' experience rating to the purchaser for the purpose of determining the purchaser's unemployment tax rate. The purchaser moved in the bankruptcy court to enforce the sale order against the labor department and enjoin the application of the debtor's experience rating to the purchaser. Section 505 grants the bankruptcy court jurisdiction to hear and determine the amount or legality of any tax of the debtor, not of a purchaser. The Tax Injunction Act prohibits a federal court from enjoining, suspending or restraining the collection of any tax where there is a state law remedy. These provisions do not deny the bankruptcy court jurisdiction to rule on the purchaser's motion. The bankruptcy court issued its free and clear order under section 363. A bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to enforce its own orders, which cannot be collaterally attacked. The issue is whether the experience rating was an "interest" in the debtor's property, not what tax the labor department may impose. Therefore, the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to determine the motion. Otherwise, a department of labor could ignore the sale hearing notice and seek to apply the experience rating after the sale had closed, depriving the court of the ability to enforce its own order. In re USA United Fleet Inc., 496 B.R.79 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2013).

11.1.iii Bankruptcy court has postconfirmation jurisdiction to characterize plan transaction for tax purposes. The debtor partnership confirmed a plan that restructured the partnership into a limited liability company and discharged a portion of the claims against the partnership property. The confirmation order (but not the plan) provided that the plan transactions "do not provide for ... and will not constitute, the liquidation of all or substantially all of the property of the Debtor's Estate." The state taxing agency later attempted to tax the partners for capital gains, characterizing the restructuring as resulting in a taxable sale, rather than non-taxable cancellation of debt income. The bankruptcy court issued an order to show cause why the agency should not be held in contempt for attacking and refusing to comply with the confirmation order. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a matter arising under title 11 (based on a right that title 11 grants) or arising in a case under title 11 (a matter that would not exist outside a bankruptcy case). The dispute here does not implicate "arising under" or "arising in" jurisdiction, because it is not based on any provision of the Code and is not unique to the bankruptcy case. A bankruptcy court also has jurisdiction over a proceeding related to a title 11 case, but its postconfirmation related to jurisdiction is narrower than its preconfirmation jurisdiction. After confirmation, related to jurisdiction requires that the dispute have a close nexus to the bankruptcy case, which includes matters “affecting the ‘interpretation, implementation, consummation, execution, or administration of the confirmed plan.’” Jurisdiction does not depend on the matter’s effect on the debtor or the estate. Here, the ultimate merits question depends on interpretation of the plan, which includes the confirmation order. Moreover, to the extent that the matter depends on interpretation of the confirmation order, a bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to interpret and enforce its own orders. Both the plan and the tax treatment depend on the transaction’s treatment as debt cancellation rather than a sale, so the court has jurisdiction to determine the nature of the transaction. The consummation of the plan does not defeat postconfirmation jurisdiction, because the disputed provision was an essential part of the plan, and tax disputes typically arise only after consummation. Finally, the Tax Injunction Act does not defeat jurisdiction, because a specific Bankruptcy Code provision, section 346(j), which regulates state taxation, provides the necessary power for the bankruptcy court to determine both the nature of the plan transaction and section 346’s effect on it. Wilshire Courtyard v. Calif. Franchise Tax Board (In re Wilshire Courtyard), 729 F.3d 1279 (9th Cir. 2013).

11.1.mmm Commonly-owned limited partnerships are not affiliates for venue purposes. Three limited partnerships had different general partners, all of which were LLCs that were 100% owned by a single member. The general partner owned less than 20% of the interests in the limited partnerships. The three limited partnerships filed chapter 11 petitions in Kentucky, which was a proper venue under section 1408(1) (principal assets) for only one of the debtors. Section 1408(2) provides proper venue in a district where a case concerning an affiliate is pending. Section 101(2)(B) defines affiliate to include “a corporation 20 percent or more of whose outstanding voting securities are directly or indirectly owned, controlled or held with power to vote, by the debtor, or by an entity that directly or indirectly owns, controls or holds with power to vote, 20 percent or more of the outstanding voting securities of the debtor.” Section 101(49) defines “security” to include “the interest of a limited partner in a limited partnership,” but it does not include a general partnership interest. The general partner therefore does not hold any securities in the debtors. Moreover, the limited partnerships are not corporations for purposes of the affiliate definition. Therefore, the affiliate venue provision does not apply. In re Invs. Cap. P’ners II, LP, 495 B.R. 809 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 2013).

11.1.nnn Court enforces a prebankruptcy forum selection clause. The Nevada bankruptcy trustee sued the debtor’s contract counterparty in the Nevada bankruptcy court for breach of contract. The contract provided for exclusive jurisdiction in New York for any disputes that “arises out of or in connection with” the contract. A trustee may bring any action that the debtor could have brought on the petition date, but the trustee remains subject to all defenses that might have been asserted against the debtor, including a forum selection clause. Therefore, the court enforces the clause and transfers the action to New York. Cory v. eBet Ltd. (In re Sona Mobile Holdings Corp.), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94206 (D. Nev. July 5, 2013).

11.1.ooo Court has subject matter jurisdiction to grant third-party release where debtor’s indemnification of released claims was automatic. The debtor’s bond indenture trustee re-perfected a lapsed security interest within 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor in possession sued to avoid the re-perfection as a preference. The debtor in possession and the indenture trustee settled the litigation by allowance of the bonds as a secured claim in a substantially reduced amount. The settlement provided for the indenture trustee’s release of its contractual indemnification claims for all claims, losses, damages or liabilities against the debtor and for a third-party release of the bondholders’ claims against the indenture trustee. Before the settlement was approved, a bondholder brought a claim against the indenture trustee in a nonbankruptcy court. The bankruptcy court has subject matter jurisdiction to approve a third-party release if it would have jurisdiction over a proceeding asserting against the third party the claims that would be released. A bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a proceeding that is related to a bankruptcy case, that is, if its outcome could conceivably effect the estate. An indemnification agreement between the third party and the debtor does not automatically create related to jurisdiction, as a mere potential effect on the estate is insufficient to create related to jurisdiction. Rather, the debtor's liability must be triggered automatically upon the filing of the claim against the third party, and the indemnification must not depend on the intervention of another lawsuit against the debtor. Here, the bondholder's action against the indenture trustee automatically triggered the debtor's indemnification obligation for defense costs, whether or not the bondholder prevailed, so the obligation would not depend on the intervention of another lawsuit. Therefore, the court had subject matter jurisdiction to grant the release. Bank of N.Y. Mellon Trust Co. v. Becker (In re Lower Bucks Hosp.), 488 B.R. 303 (E.D. Pa. 2013).

11.1.ppp Bankruptcy court clerk may enter final default judgment in noncore proceeding.

The trustee sued a defendant who had not filed a proof of claim to recover a preference in a certain amount. The summons, conforming to official form B 250, stated in bold, all-capital type that a failure to respond "will be deemed to be your consent to entry of a judgment by the bankruptcy court ... for the relief demanded in the complaint". The defendant defaulted. Generally, a bankruptcy judge may not constitutionally issue a final judgment against a defendant in a noncore proceeding. Courts are divided on whether consent provides the necessary authority. Article III implements both individual rights and structural protections, which prevent Congress from "withdraw[ing] from judicial cognizance any matter which, from its nature, is the subject of a suit at the common law". A defendant may waive individual rights, but not the structural protections. Congress vested decision-making authority in bankruptcy cases in the district courts and permitted litigants the right in noncore proceedings to an Article III tribunal, thereby not withdrawing noncore proceedings from judicial cognizance. As a result, only individual rights are implicated in evaluating whether a litigant may waive Article III protections. A waiver may be express or implied, as long as the implied consent is sufficiently clear. Failure to object in the face of a summons that states clearly the effect of failing to respond is sufficiently clear to constitute a waiver. If failure to respond were not sufficient implied consent, then, ironically, only express consent or an inadequate objection could suffice as a waiver. Therefore, the clerk may enter a default judgment. In addition, Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 55 requires the clerk (not the judge) to enter a default judgment if the claim is for a sum certain. Rule 55 applies in adversary proceedings. If the Article III district court's clerk may enter a final, enforceable judgment upon a default, then the bankruptcy judge and the bankruptcy court clerk may do so as well. Exec. Sounding Board Assocs. Inc. v. Advanced Machine & Eng'g Co. (In re Oldco M Corp.), 484 B.R. 598 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

11.1.qqq Probate and domestic relations exceptions to jurisdiction apply to approval of a settlement agreement.

The debtor signed a prenuptial agreement with her husband, preserving their property as separate during and after the marriage. After he became disabled, she had him execute in her favor a durable power of attorney for his financial affairs and prepared and had him execute a new will, also in her favor. She transferred substantial assets from her husband to herself. His brother and another sought and obtained conservatorship and guardianship orders for the husband in state court. The conservator and guardian sought return of the property the debtor had obtained and sued for divorce on the husband's behalf. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case and sued the conservator and the guardian for a declaration that the prenuptial agreement was invalid, the new will was valid, and the property transfers to her were valid and the property was property of the estate. After conversion of the case to chapter 7, the trustee settled with the conservator and guardian. The settlement provided for a declaration that the prenuptial agreement was valid and the new will was invalid ab initio. The federal jurisdiction probate exception deprives a federal court of jurisdiction to probate or annul a will or to administer a decedent's estate. A finding that the new will was invalid ab initio amounts to the annulment of the will. Therefore, the court does not have jurisdiction to issue an order under the settlement agreement declaring the new will invalid. The domestic relations exception deprives a federal court of jurisdiction to grant a divorce, alimony or child custody decree. A finding that the prenuptial agreement is valid directly affects the determination of what property is property of the estate and is merely a basic contract interpretation action. Therefore, the court may find that the prenuptial agreement was valid. In re Brown, 484 B.R. 322 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2012).

11.1.rrr Jurisdiction extends to any dispute that implicates property of the estate. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. Investors in the scheme included various investment funds. The state attorney general sued an investment manager of one of those funds on behalf of fund investors, for violation of state laws, and ultimately agreed to a settlement with the manager under which the manager would make a substantial payment to the attorney general. The trustee sued to enjoin the settlement on the ground that the manager’s funds derived from property of the debtor, that the manager’s funds were therefore property of the estate and that the settlement therefore violated the automatic stay as an attempt to exercise control over property of the estate. Section 1334(b) of title 28 grants jurisdiction to the district courts over “all civil proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in or related to a case under title 11”. Related-to jurisdiction encompasses any proceeding whose outcome might have any conceivable effect on the estate. The trustee’s claim here asserts that the settlement would dissipate property of the estate. Even if the court ultimately concludes that the property is not property of the estate or that it should not issue an injunction (as the court here later concludes), it has jurisdiction to determine the dispute. Secs. Investor Protection Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC, 491 B.R. 27 (S.D.N.Y. 2013).

11.1.sss Nevada LLC interests are located in Nevada for involuntary bankruptcy venue purposes. The debtor resided and was domiciled in Washington. He transferred substantially all of his assets, which comprised real property located in several states, to a Nevada limited liability company in exchange for the membership interests in the LLC. Three creditors filed an involuntary petition against him in Nevada. Bankruptcy case venue is proper at the location of the debtor’s domicile, residence, principal place of business or principal assets for the 180 days (or for the greater portion of that period) before the petition date. LLC membership interests are intangible property, which does not have a location, except as a legal fiction. Under the common law, intangible property is located where the owner is. Under the Nevada LLC statute, Nevada LLC interests are located in Nevada for purposes of an unsecured creditor’s obtaining a charging order against the interests, and only a Nevada court may issue such an order. Under Ninth Circuit precedent, determination of intangible property location is based on the context in which the question arises. Here, the context is unsecured creditors’ collection efforts through an involuntary petition. Because Nevada law provides that the LLC interests are located in Nevada for purposes of creditors’ collection efforts, the context here requires a determination that they are located in Nevada for involuntary bankruptcy venue purposes as well. Montana Dept. of Rev. v. Blixseth (In re Blixseth), 484 B.R. 360 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

11.1.ttt Bankruptcy court may constitutionally decide a fraudulent transfer action only with the litigants’ consent. The trustee brought a fraudulent transfer action against a defendant who did not file a proof of claim. The defendant demanded a jury trial under Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, 492 U.S. 33 (1989). The district court construed the demand as a motion to withdraw the reference. The trustee moved for summary judgment, and the defendant petitioned the district court to stay consideration of its jury trial demand pending the bankruptcy court’s hearing of the summary judgment motion. After the bankruptcy court granted the trustee’s motion, the defendant appealed to the district court and abandoned its withdrawal motion. The district court affirmed. After briefing the appeal to the court of appeals, the defendant moved there to vacate the bankruptcy court’s judgment based on Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011). Granfinanciera held that a fraudulent transfer defendant who did not file a proof of claim has a Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial, because the action was not a matter of public right. Stern held that a bankruptcy judge may not constitutionally hear and determine a proceeding to recover on a tort claim for essentially the same reason, equating the right to Article III court adjudication and the Seventh Amendment jury trial right. Therefore, Stern applies equally to a fraudulent transfer action. That the fraudulent transfer action arises under the Bankruptcy Code, rather than under nonbankruptcy law, does not render the matter one of public right, at least in part because Granfinanciera also involved a fraudulent transfer claim under the Bankruptcy Code. Congress enacted section 157(b)(2), authorizing a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine core proceedings, intending to expand the bankruptcy court's authority to its constitutional limit. This authorization includes the lesser authority to hear and submit proposed findings and conclusions. Section 157(c)(2) permits a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine a noncore proceeding "with the consent of all the parties to the proceeding". Consent then permits a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine a core proceeding. A litigant may waive the right to an Article III court here in part because the allocation of authority between the district court and the bankruptcy judges does not implicate structural interests. The defendant's action in this case constituted consent. Rules 7008(a) and 7012(b) require the consent to be express in the pleadings or otherwise, but the Rules are inconsistent with the statute, which requires only "consent", not "express consent", as section 157(e) does for a bankruptcy court jury trial. Therefore, the bankruptcy court properly issued judgment against the defendant. Exec. Benefits Ins. Agency v. Arkison (In re Bellingham Ins. Agency, Inc.), 702 F.3d 553 (9th Cir. 2012).

11.1.uuu Bankruptcy court does not have constitutional authority to determine fraud claim against creditor. The creditor defrauded the debtor, forcing the debtor into chapter 11. The debtor in possession sued the creditor for fraud, seeking discharge of judgments and debts that the creditor owned, and a judgment against the creditor for actual and punitive damages. The creditor counterclaimed on the debts. Both the debtor and the creditor alleged that the claims were core proceedings. Article III, section 2 of the Constitution limits a federal court's jurisdiction, to the extent relevant here, to federal questions. An action that determines a debtor's liability or that seeks to augment the bankruptcy estate is related to a bankruptcy case, which arises under federal law, and is therefore within the Constitutional scope of jurisdiction. By alleging that the debtor in possession's claims were core proceedings, the creditor waived any objection that they were not, and thereby waived any argument that the bankruptcy judge did not have statutory authority to issue a final judgment. However, a bankruptcy judge, who does not have the protections of Article III, may not exercise the "judicial Power of the United States". A litigant may waive Article III protections to the extent they provide personal constitutional protection, but may not waive the protections to the extent that they protect structural interests such as preserving the judiciary's role as the third branch. Determining a claim's allowability and dischargeability is within the scope of the adjustment of debtor-creditor relations. A non-Article III bankruptcy judge may issue such a determination. However, issuing a judgment on a state law fraud claim between nongovernmental entities is an adjudication of private rights and an exercise of judicial power, which a bankruptcy judge may not exercise. The debtor in possession's claim here implicated facts and issues, including the determination of punitive damages, that required more than a determination of the allowability and dischargeability of the creditor's claim and therefore were beyond what the bankruptcy judge could constitutionally determine. Section 157(b) permits the bankruptcy judge to issue a final judgment in a core proceeding, and section 157(c) permits the bankruptcy judge to submit a proposed judgment in a noncore proceeding. But neither provision authorizes a bankruptcy judge to submit a proposed judgment in a core proceeding. The claim against the creditor here was a noncore proceeding, despite the creditor's allegation that the proceeding was core. The bankruptcy judge therefore still retains authority under section 157(c) to submit a proposed judgment, which the appellate court orders the bankruptcy court to do. Waldman v. Stone, 698 F.3d 910 (6th Cir. 2012).

11.1.vvv Court transfers venue. The debtors' headquarters are in Missouri, its principal assets (coal mines) are in West Virginia and Missouri, its subsidiaries are incorporated principally in Delaware and West Virginia, and its major lenders are in New York, though many creditors are located in several different states. In the six weeks before bankruptcy, it incorporated two subsidiaries in New York. Their only assets were New York bank accounts. The new subsidiaries unilaterally assumed liability for the debtors' principal financial obligations. The New York subsidiaries filed chapter 11 cases in New York, the affiliates (including the parent) followed, with the support of the debtor in possession lenders and many of the debtors' creditors, in good faith, claiming that for the cases to proceed there was in the best interest of all stakeholders. A union representing about 40% of the debtors' workforce moved to transfer venue to West Virginia, where the judges were more familiar with the employees, the retirees and the industry. The U.S. Trustee moved to transfer venue without naming a target district. Under section 1408, a debtor may file a case in a district in which it has been domiciled or resident for the greater portion of the prior 180 days than in any other district or where a case concerning an affiliate is pending. A court may transfer venue either in the interest of justice or for the convenience of the parties. Each standard requires a case-by-case analysis. The venue choice complied literally with section 1408. But the debtors' eve-of-bankruptcy incorporation of the New York subsidiaries is a factor in the "interest of justice" analysis, lest form take precedence over substance and eviscerate the venue statute. Here, the facts were created to fit the statute, rather than the statute being applied to fit the facts. Therefore, the court grants the venue transfer motion. But in doing so, a court must not transfer simply to substitute one home field advantage (creditors in New York) for another (unions in West Virginia). Transfer to the district in which the debtors' headquarters is located is convenient for the parties and in the interest of justice as a neutral forum. Therefore, the court transfers the case to Missouri. In re Patriot Coal Corp., 482 B.R. 718 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

11.1.www Bankruptcy court lacks post-confirmation jurisdiction over a removed action to enforce a prepetition claim. The debtor maintained a defined benefit pension plan, which it had frozen 8 years before the petition date and which was underfunded. The debtor's chapter 9 plan provided that it would not affect the pension plan participants' rights against the retirement plan but that any claims against the debtor arising out of the administration of the retirement plan would be discharged. After confirmation and the discharge, plan participants filed a petition in state court against the debtor, its officers and the retirement plan administrator alleging violation of state statutory and constitutional law in administering the plan, seeking a writ of mandamus requiring the debtor to fund the retirement plan. The debtor removed the action to the bankruptcy court. An action may be removed to the bankruptcy court only if the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over it. A bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a proceeding that arises under title 11 (depends on a substantive right that title 11 grants), arises in a case under title 11 (is unique to the bankruptcy process) or is related to a case under title 11. After confirmation, a proceeding is related to a case under title 11 only if the proceeding has a close nexus to the plan. A bankruptcy court's jurisdiction, even in a removed action, is determined by the facts alleged in the complaint, not by defenses that may be asserted. The petition here did not seek recovery on a right granted by title 11 nor relate to anything that was unique to the bankruptcy process. It did not have a close nexus to the plan. Only the debtor's potential chapter 9 discharge defense could meet those requirements, and those defenses were not apparent on the face of the petition. As such, the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction over the removed action. The state court is fully capable of considering the debtor's discharge affirmative defense, and while a bankruptcy court may interpret its own orders, it may not dictate to another court in which an action is brought the preclusive effects of the bankruptcy court's orders. In a cautionary note, however, the court warns, "If ... the state court misinterprets the plan, the confirmation order or any of the bankruptcy court's other orders, [the debtor] might be able to seek relief from the bankruptcy court, provided the state court's ruling implicates substantive bankruptcy rights law issues or impacts [the debtor] or its plan." Kirton v. Valley Health Sys. (In re Valley Health Sys.), 471 B.R. 555 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

11.1.xxx For venue purposes, "residence" applies only to an individual. The debtor's principal place of business is in Boston, though it has an office in New York City. The parent holding company leased space in New York City but subleased the entire space, at a loss, to an unaffiliated sublessee. The debtor reached agreement with its creditors for a prepackaged chapter 11 plan. The plan provided for conversion of secured debt to equity and not to impair any classes of unsecured claims. The agreement required the case to be filed in New York. All voting creditors accepted the plan. The debtor and its affiliates filed the cases in the Southern District of New York, and the court set a hearing on confirmation about 32 days after the petition date. Eight days after the petition date, the U.S. trustee filed an objection to venue and a motion to transfer the cases. Section 1408 places venue for a case in the district where the debtor has its “domicile, residence, principal place of business . . . , or principal assets” for the greater portion of the preceding 180 days. Case law interpreting section 1406 requires a court to dismiss or transfer to a proper venue a title 11 case that lays venue in the wrong district or division. Unlike section 1412, which permits transfer of venue “in the interest of justice or for the convenience of the parties”, section 1406 is mandatory. Section 1408 authorizes corporate venue in the debtor’s principal place of business or principal assets. Treating the location of any place of business or assets as a “residence” would devour the principal place of business or principal assets test for a corporate debtor. Therefore, the “residence” venue test applies only to individual debtors, and the court must transfer the case. However, section 1406 does not require immediate transfer, nor is improper venue jurisdictional. Because all impaired creditors supported the plan and New York venue, the court delays enforcement of its order until the earlier of the effective date of the plan, which the court confirmed on the same day as it heard oral argument on the venue motion, or 21 days after its order. In re Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Co., 474 B.R. 122 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

11.1.yyy Potential defendant has standing to object to a trustee’s assignment of a claim against him. The trustee attempted to assign to a creditor claims the estate had against the corporate principal arising out of the debtor’s failure. The claims were insured in part by directors’ and officers’ insurance, and some of the claims might be nondischargeable in the principal’s own bankruptcy case. The principal objected. Only a person with a pecuniary interest in the outcome has standing to object in a bankruptcy proceeding. Because the claims might not be fully insured and might not be subject to the principal’s discharge, the principal has standing to object to the trustee’s assignment of the claim. The court does not address why a potential defendant has standing to object to who sues him. In re Knight-Celotex, LLC, 695 F.3d 714 (7th Cir. 2012).

11.1.zzz Bankruptcy court may enjoin extraterritorial automatic stay violation. The trustee sued a Cayman fund to recover a preference and a fraudulent transfer. The fund appeared and obtained an extension of time to respond to the complaint. On the same day that the fund answered, it brought an action against the trustee in the Cayman court for a declaration that it was not liable to the trustee. The automatic stay prohibits any action to obtain or exercise control over property of the estate. Property of the estate includes the debtor’s property, “wherever located”. The bankruptcy court has in rem jurisdiction over all estate property, regardless of its location. The automatic stay applies “to all entities”, to protect the debtor’s property and the court’s jurisdiction. Still, the bankruptcy court’s ability to enforce the automatic stay against an entity depends on the court’s in personam jurisdiction over the entity. Here, the defendant had appeared in the bankruptcy court, so the court had jurisdiction over it. It therefore could enjoin the defendant’s action, wherever it occurred, to recover property of the estate, wherever located. Picard v. Maxam Absolute Return Fund, L.P. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 474 B.R. 76 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

11.1.aaaa Court has subject matter jurisdiction to grant third party release in plan, even after confirmation. The debtor’s bond indenture trustee re-perfected a lapsed security interest within 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor in possession sued to avoid the re-perfection as a preference. The debtor in possession and the indenture trustee settled the litigation by allowance of the bonds as a secured claim in a substantially reduced amount. The settlement provided for the indenture trustee’s release of its contractual indemnification claims against the debtor and for a third party release of the bondholders' claims against the indenture trustee. However, the settlement was contingent upon confirmation of a plan that incorporated its terms. The court approved the settlement and later approved a disclosure statement that did not clearly describe the third party release. The bondholders overwhelmingly accepted the plan, but one bondholder objected to confirmation based on the third party release. To permit confirmation, all parties stipulated to address the third party release objection after confirmation, as a stand-alone issue, that would rise or fall independently of confirmation, and to allow confirmation to proceed. A bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over core proceedings (arising under title 11 or arising in the case) and over non-core proceedings (related to the case). A proceeding is related to a case if its outcome could have any conceivable effect on the estate. A creditor's contractual indemnification claim can make the proceeding on a nondebtor's claim against the creditor related to the case, so the court has jurisdiction to grant a third party release of a contractually indemnified claim. However, after confirmation, the claim will not have an effect on the estate. But once a court acquires jurisdiction, it may retain it even if later events eliminate the basis for jurisdiction. Here, the court exercises its discretion to retain jurisdiction because the parties agreed to defer litigation until after confirmation. In re Lower Bucks Hosp., 471 B.R. 419 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2012).

11.1.bbbb Bankruptcy judge may constitutionally enjoin litigation to protect the estate. The bankruptcy court preliminarily enjoined asbestos claimants from pursuing certain claims against the debtor's parent corporation and related insurance policies and proceeds that were allocated to fund the debtor's chapter 11 plan. A claimant asserted a claim against the parent based on an independent legal right against the parent. The parent was entitled to coverage from the insurance policies for defending the action and for any liability, so that the pursuit of the action would deplete the assets available to fund the plan. Under Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011), a bankruptcy judge does not have authority to issue a final order against a non-estate party in a traditional common law action. Stern's holding was narrow. Whatever its contours, it does not prevent a bankruptcy judge from enjoining litigation to protect a bankruptcy estate during a bankruptcy case. Therefore, the bankruptcy judge's injunction against the claimant did not exceed its constitutional authority. Quigley Co., Inc. v. Law Offices of Peter G. Angelos (In re Quigley Co., Inc.), 676 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2012).

11.1.cccc Bankruptcy court jurisdiction depends on whether the proceeding affects the estate, not on whether it is derivative. The bankruptcy court preliminarily enjoined asbestos claimants from pursuing certain claims against the debtor's non-debtor parent corporation and against related insurance policies and proceeds that were allocated to fund the debtor's chapter 11 plan. A claimant asserted a claim against the parent based on an independent legal right against the parent. The parent was entitled to coverage from the insurance policies for defending the action and for any liability, so that the pursuit of the action would deplete the assets available to fund the plan. Section 1334(b) confers bankruptcy jurisdiction over a proceeding that directly affects property of the estate. A proceeding involving liability that is derivative of the debtor's liability or that relates in some way to the debtor's conduct or legal rights may affect property of the estate, while a proceeding that asserts a legal claim against a third party that is independent of any of the debtor's rights does not. Bankruptcy jurisdiction does not require both that the proceeding directly affect the estate and that it be derivative. The latter is just a means to determine the effect on the estate, but it is the effect on the estate that determines jurisdiction. Thus, even a non-derivative proceeding that has a direct effect on the estate is subject to bankruptcy jurisdiction. Because the proceeding would deplete assets available to fund the plan, section 1334(b) provides jurisdiction to enjoin the action. Quigley Co., Inc. v. Law Offices of Peter G. Angelos (In re Quigley Co., Inc.), 676 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2012).

11.1.dddd Bankruptcy court has discretion to require arbitration of claims. Before bankruptcy, the debtor entered into a settlement agreement with its general liability insurer relating to asbestos claims. The debtor warranted that it had not assigned and would not assign any claims against the insurer and that it would not assist others in pursuing claims against the insurer. The agreement required arbitration of disputes. As its asbestos woes mounted, the debtor began negotiations with its other insurers and with asbestos claimants over a possible bankruptcy plan, which would provide for assigning contribution claims that other insurers might have against the settling insurer to the debtor, who would assign them under a plan to an asbestos trust under section 524(g). The debtor then filed a chapter 11 case and negotiated a plan consistent with the prepetition discussions. The insurer filed a proof of claim for breach of the settlement agreement, alleging that the negotiations for the debtor's receipt of claims against the insurer and their assignment to the asbestos trust violated the settlement agreement's anti-assignment provision. The Federal Arbitration Act requires a federal court to enforce an arbitration clause unless another statute provides otherwise. Although the Code does not expressly override the Arbitration Act, enforcement of an arbitration clause can interfere with the conduct of a bankruptcy case. Where it does, a bankruptcy court has discretion not to order arbitration, but only if it would conflict with the Code's underlying purpose. Arbitration of a non-core proceeding generally will not interfere with the bankruptcy case's conduct. Arbitration of a core proceeding presents a greater danger, as the core proceeding may be more central to the case's progress. The Code's purposes include the centralization of disputes and preventing piecemeal litigation, the more so in an asbestos case that attempts to use section 524(g) to address numerous asbestos claims. Here, the claim challenged the debtor's efforts to seek bankruptcy relief and confirm a plan using section 524(g). Therefore, the bankruptcy court properly denied arbitration. Continental Ins. Co. v. Thorpe Insulation Co. (In re Thorpe Insulation Co.), 671 F.3d 1011 (9th Cir. 2012).

11.1.eeee Bankruptcy court may not determine fraudulent transfer action but may propose findings and conclusions. The reorganized debtor sued defendants who had not filed proofs of claim to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers. Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011), held it unconstitutional for a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine, as a core proceeding, a state-law counterclaim that the court did not need to resolve to rule on a proof of claim's allowability. Although the Court emphasized the holding's narrowness, the Court based its decision largely on Granfinanciera S.A. v. Nordberg, 492 U.S. 33 (1989), which ruled that a fraudulent transfer defendant had a Seventh Amendment jury trial right because a fraudulent transfer action implicated private rights that could constitutionally be resolved only by an exercise of the judicial power. Therefore, Stern applies to a fraudulent transfer action against a defendant who did not file a proof of claim. Section 157(c) expressly authorizes a bankruptcy judge to hear a noncore proceeding and propose findings of fact and conclusions of law to the district court for decision but does not prohibit a bankruptcy judge from doing so in a proceeding that the statute designates as core. Sections 157(a) and (b) give the district court broad discretion to allocate judicial proceedings between the district court and the bankruptcy judges. Therefore, the bankruptcy judge may hear and propose findings and conclusions in a fraudulent transfer action, and the district court so orders. Finally, the district court may withdraw the reference based on efficiency, delay, costs and uniformity of bankruptcy administration. Allowing the bankruptcy judge to hear the action and propose findings and conclusions promotes efficiency and reduces delay and costs because of the bankruptcy judge's familiarity with the underlying facts and legal issues and promotes uniform administration because of the bankruptcy judge's prior handling of similar matters in the case. Heller Ehrmann LLP v. Arnold & Porter, LLP (In re Heller Ehrmann LLP), 464 B.R. 348 (N.D. Cal. 2011).

11.1.ffff Proceeding for equitable subordination is a constitutionally core proceeding. The chapter 7 trustee brought an action to subordinate a claim on equitable grounds under section 510(c). The bankruptcy judge has authority to issue a final decision on a proceeding only if the proceeding is both statutorily and constitutionally a core proceeding. Section 157(b) defines core proceeding as one arising under title 11 or arising under a case under title 11. Section 157(b)(2) lists examples of core proceedings. Sections 157(b)(2)(B) and (O) list proceedings for "allowance or disallowance of claims against the estate" or "affecting ... the adjustment of the debtor-creditor ...

relationship” as core proceedings. An equitable subordination proceeding does not seek allowance or disallowance, only priority, and it involves the adjustment of the creditor-creditor, not the debtor-creditor, relationship. However, a proceeding that is not listed in section 157(b)(2) is core if it invokes a substantive right that title 11 provides or, by its nature, could arise only in a bankruptcy case. An equitable subordination claim invokes a right that section 510(c) provides and can arise only in a bankruptcy case. Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011), prohibits a bankruptcy judge from determining a core proceeding if doing so requires an exercise of the judicial power of the United States. Despite broad language in parts of the opinion (which the bankruptcy court here catalogs), the Supreme Court’s ultimate conclusion was that Congress had violated Article III “in one isolated respect” and its decision did “not change all that much” or meaningfully change the division of labor in the statute. Therefore, Stern must be read narrowly. An equitable subordination claim does not invoke a state law claim and therefore does not implicate Stern, narrowly read. It implicates only the Bankruptcy Code, so the bankruptcy judge may constitutionally determine the claim. Burtch v. Huston (In re USDigital, Inc.), 461 B.R. 276 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

11.1.gggg A foreign representative’s claims to recover pre-foreign proceeding transfers under common law theories are not core proceedings. Foreign representatives sued foreign defendants in state court to recover transfers of property that the foreign debtor had made before its liquidation proceeding commenced under common law theories of mistake, money had and received and unjust enrichment and under the foreign avoiding power statutes. After the bankruptcy court granted recognition, the foreign representatives removed the state court cases to the bankruptcy court. On timely motion of a party in interest, the bankruptcy court must abstain from a noncore proceeding based on a state law claim over which federal jurisdiction exists only in bankruptcy if the action is commenced and can be timely adjudicated in the state court. A core proceeding is one that arises under title 11 or arises in a case under title 11, which the court must determine based on the proceeding’s form and substance. A proceeding arises under title 11 if the Code creates the substantive right. Chapter 15’s authorization of the foreign representative’s action, without more, is insufficient to meet that standard. A proceeding arises in a title 11 case if there is a statutory basis for subject matter jurisdiction. Section 1521(a)(5) authorizes the bankruptcy court to entrust the administration or realization of the debtor’s assets within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States to the foreign representative; section 1521(a)(7) authorizes the court to grant additional relief available to a trustee, except for the Code’s avoiding powers. Section 1521(a)(5) contains a specific territorial limitation and so is not a basis for core jurisdiction over a proceeding to recover foreign assets or avoid foreign transfers. Chapter 15 cases are ancillary and assert jurisdiction only over assets within the United States, to assist the foreign court, not to become the principal case. Therefore, section 1521(a)(7)’s catch-all provision allowing additional relief does not authorize a foreign representative to pursue non-U.S. assets, especially under avoiding power-like claims, which are specifically excluded. A proceeding may also arise in a title 11 case if it would have no existence outside of bankruptcy. These common law claims that all arose before the foreign liquidation proceeding began do not meet that standard. Finally, the claims are traditional state law claims that do not implicate private rights and are beyond the bankruptcy court’s authority to hear and decide. Therefore, these proceedings do not arise under title 11 or arise in a case under title 11 and are not core proceedings. If the other grounds for abstention are met, the court must abstain. In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd., 455 B.R. 665 (S.D.N.Y. 2011).

11.1.hhhh Bankruptcy court has postconfirmation jurisdiction over subsequent transferee action under section 550 but not one under the UFTA. The plan established a litigation trust, which the plan vested with fraudulent transfer actions that the debtor in possession filed before confirmation. After the trustee got judgment in the actions, he filed subsequent transferee actions in the bankruptcy court against others, who were not defendants in the original actions, under section 550 and the comparable provision of the Texas UFTA. A bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction narrows after confirmation. It extends only to related proceedings that involve disputes that are integral to the plan, that involve preconfirmation activities and were asserted before confirmation or that are determined under bankruptcy law, but not related proceedings that involve postconfirmation relations between the parties or do not depend on the plan for resolution, whether or not the outcome may affect distribution to creditors. It also extends to core proceedings. A core proceeding is one that arises under title 11 or arises in a case under title 11. The action under section 550 arises under title 11 and is core because it invokes a right created by the Bankruptcy Code. The UFTA claim, however, does not invoke a Bankruptcy Code right or provision and therefore is not a core proceeding. It involves strangers to the bankruptcy case and facts beyond those proffered during the fraudulent transfer action and is therefore not a related proceeding. Section 1367 of title 28 grants the district courts supplemental jurisdiction (previously divided into “ancillary jurisdiction” and “pendent jurisdiction”). Supplemental jurisdiction includes jurisdiction to permit a single court to dispose of factually interdependent claims, whether or not involving additional parties or claims that might not otherwise be within the court’s subject matter jurisdiction, and jurisdiction to enforce a court’s order or judgment or to vindicate its authority. The UFTA subsequent transferee action here is a new, independent action that does not meet either of the tests for supplemental jurisdiction. Moreover, section 1367 grants jurisdiction only to the district courts, and supplemental jurisdiction is not within the district court’s power to refer under section 157 of title 28. Faulkner v. Eagle View Cap. Mgmt. (In re The Heritage Org. L.L.C.), 454 B.R. 353 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2011).

- 11.1.iiii Bankruptcy court does not have postconfirmation jurisdiction to characterize partnership’s plan transaction for tax purposes. The debtor partnership confirmed a plan that restructured the partnership into a limited liability company and discharged a portion of the claims against the partnership property. The confirmation order (but not the plan) provided that the plan transactions “do not provide for ... and will not constitute, the liquidation of all or substantially all of the property of the Debtor’s Estate”. The state taxing agency later attempted to tax the general partners for capital gains, characterizing the restructuring as resulting in a taxable sale, rather than nontaxable cancellation of debt income. The bankruptcy court issued an order to show cause why the agency should not be held in contempt for attacking and refusing to comply with the confirmation order. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a matter arising under title 11 (based on a right that title 11 grants) or arising in a case under title 11 (a matter that would not exist outside a bankruptcy case). The dispute here does not implicate arising under or arising in jurisdiction, because it is not based on any provision of the Code and is not unique to the bankruptcy case. A bankruptcy court also has jurisdiction over a proceeding related to a title 11 case, but its postconfirmation related to jurisdiction is narrower than its preconfirmation jurisdiction. After confirmation, the dispute must have a close nexus to the bankruptcy case, which requires that the dispute’s resolution affects the reorganized debtor, the estate or the plan’s implementation. Here, the plan had been fully implemented and the bankruptcy case closed. The dispute’s resolution could affect only the partners’ tax liability, not the reorganized debtor, the estate or the plan’s implementation. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to resolve the dispute. In re Wilshire Courtyard, 459 B.R. 416 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).
- 11.1.jjjj Section 1334(e) ousts a state court receiver from possession of the debtor’s assets. The municipal debtor had issued revenue bonds, secured by a pledge of the net revenues of the debtor’s sewer system. The debtor defaulted in payments. The indenture trustee sought and obtained the appointment of a state court receiver, as provided in the indenture, to take possession of and operate the system, collect revenues, set rates and pay net revenues to the indenture trustee for distribution to bondholders. Upon the debtor’s filing its chapter 9 case, the receiver moved for the bankruptcy court to abstain from taking any action to interfere with the receivership. Upon the filing of a petition, 28 U.S.C. § 1334(e) gives the bankruptcy court exclusive in rem jurisdiction over all property of the debtor as of the commencement of the case. Section 362’s automatic stay and the turnover provisions of sections 542 and 543 only protect the court's in rem jurisdiction. Their inapplicability (as in chapter 9) does not limit the scope of the court's exclusive jurisdiction over property. Therefore, property of the debtor is subject to the court's in rem jurisdiction whether or not the turnover provisions apply. Under Butner v. U.S., 440 U.S. 48 (1979), state law determines whether property is property of the debtor. Under Alabama law, a receivership order and the appointment of a receiver does not affect title to the receivership property. The property is in the custody of the receivership court, and the receiver takes possession only as an officer of the appointing court, not for the creditors seeking the appointment. The bankruptcy court's exclusive jurisdiction places the property in the custody of the bankruptcy court, ousting the receivership court of control and the receiver (who is an officer of the receivership court) of possession. Neither section 542 (turnover) nor 543 (prepetition custodian) defines what is property of the debtor, and neither is needed to oust the receiver of possession. Section 1334(e) accomplishes that result as a matter of statute. The result makes the race to the courthouse irrelevant: the bankruptcy court's exclusive in rem jurisdiction is always paramount. In re Jefferson County, Ala., 474 B.R. 243 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 2012).

11.1.kkkk The section 1409(b) exception to home court venue does not apply to a preference action. The trustee sued the defendant to avoid an $11,215 payment as a preference. Section 1409(a) of title 28 authorizes venue in the home court for "a proceeding arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11". Section 1409(b) denies home court venue for "a proceeding arising in or related to such case to recover a money judgment ... against a noninsider of less than the $11,725". A preference action is a proceeding arising under title 11, which is covered by the plain language of section 1409(a) but is not covered by the plain language of the exception in section 1409(b). In addition, section 104(a) adjusted the dollar amount in section 1409(b) to $11,725 from $10,950 between the commencement of the case and the commencement of the adversary proceeding. Section 104(c) provides that adjustment in dollar amounts made under section 104(a) "shall not apply with respect to cases commenced before the date of such adjustments". Therefore, the adjustment does not apply to the adversary proceeding, which is a subaction within the case. The trustee may proceed in the home court. Straffi v. Gilco World Wide Markets (In re Bamboo Abbott, Inc.), 458 B.R. 701 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2011); see also Schwab v. Peddinghaus Corp. (In re Excel Storage Prods., L.P.), 458 B.R. 175 (Bankr. M.D. Pa. 2011).

11.1.llll Bankruptcy court may constitutionally approve a settlement of claims that it may not hear and determine. The debtor in possession proposed a settlement under Rule 9019 of claims against third parties. Under Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011), the bankruptcy court may not hear and determine and issue final judgment in a matter if doing so would require exercise of the judicial power of the United States, which is reserved to courts created under Article III of the Constitution. Determining a claim that seeks to augment the estate rather than adjust creditor rights is an exercise of judicial power. A bankruptcy court may hear and determine and issue final judgment on a claim if it derives from the bankruptcy itself or would necessarily be resolved in the claims allowance process or if there is a well established historical practice permitting it. Rule 9019, which requires bankruptcy court approval of a settlement, is derived from section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, enacted in 1898. A court need not have authority to issue judgment on a claim to determine whether its fiduciary (the debtor in possession or trustee) may settle it. Finally, approving the settlement here determines what constitutes property of the estate, which is clearly within the bankruptcy court's core authority. Therefore, the court may rule on approval of the settlement. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 461 B.R. 200 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

11.1.mmmm Stern v. Marshall* does not prevent a bankruptcy judge from hearing and determining a fraudulent transfer action. The debtor in possession brought fraudulent transfer actions against defendants who had not filed proofs of claim in the case. The defendants moved to withdraw the reference. Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011), held that a bankruptcy judge may not constitutionally hear and determine an estate's tort counterclaim against a creditor who filed a proof of claim in the case, despite section 157(b)(2)(C)'s designation of such a proceeding as "core" and its grant of authority to the bankruptcy court to hear and determine the counterclaim. Although Stern's reasoning was broad, it said only, "Congress, in one isolated respect, exceeded Article III". Therefore, Stern's statement that Granfinanciera, SA v. Nordberg, 492 U.S. 33 (1989), concluded that "Congress could not constitutionally assign resolution of [a] fraudulent conveyance action to a non-Article III court" was dictum that did not expand Stern's holding to fraudulent transfer actions. Whether a matter is core depends on whether it stems from the bankruptcy itself. A fraudulent transfer action stems from a bankruptcy, as it has no life outside of the insolvency context, which generally results in bankruptcy. Section 157(b)(2)(H) designates a fraudulent transfer action as a core proceeding and authorizes the bankruptcy judge to hear and determine it. Therefore, the bankruptcy judge may hear and determine the proceeding. If a proceeding is unconstitutionally designated as core, it may be treated as a related proceeding to which section 157(c) applies, because the absence of statutory authorization for a bankruptcy judge to make proposed findings and conclusions in a core matter that it may not constitutionally hear and determine does not prohibit the judge from doing so. The district court may determine the constitutional issue on appeal or review after the bankruptcy judge issues a final judgment in the proceeding. Therefore, the bankruptcy judge recommends that the district court deny the motion to withdraw the reference and provides that any final determination that is beyond constitutional competence must be treated as proposed findings and conclusions. Heller Ehrman LLP v. Arnold & Porter, LLP (In re Heller Ehrman LLP), 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 3777 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. Sept. 28, 2011).

11.1.nnnn Bankruptcy court may not issue final judgment in fraudulent transfer action. The trustee sued to recover a fraudulent transfer from a defendant who had not filed a proof of claim and who did not consent to the bankruptcy court's exercise of authority to hear and determine the proceeding and issue a final judgment. Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., 59 U.S. 272 (1856), concluded that the Fifth Amendment Due Process clause requires judicial process for matters that were the stuff of the courts at Westminster in 1789 and that Article III requires a judge enjoying the protections of Article III of the Constitution to conduct any such required judicial process. Congress may assign matters that do not require judicial action, such as selling property or otherwise administering property of the estate, granting relief from the automatic stay and resolving claims against the estate, to a non-judicial officer. But a proceeding that seeks the government's assistance in depriving a person involuntarily of property must be a judicial proceeding in a court established under Article III, unless the parties consent to the determination by a non-Article III judge such as a bankruptcy judge. In such a proceeding, the bankruptcy judge may hear the evidence and legal argument and make a report and recommendation to the district court, including a recommendation that the district court not re-hear the evidence. The district court may then determine how to proceed. The court cautions, however, focusing again on Murray's Lessee, that there may be matters arising in bankruptcy cases that are not susceptible to judicial cognizance and therefore that may not be heard by an Article III court or its adjunct, but leaves exploration of the scope of that issue for another day. Teleservices Group, Inc. v. Huntington Nat'l Bank, 456 B.R. 318 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2011).

11.1.0000 State court replevin action against the debtor and his non-debtor company are not core proceedings. The bank filed a replevin action in state court against the debtor and his company to enforce a security interest in the company's assets. The security interest secured a loan to the company that the debtor had guaranteed. Before the state court heard the bank's replevin motion, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case for himself, but not his company, and removed the action to the bankruptcy court. The bankruptcy court must abstain from hearing a proceeding that is not a core proceeding if federal jurisdiction lies only under section 1334, a party timely seeks abstention and the action is commenced and can be timely adjudicated in a state court. A core proceeding is one that arises under title 11 or arises in a case under title 11, that is, a proceeding that involves a right created by the Bankruptcy Code or can arise only in a bankruptcy case. The replevin actions do not arise under title 11, because they are based on state law claims, and they can and did arise outside of the bankruptcy case. Section 157(b)(2)(O) of title 28 includes a proceeding “affecting ... the adjustment of the debtor-creditor ... relationship” as core, but such a proceeding is core only if it arises under title 11 or in the case. The replevin actions—both the one against the company and the one against the debtor—are not core proceedings, even though the bank’s success in the actions against the company could prevent a successful reorganization in the individual’s case and thereby affect the adjustment of the debtor-creditor relationship. If the other elements for mandatory abstention are met, the bankruptcy court must remand the actions to the state court. The automatic stay applies to the action against the debtor but not to the action against the company. Schmidt v. Klein Bank (In re Schmidt), 453 B.R. 346 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

11.1.pppp Bankruptcy court lacks authority to hear and make proposed finding and conclusions in fraudulent transfer action against non-creditor. The trustee brought a fraudulent transfer action against a defendant who had not filed a proof of claim. Under Stern v. Marshall, the action is a core proceeding, which section 157(b)(2)(H) authorizes a bankruptcy court to hear and determine, but a bankruptcy court may not constitutionally determine the action. Section 157(c) authorizes a bankruptcy court to hear and propose findings and conclusions in a related proceeding, but not in a core proceeding. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have any authority to hear the action. The court gives the parties 14 days to seek a withdrawal of the reference, or the action will be dismissed. Samson v. Blixseth (In re Blixseth), 2011 Bankr. LEXIS 2953 (Bankr. D. Mont. Aug. 1, 2011).

11.1.qqqq Bankruptcy court must give full faith and credit to a state court judgment interpreting a bankruptcy sale order. The debtor operated a golf course on land that was subject to a restrictive covenant that required it to be operated as a golf course. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession sold the land free and clear of all encumbrances and interests of any kind. The buyer operated the golf course for a while, but then began changing the property’s use. Homeowners sued in state court to enforce the restrictive covenant, which determined that the sale order did not extinguish the covenant. The buyer reopened the bankruptcy case to enforce the sale order. A federal court must give full faith and credit to a state court judgment under 28 U.S.C. § 1738. An exception exists where Congress has granted the federal court exclusive jurisdiction over the subject matter of the state court action. In that case, the state court judgment is void and subject to collateral attack. A bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction over property of the estate under 28 U.S.C. § 1334(e), which ceases when the property is no longer property of the estate. Its jurisdiction over the sale proceeding under 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b) is non-exclusive. Therefore, after the sale, the bankruptcy court had concurrent jurisdiction with the state court, whose judgment was therefore entitled to full faith and credit. Section 363(m), which prohibits an appeal from affecting the validity of a sale order to a good faith purchaser, does not expand the bankruptcy court’s exclusive jurisdiction. The proceeding here was not an appeal. Therefore, the state court judgment was effective and binding. Mid-City Bank v. Skyline Woods Homeowners Assoc (In re Skyline Woods Country Club), 636 F.3d 467 (8th Cir. 2011).

11.1.rrrr Section 1409(b)’s small claim venue limitation does not apply to a proceeding to recover a preference. The trustee sued an out-of-state defendant in the home court to avoid and recover a $7,800 preference. Section 1409(b) of title 28 permits a trustee in a title 11 case to “commence a proceeding arising in or related to such case to recover a money judgment ... less than $1,000 or ... a debt (excluding a consumer debt) against a non-insider of less than $11,725, only in the district court for the district in which the defendant resides.” “Arising in” and “related to” are well defined terms of art in bankruptcy jurisdictional jurisprudence. A proceeding arises in a bankruptcy case if it could not exist outside of a bankruptcy case but is not a cause of action created by the Code. A proceeding is related to a bankruptcy case if its outcome could conceivably have an effect on the estate. By contrast, a proceeding to recover on a cause of action created by the Code is on that “arises under title 11”. The preference action here arises under title 11 but does not arise in the case and is not related to the case. Therefore, section 1409(b)’s venue limitation does not apply to this proceeding. Redmond v. Gulf City Body & Trailer Works, Inc. (In re Sunbridge Cap., Inc.), 454 B.R. 166 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2011).

11.1.ssss Section 547(c)(9) provides a threshold, not a deductible. Within 90 days before bankruptcy, the creditor obtained a lien against the debtor’s property to secure a claim of $5,845.74. The trustee objected to the creditor’s claim on the ground that the creditor had obtained and not returned a preference. Section 547(c)(9) provides that the trustee may not avoid a transfer in a nonconsumer case if “the aggregate value of all property that constitutes or is affected by such transfer is less than $5,475.” Section 547(c)(9) provides a monetary threshold, not an exemption or deductible, because the paragraph does not contain the “to the extent that” language present in other preference exceptions. Therefore, the lien is entirely avoidable. Western States Glass Corp. of N. Calif. v. Barris (In re Bay Area Glass, Inc.), 454 B.R. 86 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

11.1.tttt Core jurisdiction defined, but is unconstitutional as applied to an estate’s counterclaim. The debtor’s husband had promised her a substantial trust account, but he never amended his will to reflect his intentions. After he died, his son and sole heir probated the will in Texas probate court. The debtor filed bankruptcy. The son filed a nondischargeability complaint against her, alleging defamation on account of her allegations about the son’s conduct in connection with the will, and a proof of claim. The debtor counterclaimed in the bankruptcy court for tortious interference with an expected gift from her late husband. The bankruptcy court granted her judgment on her counterclaim. The son appealed to the district court. In the meantime, the son sought and obtained a ruling from the Texas probate court that the will was valid and that the debtor was not entitled to any recovery. After the probate court ruled, the district court determined that the counterclaim was not a core proceeding, held a trial and entered judgment for the debtor. Section 157(b)(1) permits bankruptcy judges to “hear and determine ... all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11”. The “arising” phrases do not limit the scope of which core proceedings the bankruptcy judges may hear and determine; they describe what constitutes a core proceeding. Section 157(b)(2) provides a ready list of examples, but ultimately, a core proceeding is one that arises under title 11 or arises in a case under title 11. Section 157(b)(2)(C) defines core proceeding to include “counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate”. Thus, the statute authorizes the bankruptcy court to hear and determine such counterclaims. However, such authority violates Article III of the Constitution. Article III vests the judicial power in courts staffed by life tenured, salary protected judges. Non-Article III judges may hear and determine only matters that are public rights, including those arising between the government and others, matters arising under a specialized federal statute or under a federal regulatory scheme, and matters that are central to the adjustment of the debtor-creditor relationship, but not matters arising under state common law. Bankruptcy courts exercise the full power that Article III courts exercise to hear and determine matters within their jurisdiction. As such, they are not adjuncts of the district court in matters in which they may enter final orders, any more than the district courts are adjuncts of the courts of appeals. The scope of matters in which they exercise such power is not limited to public rights, specialized federal statutes or regulatory matters or matters central to the adjustment of the debtor-creditor relationship. When applied to an estate’s counterclaim based on state common law, such an exercise of power by a non-Article III judge violates Article III. The creditor’s filing of a proof of claim does not save the bankruptcy court’s power. The creditor does not truly consent to jurisdiction to resolve counterclaims whose determination are not essential to the court’s determination of the creditor’s claim (such as resolution of a section 502(d) claim objection), because the creditor has no choice but to file a claim if he wishes to share in the estate. Here, the tortious interference counterclaim arose in part out of the same facts underlying the defamation claim, but determining it was not necessary to determining the defamation nondischargeability claim. The counterclaim required rulings on the additional issues of whether Texas recognizes the tort claim and what its elements are, as well as proof of the additional facts to support the claim. Thus, the bankruptcy court's exercise of core jurisdiction to determine the tortious interference counterclaim went beyond what was necessary to determine the bankruptcy issues (claim allowance and dischargeability) and the adjustment of the debtor-creditor relationship and was therefore unconstitutional. Because the Texas probate court determined the tortious interference claim before the district court did, the Texas judgment bound the district court under the Full Faith and Credit Clause. Stern v. Marshall (In re Marshall), 564 U.S. ____, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011).

11.1.uuuu Section 157(b)(5) is not jurisdictional and may be waived. The debtor's husband had promised her a substantial trust account, but he never amended his will to reflect his intentions. After he died, his son and sole heir probated the will in Texas probate court. The debtor filed bankruptcy, and the son filed a nondischargeability complaint against her, alleging defamation on account of her allegations about the son's conduct in connection with the will, and a proof of claim. The debtor counterclaimed in the bankruptcy court for tortious interference with an expected gift from her late husband. The bankruptcy court granted her judgment on her counterclaim. The son appealed to the district court. In the meantime, the son sought and obtained a ruling from the Texas probate court that the will was valid and the debtor was not entitled to any recovery. After the probate court ruled, the district court determined that the counterclaim was not a core proceeding, held a trial and entered judgment for the debtor. Section 157(b)(1) permits bankruptcy judges to "hear and determine ... all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11". But section 157(b)(5) requires the district court to order that "a personal injury tort or wrongful death claim be tried in the district court". The courts should not interpret a statute as jurisdictional unless Congress so indicates. Section 157(b)(5) does not speak in jurisdictional terms but addresses only where the matter may be tried. The statutory context suggests the provision is not jurisdictional, because it appears in the section that allocates the authority to enter a final judgment between the district court and the bankruptcy court. Therefore, section 157(b)(5) is not jurisdictional, and the parties may consent to trial and issuance of a final judgment by the bankruptcy court. Here, the counterclaim defendant consented to trial in the bankruptcy court and objected only years later, after the bankruptcy court had ruled against him. Accordingly, he waived the right to a trial before the district court. Stern v. Marshall (In re Marshall), 564 U.S. ____, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011).

11.1.vvvv Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over postconfirmation action for breach of prepetition contract. During the chapter 11 case, an employee of the debtor joined a competitor in breach of the employee's non-compete agreement. After confirmation, the reorganized debtor sued the employee in the bankruptcy court to enjoin the employee from competing. The plan included a general provision granting the bankruptcy court post-confirmation jurisdiction to determine proceedings pending on the plan's effective date. Confirmation narrows the bankruptcy court's subject matter jurisdiction, even if the plan provides for retention of jurisdiction. Postconfirmation jurisdiction requires both a plan postconfirmation jurisdiction provision and the proceeding's close nexus to the plan or its interpretation or implementation. The claim against the former employee did not have a close nexus to the plan's implementation or interpretation, because it was for the sole benefit of the reorganized debtor. Additionally, the plan's jurisdiction retention provision by its terms was too narrow to encompass this proceeding. Therefore, the court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to hear the complaint. In re Park Ave. Radiologists, P.C., 450 B.R. 461 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

11.1.wwww Estate's debtor's debtor is not a party in interest in proceeding to approve settlement between estate and its debtor. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor dismissed its CEO and forgave a large loan that the CEO's employment contract required the debtor to forgive if it dismissed him other than for cause. After plan confirmation, the liquidating trustee sued the former CEO to avoid the forgiveness as a fraudulent transfer. The trustee and the CEO settled, with bankruptcy court approval on notice to creditors. The CEO paid the trustee cash and agreed to pay a portion of the proceeds of an action against his former law firm in state court for malpractice in handling the dismissal and forgiveness transaction. In defense of the malpractice claim, the firm challenged the validity of provisions in the CEO's settlement agreement with the trustee. The CEO asked the bankruptcy court to enjoin the law firm from raising settlement agreement validity as a defense. Section 1109 permits a party in interest to raise and appear and be heard on any issue in a chapter 11 case. Courts must determine the meaning of "party in interest" on an ad hoc basis, based on whether the party has a financial stake, or in limited circumstances, a legal stake, in the outcome of the particular proceeding. In determining whether a particular party is a party in interest, the court must take into account the purposes of chapter 11 to foster reorganization and to give creditors and equity security holders a say in the proceedings. Here, the law firm was not a creditor and had no stake in the outcome of the proceeding to approve the settlement. It had too remote a stake in the proceedings to have standing to object to the court's approval of the settlement between the trustee and the former CEO. Therefore, it was not bound by the approval or the settlement, and it may challenge its validity in defending the malpractice action. Savage & Assoc., P.C. v. K&L Gates LLP (In re Teligent, Inc.), 640 F.3d 53 (2d Cir. 2011).

11.1.xxxx Bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over action related to an ancillary case. A foreign representative obtained recognition of a foreign proceeding under former section 304. He then commenced an action in state court against the debtor's accountants and others based on state law claims. The defendants removed the action to the federal district court. A district court has jurisdiction over an action that is "related to a case under title 11". Under section 301, a petition filed under section 304 commences a "case ancillary to a foreign proceeding". (The title of chapter 15 and references in the Bankruptcy Code to chapter 15 similarly use "case".) An action is related to a case if "the outcome might have any 'conceivable effect' on the bankrupt estate". The estate in the foreign proceeding is an "estate" for these purposes. Therefore, the court has jurisdiction over the removed action. Parmalat Cap. Fin. Ltd. v. Cap. & Fin. Asset Mgmt S.A., 632 F.3d 71 (2d Cir.), amended, 639 F.3d 572 (2d Cir. 2011).

11.1.yyyy Removal should be to district court, not bankruptcy court; referral is not automatic. The confirmed chapter 11 plan provided for the transfer to a liquidating trust of claims the estate had against the debtor's management for both prepetition and postpetition misconduct. The trustee brought the action in state court; the defendants removed to the district court. 28 U.S.C. § 157(a) permits the district court to refer bankruptcy proceedings over which they have jurisdiction to the bankruptcy courts, and the district court here had issued a standing reference order. However, 28 U.S.C. § 1452(a) authorizes removal to a district court. Because that section replaced a prior provision for direct removal to the bankruptcy court as part of an effort to restrict bankruptcy court jurisdiction for constitutional reasons, it should be construed strictly. Therefore, despite the standing reference order for cases and proceedings filed directly in the bankruptcy court and Bankruptcy Rule 9027(a)(1)'s providing for filing notice of removal with the bankruptcy clerk, the district court must, before referring the action, determine its jurisdiction over an action removed to the district court. So the action should be removed to the district court. McKinstry v. Sergeant, 442 B.R. 567 (E.D. Ky. 2011).

11.1.zzzz Bankruptcy court has core jurisdiction to hear state WARN Act claim. The state department of labor filed a proof of claim for amounts owing under the state's WARN Act. The labor department had not yet commenced an administrative proceeding against the debtor for the WARN Act claim, which the department argued would be subject to the police power exception to the automatic stay. The debtor in possession objected to the claim on the ground, among others, that the WARN Act did not apply because of a "liquidating fiduciary" exception. State courts had not yet determined whether that exception applied under the state's WARN Act. A bankruptcy court has authority to hear and determine core proceedings, which include proceedings for the allowance or disallowance of claims. The possibility that a state administrative proceeding to determine the claim amount might be subject to the police power exception to the automatic stay does not divest the bankruptcy court of core jurisdiction. Therefore, the court may hear the claim objection. In re Saint Vincent's Catholic Med. Centers of N. Y., 445 B.R. 264 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

11.1.aaaaa Court has postconfirmation jurisdiction to hear liquidating trust's actions. The confirmed chapter 11 plan provided for the transfer to a liquidating trust of claims the estate had against the debtor's management for both prepetition and postpetition misconduct. The trustee brought the action in state court; the defendants removed to the district court. Section 1334(b) grants bankruptcy courts jurisdiction over a proceeding that arises under title 11 or arises in or is related to a case under title 11. "Related to" is a broad basis for jurisdiction. These claim fit, because the trustee's claims by their nature maintain a connection to the bankruptcy, the result will affect creditor recoveries and the claims involve conduct during the bankruptcy. The narrower postconfirmation "close nexus" jurisdictional rule, authorizing related to jurisdiction only to interpret, implement, consummate, execute or administer a confirmed plan, should be viewed only as a prudential rule, not jurisdictional, because the statute does not distinguish between pre- and post-confirmation jurisdiction. Any such distinction makes little sense where the plaintiff is essentially a continuation of the estate and does not involve a reorganized debtor's postconfirmation operations or business. Moreover, the close nexus test triggers should not be exclusive, or else the bankruptcy court's post-confirmation core jurisdiction would be similarly limited, which it is not. Here, the trustee's claims at least relate to the bankruptcy case, because they involve prepetition and postpetition conduct, the trustee asserts them on behalf of unsecured creditors, the plan specifically assigned them to the trust, and they involve implementation and execution of the confirmed plan. McKinstry v. Sergent, 442 B.R. 567 (E.D. Ky. Jan. 12, 2011).

11.1.bbbbb Bankruptcy court has postconfirmation jurisdiction to characterize plan transaction for tax purposes. The debtor partnership confirmed a plan that restructured the partnership into a limited liability company, discharged a portion of the claims against the partnership property and provided that the plan transactions "do not provide for ... and will not constitute, the liquidation of all or substantially all of the property of the Debtor's Estate". The state taxing agency later attempted to tax the partners for capital gains, characterizing the restructuring as resulting in a taxable sale, rather than non-taxable cancellation of debt income. The bankruptcy court issued an order to show cause why the agency should not be held in contempt for attacking and refusing to comply with the confirmation order. Although the bankruptcy court's post-confirmation jurisdiction is more limited than its pre-confirmation jurisdiction, it has post-confirmation jurisdiction to interpret, implement, consummate, execute or administer a confirmed plan. The court has jurisdiction over the dispute here because it involved interpretation of the plan. In re Wilshire Courtyard, 437 B.R. 380 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2010).

11.1.ccccc Bankruptcy court has core jurisdiction over malpractice claim against an estate professional. The chapter 11 debtor in possession sued counsel for the estate in state court. Counsel removed the action to the bankruptcy court. The debtor in possession moved to remand or for abstention. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a proceeding that arises under title 11 or that arises in or is related to a case under title 11. A proceeding arises in a case under title 11 if it would have no existence outside of the case or if it is an essential part of administering the case. The services performed for a bankruptcy estate cannot stand alone and are part of the estate's administration. Therefore, an action challenging those services arise in the case, and the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over the proceeding as a core proceeding. Remand for lack of jurisdiction is not required, and remand is discretionary and is not reviewable on appeal. Baker v. Simpson, 613 F.3d 346 (2d Cir. 2010).

11.1.ddddd Bankruptcy court does not have postconfirmation jurisdiction to hear a claim for breach of real estate sale contract entered into during the case. The chapter 11 debtor co-owned property with a nondebtor. They contracted during the debtor's chapter 11 case to sell the property and gave the buyer a right of first refusal to an adjacent parcel. Closing of the sale was delayed until after confirmation of the debtor's plan. The plan referenced the sale and expressed the debtor's intention to sell the adjacent parcel either to the buyer or to a third party. Several years later, the debtor and his co-owner contracted to sell the adjacent parcel to a third party. Ultimately, the bankruptcy court approved the sale on notice to the first buyer, finding that the sale to the third party did not violate the buyer's right of first refusal. The debtor used the sale proceeds to pay all creditors in the chapter 11 case, and the court issued a final decree and closed the case. The original buyer then sued the debtor, his co-owner and the third party in state court for breach of the original sale contract and for specific performance of the right of first refusal. The state court "remanded" the case to the bankruptcy court. A bankruptcy court's jurisdiction is limited by statute to cases under title 11 and to proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11. A proceeding arises under title 11 only if it invokes a substantive right that title 11 provides. A proceeding arises in a case under title 11 only if it unique to the bankruptcy process and has no independent existence outside of bankruptcy. Here, the action was for breach of a state law-governed contract to sell real property and did not arise under title 11 or in the case. A post-confirmation proceeding is related to a case under title 11 if there is a close nexus to the plan. The state court action here lacked a close nexus because the bankruptcy court, like any other court, is not entitled to determine the preclusive effect of its own orders. That rests with the court where the order is tested. Finally, ancillary jurisdiction enables a court to vindicate its authority and effectuate its decrees. However, ancillary jurisdiction does not extend to disputes over breach of an agreement that produced a dismissal of a prior action. Thus, the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to hear a breach of contract claim based on facts that came to light after the closing of the case, and nothing about the bankruptcy case precluded the state court from taking jurisdiction. Battle Ground Plaza, LLC v. Ray (In re Ray), 624 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2010).

11.1.eeeee Postconfirmation jurisdiction is broader under a liquidating plan. Before bankruptcy, the debtor purchased excess workers compensation insurance for itself and its subsidiaries that were self-insured under applicable state insurance law and basic workers compensation insurance for subsidiaries that were ineligible to be self-insured. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession assumed the insurance contracts and entered into new, similar contracts. The chapter 11 plan provided for the sale of all the debtor's assets and for the reorganized debtor simply to address claims and make distributions. After confirmation, the state workers compensation agency and insurance fund claimed that the debtor in possession had been self-insured during the case and asserted an administrative expense claim for postpetition workers compensation claims that it had paid. It also asserted that the insurer had provided coverage. The insurer commenced an adversary proceeding against the reorganized debtor and the state agency and fund seeking a declaration that it was not liable to the state under the policies. Confirmation shrinks the scope of the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction. The court retains jurisdiction only over matters that have a close nexus to the plan or the case, such as a matter affecting interpretation, implementation, consummation, execution or administration of the plan. However, where the reorganized debtor's sole purpose is to wind up its affairs, convert its assets to cash and distribute the cash to creditors, postconfirmation jurisdiction is broader because jurisdiction relates to core bankruptcy functions and does not require supervision of a reorganized business. The court here has jurisdiction over the adversary proceeding because it seeks determination of the estate's liability in connection with insurance policies that the estate purchased. Ace Am. Ins. Co v. DPH Holdings Corp. (In re DPH Holdings Corp.), 437 B.R. 88 (S.D.N.Y. 2010).

11.1.fffff Bankruptcy court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a preference defendant whose only U.S. contact is making a loan and receiving repayment. One of the debtor's shareholders established a corporation that would borrow from the shareholder's father and loan the funds to the debtor. The father made two loans. One was wired directly to the debtor. The debtor paid the lender corporation and the father directly during the preference period. The father lives in Hong Kong and had no other contacts with the United States. A U.S. court may assert specific personal jurisdiction over a defendant if the defendant purposefully directed his activities at U.S. residents, the litigation is directly related to the defendant's activities in the U.S. and the exercise of jurisdiction comports with fair play and substantial justice. Making the loan to a U.S. corporation and advancing funds directly to the debtor as well as accepting repayment from the debtor suffices for minimum contacts for an action to recover the payment as a preference. The U.S. has a strong interest in applying the bankruptcy avoiding powers, especially because the claim is a substantial asset of the estate, which outweighs any burden on the defendant in having to defend in the United States. Therefore, the court may exercise personal jurisdiction over the defendant. Aurora Mgmt. P'ners, Inc. v. GC Fin. Servs., Inc. (In re Protected Vehicles, Inc.), 429 B.R. 856 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2010).

11.1.ggggg Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to authorize trustee to liquidate pension plan. The debtor administered a defined contribution plan. After bankruptcy, the trustee succeeded as plan administrator under section 704(a)(11). The trustee sought authorization to terminate the plan, disburse the plan corpus to participants and pay related administrative expenses with plan assets. ERISA governs each of these aspects of plan administration. Section 1334(b) of title 28 grants the bankruptcy court concurrent jurisdiction over proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11. A proceeding arises under title 11 if it invokes a substantive right that the Code provides. Section 704(a)(11) does not provide any substantive rights. It simply requires the trustee to administer a plan. ERISA determines all substantive rights related to the plan. A proceeding arises in a case under title 11 where, due to its legal nature, not the particular factual circumstances, it could arise only in a bankruptcy case. However, the trustee's involvement in the matter is not sufficient to qualify for "arising in" jurisdiction. Because this proceeding seeks determination of non-bankruptcy ERISA rights, it does not arise in the case. A proceeding is related to a case if it would affect the amount of property for distribution from the estate or the allocation of property among creditors. The estate is not liable for any of the plan's obligations, either to participants or for administration. Therefore, the determination of the trustee's motion would not have any effect on property or distributions in the case. The bankruptcy court dismisses the trustee's motion for lack of jurisdiction. In re Mid-States Exp., Inc., 433 B.R. 688 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2010).

11.1.hhhhh Bankruptcy court may exercise jurisdiction related to a probate matter. The debtor's husband had promised her a substantial trust account, but he never amended his will to reflect his intentions. After he died, his son and sole heir probated the will in Texas probate court. The debtor filed bankruptcy, and the son filed a nondischargeability complaint against her, alleging defamation, and a proof of claim. The debtor counterclaimed in the bankruptcy court for tortious interference with an expected gift from her late husband. The bankruptcy court granted her judgment on her counterclaim. The son appealed to the district court. In the meantime, the son sought and obtained a ruling from the Texas probate court that the will was valid and the debtor was not entitled to any recovery. After the probate court ruled, the district court determined that the counterclaim was not a core proceeding, held a trial and entered judgment for the debtor. Section 157(b)(1) permits bankruptcy judges to "hear and determine ... all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11". Section 157(b)(2)(C) defines core proceeding to include "counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate". This definition does not permit the bankruptcy court to determine all counterclaims. Section 157(b)(1) still limits the bankruptcy court's authority to a counterclaim arising under title 11 or arising in a case under title 11, whether or not a compulsory counterclaim. But a bankruptcy court is not limited to determining only a claim that is bankruptcy specific or could not be brought in state court. Rather, the bankruptcy court may determine counterclaims that are so closely related to the claim that it must be resolved to determine the claim's allowance. The bankruptcy court may rely only on the record as of when the counterclaim is pleaded to determine whether it may determine the counterclaim. Here, determining the tortious interference counterclaim, though arising in part out of the same facts underlying the defamation claim, was not necessary to determining the defamation nondischargeability claim. Thus, the bankruptcy court did not have core jurisdiction to determine the tortious interference counterclaim. Because the Texas probate court determined that claim before the district court determined the tortious interference claim, the Texas judgment bound the district court under the Full Faith and Credit Clause. Marshall v. Stern (In re Marshall), 600 F.3d 1037(9th Cir. 2010).

11.1.iiii Party that files counterclaim against an action by the trustee waives any jury trial right.

The debtor contracted before bankruptcy to sell a condominium. The buyer made a deposit with the title company. A dispute arose, and the sale did not close. After bankruptcy, the title company filed an interpleader action against the trustee and the buyer. The trustee cross-claimed against the buyer; the buyer answered and counterclaimed against the trustee, asserting breach of contract, fraud and other common law claims against the debtor and seeking return of the deposit. The buyer demanded a jury trial. A party who asserts a claim against the estate participates in the equitable process of determining claims and distributing property and thus waives any Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial. Property that is "arguable" property of the estate, that is, property in which the debtor has only an arguable claim of right, is property of the estate. Thus, the buyer's claim to the escrowed funds amounts to a claim against the estate that waives the buyer's right to a jury trial. William M. Condrey, P.C. v. Endeavour Highrise, L.P. (In re Endeavour High Rise, L.P.), 425 B.R. 402 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2010).

11.1.jjjj Bankruptcy court has personal jurisdiction over non-U.S. fraudulent transfer defendant who maintained account with the debtor.

The debtor stockbroker operated a Ponzi scheme through customer accounts. The customer maintained an account with the debtor in New York and regularly sent correspondence to the debtor in New York to direct transfers and withdrawals from the account. The customer designated a U.S. agent for service of process, and the account agreement specified New York law as the governing law. The trustee sued the customer for recovery of account withdrawals as fraudulent transfers. The Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause governs whether a non-U.S. defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction in the U.S. It requires that the defendant have minimum contacts with the U.S. and that the exercise of jurisdiction is reasonable, that is, that it will not offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice". The customer's contacts with the U.S. in opening and maintaining the account suffice as minimum contacts and to make the exercise of personal jurisdiction reasonable. However, under the Hague Convention, service on the customer may not be effected by ordinary mail where the customer's jurisdiction has objected, which Switzerland has done. Therefore, service must be effected through the more formal procedures of the Hague Convention. Picard v. Cohmad Secs. Corp. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 418 B.R. 75 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

11.1.kkkk Malpractice claim for services rendered during a bankruptcy case are within the bankruptcy court's "arising in" jurisdiction.

The debtor in possession and its zoning counsel parted ways during the chapter 11 case. The DIP objected to counsel's fees, which the bankruptcy court approved. After the bankruptcy case was closed, the debtor sued counsel in state court for malpractice, Counsel removed the case to the District Court. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a proceeding arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11. "Arising in" jurisdiction includes jurisdiction over matters that would not exist outside the context of a bankruptcy case. A bankruptcy court has an interest in ensuring that professional retained to represent the estate carries out its duties properly and that the fees charged are reasonable. Therefore, a malpractice claim against an estate professional "arises in" the bankruptcy case, and the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction. Capitol Hill Group v. Pillsbury, Winthrop, Shaw Pittman, LLP, 569 F.3d 485 (D.C. Cir. 2009).

11.1.IIIII Determination of a prepetition credit agreement default is a core proceeding. The debtor filed its chapter 11 case with a prepackaged plan that proposed, among other things, that any defaults under its senior secured claims under a bank credit agreement would be cured, the claims would be reinstated and the class of claims would not be impaired. The banks asserted that the debtor had committed a prepetition non-monetary default that could not be cured and brought an adversary proceeding to determine that there was such a default. The banks stated in the action that the action's purpose was to prevent plan confirmation. "Core proceedings" include claim allowance or disallowance, plan confirmation and other proceedings affecting the adjustment of the debtor-creditor relationship. Courts construe "core proceedings" expansively to include matters that are unique to or uniquely affected by the bankruptcy case and matters that directly affect a core bankruptcy function. This adversary proceeding is uniquely connected to the bankruptcy case because of the connection with plan confirmation and directly affects the core bankruptcy function of plan confirmation. The legal and factual issues in the adversary proceeding are central to the plan and arise from the same operative facts that govern the confirmation hearing. Because the litigation's stated objective is to accelerate the court's consideration of a central plan confirmation issue, the matter is a core proceeding. JPMorgan Chase Bank., N.A. v. Charter Comm'ns Operating, LLC (In re Charter Comm'ns), 409 B.R. 649 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

11.1.mmmmm Bankruptcy court has personal jurisdiction over a foreign creditor that violates the automatic stay. The debtors operated oceangoing shipping vessels. They were members of an English insurance "club". The club's English law governed insurance policies contained a "cesser" clause, under which the policies terminated not only upon the filing of a bankruptcy petition but also upon the adoption of a winding up resolution by a club member's board. The club attempted termination upon the debtors' bankruptcy filings. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over property of the debtor and of the estate, "wherever located". A U.S. court may exercise jurisdiction over a party whose actions have a substantial effect in the United States. A party whose action, such as violation of the automatic stay, has an effect on the administration of a U.S. bankruptcy case has an effect in the United States, wherever the violation occurs. Such a party's action affects the bankruptcy court's ability to administer the estate in the United States and could subvert the United States' interest in administering bankruptcy cases in a single forum. If the rule were otherwise, a foreign creditor could violate the stay and disrupt a case's administration and create the damage that the automatic stay is designed to prevent. Therefore, a stay violation qualifies to subject the actor to personal jurisdiction. LaMonica v. N. of England Protecting and Indem. Assoc. Ltd. (In re Probulk Inc.), 407 B.R. 56 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

11.1.nnnnn A turnover action does not give rise to a jury trial right. After bankruptcy, the debtor received insurance proceeds for damage to property of the estate. The trustee sought recovery from the debtor by bringing an action under section 542(a) seeking turnover and an accounting. The debtor demanded a jury trial. Whether an action in bankruptcy gives rise to a jury trial right depends on first, a comparison to similar actions brought in the English courts at the time of the Seventh Amendment's adoption, second, the remedy sought and third, if the first two point to a jury trial right, whether Congress may and did assign the action to a non-Article III factfinder. Historically, bankruptcy has been an equitable proceeding, and the U.S. courts have so characterized it since bankruptcy laws were enacted in this country. Because an action under section 542(a) is not one to recover damages but to recover property belonging to the estate, it is part of the equitable bankruptcy proceeding. The remedy the trustee seeks here is also equitable. A turnover action seeks to restore the status quo and is therefore similar to a restitution action, which is an equitable remedy. In addition, the accounting remedy that the trustee seeks is an equitable remedy. That the trustee seeks money does not prevent the action from being equitable, as it seeks restitution of property of the estate that the debtor received. Therefore, the debtor is not entitled to a jury trial. Braunstein v. McCabe, 571 F.3d 108 (1st Cir. 2009).

11.1.ooooo Debtor may not remove police or regulatory power action to the bankruptcy court.

The state sued the debtor for violation of state consumer protection laws for accepting deposits to sell product that the debtor knew it could not deliver. The debtor removed the action to the district court. Section 1452(a) permits removal of any proceeding over which the bankruptcy court would have jurisdiction under section 1334 except certain tax proceedings and “a civil action by a governmental unit to enforce such governmental unit’s police or regulatory power”. Section 1452(a)’s exception is similar though not identical to the police or regulatory power automatic stay exception in section 362(b)(4). Still, it is designed to work in tandem with that exception and should be construed in the same manner. The dominant tests are the public purpose test, that the government is trying to effectuate public policy rather than adjudicate private rights, and the pecuniary purpose test, that the government is not acting primarily for the government’s pecuniary interest. An action does not have a pecuniary purpose solely because it seeks restitution if restitution is not the primary object of the suit. The government’s action here meets both tests and may not be removed. The court remands the action to state court. Mass. v. New England Pellet, Inc., 409 B.R. 255 (D. Mass. 2009).

11.1.ppppp Creditor may not collaterally attack a bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction to issue a confirmation injunction.

The debtor asbestos manufacturer confirmed a plan based on a settlement with, among others, its insurance carriers. The plan and the settlement contained a channeling injunction that enjoined all persons from suing the carriers for all “claims, demands, allegations, duties, liabilities and obligations ... which have been, or could have been, or might be, asserted by any Person against [the carriers] based upon, arising out of or relating to any of all of the Policies”. Many years after plan confirmation, some plaintiffs brought actions against the carriers alleging that the carriers, based on information they had learned from their insurer relationship with the debtor, had conspired to hide the dangers of asbestos from the public and had failed to warn about the dangers. They sought recover from the carriers only for the carriers’ alleged state law violations, not for anything the debtor had done. The injunction did not contain any express limitation tied to the extent of the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction or power under the Bankruptcy Code. The carriers sought to enforce the injunction against the new lawsuits. The bankruptcy court construed the plan injunction as broad enough by its terms to cover the plaintiffs’ new lawsuits. Once a confirmation order becomes final, it is res judicata as to parties and those in privity with them, even as to the issuing court’s subject matter jurisdiction. Thus, parties may no longer attack the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction to issue the injunction in general or even as to matters at the periphery that might be beyond the bankruptcy court’s reach. The only issue that the party objecting to the application of the injunction may address is whether the injunction’s terms apply to the party’s conduct, not whether the terms may apply to the conduct. Travelers Indemnity Co. v. Bailey, 557 U.S. 137, 129 S. Ct. 2195, 174 L. Ed. 2d 99 (2009).

11.1.qqqqq Core jurisdiction is determined claim by claim, not claimant by claimant.

The domestic debtor and its foreign affiliates sold domestic and foreign assets to the domestic creditor and its foreign affiliates, respectively. The domestic debtor indemnified the foreign creditor if the debtor’s foreign affiliates did not meet their own indemnification obligations to the creditor’s foreign affiliates. The creditors pursued the debtor’s foreign affiliates in state court and filed a contingent proof of claim against the domestic debtor in its chapter 11 case in case the debtor’s foreign affiliates were liable and did not pay. A proof of claim generally subjects the creditor to the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction, and the proceeding on the proof of claim is a core proceeding. The debtor’s indemnification of a creditor on a claim against a nondebtor may create related to jurisdiction in the bankruptcy court over the creditor’s claim against the nondebtor, because the outcome of that claim could conceivably have an effect on the bankruptcy case. But such an indemnification obligation does not create core jurisdiction over the creditor's claim against the nondebtor. Core jurisdiction must be determined on a claim-by-claim basis, not a claimant-by-claimant basis. Here, the creditor's foreign affiliates' filing of proofs of contingent indemnification claims against the debtor did not give the bankruptcy core jurisdiction over their claims against the debtor's foreign affiliates, even though the creditor's foreign affiliates had filed proofs of claims against the debtor. In re Exide Technologies, 544 F.3d 196 (3d Cir. 2008).

11.1.rrrrr Tucker Act bars bankruptcy court jurisdiction to hear related claims against the United States. The debtor sued the United States in bankruptcy court for a prebankruptcy taking. The Tucker Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1491, waives sovereign immunity for and grants the Court of Federal Claims exclusive jurisdiction over takings claims against the United States. However, the Court of Claims' jurisdiction is not exclusive to the extent that other statutes expressly confer jurisdiction and waive sovereign immunity. Section 1334(b) of title 28 grants the district courts original but not exclusive jurisdiction over civil proceedings in bankruptcy cases "notwithstanding any Act of Congress that confers exclusive jurisdiction on a court or courts other than the district courts". Section 1334 does not itself waive sovereign immunity, and the waiver of sovereign immunity in section 106 does not include non-bankruptcy claims that become property of the estate under section 541. (That is, section 541 is excluded from section 106(a)'s list of sections as to which the Code waives sovereign immunity.) Therefore, the district court and the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction over this noncore proceeding against the United States. McGuire v. United States, 550 F.3d 903 (9th Cir. 2008).

11.1.sssss A forum selection clause is enforceable in a bankruptcy case. The debtor had entered into an agreement authorizing a lender/investor to sell the debtor's assets and remit proceeds to the debtor. The lender sold the assets and deposited the proceeds in an escrow account. The debtor disputed the lender's calculations. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case before the dispute was resolved. The lender filed a proof of claim. The debtor in possession objected and counterclaim for the disputed amount. The agreement contained a forum selection clause under which the parties agreed to the exclusive jurisdiction of the New York state and federal courts for any dispute resolution. The bankruptcy court heard the action anyway and granted judgment against the lender. M/S Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore, Inc., 407 U.S. 1 (1972), requires enforcement of a forum selection clause unless it is inherently unfair, the product of fraud or overreaching or contravenes a strong public policy. The party opposing forum selection clause enforcement has the burden of proof. 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b) does not grant the bankruptcy court exclusive jurisdiction over civil proceedings, and 28 U.S.C. § 157(b) authorizes but does not require a bankruptcy court to hear core proceedings. Where a dispute arises out of a prebankruptcy contract rather than a bankruptcy cause of action, the pendency of a bankruptcy case and the public policy of centralizing administration do not excuse enforcement of a forum selection clause in every core proceeding. The party seeking the bankruptcy court as a forum has the burden of proof that forum selection clause enforcement would meet one of the three Bremen tests. Because the debtor in possession here did not show that enforcement would contravene public policy or would be inherently unfair, the district court vacates the bankruptcy court's judgment and remands the case for transfer to the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. D.E. Frey Group, Inc. v. FAS Holdings, Inc. (In re D.E. Frey Group, Inc.), 387 B.R. 799 (D. Colo. 2008).

11.1.ttttt Section 105(a) provides an exception to Anti-Injunction Act. The Anti-Injunction Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2283 ("AIA"), prohibits a federal court from issuing an order "to stay proceedings in a State Court except as expressly authorized by Acts of Congress, or where necessary in aid of its jurisdiction, or to protect or effectuate its judgments". The All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651, authorizes federal courts to "issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of their respective jurisdictions". The two statutes act in concert, so that where an AIA exception applies, the All Writs Act authorizes an injunction. Section 105(a), which authorizes a bankruptcy court to issue any order necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, is an Act of Congress that expressly authorizes an injunction and therefore qualifies as an AIA exception. Thus, the bankruptcy court could enjoin state court litigation against an estate's accountant for malpractice where the state court litigation sought to relitigate issues that the bankruptcy court had resolved, over plaintiff's objections, at the plan confirmation hearing and at the hearing on approval of the accountants fees. Ernst & Young, LLP v. Reilly (In re Earned Cap. Corp.), 393 B.R. 362 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2008).

11.1.uuuuu Confirmation does not divest court of “related to” jurisdiction over a removed action. The plaintiff sued the debtor's former directors and officers and others in state court based on their prepetition conduct. The defendants removed the action to the district court under its “related to” jurisdiction. Before the court resolved the litigation, the bankruptcy court confirmed the plan, and the plan became effective. “Related to” jurisdiction encompasses any matter that can have an effect upon the estate but narrows upon plan confirmation and effectiveness, because there is no longer an estate that the litigation can affect. However, where the litigation was commenced before confirmation and is based on preconfirmation activities, confirmation does not divest the court of “related to” jurisdiction. Newby v. Enron Corp. (In re Enron Corp. Secs., Derivative & ERISA Litigation), 535 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2008).

11.1.vvvvv Estate representative lawsuit on a claim a creditor assigned to the estate is a core proceeding. The debtor's CEO owned a 52% equity interest in the debtor. An independent investor owned the balance of the equity and was a substantial creditor as well. To receive his maximum annual bonus and remain in control, the CEO falsified the debtor's books over two years to hide the debtor's poor performance. The debtor's auditor did not detect the fraud until after it had issued clean audit opinions for the two years' financial statements. The estate representative objected to the auditor's claim for prepetition accounting fees and counterclaimed for breach of contract, negligence, negligent misrepresentation, and fraud or recklessness in connection with the two years' audits. As part of the plan settlement of the investor's claim, the investor assigned the estate representative its claims against the auditor for the same causes of action. Core proceedings include objections to claims and “counterclaims against the estate by persons filing claims against the estate”, so the disbursing agent's objection to the auditor's claim is a core proceeding. A counterclaim based solely on a state law cause of action that arises independently of bankruptcy and that is wholly unrelated and disproportionate to the size of the creditor's claim might not be a core proceeding. Here, however, the counterclaim covered the same subject as the auditor's claim for fees, accounting services, and a professional malpractice claim is a defense to a fee claim, so the adversary proceeding against the auditor is a core proceeding. The investor's claims against the auditor do not, however, arise out of the auditor's fee claim against the estate, but they are counterclaims by the estate (even if only by way of assignment) against a person filing a claim against the estate. They arise out of the same transaction as the fee claim, their determination would likely dispose of the fee claim, and the resolution of the estate's and the auditor's claims would resolve many of the issues underlying the investor's claim. The investor's claim is therefore a core proceeding. Bankr. Servs., Inc. v. Ernst & Young (In re CBI Holding Co., Inc.), 529 F.3d 432 (2d Cir. 2008).

11.1.wwwww Court has “related to” postconfirmation jurisdiction to interpret a liquidating trust agreement created under a plan. A liquidating plan created a liquidating trust, which had subsidiaries. The trustee entered into an employment agreement with the trust and with the subsidiaries. The agreements required the trust to advance defense costs to the trustee if the trustee were sued, and their forum selection clauses provided for bankruptcy court jurisdiction. The trust agreement required the trust advisory committee to approve any trustee employment agreement and permitted a successor trustee to deny defense cost advancement. A former trustee sued the trust in state court for advancement of defense costs in other litigation. The trust removed the advancement action to bankruptcy court. A core proceeding involves matters concerning administration and allowance of claims, including an inquiry into a court fiduciary's conduct. Here, however, the advancement claim does not involve either claims allowance or the former trustee's conduct, because the advancement claims are based solely on the employment agreements, not on a determination of the trustee's conduct, and so are non-core. A post-confirmation proceeding is related to a bankruptcy case if it has a close nexus to the plan or its implementation. Because the right to advancement here depends on an interpretation of the trust agreement created under the plan and will affect plan consummation, the proceeding is related to the chapter 11 case, and the court has jurisdiction. The trustee's consent to bankruptcy court jurisdiction waives any claim for mandatory abstention or remand on an equitable ground. Street v. The End of the Road Trust, 386 B.R. 539 (D. Del. 2008).

11.1.xxxxx Bankruptcy court lacks jurisdiction over tort claim related to a bankruptcy sale.

The bankruptcy court authorized the sale of estate property. After the sale closed and after the bankruptcy court confirmed a chapter 11 plan, a disappointed bidder sued the successful bidder and certain insiders for intentional interference with business expectancy and for conspiracy. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over post-confirmation non-core actions only if the action's outcome "could conceivably have any effect on the estate". Neither common facts between the action and the bankruptcy proceedings, nor judicial economy, nor the terms of a confirmed plan can provide jurisdiction where the statutory terms do not. Here, the action was solely among third parties, not involving the debtor or the estate. Though the bankruptcy court was familiar with the issues based on having presided over the sale and the operative facts in the action substantially overlapped with the sale proceeding in the bankruptcy court, the bankruptcy court lacks jurisdiction to hear the action, because it could not conceivably have any effect on the estate. GAF Holdings, LLC v. Rinaldi (In re Farmland Indus., Inc.), 378 B.R. 829 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

11.1.yyyyy Court must dismiss or transfer an improperly venued case. The debtor lived in northern Mississippi, in the Memphis, Tennessee suburbs. He filed his bankruptcy petition in the Western District of Tennessee, which he conceded was an improper venue under section 1408. The court transfers the case to the Northern District of Mississippi. Section 1406, entitled "Cure or waiver of defects" and applicable to civil and bankruptcy cases, requires a district court to dismiss an improperly venued case or transfer it to a proper venue. Section 1412, entitled "Dismissal and Change of Venue" and applicable only to bankruptcy cases, permits a district court to transfer a case to any other district "in the interest of justice or for the convenience of the parties". Section 1412 is not inconsistent with and therefore does not override section 1406, because it addresses only a portion of circumstances that section 1406 addresses. Taken together, these provisions require dismissal or transfer of an improperly venued case. Rule 1014(a)(2) reinforces section 1406 by permitting the court to dismiss an improperly venued case or transfer it to any other district. Thompson v. Greenwood, 507 F.3d 416 (6th Cir. 2007).

11.1.zzzzz A valid jury trial demand does not divest a bankruptcy court of pre-trial jurisdiction. The preference defendant properly demanded a jury trial and did not consent to a jury trial before the bankruptcy court. The bankruptcy court still may hear all pre-trial matters, including a summary judgment motion. Allowing the bankruptcy court to hear pre-trial matters does not abridge a jury trial right, because that right is effective only at trial. Similarly, a summary judgment motion determines whether there are any genuine issues of material fact to be tried, which is not a fact-finding function of a jury. In addition, allowing pre-trial matters to proceed in the bankruptcy court is consistent with the bankruptcy system Congress has established to rely on the bankruptcy courts' expertise and familiarity with the cases before them. Finally, a jury trial right does not include a similar constitutional right to have all pre-trial matters heard before an Article III court. Sigma Micro Corp. v. Healthcentral.com (In re Healthcentral.com), 504 F.3d 775 (9th Cir. 2007).

- 11.1.aaaaaa Postconfirmation “related to” jurisdictional limitation does not apply to a core proceeding, which includes a malpractice action against an estate professional. After the case was closed, creditors brought an action in state court against the estate’s accountants for malpractice during the chapter 11 case in connection with plan confirmation. The action is a core proceeding. Core proceedings specifically include matters that concern “the administration of the estate” and “other proceedings affecting the liquidation of the assets of the estate.” An action involving the plan confirmation process is inseparable from the bankruptcy case and implicates the integrity of the bankruptcy process. In addition, because the action “arises in” the chapter 11 case (the accountants performed their services during the chapter 11 case), the action is not merely “otherwise related to” the chapter 11 case and therefore is a core proceeding. The test for “related to” jurisdiction is narrower postconfirmation than preconfirmation. However, the narrower test does not apply at all where the postconfirmation proceeding is a core proceeding. In dictum, the court explains that its narrowing of postconfirmation “related to” jurisdiction applies even where the claim arose preconfirmation, because after confirmation, there is no estate on which the action could conceivably have an effect. Geruschat v. Ernst Young LLP (In re Seven Fields Dev. Corp.), 505 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2007).
- 11.1.bbbbbb Postconfirmation “related to” jurisdiction extends to interpretation of disputed plan provision. The confirmed plan required additional pension plan funding in certain circumstances. Nearly 10 years after confirmation, a retiree group moved to reopen the case to enforce the plan provision to require the additional funding. Postconfirmation “related to” jurisdiction is narrower than preconfirmation jurisdiction and exists only if “there is a close nexus to the bankruptcy plan”, which includes “matters that affect the interpretation, implementation, consummation, execution or administration of the confirmed plan”. Because this dispute requires a direct interpretation of the confirmed plan, the bankruptcy court has postconfirmation related to jurisdiction. In re Shenango Group, Inc., 501 F.3d 338 (3d Cir. 2007).
- 11.1.cccccc The bankruptcy court does not have post-confirmation jurisdiction over an action against prepetition lenders. The debtor asserted two claims against its prepetition banks: for a breach of the loan agreement, which the debtor alleged caused its bankruptcy; and for tortious interference with contractual relationship, which the debtor alleged resulted from the banks’ discussions with the debtor’s tenant over the sale to the tenant at a below-market price of the debtor’s property, which served as collateral for the banks’ claims. The plan provided for payment in full of all creditors from postpetition earnings, not from any recovery from the banks, and for retention of jurisdiction after confirmation to liquidate the debtor’s claims against the banks. After confirmation, the debtor sold the real property and used the proceeds to pay all creditors in full, including the banks. The debtor then brought an action against the banks in the bankruptcy court for breach of contract and for tortious interference. The bankruptcy court’s “arising in a case under title 11” jurisdiction encompasses only claims that are not based on any right expressly created by title 11 but that would not exist but for the bankruptcy. The breach of contract claim does not meet that standard, because the alleged breach occurred before bankruptcy. The debtor’s allegation that the breach caused the bankruptcy does not create “arising in” jurisdiction; if it did, any debt could confer such jurisdiction, because any debt could be the cause of a bankruptcy. Similarly, the post-petition tortious interference claim did not arise in the case, because it could equally exist had the banks taken the same action either before the bankruptcy or if the debtor had not filed bankruptcy. Post-confirmation “related to” jurisdiction is more limited than preconfirmation “related to” jurisdiction and requires a “close nexus to the bankruptcy plan or proceeding”. Because the reorganized debtor paid all creditors in full from the property sale proceeds and the plan did not provide that the claims proceeds would be used to pay claims, the action against the banks did not have any nexus at all to the bankruptcy plan or proceeding. The bankruptcy court would not have jurisdiction over the claims even if they had remained property of the estate, because after confirmation, section 1334(b) still requires the close nexus for “related to” jurisdiction. The plan provision retaining jurisdiction does not change the result, because neither the parties nor a court order may create jurisdiction that the statute does not authorize. Similarly, the provision retaining jurisdiction, to which the banks did not object, does not bar the banks from litigating the bankruptcy court's post-confirmation jurisdiction, because the bankruptcy court does not have the power to determine its future (i.e., post-confirmation) jurisdiction. Valley Historic Ltd. P'shp v. Bank of N.Y., 486 F.3d 831 (4th Cir. 2007).

11.1.dddddd A 100% subsidiary of a 30% subsidiary is not an affiliate. The debtor owns 30% of an intermediate corporation's stock, which owns 100% of the subsidiary's stock. The debtor's 30% interest does not enable it to control the intermediate's voting of the subsidiary's stock. Under section 101(2)(B), an affiliate is a "corporation 20 percent or more of whose outstanding voting securities are directly or indirectly owned, controlled, or held with power to vote, by the debtor" Since the debtor neither owns, controls nor holds with power to vote at least 20% of the subsidiary's stock, the subsidiary is not an affiliate. In re Reichmann Petroleum Corp., 364 B.R. 916 (Bankr. E.D. Tex. 2007).

11.1.eeeeeee An arbitration clause is enforceable in a noncore proceeding. The debtor in possession brought an adversary proceeding to recover from the general contractor for prepetition work that the debtor subcontractor had performed. The debtor had entered into an arbitration agreement with the general contractor before bankruptcy. The contractor sought to enforce the arbitration agreement. The Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. § 2 ("FAA"), requires federal courts to enforce arbitration agreements, unless Congress has provided otherwise. There is no evidence in the Bankruptcy Code's text or legislative history that Congress intended to override the FAA in bankruptcy cases. Therefore, the court must determine whether enforcement of an arbitration agreement would create an inherent conflict with the underlying purposes of the Bankruptcy Code. In this noncore proceeding to recover property for the estate, arbitration would not conflict with the purposes of the Bankruptcy Code. Whiting-Turner Contracting Co. v. Elec. Mach. Enters., Inc. (In re Elec. Mach. Enters., Inc.), 479 F.3d 791 (11th Cir. 2007).

11.1.fyyyyy An action to impose a constructive trust on property held by a third party is a noncore proceeding. The debtor subcontractor and the general contractor performed extra work for the property owner. The general contractor sought recovery from the owner for the extra work. After the general contractor obtained a reduced recovery from the owner, the debtor in possession sought to impose a constructive trust on a portion of the recovery, on the theory that the general contractor would be unjustly enriched if allowed to retain the full recovery and pay none of it to the debtor in possession. An action to impose a constructive trust on property in the possession of the debtor in possession may be a core proceeding because the property is already in the court's custody, and an action to impose a constructive trust on property that the debtor has transferred with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors may also be a core proceeding, because federal bankruptcy law provides the right upon which the constructive trust remedy is based. Here, however, the property is not within the court's jurisdiction, and state law provides the basis for the action. Therefore, the action to impose the constructive trust is a noncore proceeding. Whiting-Turner Contracting Co. v. Elec. Mach Enters., Inc. (In re Elec. Mach. Enters., Inc.), 479 F.3d 791 (11th Cir. 2007).

11.1.gyyyyy "Related to" jurisdiction is broad and does not require certainty of effect on the estate. The debtor purchased natural gas from a supplier and resold it to its customer. The customer sold on to third parties. Texas law provides a lien to the supplier, which continues in the gas unless it is sold in the ordinary course of business or the supplier consents. After bankruptcy, the supplier sued the customer, alleging that the debtor's sale to the customer was not in the ordinary course and that the supplier could collect from the proceeds of its lien, which was the customer's receivables and collections from the third parties. If the supplier were successful against the customer, the customer would have an unsecured claim against the debtor; if not, the supplier would have a claim secured against the debtor by the debtor's receivables from the customer. Thus, the outcome of the supplier-customer litigation could conceivably “alter, positively or negatively, the debtor’s rights, liabilities, options, or freedom of action and could influence the administration of the bankrupt estate.” Certainty is unnecessary. Therefore, the bankruptcy court has “related to” jurisdiction over the litigation. Edge Petroleum Op. Co., Inc. v. GPR Holdings, L.L.C. (In re TXNB Internal Case), 483 F.3d 292 (5th Cir. 2007).

11.1.hhhhhh “Related to” jurisdiction does not encompass post-effective date state law claims.

The plan vested all claims against third parties in a creditors’ liquidating trust. In the Seventh Circuit, plan confirmation limits “related to” jurisdiction to matters to ensure plan implementation and to protection of estate assets devoted to plan implementation. The claims here are no longer property of the estate, so the litigation cannot affect the estate, only the liquidating trust. Therefore, the court does not have jurisdiction to hear them. CLC Creditors’ Grantor Trust v. Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal LLP (In re Comm’l Loan Corp.), 363 B.R. 559 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007).

11.1.iiiii Jurisdiction solely under the supplemental jurisdiction statute does not trigger mandatory abstention.

Section 1367 of title 28 gives the federal district courts supplemental jurisdiction over claims forming part of the same case of controversy with “any civil action over which the district courts have original jurisdiction,” including bankruptcy jurisdiction under section 1334. Section 1334(c)(2) requires the bankruptcy court to abstain from hearing certain proceedings over which it might otherwise have jurisdiction if “an action could not have been commenced in a court of the United States absent jurisdiction under this section [1334].” The plaintiff brought an action under two legal theories: one was a core proceeding under section 157(b); the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over the other only under section 1367. The plaintiff later waived the core proceeding theory, leaving only supplemental jurisdiction as the basis for federal jurisdiction. The district courts may retain an action over which they have only supplemental jurisdiction if the action, as originally commenced, had some other basis of federal jurisdiction. The federal courts’ jurisdiction over the plaintiff’s remaining claim only under section 1367 is sufficient to take the proceeding out of section 1334(c)(2)’s mandatory abstention provision, because section 1367 provides an independent basis of federal jurisdiction. Edge Petroleum Op. Co., Inc. v. GPR Holdings, L.L.C. (In re TXNB Internal Case), 483 F.3d 292 (5th Cir. 2007).

11.1.jjjjj Section 1452 remand motion need not be filed within 30 days after removal.

The trustee sold the debtor’s business intact and assigned a contract to the buyer. The other party to the contract brought an action in state court against the buyer for a declaratory judgment that the contract could not be assigned without curing defaults and that it was therefore no longer bound by the contract. The buyer removed the action to the bankruptcy court. In the meantime, the bankruptcy court had decided that the buyer did not assume the obligations under the contract, which still remained enforceable against the other party. The plaintiff filed a remand motion 33 days after removal. The general federal remand statute, section 1447, requires that a remand motion be filed within 30 days. The special bankruptcy provision, section 1452, does not impose a time limit on remand and evidences Congress’ intent to impose a liberal approach to remand in bankruptcy removals. Therefore, the remand motion was timely, but is denied. The action is a core proceeding because it relates to the sale of property of the estate. As such, abstention is not mandatory under section 1334(c)(2). Because the bankruptcy court had already addressed the same issue, discretionary abstention is not required. Cargill, Inc. v. Man Fin., Inc. (In re Refco, Inc.), 354 B.R. 515 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

11.1.kkkkk Bankruptcy court does not have related to jurisdiction over action involving foreign subsidiary.

The debtor’s unfiled Mexican subsidiary had entered into a joint venture agreement with a partner and agreed to arbitrate any disputes with the partner in Paris. When a dispute arose, the partner commenced an action in Mexico. The debtor’s subsidiary brought an action in the bankruptcy court to compel arbitration. The Second Circuit has adopted the test from Pacor, Inc. v. Higgins, 743 F.2d 984 (3d Cir. 1984), under which the bankruptcy court has related to jurisdiction “if the outcome could alter the debtor’s rights, liabilities, options, or freedom of action ... and which in any way impacts upon the handling and administration of the bankruptcy estate.” Possible reduction in the value of the subsidiary’s stock arising from the partner’s breach of the arbitration clause is not such an outcome. The subsidiary’s assets are not property of the estate, and an action involving the subsidiary that affects the subsidiary’s value indirectly neither alters the debtor’s “rights, liabilities, options, or freedom of action” nor affects the administration of the estate. Otherwise, the court would have jurisdiction over all actions in which the subsidiary were a party, as all actions could conceivably affect the value of its stock. Tower Automotive Mexico, S. De R.L. De C.V. v. Grupo Proeza, S.A. De C.V. (In re Tower Automotive, Inc.), 356 B.R. 598 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

11.1.iiiii Bankruptcy court may not retain an improperly venued case. The debtors filed their chapter 7 cases in an admittedly improper venue. Section 1408 determines proper venue. It is more than precatory. Section 1412 governs transfer of venue but should be read as limited only to a properly venued case. Sections 1408 and 1412 parallel and replace the provisions of sections 1472 and 1475, which were enacted part of the original 1978 bankruptcy court system that was later held unconstitutional. Section 1477, which permitted a bankruptcy court to retain an improperly venued case, was not directly replaced. Its function has been taken over by section 1406(a), which requires transfer to a proper venue or dismissal of an improperly venued case. Rule 1014(a)(2) is in accord. Therefore, the bankruptcy court may not retain the cases but must transfer to a proper venue or dismiss. In re MacDonald, 356 B.R. 416 (W.D. Tenn. 2006).

11.1.mmmmm Federal jurisdiction over core proceedings is not exclusive. The trustee filed an action in state court, with bankruptcy court approval, for recovery of a fraudulent transfer under section 544(b). The defendants removed the action to federal district court, arguing that the action was a core proceeding over which the bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction under In re Gruntz, 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000). The district court remands the action to state court, concluding that the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction over a fraudulent transfer action, unlike the automatic stay issue in Gruntz, is not part of the “case” under section 1334(a), but is a “proceeding” under section 1334(b) over which the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction is not exclusive. Here, where the bankruptcy court has specifically authorized proceeding in state court, the action does not interfere with the bankruptcy court’s paramount jurisdiction. Hopkins v. Plant Insulation Co., 349 B.R. 805 (N.D. Cal. 2006).

11.1.nnnnn Defamation is not a “personal injury tort” claim. The plaintiffs sued a television station and a public advocacy group for defamation. The television station filed bankruptcy. The public advocacy group removed the action to the district court. Section 1334(c)(2) requires the district court to abstain from an action based on a state law claim related to a title 11 case but not arising under title 11 or arising in the case if the action could not have been commenced in a federal court and if the action is commenced and can be timely adjudicated in a state court. Mandatory abstention does not apply, however, to a “personal injury tort” claim. A personal injury tort requires actual physical injury to the plaintiff. Therefore, the exception does not apply to a defamation claim. Massey Energy v. W. Va. Consumers for Justice, 351 B.R. 348 (E.D. Va. 2006).

11.1.ooooo Probate exception to federal jurisdiction does not apply to a preference action. The debtor paid deferred compensation to an employee within 90 days before bankruptcy. The debtor in possession sued to recover the preference from the employee’s executor, who defended under the “probate exception” to federal jurisdiction. Marshall v. Marshall, 126 S. Ct. 1735 (2006), narrowed the probate exception to actions that would interfere with probating a will or administering the decedent’s estate. Here, the DIP did not seek immediate turnover or collection and agreed to enforce any judgment only through the probate court. The action therefore does not come within the probate exception to federal jurisdiction. Enron Corp. v. Whalen (In re Enron Corp.), 351 B.R. 305 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

11.1.pppppp Post-confirmation jurisdiction is limited in the Fifth Circuit. The creditors' committee's financial advisor resigned to represent a potential acquirer. The acquirer's efforts to acquire the debtor in the chapter 11 case were unsuccessful. The acquirer, the financial advisor, the debtor, and other interested parties entered into a settlement agreement, which was incorporated into the confirmed plan. After confirmation, the acquirer sued the financial advisor for breach of fiduciary duty in its representation of the acquirer. A bankruptcy court has "related to" jurisdiction during a title 11 case. A proceeding is "related to" a title 11 case if its outcome "could conceivably have any effect on the estate." In re Wood, 825 F.2d 90, 93 (5th Cir. 1987). After confirmation, however, jurisdiction under Fifth Circuit precedent narrows to matters pertaining to the implementation or execution of the plan. Here, the settlement agreement underlying the plan did not govern the outcome of the litigation. Therefore, the court does not have jurisdiction over the action. Bankruptcy Trading & Invs., L.L.C. v. Chiron Fin. Group, Inc., 342 B.R. 474 (S.D. Tex. 2006).

11.1.qqqqqq Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to determine res judicata effect of confirmed plan. The plan required the debtor in possession to file claims objections within 60 days after the effective date. The debtor in possession failed to file an objection within the 60-day period to a claim listed in the schedules, and clearly described in the disclosure statement, as disputed. The creditor then filed a motion in pending (prepetition) state court litigation for a determination that the debtor's failure to object to the creditor's claim in the bankruptcy court within the 60-day period was res judicata and precluded the debtor from challenging the creditor's claim in any court. The debtor moved the bankruptcy court for an order determining that the failure to file the objection on time was not res judicata and to interpret the plan as preserving the debtor's right to challenge the claim. The bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to determine the res judicata effect of its own order in another court. That is solely the domain of the other court. The bankruptcy court does, however, have jurisdiction to interpret the plan, even under the narrower "close nexus to the plan" post-confirmation scope of "related to" jurisdiction. Section 1334, not the terms of a plan, determines the full extent of the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction. A plan cannot expand jurisdiction, although it can permissibly limit (by consent implied in a plan's terms) the exercise of the court's jurisdiction. Interpretation of a plan's terms provides perhaps the closest nexus to the plan, so the court retains and therefore must exercise jurisdiction to interpret the plan when properly asked to do so. Thickstun Bros. Equip. Co. v. Encompass Servs. Corp. (In re Thickstun Bros. Equip. Co.), 344 B.R. 515 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

11.1.rrrrrr Bankruptcy court may exercise jurisdiction related to a probate matter. The debtor's husband had promised her a substantial trust account, but he never amended his will to reflect his intentions. After he died, his son and sole heir probated the will in Texas probate court. The debtor filed later bankruptcy, and the son filed a proof of claim and nondischargeability complaint against her, alleging defamation. The debtor counterclaimed in the bankruptcy court for tortious interference with an expected gift from her late husband. The bankruptcy court granted her judgment on her counterclaim. (In the meantime, the son sought and obtained a ruling from the Texas probate court that the will was valid and the debtor was not entitled to any recovery.) The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over the counterclaim. The Supreme Court narrows the scope of the "probate exception" to federal jurisdiction, without deciding whether it is based on a constitutional or statutory limitation, to probating a will or administering an estate. Federal courts must hear claims that are within their jurisdiction even though the outcome could affect the distribution of a probate estate. The only limitation is that the court may not "interfere with the probate proceeding"; that is, it may not "disturb or affect the possession of property in the custody of a state court." The bankruptcy court's judgment only establishes the debtor's tort claim against the son. It does not touch any purely probate matter, even though it might be inconsistent with the probate court's determination of the same issue. However, if it is, then the court must determine whether rules of claim or issue preclusion dictate a different result. Finally, the Texas probate court's ruling that it had exclusive jurisdiction over the matter does not deprive a federal court of jurisdiction that Congress grants. Marshall v. Marshall, 547 U.S. 293, 126 S. Ct. 1735, 164 L. Ed. 2d 480 (2006).

11.1.ssssss The estate's adversary proceeding is superior to a nonbankruptcy class action to adjudicate a claim against the debtor's prepetition lender. Class action plaintiffs, who purchased and still held notes from the debtor, alleged that the debtor's prepetition lender aided the debtor in violating the securities laws and took the proceeds of fraudulent securities issuances in repayment of its loans. Before class certification, the creditors' committee sued the lender in the bankruptcy court for disallowance and equitable subordination of the lender's claim. Certification of a class action requires the district court to determine that the class action is superior to any other form of adjudication of the controversy. In this case, it was not. The adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy case was superior, because the class action would duplicate the adversary proceeding and will yield a single result for all creditors, and the result it seeks overlaps substantially with the plaintiffs' class action claim. Gregory v. Finova Cap. Corp., 442 F.3d 188 (4th Cir. 2006).

11.1.tttttt Bankruptcy court may not issue discharge while dismissal motion is on appeal. The bankruptcy court denied the creditor's motion to dismiss the individual debtor's case. While the creditor's appeal was pending, the bankruptcy court issued the discharge. The appeal divested the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction over the case, so the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to grant the discharge, which was void. Sherman v. SEC (In re Sherman), 441 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2006).

11.1.uuuuuu Claims assigned to the trustee may be subject to bankruptcy court jurisdiction. The debtor posted a letter of credit with its landlord to secure its performance under a lease. The debtor posted collateral from the debtor with the bank to secure the debtor's reimbursement obligation under the letter of credit. The landlord drew on a letter of credit after bankruptcy. The trustee and the bank disputed whether the draw was proper under the lease and under the letter of credit itself. The bank assigned the trustee its claims for improper draw against the landlord, which the trustee brought in the bankruptcy court. Even though the claim is between third parties and the court may not obtain jurisdiction over a claim by assignment to the trustee, the court has jurisdiction. The outcome of the litigation would affect the allowability of the bank's reimbursement claim against the estate and the posted collateral. In addition, the trustee's rights implicated the landlord damage claim limitation under section 502(b)(6). Therefore, the matter was a core proceeding. EOP-Colonnade of Dallas Ltd. P'ship v. Faulkner (In re Stonebridge Techs., Inc.), 439 F.3d 260 (5th Cir. 2005).

11.1.vvvvvv PBGC's action for distress pension plan termination is not a core proceeding. The debtor reached an agreement with its union to modify a collective bargaining agreement and sought approval of the modification under section 1113. Under the agreement, the union agreed not to oppose the debtor in possession's effort to terminate the defined benefit pension plan under ERISA section 1341(c) after a specified future date. Before that date, the PBGC notified the debtor in possession of a distress termination under ERISA section 1342 and brought an action in district court, which was referred to the bankruptcy court. The PBGC's action is not a core proceeding. Its right to terminate arises solely under ERISA. The PBGC brought its action in its capacity as a federal enforcement agency, against the debtor in its capacity as plan administrator, and the debtor would not have been a party if a different entity had been plan administrator. Although the outcome may have affected the amount of claims against the estate, such an effect is too tenuous to create core jurisdiction. Finally, termination does not affect administration of the case, because the plan assets are not property of the estate. Air Line Pilots

Assoc. Int'l v. Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. (In re United Air Lines, Inc.), 337 B.R. 904 (N.D. Ill. 2006).

11.1.wwwww Court compels arbitration of class action claim. The bank continued its automatic withdrawal of funds from the debtor's bank account after it had notice of the debtor's bankruptcy. The debtor brought a class action against the bank for damages under section 362(h) for the creditor's violation of the automatic stay. The bank sought arbitration as provided under the debtor's credit agreement with the bank. Bankruptcy courts generally do not have any discretion to deny arbitration in a non-core proceeding. However, in a core proceeding, the court has discretion only if the proceeding is based on a Bankruptcy Code provision that inherently conflicts with the Federal Arbitration Act or that would necessarily jeopardize the objectives of the Bankruptcy Code. In this case, the action was core, because it was brought under section 362(h). However, it did not directly affect the debtor's bankruptcy case. The discharge had already been granted, and the action was brought as a class action and therefore did not directly implicate the debtor's bankruptcy case. Therefore, arbitration would not seriously jeopardize the conduct of the debtor's case, the purposes of the automatic stay, or any Bankruptcy Code policies or provisions. MBNA Am. Bank, N.A. v. Hill, 436 F.3d 104 (2d Cir. 2006).

11.1.xxxxxx Bankruptcy court must enforce arbitration clause in a section 541 action. The chapter 13 debtor brought an action against its mortgage lender to invalidate the mortgage based on federal and state consumer protection laws. The mortgage lender invoked an arbitration clause in the mortgage and moved to compel arbitration. The Federal Arbitration Act reflects strong Congressional policy in favor of enforcing arbitration clauses. A court may deny enforcement only where another federal statute shows a clear Congressional intent to preclude a waiver of judicial remedies for the statutory rights at issue. The Bankruptcy Code shows no such intent for actions under section 541(a), whether core or non-core. The bankruptcy court therefore has no discretion to deny the motion in a case in which the debtor sues on a "debtor derived" action (that is, one derived under section 541(a)). Mintze v. Am. Gen. Fin. Servs., Inc. (In re Mintze), 434 F.3d 222 (3d Cir. 2006).

11.1.yyyyyy Court withdraws the reference for fraudulent transfer, alter ego, and breach of fiduciary claims against debtor's former parent. The debtor in possession sued the debtor's former parent corporation for fraudulent transfers, unlawful dividend, recharacterization of claims as equity, liability for claims of creditors as an alter ego, breach of fiduciary duty while the debtor was still a subsidiary, and disallowance or equitable subordination of the parent's claims. The former parent demanded a jury trial and moved to withdraw the reference of the adversary proceeding and transfer it to the judicial district where the debtor and the former parent are both located. After plan confirmation, the district court withdraws the reference of the action. It concludes that the unlawful dividend claim, the alter ego claim, and the breach of fiduciary duty claim are non-core, because a core proceeding is only one that invokes a substantive right provided under the Bankruptcy Code or one that can arise only in a bankruptcy case. It also concludes that the former parent is entitled to a jury trial on the breach of fiduciary duty claim, the fraudulent transfer claim, and the illegal dividend claim, because they seek money damages. Distinguishing Katchen v. Landy, 382 U.S. 323 (1966), and Langenkamp v. Kulp, 498 U.S. 42 (1990), the court concludes that the former parent's filing of a proof of claim in the bankruptcy case does not waive its jury trial right on the debtor in possession's claims or convert them to equitable claims, because a constitutional right may be waived only knowingly and willfully and because the claims for relief were not related to the subject of the proofs of claim and will not directly implicate the bankruptcy court's claim resolution process. Finally, the district court transfers the action to the judicial district where both the debtor and the former parent are located, because the only connection to the district where the action was filed was the debtor's chapter 11 case, which is not an adequate basis for retaining the case in that venue. Mirant Corp. v. Southern Co., 337 B.R. 107 (N.D. Tex. 2006).

- 11.1.zzzzzz Negative notice is adequate to protect due process rights. The chapter 13 debtor objected to the creditor's proof of claim with a "negative notice." That is, the notice said that if the creditor did not respond and request a hearing within 30 days, the bankruptcy court could enter an order without further hearing. Such notice is expressly authorized by section 102(1) in the definition of "after notice and a hearing" and is adequate to protect the creditor's due process rights. Roberts v. Pierce (In re Pierce), 435 F.3d 891 (8th Cir. 2006).
- 11.1.aaaaaa Bankruptcy court applies Italian automatic stay in the United States in an ancillary proceeding. The Italian debtor filed bankruptcy in Italy. It suffered a judgment against it in a U.S. court shortly after the bankruptcy. In addition, its Italian bankruptcy trustee obtained a judgment in the United States against a third party. The U.S. creditor in the first action, with knowledge of the Italian bankruptcy, garnished the debt owing to the Italian estate in the second action. When the Italian trustee learned of the garnishment, he filed an ancillary proceeding under section 304 and sought to apply the Italian automatic stay against the U.S. judgment creditor to void the garnishment. The court grants the motion. Section 304 permits not only an injunction but also "other appropriate relief." The Italian bankruptcy law provides, as the U.S. law does, that its automatic stay has extraterritorial reach. As such, the court stayed the U.S. judgment creditor's enforcement action. The bankruptcy court orders other appropriate relief under section 304 by recognizing the Italian automatic stay's extraterritorial reach. The factors in section 304 all weigh in favor of recognition of the Italian automatic stay: comity, just treatment of all creditors, protection of U.S. creditors from prejudice and inconvenience, prevention of preferential property dispositions, and equitable distribution of the estate, which are equally recognized by the Italian bankruptcy law and courts. Because the court recognizes the Italian stay from the time it was imposed, the garnishment violated the stay, so the court orders payment of the garnished funds to the Italian trustee for distribution in the Italian case. Adinolfi v. Empire Marble and Granite, Inc. (In re Rosacometta, S.R.L.), 336 B.R. 557 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2005).
- 11.1.bbbbbb Bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to adjudicate maritime liens on vessels arrested elsewhere. The debtor's vessels had been arrested in foreign ports, albeit after bankruptcy and therefore in violation of the automatic stay. The debtor sought a sale free and clear of liens in the bankruptcy court. The mortgage lienor consented to the sale free and clear, but three maritime lienors did not. After the sale and in compliance with the sale order, the debtor brought an adversary proceeding to determine rights in the proceeds. The maritime lienors participated in the adversary proceeding but objected to the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction to extinguish their maritime liens. They argued that only a court with admiralty jurisdiction, which is vested exclusively in the district court, may do so. The court rules that the bankruptcy court may adjudicate maritime liens where the lienors voluntarily submit to jurisdiction. The bankruptcy court's core subject matter jurisdiction encompasses adjudication of claims against the debtor's assets. Although bankruptcy courts may not exercise jurisdiction reserved exclusively to Article III courts, the court did not reach the question here of whether Congress had improperly authorized the bankruptcy courts to exercise such exclusive jurisdiction, because Congress may authorize and did in fact authorize the bankruptcy court to exercise jurisdiction over maritime assets where the maritime lienor voluntarily submits to the court's jurisdiction. Universal Oil Ltd. v. Allfirst Bank (In re Millennium Seacarriers, Inc.), 419 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2005).
- 11.1.cccccc Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction over indemnification claim arising out of fraudulent transfer. The debtor purchased a business shortly before bankruptcy. The liquidating trustee alleged that the debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value and sued the sellers for recovery of a constructively fraudulent transfer. The sellers filed a third-party complaint for negligent misrepresentation against the debtor's officers and directors, who had represented in the purchase agreement that the debtor was solvent. The bankruptcy court does not have "related-to" jurisdiction over the third-party complaint, because its outcome could not affect the assets or liabilities of the bankruptcy estate. The bankruptcy court does not have ancillary jurisdiction to hear such an action, despite the commonality of the operative facts. HA2003 Liquidating Trust v. Carramore Limited (In re HA-LO Indus., Inc.), 330 B.R. 663 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2005).

11.1.ddddddd Injunction under section 105 does not require showing of irreparable harm. A chapter 11 plan provided for a liquidating trustee, who brought an action against the debtor's former parent entity for a fraudulent transfer in the bankruptcy court in California. The former parent sued the liquidating trustee in Delaware, alleging a violation of a venue selection clause in a Settlement Agreement that the debtor and the parent had entered into before bankruptcy. The trustee asked the bankruptcy court to enjoin the Delaware action under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), which requires leave of the appointing court before suing an equity receiver or, by subsequent case law extension, a bankruptcy trustee. The bankruptcy court may enjoin the Delaware action under section 105 without a showing of irreparable harm. Section 105 provides the necessary authority to issue an injunction to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. That authority is adequate to authorize injunctions against violation of Bankruptcy Code principles or doctrines. Beck v. Fort James Corp. (In re Crown Vantage, Inc.), 421 F.3d 963 (9th Cir. 2005).

11.1.eeeeeee Confirmation order modifying leases between third parties is res judicata and may not be attacked. The debtor leased advertising kiosks to various lessees, then assigned its lessor interest to a finance company on a nonrecourse basis. Many lessees stopped paying before the debtor's bankruptcy because of related disputes. The debtor's plan proposed a modification in general of the terms of the leases, some of which had expired before bankruptcy. The lessees received notice of the plan and of confirmation and did not object. After confirmation, the lessor (the debtor's assignee) served the lessees with notice of the revised lease terms. The lease modifications were enforceable against the lessees. Even though it may have strained the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction to revive the expired leases or to modify leases between two non-debtors, the plan clearly did so, and when the confirmation became final, it was res judicata and binding on the lessees. The lessees were parties to the case and had notice of the plan and confirmation hearing and could have challenged the court's jurisdiction then. They may not do so after the order becomes final where, as here, the exercise of jurisdiction was not beyond constitutional bounds. Finova Capital Corp. v. Larson Pharmacy Inc. (In re Optical Techs. Inc.), 425 F.3d 1294 (11th Cir. 2005).

11.1.fyyyyyy Section 107(b)'s exception to public access to court documents should be narrowly construed. Because of a seemingly intractable dispute between the debtor and the creditors committee and among committee members, the parties agreed to the appointment of an examiner. The court authorized the examiner to have access to attorney-client and work product privileged documents for the purpose of preparing the report, without waiving the privileges as to third parties, and temporarily sealed the report pending a determination of whether it should be sealed to protect privilege or as required under section 107(b). The report was sharply critical of some committee members, who asked that the report be sealed. Section 107 reflects a presumption of public access to court documents. The exceptions are to be construed narrowly, and the proponent of sealing an examiner's report or applying an exception has the burden of proof. The evidentiary attorney-client and work-product privileges are distinct from any protection contemplated under section 107(b). The distinction can be addressed by redacting portions of the examiner's report without sealing the entire report. In re Fibermark, Inc., 330 B.R. 480 (Bankr. D. Vt. 2005).

11.1.ggggggg No right to jury trial in action for breach of fiduciary duty or recovery of fraudulent transfer. The liquidating trustee sued the debtor's former directors and lenders for breach of fiduciary duty in approving and financing a merger that led to the debtor's financial problems. Although one element of a claim for breach of fiduciary duty is negligence, a classic common law action, the claim for breach is equitable by its nature. Even though the trustee sought money damages, the action is not an action at common law, because the amount sought was in the nature of restitution, intending to “restore the status quo ante and return a sum rightfully belonging to another.” Restitution is an equitable remedy that does not give rise to a jury trial right. The trustee also sought recovery of a fraudulent transfer. Although the lenders had not filed proofs of claim, their claims were listed on the schedules as fixed, undisputed, and liquidated. The lenders did not submit to jurisdiction nor waive jury trial by filing a proof of claim. However, because the fraudulent transfer claim mirrors the trustee’s objection to the lenders’ claim, which is deemed filed by the listing on the schedules, the action is part of the claims allowance process and therefore not entitled to a jury trial. In addition, the trustee seeks only the equitable remedy of avoidance of the repayment obligation and of the lenders’ security interest. Liquidation Trust v. Fleet Retail Fin. Group (In re Hechinger Inv. Co.), 327 B.R. 537 (D. Del. 2005).

11.1.hhhhhh District court may abstain in nonbankruptcy litigation on comity grounds in favor of foreign bankruptcy proceeding. The creditor maintained a collection account in a U.S. bank for some of the foreign debtor’s receivables. The agreement permitted the creditor to apply the funds only in payment of the debt and required return of any surplus to the debtor. The debtor filed a suspension de pagos (suspension of payments) proceeding, similar to a U.S. chapter 11 case, in Mexico and sought to enjoin the creditor from applying the bank account funds to the debt. The bank brought an action in federal district court, seeking a determination that it owned the funds. The court should abstain on international comity grounds in favor of the foreign bankruptcy proceeding. Although prior Second Circuit precedent did not require abstention where the case presented the threshold question of whether the debtor or the other party owned the property, Koreag v. Refco F/X Assocs., Inc. (In re Koreag), 961 F.2d 431 (2d Cir. 1992), that case should be read as permitting the U.S. court to determine the issue only when there is a bona fide ownership dispute. Here, the creditor was plainly attempting to apply property to the payment of a debt, a matter which should be decided by the foreign bankruptcy court. Accordingly, the U.S. court must abstain. JP Morgan Chase Bank v. Altos Hornos de Mexico, S.A. de C.V., 412 F.3d 418 (2d Cir. 2005).

11.1.iiiiii Bankruptcy jurisdiction does not extend to action by a tort victim against a debtor’s insurer on a prepetition insurance settlement. A tort victim sued the debtor before bankruptcy. The debtor’s insurer defended and, before bankruptcy, settled and agreed to pay the victim. Before payment was made, the debtor filed chapter 11. The insurer then refused to pay, arguing that the tort action was stayed. The victim sued in state court. The insurer removed the suit to the United States district court. The district court remanded because it does not have jurisdiction. The action does not arise under title 11, because it existed independently of the bankruptcy case before the case was filed. It does not arise in the title 11 case, because it does not arise during the bankruptcy case and concern the administration of the estate. Finally, the action is not related to the title 11 case. Although an insurance policy and its proceeds are normally property of the estate, in this case, it appears that the settlement amount was less than the debtor’s self-insured retention under the policy, so the insurer’s payment of the settlement amount does not implicate the policy at all. Moreover, the insurance company’s obligation to the tort victim under the settlement agreement is independent of any obligation the debtor may have to the victim. Wetzel v. Lumberman’s Mut. Cas. Co., 324 B.R. 333 (S.D. Ind. 2005).

11.1.jjjjjj Mandatory abstention applies in a removed action. Section 1334(c)(2) requires a district court to abstain from hearing a non-core proceeding if, among other things, “an action is commenced, and can be timely adjudicated, in a State forum of appropriate jurisdiction.” Once an action is removed, it is no longer pending in the state court. However, the action was previously “commenced,” even though not currently pending, so section 1334(c)(2) mandatory abstention applies to removed actions. This conclusion follows decisions from the Fifth, Sixth, and Eleventh Circuits and splits with the Ninth Circuit. Mt. McKinley Ins. Co. v. Corning Inc., 399 F.3d 436 (2d Cir. 2005).

- 11.1.kkkkkkk Arbitration clause is enforceable in a non-core proceeding. The debtor was a distributor of medical products. The trustee sued the debtor's former supplier in the Rhode Island bankruptcy court for breach of the distribution agreement, which provided for arbitration in Tennessee, claiming that arbitration in Tennessee would be inconvenient and expensive. The bankruptcy court ordered arbitration, but in Rhode Island. The supplier appealed. In this non-core proceeding, the trustee stands in the debtor's shoes and is bound by the arbitration clause. Inconvenience and expense are not adequate reasons to disregard a forum selection clause. Therefore, arbitration must proceed in Tennessee. Furness v. Wright Med. Tech., Inc. (In re Mercurio), 402 F.3d 62 (1st Cir. 2005).
- 11.1.lllllll A core proceeding need not be arbitrated. The debtor and its principals, some of whom were foreign, had entered into international arbitration agreements for any dispute arising out of their relationships. After bankruptcy, the foreign principals initiated an arbitration proceeding in London. The U.S. principal, who had advanced substantial funds to the debtor, filed an adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy court to establish his claim and to enjoin the arbitration. The Convention on Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, Dec. 29, 1970, 21 U.S.T. 2517, implemented by the federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. § 1 et seq., requires that the dispute be arbitrated unless Congress determined that the kind of dispute should be heard in the courts. An inherent conflict between domestic law and the Convention is a ground for refusing arbitration. The bankruptcy law contemplates centralization of all disputes relating to claims against a debtor's assets in the bankruptcy court as core proceedings. Arbitration would conflict with this policy. Therefore, enjoining the arbitration proceeding and hearing the dispute in the bankruptcy court is proper. Mowbay, L.L.C. v. White Mtn. Mining Co. (In re White Mtn. Mining Co.), 403 F.3d 164 (4th Cir. 2005).
- 11.1.mmmmmmm Tax Court may properly defer to the bankruptcy court on automatic stay issue. The IRS applied a payment from the debtor's wife's property on dischargeable taxes. The debtor sought internal IRS review, claiming, among other things, that the application of the payment violated the automatic stay. Although the Tax Court may determine whether the automatic stay applies in particular cases, this case presented an especially complex set of facts. The Tax Court believed that the bankruptcy court would have better expertise on the issue and deferred. Deferral under these circumstances is not an abuse of discretion. Meadows v. Comm'r, 405 F.3d 949 (11th Cir. 2005).
- 11.1.nnnnnnn District court has jurisdiction to determine effect of automatic stay. The State Attorney General had sued the debtor before bankruptcy for a Clayton Act violation in a district court venue other than where the bankruptcy case was later filed. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession filed a "suggestion of stay" with the district court, and the district court granted a discretionary stay, based in part on a concern about whether it had jurisdiction to decide whether the police or regulatory exception to the automatic stay applied. The court of appeals concludes that the district court has jurisdiction to decide whether the stay and the exception apply, although under In re Gruntz, 202 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2002), its decision would not have preclusive effect on the bankruptcy court. Lockyer v. Mirant Corp., 398 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2005).
- 11.1.ooooooo Dispute on a state law claim under a prepetition employment contract is not a core proceeding. The debtor's former employee sought relief from the stay to proceed with an arbitration under his prepetition employment contract with the debtor. The court granted relief from the stay because the dispute over the claim is not a core proceeding. The claim was governed solely by state law. The employee had not filed a proof of claim, except after the appeal, and then only under compulsion of an impending bar date and with a full reservation of all rights. Under Third Circuit law, a proceeding is core "if it invokes a substantive right provided by title 11 or if it is a proceeding that by its nature, could arise only in the context of a bankruptcy case." This claim met neither of those requirements. What's more, the filing of the proof of claim did not make the proceeding core, in part because of the reservation of rights, in part because the claim was filed while the appeal was pending and therefore not a part of the record, and in part because a proof of claim does not invariably turn a non-core proceeding into a core proceeding (on these points, the court may not have adequately distinguished the treatment of affirmative claims by the estate with claims against the estate). Hylland v. Northwestern Corp. (In re Northwestern Corp.), 319 B.R. 68 (D. Del. 2005).

11.1.ppppppp Postconfirmation “related to” jurisdiction is more limited than preconfirmation jurisdiction. The chapter 11 plan provided for the establishment of a new corporation to undertake certain environmental remediation work. The State contracted with the new corporation to perform the work, and the debtor transferred funds to the corporation and the State to fund it. Within a few months after confirmation, disputes arose, and the State terminated the contract, directing the work to an unrelated company that hired many of the new corporation’s employees. The new corporation and the chapter 11 liquidating trustee, which owned the stock of the new corporation, sued the State and the unrelated company for breach of contract, tortious interference, and fraud in the inducement and sought recovery of the transferred funds. The Ninth Circuit adopts the Third Circuit’s “close nexus” test, see In re Resorts Int’l, Inc., 372 F.3d 154 (3d Cir. 2004), to determine the extent of the bankruptcy court’s postconfirmation jurisdiction. Under this test, the court has jurisdiction if there is a close nexus to the bankruptcy plan or proceeding sufficient to uphold jurisdiction. Here, the court had jurisdiction, because the claim for fraudulent inducement grew out of the plan and its negotiation, and the remedies sought could affect the implementation and execution of the plan. The bankruptcy court had supplemental jurisdiction over the remaining claims under 28 U.S.C. § 1367, which applies in bankruptcy cases, because the claims here are part of the same Article III case or controversy. Montana v. Goldin (In re Pegasus Gold Corp.), 389 F.3d 1189 (9th Cir. 2005).

11.1.qqqqqqq Removal of entire civil action requires consent of all defendants. A chapter 11 debtor in possession brought a state court action against several defendants. One defendant removed the entire civil action to the bankruptcy court. The plaintiff-debtor in possession moved to remand. Removal under 28 U.S.C. § 1446 (general federal question jurisdiction) requires the consent of all defendants. Section 1452 (bankruptcy jurisdiction removal), by contrast, permits removal of a single claim or cause of action. “Claim” is used in the same sense as used in the term “claim preclusion” and so is claim and party specific. Therefore, if a party removes only the claim or cause of action in which the party is involved, unanimity is not required. If, however, the party removes the entire civil action, as in this case, section 1452 does not apply, so the unanimity requirement does. Orion Refining Corp. v. Fluor Enters., Inc., 319 B.R. 480 (E.D. La. 2004).

11.1.rrrrrrr Probate exception to federal jurisdiction applies in bankruptcy. The debtor challenged the probate of her late husband’s will in Texas probate court and claimed that his son had interfered with his intent to give her an inter vivos gift. She also brought a claim in the bankruptcy court for damages against the son for tortious interference with the husband’s intent to give the gift. The probate exception to federal jurisdiction applies whenever a federal court is asked to probate a will or to interfere with the probate proceedings, assume general jurisdiction of the probate, or assume control of property in the state court’s custody. Here, the action on tortious interference and on whether the husband had intended to give an inter vivos gift interfered with the probate proceedings, because it was a disguised attack on the husband’s will, and those proceedings had already resolved the question. Therefore, the claim is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Marshall v. Marshall (In re Marshall), 392 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2004).

11.1.sssssss Under FIRREA, a bank receivership does not oust a bankruptcy court of jurisdiction over pending preference action. The trustee sued the bank to recover a preference. The FDIC later took over the bank under FIRREA, which requires that all postreceivership claims against the bank be processed through an administrative procedure and that any pending actions at the time of the receivership be stayed for 90 days to permit the receiver to request a stay to permit administrative processing. The receiver here did not do so but raised the jurisdictional bar only after the appeal from the preference judgment was pending. Under the circumstances, FIRREA's jurisdictional restrictions do not apply to prevent the bankruptcy court from hearing the matter to conclusion. Superior Bank, FSB v. Boyd (In re Lewis), 398 F.3d 735 (6th Cir. 2004).

11.1.tttttt Corporation's domicile is its place of incorporation. A Cayman Islands corporation, with all of its assets and its place of business in the United States, filed a liquidation case in the Cayman Islands under Cayman law. Section 304 authorizes ancillary jurisdiction upon an application by a foreign representative in a "foreign proceeding," which is defined as a proceeding "in a foreign country in which the debtor's domicile, residence, principal place of business or principal assets were located." Section 304 applies in this case, because the corporation's domicile is the Cayman Islands. Hoffman v. Bullmore (In re National Warranty Ins. Risk Retention Group), 384 F.3d 959 (8th Cir. 2004).

11.1.uuuuuu Plan provisions cannot create "related to" jurisdiction. Under the Third Circuit's Pacor test, a bankruptcy court has "related to" jurisdiction over a proceeding if "the outcome of that proceeding could conceivably have any effect on the estate being administered in bankruptcy". In this case, the plan proposed an injunction against claims asserted against a non-debtor third party. The injunction was critical to the success of the plan, and creditors' recoveries would have been seriously impaired if the injunction were eliminated and the plan were therefore not confirmed. The bankruptcy court did not have any other basis for asserting jurisdiction over the claims against the non-debtor. The plan provision, and the business needs underlying it, do not create related to jurisdiction to permit the bankruptcy court to issue the injunction when jurisdiction does not exist independently of the plan provision, because jurisdiction cannot be conferred by consent of the parties, such as through a plan. Similarly, the corporate affiliate between the debtor and the non-debtor injunction beneficiary does not create related to jurisdiction. In re Combustion Eng'g, Inc., 391 F.3d 190 (3d Cir. 2004).

11.1.vvvvvv Section 505(a) does not permit abstention. Section 505(a) provides that a bankruptcy court "may" determine certain tax claims. A majority of courts have construed the section to permit discretionary abstention when a trustee or debtor in possession seeks such a determination, basing the exercise of discretion on six factors, four of which address court considerations (complexity of the issues, burden on court's docket, etc.) and two of which balance the potential prejudice to the debtor, the creditors, and the taxing agency. The court concludes, however, that section 505(a) does not authorize abstention at all. The statute's language and structure lead to the conclusion that abstention is governed only by section 1334(c) of title 28, not by section 505(a), which contains no statutory standards to govern an abstention decision. In addition, of the factors the courts have developed, the first four are not a proper basis in any proceeding for a court to determine whether to hear a dispute brought before it, and the latter two address the merits of whether the court should grant section 505(a) relief, not whether the court may abstain from exercising jurisdiction. Finally, a court may not abstain under section 1334(c) where abstention would be preclusive, that is, where there is no other forum available. It was not designed as a means of denying relief altogether, only of allocating responsibility for hearing proceedings in bankruptcy cases. The court will therefore proceed to a consideration of the merits of the section 505(a) request and determine in a subsequent proceeding whether relief should be granted, based in part on whether the relief is consistent with Congress's creditor-protection purpose in enacting section 505(a). Hospitality Ventures/La Vista v. Heartwood 11, L.L.C. (In re Hospitality Ventures/La Vista), 314 B.R. 843 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2004).

- 11.1.wwwwwww Section 304-related dispute requires mandatory withdrawal. The debtor sought to restructure under the Argentine acuerdo preventivo extrajudicial (APE), which provides a procedure that is similar to a prepackaged chapter 11 case. A U.S. noteholder sought recovery in the U.S. courts of amounts owing under the bonds. The debtor commenced a section 304 proceeding, seeking ancillary relief in the form of an injunction against the creditor's action. The bankruptcy court granted a TRO and set the matter for trial. Before trial, on the creditor's motion, the district court withdraws the reference. It reasons that the issue before the bankruptcy court will be the interaction of section 304 of the Bankruptcy Code with the Trust Indenture Act, which generally prohibits a note issuer from restructuring its obligations to a particular noteholder without that noteholder's consent. Because the decision will turn on material consideration and interpretation of both statutes, one of which regulates "organizations or activities affecting interstate commerce," section 157(d) makes withdrawal mandatory. In re Cablevision S.A., 315 B.R. 818 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 11.1.xxxxxxx Minimum contacts not required for personal jurisdiction within the United States. The Texas debtor in possession sued a California defendant in Texas to collect for the debtor's prepetition sale of goods to the defendant in California. The defendant moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, arguing that it had no contacts with the forum state. The court denies the motion, holding that for federal subject matter jurisdiction, minimum contacts with the United States, not the forum state, is all that is required for personal jurisdiction, and that assumption of jurisdiction would not offend due process or notions of fair play. L.D. Brinkman Corp. v. Anderco Carpet Co. (In re L.D. Brinkman Holdings, Inc.), 310 B.R. 68 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2004).
- 11.1.yyyyyyy Claim against debtor's accountant for prepetition negligence is a core proceeding. The debtor's accountant's prepetition audits failed to uncover fraudulent financial statements that the debtor's management had prepared. The accountant performed prepetition services to restate the financial statements and filed a proof of claim for the services. The plan disbursing agent, who had been authorized to pursue estate claims for relief, brought an adversary proceeding against the accountant for damages resulting from the negligent performance of the audits. The proceeding was a core proceeding, because the claim against the accountant was directly related to and arose out of the same operative facts as the accountant's prepetition claim for fees for the restatement. Consideration of the allowance of that claim would require consideration of the disbursing agent's claim relating to the original audit. Ernst & Young v. Bankruptcy Servs., Inc. (In re CBI Holding Co.), 311 B.R. 350 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 11.1.zzzzzzz Bankruptcy court may authorize rejection of FERC-regulated contract. The debtor had entered into a power purchase agreement, which had been approved by FERC. Under the filed rate doctrine, FERC has exclusive jurisdiction over rates charged under such a contract. Rejection of the contract under the Bankruptcy Code is not a challenge to the filed rate. Even if the reason for rejection is that the rate is too high for the debtor's rehabilitation, the rejection damage claim would be based on the filed rate, and rejection would have only an indirect effect on the filed rate. Payment on the rejection claim of an amount less than the filed rate arises not from the rejection itself but from the terms of a reorganization plan providing generally for payment of claims against the debtor. Still, the bankruptcy court should consider authorizing rejection only under a more rigorous standard that takes account of the regulatory interest in the transaction. Mirant Corp. v. Potomac Elec. Power Co. (In re Mirant Corp.), 378 F.3d 511 (5th Cir. 2004), affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding 303 B.R. 304.
- 11.1.aaaaaaa Bankruptcy court may enjoin regulatory proceeding. Section 362(b)(4) excepts police and regulatory proceedings from the automatic stay. Section 105(a) authorizes the bankruptcy court to enjoin such proceedings on a case-by-case basis, but only in exceptional circumstances. Section 105 permits orders only as necessary to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. Therefore, an order enjoining FERC from taking any regulatory action that would negate the bankruptcy court's authorization to reject a power purchase agreement, such as by requiring continued performance under the agreement, is proper. But an injunction prohibiting FERC from taking any action with respect to the contract was too broad, because it was inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code's presumption, reflected in section 362(b)(4), that a debtor in possession remains subject to on-going regulatory jurisdiction. Mirant Corp. v. Potomac Elec. Power Co. (In re Mirant Corp.), 378 F.3d 511 (5th Cir. 2004), affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding 303 B.R. 304.

11.1.bbbbbbbb Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction over prepetition attorneys' fee paid by debtor's insurer to claimants' lawyers. Before bankruptcy, the debtor reached a settlement among one of its insurance companies, asbestos claimants, and their lawyers over asbestos liability. Under the settlement, the insurer would pay a sum to the claimants, who would release the insurer; the insurer would pay the claimants' attorneys' fees for negotiating the settlement, and the debtor would file a prepackaged chapter 11 to bind all claimants. The bankruptcy court confirmed the plan but ordered disgorgement of the fees. The district court reverses, holding that the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction over a prepetition transaction between two non-debtors. The dispute was not "related to" the chapter 11 case, because the debtor had not paid the fees and the agreement provided that if the fees were ordered returned, they would be repaid to the insurer. In re Western Asbestos Co., 313 B.R. 859 (N.D. Cal. 2004).

11.1.cccccccc Postconfirmation jurisdiction is not available for litigating trust's malpractice claim. The plan created a litigation trust, which hired an accountant. A dispute arose between the trust and the reorganized debtor over interest on funds the trust held. The trustee alleged that the accountant committed malpractice because its audit incorrectly showed the reorganized debtor was entitled to a portion of the interest, leading to lengthy and expensive litigation over the question. The trustee sued the accountant on the malpractice claim in the bankruptcy court. The court dismisses for lack of jurisdiction. A plan provision providing for retention of jurisdiction cannot expand the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction beyond that granted by 28 U.S.C. § 1334. Postconfirmation jurisdiction is limited, in part because of the revesting of the estate. Thus, a dispute is less likely to have an effect on the estate. "[T]he claim must affect an integral aspect of the bankruptcy process—there must be a close nexus to the bankruptcy plan or proceeding." The court traces several postconfirmation jurisdiction decisions in drawing that line, providing a good analysis of the contours of postconfirmation jurisdiction. In this case, because the dispute does not require an interpretation of the plan or the related documents such as the trust agreement, affect the reorganized debtor, or interfere with the implementation of the plan, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction. Binder v. Price Waterhouse & Co., LP (In re Resorts Int'l, Inc.), 372 F.3d 154 (3d Cir. 2004).

11.1.dddddddd Core jurisdiction requires express consent. A special counsel appointed by the bankruptcy court initiated disciplinary proceedings against an attorney by adversary proceeding. The complaint did not allege that the proceeding was core. The defendant's answer did not address the issue, and the question was not litigated in the proceeding. When the bankruptcy court issued an order for sanctions against the attorney which included a determination that the proceeding was core, the attorney moved for reconsideration, asserting that the proceeding was non-core and that he had not consented to the bankruptcy court's issuance of a final order. Although Bankruptcy Rule 7012(b) requires a defendant's answer to admit or deny an allegation that a proceeding is core or non-core, the complaint did not contain such an allegation, so the defendant's failure to assert whether the proceeding was core was not a waiver or consent. Moreover, the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 7008(a) says, "Only express consent in the pleadings or otherwise is effective to authorize entry of a final order or judgment by the bankruptcy judge in a non-core proceeding." Since the defendant objected to jurisdiction the first time the issue was raised in the proceeding, he did not waive the objection. Sheridan v. Michels (In re Sheridan), 362 F.3d 96 (1st Cir. 2004).

11.1.eeeeeeee Omnibus disciplinary proceeding is non-core. Suspecting that an attorney had failed to adequately represent clients in over 75 chapter 13 cases, the bankruptcy court initiated disciplinary proceedings against the attorney by appointing a special counsel to investigate and bring an action to determine whether the attorney should be sanctioned. After trial, the bankruptcy court imposed sanctions. The Court of Appeals, over a vigorous dissent, vacates the order. Because the proceeding was non-core and the attorney did not consent to jurisdiction, the bankruptcy court was not authorized to issue a final order, only a recommended order for consideration by the district court. Section 157(b) does not include such a proceeding as core, because it does not relate to the administration of a particular case and would not affect the outcome of any case. The Court of Appeals carefully distinguishes such an omnibus disciplinary proceeding from a proceeding for sanctions for conduct in a particular case that is still open, leaving for another day the issue whether such single proceedings may be core. Sheridan v. Michels (In re Sheridan), 362 F.3d 96 (1st Cir. 2004).

11.1.fyyyyyyy Individual Securities Act claims may be removed to the bankruptcy court. Section 1452(a) of title 28 permits any party to a civil action to remove to the bankruptcy court a claim or cause of action in a civil action over which there is bankruptcy jurisdiction, with exceptions only for police or regulatory proceedings brought by a governmental unit and proceedings before the United States Tax Court. Section 22(a) of the Securities Act of 1933 prohibits removal of individual (as opposed to class) actions to any court of the United States. The statutes appear categorical and contradictory. In a case of first impression at the court of appeals level, the Second Circuit resolves the conflict in favor of the bankruptcy removal statute, so as to further the bankruptcy goal of centralizing administration of the estate and dealing with all claims in one forum. California Public Employees' Retirement System v. WorldCom, Inc., 368 F.3d 86 (2d Cir. 2004).

11.1.gyyyyyyyy Foreign reorganization proceeding may take precedence over Trust Indenture Act. The Argentine debtor, which had issued U.S. dollar denominated notes that was subject to the Trust Indenture Act, had commenced a reorganization proceeding under Argentine law. U.S. holders commenced a collection action in New York state court. The debtor sought protection under section 304. The holders sought dismissal on the ground that section 312(b) of the Trust Indenture Act prohibited a majority vote of holders in the Argentine proceeding from modifying their rights under the notes. The court denies the motion to dismiss. Citing an 1883 Supreme Court case and Second Circuit precedent, it rules that holder of foreign company notes, whether or not qualified under the TIA, are subject to the foreign country's bankruptcy laws. Comity requires that United States courts recognize foreign reorganization proceedings that bind home country creditors so that creditors abroad can also be bound. The court also grants recognition to the Argentine proceeding under section 304, ruling that the proceeding need not be identical to U.S. proceedings to merit recognition. In re Board of Directors of Multicanal, S.A., 307 B.R. 384 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2004).

11.1.hhhhhhhh Bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction to interpret bankruptcy provisions of a confirmed plan. The bankruptcy court had confirmed a plan and had reserved jurisdiction to interpret it. After confirmation, one of the debtor's shareholders obtained a judgment against another in a Norwegian court and domesticated the judgment in a Washington state court. The Washington state court issued an order enforcing the judgment. While that was on appeal, the defendant shareholder sought a bankruptcy court injunction against enforcement, arguing that the terms of the confirmed plan were a res judicata determination of his liability. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. concludes that the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to consider the issue. Relying on In re Gruntz, 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000), the B.A.P. concludes that the bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction over core proceedings, which are those that "arise under" the Bankruptcy Code, that the court's jurisdiction continues even after a case has been closed to enable a bankruptcy court to enforce its own orders, and that where jurisdiction has been retained, it will be considered exclusive. However, the exclusive jurisdiction extends only to core matters that fall within the bankruptcy court's "arising under" jurisdiction. By contrast, a plan often involves non-core matters. In this case, the plan provision at issue established the rights among the shareholders as a matter of bankruptcy law. Therefore, as in Gruntz, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to review the state court judgment, which would have exceeded the state court's jurisdiction if it had construed the confirmed plan incorrectly. Huse v. Huse-Sporesem, A.S. (In re Birthing Fisheries, Inc.), 300 B.R. 489 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).

- 11.1.iiiiiii State court may rule on applicability of automatic stay. A tort claimant had sued the debtor, the debtor's insurer, and a third party indemnitee of the debtor in state court. The judgment was issued prepetition, but after bankruptcy the state court issued a remitter, despite the pendency of the automatic stay. After subsequent proceedings in the bankruptcy court and the district court, the district court allowed the state court to determine the effect of the automatic stay on the judgment and the post-trial motions. The Fifth Circuit affirms, ruling that state courts may rule on the applicability of the automatic stay to state judicial proceedings, and the district court did not improperly delegate its appellate authority to the state court. Chapman v. Bituminous Ins. Co. (In re Coho Resources, Inc.), 345 F.3d 338 (5th Cir. 2003).
- 11.1.jjjjjjj Bankruptcy court injunction against FERC is overturned. To preserve its jurisdiction to consider and rule upon a debtor in possession's motion to reject a wholesale power purchase agreement that was subject to FERC jurisdiction, the bankruptcy court enjoined FERC from taking any action to require performance of the contract. On appeal, the district court reverses. It holds that FERC has exclusive jurisdiction over prices and other terms for the sale of electricity for resale and that the bankruptcy court's authorizing contract rejection would affect the price at which power is to be sold. Because that issue is within FERC's exclusive jurisdiction, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to authorize the rejection and should not have enjoined FERC from proceeding. The district court suggests that the debtor in possession seek comparable relief from FERC, but under FERC's standard for modifying contract terms, not under the standard applicable for rejection of contracts in bankruptcy. In re Mirant Corp., 303 B.R. 304 (N.D. Tex. 2003) (299 B.R. 152, reversed), affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded.
- 11.1.kkkkkkk Bankruptcy judge enjoins FERC proceeding. The debtor moved to reject a power supply agreement that was subject to FERC jurisdiction. Because of FERC rulings in recent cases, the debtor in possession was concerned that FERC would order the debtor in possession to continue providing power under the agreement even after the bankruptcy court approved rejection. The bankruptcy court rules that it has the power to enjoin a federal agency, reasoning that a district court has such power, all of the district court's power in bankruptcy cases has been referred to the bankruptcy courts, and there is no prohibition in the Bankruptcy Code against enjoining a federal agency. It concludes further that the power to reject under section 365 would be vitiated by any agency action that required continued performance under the contract and that the bankruptcy court needed to act as the gatekeeper to manage the multiple proceedings that might take place in the court and in a regulatory agency regarding the contract. Finally, it concludes that injunctive relief is warranted because the delay inherent in the regulatory proceedings could irreparably harm the debtor's ability to conclude its chapter 11 case in a reasonable period of time and that there is no irreparable harm to FERC, because the bankruptcy court can hear FERC's opposition to the rejection motion and take into consideration the regulatory objectives involved, perhaps even imposing a higher standard for rejection than the business judgment test. Mirant Corp. v. Potomac Electric Power Co. (In re Mirant Corp.), 299 B.R. 152 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2003), reversed, 303 B.R. 304 (N.D. Tex. 2003).
- 11.1.iiiii "Related to" jurisdiction does not expire upon confirmation. The director defendants and underwriter defendants in a securities class action removed the action to the district court because the securities issuer was a debtor in a chapter 11 case. The plaintiffs sought remand by reason of the pending confirmation of the chapter 11 plan. They argued that the “related to” jurisdiction under which the actions were removed terminated upon confirmation, because once the plan was confirmed, the class action would not meet the jurisdictional test of having any conceivable effect on the bankruptcy estate. The court rules, however, that jurisdiction is determined when the case is commenced or removed. Adopting a contrary rule could create incentives to delay either the litigation or the bankruptcy. Therefore, the bankruptcy court retains jurisdiction even after confirmation. In re Worldcom, Inc. Securities Litigation, 294 B.R. 553 (S.D.N.Y. 2003)

11.1.mmmmmmm Bankruptcy removal must be to bankruptcy court, not district court. After bankruptcy, the debtor brought an action in state court against a creditor for violation of the automatic stay and for various other state law causes of action. The creditor removed the action to the district court. The district court grants the debtor’s motion for remand. It reasons that the district court has jurisdiction over the action only under the bankruptcy jurisdictional section, 28 U.S.C. § 1334(a). All matters arising under that jurisdictional grant have been referred, however, to the bankruptcy court. Because the debtor’s motion seeks only remand and not transfer to the bankruptcy court, the district court refuses to transfer and instead grants the motion for remand. Couloute v. Hunt, Leibert, Chester & Jacobson, LLC, 295 B.R. 689 (D. Conn. 2003).

11.1.nnnnnnn Potential preference defendant is not entitled to a declaratory judgment. The Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201-2202, was intended to provide a potential defendant with a forum to resolve a potential dispute that could affect the defendant’s conduct. It was not intended to permit a potential defendant to force a determination of liability for past conduct. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court dismisses a declaratory judgment action by recipients of potentially avoidable transfers for a determination of the avoidability of the transfers. Allen v. Official Employment-Related Issues Committee (In re Enron Corp.), 297 B.R. 382 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003).

11.1.ooooooo Bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction over contract retainage. The subcontractor had not paid its sub-subcontractor; the prime contractor still held a retainage for the subcontractor. After the subcontractor, the sub- subcontractor sued the prime contractor to recover from the retainage. The court dismisses the case, holding that the bankruptcy court in which the subcontractor’s case is pending has exclusive jurisdiction under section 1344(e) of the retainage, which is property of the subcontractor’s bankruptcy estate. Kane Enterprises v. MacGregor (USA), Inc., 232 F.3d 371 (5th Cir. 2003).

11.1.ppppppp Post-confirmation patent infringement action is related to the bankruptcy case. After confirmation, the reorganized debtors sued three non-creditor parties for pre-petition and post-petition infringement of patents that were critical to the success of the reorganization. The district court rules that the action is related to the bankruptcy case. It also rules that the minimum contact standard set out in International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945), does not apply in bankruptcy, giving the bankruptcy courts personal jurisdiction over defendants anywhere in the United States. Cytomedix v. Little Rock Foot, 287 B.R. 901 (N.D. Ill. 2002).

11.1.qqqqqqq An action pending in district court may not be removed. A creditor had brought a pre-petition action against the debtor in the United States District Court. The debtor filed a bankruptcy petition in the same district and sought to remove the action. The bankruptcy court rules that the removal notice is a nullity. Jurisdiction of bankruptcy cases is vested in the district court, subject to referral to the bankruptcy court. The district court’s standing order of referral does not refer pending civil actions. Because a party may not remove a case to the same court in which it is pending, and because the reference order does not automatically refer the pending matter, the removal petition was ineffective to transfer the matter to the bankruptcy court.

Unnamed Individuals v. The Academy, Inc. (In re The Academy, Inc.), 288 B.R. 286 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2002).

11.1.rrrrrrrr Bankruptcy court not bound by district judge's decision. In a district in which there is more than one district judge, the bankruptcy court judges in the district are not bound by a decision of a single district judge. The court reasons that another district judge in the same district may reach a different conclusion, because the first district judge's conclusion is not generally binding on other judges in the district. Accordingly, the decision is not binding on bankruptcy judges either. Talking Rain Beverage Co., Inc. v. NHB, LLC (In re NHB, LLC), 287 B.R. 475 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2002).

11.1.ssssssss Bankruptcy court may not enjoin pursuit of claim in a foreign proceeding. The creditor asserted a securities fraud claim that would be subordinated under section 510(b) in the debtor's chapter 11 case. But in the debtor's parallel proceeding in the Belgian bankruptcy court, the claim would not be subordinated. The debtor sought a declaration that the claim is subordinated. Instead, the bankruptcy court enjoined the creditor from pursuing the claim in the Belgian court. The Third Circuit rules that the order constituted an "anti-suit injunction," even though it attempted to enjoin only the party to the foreign proceeding. The Third Circuit follows the "restrictive" approach to permitting anti-suit injunctions (along with the Second, Sixth, and District of Columbia Circuits), contrasted with the liberal approach of the Fifth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits. Under the restrictive approach, the injunction may be granted only if the purpose of the foreign proceeding was specifically to interfere with the U.S. court's exercise of its own jurisdiction. Where, as here, there is simply a difference in the law of the two countries, an anti-suit injunction is not appropriate. Moreover, the "center of gravity" and choice of law analysis under In re Maxwell Communication Corp., 93 F.3d 1036 (2d Cir. 1996), does not apply because Maxwell involved only a choice of law and a determination to dismiss the U.S. proceeding, not an injunction against a foreign proceeding. Stonington Partners, Inc. v. Lernout & Hauspie Speech Products, N.V., 310 F.3d 118 (3d Cir. 2002).

11.1.tttttttt A motion to re-open is strictly administrative. The bankruptcy court denied a motion to re-open a bankruptcy case to permit the filing of a non-dischargeability complaint under section 523(a)(3)(B). The court based its denial in large part on the futility of the underlying complaint, which the court determined would be barred by laches. The Ninth Circuit reverses, holding that a court should not examine the underlying merits sought to be litigated upon the granting of the motion to re-open. Rather, the motion to re-open addresses only whether further administration appears to be warranted. In addition, a late non-dischargeability complaint under section 523(a)(3)(B) does not require a re-opening of the case, because it is an adversary proceeding that does not implicate the administration of the case. Staffer v. Predovich (In re Staffer), 306 F.3d 967 (9th Cir. 2002).

11.1.uuuuuuuu Plan jurisdiction retention provision trumps arbitration clause. A professional had performed services for the debtor before bankruptcy under an engagement agreement that provided for arbitration of any disputes. The debtor proposed a plan that would have settled some of the disputes. The professional objected, and the bankruptcy court required modification of the plan to remove the settlement. After confirmation, the debtor sued the professional in the bankruptcy court under the provision of the plan that provided for the bankruptcy court to retain jurisdiction "to adjudicate any pending adversary proceeding" The professional sought to compel arbitration. The Seventh Circuit rules that the plan provision effectively modified the pre-petition engagement agreement, eliminating the arbitration requirement and substituting the bankruptcy court's retained jurisdiction to adjudicate disputes. Ernst & Young LLP v. Baker O'Neal Holdings, Inc., 304 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 2002).

- 11.1.vvvvvvvv Bankruptcy court may decline to order arbitration of core proceeding. Before bankruptcy, the debtor brought litigation arising out of a partnership against her former partners. The partnership contained an arbitration clause. After bankruptcy, she removed the action to the bankruptcy court and added fraudulent transfer and strong-arm power recovery causes of action. The defendants moved to stay the proceeding and require arbitration. The Fifth Circuit rules that arbitration is not required, despite the Federal Arbitration Act, in a core proceeding. The bankruptcy court has discretion to determine whether the proceeding should proceed in the bankruptcy court. Gandy v. Gandy (In re Gandy), 299 F.3d 489 (5th Cir. 2002).
- 11.1.wwwwwwwww Court may not remand case to a stranger court. After the debtor plaintiff filed bankruptcy, it removed its Florida state court action to the Florida U.S. District Court, which transferred the case to the Delaware U.S. District Court. The Delaware District Court remanded the action under section 1452(b) to the Delaware Superior Court. The defendant appealed; the plaintiff petitioned for writ of mandamus. The Third Circuit rules that it does not have jurisdiction to review on appeal an order of remand made “on any equitable ground,” which, in this case, included a remand based on the abstention grounds in section 1334(c)(1) of “in the interest of justice.” It did conclude, however, that a remand to a stranger court is not permissible. Accordingly, the district court acted beyond its jurisdiction, and a writ of mandamus was appropriate to vacate the remand order. The Third Circuit suggested that the Delaware District Court could have authority to remand the case to the Florida state court, because the transferee court (Delaware) had all of the jurisdiction and power of the transferor court (Florida). Allied Signal Recovery Trust v. Allied Signal, Inc., 298 F.3d 263 (3d Cir. 2002).
- 11.1.xxxxxxxx Remand order not reviewable by mandamus. Friction Product Defendants, who had potential indemnification claims against the debtor, removed thousands of asbestos cases from state courts to district courts around the country. The district court in Delaware provisionally transferred the cases to itself under section 157(b), but ultimately remanded the cases to the state courts from which they were removed. On appeal and on petition for writ of mandamus, the Third Circuit rules that the district court did not have “related to” jurisdiction over the actions, because the mere possibility of indemnification claims against the debtor did not make the cases sufficiently related to the debtor’s bankruptcy case. The court also rules that the prohibition on review of a remand order “by appeal or otherwise” prohibits review of the order by writ of mandamus. Accordingly, the appeal is dismissed In re Federal-Mogul Global, Inc., 300 F.3d 368 (3d Cir. 2002).
- 11.1.yyyyyyyy State court has no jurisdiction regarding discharged debt. The debtor listed a minor on his schedules. The minor did not bring a dischargeability complaint within the deadline set by section 523(c). After the minor reached majority, he sued the debtor in state court on the discharged claim. The state court ruled that notice to the minor creditor had not been adequate and that he was therefore not bound by the discharge. The debtor sought to reopen the bankruptcy case to enforce the discharge injunction. The Ninth Circuit rules that it was an abuse of discretion for the bankruptcy court not to reopen the case. Relying on its prior decision in Gruntz v. Los Angeles, 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000), which held that determination of the breach of the automatic stay was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court, the Ninth Circuit reaches the same conclusion on the discharge of claims of creditors who were listed in the schedules. Although the court acknowledges that a state court has concurrent jurisdiction over matters related to claims of creditors that were neither listed nor had notice nor actual knowledge of the case (see § 523(a)(3)), the court rules that a creditor who is listed is expressly covered by the discharge, thus implicating the bankruptcy court’s exclusive jurisdiction. Therefore, the bankruptcy court was required to reopen the case to protect its exclusive jurisdiction over the enforcement of its own orders. McGhan v. Rutz, 288 F.3d 1172 (9th Cir. 2002).

- 11.1.zzzzzzzz A bankruptcy court's exclusive jurisdiction is coextensive with the automatic stay. The bankruptcy court has very broad jurisdiction. Where the automatic stay prohibits an action in another court, the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction is exclusive. Where an exception to the automatic stay applies, or where the bankruptcy court grants relief from the stay, its jurisdiction is concurrent. The non-bankruptcy court in which an action is pending may make a determination about the applicability of the automatic stay, but if it erroneously determines that the stay does not apply, the entire action may later be declared void. If the non-bankruptcy court is correct, it may issue orders that will later be enforced. Here, the Sixth Circuit reviews this question of exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction in the context of an action pending in a different district court from the district where the bankruptcy case was pending. Chao v. Hospital Staffing Services, Inc., 270 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 2001).
- 11.1.aaaaaaaa Non-bankruptcy courts have concurrent jurisdiction over civil penalty dischargeability litigation. Shortly after filing bankruptcy, the debtor negotiated a settlement of a governmental environmental claim against him by stipulating in the district court litigation that the amount owing to the government in the settlement was a civil penalty that was non-dischargeable under section 523(a)(7). Neither of the parties litigated non-dischargeability in the bankruptcy court. Nevertheless, because the bankruptcy court has only concurrent, not exclusive, jurisdiction over dischargeability litigation other than under paragraphs (2) (4) (6), and (15), the district court had jurisdiction to determine that the settlement was, by stipulation, non-dischargeable under section 523(a)(7). Whitehouse v. LaRoche, 277 F.3d 568 (1st Cir. 2002).
- 11.1.bbbbbbbbbb Withdrawn proof of claim does not provide basis for jurisdiction. The foreign creditor had filed a proof of claim but had withdrawn it as of right under Bankruptcy Rule 3006 several months before the debtor brought an adversary proceeding against the creditor. The court rules that because the claim had been withdrawn, the consent to jurisdiction had been revoked. Cruisehone, Inc. v. Cruise Ships Catering and Services N.V. (In re Cruisehone, Inc.), 278 B.R. 325 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2002).
- 11.1.ccccccccc Bankruptcy court's jurisdiction continues after case is closed. Section 1334 of title 28 gives the bankruptcy court jurisdiction over proceedings "arising under title 11, or arising or related to cases under Title 11." The grant of jurisdiction does not depend upon whether the bankruptcy case has been closed (or re-opened) at the time the proceeding is brought. The court may interpret and effectuate its orders under its ancillary jurisdiction, and the court's "arising under" jurisdiction, which permits the court to resolve any dispute based on a right or cause of action created by title 11. The case also contains a useful discussion of the distinction between dismissal and closing of the case and of the requirement and effect of re-opening a case. Aheong v. Mellon Mortgage Co. (In re Aheong), 276 B.R. 233 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).
- 11.1.ddddddddd No home court venue for breach of post-petition contract dispute. The debtor brought an action in the home bankruptcy court against a customer for breach of a post-petition contract. The customer had no particular contacts with the forum state. The B.A.P. dismisses the action for improper venue. It reasons that section 1409(d), which governs venue of a claim arising out of the post-petition operation of the debtor's business, must be applied without regard to the nationwide service of process provision in Bankruptcy Rule 7004 (although those provisions would apply in the case of a pre-petition claim). On that basis, the B.A.P. concludes that applicable non-bankruptcy venue rules apply and that, in this case, such rules require minimum contacts between the defendant and the forum state. Etalco, Inc. v. AMK Industries, Inc. (In re Etalco, Inc.), 273 B.R. 211 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).
- 11.1.eeeeeeeee Settlement agreement in one bankruptcy case may be binding in subsequent case. The debtor entered into an agreement to cure mortgage arrearages in a prior bankruptcy case. The agreement and order provided that it would be binding upon the debtor in any subsequent bankruptcy case. The debtor filed a subsequent chapter 13 case, proposing a plan that would modify the prior agreement and order. Although the court finds the subsequent chapter 13 case was filed in good faith and the debtor complied with the provisions of chapter 13, it enforces the agreement approved in the prior case, because a court can and should enforce its prior orders. Litton v. Wachovia National Bank (In re Litton), 275 B.R. 259 (W.D. VA 2002).

11.1.ffffff Plan confirmation is res judicata as to the debtor's claims against third parties. The estate had a substantial malpractice and breach of duty claim against a third party. Through inadvertence, it did not specifically disclose the claim in its disclosure statement, but generally reserved all claims or causes of action that the estate might own and vested them in a liquidating trust. The Sixth Circuit rules that the order confirming the plan was res judicata as to the claim against the third party, because it was a claim that could have been litigated in the bankruptcy court between the same parties as a non-core proceeding and because the confirmation order is a final judgment. The court rules that the omnibus general reservation provision in the disclosure statement is not adequate to except a claim from the res judicata effects of a confirmation order. Browning v. Levy, 283 F.3d 761 (6th Cir. 2002).

11.1.gggggggg Court disallows nunc pro tunc substantive consolidation. A creditor moved for substantive consolidation of the debtor, six affiliated corporations, and two affiliated individuals, nunc pro tunc as of the petition date. Although the creditor argued that the retroactive order would merely confirm that all entities were a single entity and had been subject to the court's jurisdiction since the petition date, the court rules that a nunc pro tunc order can be used only to correct the record, not to retroactively impose jurisdiction where none previously existed. United States v. AAPC, Inc. (In re AAPC, Inc.), 277 B.R. 785 (Bankr. D. Utah 2002).

11.1.hhhhhhhh Professional's forum selection clause disapproved. In its application for employment, Ernst & Young required that the debtor in possession consent to litigation over any dispute only in a federal court without a jury. Upon objection by the United States Trustee, the bankruptcy court refused to approve the provision, holding that the right to sue in state court and obtain a jury are fundamental to the debtor in possession and that waiver was inappropriate, especially insofar as waiver sought to bind a subsequent chapter 7 trustee. In re Komag, Inc., 268 B.R. 566 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2001).

11.1.iiiiiiii Bankruptcy court does not have post-confirmation jurisdiction over ordinary contract disputes. The Fifth Circuit rules that the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction over an action for breach of a pre-petition contract that the debtor assumed under its confirmed plan and that was necessary for its successful operation under the plan. The court concludes that the expansive bankruptcy court jurisdiction necessary to the administration of the estate does not apply to post-confirmation breach of contract actions, even though the bankruptcy case may still be open. Bank of Louisiana v. Craig's Stores of Texas, Inc. (In re Craig's Stores of Texas, Inc.), 266 F.3d 388 (5th Cir. 2001).

11.1.jjjjjjjj Automatic stay defines scope of bankruptcy court's exclusive jurisdiction. The Secretary of Labor had commenced a "hot goods" action in federal district court under the Fair Labor Standards Act against the trustee to prevent her from moving business records in interstate commerce. The trustee defended on the grounds that the action was stayed by the automatic stay and the non-bankruptcy federal court did not have jurisdiction. The Secretary countered that the action fell under the police and regulatory powers exception of section 362(b)(4). On appeal, the Sixth Circuit rules that whether the district court had jurisdiction depends on whether the automatic stay applies. If the stay applies, the bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction over actions directed at the debtor or its property. If the automatic stay does not apply, for example, if the action is subject to one of the exceptions of section 362(b), then the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction is concurrent with other courts of competent jurisdiction. Such other courts may determine whether the stay applies and, if it does not, proceed with the non-bankruptcy litigation. However, if that court's initial jurisdictional determination is in error, the entire action may later be declared void. The bankruptcy court's determination of that issue takes precedence over the determination of that issue by a state court or an administrative agency, but a conflict between a bankruptcy court and a federal district court would likely need to be resolved by an appellate court with appellate jurisdiction over both lower courts. Chao v. Hospital Staffing Services, Inc., 270 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 2001).

11.1.kkkkkkkkk Bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction over automatic stay issues. After bankruptcy, an unsecured creditor brought an action against the debtor before a state agency. The debtor responded with a letter asserting the applicability of the automatic stay, but the state agency determined that the stay did not apply and proceeded to issue an order against the debtor. The debtor turned to the bankruptcy court for an injunction against the agency and the creditor. Relying on its decision in Gruntz v. County of Los Angeles (In re Gruntz), 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc), the Ninth Circuit affirms the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court to re-examine the automatic stay issue, despite the prior ruling of the state agency. The Ninth Circuit reasons that "Congress vested the federal courts with 'the final authority to determine the scope and applicability of the automatic stay,'" and that actions in violation of the automatic stay are void. Contractors' State License Board v. Dunbar (In re Dunbar), 245 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2001).

11.1.llllllllll State court may determine applicability of automatic stay. Disagreeing with the Ninth Circuit's decision in In re Gruntz, 202 F.3d 1074 (9th Cir. 2000), a New York bankruptcy court holds that a state court determination that its own order and actions did not violate the automatic stay binds the bankruptcy court under the Rooker-Feldman doctrine. In this case, the debtor was incarcerated post-petition under a pre-petition arrest warrant for contempt of the state court in a debt collection proceeding. The debtor unsuccessfully sought a state court order that the arrest violated the automatic stay. The state court's determination was binding, and the bankruptcy court would not revisit it. Siskin v. Complete Aircraft Services, Inc. (In re Siskin), 258 B.R. 554 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2001).

11.1.mmmmmmmmm Bankruptcy court lacks personal jurisdiction over foreign creditor's stay violations. The debtor lived and worked in Hong Kong, where he was sued by various creditors. He moved to the United States, filed a chapter 13 case, and notified the Hong Kong creditors by letter of the automatic stay. The Hong Kong creditors proceeded to judgment in Hong Kong nevertheless, and the debtor sought sanctions against them for violation of the stay. The bankruptcy court ruled that it did not have personal jurisdiction over the Hong Kong defendants, whose only contact with the United States was the sending of letters and other documents to the debtor after he had moved to the United States, because they did not have the required "minimum contacts," including "continuous and systematic general business contacts with the United States." Williams v. Law Society of Hong Kong (In re Williams), 264 B.R. 234 (Bankr. D. Conn. 2001).

11.1.nnnnnnnnn Litigation in a foreign court in violation of the automatic stay subjects the foreign creditors to personal jurisdiction. The debtor's reorganization plan provided for a contribution to an insurance fund by its insurance carrier and a channeling injunction prohibiting any litigation against the debtor or the carrier. Canadian creditors nevertheless continued litigation in Canada against the insurance carrier. The debtor and the carrier brought an action in the bankruptcy court against the Canadian creditors for violating the channeling injunctions. The Canadian creditors did not transact any business in the United States or take any action in the United States, although they had United States affiliates. The court rules that their relationship with their United States affiliates does not subject them to personal jurisdiction in the United States but that doing an act elsewhere that has an effect in the United States, that is, continuing the litigation in Canada that would have an effect on the bankruptcy estate in the United States, subjects them to personal jurisdiction for violation of the channeling injunction. In re Chiles Power Supply Co., 264 B.R. 533 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2001).

11.1.00000000 Filing of a proof of claim does not confer core jurisdiction. The creditor filed a proof of claim, and the debtor counterclaimed in an amount substantially in excess of the creditor's claim for a matter that did not arise out of the same transaction or occurrence. The district court rules that section 157(b)(2)(C), which designates as a core proceeding any counterclaim "against persons filing claims against the estate," should not be read literally. The court notes that the core proceeding definition is limited by section 157(b)(1) to "arising in" and "arising under" proceedings and does not include "related to" proceedings. Because the counterclaim was strictly a "related to" matter, it was not within the general definition of "core proceedings," and therefore did not come within section 157(b)(2)(C). In addition, the court cites footnote 31 of the Supreme Court's Marathon decision to support its view that expanding core jurisdiction to include all counterclaims, including "related to" proceedings, would raise serious constitutional questions. Marshall v. Marshall (In re Marshall), 264 B.R. 609 (C.D. Cal. 2001).

11.1.ppppppppp Core proceeding jurisdiction continues after dismissal of the case. Under the bankruptcy court's order, the chapter 13 trustee made payment to the secured creditor of funds deposited by the debtor before plan confirmation was denied and the case was dismissed. The B.A.P. reversed. On the debtor's later motion to compel turnover of the funds, the B.A.P. holds that the bankruptcy court's core jurisdiction extends to enforcing the order on appeal reversing its prior order, even though the bankruptcy case had been dismissed in the interim. Williams v. City Financial Mortgage Co. (In re Williams), 256 B.R. 885 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

11.1.qqqqqqqqq Bankruptcy court may not abstain from administrative matters. Section 1334(e) of title 28 grants the bankruptcy court "exclusive jurisdiction of the property. . . of the estate." The First Circuit B.A.P. reads this language as granting exclusive jurisdiction over matters relating to the administration of the case to the bankruptcy court. Hence, the bankruptcy court could therefore not abstain from the determination of the administrative tax claim of the Internal Revenue Service. United States v. Sterling Consulting Corp. (In re Indian Motorcycle Co., Inc.), 261 B.R. 800 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

11.1.rrrrrrrrr Bankruptcy court may not abstain from an unfiled case. The bankruptcy trustee brought an action for negligence against a former trustee in state court and promptly moved for the bankruptcy court to abstain from hearing the case. The bankruptcy court denied the motion, holding that the state court proceeding was a core proceeding. The B.A.P. reversed the bankruptcy court's order, not on the merits, but because the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to issue the order. Because there was no proceeding pending before the bankruptcy court from which it could abstain, it could not hear and determine a motion to abstain. Krasnoff v. Marshack (In re General Carriers Corp.), 258 B.R. 181 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

11.1.sssssssss Mandatory abstention does not apply to a diversity action. Section 1334(c)(2) of title 28 requires the district court to abstain from hearing a "related to" proceeding if, among other things, "an action could not have been commenced in a court of the United States absent jurisdiction under this section." In this case, the action could have been brought in federal court under diversity jurisdiction. Accordingly, mandatory abstention did not apply. Blanton v. IMN Financial Corp., 260 B.R. 257 (M.D.N.C. 2001).

11.1.ttttttttt Bankruptcy court has no jurisdiction over FCC licenses. The bankruptcy court applied the automatic stay to prevent the FCC from canceling and re-auctioning radio spectrum licenses. The Court of Appeals previously ruled that the FCC's requirements that spectrum bidders pay in full and on time for any licenses is a regulatory issue for the FCC. In re NextWave Personal Communications, Inc., 200 F.3d 43 (2d Cir. 1999). Enforcing its prior decision, the Court of Appeals now rules that the bankruptcy court has no jurisdiction to review any regulatory action of the FCC. Accordingly, the Second Circuit issues mandamus to vacate the bankruptcy court's order. In re Federal Communications Commission, 217 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2000).

- 11.1. uuuuuuuuu Court may not abstain from removed action. Where the trustee removed a state action to the bankruptcy court, the bankruptcy court must determine whether to remand under section 1452(b) "on any equitable ground," but may not abstain on grounds of comity under section 1334(c)(1) or by legislative mandate under section 1334(c)(2). According to the Ninth Circuit, "abstention can exist only where there is a parallel proceeding in state court." Schulman v. California (In re Lazar), 237 F.3d 967 (9th Cir. 2001).
- 11.1. vvvvvvvvv U.S. bank accounts create bankruptcy jurisdiction. Section 109(a) of the Bankruptcy Code permits "only a person that resides or has a domicile, a place of business or property in the United States" to be a debtor. The debtors in this case were all foreign and had only some bank accounts in the U.S. The court finds that the bank accounts constitute adequate property in the U.S. for eligibility purposes under section 109(A). In re Global Ocean Carriers Ltd., 251 B.R. 31 (Bankr. D. Del. 2000).
- 11.1. wwwwwwwww B.A.P. loses jurisdiction when the mandate issues. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel affirmed the decision of the Bankruptcy Court, which had issued a stay pending appeal. In accordance with Bankruptcy Rule 8017, the B.A.P. mandate issued to the bankruptcy court 17 days after decision, terminating the bankruptcy court's stay pending appeal. Immediately after the issuance of the mandate, the appellant sought a stay of the judgment pending appeal to the Court of Appeals. The court of appeals ruled that the B.A.P. did not have jurisdiction to issue the stay once the mandate had issued to the bankruptcy court. Payne v. Clarendon National Ins. Co. (In re Sunset Sales, Inc.) 195 F.3d 568 (10th Cir. 1999).
- 11.1. xxxxxxxxx Bankruptcy Court may not stay judgment pending appeal from the District Court to the Court of Appeals. Relying heavily on Payne v. Clarendon National Insurance Co. (In re Sunset Sales, Inc.) 195 F.3d 568 (10th Cir. 1999), the bankruptcy court holds that until the district court has issued its mandate affirming the bankruptcy court's decision, the bankruptcy court is without jurisdiction to grant a stay of enforcement of its judgment pending a further appeal to the court of appeals. Following an exhaustive analysis Bankruptcy Rule 8017 in a related statute, the court also concludes that only the district court and court of appeals may stay enforcement of the bankruptcy court's judgment. Finally, the court concludes that the supersedes bond posted with the bankruptcy court to obtain the initial stay of enforcement of the judgment is not released, and therefore the stay is not terminated until the district court's issuance of the mandate. Lindner & Assocs., P.C. v. Richards (In re Richards), 241 B.R. 769 (Bankr. D.D.C. 1999).
- 11.1. yyyyyyyyy Rule 7004 authorizes nationwide service of process. Reversing its prior panel decision, the Eighth Circuit en banc holds that Bankruptcy Rule 7004(d) which authorizes nationwide service of process, is constitutional and that process need not be limited to situations where the defendant had minimum contacts with the forum state. Warfield v. K.R. Entertainment, Inc. (In re Federal Fountain, Inc.), 165 F.3d 600 (8th Cir. 1999).
- 11.1. zzzzzzzzz "Related to" jurisdiction is limited. Having obtained a nondischargeability judgment in a Utah bankruptcy case, the creditor registered the judgment in Texas and brought an action in the Texas bankruptcy court to collect after the Utah case had been closed. Although the action "could alter the debtor's rights, liabilities, [or] options," it would not have an effect on the administration of the estate and so was not within the "related to" jurisdiction of 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b). It was also not within the core bankruptcy jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(O) because, even though it "could adjust the debtor-creditor relationship," it did not arise in or arise under the bankruptcy case and so could not be a core proceeding. Finally, section 157 does not allow referral of diversity or Federal question jurisdiction to the bankruptcy court when the case does not otherwise meet bankruptcy jurisdiction requirements. Bass v. Denney (In re Bass), 171 F.3d 1016 (10th Cir. 1999).

- 11.1.aaaaaaaa State court jurisdiction to determine the scope of the automatic stay is limited. The state court rejected the debtor's claim that his criminal prosecution was stayed by the automatic stay. The debtor sought an injunction from bankruptcy court and an order voiding the state court conviction. The bankruptcy court denied the injunction, but the Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that even though the state court may determine whether the automatic stay applies, a Federal court may subsequently independently determine the issue and set aside the state court's ruling if it was erroneous. Gruntz v. County of Los Angeles (In re Gruntz), 177 F.3d 728 (9th Cir. 1999).
- 11.1.bbbbbbbbbb Confirmation order effects claim preclusion of "related to" claim. The Fifth and Seventh Circuits have refused to bar a claim over which the bankruptcy court had only "related to" jurisdiction based on an order in a core proceeding, reasoning that the "related to" matter could not be litigated in the core proceeding. The Third Circuit joins the Second, Sixth and Ninth Circuits in going the other way. Here, the senior creditor objected to plan confirmation on unfair discrimination grounds because the subordinated creditor had received partial payment of its claim. In a subsequent non-bankruptcy action for recovery of the funds, the Third Circuit holds that the confirmation order precluded litigation of the terms of the subordination agreement, which could have been raised and the substance of which was raised during the confirmation hearing. The court rejects the argument that a confirmation order can not have claim preclusive effect on a dispute between two creditors. Corestates Bank, N.A. v. Huls America, Inc., 176 F.3d 187 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 11.1.cccccccccc A bankruptcy judge may not revoke the reference. Confronted with a potential constitutional jurisdictional problem, the bankruptcy judge terminated a standing order of reference and transferred all proceedings to the district court. The district judge reversed, holding that only the district judge can withdraw the reference. Moore, Owens, Thomas & Co. v. Coffey (In re Kool, Man, Coffee & Co.), 234 B.R. 873 (D.V.I. 1999)
- 11.1.dddddddddd Potential defendant/creditor may object to assignment of claim against him. The trustee sold litigation rights to one creditor in exchange for a percentage of the recovery. Another creditor, who would be a defendant in the potential litigation objected and appealed. The objecting creditor had standing to object to the assignment. Duckor Spradling & Metzger v. Baum Trust (In re P.R.T.C., Inc.), 177 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 1999).
- 11.1.eeeeeeeeee Creditor committee service may subject foreign corporation to bankruptcy court jurisdiction. A German creditor, with no place of business or business activities in the United States, engaged a New York attorney in a New York chapter 11 case. The creditor filed a proof of claim, designating the attorney's address for "all notices in the case." The attorney attended all meetings of the creditors' committee, to which the creditor was appointed. The court held the attorney to be the creditor's agent for service of process in a preference action. Ms. Interpret v. Rawee Druck-Und-Veredlungs-GmbH (In re Ms. Interpret), 224 B.R. 409 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1998).
- 11.1.fffffff Bankruptcy court exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction. The bankruptcy court may enjoin a foreign bank, which did business in the United States, from pursuing a debtor against whom the bank had filed a proof of claim in the debtors' chapter 7 case. Congress has expressed its intention to permit the bankruptcy court to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction, at least where the creditor filed a proof of claim in the bankruptcy case, and there is no constitutional impediment in such a case. Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corp., Ltd. v. Simon (In re Simon), 153 F.3d 991 (9th Cir. 1998).

11.1.gggggggggg Malpractice claim against examiner's accountants is a core proceeding. The examiner's accountants failed to investigate and pursue a claim that the debtor had against a third party, because the third party was a client of the accountants. The debtor's claim against the accountant is a core proceeding, even though malpractice is a state-created cause of action, because policing professionals retained at the expense of the estate is integral to the bankruptcy function and can affect the amount creditors receive. Southmark Corp. v. Coopers & Lybrand (In re Southmark Corp.), 163 F.3d 925 (5th Cir. 1999).

11.1.hhhhhhhhhh A bankruptcy discharge defense does not support removal of a state court action. In a prior bankruptcy case, the bankruptcy court had ordered a sale free of liens and ordered the county recorder to expunge the liens from the record. The county recorder failed to do so. Subsequently, the lienor sued a buyer on the lien in state court. The buyer removed the action to district court based on the federal law defense. Construing the federal removal statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a) as permitting removal only where the federal claim is contained in the plaintiff's cause of action, not in a defense, the Supreme Court ordered removal. Rivett v. Regions Bank of Louisiana, 118 S. Ct. 921 (1998).

11.1.iiiiiiiiii Nationwide service of process rejected. The Eight Circuit rules that despite Bankruptcy Rule 7004, a defendant is not subject to suit in bankruptcy or district court in a state with which the defendant does not have minimum contacts. The court thus splits with the Second, Fifth and Seventh circuits in applying the general federal civil practice rule, rather than the rule intended by the drafters of Bankruptcy Rule 7004. Warfield v. K.R. Entertainment, Inc. (In re Federal Fountain, Inc.), 143 F. 3d 1138 (8th Cir. 1998).

11.1.jjjjjjjjjj "Minimum contacts" required for nationwide service of process. A Missouri bankruptcy trustee sued a Nevada defendant in the bankruptcy court in Missouri. Despite Rule 7004, which provides for nationwide service of process, the District Court rules that the defendant must have minimum contacts with the forum state to be subject to personal jurisdiction, citing the Eight Circuit's narrow interpretation of personal jurisdiction rules. Warfield v. K.R. Entertainment, Inc. (In re Federal Fountain, Inc.), 212 B.R. 960 (E.D. Missouri 1997).

11.1.kkkkkkkkkk Bankruptcy court jurisdiction may be limited. The terms of a confirmed plan can limit the jurisdiction that a bankruptcy court retains after confirmation. Grossman v. Murray (In re Murray), 214 B.R. 271 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1997).

11.1.llllllllll Post-confirmation jurisdiction approved. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to hear an action by a chapter 7 trustee for breach of fiduciary duty against the debtor's principals where the plan was confirmed, the case was closed, and the case was later re-opened by the bankruptcy court because the debtors defaulted on payments under the plan. Donaldson v. Bernstein, 104 F.3d 547 (3d Cir. 1997).

11.1.mmmmmmmmmm Post-confirmation jurisdiction upheld. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a dispute concerning disposition of a sales tax refund relating to property sold under the plan, based on a provision of the plan that the bankruptcy court retain jurisdiction until the plan has been fully consummated for various purposes, including interpretation and enforcement of the terms of the plan. Norwest Equipment Finance, Inc. v. Nath (In re D & P Partnership), 91 F.3d 1072 (8th Cir. 1996).

11.2 Sanctions

- 11.2.a Court distinguishes sources of bankruptcy court’s sanction authority. Debtor’s counsel filed a chapter 7 case as a litigation tactic, omitted substantial assets and transfers from the schedules and statement of affairs, failed to ensure that the debtor complied with the trustee’s information requests, used state court litigation, including an action against the chapter 7 trustee, to attempt to dismiss the case, withdrew as attorney of record yet still moved to dismiss the case. A bankruptcy court may sanction counsel under Bankruptcy Rule 9011, under section 105(a), and under its inherent authority. Sanctions under Rule 9011 may be imposed only for filing a paper with the court in violation of the requirements of that Rule. Sanctions under section 105(a) may be imposed for civil contempt to remedy a violation of a specific order, including an “automatic” order such as the automatic stay or discharge injunction. Sanctions under the court’s inherent authority may be imposed to deter and provide compensation for improper litigation tactics, including bad faith litigation tactics. This last power is broader than the other two, is not mutually exclusive with the others, and extends to the full range of litigation abuses. It requires a finding of recklessness plus frivolousness, harassment, or an improper purpose or of bad faith (or conduct tantamount to bad faith). Here, although the bankruptcy court imposed sanctions under section 105(a), counsel’s conduct amounted to improper litigation tactics and purpose and bad faith and should have been imposed under the court’s inherent power. But because the bankruptcy court made sufficient finding to support sanctions under its inherent authority, the appellate court affirms the award. Stanley v. Mason (In re BCB Contracting Servs., LLC), ___ B.R. ___ (9th Cir. B.A.P. Apr. 21, 2022) (unpublished).
- 11.2.b Conclusive determination of stay relief motion is a final order. On the eve of trial in state court, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The creditor moved for stay relief to permit the litigation to proceed. The bankruptcy court denied the motion. The creditor filed a proof of claim, which the bankruptcy court tried and disallowed. The bankruptcy court then confirmed a plan. The creditor appealed the stay relief denial and the disallowance only after the disallowance. Section 158(a) gives the district courts appellate jurisdiction over final orders of the bankruptcy courts. Rule 8002(a) requires the appellant to file the notice of appeal within 14 days after entry of the final order. Although a civil action involves a single unit of litigation that concludes with a final order, a bankruptcy case involves multiple proceedings, each of which can be a unit of litigation resulting in a final order. A stay relief ruling does not address the merits of the claim resolution but disposes of a procedural unit separate from other proceedings in the case, including claim resolution. The stay relief ruling only directs where and when claim resolution will occur. Accordingly, it is a discrete unit of litigation, and an order conclusively resolving the stay relief motion is a final order that is immediately appealable. Ritzen Group, Inc. v. Jackson Masonry, LLC, 589 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. ___, 2020 U.S. LEXIS 526 (Jan. 14, 2020).
- 11.2.c Bankruptcy court has inherent power to issue non-contempt punitive sanction. The chapter 13 debtor inadvertently failed to send the trustee a copy of his tax return, as required by his plan confirmation order. The trustee moved for sanctions, seeking a punitive award of $200. The debtor sent the trustee the information before the hearing, but the bankruptcy court imposed a $100 sanction. A court has inherent power, in addition to its power to sanction for contempt, to impose a punitive sanction for violation of its order. Factors that distinguish a criminal contempt sanction from an inherent-power punitive sanction are whether the court makes an express contempt finding, whether the sanctioned conduct evidences a criminal mens rea, and whether the order falls within a recognized inherent power of the court. Here, the court did not find a contempt of court, the debtor’s conduct was inadvertent and not reflective of criminal intent, and a punitive award such as the bankruptcy court imposed here is within its inherent power to impose. A non-Article III bankruptcy court has inherent power to award sanctions to manage its own affairs. Therefore, it was a proper sanction. Charbono v. Sumski (In re Charbono), 790 F.3d 80 (1st Cir. 2015).
- 11.2.d 28 U.S.C. § 1927 applies to the bankruptcy case as a whole, not just individual proceedings within the case. The debtor’s personal assistant testified against him in an exemption objection proceeding. The trustee paid the witness’s legal fees. The trustee then objected to the debtor's discharge. During discovery, the witness testified that he had previously met with the trustee but had not discussed the case's substance. At a later hearing, trustee's counsel mistakenly stated that the witness and the trustee had not previously met. The debtor's counsel filed a motion for an evidentiary hearing on a bribery allegation (later re-filed as an adversary proceeding), a motion for a hearing regarding a conflict between the trustee and his counsel relating to the payment of the witness's legal fees, and two objections to the trustee's interim compensation application and issued a press release announcing a hearing on bribery allegations. On the record, the trustee's counsel promptly corrected the mistake about the meeting between the witness and the trustee. The bankruptcy court dismissed the motion for an evidentiary hearing and denied conflicts motion. Debtor's counsel soon withdrew the fee objections. The trustee moved for legal fees and expenses against debtor's counsel under 28 U.S.C. § 1927, which permits a court to require an attorney "who so multiplies the proceedings in any case unreasonably and vexatiously" to pay the costs, expenses, and attorneys' fees incurred because of such conduct. In a bankruptcy case, an adversary proceeding may multiply the proceeding, even though it is a separate proceeding, because it can increase the cost of the entire bankruptcy case of which it is a part. In this case, the adversary proceeding and other proceedings, coupled with the press release multiplied the proceedings, was vexatious, showed bad faith, and increased the cost of the case. Therefore, the bankruptcy court properly awarded fees and costs in favor of the trustee against debtor's counsel. Prosser v. Gerber (In re Prosser), 777 F.3d 155 (3d Cir. 2014).

- 11.2.e Bankruptcy court may not impose criminal contempt sanctions. The creditor brought a bad faith involuntary petition against the debtor. The court dismissed and awarded attorneys' fees, damages and punitive damages under section 303(i). The creditor then filed his own voluntary bankruptcy petition, which was later dismissed. After the dismissal, the creditor paid the section 303(i) award from the first case. The debtor sought additional attorneys' fees and punitive damages for the effort to challenge the creditor's bankruptcy and collect the award because of the creditor's bad faith conduct. A civil contempt sanction only includes an order to coerce future compliance or to compensate for past noncompliance. Any form of punishment, such as punitive damages, for noncompliance is a criminal sanction. Bankruptcy courts, like all courts, have inherent power to "achieve the orderly and expeditious disposition of their cases." In addition, section 105(a) authorizes a bankruptcy court to "issue any order, process or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of" the Code. Neither authority allows a bankruptcy court to issue a criminal sanction. A civil contempt sanction aids compliance by its coercive effect. By contrast, a criminal sanction is not necessary to facilitate compliance with the Code and a court's orders; it only punishes. Therefore, the bankruptcy court may not impose punitive damages for violation of its order. Adell v. John Richards Homes Bldg Co., LLC (In re John Richards Homes Bldg Co., LLC), 475 B.R. 585 (E.D. Mich. 2012).
- 11.2.f Bankruptcy court sanctions debtor's parent but not counsel for bad faith filing. The debtor shell corporation was a co-defendant in environmental litigation. The plaintiffs made clear that they would dismiss their claims against any defendant who filed bankruptcy. The debtor defendant, directed by its operating parent, filed bankruptcy. The parent orchestrated aggressive litigation tactics and delay in the bankruptcy case to prevent the co-defendants from asserting alter ego claims against the parent, but counsel did not mislead or make false representations to the court. The bankruptcy court denied the co-defendant's motion to dismiss the filing as a bad faith filing, but the district court and court of appeals reversed. The co-defendants then sought sanctions against the debtor, the parent and debtor's counsel. Rule 9011 permits sanctions, but provides a safe harbor if counsel withdraws the offending paper within 21 days after notice from the adversary. The safe harbor does not apply, however, to a bankruptcy petition, because it cannot be withdrawn. Therefore, the standard for granting sanctions upon a bad faith filing is whether no reasonable attorney could conclude that the debtor filed the case in good faith. Because the bankruptcy court initially found the petition to be in good faith, it could not find that debtor's counsel violated Rule 9011. However, based on the appellate courts' finding what the bankruptcy court initially missed, that the parent abused the bankruptcy process at the co-defendant's expense, sanctions were appropriate against the parent in the amount of attorneys' fees the co-defendant incurred in connection with the bankruptcy. Santa Fe Minerals, Inc. v. BEPCO, L.P. (In re 15375 Memorial Corp.), 430 B.R. 142 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).

- 11.2.g Bankruptcy court may hold a party in civil contempt for violating an oral injunction. At a hearing, the bankruptcy court ordered an asset protection trustee not to dispose of property. Before the written order was entered, the trustee disposed of the property. The court later found that the trustee knew of the oral order when he violated it. Civil contempt may be coercive or remedial, but not punitive. Bankruptcy courts may sanction a civil contempt. The contempt power is essential for a court to enforce its orders. The elements of civil contempt are that a court order is in effect, the order requires certain conduct and the respondent does not comply with the order. Bankruptcy proceedings move quickly, and a party can dispose of property before the court can issue a written order. Therefore, an oral injunction may be necessary, and the court may punish for violation of an oral injunction. Because the trustee violated the oral injunction here, the civil contempt judgment to restore the property was proper. Ingalls v. Thompson, 588 F.3d 255 (5th Cir. 2009).
- 11.2.h A bankruptcy court may impose sanctions under 28 U.S.C. § 1927. Section 1927 of title 28 permits a "court of the United States" to impose sanctions against counsel "who so multiplies the proceedings in any case unreasonably and vexatiously". A lawyer filed and then consented to dismissal of a second bankruptcy case solely to obtain the automatic stay's protection for his client. The bankruptcy court imposed sanctions against the lawyer under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 for the second case filing. Section 451 of title 28 defines "court of the United States" to include the district courts but does not mention bankruptcy courts. Section 151 of title 28 defines the bankruptcy court as a "unit of the district court", and section 157(a) permits a district court to refer all bankruptcy cases and proceedings to the bankruptcy courts. The delegation of authority includes the authority to issue sanctions under section 1927. In re Schaefer Salt Recovery, Inc., 542 F.3d 90 (3d Cir. 2008).
- 11.2.i Bankruptcy court may not sanction for contempt an individual who has not been served or appeared. The debtor's officer refused to testify in a Rule 2004 examination in the bankruptcy case. A creditor sought to hold her in contempt, but did not comply with Rule 7004 in serving her with process. As the debtor's representative, the officer was only the debtor's agent. Appearance as an agent does not make an individual a party in an individual capacity. Therefore, she could be held in contempt only if she were properly served with process in her individual capacity. Because she was not, she was not subject to the court's jurisdiction and could not be held in contempt. In re Teknek, LLC, 512 F.3d 342 (7th Cir. 2007).
- 11.2.j Court sanctions attorney for inadequate investigation of debtor's prior bankruptcy filings. The debtor had filed several prior bankruptcy cases, the last two of which had been dismissed under an order prohibiting refiling for one year. Although the debtor's new bankruptcy counsel inquired about prior chapter 7 filings, he did not access any of the bankruptcy court records such as VCIC or PACER to determine whether the debtor had actually previously filed any cases and to review the dismissal orders. Counsel's conduct did not meet the standard of reasonable investigation under Bankruptcy Rule 9011 and subjected counsel to sanctions for the filing. In re Reaver, 307 B.R. 834 (Bankr. S.D. Miss. 2002).
- 11.2.k Bankruptcy court has inherent power to sanction. The lawyer and one of the debtors abused the bankruptcy process to delay state court litigation. The bankruptcy court found that they had acted in bad faith. The bankruptcy court has the inherent power to sanction this conduct where the statutes and rules are not adequate to remedy the misconduct. However, where the statute or rules apply, the bankruptcy court may not use its inherent power to go beyond what is authorized in the statute or rules. In re DeVille, 361 F.3d 539 (9th Cir. 2004).

- 11.2.l Court of appeals reviews B.A.P. imposition of sanctions for abuse of discretion. The B.A.P. had dismissed an appeal for failure to supply a record and to comply with B.A.P. rules. On appeal to the court of appeals, the appellant argued the underlying merits of the bankruptcy court's decision. The Ninth Circuit bypasses that issue to review the B.A.P.'s summary affirmance as a sanction and concludes that it should apply an abuse of discretion standard to the decision of the B.A.P. (or the district court) on appeal. To do otherwise would undercut the ability of those courts to enforce their rules and orders. Morrissey v. Stuteville (In re Morrissey), 349 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 11.2.m Attorney sanctioned for bad faith chapter 11 filing. Sanctions may be warranted under Rule 9011(b) in the case of a filing that is both frivolous and for an improper purpose. The more compelling the showing as to one element, the less compelling the showing as to the other needs to be. In this case, the debtor, represented by counsel, filed a chapter 11 petition two days before the state court was to set a trial date on a specific performance action against the debtor for sale of real property. The value of the property plus the debtor's other assets was more than enough to pay all claims, including the specific performance claim, and the nature of the debtor's financial condition made it impossible for the debtor to confirm a plan without the consent of the specific performance plaintiff. Therefore, the petition was filed both for an improper purpose and was frivolous, in that it would not have accomplished any restructuring objective. Sanctions on both the debtor and his attorney were appropriate. Dressler v. The Seeley Co. (In re Silverkraus), 336 F. 3d 864 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 11.2.n Bankruptcy court has disciplinary authority. The bankruptcy court appointed special counsel to investigate an attorney's violations of state bar rules, including the duty to handle matters competently and to protect client funds. Based on special counsel's investigation and recommendation, the bankruptcy court disbarred the attorney for one year, awarded special counsel its fees from the court itself, and ordered the attorney to reimburse the court for the fees as a condition of reinstatement. The B.A.P. upholds the order, ruling that the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction, inherent authority, power under section 105(a), and authority under the local bankruptcy rules to protect the integrity of the court and court processes and to punish violation of state bar rules. The B.A.P. agrees that the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to order payment of special counsel fees and discretion to determine the punishment for violation, including suspension or disbarment. In re Disciplinary Proceedings, Sheridan v. Michaels, 282 B.R. 79 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2002).
- 11.2.o Creditor is sanctioned for undisclosed dual fee structure. The secured creditors law firm charged the creditor a blended hourly rate but sought reimbursement at a higher rate, which the creditor agreed to pay only if the debtor was actually held liable for and paid the amount under section 506(b). In its section 506(b) motion, the creditor failed to disclose the dual fee structure. The court awarded sanctions under Rule 9011 for the nondisclosure. 1095 Commonwealth Corporation v. Citizens Bank of Massachusetts (In re 1095 Commonwealth Corporation), 236 B.R. 530 (D. Mass. 1999).
- 11.2.p Bankruptcy court has civil contempt power to incarcerate. The bankruptcy judge may incarcerate for a civil contempt, that is, until the contemnor complies with the court's order. Unless the contemnor objects within 10 days, as required under Rule 9020(c), the bankruptcy judge need not submit a report and recommendation to the district court for the incarceration order to be effective. In re Burkman Supply Co., Inc., 217 B.R. 223 (W.D. Mich. 1998).

- 11.2.q Contempt sanctions for violation of automatic stay. The Eleventh Circuit joins the Second and Ninth Circuits in holding that “individual” in section 362(h) does not include a corporation, but that the bankruptcy court has contempt power under section 105(a) to award monetary and other forms of relief for automatic stay violations. Because this case involved a stay violation by the IRS, the court further ruled that “section 106(a) unequivocally waives sovereign immunity for court-ordered monetary damages under section 105,” but that any attorney’s fees awarded against the IRS must be consistent with the Equal Access to Justice Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d)(2)(A) and section 7430 of the Internal Revenue Code. The court also prohibited any punitive sanction for the civil contempt violation of the automatic stay. Jove Engineering, Inc. v. Internal Revenue Service, 92 F.3d 1539 (11th Cir. 1996).
- 11.2.r Criminal contempt is an appropriate remedy for disclosure and solicitation violations. A creditor improperly solicited rejections of the small business debtor’s plan, suggesting that the creditor’s own plan, which would follow denial of confirmation of the debtor’s plan, would be a better choice. The district court confirmed a criminal contempt sanction by the bankruptcy judge as a remedy for the violation of Section 1125. Colorado Mountain Express, Inc. v. Aspen Limousine Service, Inc. (In re Colorado Mountain Express, Inc.), 198 B.R. 341 (D. Colo. 1996).
- 11.2.s Bankruptcy court lacks authority to award fees for on appeal. The trustee filed a motion for sanctions for violation of the automatic stay, including withholding funds pending an appeal. The bankruptcy court granted the fees incurred in the prior appellate proceeding as a compensatory penalty for the stay violation. The Ninth Circuit rules that the bankruptcy court lacks power under section 105(a) to grant fees related to an appeal. State of California Employment Department v. Taxel (In re Dell Mission Ltd.), 98 F.3d 1147 (9th Cir. 1996).
- 11.3 Appeals
- 11.3.a Appeal from cram-down distribution and plan exculpation provisions is not equitably moot. The debtor confirmed and consummated a cram-down plan that included broad exculpation provisions for the debtor, its directors, the creditors committee, the reorganized debtor and its management, and a liquidating trust. Creditors with claims in the nonaccepting class appealed. Analysis of whether an appeal from a confirmation order for a substantially consummated plan is equitably moot proceeds on an issue-by-issue basis. A court must consider whether appellants obtained a stay, whether the plan was substantially consummated, and whether the relief requested would affect the plan’s success or non-parties’ rights. Although section 1127 does not permit post-consummation plan modification, it does not limit appeals, and reversal of a plan provision on appeal does not violate the anti-modification provision. Moreover, “equity strongly supports appellate review of issues consequential to the integrity and transparency of the Chapter 11 process.” Therefore, the court of appeals denies the motion to dismiss the appeal for equitable mootness. NexPoint Advisors, L.P. v. Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P.), ___ F.4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 23237 (5th Cir. Aug. 19, 2022).
- 11.3.b A magistrate judge may not hear a bankruptcy appeal. The losing party in the bankruptcy court appealed the order, and the parties consented to the district court’s reassignment of the appeal to a magistrate judge, who affirmed the bankruptcy court’s ruling. Section 158 of title 28 permits bankruptcy appeals to the district court or to a bankruptcy appellate panel. Despite the broad language in section 636(c) of title 28 governing referral to magistrate judges of matters pending in the district courts, the express language of section 158 governs and prohibits referral of bankruptcy appeals, even with consent of the parties, to a magistrate judge. S. Cent. Houston Action Council v. Oak Baptist Church, 38 F.4th 471 (5th Cir. 2022).
- 11.3.c District court may not refer a bankruptcy appeal to a magistrate judge. After the defendant won summary judgment in the bankruptcy court, the debtor appealed to the district court. With the parties’ consent, the district court referred the appeal to a magistrate judge under 28 U.S.C.

§ 636(c). The debtor lost and appealed to the court of appeals, which first examined its own jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 158 allows an appeal from a bankruptcy court order to be taken to a district court or a bankruptcy appellate panel. Because section 157 does not authorize referral to a magistrate judge, the district court improperly referred the appeal to the magistrate judge. The court of appeal remands to the district court to hear the appeal. S. Central Houston Action Coun. v. Oak Baptist Church (In re S. Central Houston Action Coun.), 35 F.4th 1277 (5th Cir. 2022).

- 11.3.d Only trustee, not debtor, may appeal chapter 7 conversion order. The bankruptcy court converted the corporate chapter 11 case to chapter 7, resulting in the appointment of a trustee. The debtor appealed. When a chapter 7 trustee is appointed, the trustee takes over all the debtor's management functions and authority. Therefore, only the trustee may appeal the conversion order on the debtor's behalf. However, the debtor's former management may appeal in their own name if they have a sufficient pecuniary interest to satisfy the "person aggrieved" standing standard. Bear Creek Trail, LLC v. BOKF, N.A. (In re Bear Creek Trail, LLC), ___ F.4th ___ (10th Cir. June 7, 2022).
- 11.3.e Notice of appeal on main case docket does not bring up adversary proceeding order for review. The confirmed plan established a litigation trust with a limited life, vested causes of action in the trust, and continued the automatic stay to protect the trust. Former shareholders brought an action in the bankruptcy court that belonged to the trust. The trustee moved to dismiss the adversary proceeding and sought sanctions. The bankruptcy court issued an order in the adversary proceeding dismissing it and an order in the main bankruptcy case granting sanctions. The shareholders filed a notice of appeal in the main case but not in the adversary proceeding, attaching a copy of only the sanctions order. The main case and the adversary proceeding are distinct for purposes of appeal. Moreover, Bankruptcy Rule 8003(a)(3)(B) requires an appellant to attach a copy of the order appealed from to the notice of appeal. Therefore, the notice of appeal in this case did not bring up the dismissal order for review, and the court of appeals lacked jurisdiction to hear it. Kreit v. Quinn (In re Cleveland Imaging and Surg. Hosp., L.L.C.), 26 F.4th 285 (5th Cir. 2022).
- 11.3.f Court denies defendant standing to appeal approval of trustee's litigation funding order. The liquidating trustee under a chapter 11 plan entered into a litigation funding agreement to pursue claims against the debtor's bank. The agreement required the trustee to consult in good faith with the funder over any settlement discussions. The bank objected, contending that the funder would unduly influence the litigation and prevent settlement. As of the time of the bank's appeal, no settlement discussions had occurred. To appeal, a party must have Article III standing and be a "person aggrieved." Article III standing requires a concrete, particularized, and imminent injury in fact. Here, the bank's injury is not imminent but is speculative, based on an attenuated chain of possibilities, because no settlement discussions have taken place, and the result of any future discussions is uncertain. An appellant is a person aggrieved only if it has a direct and substantial interest in the question being appealed. Being subject to litigation and risking liability in an adversary proceeding is not such an interest. Moreover, the interest must be one the Code protects or regulates. A defendant's interest in avoiding liability is antithetical to the Code's goals. Finally, a desire to preserve the integrity of the bankruptcy process is not sufficient to give an appellant "person aggrieved" status. Therefore, the bank lacks standing to appeal. Valley Nat'l Bank v. Warren (In re Westport Holdings Tampa, Ltd. P'shp), ___ 4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 8480 (11th Cir. Mar. 31,
- 11.3.g U.S. trustee has standing to appeal plan confirmation. The debtor sold its assets and proposed a liquidation plan that provided broad third-party releases, particularly securities class action claims against directors and officers. The disclosure statement and ballots made clear that non-voting equity holders, who received nothing under the plan, and voting creditors could opt out of the releases. The U.S. trustee and the securities litigation lead plaintiff, who had opted out of the releases, objected to the releases. Because of the U.S. trustee's supervisory role and the express grant in section 307, he has standing to appeal plan confirmation. But the securities action lead plaintiff does not, because the releases do not affect him as an opt-out creditor. Patterson v. Mahwah Bergen Retail Group, Inc. ___ B.R. ___, 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7431 (E.D. Va. Jan. 13, 2022).

- 11.3.h Section 363(m) prohibits relief on appeal even from an allegedly illegal sale authorization. The individual debtors moved to approve a credit bid sale to its secured lender, which had rolled up its prepetition loan with a financing under section 364. After the court approved the sale, the debtors developed arguments why the sale should not have been approved. They moved to amend the sale order and stay the sale. The bankruptcy court denied the motion, and the debtors appealed. Section 363(m) prohibits the reversal or modification on appeal of an order authorizing a sale to a good faith buyer unless the authorization has been stayed pending appeal. Section 363(m) applies to any sale authorized by the court, not only sales authorized by the statute. Therefore, any argument that the roll up invalidated the creditor's postpetition lien, undermining the authority for a credit bid, did not affect section 363(m)'s application. Therefore, the appeal is moot. A concurrence questions whether the decision is consistent with a prior circuit precedent that permitted an appeal from an order authorizing a postpetition cross-collateralization on the ground that the Code does not authorize cross-collateralization. Reynolds v. Servisfirst Bank (In re Stanford), ___ F.4th ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 32503 (11th Cir. Nov. 1, 2021).
- 11.3.i Eighth Circuit severely limits equitable mootness doctrine. The preferred shareholder appealed the chapter 11 confirmation order. Before the appeal was heard, the plan sponsor funded the plan, all equity interests were canceled, the secured creditor received payment, unsecured creditors received partial payment, and the plan sponsor released its DIP financing claim and a prepetition claim. The equitable mootness doctrine is based on common sense or equitable considerations to justify declining to decide a case on the merits. In a case of first impression, the Eighth Circuit declines to adopt a specific multi-factor test, deferring instead to whether the court can grant effective relief without undermining the plan and thereby affecting third parties. Most important are whether the plan has been substantially consummated and what effects reversal might have on third parties. Seeking or obtaining a stay is not determinative. Therefore, the appellate court must undertake a preliminary review of the merits to determine the strength of the appeal and the time required to resolve it, as well as of the remedies available, so as not to undermine the plan and harm third parties. Therefore, dismissal for equitable mootness should be extremely rare. Here, because the district court did not undertake this review, the court of appeals remands, noting that the plan sponsor and the supportive secured creditors are not true third parties the doctrine is meant to protect. FishDish, LLP v. VeroBlue Farms USA, Inc. (In re VeroBlue Farms USA, Inc.), 6 F.4th 880 (8th Cir. 2021).
- 11.3.j Rule 8002 time limit is mandatory but not jurisdictional. The court overruled a preferred shareholder's objection to the secured creditor's claim. The shareholder appealed 18 days after the order. Rule 8002 requires that a notice of appeal be filed "within 14 days after entry of the judgment, order, or decree being appealed." Section 158(a) of title 28 permits appeals of final judgments and of interlocutory orders. Section 158(c)(2) requires an appeal under subsection (a) to be taken "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." Only a statute may specify a court's jurisdiction. Because the Rules may be amended without Congressional action to change the time period for filing a notice of appeal, the Rule is not jurisdictional, despite the reference to the Rule in the statute. However, the deadline is mandatory, and the court dismisses the appeal. FishDish, LLP v. VeroBlue Farms USA, Inc. (In re VeroBlue Farms USA, Inc.), 6 F.4th 880 (8th Cir. 2021).
- 11.3.k Chapter 13 dismissal moots appeal from order directing funds disbursement. The court ordered the chapter 13 trustee to disburse to the secured lender insurance proceeds resulting from damage to the chapter 13 debtor's house. The debtor moved to dismiss her case, which the court granted. The debtor appealed the disbursement order. An appeal is jurisdictionally moot when the case or controversy it concerns is no longer live. Section 349(b)(3) provides that property of the estate reverts in the entity in which the property was vested immediately before the petition. Once the trustee disbursed the funds, they were no longer property of the estate, and section 349(b)(3) does not authorize the court to recover funds that were already disbursed. Therefore, the court may not grant relief, and the appeal is moot. Sundaram v. Briry, LLC (In re Sundaram), 9 F.4th 16 (1st Cir. 2021).

- 11.3.l Equitable mootness doctrine survives Mission Products decision. A Puerto Rico agency (COFINA) confirmed a plan under PROMESA that restructured its bonds and resolved disputes over its entitlement to sales and use tax revenues. The agency implemented the plan, distributed billions of dollars of restructured securities, and discharged all claims against it, including claims under its pre-existing bonds. A court should dismiss an appeal as equitably moot based on whether the appellant has pursued with diligence all available remedies to obtain a stay, whether the “plan proceeded to a point well beyond any practicable appellate annulment,” and whether providing relief would harm innocent third parties. Under Mission Prods. Holdings, Inc. v. Tempnology, LLC, 139 S. Ct. 1652 (2019), an appeal is moot under Article III only when it is “impossible for a court to grant any effectual relief whatever.” Where there remains a live controversy and relief is possible by reversing the confirmation order, the appeal is not constitutionally moot. Instead, equitable mootness bears on how to resolve the dispute, more like a rule of equitable laches, in that the passage of time and a party’s inaction can render relief inequitable. Equitable considerations are particularly appropriate in considering plan confirmation, which is inherently an equitable proceeding. Therefore, any constitutional mootness analysis from Mission Products does not apply here. Pinto-Lugo v. Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd. (In re Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd.), 987 F.3d 173 (1st Cir. 2021).
- 11.3.m Rule 8002’s notice of appeal deadline is not jurisdictional. The debtor filed a notice of appeal after the 14-day period specified in Rule 8002. The appellee moved to dismiss on the ground that the appellate court lacked jurisdiction. Section 158(c)(2) of title 28 provides an appeal shall be taken in the time provided by Rule 8002. Rule 8002(a)(1) requires an appeal to be filed within 14 days after entry of judgment. An appeal deadline is jurisdictional if a statute provides the time limit, but not if a rule does. Otherwise, Congress would be delegating to the rules-making process the determination of the scope of the federal courts’ jurisdiction, which the Constitution does not permit. Therefore, the deadline is not jurisdictional. However, the notice of appeal was still untimely, and the appeal must be dismissed. Tennial v. REI Nation, LLC (In re Tennial), 978 F.3d 1023 (6th Cir. 2020).
- 11.3.n Appeal from confirmation order is equitably moot when requested relief would violate the Code. The debtor confirmed a plan that paid trade creditors in full and nothing to unsecured note holders, one of whom objected and appealed. The district court denied a stay, and the parties consummated the plan. An appeal from a confirmation order is equitably moot if the plan has been substantially consummated and granting relief would fatally scramble the plan or significantly harm third parties who have justifiably relied on confirmation. Only two forms of relief would be available to the appellant: requiring payment in full of his claim, or requiring payment in full of his class. The former would violate section 1123(a)(4)’s equal treatment rule; the latter would fatally scramble the plan. Therefore, the appeal is moot and is dismissed. In re Nuverra Environmental Solutions, Inc., ___ F.3d ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 244 (3d Cir. Jan. 6, 2021).
- 11.3.o Equitable mootness doctrine applies to a liquidating plan. The debtor confirmed a liquidating plan that subordinated intercompany claims. The subordination resulted in no recovery on those claims. The liquidating trustee for the affiliates objected to and appealed from the confirmation order and sought a stay pending appeal, which the bankruptcy court and the district court denied. The debtor’s representative consummated the plan and distributed cash to holders of priority and undisputed unsecured claims. The court may dismiss an appeal from a plan confirmation order as equitably moot if reversal would be inequitable or impracticable. Although the courts consider six factors, the foremost concern is what effects reversal would have on third-party creditors. That analysis does not differ when the plan provides for liquidation rather than reorganization, because by-stander creditors can still be harmed by reversal by the risk of distribution clawback long after they have received and relied on the distributions. In this case, the equitable mootness factors were met. That the plan was a liquidation rather than an operating reorganization does not change that result. Drivetrain, LLC v. Kozel (Abengoa Bioenergy Biomass of Ks., LLC), 958 F.3d 949 (10th Cir. 2020).

- 11.3.p Filing a notice of appeal only after attorneys' fees award was untimely. The debtor in possession brought a stay violation action against a state court counter-litigant, seeking damages and attorneys' fees for the stay violation motion. In an opinion and order entered on April 4, the bankruptcy court awarded damages, except for attorneys' fees "incurred in the prosecution of this adversary proceeding." On April 18, 14 days later, the debtor in possession filed a reconsideration motion under Bankruptcy Rules 9023 and 9024. By order entered May 30, the bankruptcy court denied the motion. On November 27, the bankruptcy court awarded the attorneys' fees. The defendant filed a notice of appeal on December 8. A complex combination of the Bankruptcy Rules and Civil Rules govern the time for filing a notice of appeal. Bankruptcy Rule 8002(a)(1) requires a notice of appeal to be filed "within 14 days after the entry of the judgment, order, or decree being appealed." Civil Rule 58(a), incorporated by Bankruptcy Rule 7058, requires a judgment to "be set out in a separate document," that is, a document separate from an opinion or memorandum of the court, with limited exceptions. Under Civil Rule 58(c)(2), if the clerk does not enter a separate judgment, then judgment is deemed entered 150 days after the court's ruling is entered on the docket. Under Rule 58(e), entry of judgment and time to appeal may not be delayed to tax costs or award fees if the fees are incurred in the course of litigation and cannot be determined until after the case is litigated, unless the court expressly orders the attorneys' fee motion to have the same effect as a reconsideration motion, which extends the time for appeal. In this case, the court's order required a separate judgment, which was not issued and entered on the docket, so the judgment was deemed entered 150 days later, on September 1. The timely reconsideration motion extended the time for appeal to 14 days after its denial on May 30. Because Rule 58(a) does not require a separate judgment for disposition of such a motion, the time to appeal expired fourteen days later, on June 13. Because the defendant did not file its notice of appeal until December 8, its appeal was untimely, except as to the ruling on the attorneys' fees motion on November 27. PC Puerto Rico v. Empresas Martínez Valentín Corp. (In re Empresas Martínez Valentín Corp.), 948 F.3d 448 (1st Cir. 2020).
- 11.3.q Appeals from sale proceeds distribution order is not moot. Before bankruptcy, the lender mistakenly filed a mortgage satisfaction in the land records office, discovered the error, and filed a revocation of the satisfaction. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sold the mortgaged property and claimed the proceeds. The bankruptcy court awarded the proceeds to the mortgagee, and the debtor in possession appealed. Section 363(m) provides that a reversal or modification on appeal from an order approving a sale does not affect the validity of the sale. An appeal is moot only when there is no longer a live dispute between the parties; it deprives the court of jurisdiction. Section 363(m) does not make an appeal moot; rather, it is a substantive rule of decision and therefore does not affect the appellate court's jurisdiction. As a substantive rule of decision, section 363(m) addresses only the validity of the sale, not the distribution of proceeds. So the appeal from the order granting the proceeds to the lender is not moot. Trinity 83 Devel., LLC v. ColFin Midwest Funding, LLC, 917 F.3d 599 (7th Cir. 2019).
- 11.3.r Appeal of settlement that is part of a sale is moot. The trustee litigated with an adverse claimant over ownership of property. A buyer offered to purchase the property but demanded clear title. The trustee agreed to a settlement with the adverse claimant, resulting in payment of portion of the sale price and release of all claims between the trustee and the adverse claimant. The sale and the settlement were each conditioned on the other. The bankruptcy court approved both in a single order. An unsecured creditor appealed the approval of the settlement. A court of appeals may dismiss a bankruptcy appeal on equitable mootness grounds if the challenged transaction is substantially consummated and would be too complex to unwind. This transaction is simple and could be unwound, so the court denies the trustee's motion to dismiss on equitable mootness grounds. Section 363(m) provides that a reversal on appeal of an order under section 363 approving a sale does not affect the validity of the sale. Neither the Code nor the Bankruptcy Rules provide a similar provision for a settlement approval. However, here, because the sale and the settlement were conditioned on each other and the settlement was an essential part of the sale, section 363(m) prevents appellate review. New Indus., Inc. v. Byman (In re Sneed Shipbuilding, Inc.), 914 F.3d 1000 (5th Cir. 2019).

- 11.3.s Section 363(m) does not prevent appeal of an order determining distribution of sale proceeds. The secured lender mistakenly released its lien long before bankruptcy but corrected its error before bankruptcy. After the property was sold in the bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sought to keep the sale proceeds, free of the lender's secured claim. The bankruptcy court ruled for the lender; the DIP appealed. Section 363(m) prevents the reversal or modification of a sale approval order from affecting the validity of a sale to a good faith buyer. Mootness is a constitutional doctrine that deprives a federal court of jurisdiction when the issues are no longer live or the parties lack a cognizable interest in the outcome. Section 363(m) provides a rule of decision, but does not make a live dispute moot or prevent a bankruptcy court from deciding what should be done with sale proceeds. Because state law here permits a mortgagee to correct a mistaken release before a third party relies on the mistake, the lender properly corrected the mistake and is entitled to the sale proceeds. Trinity 83 Devel, LLC v. ColFin Midwest Funding, LLC, 917 F.3d 599 (7th Cir. 2019).
- 11.3.t Sixth Circuit establishes test for when an order is final for purposes of appeal. The creditor had sued the debtor for breach of contract in state court. One week before trial, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The creditor moved for stay relief to proceed with the state court action. The bankruptcy court denied the motion. The creditor filed a proof of claim, to which the DIP objected. The court disallowed the claim. The creditor then appealed from order denying stay relief and from the order disallowing the claim. Under 28 U.S.C. 158(a), the district courts "have jurisdiction to hear appeals from final judgments, orders, and decrees of bankruptcy judges entered in cases and proceedings," unlike in ordinary civil actions, where the courts have appellate jurisdiction only over "final decisions." Under Bankruptcy Rule 8002(a), an appellant must file its notice of appeal within 14 days after entry of the order. A judgment, order, or decree in a bankruptcy case or proceeding is appealable if it is entered in a proceeding and is final. A proceeding is a dispute narrower than and distinct from the bankruptcy case as a whole. It is a discrete dispute within the overall bankruptcy case that resolves a litigated matter. A stay relief motion meets this definition, because it determines the creditor's right under the legal standards for stay relief. An order is final if it terminates the proceeding, alters the status quo and fixes the rights and obligations of the parties. An order that denies relief without prejudice or with leave to amend is not final, because it does not alter the status quo or fix rights and obligations—the parties may still raise the issue in a future proceeding. An order denying stay relief without more is final, because it requires the creditor to pursue its claim in the bankruptcy court rather than in another forum or be barred from doing so, whether by a claims bar date or the conclusion of the bankruptcy case and the entry of the discharge. Because the creditor waited until after resolution of its proof of claim, its appeal from the stay relief denial was untimely and must be dismissed. Ritzen Group, Inc. v. Jackson Masonry, LLC (In re Jackson Masonry, LLC), ___ F.3d ___, 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 29009 (6th Cir. Oct. 16, 2018).
- 11.3.u Equitable mootness doctrine applies in chapter 9 cases. The county confirmed a chapter 9 plan that provided for issuance of refinancing bonds, supported by sewer revenues, required county commissioners to increase sewer rates annually for 40 years, and provided continuing bankruptcy court jurisdiction to enforce that provision. Ratepayers appealed, seeking reversal of the rate-increase and bankruptcy court jurisdiction provisions, but did not seek a stay pending appeal or seek to expedite the appeal. The equitable mootness doctrine permits an appellate court, based on equitable or prudential considerations, to dismiss an appeal where granting relief would be extremely burdensome, especially on non-parties. Considerations include whether permitting the appeal will impinge on actions taken in good faith reliance on the judgment and whether appellate relief will interfere with actions taken without knowledge that claims are still pending final resolution, but courts are sensitive to the right to appeal, especially if the appellant promptly sought a stay or was unjustifiably denied a stay. The reasons supporting the doctrine in chapter 11 cases apply equally in a chapter 9 case. The presence of sovereignty or other constitutional issues does not detract from the principle; and a court might properly be more solicitous of a municipal debtor in permitting a plan to proceed than of a commercial debtor, because of the public interests. Because the county implemented the plan and issued new securities on the public markets and the appellants did not even seek a stay, the court finds the appeal equitably moot and dismisses it. Bennett v. Jefferson County, Ala., 899 F.3d 1240 (11th Cir. 2018).

- 11.3.v Failure to object to an order does not deprive a person aggrieved of standing to appeal. The chapter 7 trustee moved to assume a contract and gave notice to the counterparties. The counterparties did not appear at the hearing to object to the assumption. After the court announced its ruling granting the motion but before it issued a written order, the counterparties filed a motion for reconsideration. The bankruptcy court denied that motion on the merits and issued the written order granting the assumption motion. The counterparties appealed. Only a “person aggrieved” has standing to appeal a bankruptcy court order. A person is aggrieved if the order affects the person’s pecuniary interests. Failure to appear and object does not affect whether the person is aggrieved by the order. Therefore, the failure does not affect the counterparties’ standing to appeal. However, the failure might constitute waiver or forfeiture of the person’s rights. Here, the counterparties’ prompt motion for reconsideration was sufficient to prevent waiver, but the court may still consider whether the failure amounted to a forfeiture. The appellate court remands for that determination. Harkey v. Grobstein (In re Point Ctr. Fin., Inc.), 890 F.3d 1188 (9th Cir. 2018).
- 11.3.w Shareholder may not purchase standing to appeal. The debtor’s shareholder objected to the trustee’s application to employ special counsel. The bankruptcy court overruled the objection. The shareholder appealed. At the time of the bankruptcy court hearing, any effect on the shareholder’s possible recovery in the case based on the outcome of the objection was entirely speculative. As a result, the shareholder was not “a person aggrieved” who had standing to appeal. So while the appeal was pending, he purchased a claim. The purchase did not give him standing to appeal, because standing is determined at the commencement of the suit. Furlough v. Cage (In re Technicool Syss., Inc.), ___ F.3d ___, 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 19508 (5th Cir. July 16, 2018).
- 11.3.x Appellate review of an “insider” determination is only for clear error. The real estate LLC debtor had two principal creditors, a secured creditor and its managing member, which held a $2.76 million unsecured claim. After bankruptcy, one of the five managing member directors approached a close personal and business friend and offered on behalf of the managing member to sell its claim to him for $5,000. The claim buyer did not live or share expenses with his director friend, and neither controlled the other in their business relationships. Before the purchase, the buyer had no relationship with the managing member or its other directors and knew little of its business. After the sale, the debtor proposed a plan that distributed $30,000 on the unsecured claim. The buyer did not know the plan’s terms before his purchase, which he made as a speculative investment. The buyer accepted the plan, creating an impaired accepting class; the secured creditor did not accept and objected to confirmation. Section 1129(a)(10) requires as a confirmation condition that at least one impaired class accept the plan, not counting any insider’s acceptances. Section 101(31) defines insider to include persons with certain defined formal relations with the debtor, generally one with a sufficiently close formal relationship to warrant special treatment or scrutiny. A non-statutory insider is one who has any other sufficiently close relationship to fall within the purpose of the definition. Three kinds of issues determine whether a person is a non-statutory insider, one legal, one factual, and one a combination of the first two. The courts of appeals set the legal standard; the bankruptcy courts’ selection of the legal standard is subject to de novo review. The bankruptcy court determines the basic or historical facts about the relationship between the alleged insider and the debtor, which is subject to clear error review. The bankruptcy court applies the legal standard to the facts to decide whether the facts meet the legal standard, a so-called mixed question of law and fact. The standard for review of such a determination depends on whether the determination is primarily factual (a detailed examination of the facts) or legal (requiring amplification of the legal standard or development of auxiliary legal principles to apply in other cases). The legal rule here is essentially whether the parties' transaction was at arms' length, which is a factually-driven determination. Therefore, the standard of review is for clear error. Because the bankruptcy court found the claim buyer was not an insider and the court of appeals reviewed only for clear error, the Court affirms the judgment. A dissent questions whether the legal standard was proper, but the certiorari grant excluded consideration of that question. U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Village at Lakeridge, LLC, 583 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 960 (2018).

- 11.3.y Secured lender's appeal from confirmation order is not equitably moot where only relief is increased payments. The bankruptcy court confirmed a cram down partial dirt-for-debt plan that valued the surrendered land as sufficient to pay the remaining balance of the secured lender's claim. There were few other creditors. The lender appealed, claiming the land valuation and the amount of postpetition interest the court allowed were too low, and sought a stay pending appeal, which the district court and the court of appeals denied. An appeal is equitably moot if, because of the passage of time, effective relief on appeal has become impractical, imprudent, and therefore inequitable. Relevant factors include whether the appellant has obtained a stay, whether the plan has been substantially consummated, whether appellate relief would affect the plan's success, and whether relief would affect third parties' interests. Here, the remedy if the bankruptcy court erred was to increase the reorganized debtor's payments to the lender. It would not affect other creditors, whose claims were satisfied under the plan. The case is essentially a two-party dispute. Under the circumstances, the appeal is not equitably moot. Bate Land Co. v. Bate Land & Timber LLC (In re Bate Land & Timber LLC), 877 F.3d 188 (4th Cir. 2017).
- 11.3.z A bankruptcy judge's order denying a motion to dismiss an adversary proceeding is an interlocutory order, not proposed findings and conclusions. The bankruptcy judge denied the defendant's motion to dismiss an adversary proceeding for failure to state a claim. The defendant sought review in the district court. Section 157(c)(1) of title 28 requires the district court to enter judgment in a related proceeding after reviewing de novo the bankruptcy judge's proposed finding of fact and conclusions of law. Section 158(a)(3) permits an appeal to the district court from a bankruptcy judge's interlocutory order with leave of the district court. A bankruptcy judge may issue an interlocutory order in a non-core proceeding; not all its orders are proposed findings and conclusions. An order denying a motion to dismiss is an interlocutory order. Therefore, the defendant must seek leave to appeal; it does not have a right of de novo review under section 157(c)(1). Canadian Pac. Ry Co. v. Keach, ___ B.R. ___, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 177452 (D. Me. Oct. 26, 2017).
- 11.3.aa Federal Arbitration Act does not bar district court appeal from bankruptcy court order compelling arbitration. After confirmation, the estate representative sued the debtor's insurer. Based on an arbitration clause in the insurance policy, the bankruptcy court stayed the litigation and compelled arbitration. The estate representative filed an interlocutory appeal. Section 16(b) of the Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. § 16(b), prohibits an appeal from an interlocutory order compelling arbitration or staying a proceeding pending arbitration, "except as otherwise provided in section 1292(b) of title 28." Section 1292(b) applies to interlocutory appeals from the district court to the court of appeals. The relationship between the bankruptcy court and the district court differs. Congress granted the district courts, not the bankruptcy courts, original jurisdiction over bankruptcy proceedings, subject to referral to the bankruptcy courts. The fortuity of referral or of withdrawal of the reference should not affect a litigant's opportunity to have an arbitration claim heard by an Article III court. Therefore, section 16(b) does not prohibit an interlocutory appeal to the district court from a bankruptcy court order compelling arbitration or staying proceedings pending arbitration. MF Global Holdings Ltd. v. Allied World Assurance Co., Ltd (In re MF Global Holdings Ltd.), ___ B.R. ___, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 177452 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 30, 2017).

- 11.3.bb Appeals court refuses to determine merits issues inherent in deciding whether section 363(m) mootness applies. The trustee auctioned causes of action, including avoiding power claims, as is, where is. A creditor group outbid the potential defendant group, who claimed irregularities in the auction procedures and that only the trustee may pursue avoiding power claims. The bankruptcy court approved the sale. Without seeking a stay pending appeal, the defendant group appealed. While the appeal was pending, the purchasers brought the avoiding power action against the defendant group members, who moved to dismiss on the ground that only the trustee may pursue avoiding power claims. Section 363(m) provides that the reversal or modification of an order approving a sale of property of the estate does not affect the validity of the sale to a good faith purchaser. If the avoiding power claims are not property of the estate under section 541(a), then the stay would not apply. But determining that issue would determine the merits of the appeal. A sale objector may not evade section 363(m)'s stay requirement by challenging whether the sold property is property of the estate, because it would result in the appeals court hearing the merits of the dispute and undermine the effectiveness of section 363(m). If the appeals court determined that only the trustee may pursue avoiding power claims, it would undermine the sale, even though the "as is, where is" nature of the sale placed the risk of that issue on the purchasers. Therefore, the court of appeals dismisses the appeal as moot and leaves the issue of whether only the trustee may pursue the avoiding power claims to the trial court that is hearing that litigation. Schepis v. Burtch (In re Pursuit Cap. Mgmt., LLC), ___ F.3d ___, 2017 U.S. App. LEXIS 20889 (3d Cir. Oct. 24, 2017).
- 11.3.cc A bankruptcy purchaser is not a person aggrieved by a creditor's violation of the automatic stay. The debtor in possession sold its assets free and clear of all claims and interests. However, it had not given notice to a creditor in a pending state court action. After the sale, the state court entered judgment against the debtor and, on the creditor's motion, amended the judgment to include the purchaser as a judgment debtor. The purchaser moved the bankruptcy court for an order enforcing the automatic stay against the creditor to require the creditor to dismiss the action and for damages for stay violation. The bankruptcy court denied the relief, and the purchaser appealed. The automatic stay is a fundamental debtor protection. However, it does not protect a non-debtor, such as the purchaser. Only a person aggrieved by the bankruptcy court's order has standing to appeal. A person aggrieved is one whose pecuniary interests are directly and adversely affected by the order. Because the purchaser is not entitled to the automatic stay's protection, the purchaser is not a person aggrieved and does not have standing to appeal. Encanto Restaurants, Inc. v. Aquino (In re Cousins Int'l Food Corp.), 565 B.R. 450 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2017).
- 11.3.dd Appeal challenging whether a sale is free and clear of interests is not moot. The trustee moved to sell real property free and clear of all interests. Two lessees of portions of the real property objected, relying on their right under section 365(h) to retain possession. The court approved the sale, expressly subject to a post-closing determination of the section 365(h) claims. The court later denied the claims, confirming the sale as free and clear of the leaseholds. The lessees appealed. Section 363(m) provides that an appeal from an order approving a sale to a good faith purchaser may not affect the validity of the sale. Here, the lessees did not challenge the sale's validity, only whether the sale was free and clear of their leasehold interests. Therefore, the appeal would not affect the sale's validity and is not mooted by the closing of the sale. Pinnacle Restaurant at Big Sky, LLC v. CH SP Acquisitions, LLC (In re Spanish Peaks Holdings II, LLC), 862 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 11.3.ee Court of appeals does not have direct appeal jurisdiction over a report and recommendation in a related proceeding. The trustee sued to avoid transfers. During the litigation, the trustee's law firm hired the bankruptcy judge's fiancé. After the court issued judgment for the trustee, the defendants sued the trustee's lawyer and the judge's fiancé in state court for conspiracy to obstruct due operation of law and for fraudulent corruption of the judicial process. The lawyer and fiancé removed the action to the bankruptcy court, which granted their motion to dismiss and certified the order for direct appeal to the court of appeals. A court of appeals, upon appropriate certification, may have direct appellate jurisdiction over a final judgment, order, or decree of the bankruptcy court. A core proceeding is one that arises under title 11, that is, based on a claim or right established by the Bankruptcy Code, or that arises in a case under title 11, that is, one that could not exist outside of bankruptcy. The proceeding against the lawyer and fiancé here are not core proceedings, because they assert state law tort claims and address an issue—judicial corruption—that can arise in any court or proceeding. A proceeding is related to a title 11 case if its outcome could have any conceivable effect on the bankruptcy estate. The proceeding here could have such an effect, because its outcome could result in setting aside the avoidance judgment against the defendants. A bankruptcy court does not have authority to issue a final judgment in a related proceeding without the parties' consent, which was not given here. Its determination may be treated as a report and recommendation to the district court. As such, it is not a judgment, order, or decree over which the court of appeals has appellate jurisdiction. The court dismisses the appeal. Wortley v. Bakst, 844 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2017).

- 11.3.ff Appeal from sale order authorizing sale of entire business in place is not moot. The debtor in possession sold its assets in a section 363 sale. The court found the purchaser was in good faith. After the sale, the buyer made substantial payments on the debtor's prepetition and postpetition debts that it assumed in the sale, separately purchased the debtor's inventory, hired all the debtor's employees, and started marketing and selling products to customers. The losing bidder appealed but did not obtain a stay pending appeal. Section 363(m) provides that reversal or modification of an order approving a sale to a good faith purchaser may not affect the validity of the sale, unless the sale was stayed pending appeal. However, an appeal may challenge a good faith finding. To that extent, the appeal is not moot, and the appellate court may hear the appeal. An appeal is equitably moot if the appellate court cannot grant effective relief. Here, because the sale's principal effect was simply to transfer ownership of the business and there was no material third party reliance, the transactions are capable of being unwound. Therefore, the appeal is not equitably moot. Mission Prod. Holdings, Inc. v. Old Cold, LLC (In re Old Cold, LLC), 558 B.R. 500 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2016).
- 11.3.gg Equitable mootness doctrine does not apply to a jurisdictional challenge. The bankruptcy court confirmed a plan that enjoined the Department of Health and Human Services from terminating the debtor's Medicare and Medicaid provider agreements. The debtor implemented the plan. The Department appealed on the ground that the Medicare statute deprived the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction to hear the dispute between the Department and the debtor and to enjoin termination. The district court reversed on the ground that the bankruptcy court lacked jurisdiction. The debtor appealed. The equitable mootness doctrine prevents a court from hearing an appeal where effective relief is impossible. The court of appeals agreed with the district court that the bankruptcy court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The lower court's lack of jurisdiction precludes it from issuing the challenged order, and the appellate court must vacate it. Therefore, the equitable mootness doctrine cannot apply. Fla. Agency for Health Care Admin. v. Bayou Shores SNF, LLC (In re Bayou Shores SNF, LLC), 828 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2016).
- 11.3.hh Section 363(m) applies to a settlement that is structured as a section 363 sale. The trustee settled claims against the debtor's principal lender by selling the lender the estate's claims against the lender and third parties in exchange for cash and a waiver of the lender's claims against the estate. The bankruptcy court approved the transaction both as a sale under section 363(b) and as a settlement under Rule 9019. The objector did not obtain a stay pending his appeal. Section 363(b) authorizes the trustee to sell property of the estate after notice and a hearing. Section 363(m) prohibits a reversal or modification of an order authorizing a sale from affecting the validity of a sale to a good faith purchaser. A cause of action is intangible property of the estate, which can be sold under section 363. Section 363(m) applies to such a sale. Because the objector did not obtain a stay pending appeal, his appeal is moot. Adeli v. Barclay (In re Berkely Del. Court, LLC), 834 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 2016).

- 11.3.ii Equitable mootness doctrine applies in a chapter 9 case. The debtor's chapter 9 municipal debt adjustment plan provided for discharge of over $7 billion in debt held by tens of thousands of creditors, transfers of significant municipal assets to various transferees, contributions by philanthropic organizations and the state to the city's pension plans, issuance of new debt, investment in improved municipal services and reduction of city pension obligations, among other things. Most were accomplished shortly after the plan's effective date. Some pensioners appealed the confirmation order. An appellate court may dismiss an appeal from a chapter 11 confirmation order as equitably moot if the appellant did not obtain a stay pending appeal, the plan has been substantially consummated and, most importantly, reversal of the confirmation order or modification of the plan on appeal would affect third parties' rights or the plan's overall success. A chapter 9 case, plan and confirmation order do not differ significantly from those in a chapter 11 case on issues that drive the equitable mootness analysis, nor does the debtor's governmental and public character affect the analysis. The reliance of third parties on the confirmation order and on the steps taken to consummate the plan is the most important factor in the doctrine's application. Those aspects are present in a chapter 9 case to the same extent as in a chapter 11 case. Therefore, the doctrine applies, and because all three conditions were met here, the court dismisses the appeal. A strong dissent questions the equitable mootness doctrine, arguing the Bankruptcy Code does not justify equitable mootness at all, claims the doctrine upsets the constitutional basis on which the bankruptcy system is based, arguing that it prevents any consideration by an Article III court, and asserts that it should not apply in a chapter 9 case at all. Ochadleus v. City of Detroit, Mich. (In re City of Detroit, Mich.), 838 F.3d 792 (6th Cir. 2016).
- 11.3.jj Court of appeals lacks jurisdiction over appeal from order denying approval of a settlement. The bankruptcy denied approval of a settlement of the estate's malpractice claim against the debtor's lawyers. The debtor appealed. The courts of appeals have jurisdiction over "appeals from all final decisions, judgments, orders, and decrees" issued by a district court or bankruptcy appellate panel reviewing a bankruptcy court decision. A final order disposes of the matter before the court and alters the status quo or fixes the rights and obligations of the parties. An order denying approval of a settlement does not change anything or fix any rights. Therefore, it is not a final order, and the court does not have jurisdiction over an appeal from the denial. Church Joint Venture, L.P. v. Blasingame (In re Blasingame), 651 Fed. Appx. 386 (6th Cir. 2016).
- 11.3.kk Appeal from settlement approval is not constitutionally moot if appellate court can fashion some relief. A creditor won a judgment against the debtor for $23 million. The debtor appealed. Rather than posting a bond to stay execution pending the appeal, the debtor filed a chapter 7 petition. The trustee settled with the creditor: the creditor agreed to pay the estate $100,000, and the trustee agreed to allow the creditor's claim in the case for $23 million and to dismiss the appeal. Another creditor objected to the court's approval of the settlement but did not obtain a stay pending appeal. The trustee and the creditor consummated the settlement. An appeal is constitutionally moot if the appellate court cannot grant any effective relief. If the appellate court reversed the settlement approval, the trustee could not reinstate the dismissed appeal, but she could return the creditor's payment and the bankruptcy court could adjust the creditor's claim. Therefore, the appeal is not constitutionally moot. Rich Dad Op. Co., LLC v. Zubrod (In re Rich Global, LLC), 652 Fed. Appx. 625 (10th Cir. 2016).
- 11.3.ll Appeal from stay relief motion is constitutionally moot after foreclosure and dismissal of the chapter 11 case. The bankruptcy court granted a secured creditor stay relief in the chapter 11 case to foreclose on the collateral. The debtor appealed the stay relief order. After the creditor completed foreclosure, the bankruptcy court dismissed the case. The debtor consented to and did not appeal the dismissal order. An appeal is constitutionally moot when the appellate court can no longer give the appellant any effective relief. Because the underlying bankruptcy case was dismissed and the dismissal order became final, reversal of the stay relief order would not reimpose the automatic stay. Therefore, the appellate court could not grant effective relief from the stay relief order. The appeal is moot. Castaic P'ners II, LLC v. DACA-Castaic, LLC (In re Castaic P'ners II, LLC), 823 F.3d 966 (9th Cir. 2016).

11.3.mm Ponzi scheme avoiding power defendant is not a person aggrieved by a substantive consolidation order. The debtor conducted a Ponzi scheme through a parent company and several special purpose entity (SPE) subsidiaries. The trustee sued several SPE lenders as subsequent transferees to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers. While the actions were pending, the trustee moved for substantive consolidation of the parent and the SPEs, which the bankruptcy court granted. The lenders appealed. A party may appeal a bankruptcy court order only if the party is a "person aggrieved" by the order. A person is aggrieved if the order "diminishes the person's property, increases the person's burdens or impairs the person's rights." The harm must be direct. Harm that occurs only after several additional intervening steps does not qualify. Thus, a person is not a person aggrieved by an order that makes the person subject to litigation or that removes a potential defense. Here, the consolidation order effectively changed the lenders from subsequent transferees from the parent into initial transferees from the consolidated entities, reducing their defenses to the avoidance and recovery actions. Such an effect is indirect and insufficient to make the lenders persons aggrieved, so they do not have standing to appeal. Opportunity Fin., LLC v. Kelley, 822 F.3d 451 (8th Cir. 2016).

11.3.nn Appeal from unstayed confirmation order in simple case is not equitably moot. The debtor had one secured creditor with a claim of $100,000 secured by assets worth about $200,000, 17 unsecured creditors, one with a $9.4 million judgment and the remainder with less than $1.3 million in claims, and a single shareholder. The plan provided for a single private investor to acquire the reorganized company for a $200,000 investment and for unsecured creditors to be paid $1.25 million over seven years. The large unsecured creditor unsuccessfully objected to confirmation and appealed but did not obtain a stay pending appeal. The debtor consummated the plan, began distributions and entered into various routine transactions in the conduct of its business, including hiring new employees. An appeal from an unstayed confirmation order is equitably moot if the plan is substantially consummated and granting appellate relief will either fatally scramble the plan or significantly harm third parties who justifiably relied on the plan. The doctrine must be construed narrowly and applied only where reversal would upset complex restructurings involving widespread third parties, such as new public investors, because of the federal courts' unflagging obligation to hear cases within their jurisdiction and the right of objecting creditors to appeal. Here, the plan did not involve an intricate or public transaction, and the debtor did not show that the plan would be difficult to unravel. The reorganized debtor's post-consummation transactions were routine and would likely occur after any plan's consummation and need not be unwound upon reversal. Third party reliance and harm to third parties are minimal and would be present in nearly all cases. Therefore, the appeal is not equitably moot. Judge Krause writes a lengthy concurrence arguing that the Third Circuit should revisit and reject the equitable mootness doctrine. In re One2One Communications, LLC, 805 F.3d 428 (3d Cir. 2015).

11.3.oo Appeal from order confirming real estate debtor's plan funded by a new investor is not equitably moot. The debtor developed an affordable housing project. The mortgagee began foreclosure proceedings, but the debtor stayed them with a chapter 11 petition. The debtor proposed a reorganization plan based on a new investment of $1.2 million from an unrelated third party. The bankruptcy court confirmed the plan over the mortgagee's valuation objection. The bankruptcy court and the district court denied the mortgagee's motions for a stay pending appeal, the district court affirmed, and the debtor and investor consummated the plan. If the confirmation order were reversed and the plan unwound, the investor would lose its investment and suffer related adverse tax consequences. An appellate court will dismiss an appeal from a confirmation order as equitably moot based on four factors: whether the appellant sought a stay, whether the plan was substantially consummated, what effect an appellate remedy would have on third parties not before the court and whether the remedy would knock the props out from under the plan and create an uncontrollable situation. Here, the appellant made clear its intent to appeal and sought a stay, and the plan was consummated. The denial of a stay and consummation should not prevent otherwise available appellate relief. The new investor was intimately involved in the case, participated actively in the confirmation proceedings and knew of the appellate risk. It is not the kind of innocent third party that the equitable mootness rule is designed to protect. Finally, the transaction was not overly complex and could be unwound, even though it would harm the new investor. Considering all the factors, the appeal is not equitably moot. First Southern Nat'l Bank v. Sunnyslope Housing Ltd. P'shp (In re Sunnyslope Housing Ltd. P'shp), 818 F.3d 937; motion for reh'g en banc granted, 838 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2016).

- 11.3.pp District court does not have jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal without an express grant of leave to appeal. The bankruptcy court appointed special counsel to represent the estate for PACA matters. Counsel filed two interim fee applications and one final fee application, which the bankruptcy court granted. One PACA creditor appealed all the bankruptcy court's fee orders to the district court, which reversed them without addressing whether they were interlocutory or final orders and without granting leave to appeal. Section 158(a) grants the district courts jurisdiction over appeals from bankruptcy court final orders and jurisdiction with leave over appeals from interlocutory orders. The district court may treat a notice of appeal from an interlocutory order as an application for leave to appeal. But the district court does not have jurisdiction to hear the interlocutory appeal unless it expressly grants leave. An order ruling on the appeal by itself is not an implied grant of leave to appeal. An interim fee order is an interlocutory order. Therefore, the district court did not have jurisdiction to hear the appeals from the two interim fee orders. Kingdom Fresh Produce, Inc. v. Stokes Law Office, L.L.P. (In re Delta Produce, L.P.), 817 F.3d 141 (5th Cir), aff'd on reh., 845 F.3d 609 (5th Cir. 2016).
- 11.3.qq Appeal from chapter 7 settlement approval order is not equitably moot. The chapter 7 trustee settled two adversary proceedings. The first settlement did not involve payment or distribution of money, but it did result in dismissal of the settled litigation with prejudice. The second settlement involved the defendant's payment to the trustee and dismissal with prejudice, but the trustee had not yet distributed any of the funds as of the time of the appeal. The bankruptcy court approved the settlements and denied an objector's motion for a stay pending appeal. An appeal is equitably moot if the appellate court cannot grant effective judicial relief. To determine whether the court can grant effective relief, it must perform a multi-factor analysis, including whether a stay was obtained and if not, why not, whether the plan has been substantially consummated, the relief the appellant seeks, the relief's effect on parties not before the appellate court, and the effect on the debtor's emergence as a reorganized entity. Equitable mootness applies generally to chapter 11 plan confirmation orders. The court here does not decide whether it should apply in a chapter 7 case but assumes it does. The appellant tried to obtain a stay but was blocked by the bankruptcy court's procedural maneuvering. The settlements were not clearly substantially consummated, because the trustee had not distributed the proceeds to creditors. The transactions were not complicated or difficult to unwind. And reversal would not adversely affect third parties who were not before the court. The statute of limitations had run on both dismissed adversary proceedings, but the court suggests that equitable tolling would permit refiling. Therefore, court could grant effective relief, and the appeal is not equitably moot. Ullrich v. Welt (In re NICA Holdings, Inc.), 810 F.3d 781 (11th Cir. 2015).
- 11.3.rr Court of appeals has jurisdiction over an appeal from an abstention order that does not rely on section 1334(c) grounds. The state court defendant removed an action to the district court as related to a chapter 11 case. While the plaintiff's remand motion was pending, the liquidators for entities related to the chapter 11 debtor filed chapter 15 cases for those entities. The district court permissively abstained under section 1334(c)(1) and ordered remand under section 1452(b) of title 28. Section 1334(c)(1) permits abstention in the interest of justice or of comity with State courts, except with respect to a case under chapter 15. Section 1334(d) provides that a decision to abstain or not to abstain under section 1334(c) is not reviewable by appeal or otherwise by the courts of appeal. However, if the district court bases its decision on a ground that section 1334(c)(1) does not authorize, then the decision is not “under section 1334(c),” and the courts of appeals may review whether the abstention ground was proper. Because the appellant’s challenge to the abstention and remand order was that sections 1334(c)(1) and 1452 did not apply, rather than to the district court’s reason for abstention and remand, the court of appeals has jurisdiction under section 158(d). Firefighters Retirement System v. Citco Group Ltd., 788 F.3d 425 (5th Cir. 2015).

11.3.ss In a thoughtful opinion considering equitable mootness and its underlying policies, Third Circuit dismisses confirmation appeal as moot. A failed LBO pushed the debtor into chapter 11. Creditors asserted substantial claims against the LBO sponsors and lenders. Ultimately, two plans were proposed that differed primarily in their treatment of the LBO claims: one settled them, the other preserved them for a litigation trust. Nearly all creditor classes rejected the litigation plan. The court confirmed the settlement plan. The litigation plan proponent appealed, seeking a ruling that would preserve the litigation and requesting a stay pending appeal. The bankruptcy court required a $1.5 billion supersedeas bond as a condition to a stay pending appeal, and the district court did not set aside that ruling. The appellant opposed any bond at all, choosing not to argue for a smaller bond amount. The plan was then consummated with a new equity investment. Under Third Circuit precedent, an appeal may be dismissed as equitably moot if the plan has been substantially consummated and if so, whether granting the appellate relief requested will either fatally scramble the plan or significantly harm third parties who have justifiably relied on confirmation and consummation. Some third parties have reliance interests more worthy of protection than others. For example, new equity investors are most worthy of protection to encourage new investment to rescue companies from bankruptcy. Parties who have received plan distributions to which they are not entitled are least worthy of protection, as long as recovering the distributions will not unravel the plan. Those who participated in the plan process and negotiated settlements and plan terms and those who deal with the reorganized debtor fall somewhere in between. Here, the remedy the appellant seeks would upset the entire plan settlement and undermine the equity investor’s investment in the reorganized debtor. Finally, equitable mootness is an equitable doctrine. It would be inequitable to reward the appellant’s decision to risk mootness rather than propose and justify a reasonable bond amount. Therefore, the court dismisses the appeal. However, the court does not dismiss a related appeal in which an indenture trustee argued that the plan misinterpreted a subordination agreement and distributed $30 million to the wrong class, because the amount was small in relation to the entire plan (so recovery would not scramble the plan), and the recipients could not justifiably rely on the confirmation order if they were not entitled under the documents to the funds. In re Tribune Media Co., 799 F.3d 272 (3d Cir. 2015).

11.3.tt Equitable mootness does not apply to an appeal of sale proceeds distribution order, and the appeal is not moot under section 363(m). The debtor in possession sold all its assets, including its cash, to its secured lender under a credit bid of about 90% of the secured debt. The secured lender agreed to put funds into escrow to pay the DIP’s professional and to fund into escrow a small distribution to unsecured creditors. The sale resulted in a large, administrative priority capital gain tax. The government objected to the sale and to the distribution of the escrowed funds to professionals and unsecured creditors and appealed the sale order, seeking payment of its tax claim from the escrowed funds. Section 363(m) provides that the reversal or modification on appeal of an order authorizing a sale does not affect the validity of the sale to a good faith purchaser. It applies only to an appellate order that affects the validity of the sale itself, not one that grants ancillary relief, such as an order to redistribute sale proceeds. In addition, the equitable mootness doctrine applies only to an appeal from a plan confirmation order. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. In re LCI Holding Co., Inc., 802 F.3d 547 (3d Cir. 2015).

11.3.uu Appeal is not moot where the court may modify plan without affecting innocent third parties. The debtor comprised two operating hotel entities, two mezzanine entities, and a holding company. The operating debtors' lender purchased the mezzanine debtors' loans. The debtor proposed a plan to sell the hotels to a third party and to restructure the operating debtors' loan. The lender made the section 1111(b) election, so the plan proposed to pay the lender total cash payments equal to the lender's $247 million claim over 21 years, with interest only and a full principal balloon payment at the end. If the purchaser sold the property, the full principal would be payable immediately, unless the purchaser sold between years five and fifteen, in which case the purchaser's purchaser could assume the restructured loan. Creditor classes of the operating debtors accepted the plan, but no mezzanine debtor creditor classes did. The bankruptcy court confirmed the plan, finding the restructured loan met section 1129(b)(2)(A)'s cramdown requirements and that section 1129(a)(10)'s "impaired accepting class" rule applies on a per-plan basis. The lender appealed from the bankruptcy court's ruling on both issues and sought a stay from the bankruptcy court and from the district court, both of which denied the stay request. The debtor consummated the plan and transferred the hotels to the purchaser. The district court dismissed the appeal as equitably moot. An appellate court may dismiss an appeal as equitably moot based upon four considerations: whether the appellant has fully pursued its rights, whether the plan has been substantially consummated, an appellate remedy's effect on innocent third parties, and whether the bankruptcy court can fashion effective relief without knocking the props out from under the plan and thereby creating an uncontrollable situation. Here, the appellant pursued its rights by seeking a stay, but an appellate court should not penalize the appellant for failure to obtain one, assuming the other considerations counsel against mootness. The plan was substantially consummated, but that alone does not require dismissal. The relief the lender sought might affect the purchaser, but not necessarily other parties. The court could, for example, modify the terms of the loan assumption provisions or the allocation of value to the mezzanine lender. Neither remedy would affect third parties; the purchaser is not an innocent third party, having fully participated in the plan process. Finally, fashioning such a remedy would not necessarily knock the props out from under the plan, though the bankruptcy court should be careful in fashioning a remedy. Based on these considerations, the appeal is not moot. The court of appeals remands to the district court to hear the appeal. JPMCC 2007-C1 Grasslawn Lodging, LLC v. Transwest Resort Props. Inc. (In re Transwest Resort Props. Inc.), 791 F.3d 1140 (9th Cir. 2015); on reh'g, 801 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2015).

11.3.vv Appeal from fee award under section 303(i) based on unreviewable abstention under section 305 is not moot. The creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The bankruptcy court dismissed the petition on the grounds that the claimed debts were subject to bona fide dispute and that the court should abstain under section 305 because the disputes were the subject of ongoing litigation in other courts. The bankruptcy court then awarded attorneys' fees against the creditors under section 303(i). The creditors appealed to the district court, which affirmed all rulings. The creditors appealed to the court of appeals but then argued that the appeal was moot and should be dismissed, because the court of appeals does not have jurisdiction over an appeal from an abstention ruling under section 305. The creditors sought an order vacating the fees award based on the mootness of the appeal, which prevented them from obtaining review of the dismissal order. An award of money damages presents a live controversy, even if the underlying issues resulting in the award are moot and not subject to appeal. Therefore, the court of appeals has jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the attorneys' fee award. Crest One SpA v. TPC Troy, LLC (In re TPG Troy, LLC), 793 F.3d 228 (2d Cir. 2015).

- 11.3.ww Court dismisses as equitably moot an appeal from a structured dismissal. The debtor's lessor sued the debtor to terminate its lease. One of its two shareholders asserted his claims were secured, which the other shareholder disputed. A judicial lien creditor had levied on the debtor's accounts, which were now frozen. After bankruptcy court litigation over the validity of the lessor's lease termination and over a reorganization plan, the lessor, the shareholder with the disputed secured claim, and the other secured creditor settled. The settlement provided for the lessor to pay into the estate $4 million and to receive a lease termination and clear title to the real property, for the non-claimant shareholder to receive all the debtor's equipment, worth over $2 million, for the full payment of administrative claims, for a distribution of approximately 40% to the general unsecured creditors, for distribution of the balance of the $4 million cash payment to the claimant shareholder, and for dismissal of the case. The court approved the settlement, including the dismissal; the parties consummated the entire settlement. The non-claiming shareholder appealed, asking the court to reverse the distribution to the claimant shareholder on the ground that the shareholder's claim was not secured. A court must dismiss an appeal as equitably moot when the court cannot grant effective relief, such as when the court lacks power to rescind transactions that are the subject of the appeal. The equitable mootness doctrine is not limited to appeals from plan confirmation orders. Here, the settlement was an integrated transaction. Reversing the distribution to the claimant shareholder would effectively break the settlement into two parts, which would arbitrarily reform the parties' agreement. Therefore, the court could not grant effective relief and so dismisses the appeal. Musilino v. Ala. Marble Co., Inc., 534 B.R. 820 (N.D. Ala. 2015).
- 11.3.xx Denial of a stay pending appeal of a sale order is a final order for purposes of appeal. The debtor in possession moved to sell property free and clear of a leasehold interest on the ground that the leasehold interest was subject to a bona fide dispute. The lessee objected on the ground, among others, that the DIP had not shown a bona fide dispute. The bankruptcy court granted the free and clear sale motion and denied a stay pending appeal, as did the district court. Under section 158(d) of title 28, the court of appeals has "jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions, judgments, orders, and decrees" of the district court in bankruptcy proceedings. Section 363(m) prohibits an appellate order from affecting a sale's validity to a good faith purchaser. Therefore, if the sale closed, the lessee would be without a remedy; the district court's denial of the stay effectively foreclosed the lessee from further relief. Under the circumstances, the stay denial operated as a final order, so the court of appeals had jurisdiction under section 158(d). In re Revel AC, Inc., 802 F.3d 558 (3d Cir. 2015).
- 11.3.yy Third Circuit describes standard for stay pending appeal. A lessee brought an action seeking a declaratory judgment that it was entitled to the protections of section 365(h), which permits a lessee to retain its interest even after lease rejection. The debtor in possession then moved to sell property free and clear of a leasehold interest on the ground that the leasehold interest was subject to a bona fide dispute. The lessee objected on the ground, among others, that the DIP had not shown a bona fide dispute. The bankruptcy court granted the free and clear sale motion and denied a stay pending appeal, as did the district court. To obtain a stay pending appeal, an appellant must make a strong showing of likelihood of success on the merits, show irreparable injury that outweighs the expected injury to the appellee, and show that a stay is in the public interest. The appellant need not show that merits success is more likely than not; rather, a reasonable chance or probability of winning is adequate. The appellant must show that irreparable injury is likely, not merely possible. These first two factors are the most important. After that, the court should consider the balance of potential harms to the parties from denying or granting a stay in conjunction with the public interest consideration. In cases between the extremes or where all factors do not point in the same direction, the court should use a sliding scale in considering the factors: the stronger the likelihood of merits success, the less weight to be accorded to irreparable injury, balancing harms, and the public interest. Conversely, if the likely harm to the appellant would be substantial, and the balance of harms tips decidedly in its favor, then a weaker showing, though still well above negligible, of likelihood of success might suffice for a stay. Thus, the appellant need not necessarily prevail on each of the four factors. Here, likely statutory mootness of the appeal under section 363(m) establishes irreparable harm to the appellant/lessee, and DIP did not show that it would likely lose the sale absent a stay. The public interest factor slightly favored the DIP, but not enough to overcome the near certainty of merits success. The declaratory judgment action sought only confirmation that section 365(h) protections applied and did not suggest any dispute at all over whether the lease was in fact a lease. Therefore, the court grants the stay pending appeal. In re Revel AC, Inc., 802 F.3d 558 (3d Cir. 2015).

11.3.zz Avoiding power defendant does not have standing to appeal substantive consolidation order. The bankruptcy court granted the trustee's motion to consolidate the estates of a Ponzi scheme debtor and its wholly owned special purpose entities while the trustee's avoiding power actions against net winner investors in the subsidiaries were pending. The consolidation order facilitated the trustee's avoiding power actions by making the investors initial transferees rather than subsequent transferees. The investors objected to consolidation and appealed the bankruptcy court's ruling. Only a "person aggrieved" has standing to appeal a bankruptcy court's order. A person aggrieved is one who has a pecuniary interest directly affected by the order, one whose property is diminished, burdens increased, or rights impaired by the bankruptcy court's order. A person is not aggrieved by an order that merely requires the person to defend litigation or deprives a person of a defense in an adversary proceeding, nor is a person aggrieved whose interest is not protected by the Bankruptcy Code. An adversary defendant's interest in defending an action is an interest the Bankruptcy Code does not protect. Therefore, the investors are not persons aggrieved by the substantive consolidation order. That the investors have a contingent claim against the estate that might arise from the trustee's successful pursuit of the avoiding power action does not change the result. The claim is speculative, and the argument amounts only to another way to assert their interest as defendants. The court dismisses the appeal. WestLB AG v. Kelley, 531 B.R. 783 (D. Minn. 2015).

11.3.aaa Equitable mootness doctrine applies to appeal from order confirming liquidation plan. The retail debtor confirmed and substantially consummated a liquidation chapter 11 plan. Shortly before the effective date, several gift card holders filed proofs of claim and moved for class certification for all gift card holders. The bankruptcy court rejected their claims as late filed and denied their motion. They appealed but did not seek a stay until 10 months after the plan's effective date. An appeal from a confirmation order is equitably moot if the plan has been substantially consummated and implementing relief would be inequitable, unless the court can still order some relief that will not affect the debtor's reemergence or knock the props out from under the plan's transactions, the potentially affected parties are able to participate in the appeal, and the appellant pursued available remedies diligently. The equitable mootness doctrine applies equally to an appeal from a confirmation order of a chapter 11 plan providing for liquidation as well as to one providing for reorganization. The appellants do not meet the exception to applying the equitable mootness doctrine, so the court dismisses the appeal. Beeman v. BGI Creditors' Liquidating Trust (In re BGI, Inc.), 772 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2014).

11.3.bbb Equitable mootness doctrine applies to an appeal from an order confirming a liquidating plan. The debtor confirmed its liquidating chapter 11 plan. Two weeks later, arguing lack of adequate notice, three creditors moved for leave to file late proofs of claims and to certify a class of similarly situated creditors. The bankruptcy court denied the motions seven months later, finding that they had adequate notice of the bar date. They appealed but did not seek a stay of the confirmation order, and the estate had by then already paid administrative and priority claims. An appeal from a plan confirmation order is equitably moot "when, even though effective relief could conceivably be fashioned, implementation of that relief would be inequitable" such as by being impractical or imprudent. In the Second Circuit, the court presumes such an appeal is equitably moot if the plan has been substantially consummated. The appellant may rebut the presumption by showing the court can still grant some relief, which will not affect the debtor's reemergence as a revitalized company or knock the props out from under plan transactions and create an unmanageable situation for the bankruptcy court, adverse parties have a chance to participate, and the appellant pursued a stay diligently. As in connection with a reorganizing plan, parties and the court may have devoted substantial time and resources to plan formulation and confirmation, and substantial interests may have attached. Therefore, the equitable mootness presumption should apply equally to an appeal from a liquidating chapter 11 plan confirmation order. Here, the plan was substantially consummated, and the appellants did not assure adequate protection for potentially affected parties or pursue a stay. Therefore, the court dismisses the appeal. Beeman v. BGI Creditors' Liquidating Trust (In re BGI, Inc.), 772 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2014).

11.3.ccc Seeking a stay is required to prevent equitable mootness dismissal. The debtor raised money from investors to extend mortgage loans by granting the investors interests in the notes and mortgages and acting as servicer. The bankruptcy court confirmed a plan that transferred the servicing rights to a new manager. The manager sought to sell some of the loans. An investor objected on the grounds, among others, that the plan did not transfer the agreement to the manager and if it did, the investor could revoke its servicing agreement as a revocable agency agreement. The bankruptcy court overruled the objection and granted the manager a declaratory judgment affirming its authority. The investor appealed and sought a stay. The bankruptcy court conditioned the stay on a bond that the investor could not afford. The district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's ruling on the stay. The manager sold some of the properties while the appeal was pending. A court may dismiss a bankruptcy appeal as equitably moot based on whether a stay was sought, the plan was substantially consummated, the remedy would affect third parties not before the court and would not knock the props out from under the plan. A party must seek a stay to show diligence but need not obtain a stay to defeat a mootness ruling, as equity requires diligence, not success. In this case, though the plan had been substantially consummated, the appellant diligently sought a stay from the bankruptcy and district courts, and a ruling affecting the manager's authority only as to future stays would neither adversely affect innocent third parties nor undermine the plan. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Rev Op Group v. ML Manager LLC (In re Mortgages Ltd.), 771 F.3d 623 (9th Cir. 2014).

11.3.ddd Missing a nonjurisdictional appeal deadline does not require dismissal of the appeal. The appellant filed a motion for reconsideration under Civil Rule 59(e) 23 days after losing a bankruptcy appeal at the district court. The district court denied the motion. The appellant filed its notice of appeal to the court of appeals 51 days after the initial adverse district court ruling. The appellee did not object to the timeliness of the notice of appeal, but the court of appeals ordered briefing on the timeliness issue. The court of appeals must dismiss an appeal if the notice of appeal was filed after a jurisdictional deadline for filing a notice of appeal, but not if the deadline is only a claims processing rule. A deadline is jurisdictional if it is statutory, because only Congress may define a federal court's jurisdiction. A judge-made rule is not jurisdictional. Appellate Rule 6(b) applies Appellate Rule 4(a) to an appeal from a district court's decision in a bankruptcy appeal. Appellate Rule 4(a) is reflected in 28 U.S.C. § 2107, but Appellate Rule 6(b) is not statutory and therefore not jurisdictional. A motion for rehearing under Bankruptcy Rule 8015, which must be filed within 14 days after entry of judgment, suspends the time for filing a notice of appeal, but in a bankruptcy appeal, a motion for reconsideration under Civil Rule 59(e) does not, because Appellate Rule 6(b) makes Appellate Rule 4(a)(4) (which suspends the time for appeal after a Rule 59 motion) inapplicable in bankruptcy appeals. In this case, even if the appellant had filed its motion under Rule 8015, it would have been untimely and therefore would not have extended the time for the notice of appeal to the court of appeals. Because Appellate Rule 6(b) is not jurisdictional, any timeliness objection is forfeited if not timely raised. Appellee did not raise the issue, the objection is forfeited, and the court does not dismiss the appeal. Tze Wung Consultants, Ltd. v. Bank of Baroda (In re Indu Craft, Inc.), 749 F.3d 107 (2d Cir. 2014).

11.3.eee Order denying stay relief is not necessarily a final order. The debtor’s counterparty sued the debtor in Virginia. The debtor sued the counterparty in Puerto Rico. Each counterclaimed, and the counterparty asked the Virginia court to stay the Puerto Rico litigation under the “first to file” rule. Before the court ruled, the debtor filed a chapter 7 case in Puerto Rico. The bankruptcy court granted stay relief to allow the Puerto Rico action—claim and counterclaim—to proceed to judgment. The counterparty sought stay relief to allow the Virginia court to decide the first to file issue. The bankruptcy court denied stay relief without prejudice, and the counterparty appealed. Section 158(d)(1) gives the court of appeals jurisdiction over “final decisions, judgments, orders, and decrees.” In bankruptcy, courts treat finality flexibly, because of the multiple “proceedings within a proceeding” nature of a case. Thus, an order granting stay relief is final and appealable, because it resolves a discrete dispute within the case. Nothing more need be done on the stay. However, an order denying stay relief, especially one without prejudice, might not resolve a discrete, fully-developed issue that is not reviewable elsewhere. Here, the discrete issue was the first to file issue. The bankruptcy court did not resolve that issue by denying stay relief but deferred to the Puerto Rico court to address it. Once it does, the counterparty might seek stay relief again, on a more fully developed record. Therefore, the denial was not a final order. The court dismisses the appeal, over a strong dissent and the different views of seven other circuits. Pinpoint IT Servs., LLC v. Landrau Rivera (In re Atlas IT Export Corp.), 761 F.3d 177 (1st Cir. 2014).

11.3.fff Adversary defendant is not a “person aggrieved” by an order that requires him to defend litigation. The debtor’s confirmed plan established a litigation trust and imposed a deadline on actions it could bring. After the deadline, the debtor modified the plan to extend the deadline. Because the plan had not been substantially consummated, the court permitted the modification and confirmed the modified plan. A former creditor (one who had withdrawn his proof of claim) appealed. Only a “person aggrieved” may appeal a bankruptcy court order. A person aggrieved is one whom the order directly, adversely, and pecuniarily affects by diminishing his property, increasing his burdens, or impairing rights that the Bankruptcy Code seeks to protect or regulate. An order subjecting a party to litigation causes a party only indirect harm, because the party may still exercise the right to defend the litigation. Here, the only right the defendant sought to protect was to prevent being sued, based on a provision of the superseded plan, not the Bankruptcy Code. Therefore, he is not a person aggrieved. Atkinson v. Ernie Haire Ford, Inc. (In re Ernie Haire Ford, Inc.), 764 F.3d 1321 (11th Cir. 2014).

11.3.ggg Section 364(e) statutory mootness does not apply to non-estate collateral. Vantage sued Su for fraud to impose a constructive trust on and recover Vantage shares that it had issued to Su and that Su had transferred to his wholly-owned corporation F3. While the litigation was pending, Su caused other wholly-owned corporations to file chapter 11 cases. The bankruptcy court ordered that Su deposit the Vantage shares in custodia legis to secure compliance by the debtors in possession with bankruptcy court orders and to secure DIP financing. The order did not transfer title to the estates and permitted F3 to retain all voting rights in the shares. The DIPs then sought financing secured by the Vantage shares, which the bankruptcy court approved over Vantage’s objection. Vantage appealed. Section 364(e) provides, “The reversal or modification on appeal of an authorization under this section to obtain credit or incur debt, or of a grant under this section of a priority or a lien, does not affect the validity” of the debt or lien “to an entity that extended such credit in good faith” unless the order were stayed pending appeal. “Good faith” requires giving value, in good faith, and without notice of adverse claims and the absence of fraud, collusion, and any attempt to take grossly unfair advantage of other bidders. Here, the DIP lender knew of Vantage’s adverse claim to the Vantage shares, defeating the lender’s good faith, so the appeal may affect its lien on the Vantage shares and is therefore not moot. The bankruptcy court has “related to” jurisdiction over a proceeding that could conceivably have an effect on the estate or property of the estate. Section 541(a)(7) includes as property of the estate “[a]ny interest in property that the estate acquires after the commencement of the case.” However, its reach is limited to property that is traceable to property of the estate or generated in the ordinary course of the debtor’s business. Here, the Vantage shares remained F3’s property, were not derived from property of the estate, and did not, by reason of the deposit order, become property of the estate. Otherwise, the bankruptcy court could create “bootstrap jurisdiction” simply by ordering non-estate property to be deposited with the court. Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to order a lien on the Vantage shares for the DIP lender. Finally, the prepetition Vantage litigation could not have any conceivable effect on the estate, because it did not affect any property of the estate or any debtor, only the debtors’ shareholder. Therefore, the bankruptcy court could not resolve the dispute over ownership of the Vantage shares. TMT Procurement Corp. v. Vantage Drilling Co. (In re TMT Procurement Corp.), 764 F.3d 512 (5th Cir. 2014).

- 11.3.hhh Court of appeals issues mandamus to require district court to decide bankruptcy appeal before plan confirmation hearing. The bankruptcy court applied the automatic stay to prevent a creditor from trapping the debtor’s revenue that had been paid into a lockbox account, on the ground that the funds were property of the debtor. The creditor appealed. After briefing and over the creditor’s objection, the district court stayed the appeal pending a decision by the court of appeals on the bankruptcy court’s ruling that the debtor was eligible for bankruptcy. The creditor then petitioned the court of appeals for a writ of mandamus. The All Writs Act authorizes an appellate court to issue a writ of mandamus in aid of its present or future jurisdiction, but mandamus is an extraordinary remedy. The court of appeals should consider whether the party has other means of redress and will suffer irreparable damage and whether the district court’s order was clearly erroneous, incorporates an oft-repeated error, or raises new and important issues. Although a reversal of the eligibility ruling would moot the stay appeal, the appeals are independent, and both should proceed, lest the creditor be denied its statutory right of judicial review. Moreover, the risk of irreparable harm is substantial, because the stay ruling will affect plan confirmation. The rules seek to expedite bankruptcy appeals, and the courts have more flexible, pragmatic rules on what is a final judgment. They contemplate early appeals to inform the confirmation process. Therefore, the court issues the writ to require the district court to rule on the appeals within 12 days. In re Syncora Guar. Inc., 757 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2014).
- 11.3.iii Bankruptcy court’s stay pending appeal ends when BAP issues its mandate. A fraudulent transfer defendant appealed the bankruptcy court’s judgment and obtained a stay pending appeal. The BAP affirmed; the defendant appealed to the court of appeals. Bankruptcy Rule 8005, which applies to appeals from the bankruptcy court to the district court or BAP, permits a bankruptcy judge to issue a stay “during the pendency of an appeal.” Bankruptcy Rule 8017 permits the district court or the BAP to “stay its judgment pending an appeal to the court of appeals” and provides that the stay “shall continue until final disposition by the court of appeals.” In light of Rule 8017, governing stays pending appeal to the court of appeals, the bankruptcy court’s stay pending appeal to the BAP terminates when the BAP issues its mandate. Lofstedt v. Kendall (In re Kendall), 510 B.R. 356 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2014).
- 11.3.jjj Tenth Circuit’s treatise on statutory mootness under section 363(m). The bankruptcy court determined that the estate owned various assets that the debtor transferred during the involuntary gap period and ordered their return to the estate under sections 549 and 550. One of the assets was a mining agreement that permitted the debtor to mine coal on the transferee’s land. The counterparty also claimed that the debtor had breached a “continuous mining” clause in the contract and therefore owed the counterparty over $1 million. While the transferees were appealing the ruling, the trustee sold the assets to a good faith purchaser. The trustee moved to dismiss the appeals as moot. Section 363(m) provides the “reversal or modification on appeal of an authorization under subsection (b) or (c) of this section of a sale or lease of property does not affect the validity of a sale or lease under such authorization” to a good faith purchaser. If the appeal seeks a remedy that would affect the validity of the sale, the appellate court may not grant the remedy, and the appeal is moot. The trustee has the burden of proving mootness. However, the trustee need not disprove any possible remedy. The appellant must identify the remedy it seeks, and the trustee’s burden is to show that the remedy would affect the sale’s validity. This appeal does not challenge the order authorizing the sale but the prior order determining that the property is property of the estate. A reversal or modification of that order would affect the sale’s validity, because it would undermine the purchaser’s title. Therefore, section 363(m) applies equally to an order that precedes a sale authorization order if the appellate remedy would affect the validity of the sale. If the appellants sought only recovery from the estate of the sale proceeds, it would not affect the validity of the sale. Such a remedy is available if the estate has sufficient undistributed assets remaining to satisfy the remedy, whether or not the sale proceeds were segregated. But one appellant here sought only imposition of a constructive trust on the sale proceeds, and on the particular facts, a constructive trust was not available. Therefore, that appellant’s appeal is moot. Another appellant appealed from the bankruptcy court’s interpretation of the continuous mining clause. A reversal or modification of that order would change the contract that the purchaser bought and would thereby affect the sale. Because that appellant sought only that remedy and not simple breach of contract damages from the estate, its appeal is also moot. Rushton v. ANR Co., Inc. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 740 F.3d 548 (10th Cir. 2014).

11.3.kkk A shareholder does not have standing to appeal a chapter 11 to chapter 7 conversion order. A corporate debtor filed a chapter 11 case. A trustee was appointed, sold the debtor’s assets and moved to convert the case to chapter 7. The debtor’s shareholders appealed the conversion order. Only a person aggrieved has standing to appeal. A debtor might be a person aggrieved if success on the appeal would create a surplus over the amount necessary to satisfy all creditor claims. In a chapter 7 case, section 762(a)(6) directs the surplus to the debtor, not to the shareholders. Therefore, the debtor might have standing, but the shareholders do not. Sears v. U.S. Trustee (In re AFY), 734 F.3d 810 (8th Cir. 2013).

11.3.iii Competing bidder who did not bid does not have standing to appeal. The debtor in possession proposed an all-cash auction of its assets. The sale process required a 10% cash deposit. A joint venture made the deposit and bid. Another bidder proposed an alternative purchase structure. The judge rejected the proposal and confirmed the sale to the joint venture. The sale closed. The disappointed bidder appealed on the ground, among others, that the joint venture constituted voidable collusive bidding under section 365(n). A prospective bidder who does not actually bid is not harmed by the process and may not appeal. In re New Energy Corp., 739 F.3d 1077 (7th Cir. 2014).

11.3.mmm Court dismisses as moot a chapter 9 confirmation order appeal challenging debtor’s constitutional authority. The county controlled the county hospital board. The county council replaced the hospital board members with the council board members and later filed a chapter 9 case for the hospital. A displaced hospital board member sued, arguing that the replacement violated a state constitutional prohibition on dual office holding. While the bankruptcy case was pending, the state supreme court ruled in favor of the former board member. The former board member moved to dismiss the bankruptcy case as improperly authorized and objected to the debtor’s plan to sell the hospital. The bankruptcy court denied the motion, overruled the confirmation objection and confirmed the plan. The former board member sought a stay from the bankruptcy court, which was denied. The hospital and the buyer consummated the sale and disbursed the sale proceeds to creditors. The former board member appealed. When deciding a motion to dismiss an appeal from a confirmation order as equitably moot, a court should consider whether the appellant sought a stay, whether the plan has been substantially consummated and the extent to which the appellate relief requested would affect the reorganization's success and third parties' interests. Here, the appellant sought a stay only from the bankruptcy court, the plan was substantially consummated and granting appellate relief would undo the plan completely and unduly harm innocent third parties who are not before the court. Therefore, the court dismisses the appeal as moot. Alexander v. Barnwell County Hospital, 498 B.R. 550 (D.S.C. 2013).

11.3.nnn Third Circuit restricts dismissal of plan confirmation order appeal for equitable mootness. The supplier filed an adversary proceeding asserting that it retained title or a statutory lien on the goods that it supplied to the debtor before bankruptcy. The debtor in possession proposed a general procedure, with representative adversary proceedings, for all similarly situated suppliers. The court adopted the DIP's proposed procedure and stayed the supplier's adversary proceeding. The DIP, the principal secured lenders and the representative suppliers reached a settlement that was incorporated into a plan. The supplier class under the plan accepted the plan, but the supplier objected to discharge of its claim without a right to determine its property interest in the adversary proceeding. The court overruled the objection and confirmed the plan. The debtor implemented the plan, taking down new financing and issuing new debt and equity securities. The supplier's claim was about $200,000; the amount distributed under the plan to the supplier class was about $161 million and to all creditors and equity holders was over $2 billion. The reorganized debtor had over $73 million in cash upon emergence. The supplier appealed. Equitable mootness, more appropriately called "prudential forbearance," requires dismissal of an appeal from a plan confirmation order when granting appellate relief would disrupt an implemented plan or harm third parties. It promotes finality of bankruptcy decisions on which third parties may rely, though it contravenes the important federal jurisdictional policy that a court with jurisdiction must exercise it. Courts have considered five factors in determining when to dismiss an appeal for equitable mootness, but they may be synthesized into just two: If a plan has been substantially consummated, will granting relief "fatally scramble the plan and/or (b) significantly harm third parties who have justifiably relied on plan confirmation?" Substantial consummation, as defined in section 1101, indicates that implementation has progressed to the point where turning back may be imprudent. If so, then the appellate court must consider whether it might grant relief that modifies the plan without undoing it and that does not harm third parties who have acted reasonably in reliance on the confirmation order's finality. Dismissal where there is jurisdiction should be rare, and Congress gave a right to appeal a confirmation order without obtaining a stay. Therefore, the party seeking dismissal has the burden of proof, based on evidence in the record. Here, the small amount that the supplier sought would not undo the plan and would not adversely affect third parties who relied on confirmation. Finally, "[p]reserving the finality of plan confirmation to encourage parties to move forward with plan execution justifies forbearing the exercise of jurisdiction only where precluding the appeal will prevent a perverse outcome." Samson Energy Res. Co. v. SemCrude, L.P. (In re SemCrude, L.P.), 728 F.3d 314 (3d Cir. 2013).

11.3.ooo Bankruptcy Rules do not impose a deadline for a joint certification for a direct appeal. The trustee sued to recover a fraudulent transfer. The bankruptcy court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim for relief. The trustee filed a notice of appeal to the district court 13 days later. The trustee and the defendants agreed to direct appeal to the court of appeals and filed certifications under Rule 8001(f) 26 days later. They filed a joint petition under Fed. R. App. Proc. 5 27 days after that. Rule 8001(f)(3)(A) requires that a request for certification be filed within the time specified in 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(2). Section 158(d)(2)(E) requires that a request for certification under 158(d)(2)(B) be made within 60 days after the entry of judgment. Rule 800a(f)(3)(A) and section 158(d)(2)(B) by their terms apply only to a request to the court for certification, not to the parties' joint certification for a direct appeal. Accordingly, Rule 8001 does not set a deadline for parties' joint certification of a direct appeal. Peterson v. Somers Dublin Ltd., 729 F.3d 741 (7th Cir. 2013).

11.3.ppp Creditor does not have standing to appeal order granting stay relief to pursue litigation. Before bankruptcy, the creditor sued the debtor in Virginia, the debtor sued the creditor in Puerto Rico, and the creditor counterclaimed against the debtor in the Puerto Rico action, all involving the same dispute. After bankruptcy, the trustee obtained stay relief for the Puerto Rico action, including for the counterclaim against the debtor. The creditor appealed. A party may appeal only if it is a person aggrieved, that is, a person whose property is diminished, whose burdens are increased, or whose rights are adversely affected by the trial court's order. Here, the creditor did not lose any rights to argue in the Puerto Rico action that the dispute should be resolved in the Virginia court. The ruling was only that the bankruptcy court would not decide that issue. Because all the creditor's rights were preserved, the creditor was not a person aggrieved and did not have standing to appeal the stay relief order. Pinpoint IT Servs., LLC v. Atlas IT Export, LLC (In re Atlas IT Export, LLC), 491 B.R. 192 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2013).

11.3.qqq Notice of appeal filed with the district court while an appeal was pending before the BAP is a nullity. In a BAP circuit, section 158(c)(1) requires an appellant to elect the district court when filing the appeal. Rule 8001(e)(1) requires the appellant to make the election in a separate writing, not in the notice of appeal. After the bankruptcy court announced its decision but before entry of judgment, the debtor filed with the district court a notice of appeal "to the district court". He did not file the separate election required by Rule 8001(e). The district court clerk promptly transmitted the notice to the bankruptcy court clerk. Rule 8002(a) provides that a notice of appeal filed after announcement of a decision but before entry of the order is effective without refiling upon entry of the order. Accordingly, the BAP recognized the appeal, entered it on the docket and issued an order denying the debtor's election to appeal to the district court because it was not made in a separate writing. (The opinion does not relate how the BAP learned of the notice of appeal.) Coincidentally, the bankruptcy court entered judgment on the same day. Apparently unaware of the court's entry of judgment, the debtor, two days later, filed a voluntary withdrawal of the notice of appeal, stating an intention to refile after entry of the judgment. Upon learning of the entry, the debtor timely filed a "renewed" notice of appeal and an election in a separate writing to proceed before the district court. The BAP apparently did not recognize the prior voluntary withdrawal and maintained the docket on the original notice of appeal. The debtor failed to file other papers in the appeal, so the BAP dismissed the appeal for failure to prosecute. The appellee filed a motion with the district court to dismiss the appeal that appeared to be pending there based on the renewed notice of appeal. The district court denied the motion and proceeded to the merits, affirming the bankruptcy court. The debtor timely appealed to the court of appeals. Rule 8001(c) permits voluntary dismissal of an appeal only by stipulation or court order. Therefore, the voluntary withdrawal that the debtor filed was ineffective, and the original notice of appeal remained effective. Because the debtor had not properly elected the district court to hear the appeal, it remained pending at the BAP. When the BAP dismissed it, the matter concluded. The second notice of appeal with the election to the district court filed while the original appeal was already pending before the BAP was a nullity. Therefore, the district court did not have jurisdiction over the appeal and should have dismissed it. Woodman v. Concept Constr., LLC (In re Woodman), 698 F.3d 1263 (10th Cir. 2012).

11.3.rrr An order granting stay relief, in whatever guise and whether issued by the bankruptcy court or the district court, is appealable. The debtor contracted with an investor to develop wind power projects. The contract required the investor, upon commercial operation, to pay 75% of the projects' purchase price to the debtor and 25% to an advisor. The debtor transferred the development contract to an affiliate without consideration. It later filed bankruptcy. The debtor's bankruptcy trustee sued the affiliate and the advisor to avoid as a fraudulent transfer and recover the transfer of the contract and therefore the right to the purchase price. After commercial operation, the affiliate and the advisor sued the investor in state court for the purchase price. The state court issued judgment against the investor but, based on the trustee's notice of bankruptcy, ordered the payment to be deposited with the bankruptcy court. The state court then transferred the issue of whether the judgment was part of the bankruptcy estate to the bankruptcy court. The affiliate and the advisor successfully removed the action to the district court, where the trustee's fraudulent transfer action was pending. The district court consolidated the two actions. Over the trustee's opposition that the payment was property of the estate to which the automatic stay applied, the affiliate and the advisor obtained an order from the district court requiring distribution to them of the investor's payment. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1291(a), a court of appeals has jurisdiction only over a district court's final order. The grant or denial of automatic stay relief is generally an appealable final order, to promote quick resolution of stay relief matters. By ruling that the payment was not property of the estate, the district court effectively granted stay relief. 28 U.S.C. § 158(d) does not limit the courts of appeals to review of district court orders on appeal from bankruptcy court stay orders. Section 1291(a) applies to review of district court orders when the reference has been withdrawn. Nor does the pendency of the trustee's fraudulent transfer action in the consolidated case prevent review. A bankruptcy case has multiple discrete units of litigation, so finality concepts are applied more flexibly in bankruptcy cases. Stay orders are such discrete units and are appealable as final orders whether issued in the first instance by the district court or the bankruptcy court. Therefore, the court of appeals has jurisdiction over the appeal. Rajala v. Gardner, 709 F.3d 1031 (10th Cir. 2013).

11.3.sss Payment of judgment to plaintiff does not moot defendant's appeal. The debtor contracted with an investor to develop wind power projects. The contract required the investor, upon commercial operation to pay 75% of the projects' purchase price to the debtor and 25% to an advisor. The debtor transferred the development contract to an affiliate without consideration. It later filed bankruptcy. The debtor's bankruptcy trustee sued the affiliate and the advisor to avoid and recover the transfer of the contract and therefore the right to the purchase price as a fraudulent transfer. After commercial operation, the affiliate and the advisor sued the investor in state court for the purchase price. The state court issued judgment against the investor but, based on the trustee's notice of bankruptcy, ordered the payment to be deposited with the bankruptcy court. The state court then transferred the issue of whether the judgment was part of the bankruptcy estate to the bankruptcy court. The affiliate and the advisor successfully removed the action to the district court, where the trustee's fraudulent transfer action was pending. The district court consolidated the two actions. Over the trustee's opposition that the payment was property of the estate to which the automatic stay applied, the affiliate and the advisor obtained an order from the district court requiring distribution to them of the investor's payment. An appeal is moot if the appellate court cannot grant effective relief. The payment had been distributed to the affiliate and the advisor, and it was even possible that they had dissipated the funds. Still, the court of appeals could order the repayment of the funds, so the appeal was not moot. Rajala v. Gardner, 709 F.3d 1031 (10th Cir. 2013).

11.3.ttt Appeal from cramdown interest rate ruling is not moot. The hotel debtor confirmed a new value plan over the secured lender's objection to the interest rate on the notes issued under the plan. The debtor's plan forecasts showed substantial operating income after final payment to unsecured creditors. The secured lender appealed but did not obtain a confirmation order stay pending the appeal. The debtor consummated the plan, paying out about $8 million to other creditors. An appeal from a confirmation order is equitably moot if the appellate court cannot order effective relief, because ordering relief would adversely affect the rights of third parties who are not before the court or the success of the plan. However, if the court can order even partial relief, the appeal is not moot. Here, the debtor's projections show that it could pay a higher interest rate without affecting other creditors or the plan's success. A reversal might affect the new equity investors, but they are before the appellate court. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Wells Fargo Bank N.A. v. Texas Grand Prairie Hotel Realty, L.L.C. (In re Texas Grand Prairie Hotel Realty, L.L.C.), 710 F.3d 324 (5th Cir. 2013).

11.3.uuu Debtor loses standing to appeal on behalf of the estate upon conversion to chapter

7. The debtor in possession moved to surcharge the secured creditors' collateral for the costs of sale, which did not produce sufficient proceeds to pay secured claims in full. The bankruptcy court denied the motion and converted the case to a chapter 7 case. Only an appellant with standing may appeal. Upon conversion, the chapter 7 trustee steps into the debtor in possession's shoes as representative of the estate. Accordingly, the former debtor in possession no longer may appeal on behalf of the estate. Alternatively, a debtor may appeal if it is a "person aggrieved", which is one whose pecuniary interests are adversely affected by the appealed order. Because a surcharge would not produce enough estate assets to pay unsecured claims and provide a recovery to the debtor, the debtor was not a person aggrieved by the order denying surcharge. Formatech, Inc. v. Sovereign Bank (In re Formatech, Inc.), 483 B.R. 363 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

11.3.vvv Chapter 7 debtor does not have standing to appeal remand order.

The debtor sued contractors before bankruptcy for damages to its business. After bankruptcy, the debtor removed the action to the bankruptcy court. The bankruptcy court remanded the action to the state court. The debtor appealed. The chapter 7 trustee did not join the appeal. Only a person aggrieved has standing to appeal a bankruptcy court order. A person is aggrieved only if the person is directly and adversely affected pecuniarily by the bankruptcy court's order. Ordinarily, only a trustee has standing to protect the estate's interests. However, a debtor may have standing if a successful appeal could result in a surplus estate. Here, successful prosecution of the action might result in a surplus, but a successful appeal would result only in the action remaining in the bankruptcy court. Therefore, the remand order did not directly and adversely affect the debtor pecuniarily, so the debtor does not have standing to appeal. Minerals Continental Inc. v. LaCampana, Inc. (In re Minerals Continental Inc.), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47415 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 2, 2013).

11.3.www Appeal from asbestos plan confirmation order is not equitably moot.

The debtor proposed a plan that provided for transfer to an asbestos trust of $600 million by settling liability insurers and of $500,000 in cash, a promissory note for $1.25 million and a claim against another asbestos trust by the reorganized debtor and for the debtor's assignment to the trust of liability insurance policies issued by non-settling insurers, despite anti-assignment provisions in the policies. The bankruptcy court confirmed the plan. The insurers appealed. They sought but were denied a stay pending appeal by the court of appeals and by the Circuit Justice. At the time the court of appeals heard the appeal, the settling insurers had transferred only $135 million to the trust, and the trust had made some distributions to claimants. To determine whether an appeal is equitably moot, a court must consider whether the appellant sought or obtained a stay, whether substantial consummation has occurred, the effect a remedy may have on third parties and whether the bankruptcy court can fashion effective and equitable relief without defeating the plan. Declaring an appeal equitably moot where appellants seek but do not obtain a stay would inequitably elevate expedience over justice. If appellants sit on their hands, it would not be inequitable to dismiss the appeal. Here, appellants sought but did not obtain a stay, so the court considers the other factors. Substantial consummation requires, among other things, transfer of all or substantially all of the property proposed to be transferred by the plan. Here, only $135 million of the committed $600 million of property had been transferred. An appellate remedy may affect third parties if the effect is not inequitable. Here, the plan permits amendments to the asbestos trust with the consent of the future claims representative, so amendments are not per se inequitable, though the bankruptcy court must take care on remand to ensure that the effects are not inequitable. Finally, equity vests broad discretion in the bankruptcy court to devise an equitable remedy that does not fully upset plan confirmation. The availability of equitable relief, though incomplete, renders the appeal not moot. Here, there are alternatives that the bankruptcy court could order, if the confirmation was improper, that would not upset the plan. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Motor Vehicle Cas. Co. v. Thorpe Insulation Co. (In re Thorpe Insulation Co.), 677 F.3d 869 (9th Cir. 2012).

- 11.3.xxx Third Circuit limits equitable mootness doctrine on appeal after plan confirmation. The court disallowed an administrative expense claim. While the court's order was on appeal, the debtor consummated its chapter 11 plan. The plan required a reserve for disputed administrative claims. Because of the appeal, the debtor treated the claim as disputed. The equitable mootness doctrine requires dismissal of an appeal when granting relief would be inequitable because of changed circumstances, for example, if a successful appeal would be fatal to the plan or injure third parties. In evaluating equitable mootness, a court should consider whether the plan has been substantially consummated, a stay has been obtained, and the requested relief would affect parties who are not before the court or the plan's success and the public policy of affording finality to bankruptcy judgments. Taken together, the factors limit the doctrine's scope and permit a court to apply equitable mootness only if it would "unscramble complex bankruptcy reorganizations when the appealing party should have acted before the plan became extremely difficult to retract." Substantial consummation alone, coupled with the absence of a stay, does not require the doctrine's application where reversal on appeal will not upset the plan. Here, a reversal would not unscramble the plan or upset third parties' rights. Therefore, the appeal is not equitably moot. In re Phila. Newspapers, LLC, 690 F.3d 161 (3d Cir. 2012).
- 11.3.yyy Court dismisses unstayed confirmation order appeal as equitably moot. The debtor proposed a prepackaged plan that required the full cooperation of its principal parent shareholder to preserve net operating loss carryovers and prevent a default in its senior credit facility. In exchange, the plan gave the shareholder substantial consideration and a release, even though the other parent shareholders received nothing under the plan. A parent bondholder and a parent shareholder objected to confirmation and appealed from the confirmation order after plan consummation. They sought but were denied a stay of plan consummation pending appeal. The equitable mootness doctrine permits an appellate court to dismiss an appeal, even though effective relief is conceivable, when implementation would be inequitable. It requires the court to balance finality against the appellant's review rights. An appeal is presumed equitably moot when the plan has been substantially consummated. The appellant may overcome the presumption by showing that the court can still order some relief, the relief will not affect the debtor's emergence from chapter 11 or unravel the plan, the parties who would be affected have notice of and an opportunity to participate in the appeal, and the appellant diligently sought a stay. The court of appeals reviews the district court's mootness decision for abuse of discretion. Here, the appellants diligently sought a stay, some relief could be possible, such as requiring the shareholder to disgorge the consideration or voiding the release, and the shareholder was a party to the appeal. However, the shareholder consideration was integral to the plan, and changing it on appeal could require unwinding the plan. Therefore, the appeal was equitably moot and must be dismissed. R² Invs. v. Charter Commc'ns, Inc. (In re Charter Commc'ns, Inc.), 691 F.3d 476 (2d Cir. 2012).
- 11.3.zzz An administrative claimant does not have standing to appeal denial of derivative standing to another. After the case converted from chapter 11 to chapter 7, the debtor's chapter 11 lawyer asserted a claim for administrative expenses and demanded that the chapter 7 trustee pursue an avoiding power claim against a judicial lien creditor. When the trustee refused, the lawyer commenced an adversary proceeding against the creditor and sought derivative standing. The former chapter 11 examiner moved to substitute in as plaintiff, but the court denied the motion. The lawyer appealed. Only a "person aggrieved", that is, someone whose property is diminished, burdens increased or rights impaired by the underlying order, has standing to appeal. The effect must be direct, not too remote or contingent. Here, the denial of the former examiner's derivative standing would have an effect on the lawyer only if the examiner prevailed in the avoiding power action and then only if the lawyer's administrative claim were allowed. The effect on him was too remote, so the lawyer did not have standing to appeal. Robert F. Craig, P.C. v. Greenlight Cap. Qualified, L.P. (In re Prosser), 469 B.R. 228 (D.V.I. 2012).

- 11.3.aaaa 28 U.S.C. § 1291 finality rules apply to an order of a district court who has withdrawn the reference of a bankruptcy case. The debtor was a defendant before the district court in Nevada. After an adverse ruling, it filed a chapter 11 case in New York. The New York court transferred the case to the District of Nevada, and the district judge withdrew the reference of the case. The district judge converted the case to chapter 7 and issued monetary sanctions against the debtor and its attorneys for a frivolous filing and for attempting to evade the court's jurisdiction. The court of appeals has jurisdiction over appeals from final orders of a district court under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and, in bankruptcy cases and proceedings, under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d) when the district court sits as an appellate court in bankruptcy. The finality standards differ under the two sections, because of the need for a more flexible finality standard in bankruptcy. However, the flexibility applies only in appeals under section 158(d); section 1291 does not vary depending on the kind of case from which the appeal arises. Therefore, the strict finality rules of section 1291 apply when a district court has withdrawn the reference and is sitting as a court of original jurisdiction. Under strict finality rules, a sanction order is not a final order and is not appealable until the end of the case. Therefore, the court of appeals does not have jurisdiction to hear the appeal. A concurrence argues vigorously that the Ninth Circuit should reconsider its precedent requiring this result. Klestadt & Winters, LLP v. Cangelosi, 672 F.3d 809 (9th Cir. 2012).
- 11.3.bbbb Appeal from denial of stay relief motion is not moot because the issue is capable of repetition but evading review. The bankruptcy court determined that the debtor was not a single asset real estate debtor and denied the secured creditor stay relief. The secured creditor appealed. While the appeal was pending and briefing had been completed, the bankruptcy court confirmed a plan, which was consummated. The secured creditor retained its lien and claim under the plan. Confirmation terminated the automatic stay, making unavailable the relief the secured creditor had sought. However, the dispute here is capable of repetition if the reorganized debtor files another chapter 11 case, and the time required to resolve an appeal may prevent review in this or future cases. Abandoning the case now would be wasteful of judicial resources. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Meruelo Maddux Props.-760 S. Hill St. v. Bank of Am. N.A. (In re Meruelo Maddux Props., Inc.), 667 F.3d 1072 (9th Cir. 2012).
- 11.3.cccc Appeal from orders approving a settlement and denying derivative standing is not moot. The lenders demanded that the trustee pursue a fraudulent transfer claim. The trustee investigated and settled with the defendants for a cash payment. The lenders objected to approval of the settlement and sought derivative standing to pursue the claims. The court approved the settlement and denied derivative standing. The settling parties paid the trustee, who held the cash. The lenders appealed but did not obtain a stay. An appeal is moot if the appellate court cannot grant effective relief. If the settlement can be unwound, then the appeal is not moot. Here, the cash remained with the Trustee, who could return it if the appellate court reversed the settlement approval order. Unwinding the settlement would not be difficult or complex and would not defeat any party's reliance on finality. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. In re VOIP, Inc., 461 B.R. 899 (S.D. Fla. 2011).
- 11.3.dddd Bankruptcy court may not strike issue from statement of issues of appeal. After the bankruptcy court's decision, the defendant appealed. In compliance with the Bankruptcy Rules, the appellant filed a statement of issues on appeal, listing an issue that the appellant had not raised below. The bankruptcy court issued an order striking that issue from the statement of issues. If the bankruptcy court could strike an issue from the statement of issues on appeal, it could effectively insulate its decisions from appellate review. Accordingly, the district court vacates the bankruptcy court's order striking the issue. Fox v. Picard (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 848 F. Supp. 2d 469 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

11.3.eeee Court of appeals does not have jurisdiction over direct appeal from core proceeding that was beyond bankruptcy judge’s constitutional authority. A Wisconsin health care provider filed proofs of claim in numerous chapter 13 cases. The proofs of claim disclosed the debtors’ medical information. A Wisconsin statute makes patient information confidential and gives patients a claim for damages for willful violation of the statute. Three debtors brought a class action in the bankruptcy court against the providers for damages but soon filed a motion for the bankruptcy judge to abstain in favor of a state court proceeding. Other debtors brought a state court class action, which the provider removed to the bankruptcy court. The provider then moved to withdraw the reference. The bankruptcy judge first heard the abstention motion and determined that the proceedings were core because the claims could arise only in a bankruptcy case and fell under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(C) (counterclaims against a person filing a proof of claim). Based on the core determination, the district court denied the withdrawal motion. The bankruptcy judge granted summary judgment for the provider on the ground that the statute permitted recovery only if the debtors showed actual damages from the violations, which they did not. The parties stipulated to a direct appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(2). A court of appeals has jurisdiction to hear a direct appeal from a final judgment, order or decree or, with leave of court, from an interlocutory order or decree. The claims arise in the bankruptcy cases because they are predicated on the provider’s participation in the cases. However, under Stern v. Marshall, 131 S. Ct. 2594 (2011), the bankruptcy judge may not determine even a core proceeding if it involves adjudication of private rights between private parties that were not historically determined by the executive or legislative branches and did not flow from a federal statutory scheme or address a particularized area of the law where Congress devised a specialized system to resolve facts expeditiously. The claims are ordinary state law claims. Though they arise in bankruptcy cases, the bankruptcy judges do not have constitutional authority to determine them. Therefore, the bankruptcy judge did not have authority to issue final judgments on the claims. As a result, the court of appeals does not have jurisdiction to hear appeals from the orders as final judgments. Moreover, the bankruptcy judge’s order could not function as proposed findings and conclusions under section 157(c), because the proceeding was core, and section 157(c) applies only to noncore proceedings. Finally, the parties did not adequately consent to the bankruptcy judge’s determination of the proceedings, despite the debtors’ initiation of one of the actions in the bankruptcy court and the provider’s removal of the state court case to the bankruptcy case, because the debtors sought abstention and the provider sought withdrawal. Therefore, the court does not determine whether the bankruptcy court could have acted on consent. Ortiz v. Aurora Health Care, Inc. (In re Ortiz), 665 F.3d 906 (7th Cir. 2011).

11.3.ffff Rule 8002(a) time limit for filing a notice of appeal is jurisdictional. Section 158(a) of title 28 grants the district courts jurisdiction to hear appeals from bankruptcy courts’ final judgments. Section 158(c)(2) requires such appeals to be taken “in the time provided by Rule 8002”. Bankruptcy Rule 8002(a) requires that a notice of appeal from a bankruptcy court judgment be filed within 14 days after entry of the judgment. A time period specified in a Rule is ordinarily non-jurisdictional, as it was in Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443 (2004), where the Supreme Court held that a Bankruptcy Rule fixing a deadline for objecting to a discharge is a non-jurisdictional claims processing rule. But where the statute requires the appeal to be filed within a time period specified in the statute or incorporated by reference from a rule, compliance with the time period is a condition to the appellate court’s jurisdiction. In this case, the debtor filed a notice of appeal from the bankruptcy court’s order dismissing his chapter 11 case after the time specified in Bankruptcy Rule 8002(a). The debtor failed to designate items to be included in the record or file a statement of issues, as required by Bankruptcy Rule 8006. The district court dismissed the appeal for failure to prosecute. The debtor timely appealed to the court of appeals. The court of appeals dismissed the appeal with instructions to the district court to dismiss the appeal there for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. In re Caterbone, 640 F.3d 108 (3d Cir. 2011).

- 11.3.gggg BAP lacks jurisdiction to hear appeal from order issued before venue transfer by a court in a different circuit. Three creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor in Delaware. The debtor moved to dismiss and moved to transfer venue to Colorado. The court denied the motion to dismiss but did not issue an order for relief. Following a discovery dispute hearing, the Delaware bankruptcy court issued an order transferring venue, noting incorrectly that an order for relief had been entered. After the case was transferred to Colorado, the Delaware bankruptcy court, on the creditors' motion, corrected the transfer order to include an order for relief. The debtor appealed from the Delaware court's post-transfer order for relief in both Delaware and Colorado. The Delaware district court granted the debtor's motion to transfer the appeal to Colorado. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Tenth Circuit heard the Colorado appeal, because the parties did not object or request that the district court hear it. Section 158(a) of title 28 permits an appeal to "be taken only to the district court for the judicial district in which the bankruptcy judge is serving". Based on that provision, the BAP determined that it did not have jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the order for relief and dismissed. The debtor appealed to the court of appeals. The court of appeals has jurisdiction only over a final order of the BAP. The court of appeals has jurisdiction over a dismissal that has the same effect as an affirmance only if the underlying order is a final order. An order for relief is a discrete order in a bankruptcy case that conclusively determines the debtor's status in bankruptcy, is res judicata and may seriously affect the parties' rights and obligations if not reviewed until the end of the bankruptcy case. Therefore, it is a final order, which the court of appeals may review. Although section 158(a) of title 28 does not address appellate jurisdiction over an order issued before venue transfer, analogous case law under section 1294(a) does. Both section 158(a) and section 1294(a) speak in territorial terms and require an appeal to be taken in the same district or circuit in which the order was issued. Therefore, the Tenth Circuit BAP did not have jurisdiction over the Delaware bankruptcy court's order for relief and properly dismissed the appeal. Healthtrio, Inc. v. Centennial River Corp. (In re Healthtrio, Inc.), 653 F.3d 1154 (10th Cir. 2011).
- 11.3.hhhh Appeal of an order authorizing the assignment of a contract is not moot if some remedy is possible. The trustee moved for an extension of time to assume a contract. While an appeal from the court's extension order was pending, the trustee assumed and sold the contract with bankruptcy court approval. An appeal is moot if the appellate court cannot grant effective relief. Section 363(m) prohibits an appellate order from affecting the validity of a sale and renders most appeals from sale orders moot. However, where the appellee, who carries the burden of showing mootness, does not show that the appellant cannot obtain effective relief that does not affect the validity of the sale, such as a claim for damages against the estate, the court will not dismiss the appeal as moot. Here, the trustee failed to make such a showing, so the court denied the motion to dismiss the appeal. C.O.P. Coal Devel. Co. v. C.W. Mining Co. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 641 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2011).
- 11.3.iiii Appeal of an order determining ownership of property does not divest the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction to confirm a plan that disposes of the property. The bankruptcy court determined that certain property belonged to the estate rather than to an adverse claimant. The claimant appealed. While the appeal was pending, the debtor proposed a plan that disposed of the property. An appeal divests the trial court of jurisdiction to issue any further orders on the subject of the dispute. However, Rule 8005 provides, "the bankruptcy judge may suspend or order the continuation of other proceedings in the case during the pendency of an appeal". The court is prohibited only from altering the appealed order. Otherwise, an appeal would have the effect of automatically staying the remainder of the bankruptcy case pending the appeal. Plan confirmation here would have the effect of enforcing the appealed order, not modifying it, even though confirmation and consummation might moot the appeal. Therefore, the court may consider plan confirmation. In re Wash. Mut., Inc., 461 B.R. 200 (Bankr. D. Del. Sept. 13, 2011).

- 11.3.jjjj Interlocutory order denying exclusivity termination becomes appealable upon plan confirmation. The small business debtor filed a plan on the last day of the debtor's exclusive period. Three days later, a creditor filed a motion to terminate exclusivity to allow the creditor to file a plan, which the bankruptcy court denied. The creditor filed a notice of appeal. A few days later, the court confirmed the debtor's cram down plan over the creditor's objection. The creditor appealed from the plan confirmation order. The confirmation order is similar to a final judgment and therefore renders previously interlocutory orders final for purposes of appeal. Therefore, the district court has jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the exclusivity order. H.G. Roebuck & Son, Inc. v. Alter Comm'ns, Inc., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59781 (D. Md. June 3, 2011).
- 11.3.kkkk Out of the money creditor has standing to appeal a confirmation order. The debtor proposed a plan that provided a partial distribution to senior creditors, limited distribution to junior creditors and a distribution to equity holders. The junior creditor class did not accept the plan. The debtor's overall value was insufficient to pay the senior creditors in full, so neither the junior creditors nor the equity holders would have received anything if the senior creditors had not permitted the distribution. The court confirmed the plan on the theory that the senior creditors could give a portion of their recovery to the equity holders without regard to the absolute priority rule. A junior creditor whose claim was disputed appealed. The Bankruptcy Code does not specify a standing test for an appeal, but the courts have developed the "person aggrieved" standard, under which a party may appeal if its interest is "directly and adversely affected pecuniarily by the challenged order". Creditors generally have such an interest and do not lose it in appealing a confirmation order solely because the debtor's value is insufficient to pay more senior claims in full. Standing does not turn on valuation, or else appellate courts would have to determine valuation as a standing question. Nor does standing depend on whether the creditor's claim is disputed, because standing does not depend on the merits, especially of an issue that is not before the court on appeal. Therefore, the junior creditor has standing to appeal. DISH Network Corp. v. DBSD N. Am., Inc. (In re DBSD N. Am., Inc.), 634 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2011).
- 11.3.llll Clearly erroneous standard of review is relaxed where the trial court adopts prevailing party's findings. After a two-week, heavily contested trial, in which 20 witness testified, the bankruptcy court adopted the findings and conclusions proposed by the winning litigant with relatively minimal changes. Bankruptcy Rule 7052 requires the court to make findings of fact and conclusions of law. The ordinary standard of review on appeal for findings of fact is a clearly erroneous standard. However, where the trial court adopts the prevailing party's findings, the standard is relaxed. 3V Cap. Master Fund Ltd. v. Official Comm. Of Unsecured Creditors (In re TOUSA, Inc.), 444 B.R. 613 (S.D. Fla. 2011).
- 11.3.mmmm Request for limited remedy may prevent mootness of appeal from confirmation order. The individual debtor's plan did not pay creditors in full but allowed him to retain his property. A creditor in a non-accepting class objected to confirmation. The creditor appealed, arguing the plan violated the absolute priority rule. The creditor did not obtain a stay pending appeal. In the appeal, the creditor did not seek recovery of any payments that had been made to senior secured creditors. An appeal from a confirmation order may become moot if the plan has been substantially consummated. In determining mootness, the court must strike a "balance between the equitable considerations of finality and good faith reliance on a judgment and the competing interests that underlie the right of a party to seek review". Here, where the creditor did not seek to upset payments that the debtor had already made under the plan, a reversal would not necessarily lead to prejudice to absent third parties. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. A/a. Dep't of Eco. & Community Affairs v. Lett (In re Lett), 632 F.3d 1216 (11th Cir. 2011).
- 11.3.nnnn Creditor may raise absolute priority challenge for the first time on appeal. The individual debtor's plan did not pay creditors in full but allowed him to retain his property. A creditor in a non-accepting class objected to confirmation but did not raise the violation of the absolute priority rule as a ground of objection. The court asked the debtor about compliance with the absolute priority rule, the debtor offered evidence of compliance and the court confirmed the plan. The creditor appealed and raised an absolute priority rule objection. A court may confirm a plan that has not been accepted by all impaired classes if the plan complies with section 1129(b), which requires that the plan be fair and equitable to the non-accepting class. The bankruptcy court must make specific findings of compliance and ensure that its requirements are met before it may confirm the plan. Therefore, an appellant may raise the issue for the first time on appeal. A concurrence suggests that an appellant may do so only in the appeal to the district court, not to the court of appeals. Ala. Dep't of Eco. & Community Affairs v. Lett (In re Lett), 632 F.3d 1216 (11th Cir. 2011).

11.3.oooo Only district court may certify direct appeal once appeal has been docketed there.

The appellant appealed, under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), an order denying a motion to dismiss the case, claiming that the order was a final order, and requested from the district court certification of a direct appeal under section 158(d)(2) to the court of appeals. The district court determined that the order was an interlocutory order and therefore determined that the motion for certification of a direct appeal was moot, because section 158(d)(2) permits direct appeal only of final orders. The appellant argued that once the district court determined that the order below was interlocutory, the appeal should not be considered docketed at the district court and asked that the certification be transferred to the bankruptcy court for consideration. Section 158(d)(2) requires certification by the court "involved", which means the court where the action is pending. Rule 8007(b) requires the docketing of the appeal with the district court upon completion and transmittal of the record on appeal, which had already occurred in this case. Upon docketing of the appeal with the district court, the action is pending there. Therefore, the certification motion was properly before the district court and would not be transferred. The denial of leave to appeal did not change the result. Ambac Assurance Corp v. Las Vegas Monorail Co. (In re Las Vegas Monorail Co.), 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36943 (D. Nev. Mar. 25, 2011).

11.3.pppp Appeal from an adequate protection order is not equitably moot where some relief is possible.

In separate orders, the court confirmed a chapter 11 plan and determined that the secured creditor had not suffered diminution in its collateral value and therefore was not entitled to a section 507(b) administrative expense claim. The creditor appealed both orders. The court of appeals permitted a direct appeal from the confirmation order and affirmed. An appeal, especially of a confirmation order, may be equitably moot where the relief requested would affect the rights of parties not before the court or the success of the plan. An appeal is not equitably moot simply because it may be impossible to grant the appellants all the relief they seek, as long as some relief is possible. That the appellee (here, the reorganized debtor) may be unable to pay the amount the appellate court awards also does not render the appeal moot. In this case, the consequences of an adverse appellate result were foreseeable to the reorganized debtor, who is a party that is before the court. Thus, the adequate protection order appeal is not moot. Bank of New York Trust Co. NA v. Pac. Lumber Co (In re Scotia Pac. Co., LLC), 624 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2010).

11.3.qqqq Appeal from cash collateral order is not moot.

When the debtor, a resort developer, filed bankruptcy, it held cash that was subject to its lenders' lien and an uncompleted project that was subject to the lenders' and mechanics liens. The lenders and the mechanics lienors disputed the priority of their liens on the project. The court authorized the debtor in possession to use the cash collateral to stabilize and maintain the project and to pay the chapter 11 expenses of administration, including the cost of an examiner. The authorizing order deemed that the debtor in possession repaid the cash to the lenders and reborrowed it from them under section 364(d), granted the lenders a priming lien on the project, ahead of the mechanics liens, and required that any third party debtor in possession financing proceeds be used first to repay the lenders the amount of cash collateral that the debtor in possession used. Later, the debtor in possession obtained such third party financing from a good faith lender and used the proceeds to pay the lenders as the original cash collateral order required and for other purposes. The mechanics lienors appealed the cash collateral order and the financing order, contending that the court did not provide adequate protection of their interests. They sought but did not obtain a stay pending appeal. An appeal is constitutionally moot if the court is not able to grant any effective relief, but not if the court can grant some relief, even though the relief would not restore the parties to their prior positions. Here, the court could not undo the financing, because section 364(e) protects a good faith lender. But the court could order the prepetition lenders to return the financing proceeds to the estate to protect the mechanics lienors' claim that the cash collateral order did not provide adequate protection. Therefore, the appeal is not constitutionally moot. An appeal is equitably moot if the court cannot grant effective relief without inequitably affecting the rights of third parties. Equitable mootness is a pragmatic doctrine that recognizes that in time, effective relief may become impractical, imprudent or inequitable. Although equitable mootness is most commonly applied to an appeal from a plan confirmation order, it also may apply to other orders during a bankruptcy case. The absence of a stay pending appeal does not require a finding of equitable mootness but is only one factor in the equitable analysis. Here, granting relief to the mechanics lienors would not upset a reorganization nor affect any third parties who were not before the court or who were not aware of the challenges to the order that benefited them. The appeal therefore is not equitably moot. Although section 364(e) protects the debtor in possession lender from the effects of reversal or modification on appeal of the financing order, it does not protect those who received the proceeds of the financing. Therefore, the appeal as to the lenders is not statutorily moot. Desert Fire Protection v. Fontainebleau Las Vegas Holdings, LLC (In re Fontainebleau Las Vegas Holdings, LLC), 434 B.R. 716 (S.D. Fla. 2010).

11.3.rrrr Appeal from sale order challenging purchaser's good faith does not require stay pending appeal. A party appealed from an order approving a sale, challenging the bankruptcy court's finding that the purchaser was a good faith purchaser. The appellant did not seek or obtain a stay pending appeal. The purchaser acquired the property and moved to dismiss the appeal as moot. Section 363(m) provides that a reversal or modification on appeal of a sale authorization order does not affect the validity of a sale to a good faith purchaser, so that an appeal of an unstayed order is typically moot, because the appellate court cannot grant effective relief. However, where the appeal challenges the bankruptcy court's determination that the purchaser was in good faith, a reversal could result in an order affecting the validity of the sale. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Petroleum & Franchise Funding LLC v. Bulk Petroleum Corp., 435 B.R. 589 (E.D. Wis. 2010).

11.3.ssss Section 363(m) mootness applies to an order authorizing sale of a co-owner's interest under section 363(h). The debtor owned seven properties as a tenant in common with 30 co-owners. The trustee sought to sell the properties, including the interests of the co-owners, in a single sale. Section 363(h) permits a trustee to "sell both the estate's interest, under subsection (b) or (c) of this section, and the interest of any co-owner in property in which the debtor had, at the time of the commencement of the case, an undivided interest as a tenant in common" if certain conditions are met. The sale that the trustee proposed met the necessary conditions, and the court approved the sale under both subsections (b) and (h) and found that the purchaser was a good faith purchaser. Section 363(m) provides that "the reversal or modification on appeal of an authorization under subsection (b) or (c) of this section of a sale or lease of property does not affect the validity of the sale" to a good faith purchaser unless the sale was stayed pending appeal. Section 363(m) therefore moots any appeal of the sale of the estate's interest, which was authorized under subsection (b). However, subsection (b) does not directly authorize the sale of the co-owners' interests, and subsection (m) does not directly address an appeal from such an authorization under subsection (h). Still, the sale authorization was under a single order that included authorization under subsection (b), and it would create an anomalous result to permit co-owners to appeal such a sale order without a stay, especially when a holder of another kind of interest, such as a lien, may not appeal an unstayed order that authorizes a sale free and clear under subsections (b) and (f). Therefore, the appeal is moot, and the court dismisses the appeal. A concurrence argues that the statutory language does not directly support the result but policy reasons do. Official Comm. Of Unsecured Creditors v. Anderson Sr. Living Property, LLC (In re Nashville Sr. Living, LLC), 620 F.3d 584 (6th Cir. 2010).

11.3.tttt Section 363(m) prohibits review of any portion of a sale order. The debtor in possession conducted an auction of its assets, at which only the first lien holder and the second lien holder bid. Both bids contemplated distribution of the equity securities of the acquisition vehicle in satisfaction of the creditors' claims, and a key part of each bid was the requirement that the assets be sold free and clear of all liens and that the purchaser obtain control over the acquisition vehicle. The second lien holder's bid also included the purchase of equity securities in the acquisition vehicle for cash. The bankruptcy court approved the sale. The first lien holder appealed and sought a stay. Before the ruling on the stay motion, the first lien holders and the second lien holder stipulated to the closing of the sale and the escrowing of the securities to be distributed to the second lien holder. The district court ruled that there was no statutory basis to authorize the lien release without payment of the first lien holder in cash. The second lien holder appealed. Section 363(m) provides that the reversal or modification of an order approving a sale to a good faith purchaser does not affect the validity of the sale. This section deprives the appellate court or jurisdiction to review the entire sale order, not just the sale transaction. The lien release and claim satisfaction provisions of the sale order were part of the sale order and integral to the sale. Therefore, review comes within section 363(m)'s prohibition. The stay stipulation does not affect the result. It addressed only the distribution of consideration. The appellate court may review the distribution of the securities, but not the lien release or claim satisfaction. Contrarian Funds LLC v. Aretex LLC (In re Westpoint Stevens, Inc.), 600 F.3d 231 (2d Cir. 2010).

11.3.uuuu Without adequate evidentiary record on good faith and availability of relief, appeal is not moot. The debtor owned a 49% interest in a business and cross-claims against the 51% owner, which the debtor had been prosecuting in state court before bankruptcy. Over the debtor's objection, the bankruptcy court approved the trustee's sale of both assets to an affiliate of the 51% owner. Although the sale order recited that the purchase was made in good faith, the trustee had not presented any evidence of good faith at the sale hearing. Once the sale closed, the buyer sold the 49% interest to "a third party" six days later and obtained dismissal with prejudice of the cross-claims in the state court. The debtor appealed the sale order. Under section 363(m), a reversal or modification on appeal from an order authorizing a sale to a good faith purchaser may not affect the validity of the sale. In this case, despite the good faith recital in the sale order, the record contained no evidence of good faith, so section 363(m) does not apply. An appeal is equitably moot if the appellate court cannot grant effective relief. The appellee has the burden of showing that effective relief cannot be granted. Here, appellee did not show that the state court order dismissing the cross-claims could not be reinstated nor that the "third party" purchaser of the 49% interest was not an affiliate as to whom the court could grant effective relief. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Fitzgerald v. Ninn Worx Sr. Inc (In re Fitzgerald), 428 B.R. 872 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2010).

11.3.vvvv District court appellate decision does not bind bankruptcy court for another district. The bankruptcy court refused to follow the decision of a district court for another district. A bankruptcy court's decision may not be appealed to a district court for another district. Stare decisis does not require one district judge to follow the decision of another district judge in the circuit. If the bankruptcy court were bound by the decisions of each district court within a circuit, the bankruptcy court could be subject to conflicting precedents. Therefore, the decision of one district court should not have precedential effect on a bankruptcy court for another district. In dictum, the court states the same rule for the decisions of the district judges within the district where the bankruptcy court sits. State Comp. Ins. Fund v. Zamora (In re Silverman), 616 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2010).

11.3.wwww Appeal from order authorizing sale free and clear is moot. The bankruptcy court authorized a sale of assets free and clear of liens. The sale order referenced section 363(b). Section 363(m) prevents a reversal or modification of a sale “authorization under subsection (b) or (c)” from affecting the validity of the sale, thereby mooting any appeal from an unstayed order. The secured creditor objected and appealed, seeking reversal only of the portion of the order authorizing the sale free and clear, and relying on Clear Channel Outdoor, Inc. v. Knupfer (In re PW, LLC), 391 B.R. 25 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2008), to argue that section 363(m) did not apply, because a sale free and clear is authorized under subsection (f). However, subsection (f) provides, the “trustee may sell property under subsection (b) or (c) of this section free and clear ...”. Therefore, section 363(m) applies to any sale free and clear of liens or interests. A reversal or modification of a provision in the order would affect the sale’s validity if the absence of the provision would, in effect, unwind the sale. The free and clear provision here was integral to the sale, as the buyer would not have consummated the transaction without that provision. Therefore, the court dismisses the appeal as moot. Asset Based Resource Group, LLC v. U.S. Trustee (In re Polaroid Corp.), 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 14012 (8th Cir. July 9, 2010).

11.3.xxxx Appeal from order confirming liquidating plan is not moot. The debtor in possession liquidated its tangible assets during the case; the intangible assets remained to be liquidated or collected and distributed under the plan. The plan created a class of equity security holders and a class of claims for damages arising from violations of the securities laws with respect to the common stock but did not specify the relative treatment of the two classes, leaving that for the court to determine if there were more than sufficient assets to pay all unsecured claims in full. Members of the equity security holders class appealed the confirmation order. An appeal from a chapter 11 confirmation order may be equitably moot if a stay was not obtained, the plan has been substantially consummated and the relief requested would affect the rights of parties not before the court or the success of the plan. Although the appeal here seeks to reverse the confirmation order, the only relief sought is an appropriate determination of the relative rights of the two equity security-related classes. The court can fashion effective relief without upsetting the rights of parties not before the court or the success of the plan. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Schaefer v. Superior Offshore Int’l, Inc. (In re Superior Offshore Int’l, Inc.), 591 F.3d 350 (5th Cir. 2009).

11.3.yyyy Tenth Circuit adopts equitable mootness doctrine, with additional considerations. Two creditors proposed competing chapter 11 plans, one jointly with the chapter 11 trustee. Each creditor filed its plan to obtain ownership of the estate’s most valuable asset. Each plan provided for payment of all administrative expenses and claims in full. The court confirmed the joint plan, largely because it reflected an asset purchase agreement that the trustee and the creditor had entered into and the court had approved earlier in the case. The joint plan provided for pursuit of litigation against the other creditor over ownership of the asset. The other creditor appealed. The plan provided that it would not become effective while an appeal was pending, but the creditor and the trustee could waive that condition, which they did and then consummated the plan. A court must dismiss an appeal when it is constitutionally moot, that is, when the court cannot fashion any meaningful relief. However, if the court can fashion some relief, even if not all the relief the appellant seeks, the appeal is not constitutionally moot. A court may dismiss an appeal when it is equitably moot, that is, when equitable, prudential or pragmatic considerations counsel against granting some or all of the relief sought. Courts should weigh six factors in deciding whether to dismiss an appeal as equitably moot, though all factors will not apply in all cases, and the factors are not conclusive. (1) Whether the appellant sought or obtained a stay. Equity is less likely to protect one who fails to seek a stay through all possible means, but failure to obtain a stay does not preclude appellate relief. (2) Whether the plan has been substantially consummated. Substantial consummation may make appellate relief more difficult, especially if it affects the rights of absent innocent third parties. However, substantial consummation is not dispositive, and the plan proponents' rush to waive the effective date condition cuts against equitable relief for them as appellees. (3) Whether appellate remedies would affect third parties. (4) Public policy and finality. Creation of an unmanageable situation on remand to resolve the chapter 11 case counsels in favor of equitable mootness. (5) Impact on the likelihood of a new plan. A fair likelihood of a new plan after remand counsels against equitable mootness. (6) The merits. An appellate court should not review the merits on a mootness review, but a quick look at the merits may suggest that the appeal should be heard. Here, the first five factors were largely in balance, but the merits review suggested a serious conflict of interest issue that an appellate court should review and tipped the balance against dismissal for mootness. Search Market Direct, Inc. v. Jubber (In re Paige), 584 F.3d 1327 (10th Cir. 2009).

11.3.zzzz Appeal from assumption of an executory contract under a plan is not moot. The creditor sought an order that its executory contract was a non-assumable technology license. The bankruptcy court denied the motion. The creditor then sought to require the debtor in possession to assume or reject the contract. The court also denied that motion. The creditor appealed both denials. While the appeal was pending, the debtor confirmed and consummated its plan, which assumed the contract. The creditor appealed the confirmation order as well. Before the district court, the debtor stipulated that contract rejection would not affect the confirmed plan, but the district court rejected the stipulation. No other evidence in the record showed whether contract rejection would adversely affect the plan. An appeal from a confirmation order is equitably moot if the court cannot order effective relief, such as if a reversal would require unwinding plan consummation. Substantial consummation is not fatal to an appeal; the appeal is moot only when the relief sought would unravel the plan. Because the record did not contain evidence that reversal of the confirmation order on the issue of the plan's contract assumption would unravel the plan, the appeal was not equitably moot. Section 1127(b) does not permit plan modification after substantial consummation. However, modification necessarily resulting from an appeal of the confirmation order or an order earlier in the case is not a plan modification that section 1127(b) prohibits. Otherwise, section 1127(b) would bar all post-consummation appeals and render the equitable mootness doctrine superfluous. Alberta Energy P'ners v. Blast Energy Servs. Inc. (In re Blast Energy Servs. Inc.), 593 F.3d 418 (5th Cir. 2010).

11.3.aaaa Appeal from a consummated settlement and distribution in a chapter 7 case is not moot. A lender sued the debtor's officer, subject to the limits of the directors and officers insurance policy, for negligent misrepresentation in executing a sale-leaseback transaction that was not authorized. The debtor and its principal officer filed bankruptcy. The trustee removed the action to the bankruptcy court, along with other actions that could be satisfied in part by the insurance. The trustee settled with the insurance company, who paid a portion of policy limits in exchange for a dismissal with prejudice of all claims against the policy and sought court approval of the settlement and of an interim distribution of proceeds. The lenders opposed both. The bankruptcy court approved the settlement, on the basis that all policy proceeds were property of the estate, and authorized the distribution. The lenders appealed. An appeal is equitably moot if the appellate court cannot order effective relief. However, equitable mootness in bankruptcy is usually applied upon chapter 11 plan confirmation, where it often focuses on whether the requested appellate relief would affect the rights of parties not before the court. Here, the insurance company, the trustee and the other distributees of the funds were all before the court in connection with the settlement's approval. Therefore, the appeal is not equitably moot. The court notes little difference between this case, which involves the distribution of money, and an ordinary civil appeal, where the defendant's payment to the plaintiff/appellee does not moot the appeal, even if the plaintiff is, after a reversal, unable to repay the money. Tech. Lending P'ners v. San Patricio County Community Action Agency, 575 F.3d 553 (5th Cir. 2009).

11.3.bbbbb Appeal from settlement approval in a chapter 7 case is not moot. The chapter 7 trustee settled with a custodian over the custodian’s prebankruptcy fees. A creditor opposed the settlement and appealed. While the appeal was pending, the trustee distributed all funds in the estate, including the custodian’s fees, and closed the case. An appellate court must consider three factors in determining whether an appeal from a chapter 11 plan confirmation order is moot: whether the appellant obtained a stay, whether the plan has been substantially consummated and whether the requested relief would affect rights of parties not before the court or the success of the plan. It is unclear whether these standards also apply in a chapter 7 case. However, in this case, even if those standards apply, the court may grant effective relief. The only real third party is the estate, and reopening would not require the same disruption involved in setting aside plan confirmation. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Szwak v. Earwood (In re Bodenheimer, Jones, Szwak, & Winchell L.L.P.), 592 F.3d 664 (5th Cir. 2009).

11.3.ccccc Court substantially limits application of equitable mootness doctrine. One affiliated debtor was an operating business; the other was a single purpose entity that owned timberland that secured bonds. The debtors proposed a joint plan that provided for the transfer of each debtor’s assets to new companies created and owned by two plan sponsors. One plan sponsor was unrelated to the debtors. The other held a large unsecured claim against the operating debtor. The plan provided for the sponsors to fund cash sufficient to pay the secured bonds the value of the timberland and provide working capital and to convert the sponsor’s unsecured claim to equity. The plan classified the bonds into a secured claim class and an unsecured deficiency claim class, separate from other unsecured claims. Neither bond class accepted the plan. The bankruptcy court heard extensive valuation testimony and valued the timberland collateral at less than the amount owing on the bonds. The plan also provided a minor impairment to a bank working capital claim class, which accepted the plan, and exculpation of the plan sponsors, the new companies and the unsecured creditors’ committee and its members from liability related to proposing, implementing and administering the plan. The plan was consummated within 60 days after confirmation, with the debtors dissolved, assets transferred to the new companies, exit financing funded and creditors other than bondholders paid. Equitable mootness requires the court to “strik[e] the proper balance between the equitable considerations of finality and good faith reliance on a judgment and competing interests that underlie the right of a party to seek review of a bankruptcy order adversely affecting him.” The doctrine applies to specific claims, not to entire appeals, and should be applied with a scalpel, not an axe. A stay is not required where there would be no significant consequences to the reorganization from a reversal of particular issues. The secured claims’ treatment is subject to constitutional limitations, and the complexity of cramdown may demand appellate review. Reversal of the claims’ treatment would likely affect only the plan sponsors, for whom an appeal was foreseeable and who are parties to the appeal. Denying mootness may also encourage consensual plans. Therefore, the court hears the appeal from the confirmation order’s cramdown. It also hears the appeal from the exculpation provisions. Equity supports integrity and transparency in chapter 11 cases, and there is little equitable about protecting non-debtors from negligence liability arising out of a reorganization. In addition, exculpation is easily severable from other plan issues. Equitable mootness prevents review, however, of the classification scheme and of the “artificial” impairment plan provisions, because substantial consummation resulted in payment of the affected creditors, and there would be no remedy other than unwinding confirmation. Bank of N.Y. Trust Co., N.A. v. Official Unsecured Creditors’ Comm. (In re Pac. Lumber Co.), 584 F.3d 229 (5th Cir. 2009).

11.3.ddddd Court provides limited standards for certification of a direct appeal. The bankruptcy court denied a stay pending appeal of a $700 million secured claim cram down confirmation order and certified a direct appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d). The certification provision is intended to expedite appellate review and generate binding precedent. An order for secured debt cramdown in a case this size deserves certification. A certification is not necessarily facially inconsistent with denying a stay pending appeal but can be incongruous. In certifying an appeal, a bankruptcy court's denial of a stay pending appeal may be too simplistic a response. The court should consider other alternatives, such as a supersedeas bond or expediting the appeal. Nevertheless, in this case, the court accepts the certification and determines on an issue by issue basis whether the appeal is equitably moot. Bank of N.Y. Trust Co., N.A. v. Official Unsecured Creditors' Comm. (In re Pac. Lumber Co.), 584 F.3d 229 (5th Cir. 2009).

11.3.eeeee Person aggrieved standing requirement does not apply to second level appeal. The debtor transferred assets to an affiliate. A creditor brought a fraudulent transfer action against the affiliate and later filed an involuntary chapter 7 petition against the debtor. After the order for relief, the trustee determined not to pursue a fraudulent transfer action against the affiliate. The creditor sought derivative standing. The trustee and the affiliate, which asserted claims as a creditor, both opposed derivative standing, and the bankruptcy court denied the creditor's motion. The creditor appealed to the district court. The affiliate defended the appeal, but the trustee did not. The district court reversed. The affiliate appealed to the court of appeals, which granted leave for an interlocutory appeal. Ordinarily, a party may appeal an order only if it is a "person aggrieved", that is, only if the order has a direct and adverse pecuniary effect on the appellant. The rule prevents the myriad persons with claims or interests in a bankruptcy case from prolonging the proceedings in matters in which they do not have a direct interest. However, where a person aggrieved has appealed an order to the district court, the matter has already embarked on the appellate road, and there is no need to apply the prudential standing rule to prevent a person not aggrieved from appealing to the court of appeals. Therefore, the affiliate may pursue the appeal to the court of appeals. A vigorous dissent argues otherwise. Hyundai Translead, Inc. v. Jackson Truck & Trailer Repair, Inc. (In re Trailer Source, Inc.), 555 F.3d 231 (6th Cir. 2009).

11.3.fffff A defendant in an action brought under an order granting a committee standing to sue does not have standing to appeal the order. The administrative claimants' committee obtained a Standing Order authorizing it to bring actions against the debtors' directors and officers. It promptly sued the debtor's former CEO. He appealed the Standing Order. Only a "person aggrieved" has standing to appeal a bankruptcy court's order. A person is aggrieved if the order diminishes his property, increases his burdens or impairs his rights. Having to defend a lawsuit does not make a person aggrieved. Therefore, the court dismisses the appeal. The opinion relies in part on the dissent in Hyundai Translead, Inc. v. Jackson Truck & Trailer Repair, Inc. (In re Trailer Source, Inc.), 555 F.3d 231 (6th Cir. 2009). Moran v. LTV Steel Co., Inc. (In re LTV Steel Co., Inc.), 560 F.3d 229 (6th Cir. 2009).

11.3.ggggg A court must judge equitable mootness differently in an appeal of an order confirming a liquidating plan. The related debtors had numerous intercompany claims, and many creditors' claims could be asserted against more than one debtor. The plan compromised both of these issues, among others, by allowing multi-debtor claims at 130% of face amount against the parent debtor, disallowing the claims against the other debtors and providing for distribution of the aggregate assets of the debtors among all claims against them, pro rata, based on the allowed amounts of the claims. Each creditor class voted separately, and all but one accepted the plan. The court confirmed the plan and denied the nonaccepting class's members' motion a stay pending appeal. On the effective date, a liquidating trust was created, the estates' assets were distributed to the trust, all outstanding notes, securities, indentures and stock were cancelled and 127,000 parties received notice of confirmation and the effective date. Since the effective date, the trust expended small amounts in administration and settled and made distributions on certain claims. An appeal from a confirmation order should be dismissed as equitably moot if granting the relief appellant seeks would be inequitable. Considerations include whether the plan has been substantially consummated, a stay has been obtained, or relief would affect the rights of parties not before the court or the plan's success and the public policy of affording finality to bankruptcy judgments. The court may apply these factors differently under a liquidating plan, because unraveling a liquidating plan is likely to have less significant consequences than unraveling a reorganization. Here, reversing the plan would not likely result in great difficulty in unwinding the rather minimal transactions that occurred, there does not appear to have been substantial third-party reliance and the reversal would not affect the debtor's ability to liquidate under a revised plan. Therefore, the appeal is not moot. Schroeder v. New Century Liquidating Trust (In re New Century TS Holdings, Inc.), 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50708 (D. Del. June 16, 2009).

11.3.hhhhh Appeal is not moot where court may order relief against appellee's counsel. The plan established a reserve account for a secured creditor's disputed claim. The bankruptcy court disallowed the claim and, while an appeal from the disallowance order was pending, authorized the disbursement of the reserve account to pay the administrator's professional's fees. The secured creditor separately appealed the disbursement authorization. The court of appeals later reversed the claim disallowance. The administrator argued that the appeal from the disbursement authorization was moot, because the plan had been consummated and the funds disbursed. Equitable mootness protects non-adverse third parties who have relied on the plan and are not before the court by inquiring whether the court can grant relief without undermining the plan. The court must consider whether the appellant obtained a stay, whether the plan has been substantially consummated and whether the requested relief would affect either the rights of third parties not before the court or the success of the plan. Where effective relief can be granted, an appeal might not be moot even in the absence of a stay after plan consummation. Here, the administrator's counsel, who had received the reserve funds, is before the court, even though not as a party. Therefore, the court could order effective relief, and the appeal is not moot. Wooley v. Faulkner (In re SI Restructuring, Inc.), 542 F.3d 131 (5th Cir. 2008).

11.3.iiii Sixth Circuit applies the equitable mootness doctrine to dismiss an appeal from a consummated plan. The debtor consummated its plan by canceling old membership interests and issuing new ones in exchange for new membership fees, dissolving a subsidiary, closing a new loan facility, and making distributions on priority and general unsecured claims, among other things. Equitable mootness differs from constitutional mootness in that it is an equitable doctrine designed to protect parties' expectations and a debtor's ability to emerge from bankruptcy. An appellate court may dismiss an appeal from confirmation as equitably moot based on three factors: whether the appellant has obtained a stay, whether the plan has been substantially consummated, and whether the relief requested would affect the rights of parties not before the court. Here, the appellants did not seek a stay, and the plan had been substantially consummated. The appellants sought reversal of the confirmation order, not minor modifications or interpretations. Therefore, the relief sought on appeal would default the exit loan, jeopardize the debtor's ability to continue to make loans to 68,000 farmers who are members and customers, halt livestock transaction payments, and otherwise disrupt operations. It would also create uncertainty about all the plan consummation transactions. The appellants' argument that their plan would provide better creditor recoveries and sounder post-emergence operations goes to the merits of the appeal but is irrelevant to mootness. Therefore, the court dismisses the appeal as equitably moot. Curreys of Neb., Inc. v. United Producers, Inc. (In re United Producers, Inc.), 526 F.3d 942 (6th Cir. 2008).

11.3.jjjj Appeal from order authorizing sale free and clear is not moot. The trustee sold real property to the senior lienor under a credit bid free and clear of the junior lien. The sale involved transfer of possession, document recordation, assumption of contracts and cure of defaults. The junior lienor appealed the order approving the sale free and clear. Constitutional mootness requires impossibility of relief. Here, though relief may be difficult or inequitable, the trustee and both lienors are parties to the appeal, so relief is not impossible. Equitable mootness looks beyond impossibility to the consequences of a reversal and its effect on third parties who changed position in reliance on the sale order or to whether the transaction is too difficult or complex to unwind. Here, the sale involved third parties, so an appeal from the authorization to sell is equitably moot. However, an appeal from the lien-stripping portion of the sale order is not. Both the senior and junior lienor are parties to the appeal, and the lien can be reattached to the property without adverse consequences to anyone but the senior lienor. Statutory mootness under section 363(m) is similar to equitable mootness but is limited by the statutory language. Section 363(m) limits mootness to “an authorization under subsection (b) or (c) of a sale or lease” and prohibits an appeal from affecting the validity of the sale or lease. It does not address an order under subsection (f) to sell free and clear. Although the senior lienor’s contract was to purchase the property free and clear, treating that term and the sale authorization as a single provision has the same effect as an express provision prohibiting an appeal from the sale order, which would not be permissible. Therefore, the appeal from the order authorizing the sale to be free and clear of the junior lien is not moot. Clear Channel Outdoor, Inc. v. Knupfer (In re PW, LLC), 391 B.R. 25 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

11.3.kkkkk Direct appeal requires certification from the court where the matter is pending. A party may file a direct appeal from a bankruptcy court decision to the court of appeals if “the bankruptcy court, the district court, or the bankruptcy appellate panel involved” certifies the case is appropriate for direct appeal. Rule 8001(f)(2) adopts a bright-line test to determine which court is “involved”: it is the bankruptcy court until an appeal is docketed at the district court or bankruptcy appellate panel. Rule 8007(b) provides for the clerk to docket the appeal only after the record (including any transcript) is complete and the clerk transmits it to the appellate court, although a local rule permits the bankruptcy court clerk to retain the record and transmit only a certificate that the record is ready. Therefore, a petition for certification filed with the B.A.P. before the appeal is docketed is erroneously filed. Rule 5005(c) requires a court in which a paper is erroneously filed to transmit it to the proper court, here, the bankruptcy court. If the bankruptcy court does not certify the appeal for a direct appeal before the appeal is docketed at the B.A.P., the appellant may renew the certification petition at the B.A.P. Frye v. Excelsior College (In re Frye), 389 B.R. 87 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

11.3.lllll Absence of judgment on separate document tolls time to appeal. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel issued a 6-page “Order and Judgment”, which contained a detailed statement of facts and legal reasoning and the judgment. The debtor filed a notice of appeal with the B.A.P. 34 days after the Order and Judgment was entered on the B.A.P.’s docket. Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)’s deadline for filing a notice of appeal is 30 days after entry of the lower court’s judgment. But it defines “entry” by reference to Fed. R. Civ. P. 58, which requires that a judgment be set forth on a separate document. If the judgment is not contained in a separate document, it is not deemed “entered” to start the appeal period for 150 days from the date the judgment is entered. A judgment that is a separate document must be self-contained, reciting only who has won and what relief the court has ordered, without a statement of facts or legal reasoning. The rule is a mechanical one that is to be construed to preserve a party’s opportunity to appeal. Therefore, the “Order and Judgment” in this case did not start the 30-day appeal period running, and the appeal was timely. Taumoepeau v. Mfrs & Traders Trust Co. (In re Taumoepeau), 523 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 2008).

11.3.mmmmm Denial of motion, based on removal procedural defects, to remand is not appealable. After the case was closed, creditors brought an action in state court against the estate’s accountants for malpractice in connection with plan confirmation. The accountants removed the action to the bankruptcy court without reopening the case. The creditors motion to strike the removal on the ground that the action could not be removed unless the chapter 11 case were first reopened. The bankruptcy court denied the motion. Section 1452(b) of title 28 permits the bankruptcy court to remand “on any equitable ground” and provides that “an order entered under this subsection remanding a claim or cause of action, or a decision to not remand, is not reviewable by appeal or otherwise by the court of appeals”. A decision based on procedural issues, such as this one, or the timeliness of removal falls within the scope of the appeal prohibition. Therefore, the court of appeals does not have jurisdiction to review the bankruptcy court's decision. However, the court has jurisdiction to review whether the bankruptcy court had subject matter jurisdiction over the proceeding. Geruschat v. Ernst Young LLP (In re Seven Fields Dev. Corp.), 505 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2007).

11.3.nnnnn Parties may take direct appeal to court of appeals only if a district court or B.A.P. appeal is pending. The trustee appealed a chapter 13 plan confirmation to the district court. The trustee and the debtor then filed a joint request for a certification of appeal to the court of appeals under section 158(d)(2). Under the interim procedure provided in uncodified BAPCPA section 1233(b)(4)(A), if the district court certified the appeal, the trustee would have had 10 days to petition the court of appeals to hear the appeal. Instead, the district court remanded to the bankruptcy court to certify, which it did. The parties then filed their joint petition to the court of appeals to hear the appeal, but the trustee did not file a new notice of appeal to the district court. Interim Rule 8001(f)(1) provides that a certification shall not be treated as entered on the docket "until timely appeal has been taken" in the manner specified in Rule 8001(a) or (b), governing ordinary appeals. Although the Interim Rule 8001(f)(1) provision appears to be a means to delay the start of the 10-day period specified in section 1233(b)(4)(A), the court of appeals reads it as a requirement of a direct appeal. It concludes that a timely appeal to the district court or B.A.P. is a condition to seeking permission for a direct appeal and actually benefits the appellant by preserving an intermediate appeal if the court of appeals declines to take the case. Despite this apparent procedural misstep, the court of appeals reaches the direct appeal question and determines that "percolation through the district court would cast more light on the issues and facilitate a wise and well-informed decision", quoting Weber v. U.S. Trustee, 484 F.3d 154, 158 (2d Cir. 2007). In re Davis, 512 F.3d 856 (6th Cir. 2008).

11.3.ooooo Bankruptcy court may not issue a discharge while dismissal motion is on appeal. The bankruptcy court denied the creditor's motion to dismiss the individual debtor's case. While the creditor's appeal was pending, the bankruptcy court issued the discharge. The appeal divested the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction over the case, so the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to grant the discharge, which was void. Sherman v. SEC (In re Sherman), 491 F.3d 948 (9th Cir. 2007).

11.3.ppppp Appellate court reviews bankruptcy court's interpretation of a confirmed plan for abuse of discretion. The confirmed plan required additional pension plan funding in certain circumstances. Nearly 10 years after confirmation, a retiree group moved to reopen the case to enforce the plan provision to require the additional funding. A confirmed plan is a court order. Construing a confirmed plan generally requires application of contract principles, and contract construction generally presents a question of law for de novo review, but reviewing the bankruptcy court's interpretation of its own order (the plan) requires a more deferential standard. Therefore, unless the issue being reviewed presents only a question of law, the court of appeals applies an abuse of discretion standard to reviewing the bankruptcy court's plan interpretation. In re Shenango Group, Inc., 501 F.3d 338 (3d Cir. 2007).

11.3.qqqqq BAP decisions are binding on bankruptcy courts throughout the circuit. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel had issued a decision in an appeal from another district that was directly on point. The district court from this district had not addressed the issue. The BAP has previously ruled that its decisions are binding on all bankruptcy courts in the circuit. Although a district judge is not bound by the decisions of another district judge even in the same district, the BAP's rules require a BAP panel to follow decisions of other BAP panels (unless overruled by the court of appeals or the Supreme Court). Moreover, part of Congress's intent in establishing the BAPs was to promote uniformity of decisions within a circuit. Under these circumstances, the BAP's precedent is binding on the bankruptcy court. The court does not address whether it would be binding if there were also a contrary district court decision directly on point. In re Vue, 364 B.R. 767 (Bankr. D. Ore. 2007).

11.3.rrrrr Bankruptcy court lacks jurisdiction over stay relief motion while confirmation appeal is pending. Generally, an appeal divests the trial court of jurisdiction. Because a bankruptcy case raises so many unrelated issues, however, the bankruptcy court may continue to hear matters where the appeal concerns unrelated aspects of the case. Here, the debtor appealed the confirmation of a secured creditor's chapter 11 plan. The plan provided for a liquidating trustee to sell the creditor's collateral by a particular date, after which the stay was lifted to permit the creditor to sell at foreclosure. The relief the creditor sought in a stay relief motion was inconsistent with the plan provision and therefore was sufficiently related to the confirmation order that the appeal divested the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction over the stay relief motion. Whispering Pines Estates, Inc. v. Flash Island, Inc. (In re Whispering Pines Estates, Inc.), 369 B.R. 752 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

11.3.sssss Court of appeals declines direct appeal. The bankruptcy court applied a state's homestead exemption increase to apply even to existing mortgages and certified a direct appeal by the creditor to the court of appeals under 28 U.S.C. §158(d)(2)(A). That section permits a direct appeal if the court of appeals "authorizes" it, which gives the court of appeals discretion to exercise or decline to exercise jurisdiction. Among the considerations the court of appeals might use are whether there is a conflict among the bankruptcy or district courts on the legal issue, whether the ruling is manifestly correct or incorrect, whether an appellate ruling would materially advance or alter the conduct of the case below, and whether the legal issue would be resolved more wisely if there is more time for percolation through the lower courts and for development and consideration of the issues. In this case, the decision was in accord with the other three bankruptcy courts in the state who had ruled on the issue, it was not manifestly correct or incorrect, resolution would not materially advance or affect the progress of the bankruptcy case, and the issue would benefit from further consideration and analysis by the district courts. Accordingly, the court declines to hear the appeal. It cautions, however, that its reasoning is dicta and that other panels of the court remain free to authorize a direct appeal if they believe doing so would better further Congress' goals in permitting direct appeals. Weber v. U.S. Trustee, 484 F.3d 154 (2d Cir. 2007).

11.3.ttttt Minute order granting summary judgment motion is not a final order. The bankruptcy court orally granted the creditor's motion for summary judgment in an adversary proceeding in which the debtor sought to impose sanctions for a stay violation. The judge signed a minute order later that same day, "ORDERED denying the debtor motion for summary judgment and granting [creditor's] motion for summary judgment," which was entered on the docket. But the court took under submission the creditor's sanctions motion against the debtor's attorney. The time to file a notice of appeal under Rule 801 runs only from entry of a final order. To be a final order, the order must clearly and unequivocally reflect the judge's intention that it finally dispose of the matter pending before the court. Typically, an order granting a summary judgment motion without granting judgment to the prevailing party in a separate document as required under Rule 7058 does not reflect such an intention. The absence of a final judgment in favor of the creditor and the continued pendency of the sanctions motion here negated any such intention. Brown v. Wilshire Credit Corp (In re Brown), 484 F.3d 1116 (9th Cir. 2007).

11.3.uuuuu Rule 60 does not apply in bankruptcy appeals. The appellant moved under Bankruptcy Rule 9024, which incorporates Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 60 by reference, for relief from the district court's order dismissing her appeal. Civil Rule 81(a) provides that the Civil Rules applies "to proceedings in bankruptcy [in the district courts] to the extent provided by the" Bankruptcy Rules. Rule 9024 applies by its terms only to a bankruptcy court's order or judgments. It therefore does not apply in the district court. The court instead treats the motion as one for reconsideration under Rule 8015, which imposes a 10-day deadline on such a motion. As such, it was untimely and therefore denied. Ben-Baruch v. Island Props., 362 B.R. 565 (E.D.N.Y. 2007).

11.3.vvvvv Direct appeal statute applies only to bankruptcy cases, not appeals, filed on or after BAPCPA's effective date. The debtor filed his chapter 13 case on September 13, 2005 and filed a notice of appeal from its dismissal on March 21, 2006. The debtor requested a certificate permitting direct appeal to the court of appeals, as authorized by BAPCPA. BAPCPA provides, with exceptions not relevant here, that it applies to "cases under title 11" filed on or after October 17, 2005. The debtor's chapter 13 case was filed before BAPCPA's effective date. Therefore, BAPCPA's direct appeal provision does not apply, and the court denies the request for the direct appeal certificate. Berman v. Maney (In re Berman), 344 B.R. 612 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

11.3.wwwww Appeal from unstayed confirmation of simple plan is not moot. The real estate developer's plan adjusted the claims of the secured creditor by issuance of new notes and did little else to restructure the debtor. No assets were sold, no stock was issued, and no capital was invested. Under the circumstances, the appellate court could grant effective relief to the secured creditor appellants, so the appeal was not moot. F.H. Partners, L.P. v. Inv. Co. of the Sw., Inc. (In re Inv. Co. of the Sw., Inc.), 341 B.R. 298 (10th Cir. BAP 2006).

11.3.xxxxx Appeal from approval of negotiated terms of financing agreement is moot. The trustee entered into a postpetition financing agreement that provided for funds to complete the debtor's housing project and a specified amount for payment of expenses of the trustee and his professionals, but not any debtor in possession professionals, and that any amount not used for that purpose would be returned to the lender. The debtor in possession's counsel appealed, seeking a modification of the order to require that the specified funds be available pro rata for all professionals with allowed chapter 11 administrative claims. The appeal is moot, even though it would not affect the validity of the debt or the priority of the lender's lien, because the relief sought would modify the terms of the financing, which is impermissible under the Ninth Circuit's broad reading of section 364(e). Weinstein, Eisen & Weiss LLP v. Gill (In re Cooper Commons, LLC), 430 F.3d 1215 (9th Cir. 2005), amending and superseding 424 F.3d 963 (9th Cir. 2005).

11.3.yyyyy Appeal from approval of a consummated settlement is not moot. The debtor had contracted to build a methane gas recovery facility on a landfill and, separately, to sell the gas. The debtor's lenders had a security interest in both contracts (among other assets). The debtor breached both contracts. The debtor's chapter 11 trustee settled disputes with the landfill operator and the gas purchaser over the debtor's breaches by agreeing to accept a small payment and a release of claims from both counterparties and to give up the estate's right to the gas. The lenders proposed instead that they waive a portion of their secured claim, make a larger payment to the estate, and indemnify the estate against the counterparties' claims in exchange for the trustee's abandonment of the right to collect the gas. The bankruptcy court denied the lenders' objection and approved the trustee's settlement with the counterparties. The trustee consummated the settlement. The lenders' appeal was not moot, because the appellate court could order effective relief. Even though it might be complicated to unwind the settlement, it was possible to do so. The trustee could be ordered to return the payment to the counterparties, reinstate the claims, and redirect delivery of the gas. In re Resource Tech. Corp., 430 F.3d 884 (7th Cir. 2005).

11.3.zzzzz Sixth Circuit adopts less stringent equitable mootness rule. The Sixth Circuit follows the Fifth Circuit in adopting the following test to determine whether an appeal from a plan confirmation order is equitably moot: "(1) whether a stay has been obtained; (2) whether the plan has been 'substantially consummated'; and (3) whether the relief requested would affect the rights of parties not before the court or the success of the plan." In this case, the secured lenders appealed the valuation of their collateral and the cram down interest rate. They did not seek or obtain a stay, but failure to do so is not fatal on the first factor. The plan had been substantially consummated. There was sufficient evidence in the record below that reversal on the valuation and interest rate issues would not affect the plan's success. Erring on the side of caution, the court therefore holds the appeal not moot. Bank of Montreal v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re American HomePatient, Inc.), 420 F.3d 559 (6th Cir. 2005).

11.3.aaaaaa Sale order appeal is not moot as to unexecuted portions of the sale order. The bankruptcy court authorized an asset sale, with a portion of the proceeds distributed to the first lien lenders and the balance to the second lien lenders. The first lien lenders challenged several aspects of the sale and the order, but stipulated to allow the sale to close, as long as the sale proceeds were held in escrow and not distributed to the second lien holders pending a decision of the appellate court. The appeal was moot as to issues relating to the validity of the sale but not as to the distribution of proceeds. Those issues were preserved by the stipulation and the escrow of the sale proceeds pending the appeal outcome. Contrarian Funds, LLC v. WestPoint Stevens, Inc. (In re WestPoint Stevens, Inc.), 333 B.R. 30 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).

11.3.bbbbbb Denial of mandatory abstention is reviewable, even in the context of a refusal to remand. Under section 1452(b), a district court's decision on a motion to remand is not reviewable, by appeal or otherwise. Under section 1334(d), a district court's decision on a motion to abstain is similarly not reviewable, except that an order denying mandatory abstention under section 1334(c)(2) is reviewable. What if the district court denies remand on the ground that mandatory abstention is not required? The Second Circuit rules that to give effect to both provisions, the order is reviewable. It reasons that after a reversal of a decision not to abstain, the district court might decide to remand. The appellate court's review would have been only of the abstention decision, not of the remand, so the appellate review does not violate section 1452(b). Mt. McKinley Ins. Co. v. Corning Inc., 399 F.3d 436 (2d Cir. 2005).

11.3.cccccc Court of appeals has jurisdiction over district court's discretionary stay of Attorney General's enforcement action. The debtor in possession sought a stay of the State Attorney General's prepetition Clayton Act case, which sought to require the debtor to divest assets. Without ruling on whether the police or regulatory power exception of section 362(b)(4) applied, the district court granted a discretionary stay. The Attorney General appealed. The court of appeals has appellate jurisdiction because the order put the Attorney General "effectively out of court," as described in Moses H. Cone Mem'l Hosp. v. Mercury Constr. Co., 460 U.S. 1 (1983). If the bankruptcy court authorized or required divestiture of the assets, the issue might become moot, and the Attorney General would not have the opportunity to litigate the Clayton Act violation and might have to relitigate it with the asset's purchaser. If not, then in the meantime, any Clayton Act violation could harm consumers in the state. Accordingly, the court of appeals could hear the appeal. Lockyer v. Mirant Corp., 398 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2005).

11.3.dddddd Appeal of an order for relief in an involuntary case is not moot. The debtor appealed the chapter 7 order for relief. The appellees sought dismissal on the ground of mootness. The court concludes that the relief sought—return of the control of the business to the debtor, discharge of the trustee, and dismissal of the case—could not be granted. Nor were the transactions so complex or difficult to unwind that the appeal should be dismissed as equitably moot. Focus Media, Inc. v. National Broad. Co. (In re Focus Media, Inc.), 378 F.3d 916 (9th Cir. 2004).

11.3.eeeeeee Court of appeals lacks jurisdiction over order denying interlocutory review. The bankruptcy court issued a preliminary injunction. The defendant appealed. The district court concluded that the injunction was interlocutory and did not grant leave to appeal. The defendant appealed to the court of appeals, which ruled that it did not have jurisdiction. Although section 1292(a) of title 28 grants the court of appeals mandatory jurisdiction over any district court order granting or denying an injunction, the Second Circuit concludes that the district court was not required to act in this case, because of the discretion it has in granting leave to appeal under section 158(a)(3) of title 28. Since the district court did not act, the court of appeals was without jurisdiction to hear the appeal. Gibson v. Kassover (In re Kassover), 343 F.3d 91 (2d Cir. 2003).

- 11.3.fffff B.A.P. may not certify interlocutory appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). The bankruptcy appellate panel reversed the bankruptcy court's decision and remanded for further specific findings. The appellee asked the B.A.P. to certify questions to the court of appeals for interlocutory appeal under section 1292(b). The B.A.P. rules that section 1292(b) authorizes a certified interlocutory appeal only from a district court (whether acting as a court of original jurisdiction or as a bankruptcy appellate court), but not from the decision of a bankruptcy appellate panel. Watman v. Groman (In re Watman), 304 B.R. 553 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2004).
- 11.3.ggggg Section 363(m) moots appeal from an order approving integral portions of a sale agreement. A pre-petition junior secured lender was the successful bidder at a bankruptcy sale. One of the terms of the sale required a release of any avoiding power actions against the buyer and against the senior secured lender. In fact, the buyer increased the purchase price to obtain the releases. Because the releases were integral to the sale, section 363(m) prevented review of those provisions. In addition, section 363(m) does not exclude creditor purchasers from its protection. Official Committee Of Unsecured Creditors v. Trism, Inc. (In re Trism), 328 F.3d 1003 (8th Cir. 2003).
- 11.3.hhhhh Rule 9021 requires a separate document for an effective order. The bankruptcy court dismissed a case in a memorandum opinion without a separate order. As a result, the time to appeal did not begin to run. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. re-emphasizes the importance of the separate document rule, under which a judgment (including any order) must be set forth in a separate document. The B.A.P. notes the recent amendment to F.R.C.P. 58, under which a judgment is effective either when it is set forth on a separate document or when 150 days have run from entry on the docket of a non-conforming judgment. Garland v. Estate of Maloney (In re Garland), 295 B.R. 347 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 11.3.iiiii Section 108(b) extends time to file notice of appeal. Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 4(a) provides a 30-day deadline for filing a notice of appeal. The deadline is jurisdictional. If the appellant files a bankruptcy petition within the 30-day period, however, section 108(b) of the bankruptcy code extends the time period until 60 days after the order for relief. A notice of appeal is a document of the kind described in that section. The Rules Enabling Act for the appellate rules provides that the rules supercede all laws in conflict with the rules. But the court concludes that the enactment of section 108(b) after the promulgation of the rules renders that provision of the Rules Enabling Act inapplicable to this situation. Local No. 38 v. Custom Air Systems, Inc., 333 F.3d 345 (2d Cir. 2003).
- 11.3.jjjjj Creditor may not intervene to take over settled appeal. The committee appealed from an order of the bankruptcy court dismissing avoiding power claims that the committee had brought on behalf of the estate. During the appeal, the committee settled with the defendants. A creditor moved to intervene in the appeal to continue its prosecution. The district court rules that despite the creditor's absolute right to intervene under section 1109(b), intervention on these facts would amount to taking ownership of the cause of action, which is not authorized by section 1109. Official Committee v. Morgan Stanley & Co., Inc. (In re Sunbeam Corp.), 287 B.R. 861 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).
- 11.3.kkkkk Decision not to remand is reviewable on jurisdictional grounds. Where the bankruptcy court determines not to remand an action that has been removed from state court, the non-removing party may seek review of the order, despite the limitation on appellate review of a decision to remand or not to remand contained in 28 U.S.C. § 1452(b), if the sole ground for review is that the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to hear the removed action. Bissonnet Invs. LLC v. Quinlan (In re Bissonnet Invs. LLC), 320 F.3d 520 (5th Cir. 2003); Mourad v. Farrell (In re V&M Mgmt., Inc.), 321 F.3d 6 (1st Cir. 2003).

11.3.iiiii Order dismissing non-final appeal is final and appealable. The bankruptcy appellate panel ruled that it did not have jurisdiction to hear an appeal because the underlying order was not final. On further appeal to the court of appeals, the Eighth Circuit rules that the B.A.P.'s order was a final order, that a motion to dismiss the appeal to the court of appeals should therefore be denied, but that because the underlying order was not final, the B.A.P.'s order should be affirmed. Schwartz v. Kujawa, 323 F.3d 628 (8th Cir. 2003).

11.3.mmmmm Bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to issue order supplemental to appealed confirmation order. In the confirmation order, the bankruptcy court set the interest rate on state tax claims at 10%. The state appealed. Within 5 days thereafter, on the debtor's motion, the bankruptcy court issued an order confirming the 10% rate, apparently so that the state's appeal would not disrupt the implementation of the confirmation order. The state also appealed the supplemental order. After the district court dismissed the appeal from the confirmation order and affirmed the supplemental order, the state appealed the supplemental order to the Court of Appeals, which rules that the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to issue the supplemental order, because the subject of the supplemental order was the subject of an appeal from the confirmation order, which divested the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction. Texas Comptroller v. Trans Texas Gas Corp., 303 F.3d 571 (5th Cir. 2002).

11.3.nnnnn Appeal from third party release is moot. The debtor's principal competitor was a successful plaintiff in a patent violation action against the debtor and was therefore also its principal creditor. It also sued the debtor's principals in a subsequent action. The debtor's plan provided for payment of all creditors (including the competitor) in full, funded in large part by a contribution from the principals, who would receive the benefit of an injunction against prosecution of the action against them unless the debtor defaulted under the plan. The Fourth Circuit holds the creditor's plan confirmation appeal moot, because the plan had been substantially consummated, the debtor had incurred substantial new relationships and obligations in going back into business, and because it would be inequitable to vacate the injunction without at the same time refunding the principals contribution to the reorganization. MAC Panel Co. v. Virginia Panel Corp., 283 F.3d 622 (4th Cir. 2002).

11.3.ooooo B.A.P.'s may issue writs of mandamus. The All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a), authorizes "all courts established by Act of Congress [to] issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of their respective jurisdictions . . ." Bankruptcy Appellate Panels are established under 28 U.S.C. § 158(b), which grants the judicial counsel of a circuit the authority to establish them. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. rules that because Congress authorized the creation of the B.A.P.'s, Congress "established" the B.A.P.'s for purposes of the All Writs Act. Therefore, the B.A.P.'s have authority to issue writs of mandamus. Salter v. United States Bankruptcy Court (In re Salter), 279 B.R. 278 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).

11.3.ppppp Appeal from confirmation order is held equitably moot. In a continuing expansive reading of the equitable mootness doctrine, the Third Circuit affirms, on an abuse of discretion standard, the district court's ruling that an appeal from the order confirming the reorganization plan of Zenith Electronics is moot. The plan provided for exchange of public bonds for new bonds in a lesser amount, conversion of insider debt to equity, refinancing of secured debt, and elimination of equity. The court applied the five part equitable mootness test it adopted in Continental Airlines, 91 F.3d 553 (3d Cir. 1996): (1) Substantial consummation: the plan had been substantially consummated; (2) Absence of a stay: the plan was consummated within four days after entry of the order of confirmation, without notice to the appellants, but the exchange of bonds did not occur until ten days later, after the appellants had received notice of the confirmation order and the commencement of consummation. Nevertheless, the court faulted the appellants for neither seeking a stay nor providing an adequate explanation for their failure to do so. (3) Effect on rights of third parties: the effect to be measured is on parties before the appellate court, not those before the bankruptcy court. The court did not weigh the effect on the insider 58% stockholder heavily, or the effect on the secured lenders who refinanced their credit facility, departing from the Fifth Circuit's decision in In re GWIPCS1, Inc., but finds that the effect on bondholders who were not before the court might be inequitable. (4) Effect on success of the plan: the appellants intended to dissolve the plan if they were successful on appeal, so the Third Circuit found this factor satisfied. (5) Public policy of finality: despite the reliance of insiders, the court found this factor weighed in favor of mootness. Nordhoff Investments, Inc. v. Zenith Electronics Corp., 258 F.3d 180 (3d Cir. 2001).

11.3.qqqqqq Delayed interlocutory appeal is permitted. The appellant timely filed a notice of appeal from an interlocutory order of the bankruptcy court and a motion for leave to appeal to the district court. Thereafter, the appellant moved the bankruptcy court for an order altering the prior ruling. Because of the filing of that motion, the district court denied the motion for leave to appeal without prejudice. The bankruptcy court ultimately denied the motion to alter the prior ruling, and the appellant moved once again for leave to appeal, but more than ten days after the bankruptcy court denied the motion to amend the judgment. The court of appeals rules that the appeal was proper, because it was an appeal from the original ruling of the bankruptcy court, which had been timely. The subsequent motion for leave to appeal was simply renewal of a motion that had previously been denied without prejudice. Therefore, its tardiness did not affect the jurisdiction of the district court. McGee v. Stumpf (In re O'Connor), 258 F.3d 392 (5th Cir. 2001).

11.3.rrrrrr Interlocutory bankruptcy court orders may not be reviewable by the court of appeals. The trustee brought an action against several defendants for recovery of fraudulent transfers and on other grounds. The bankruptcy court dismissed the fraudulent transfer claims. The orders were interlocutory, because they did not dispose of all claims against all of the defendants. Before trial on the remaining claims, the district court withdrew the reference and tried the remaining claims. The trustee never sought district court review of the bankruptcy court's interlocutory orders. When the trustee lost on the other claims at the district court and appealed to the court of appeals, the court of appeals dismissed the appeal of the bankruptcy court's interlocutory orders for lack of jurisdiction. The court of appeals reasoned that it had jurisdiction only of appeals of orders of the district court and that the district court had never ruled on the matters that the bankruptcy court disposed of by the initial interlocutory order. Brandt v. Wand Partners, 242 F.3d 6 (1st Cir. 2001).

11.3.ssssss B.A.P. retains jurisdiction to issue stay pending appeal. Typically, the filing of a notice of appeal divests the lower court of jurisdiction. It does not, however, divest it of jurisdiction to consider ancillary matters, such as issuing a stay pending appeal. Accordingly, the B.A.P. has jurisdiction to issue a stay pending appeal even after the filing of the notice of appeal. Similarly, it may stay issuance of the mandate. But it may not do either once the mandate has issued, because issuance of the mandate returns the case to the bankruptcy court and divests the B.A.P. of jurisdiction. Fross v. MJPB, Inc. (In re Fross), 258 B.R. 26 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

11.3.tttttt Appeal from contract assumption order is not moot. The bankruptcy court authorized the assumption and assignment of physicians' employment contracts. The physician-employees objected that the contracts could not be assigned. After the bankruptcy court approved the assignments, the physicians appealed. The court of appeals rules that section 363(m), which prevents an appeal from affecting the validity of a sale order, applies to an order approving assignment of executory contracts, as long as the order also contemplates a sale of the contracts under section 363. In this case, if the physicians' challenge to the assumption and assignment order was reversed, the physicians might have a claim for rejection damages and would be relieved of covenants not to compete contained in the contracts. Accordingly, the court could grant effective relief, and the appeal was not moot. Cinicola v. Scharffenberger, 248 F.3d 110 (3d Cir. 2001).

11.3.uuuuuu Appeal of an unstayed order is not moot. The IRS did not obtain a stay of the bankruptcy court's order approving the chapter 7 trustee's final accounts and closing the case, but appealed the order nevertheless. The IRS joined as an appellee a receiver in a federal district court case, who had received the chapter 7 estate's surplus. The First Circuit B.A.P. holds that the appeal is not moot by reason of the failure to obtain a stay, because it did not involve a sale of property or confirmation of a plan, because the distributee of the estate's property was a party to the appeal, and because the bankruptcy court could fashion effective relief. United States v. Sterling Consulting Corp. (In re Indian Motorcycle Co., Inc.), 259 B.R. 458 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

11.3.vvvvvv Equitable mootness may be defeated by the appellee's inequitable conduct. On an appeal, the lender was required to return funds to the debtor after the dismissal of a chapter 13 case. The lender failed to do so but instead sought and obtained a judgment of the state court allowing it to apply the funds to the loan. The debtor sought to have the bankruptcy court order return of the funds, but the bankruptcy court denied the debtor's motion. On appeal from that denial, the lender argued equitable mootness on the grounds of a comprehensive change in circumstance as a result of the state court judgment. The B.A.P. rules that the lender's own conduct in disregarding the prior appellate decision was inequitable and defeated the lender's claim to equitable mootness. Williams v. City Financial Mortgage Co. (In re Williams), 256 B.R. 885 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2001).

11.3.wwwwww Finality for purposes of appeal may differ if the reference is withdrawn. The Second Circuit determines finality of a bankruptcy court order by determining "whether the underlying decision of the bankruptcy court was final or interlocutory," citing Bowers v. Connecticut National Bank, 847 F.2d 1019, 1022 (2d Cir. 1988). In this bankruptcy case, the district court was required to determine venue directly under section 157(b)(5) of title 28, in a proceeding that could not be referred to the bankruptcy court under section 157(a). Because the district court issued the initial order, the Bowers test could not be satisfied, suggesting that the rules for determining finality for purposes of an appeal from a bankruptcy court order do not apply where the reference has been withdrawn and the initial order is entered or is made by the district court. Maritime Asbestosis Legal Clinic v. United States Lines, Inc. (In re United States Lines, Inc.), 216 F.3d 228 (2d Cir. 2000).

11.3.xxxxxx Only a person aggrieved by non-disclosure may appeal from confirmation on that ground. The creditor challenged the validity of the disclosure statement for failure to conduct a thorough preference recovery analysis, but would not have voted differently had it known the outcome of that analysis. The creditor appealed the confirmation order under section 1129(a)(2) ("the proponent of the plan complies with the applicable provisions" of the Bankruptcy Code) on the ground that inadequate disclosure constituted noncompliance. Although the Third Circuit agreed with the general principle, it ruled that the creditor was not aggrieved by the possible violation and so did not have standing to appeal. In re PWS Holding Corp., 228 F.3d 224 (3d Cir. 2000).

11.3.yyyyyy Time to file notice of appeal extended twice by weekends. The bankruptcy court entered its order on a Wednesday so that the 10-day period for filing any notice of appeal expired on Saturday and was automatically extended to Monday under Rule 9006(a). On that Monday, the appellant sought a 20-day extension under Rule 8000(2)(c). The court granted the extension so that the period would expire on a Sunday, which was automatically extended to the next business day by Rule 9006(a). The Court of Appeals held the notice of appeal timely, even though it was filed 33 days after the initial entry of judgment, because of the intervention of two weekend extensions. Plotner v. AT&T Corp., 224 F.3d 1161 (10th Cir. 2000).

- 11.3.zzzzzz Appeal from plan releases is not moot. Where the confirmed reorganization plan provided a release of equity holders from fraudulent transfer claims, an appeal from the confirmation order challenging only the release would not be held equitably moot. If the releases were struck, it would not require unraveling of the reorganization or reversal of the entire confirmation order. In re PWS Holding Corp., 228 F.3d 224 (3d Cir. 2000).
- 11.3.aaaaaa FCC appeal of plan confirmation order is equitably moot. The debtor avoided its obligations under the C-block license auction to the FCC and confirmed the plan based on the reduced obligation. The FCC appealed and obtained a temporary stay, but the stay was vacated before the appellate decision. The debtor obtained new investors (mostly insiders) and embarked on building out the PCS system. The appeal was equitably moot because a stay had not been obtained, the plan had been substantially consummated, and the relief requested would adversely affect the rights of third parties. Substantial consummation does not require complete consummation (some financing had still not been obtained), and the fact that insiders were involved does not detract from either substantial consummation or third party reliance. The reliance element is evaluated based upon whether the parties could be placed back in the position they were in before confirmation. United States v. GWI PCS One, Inc. (In re GWI PCS One, Inc.), 230 F.3d 788 (5th Cir. 2000).
- 11.3.bbbbbbb Confirmation of chapter 13 plan moots appeal from order converting case. The trustee objected to the debtor's motion to convert her chapter 7 case to chapter 13. The objection was overruled, and the chapter 13 case proceeded to confirmation. Distributions under the chapter 13 began before the B.A.P. heard the appeal from the conversion order, which had not been stayed. Because the chapter 13 confirmation and distributions could not reasonably be unwound, the court held the appeal moot and dismissed. Blackwell v. Little (In re Little), 253 B.R. 427 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2000).
- 11.3.cccccc Appeal divests lower court of jurisdiction. The bankruptcy court dismissed the petition for bad faith. The B.A.P. reversed and remanded. The trustee appealed to the Court of Appeals. While that appeal was pending, the bankruptcy court implemented the B.A.P.'s remand, reinstated the bankruptcy case, granted the discharge, and closed the case. Holding that the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction during the pendency of the appeal to the Court of Appeals, the Court of Appeals vacated the bankruptcy court's orders. Neary v. Padilla (In re Padilla), 222 F.3d 1184 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 11.3.dddddd A B.A.P. decision is not binding precedent on bankruptcy courts. Based on the rationale that the decision of one district judge does not bind other district judges within the same district, the bankruptcy court concludes that the Article I B.A.P. should not be given any greater stare decisis authority than the district court and therefore cannot bind bankruptcy judges within the circuit. Daly v. Deptula (In re Carrozzella & Richardson), 255 B.R. 267 (Bankr. D. Conn. 2000).
- 11.3.eeeeeee Equitable mootness argument rejected in appeal of confirmation order. Plaintiffs in a securities class action appealed from an order confirming a plan which contained a release of the debtor's directors and officers from the class action claims. Because the release was not integral to the plan, the amounts involved were not large, and the reversal of the release would not necessitate the reversal or unraveling of the entire plan, the Third Circuit denies a motion to dismiss the appeal on grounds of equitable mootness. Gillman v. Continental Airlines (In re Continental Airlines), 203 F.3d 203 (3d Cir. 2000).

- 11.3.ffffff Extension of ten-day period to appeal does not require “special circumstances.”
The appellant timely sought an extension of the ten-day period under Bankruptcy Rule 8002 to file its appeal to permit it to determine the outcome of a mediation. The bankruptcy court denied the motion on the ground that the appellant did not demonstrate special circumstances for the extension. The Ninth Circuit B.A.P. reversed, holding that in determining an extension motion, the court should apply a modified version of the standards for determining whether a continuance is appropriate, and refusing to follow the Tenth Circuit B.A.P.’s ruling requiring special circumstances set forth in Lovelace v. Higgins (In re Higgins), 220 B.R. 1022 (10th Circuit B.A.P. 1998)). Nugent v. Betacom of Phoenix, Inc. (In re Betacom of Phoenix, Inc.), 250 B.R. 376 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2000).
- 11.3.ggggggg Appeal from order denying section 1110 rights is moot. After the bankruptcy court authorized the assignment of leases that were protected by section 1110 as collateral for a post-petition financing, the lessor appealed. Because the appeal would have affected the financing, the court of appeals, in a very broad reading of section 364(e), holds the appeal moot. Boullion Aircraft Holding Company, Inc. v. Smith Management (In re Western Pacific Airlines, Inc.), 1999 W.L. 459469 (10th Cir. 1999).
- 11.3.hhhhhhh Repossession of aircraft moots appeal from order denying section 1110 rights.
Although the bankruptcy court initially permitted an aircraft lessor to repossess aircraft under section 1110, the district court reversed. Nevertheless, the chapter 11 case converted to chapter 7 and the lessor repossessed all planes. Accordingly, the appeal of the District Court’s order (In re Western Pacific Airlines, 219 B.R. 305 D. Colo. 1998) on rehearing, 221 B.R. 1 (D. Colo. 1991), was moot. Because the lessor/appellant caused the mootness, the court of appeals declined, on equitable grounds, the appellant’s request to vacate the decision below. (Boullion Aircraft Holding Company, Inc. v. Smith Management (In re Western Pacific Airlines, Inc.), 1999 W.L. 459469 (10th Cir. 1999).
- 11.3.iiiiiii The bankruptcy court may not implement a B.A.P. reversal while it is on appeal.
The bankruptcy court entered a non-dischargeability judgment against the debtor. The debtor appealed, and the B.A.P. reversed and remanded. The creditor timely appealed but after the B.A.P. issued its mandate. The bankruptcy court then denied the debtor’s motion to vacate the judgment because of the B.A.P. reversal. The B.A.P. affirmed the denial, reasoning that the subsequent appeal divested the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction, even though it was filed after the B.A.P. had issued its mandate to the bankruptcy court. Marino v. Classic Auto Refinishing, Inc. (In re Marino), 234 B.R. 767 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1999). Because the appellant did not obtain a stay pending appeal, the court could enforce its original judgment, even though it had been reversed, although the B.A.P. would likely view a motion for a stay with favor. Hill and Sanford LLP v. Mirzai (In re Mirzai), 236 B.R. 8 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1999).
- 11.3.jjjjjjj Failure to specify an issue on an appeal results in waiver. Bankruptcy Rule 8006 requires an appellant to file a “statement of issues to be presented,” and Rule 8010 requires a statement of the issues presented in the appellant’s brief. Failure to raise an issue in these two places results in waiver, even if the issue is mentioned in the body of the brief. Interface Group-Nevada, Inc. v. Trans World Airlines, Inc. (In re Trans World Airlines, Inc.), 145 F.3d 124 (3d Cir. 1998).
- 11.3.kkkkkkk A person aggrieved may piggyback on the appeal of a party without standing. A party before the district court filed a notice of appeal within 30 days after the district court’s order. The trustee filed a notice of appeal within 14 days thereafter. The original appellant did not have standing to appeal, but the invalidity of its appeal did not effect the additional 14-day period in which the trustee could file its notice of appeal. Marlow v. Rollins Cotton Co. (In re The Julien Co.), 146 F.3d 421 (6th Cir. 1998).

11.3.iiiii Appellate jurisdiction limited. A person who had objected to the bankruptcy court's ruling did not appeal the order to the district court, but filed a brief in support of the debtor, who did appeal. After the district court affirmed, the person filed a notice of appeal to the court of appeals. The court of appeals ruled that because the person did not file a notice of appeal at the first appellate level, the court of appeals did not have jurisdiction to hear the second level appeal filed by that person. Krebs Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc. v. Valley Motors, Inc., 141 F.3d 490 (3d Cir. 1998).

11.3.mmmmm Bankruptcy court contempt sanction is not a final order. The bankruptcy court issued a contempt order, to which the contemnor filed timely objection. The bankruptcy court overruled the objection, and the contemnor appealed to the B.A.P.. The B.A.P. holds that the contempt order and the order overruling the objections are not final orders, because Bankruptcy Rule 9033 requires district court de novo review of a contempt order. The order overruling the objection is vacated and remanded to the bankruptcy court to transmit to the district court for review. In re Carrico, 214 B.R. 842 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).

11.3.nnnnn Mixed question of law and fact defined. "A mixed question of law and fact occurs when the historical facts are established; the rule of law is undisputed . . .; and the issue is whether the facts justify the legal rule. Mixed questions are presumptively reviewed by us de novo because they require consideration of legal concepts and the exercise of judgment about the values that animate legal principles," overruling prior Ninth Circuit precedent in the context of a determination that a debt was non-dischargeable because it was based on willful and malicious injury. Murray v. Bammer (In re Bammer), 131 F.3d 788 (9th Cir. 1997) (en banc).

11.3.ooooo Litigation target does not have standing to oppose assignment of a claim. The debtor's landlord sued the debtor for damage to the building and obtained relief from the stay on the grounds that the debtor's liability was insured. After conversion of the debtor's case to chapter 7 in the appointment of a trustee, the landlord obtained judgment outside the policy limits. The trustee settled with the landlord for the excess amount by assigning the debtor's insurance bad faith claim to the landlord in exchange for 5% of the landlord's recovery. The insurer attempted to intervene in the bankruptcy court to oppose the settlement. The court of appeals affirmed the denial of intervention on the grounds that the insured had no standing to challenge who owned the claim against it and dismissed the appeal because the insurer was not "aggrieved" by the bankruptcy court's order denying intervention. In re New Era, Inc., 135 F.3d 1206 (7th Cir. 1998).

11.3.ppppp All bankruptcy judges in a district are bound by a district judge's decision. In a somewhat unusual personal description of the history of prior case law in the Western District of New York, Judge Kaplan concludes that all bankruptcy judges within a district are bound any reported decision of a single district judge in the district, for stare decisis purposes, even in a multi-judge district court. IRR Supply Centers, Inc. v. Phipps (In re Phipps), 217 B.R. 427 (Bankr. W.D. N.Y. 1998).

11.3.qqqqq Sale of property under plan renders appeal from confirmation order moot. The Sixth Circuit joins the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits in holding that sale of property under a plan (here, a single asset real estate case) renders moot an appeal from an order confirming the plan, even though the debtor's principal secured creditor, who was the plan proponent, is a party to the appeal. 255 Park Plaza Associates Ltd. Partnership v. Connecticut General Life Insurance Company (In re 255 Park Plaza Associates Ltd. Partnership), 100 F.3d 1214 (6th Cir. 1996).

11.3.rrrrrrr Abstention may be reviewable by mandamus. Section 1334(d) of title 28 provides that a decision to abstain or not to abstain “is not reviewable by appeal or otherwise.” Nevertheless, the Sixth Circuit holds in the Dow Corning Breast Implant litigation that the district court’s decision to abstain from multiple proceedings was reviewable by a petition for a writ of mandamus and ordered the district court to hear the cases. Lindsey v. The Dow Chemical Company (In re Dow Corning Corporation), 113 F.3d 565 (6th Cir. 1997).

11.4 Sovereign Immunity

11.4.a Section 106 abrogates tribal immunity. An instrumentality of an Indian tribe violated the automatic stay in an individual debtor’s case. The individual sued, seeking stay enforcement, prohibiting further collection actions, and damages, attorneys’ fees, and expenses. Congress may abrogate a tribe’s sovereign immunity only if it does so clearly and unequivocally. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity with respect to a governmental unit in the application of Bankruptcy Code sections listed in section 106(a). Section 101(27) defines “governmental unit” capaciously to include “other foreign or domestic government.” Neither section 106(a) nor section 101(27) refers to Indian tribes. Because they act as governing authorities of their members and have sovereignty over the members and territories, they are governments. Because they operate within the territorial boundaries of the United States, they are domestic governments. The application of the two sections is a clear and unequivocal expression of Congress’ intent to abrogate the tribes’ sovereign immunity. Coughlin v. Lac Du Flambeau Band of Lake Superior Chippewa Indians (In re Coughlin), 33 F.4th 600 (1st Cir. 2022).

11.4.b Section 106 abrogates U.S. sovereign immunity for actions under section 544(b). The trustee sued the United States under section 544(b), relying on state fraudulent transfer law, to avoid tax penalty obligations and to recover the tax penalty payments. The United States would have a sovereign immunity defense to an action by a creditor under a state fraudulent transfer law. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity for actions under section 544. Therefore, the trustee is not barred by sovereign immunity from suing the United States. Cook v. U.S. (In re Yahweh Center, Inc.), 27 F.4th 960 (4th Cir. 2022).

11.4.c Sovereign immunity does not bar post-effective date action against a state. During bankruptcy, the debtor in possession agreed to lease the state some estate property. Separately, the state also filed a proof of claim for environmental damage. The plan created a liquidating trust, which assumed all the property of the estate and was to make distributions to creditors. After a dispute arose about the lease, the state took over the leased facility without paying rent, relying on its police power to protect the environment and public safety. The take-over persisted after the effective date. The liquidating trustee sued the state to recover for the inverse condemnation of the leased facility, both before and after the effective date. A state generally has sovereign immunity against suit in the federal courts, but immunity in bankruptcy cases is limited, because in the Constitution, the states waived their immunity in certain bankruptcy proceedings. In sum, “States cannot assert a defense of sovereign immunity in proceedings that further a bankruptcy court’s in rem jurisdiction no matter the technical classification of that proceeding,” including the court’s exercise of in rem jurisdiction over the debtor’s property, the equitable distribution of property, and the discharge. A proceeding’s function, not its form, governs. Here, the trustee’s action against the state furthers the court’s jurisdiction over the debtor’s and the estate’s property and over equitable distribution, in that it prevents the state from recovering on its proof of claim without answering to the trustee’s claim. The post-effective date source of a portion of the trustee’s claim does not matter to the immunity waiver, because the property to be recovered was in compensation for the trust’s assets and furthers the equitable distribution of the estate among creditors. Davis v. Calif. (In re Venoco LLC), 998 F.3d 94 (3d Cir. 2021).

11.4.d Trustee may sue to recover fraudulent transfer tax payments to the United States. More than two years before bankruptcy, the debtor paid its two shareholders’ federal tax obligations. Relying on the rights of a creditor with an allowable claim, the trustee sued the United States under section 544(b) to avoid and recover the payments. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid any transfer that would be avoidable by a creditor holding an allowable claim. Any such action is subject to any defenses the transferee would have in an action by that creditor, including a sovereign immunity defense. Section 106(a) abrogates the sovereign immunity of the United States with respect to specified Code sections, including section 544. Because the provision contains no exceptions, limitations, or conditions, it abrogates sovereign immunity for purposes of the trustee's pursuit of the creditor's claim. The Internal Revenue Code is a comprehensive federal statute that preempts state law covering the same field. However, an action to recover a tax payment that is a fraudulent transfer is not an action to collect a tax and is therefore not preempted. Miller v. U.S. (In re All Resorts Grp., Inc.), 617 B.R. 375 (Bankr. D. Utah 2020).

- 11.4.e Sale free and clear of state's interest does not violate the Eleventh Amendment. The debtor in possession sold real property that was subject to an easement in favor of a state agency free and clear of all interests under section 363(f). The Eleventh Amendment denies federal courts of jurisdiction over an action against a state. However, it does not prevent a federal court from dealing with property in which the state has an interest, because doing so is an action in rem and does not seek affirmative relief against the state. Therefore, the bankruptcy court's order authorizing the sale free and clear of the state's easement did not violate the Eleventh Amendment. Port of Corpus Christi Auth. v. Sherwin Alumina Co., L.L.C. (In re Sherwin Alumina Co., L.L.C.), 932 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 11.4.f Section 106's sovereign immunity abrogation does not apply to Indian tribes. The trustee sued an Indian tribe to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer. Indian tribes have sovereign immunity. Congress may abrogate a tribe's sovereign immunity, but only by a clear and unequivocal statement. Inference or implication from legislative language does not suffice. In every instance in which the courts have found abrogation of an Indian tribe's sovereign immunity, Congress has referred expressly to Indians or tribes. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity of governmental units. Section 101 defines "governmental unit" as the "United States; State; Commonwealth; ... foreign state; ... or other foreign or domestic government." A tribe is domestic and it is a government. Syllogistically, therefore, it is a domestic government. However, no prior Supreme Court case has referred to an Indian tribe as a "domestic government." Therefore, including Indian tribes within the phrase "domestic government" would require inference or implication, which would be inadequate to bring them within the section's scope. The court dismisses the avoiding power action against the tribe. Buchwald Cap. Advisors, LLC v. Sault St. Marie Tribe (In re Greektown Holdings, LLC), 917 F.3d 451(6th Cir. 2019).
- 11.4.g Section 544(b) does not require a separate sovereign immunity waiver for a claim against the government. Relying on the claim of a creditor holding an unsecured claim and state law, the trustee sued the Internal Revenue Service under section 544(b) to avoid the debtor's federal tax payments made between two and four years before bankruptcy. Sovereign immunity would have prevented the triggering creditor on whom the trustee relied from suing the IRS. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to "avoid a transfer that is voidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an unsecured claim." Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity with respect to claims under section 544. The abrogation is adequate to permit the action; a secondary waiver for the underlying substantive claim is not required. Therefore, the trustee may bring the action despite the IRS's sovereign immunity defense. Zazzali v. U.S. (In re DBSI, Inc.), 869 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 11.4.h Section 106 does not abrogate an Indian tribe's sovereign immunity or waive it upon filing a proof of claim, because the tribe is not a governmental unit. The debtor provided cash processing services for an Indian casino under a services agreement. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor failed to reimburse the casino for cash the casino expended; the casino filed a proof of claim. The trustee sued the casino to avoid and recover as preferences payments the debtor had made to the casino under the services agreement. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity "as to a governmental unit" for certain purposes under the Code, including preference avoidance and recovery. “Governmental unit” means the United States, the states, their various agencies and instrumentalities, a foreign state, or “other foreign or domestic government.” Congress may abrogate an Indian tribe’s sovereign immunity only by clear and unequivocal language. The general reference to “other foreign or domestic government” does not suffice. A tribal entity enjoys the tribe’s sovereign immunity based on its relationship to the tribe, principally based on whether it operates as an arm of the tribe. Here, the casino is owned by the tribe, carries out the tribe’s interests, and transmits all proceeds to the tribe and therefore is an arm of the tribe that enjoys sovereign immunity from the trustee’s action. Section 106(b) provides, “A governmental unit that has filed a proof of claim in the case is deemed to have waived sovereign immunity” with respect to claims against the governmental unit that arose out of the same transaction or occurrence. Because a tribe is not a governmental unit, section 106(b) does not apply. So there is neither abrogation nor waiver of the tribe’s sovereign immunity. Casino Caribbean, LLC v. Money Centers of Am., Inc. (In re Money Centers of Am., Inc.), 565 B.R. 87 (Bankr. D., Del. 2017).

- 11.4.i Section 544(b) does not require a separate sovereign immunity waiver for a claim against the government. Relying on the claim of a creditor holding an unsecured claim and state law, the trustee sued the Internal Revenue Service under section 544(b) to avoid the debtor’s federal tax payments between two and four years before bankruptcy. Sovereign immunity would have prevented the “golden” creditor on whom the trustee relied from suing the IRS. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to “avoid a transfer that is voidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an unsecured claim.” Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity with respect to claims under section 544. The abrogation is adequate to permit the action; a secondary waiver for the underlying substantive claim is not required. Therefore, the trustee may bring the action despite the IRS’s sovereign immunity defense. Zazzali v. U.S. (In re DBSI, Inc.), 554 B.R. 234 (D. Id. 2016).
- 11.4.j Section 106’s sovereign immunity abrogation does not apply to Indian tribes. The trustee sued an Indian tribe to avoid and recover a fraudulent transfer. Common law grants Indian tribes sovereign immunity. Congress may abrogate a tribe’s sovereign immunity but only by a clear and unequivocal statement in the legislation itself. Inference or implication from legislative language does not suffice. And in every instance in which the courts have found abrogation of an Indian tribe’s sovereign immunity, Congress has referred expressly to Indians or tribes. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity of governmental units. Section 101 defines “governmental unit” as the “United States; State; Commonwealth; ... foreign state; ... or other foreign or domestic government.” A tribe is domestic and it is a government. Syllogistically, therefore, it is a domestic government. However, no prior Supreme Court case has referred to an Indian tribe as a “domestic government.” Moreover, the Constitution distinguishes in Art. III, sec. 1 among the States, foreign governments, and Indian tribes, yet section 106(a) does not mention Indian tribes. Therefore, including Indian tribes within the phrase “domestic government” would require inference or implication, which would be inadequate to bring them within the section’s scope. The court dismisses the avoiding power action against the tribe. Buchwald Cap. Advisors, LLC v. Papas (In re Greektown Holdings, LLC), 532 B.R. 680 (E.D. Mich. 2015).
- 11.4.k Section 106(a)’s sovereign immunity waiver does not apply to a fraudulent transfer action against the federal government under section 544(b). The subchapter S corporation debtor made a tax payment to the IRS for its shareholders more than two years before bankruptcy. The debtor was insolvent at the time of the payment and did not receive reasonably equivalent value for the payment. The debtor had at least one unsecured creditor at the time. Section 544(b) permits the trustee to avoid a transfer that is “voidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an unsecured claim.” Ordinarily, a creditor of the debtor could avoid the transfer under state fraudulent transfer law, but the creditor’s claim against the IRS would be barred by sovereign immunity. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity “with respect to” section 544. However, the abrogation does not address section 544(b)’s express requirement that the transfer be avoidable by a creditor holding an allowable unsecured claim. Congress has not waived sovereign immunity to permit a general unsecured creditor to avoid a transfer to the federal government. Therefore, there is no creditor who could avoid the payment to the IRS, so the trustee may not avoid the transfer. In re Equip. Acq. Res., Inc., 742 F.3d 743 (7th Cir. 2014).

- 11.4.l Sovereign immunity does not prevent avoidance under section 544(b). The subchapter S debtor made quarterly tax payments to the IRS on behalf of its shareholders. After bankruptcy, the trustee sought to avoid and recover one of the payments as a constructively fraudulent transfer under section 544(b) and the Illinois Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act. Section 544(b) authorizes a trustee to avoid a transfer “that is voidable under applicable law by a creditor holding an [allowable] unsecured claim”. Although the UFTA authorizes a creditor to avoid a constructively fraudulent transfer, a creditor may not bring such a claim against the IRS, because sovereign immunity provides the IRS an absolute defense to such an action. Section 106(a)(1) abrogates “sovereign immunity as to a governmental unit to the extent set forth in this section with respect to ... section 544”. The abrogation is broad, eliminating sovereign immunity whenever it appears “with respect to” section 544, not just on the section 544 claim itself. Therefore, it applies to the underlying state law cause of action as well. The court denies the IRS’s motion to dismiss the complaint on sovereign immunity grounds. U.S. v. Equip. Acq. Res., Inc. (In re Equip. Acq. Res., Inc.), 485 B.R. 586 (N.D. Ill. 2013).
- 11.4.m A request for payment of an administrative expense does not trigger a section 106(b) sovereign immunity waiver. The corporate debtor did not file a federal income tax return for a 2001 “stub period” between January 1 and the date of the filing of the petition, because of uncertainty over which other corporation was its parent and responsible for including it in the parent’s return. After bankruptcy, it filed a return for the “short period” remainder of 2001 but did not seek a prompt determination under section 505(b) of the tax due for the short period. The debtor filed 2002 and 2003 returns with section 505(b) prompt determination requests. The IRS did not complete its examination of those returns before the section 505(b) deadlines. The debtor in possession also amended the debtor’s 1998 return to seek a refund, based on net operating loss carrybacks and filed an unsigned return for the 2001 stub period. The IRS rejected the refund request. The IRS filed a request for payment of administrative expense for interest and penalties for the 2001 short period. The liquidating trustee under the debtor’s confirmed plan objected to the request, sought to carry forward and carry back losses against the short period income, recover the disallowed 1998 refund and recover a refund of taxes paid with the 2001 short period return. Later, the trustee requested a refund from the IRS for 1998 and for the 2001 short period. Under section 106(b), a governmental unit that has filed a proof of claim waives sovereign immunity with respect to a claim that is property of the estate and arose out of the same transaction or occurrence. “Same transaction” does not require an absolute identity of factual background but only whether judicial economy and fairness require all issues to be tried together. Here, the trustee’s short period refund claim is sufficiently related to the IRS’s short period interest and penalty administrative expense requests as to qualify. However, a request for payment of an administrative expense is not the same as a proof of claim. Section 106(b) refers only to a proof of claim. Therefore, section 106(b) does not waive sovereign immunity for a counterclaim to an administrative expense request. United States v. Bond, 2012 WL 4086769 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 17, 2012).
- 11.4.n Section 106(a) does not abrogate Indian tribe’s sovereign immunity. The debtor is a member of an Indian tribe. The trustee sought turnover from the tribe of tribal revenue payments to which the debtor was entitled. Under federal common law, Indian tribes have sovereign immunity, but Congress may abrogate immunity by explicit legislation. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity “as to a governmental unit” with respect to turnover proceedings. Section 101(27) defines “governmental unit” as the United States, a State, District or Territory or a foreign state, municipalities, instrumentalities and divisions, “and any other foreign or domestic government”.

Although case law has characterized Indian tribes as domestic nations, the general reference in the definition to foreign or domestic governments is not sufficiently explicit to cover Indian tribes for purposes of waiving their sovereign immunity. Therefore, section 106(a) does not abrogate the tribe's sovereign immunity, and the trustee may not get turnover from the tribe. Bucher v. Dakota Fin. Corp. (In re Whitaker), 474 B.R. 687 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

- 11.4.o An Indian tribe is a governmental unit for which the Bankruptcy Code waives sovereign immunity. The debtor in a prior case confirmed a plan that provided for assignment to a third party of a lease from an Indian tribe of mineral rights on Indian land. The plan specified the obligations under the lease for which the assignee would be liable. The Indian tribe was a party in the prior case. In the assignee's later chapter 11 case, the tribe objected to the lease's assumption on the ground that sovereign immunity protected it against the bankruptcy court's orders and the application of section 1141(d) in the prior case. An Indian tribe generally has sovereign immunity, subject to Congressional abrogation, which must be clear and unequivocal to be effective. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity "as to a governmental unit" with respect to section 1141, among other sections. A "governmental unit" includes, in addition to a State and its municipalities, a foreign state and its municipalities, and "other foreign or domestic government". The latter phrase includes Indian tribes. Therefore, Congress has abrogated Indian tribes' sovereign immunity in bankruptcy cases, and the tribe is bound by the order in the prior case. In re Platinum Oil Props., LLC, 465 B.R. 621 (Bankr. D.N.M. 2011).
- 11.4.p A state's consent by ratification to a sovereign immunity waiver permits an action to enforce the automatic stay and the discharge injunction. The chapter 13 debtor owed child support payments. The state collection agency filed a proof of claim. The debtor objected to the prepetition interest portion of the claim. The state did not respond, so the court sustained the objection. The debtor confirmed the plan and completed all payments, receiving a discharge. During the debtor's plan performance, the state contacted the debtor twice and threatened collection action for nonpayment of child support. The debtor's attorney responded each time, and the state dropped the matter. After the discharge, the state sought to collect unpaid prepetition and postpetition interest. The debtor then brought an action against the state for violation of the automatic stay and of the discharge injunction. A state generally has sovereign immunity, but there are three bases on which the bankruptcy court may entertain an action against a state. Under the litigation waiver theory, by filing a proof of claim and invoking the court's jurisdiction, a state waives immunity for adjudication of the claim. Under the congressional abrogation theory, Congress may abrogate the state's immunity under a valid exercise of power. Congress has done so in section 106, but the third theory has overtaken the abrogation theory, which retains little relevance. Under the "consent by ratification" theory, by ratifying the Constitution's Bankruptcy Clause, the states waived immunity in proceedings necessary to effectuate the bankruptcy courts' in rem jurisdiction. The courts' in rem jurisdiction involves, at a minimum, the court's exclusive jurisdiction over the debtor's property, the property's equitable distribution and the debtor's discharge. An action for a stay violation, even one seeking money damages, functions to protect the courts' in rem jurisdiction. Therefore, the states generally consented by ratification to a sovereign immunity waiver to permit enforcement actions for a stay violation. In this case, however, the debtor brought the action after distribution was completed, the court no longer had exclusive jurisdiction over the debtor's property and the discharge injunction replaced the stay. Therefore, the action was too late to vindicate the court's in rem jurisdiction, and the sovereign immunity waiver did not apply. An action for a discharge injunction violation similarly functions to protect the in rem discharge, and the sovereign immunity consent by ratification therefore applies to it. State of Florida Dept. of Rev. v. Diaz (In re Diaz), 647 F.3d 1073 (11th Cir. 2011) insurance for itself and its subsidiaries that were self-insured under applicable state insurance law and workers compensation for subsidiaries that were ineligible to be self-insured. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession assumed the insurance contracts and entered into new, similar contracts. The plan provided for the sale of all the debtor's assets and for the reorganized debtor simply to address claims and make distributions. After confirmation, the state workers compensation agency and insurance fund claimed that the debtor in possession had been self-insured during the case and asserted an administrative expense claim for workers compensation claims that it had paid. It also asserted that the insurer had provided coverage. The insurer commenced an adversary proceeding against the reorganized debtor and the state agency and fund seeking a declaration that it was not liable to the state under the policies. The Constitution abrogates state sovereign immunity to the extent of the bankruptcy court's in rem jurisdiction necessary to resolve a bankruptcy case. In addition, section 106(a)(2) abrogates state sovereign immunity to permit the court to "hear and determine any issue arising with respect to the application of [section 502 or 503] to governmental units". The determination of the insurer's and the fund's administrative expense claims, and the determination of the insurer's liability under the policy, which is an asset of the estate, are necessary for the administration of the estate. Therefore, the adversary proceeding does not exceed the Constitutional and statutory abrogation of sovereign immunity, even though it does not directly address the state's liability to the estate or the state's claims against the estate. Ace Am. Ins. Co v. DPH Holdings Corp. (In re DPH Holdings Corp.), 437 B.R. 88 (S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 11.4.q Sovereign immunity abrogation applies even where action only indirectly addresses state claims or liabilities. Before bankruptcy, the debtor purchased excess workers compensation

- 11.4.r Bankruptcy court may determine what is property of the estate without offending state sovereign immunity. The debtor was the Superintendent of Schools of the state of Georgia. She entered a game show, where she won $1 million. Before the show, she answered a questionnaire in which she said that any winnings would be donated to educational charities. After the show, she directed the money be deposited in a self-directed charitable gift fund and directed the fund to donate the money to three Georgia schools. She filed bankruptcy three months later, before the game show paid the money to the charitable gift fund. The trustee brought an action against her and the Georgia Department of Education for a declaration that the winnings were property of the estate under section 541(a)(1). The Eleventh Amendment confirms the states' sovereign immunity from suit. However, the states waived their sovereign immunity in the compact of the Constitution as to proceedings necessary to effectuate a bankruptcy court's in rem jurisdiction. A fundamental purpose of the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction is to determine what constitutes property of the estate, and the court has exclusive jurisdiction over property of the estate. Therefore, sovereign immunity does not prevent the trustee from suing the state to determine whether the prize money is property of the estate. In addition, this action does not offend the state's sovereign immunity because a judgment would not expend itself on the public treasury. Finally, Congress may abrogate state sovereign immunity, which it did in section 106 as to certain enumerated sections of the Code, but not including section 541. The exclusion of section 541 does not limit the Code's abrogation as to determination of what is property of the estate, because determination of that question is often necessary to application of other sections, such as section 362, as to which the Code expressly abrogates sovereign immunity. Brown v. Fox Broad. Co. (In re Cox), 433 B.R. 911 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2010).
- 11.4.s Order against a state to enforce the automatic stay is not subject to a sovereign immunity claim. Florida sent collection letters and attempted to garnish wages of a chapter 13 debtor who had confirmed a repayment plan. Upon finding a stay violation, the bankruptcy court awarded damages, attorney's fees, and sanctions against the state and in favor of the debtor. The state's sovereign immunity does not prevent the court from doing so. Central Va. Comm. College v. Katz, 546 U.S. 356 (2006), held that the Constitution permits Congress to hold the states to the same rules as private parties, despite any sovereign immunity claim, in "proceedings necessary to effectuate the in rem jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court", which includes a proceeding to enforce the automatic stay. However, the court may not award punitive damages. Section 106(a)(3) expressly authorizes the bankruptcy court to issue an order under one of the sections enumerated in section 106(a)(1) against a governmental unit, “but not including an award of punitive damages”. Central Va. held only that section 106(a)’s sovereign immunity abrogation was unnecessary, not unconstitutional. The punitive damage limitation therefore remains effective as within Congress’ apparent intent when it enacted section 106(a), even under the mistaken impression that the section was necessary to abrogation. Fla. Dept. of Rev. v. Omine (In re Omine), 485 F.3d 1305 (11th Cir. 2007).

- 11.4.t State’s refusal to consent to bankruptcy case does not prevent discharge of a bail bond forfeiture judgment. A bail bond issuer defaulted on surety bonds issued to the state to guarantee the appearance of criminal defendants. The state obtained a judgment against the issuer, who then filed bankruptcy. The state moved to dismiss the case on the ground that its refusal to consent deprived the court of jurisdiction over it. The Supreme Court’s decisions in Tenn. Student Assist. Corp. v. Hood, 541 U.S. 446 (2004), and Central Va. Comm. College v. Katz, 546 U.S. 356 (2006), fully dispose of the state’s claim. The proceeding is, in Hood’s words, in rem, brought to obtain a discharge, not to seek recovery against the state, and therefore does not infringe the state’s immunity. In addition, despite a plea from concurring Judge Edith Jones, the court refuses to revisit its decision in In re Hickman, 260 F.3d 400 (5th Cir. 2001), that a bail bond forfeiture judgment is not nondischargeable under section 523(a)(7)’s exception to discharge for a “fine, penalty, or forfeiture”. Texas v. Soileau (In re Soileau), 488 F.3d 302 (5th Cir. 2007).
- 11.4.u Ex parte Young permits a case ancillary to a foreign proceeding against a state banking superintendent. The Yugoslav banking supervisory agency took over a Yugoslav bank that had a New York branch. The New York banking superintendent seized the New York branch’s assets to liquidate them under New York law for distribution to New York creditors. The Yugoslav agency commenced a case ancillary to a foreign proceeding under then-applicable section 304. The New York superintendent moved to dismiss on sovereign immunity grounds, arguing that sovereign immunity protected the superintendent, as an agency or instrumentality of New York state, from bankruptcy court jurisdiction to order turnover of the bank’s assets from the superintendent. Ex parte Young permits an action that might otherwise be barred by sovereign immunity if the action is directed against an individual state officer, in his or her official capacity, alleges an ongoing violation of federal law, and seeks only prospective relief. Here, the petition alleges that the superintendent commits an ongoing violation of federal law by retaining assets that, as a matter of federal law under section 304, should be turned over to the bankruptcy court to administer and is prospective in nature, because it does not seek to remedy past misconduct or compensate for a past violation. Ex parte Young does not permit a quiet title action against a state. This ancillary case, however, is not a quiet title action, because the state does not claim any beneficial interest in the seized assets but holds them only for distribution to the bank’s creditors. Deposit Ins. Agency v. Superintendent of Banks, 482 F.3d 612 (2d Cir. 2007).
- 11.4.v State supreme court is a governmental unit. The state supreme court, acting through its office of disciplinary counsel, disbarred an attorney and required restitution. The attorney filed a bankruptcy petition. The state bar disciplinary counsel sought enforcement of the restitution obligation. The supreme court is a governmental unit, because it exercises the state’s sovereign judicial power. Therefore, section 362(b)(4)’s police or regulatory power automatic stay exception applies to the court’s disciplinary counsel’s action to enforce the disbarment and restitution order. In re Arsj, 354 B.R. 770 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2006).
- 11.4.w State may not assert sovereign immunity against tax refund action. The debtor in possession sought a sales tax refund through ordinary state procedures. When it was unsuccessful, it brought an action under sections 505 and 542 for determination and turnover of the tax overpayment. The Supreme Court had ruled in Tenn. Student Assistance Corp. v. Hood, 541 U.S. 440 (2004), that state sovereign immunity does not apply against the bankruptcy court's exercise of in rem jurisdiction and in Central Va. Comm. College v. Katz, 544 U.S. 960 (2005), that the Constitution's bankruptcy clause committed the states not to assert sovereign immunity against actions brought under the bankruptcy power. Those cases therefore do not reach the question of whether section 106(b) properly abrogated state sovereign immunity in bankruptcy. The Sixth Circuit, however, had so held in both those cases and in In re Serv. Merch. Co., 333 F.3d 666 (6th Cir. 2003), and its rulings remain binding precedent, despite the Supreme Court's affirmance on other grounds. Therefore, the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over the debtor in possession's action for a tax refund for overpayments. In re Quality Stores, Inc., 354 B.R. 840 (W.D. Mich. 2006).

- 11.4.x Section 106 does not override Federal Tort Claims Act exceptions. The Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) waives the United States' sovereign immunity to permit injured parties to bring certain claims. It excepts from the immunity waiver, however, claims arising out of discretionary functions or for "libel, slander, misrepresentation, deceit, or interference with contract rights." Section 106 waives the sovereign immunity of the United States in general. Section 106(c) permits offset against a governmental unit's proof of claim, notwithstanding any assertion of sovereign immunity, of "any claim against such governmental unit that is property of the estate." But section 106(a)(5) provides that, "Nothing in this section shall create any substantive claim for relief ... not otherwise existing under ... nonbankruptcy law." Section 106(c) does not override the FTCA's waiver exception for the listed claims. The exception to the sovereign immunity waiver for those claims prevents them from ever coming into existence (rather than just barring a remedy on underlying claims that exist independent of the waiver) and thereby from becoming property of the estate. Section 106(a)(5) makes clear that the section's sovereign immunity waiver does not create claims that do not exist outside bankruptcy. As such, they cannot form the basis for an offset claim against the government's proof of claim. A dissenting opinion argues that the FTCA bars the remedy but does not prevent the claim from coming into existence. Zayler v. Dep't of Agric. (In re Supreme Beef Processors, Inc.), 468 F.3d 248 (5th Cir. 2006) (en banc).
- 11.4.y Ex parte Young* applies to an action to enforce an extension of time under section 108. The debtor in possession filed a claim against the State that was, under the State's administrative procedures, four days late. The debtor in possession argued that section 108(a) permitted the late filing, because it extends any such deadline for the first 60 days after the order for relief. When the State refused to recognize the claim, the debtor in possession sued the State officers to enjoin their continuing violation of Federal law. The officers argued that sovereign immunity barred the action, which ultimately sought monetary recovery from the State. However, monetary recovery was only a consequence of the action, not its purpose, which was to enjoin the officers' continued, prospective violation of section 108(a). Such a purpose falls within the requirements of Ex parte Young. Dairy Mart Convenience Stores, Inc. v. Nickel (In re Dairy Mart Convenience Stores, Inc.), 411 F.3d 367 (2d Cir. 2005).
- 11.4.z Section 106(b) does not impose a claim "maturity" requirement to qualify as a compulsory counterclaim for sovereign immunity waiver purposes. The debtor's non-debtor subsidiary contracted to build a steel mill. The debtor guaranteed completion, posted a letter of credit to secure the guarantee, and posted cash collateral with the letter of credit issuer to secure the reimbursement obligation under the letter of credit. A dispute arose over completion before the debtor's bankruptcy. Once the debtor filed chapter 11, the letter of credit issuer filed a proof of claim. Sometime later, the debtor's customer drew the letter of credit. The debtor in possession sued, based on the allegedly improper letter of credit draw, to recover the collateral. The issuer, International Finance Corp., an entity that is immune under the International Organizations Immunity Act, asserted sovereign immunity as a defense to the claim and claimed that the waiver effected by its earlier filing of a proof of claim related to this transaction did not meet the "compulsory counterclaim" requirement of section 106(b) for a waiver, because the debtor in possession's claim did not exist at the time IFC filed its proof of claim. Rule 13(b) of the Fed. R. Civ. P. requires the filing of any counterclaim "which at the time of serving the pleading the pleader has against any opposing party, if it arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party's claim." However, section 106(b) does not impose a similar "maturity" requirement, so it applies even where, as here, the counterclaim arose after the filing of the proof of claim. Int'l Fin. Corp. v. Kaiser Group Int'l, Inc. (In re Kaiser Group Int'l, Inc.), 399 F.3d 558 (3d Cir. 2005).

- 11.4.aa Sovereign immunity waiver is limited to matters logically related to a proof of claim. The State had filed a proof of claim against the debtor for environmental clean-up obligations. The chapter 11 plan provided for the establishment of a new corporation to undertake certain environmental remediation work. The State contracted with the new corporation to perform the work, and the debtor transferred funds to the corporation and the State to fund it. Within a few months after confirmation, disputes arose, and the State terminated the contract, directing the work to an unrelated company that hired many of the new corporation's employees. The new corporation and the chapter 11 liquidating trustee, which owned the stock of the new corporation, sued the State and the unrelated company for breach of contract, tortious interference, and fraud in the inducement and sought recovery of the transferred funds. The claim against the State did not arise out of the same transaction or occurrence as the original environmental claim. Although both matters related to environmental cleanup, the debtor did not have a counterclaim, compulsory or otherwise, against the State for the later events, at the time the State filed its proof of claim. Thus, the claims were not sufficiently related so that the proof of claim constituted a sovereign immunity waiver for the later lawsuit. Montana v. Goldin (In re Pegasus Gold Corp.), 389 F.3d 1189 (9th Cir. 2005).
- 11.4.bb Sovereign immunity claim defeats section 544(b) action. The debtor in possession sued the state under section 544(b) to recover a fraudulent transfer, relying on the existence of a creditor holding a prepetition unsecured claim who could have pursued the action. Although the state had waived sovereign immunity in the case by filing multiple proofs of claim related to the same transactions, there was no creditor whose claim the debtor in possession could use under section 544(b). Because the state had not waived sovereign immunity, there was no cause of action before bankruptcy available to any creditor to avoid the transfer. The state's filing of the proofs of claim and the pursuit of the action by the debtor in possession does not avoid the sovereign immunity issue. Grubbs Constr. Co. v. Florida Dep't of Revenue (In re Grubbs Constr. Co.), 321 B.R. 346 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2005).
- 11.4.cc State sovereign immunity does not prevent application of section 304 to a state supervised bank branch. The Superintendent of Banks argued that the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to grant a foreign representative's petition under section 304 for the assets of a foreign bank's U.S. branch, which was regulated by the state Superintendent of Banks, because such a petition requires the state to appear in a federal court and is denied its rights under a mandatory bank supervision statute. The court rejects the argument out of hand. Section 304 is consistent with Congress' authority to enact uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies and to regulate international commerce. A state official may not stand in the way of the enforcement of the bankruptcy laws. The court does not mention the recent Supreme Court's decision in Tennessee Student Assistance Corp. v. Hood, 541 U.S. 440 (2004), which might have addressed this case as an issue of the bankruptcy court's in rem jurisdiction over the debtor's property. Agency for Deposit Ins. v. Superintendent of Banks, 313 B.R. 561 (S.D.N.Y. 2004).
- 11.4.dd Discharge complaint against a State does not implicate sovereign immunity. The debtor filed an adversary proceeding against the State for a determination that the undue hardship exception to student loan nondischargeability applied. The State objected to jurisdiction, claiming sovereign immunity from suit in the federal courts. The Supreme Court does not address the big question, whether the Eleventh Amendment and sovereign immunity apply in bankruptcy cases. Rather, it concludes that to the extent a bankruptcy case and any proceeding in the case are in rem, the bankruptcy court has complete jurisdiction to resolve the proceeding, even where a State is hailed into court as a party to the proceeding. It concludes that proceedings relating to the discharge are part of the bankruptcy court's in rem jurisdiction. Therefore, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to resolve this dischargeability complaint against the State, despite the State's claim of sovereign immunity. Tennessee Student Assistance Corp. v. Hood, 541 U.S. 440 (2004).

- 11.4.ee Indian tribes do not have sovereign immunity in bankruptcy cases. An Indian tribe normally has sovereign immunity, which may be abrogated only by the tribe's consent or by explicit Congressional enactment. Section 106(a) of the Bankruptcy Code abrogates sovereign immunity as to "governmental units." The definition of "governmental unit" does not include explicit mention of Indian tribes but refers generally to "other foreign or domestic governments." Under Supreme Court precedents, Indian tribes are domestic governments. Therefore, even though Congress did not specifically list the Indian tribes in section 106(a), its abrogation of their sovereign immunity is sufficiently explicit to evidence Congress's unequivocal intent to abrogate. Krystal Energy Co. v. Navajo Nation, 357 F.3d 1055 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 11.4.ff Congress abrogated Indian tribes' sovereign immunity in bankruptcy. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity "as to a governmental unit." "Governmental unit" is defined to include "other foreign or domestic governments." Under Supreme Court precedents, Indian tribes are domestic governments. Therefore, even though Congress did not specifically list Indian tribes in section 106(a), its abrogation of their sovereign immunity is sufficiently explicit to evidence Congress's unequivocal intent to abrogate. Krystal Energy Co. v. Navajo Nation, 357 F.3d 1055 (9th Cir. 2004).
- 11.4.gg Government waives sovereign immunity for stay violation sanction by filing proof of claim. After the state taxing agency filed a proof of claim, it sought to collect the taxes from the debtor. The debtor sought an order enforcing the stay and sanctions. The parties agreed to an order prohibiting further collection efforts, which the state violated. By having filed the proof of claim, the state agency waived sovereign immunity under section 106(b). For these purposes, the stay violation arose out of the same transaction or occurrence as the taxes asserted in the proof of claim, because the state's violation related to the taxes. (The court rules, without discussion, that in this chapter 7 case, the claim against the taxing agency is property of the estate, a dubious proposition.) Indiana Dept. of Revenue v. Williams, 301 B.R. 871 (S.D. Ind. 2003).
- 11.4.hh United States trustee has sovereign and quasi-judicial immunity. When the United States trustee is sued for any of his official acts, he is acting on behalf of the United States, and the suit is effectively against the United States. He is therefore entitled to sovereign immunity. Section 106(a) does not waive sovereign immunity, because that section waives sovereign immunity only as to a "governmental unit." The definition of governmental unit excludes the United States trustee. In addition, because the United States Trustees perform many of the functions that had previously been assigned to bankruptcy judges and are part of the judicial function, when the United States Trustee is sued in his individual capacity, he is entitled to quasi-judicial immunity. Balser v. Department of Justice, 327 F.3d 903 (9th Cir. 2003).
- 11.4.ii Sovereign immunity waiver applies to Indian tribes. Section 106(a) abrogates sovereign immunity of a "governmental unit." The definition of "governmental unit" in section 101 includes "other foreign or domestic government." The court rules that the phrase "other domestic government" includes Indian tribes and that section 106(a) therefore abrogates sovereign immunity as to the tribes. Russell v. Fort McDowell Yavapai Nation (In re Russell), 293 B.R. 34 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2003).

- 11.4.jj Section 106(a) constitutionally abrogates state sovereign immunity. Breaking with five other circuits, the Sixth Circuit rules that section 106(a) is a constitutional abrogation of the states' sovereign immunity. In this case, the debtor sued the Tennessee Student Assistance Corporation for a determination that her student loan debt was dischargeable. Reviewing the constitutional history, the Sixth Circuit determines that by authorizing "uniform" laws on the subject of bankruptcy, the Constitution abrogated the sovereign immunity of the states to suit in bankruptcy proceedings. Hood v. Tennessee Student Assistance Corp., 319 F.3d 756 (6th Cir. 2003), aff'd 124 S. Ct. 1905 (2004).
- 11.4.kk Bankruptcy court may determine claim against state for purposes of set-off. The state filed a proof of tax claim in the bankruptcy court. The debtor asserted a tax refund state on unrelated matters. The filing of the proof of claim constituted a waiver of sovereign immunity sufficient to permit the bankruptcy court to determine the debtor's claim against the state for purposes of set-off under section 106(c). The matter need not be determined by the state court. In re Microage Corp., 288 B.R. 842 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2003).
- 11.4.ll State participation in adversary proceeding may waive sovereign immunity. The debtor requested by motion a determination that its debt to the state was not discharged. The state opposed on the ground that the request required an adversary proceeding, which the debtor filed and the state answered. The state filed a motion for summary judgment and later, at the bankruptcy court's request, filed supplemental briefing. It also filed a motion to dismiss on sovereign immunity grounds. The Ninth Circuit rules that a state waives sovereign immunity by participating in litigation. Although the test to determine waiver is a stringent one, the state may not delay to see how the court might rule and only then assert sovereign immunity. Such tactical maneuvering undermines the integrity of the federal judicial system. Arizona v. Bliemeister (In re Bliemeister), 296 F.3d 858 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 11.4.mm Debtor's automatic stay motion does not violate sovereign immunity. The state initiated proceedings against the debtor and its officers for non-payment of pre-petition vacation pay. The debtor brought a motion before the bankruptcy court to determine the scope and applicability of the automatic stay. On appeal, the district court rules that the motion does not violate the state's sovereign immunity. First, the proceeding is not a suit against the state, because the state is not named as a defendant, is not served with process, and is not compelled to appear in federal court. Second, the motion asks the bankruptcy court to exercise its power to determine the scope of a provision based on its jurisdiction over the debtor and its estate, not jurisdiction over the state or other creditors. It is the bankruptcy law, not the court's order, that operates to stay the state's action. In re Midway Airlines Corp., 283 B.R. 846 (E.D.N.C. 2002).
- 11.4.nn Plan injunction implicates sovereign immunity. In 2001, the Bankruptcy Rules were amended to eliminate the requirement of an adversary proceeding to obtain an injunction as part of a plan in chapter 11. Although an adversary proceeding is no longer required, the court rules that a request for a plan injunction against a governmental unit implicates the same sovereign immunity issues that would be implicated by an adversary proceeding. In re Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 273 B.R. 795 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2002).
- 11.4.oo Sovereign immunity does not bar the trustee's use of an actual creditor's claim against a governmental unit under section 544(b). The trustee brought an action against the IRS under section 544(b) for recovery of tax payments that the trustee alleged constituted a fraudulent transfer. The IRS argued that the trustee could not maintain his action in the right of the creditor under section 544(b), because sovereign immunity would have prohibited the creditor from suing the IRS to recover the transfer. The bankruptcy court rules, however, that the express abrogation of sovereign immunity in section 106(b) with respect to section 544(b) should be construed to include the trustee's action here, despite the jurisdictional disability that the actual creditor would otherwise suffer. Liebersohn v. Internal Revenue Service (In re C.F. Foods, L.P.), 265 B.R. 71 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2001).

- 11.4.pp Sovereign immunity does not bar discharge of state taxes. The Ninth Circuit joins the Fourth and the Fifth in ruling that the discharge injunction of section 524(a) applies to claims of a state, including tax claims. Thus, the state as creditor is enjoined and, under the Ex Parte Young doctrine, the debtor may bring an action against the individual tax collector to enforce the discharge injunction, whether or not the state files a proof of claim in the case. What is more, the Tax Injunction Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1341, does not bar either the discharge injunction under section 524(a) or an action for an injunction to enforce the discharge injunction. Goldberg v. Ellett (In re Ellett), 254 F.3d 1135 (9th Cir. 2001).
- 11.4.qq Counterclaim sovereign immunity waiver under section 106(b) is unconstitutional. Section 106(b) provides for waiver of a state's sovereign immunity if the state files a claim in a bankruptcy case. But College Savings Bank v. Florida Prepaid Post-Secondary Education Expense Board, 527 U.S. 666 (1999), held that Congress could not imply a constructive waiver of sovereign immunity based on a state's conduct; the waiver must be voluntary and unequivocal. Applying College Savings Bank here, the First Circuit holds that section 106(b) is an unconstitutional waiver of sovereign immunity, because it provides for an implied waiver based on the state's conduct. Arecibo Community Health Care, Inc. v. Puerto Rico, 244 F.3d 241 (1st Cir. 2001).
- 11.4.rr Filing of proof of claim waives sovereign immunity for same transaction or occurrence. The Ninth Circuit follows the Fourth and Tenth Circuits in holding that the filing by a state government or an arm of the state waives sovereign immunity for counterclaims against the state arising out of the same transaction or occurrence, differing from the Seventh Circuit rule under which the filing of the proof of claim waives immunity only to the extent of defeating the state's claim. In applying the rule, the Ninth Circuit follows the "logical relationship" test of Fed. R. Civ. P. 13(a) to determine what constitutes the same transaction or occurrence, noting that the concept "gets an increasingly liberal construction." In so ruling, the Ninth Circuit does not address whether the filing of a proof of claim might allow for a broader affirmative recovery from the state than for matters arising out of the same transaction or occurrence. Schulman v. California (In re Lazar), 2001 U.S. App. Lexis 490 (9th Cir. 2001).
- 11.4.ss Discharge of debt to state does not implicate 11th Amendment. Four years after bankruptcy, the state sued the debtor. The debtor moved to reopen the case, and the state appeared to challenge reopening and dischargeability. Holding that determinations of dischargeability arise from the court's jurisdiction over debtors, not its jurisdiction over states, and noting the absence of an adversary proceeding in this case in which the state was hailed into court, the Fourth Circuit holds that the bankruptcy court could determine dischargeability without violating the states sovereign immunity under the 11th Amendment. Virginia v. Collins (In re Collins) 173 F.3d 924 (4th Cir. 1999).
- 11.4.tt A State's proof of claim waives sovereign immunity. Relying on Gardner v. New Jersey, 329 U.S. 565 (1947), the Tenth Circuit holds that Section 106(b) is constitutional, so that a state filing a proof of claim waives sovereign immunity with respect to actions against the state arising out of the same transaction or occurrence. In addition, the court holds that all agencies of the state of Wyoming are a single entity for purposes of the Section 106(b) waiver. Wyoming Dept. of Transportation v. Straight (In re Straight), 143 F.3d 1387 (10th Cir. 1998).
- 11.4.uu Discharge of a State's claim does not violate the Eleventh Amendment. In an action by a State that had been removed to federal district court, the debtor raised his discharge and bankruptcy as an affirmative defense. Rejecting the state's Eleventh Amendment argument, the Fifth Circuit holds that using the discharge as an affirmative defense does not violate the Eleventh Amendment. The court leaves open whether a debtor's attempt to enforce the discharge injunction against the state would violate the Eleventh Amendment, but concludes that the mere granting of the discharge does not. State of Texas v. Walker, 142 F.3d 813 (5th Cir. 1998).

- 11.4.vv Dischargeability of a state's claim does not implicate the Eleventh Amendment. The state commenced an adversary proceeding under section 523 to declare a child support claim nondischargeable. Because the state commenced the action, the bankruptcy court was not prohibited from entering judgment against the state holding the claim dischargeable. The debtor did not hale the state into court; the state chose to participate in the bankruptcy case for the benefits it would bring. Dekalb County Division of Family and Children's Services v. Platter (In re Platter), 140 F.3d 676 (7th Cir. 1998).
- 11.4.ww Sovereign immunity assertion is limited. The debtor in possession brought an action against the State to avoid a lien on real property as a preference. Because the action was in rem, it did not bring the State personally before the court or create the risk of imposing personal liability on the State. Therefore, the principles of sovereign immunity enunciated in Seminole Tribe v. Florida, 516 U.S. 44 (1996), did not apply. O'Brien v. Vermont (In re O'Brien), 216 B.R. 731 (Bankr. D. Vt. 1998).
- 11.4.xx State's assertion of sovereign immunity upheld. The State of Maryland filed a proof of claim for sales and withholding taxes. The trustee counterclaimed for preference recovery for payment of income taxes. The Fourth Circuit permitted the State to assert Eleventh Amendment immunity for the first time on appeal, held unconstitutional the Bankruptcy Code's abrogation of State's sovereign immunity under section 106, permitted compulsory counterclaims against a state that files a proof of claim in a bankruptcy case, and did not reach the issue of whether permissive counterclaims (such as the preference action involved here) could be used to offset the liability of the estate on a proof of claim. Schlossberg v. State of Maryland (In re Creative Goldsmiths of Washington, D.C., Inc.), 119 F.3d 1140 (4th Cir. 1997); Accord, Grabscheid v. Michigan Employment Security Comm'n, 212 B.R. 265 (E.D. Mich. 1997).
- 11.4.yy Sovereign immunity prevents dischargeability determination. The bankruptcy court finds that sovereign immunity and the Eleventh Amendment protect a state educational institution from defending a complaint to determine the dischargeability of a student loan. Rose v. U.S. Department of Education (In re Rose), 214 B.R. 372 (Bankr. W.D.M.O. 1997).
- 11.4.zz Sovereign immunity does not vitiate binding effect of confirmation order. The plan provided for the transfer of all property to a liquidating trust, which was to sell the property for the creditors, free of any stamp or transfer tax. Though the State had notice of the plan, it did not object. It was bound by the plan, despite its later assertion of sovereign immunity. State of Maryland v. Antonelli Creditors' Liquidating Trust, 123 F.3d 777 (4th Cir. 1997).

12. PROPERTY OF THE ESTATE

12.1 Property of the Estate

- 12.1.a Cryptocurrency deposits are property of the estate. The cryptocurrency debtor operated an "earn" program, under which customers would "loan" stablecoin to the debtor, who could then hypothecate it as part of its business model, and the customer would earn crypto assets based on the amount and duration of the deposits. To participate in this program, the customer had to agree, on the debtor's website, to the clickwrap terms of service. The terms of service provided that the customer grants the debtor all right and title to the digital assets, including ownership rights. A clickwrap contract is effective to bind the parties if there is assent, consideration, and intent to be bound and if the terms are conspicuous on the website. The contract here met those terms and so was valid and enforceable. Because the terms transferred title and ownership to the debtor, the stablecoin became property of the estate when the debtor filed its chapter 11 petition. The characterization of the transaction as a loan of stablecoin does not change the result. A loan of money or property to another creates a debtor-creditor relationship. And perfection of a security interest in the loaned assets requires filing a financing statement under the U.C.C., which was not done here. Therefore, the assets are property of the estate. In re Celsius Network LLC, ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Jan. 4, 2023).

- 12.1.b A claim for aiding and abetting a principal’s fraud against the debtor is property of the estate. A defrauded Ponzi scheme creditor sued one of the scheme’s major lenders for aiding and abetting the fraud. The trustee had already settled with the lender, asserting, among others, the same kind of claims. A claim that the debtor could have brought becomes property of the estate. The aiding and abetting claim asserts that the lender helped the principal steal from the debtor. The debtor could have brought that claim before bankruptcy. Therefore, it is property of the estate, and the defrauded creditor may not bring it against the lender. Only the trustee may do so. Ritchie Special Credit Invs., Ltd. v. JPMorgan Chase & Co., 48 F.4th 896 (8th Cir. 2022).
- 12.1.c
- 12.1.d Trustee’s claim against investment banker is barred by in pari delicto. The debtor used an investment banker to help it raise capital based on some dodgy accounting practices. When the debtor ultimately failed, its chapter 7 trustee sued the banker for fraud, breach of fiduciary duty, and aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty. Section 544(a) gives the trustee the rights of a hypothetical judicial lien creditor. A judicial lien creditor could execute on all the debtor’s assets, including claims it might have against third parties. However, a debtor’s claim for fraud or breach of fiduciary duty is subject to the in pari delicto defense, under which a debtor may not recover against a wrong-doer when the debtor itself was part of the wrong-doing, that is, in equal (or greater) fault. A judicial lien creditor suing the third party would be subject to all defenses the third party would have against the debtor, including the in pari delicto defense. The trustee is similarly subject to the defense. Anderson v. Morgan Keegan & Co., Inc. (In re Infinity Bus. Group, Inc.), 31 F.4th 294 (4th Cir. 2022).
- 12.1.e Liquidation trustee has standing to defend appeal even after termination of the trust. The confirmed plan established a litigation trust with a limited life, vested causes of action in the trust, and continued the automatic stay to protect the trust. After the trust terminated, former shareholders brought an action in the bankruptcy court that belonged to the trust. The trustee sought sanctions, which the bankruptcy court granted and the shareholders paid. The shareholders appealed. An appellate court does not have jurisdiction over an appeal unless both parties have standing. An appellee must show an ongoing interest in the dispute. Although the trust had terminated, the trustee had the payment from the shareholders and still had an obligation to return trust property to the beneficiaries. Therefore, even though the trustee lacked wind-up power, he had an interest in defending the appeal, which gives him standing. Kreit v. Quinn (In re Cleveland Imaging and Surg. Hosp., L.L.C.), 26 F.4th 285 (5th Cir. 2022).
- 12.1.f Liquidation trustee may continue litigation after trust terminates if trust agreement so provides. The confirmed plan established a liquidation trust to prosecute claims against third parties. The trustee brought the claims; the court denied motions to dismiss, and the litigation was in discovery. After the filing of the complaint and the motions to dismiss but before the court’s denial of the motions, the trust terminated by the terms of the trust agreement. However, the trust agreement also provided that after termination, “for the purpose of liquidating and winding up the affairs of the Liquidation Trust, the Liquidation Trustee “shall continue to act as such until its duties have been fully performed.” Because the trust agreement requires the trustee to continue to act after the trust terminates, and because the trustee has not “fully performed” his duties while litigation remains pending, the trustee retains standing to prosecute litigation that he commenced before termination. Therefore, the court denies the defendants' motion to dismiss the litigation. Energy Conversion Devices Liquidation Trust v. Ovonyx, Inc. (In re Energy Conversion Devices, Inc.), 634 B.R. 537 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2021).

- 12.1.g Lender is liable for concealment, excessive fees, breach of loan agreement, and fraud. After a new lender's due diligence over several months, the debtor entered into replacement financing facility with the new lender, comprising an accounts receivable factoring and an inventory line of credit. Within months, the lender declared a default over a minor, curable breach and began reducing availability under the lines. Though availability remained, the lender represented otherwise to the debtor and refused to advance, despite continuing to collect all the debtor's receivables. The lender also took over payment of the debtor's payables, dictating which vendors would be paid. The lender also charged excessive fees that were not authorized by the credit agreement and refused to disclose the charges to the debtor. The lender then promised to restore availability if the debtor's principal pledged his homestead but reneged after receiving the pledge. The lender then terminated the agreements but continued to collect all receivables, even after internal documents showed that the debtor's obligations had been satisfied in full. All the while, the lender's internal emails showed malice and an intent to destroy the debtor's business. The debtor filed a chapter 11, but the business failed. The principal and the chapter 7 trustee sued the lender under multiple theories. The lender breached the credit agreements by withholding the debtor's accounts receivable collections and demanding that the debtor continue to send new receivables to the lender even after termination of the agreement. The breaches caused the loss of the debtor's legacy business; the lender was liable to the debtor for its value. It also caused the loss of an anticipated future business line, and the lender was liable for that value too. When a lender takes excessive control over a business, it becomes a fiduciary and owes a duty of transparency and loyalty. Here, the lender breached those duties. The lender also defrauded the debtor by misrepresenting the lack of availability under the credit lines and concealing information about fees and charges, which were not authorized. The court holds the lender liable for breach of contract and breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing, fraudulent misrepresentation, the tort of contractual and business interference, and willful automatic stay violations (to the extent the withholding of collections occurred after the petition date). Bailey Tool & Mfg. Co. v. Republic Bus. Credit, LLC (In re Bailey Tool & Mfg. Co.), 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 3502 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. Dec. 23, 2021).
- 12.1.h Court explains proper disposition of unclaimed creditor distribution. The bank failed to record the mortgage but filed a proof of claim. The trustee avoided the unrecorded mortgage and sold the real property. The trustee issued a check to the mortgagee, but the mortgagee never cashed it. After 90 days, the trustee stopped payment under section 347(a) and deposited the funds into court. After five years, the clerk, under 28 U.S.C. 2041, deposited the funds with the U.S. Treasurer in the name and to the credit of the court. The debtor then sought recovery of the unclaimed funds. In a status of custodial escheat, the funds are not abandoned property under section 554 and remain property of the estate. Section 2041 provides that moneys paid into court may be paid to "the rightful owners." Section 2042 prohibits money deposited under section 2041 to be withdrawn except by court order and permits payment to a claimant "entitled thereto" upon "full proof of the right thereto." Although the funds remained property of the estate, the mortgagee is not deemed to have abandoned its claim. The survival of the mortgagee's claim prevents the case from being a surplus case, with funds being paid to the debtor under section 726(a)(6). Therefore, upon the mortgagee's proper proof of entitlement to the funds, the trustee will be required to pay them to the mortgagee. In re Pickett, ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 2203 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. Aug. 11, 2021).
- 12.1.i Bank may force management change if authorized under the loan agreement. The debtor defaulted on its loans. The bank agreed to amendments, but required a personal guarantee from the principal and the installation of a CRO. After further defaults, the debtor and guarantor handed the CRO full authority over the business. Yet the borrowers remained in default. A forbearance agreement then reaffirmed the validity of the debt, confirmed there were no valid defenses to enforcement, and waived all claims against the bank. After still more defaults, the lenders accelerated and foreclosed and called the guaranty. Ratification recognizes a contract as valid, having knowledge of all relevant facts. A guaranty that has been ratified cannot be avoided due to duress or fraudulent inducement. Duress exists only upon a threat to do something without a legal right, an illegal exaction or fraud, and an imminent restraint that destroys free agency. The bank had the right to take action, including demanding management change, under the loan agreements, the amendments, and the forbearance agreement. Therefore, it did not act illegally in exercising its leverage and in enforcing the guarantee. Lockwood Int'l, Inc. v. Wells Fargo, N.A., ___ Fed. Appx. ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 24385 (5th Cir. Aug. 16, 2021).

- 12.1.j Litigation funder's lien on personal injury action proceeds did not survive bankruptcy. Before bankruptcy, the debtor obtained financing to pursue a personal injury tort action. Under New York law, a personal injury action is not assignable, but proceeds are. The debtor assigned and granted a security interest in the proceeds of the action to the financier. The debtor filed a chapter 7 petition before obtaining a judgment in the action. The financier filed a proof of secured claim. The trustee settled the action, and the financier claimed the proceeds. Property of the estate includes all the debtor's interests in property, notwithstanding applicable nonbankruptcy law to the contrary, so the action became property of the estate. Under section 541(a)(6), proceeds of the action became property of the estate only when received. Before that, the proceeds did not exist. The assignment of future proceeds operates only as a future lien and does not relate back to the assignment date. Therefore, the debtor's prepetition assignment and grant of a security interest in the action's proceeds was ineffective to vest in the financier any rights that survived the filing of a bankruptcy petition, and the proceeds became property of the estate, unencumbered by the financier's claimed interests. In re Reviss, 628 B.R. 386 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2021).
- 12.1.k Fraudulent debtor's payoff of secured loan does not give rise to aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty claim. The debtor borrowed substantial amounts from the bank to acquire and construct real property, which collateralized the bank's loans. The debtor was also borrowing from investors, without disclosing the debtor's precarious financial state and fraudulent activities. With numerous judgments against it and the bank pressing for payment, the debtor sold the property for about half of the bank's appraised value and paid the bank off. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the bank for aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty and for conspiracy to breach fiduciary duty, based on the debtor's managers' bargain sale of the property. A claim for aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty requires showing a breach, the defendant's actual knowledge of the breach, and the defendant's substantial assistance in the breach. Substantial assistance involves affirmative help or failure to act when required to do so, enabling the breach to occur. Mere inaction will not suffice. The trustee did not allege any facts showing the bank knew of the debtor's total debts and that if the property had been sold for more, other creditors could have been paid. The trustee also did not allege the bank took any action to assist the breach, only that it was protecting itself in collecting a legal, secured debt in the face of a borrower that it knew was defrauding other creditors. A conspiracy claim requires showing a conspiracy between two or more people, an unlawful act, an overt act in pursuit of the conspiracy, and damage. Here, the trustee alleged the breach of fiduciary duty as the unlawful act. Because the trustee failed to allege the bank knew of the breach of fiduciary duty, the trustee's conspiracy claim also fails. Dillworth v. Amerant Bank, N.A. (In re Bal Harbour Quarzo, LLC), 623 B.R. 903 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2020).
- 12.1.l Funds used to purchase a cashier's check remain property of the debtor until the check is finally honored. The debtor's officer drew a cashier's check on the debtor's bank account. The debtor's owner asserted fraud and demanded the bank stop payment on the check, which the bank did and retained the funds in a suspense account at the bank. Before ownership of the funds was resolved in state court litigation among the parties, the debtor filed bankruptcy. Property of the estate includes all interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case. A debtor retains an interest in funds in its bank account against which a check has been drawn until the check is honored. For fraudulent transfer avoidance purposes, the debtor's purchase of a cashier's check, which transfers funds from the debtor's account to the bank's, is not an "initial transfer," and the bank is a mere conduit. Similarly here, the purchase of the cashier's check did not render the bank the transferee of the funds the check represented, which remained property of the debtor until the check was finally honored. Gould v. BOKF, N.A. (In re Artfolio LLC), 618 B.R. 29 (Bankr. W.D. Ok. 2020).

- 12.1.m Trustee may abandon estate causes of action to a creditor. Before bankruptcy, the debtor conspired with its law firm and a creditor to transfer assets so that a major creditor could not reach them. The major creditor sued all three. The major creditor sued the law firm and the other creditor to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers and for damages for breach of fiduciary duty and aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty and the fraudulent transfers. Two months later, the debtor filed a chapter 7 case. The trustee settled with the two creditors, releasing the estate's claims against the first creditor and agreeing not to interfere with the major creditor's claims against the first creditor or others. The trustee abandoned other claims of the kind that the major creditor brought. Constitutional standing requires injury in fact fairly traceable to the defendant's conduct that a favorable decision would likely redress. It differs from statutory authority to pursue a claim, which is not constitutional standing but relates only to which entity a statute authorizes to assert a claim. Here, the major creditor had constitutional standing to bring the claims, but the bankruptcy deprived it of authority to bring them, vesting them in the estate, because they assert a generalized injury to all creditors, not a personal, particularized injury just to the major creditor. The trustee may abandon estate causes of action, causing them to revert back to the prior holder. Since the major creditor owned the claims before bankruptcy, the trustee's abandonment of the claims revested them in that creditor, who then had statutory authority to continue to assert them. Artesanias Hacienda Real S.A. de C.V. v. N. Mill Cap., LLC (In re Wilton Armetale, Inc.), 968 F.3d 273 (3d Cir. 2020).
- 12.1.n Pennsylvania gaming license is not property of the debtor under PUFITA. The state granted the debtor a gaming license, for which the debtor paid $50 million. A few years later, the state revoked the license when the debtor did not meet certain maintenance requirements. After the debtor filed a bankruptcy case, the trustee sued the state to recover for the revocation as a fraudulent transfer. The Pennsylvania Gaming Act provides that a gaming license is "a privilege, conditioned upon the proper and continued qualification of the licensee," bars the transfer of the license, and prevents the formation of a property interest by precluding any entitlement to a license. The Pennsylvania UFTA permits a creditor to avoid a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property. It defines property as anything that may be the subject of ownership, including the right to possess a thing. However, because the license is a revocable, conditional, and nontransferable privilege, it cannot be subject to ownership and therefore is not an interest of the debtor in property. Therefore, the trustee could not avoid the revocation of the license as a fraudulent transfer. Phila. Entertainment and Devel. P'ners v. Commonwealth (In re Phila. Entertainment and Devel. P'ners), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 180199 (E.D. Pa. September 30, 2020).
- 12.1.o State law, not federal common law, determines property rights. The FDIC took over a failed bank. Its parent corporation filed bankruptcy. The trustee filed a tax refund request with the IRS, which issued the refund. The refund was due to losses the bank, not the parent, suffered, so the FDIC as the bank's receiver claimed the refund, relying on In re Bob Richards Chrysler-Plymouth Corp., 473 F.2d 262 (1973), in which the court fashioned a federal common law rule to determine entitlement to a tax refund among corporate group members. However, under Butner v. U.S., 440 U.S. 48 (1979), property rights in bankruptcy are determined by state law, unless a federal interest requires otherwise. More generally, federal courts are not free to fashion federal common law rules except in areas in which a federal interest predominates. There is not such federal interest in determining which member of a corporate group receives a tax refund. Therefore, the court must look to state law, including any applicable tax allocation agreement, to determine entitlement. Rodriguez v. Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp., 589 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 714 (2020).

- 12.1.p A dishonored cashier's check from the debtor's account remains property of the debtor. The debtor's president caused the debtor's bank to issue a cashier's check to herself, which she deposited in her own account at another bank. Believing the withdrawal to have been fraudulent, the debtor's majority owner promptly canceled the president's signature authority over the bank account and demanded the bank stop payment on the check. The bank did so, and the president's bank returned the funds represented by the check to the debtor's bank, which held the funds in a suspense account pending resolution of the disputes. The debtor filed bankruptcy years later after the state court ruled in the president's favor. Ordinarily, a check does not transfer funds in a debtor's bank account until the check clears the account. A cashier's check differs, because the account is debited upon issuance of the check. However, where the check is later reversed, and, as in this case the bank does not claim an interest in the funds, the funds remain in the debtor's account and are therefore property of the estate. Gould v. BOKF, N.A. (in re FDV Artfolio LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 994 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. Apr. 10, 2020).
- 12.1.q Avoidance actions are property of the estate. The debtor conducted a combined Ponzi/pyramid scheme. New participants received an invoice from the debtor for their "membership" fees, but most paid the invoice directly to the existing participant who recruited them, and the existing participant's account with the debtor was debited by the amount of payment. After bankruptcy, the trustee obtained an order determining net winners and net losers based on total cash in/cash out from each participant, regardless of whether the participant had paid the debtor directly or had paid the recruiting participant. The trustee then brought preference and fraudulent transfer actions against net winners. A group of net losers brought a class action against net winners for unjust enrichment. The trustee sought to enjoin that action. The trustee's avoidance actions are property of the estate. Section 362(a)(3) stays any act to exercise control over property of the estate. Therefore, the class plaintiffs' attempt to reach the same proceeds in the hands of the net winners violates the automatic stay and should be enjoined. Darr v. Dos Santos (In re Telexfree, LLC), 941 F.3d 576 (1st Cir. 2019).
- 12.1.r Substantive consolidation motion requires notice to nondebtors' creditors. The trustee moved to consolidate the debtor's estate with nondebtors who were related to the debtor and were possible fraudulent transfer recipients. The trustee did not give notice of the motion to the nondebtors' creditors. Nondebtors' creditors should be afforded just as much, if not more, notice than the debtor's creditors, because consolidation would directly affect their rights. Consolidation is an equitable order to achieve fairness to all creditors, so the bankruptcy court can hear from them to ensure fairness. Therefore, notice to creditors of the target entities is required. Leslie v. Mihranian (In re Mihranian), 937 F.3d 1214 (9th Cir. 2019).
- 12.1.s Direct injury claim to former CEO is not property of the estate. The debtor's former CEO claimed the debtor's principal secured lender, through its control of the board and the debtor's funding, caused the debtor to fire him prepetition. The dismissal entitled him to severance payments, which the debtor could not pay. After bankruptcy, the debtor settled with the lender, releasing all claims against the lender. The former CEO later sued the lender in state court for recovery of his severance payments. Where an act directly injures the debtor, the claim for damages is property of the estate, which any other person indirectly or derivatively injured by the act may not bring. By contrast, a direct injury claim that does not involve any harm to the debtor is not property of the estate and may be brought by the creditor or other party in interest that the act harmed. Even if the act also harms the debtor, as long as the third party's injury is not derivative of the debtor's injury, the third party may independently bring a claim. Here, the former CEO's injury of loss of severance payments did not depend on injury to the debtor; he was injured independently by the lender's act. Therefore, the claim is not property of the estate, and the CRO may bring it. Meridian Cap. CIS Fund v. Burton (In re Buccaneer Res., L.L.C.), 912 F.3d 291 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 12.1.t Shareholder derivative action is property of the estate. After chapter 11, the debtor corporation's sole shareholder sued a competitor for damages under the Ohio RICO statute, which expressly permits a party “directly or indirectly” injured by corrupt conduct to sue for damages. Ordinarily, a shareholder may not sue directly for damages to a corporation but may sue only in a derivative action in the name of the corporation. In authorizing an action by a party indirectly injured, the Ohio legislature did not intend to supplant this body of corporate law. The shareholder could sue only derivatively, as the claim for damages under the Ohio RICO statute belonged to the corporation. Because it belonged to the corporation, upon the corporation’s bankruptcy filing, the claim became property of the estate. The shareholder’s lawsuit was an act to obtain possession or control of property of the estate and so violated the automatic stay. Lowe v. Bowers (In re Nicole Gas Prod., Ltd.), 916 F.3d 566 (6th Cir. 2019).

- 12.1.u Court may grant creditors derivative standing in a chapter 7 case. The chapter 7 trustee agreed to sell the debtor’s causes of action against managers and other insiders and the estate’s causes of action to avoid and recover fraudulent transfers to creditors who had been pursuing similar lawsuits before bankruptcy. Sections 548 and 544(b) authorize the trustee to bring avoiding power claims. The Court of Appeals had previously ruled that a bankruptcy court may authorize a chapter 11 creditors committee to bring such claims derivatively on behalf of the estate in certain circumstances, such as when “the Code’s envisioned scheme has broken down.” The same rationale applies in a chapter 7 case. As in a chapter 11 case, section 503(b)(3)(B), which authorizes compensation to a committee acting on behalf of the estate, applies in a chapter 7 case and recognizes and rewards the practice, as long as the court has previously authorized the action. The court’s equitable powers exist equally in chapter 7, and the public policy goals in a chapter 11 case of maximizing creditor recoveries and equality of treatment are the same in a chapter 7 case. Claridge Assoc., LLC v. Schepis (In re Pursuit Cap. Mgmt., LLC), 595 B.R. 631 (Bankr. D. Del. 2018).
- 12.1.v Post-bankruptcy death terminates debtor’s joint tenancy and deprives trustee of interest in property. On the petition date, the debtor owned real property in joint tenancy with his wife with right of survivorship. Before the trustee sold the debtor’s interest in the property, the debtor died. Applicable non-bankruptcy law applies to determine property interests unless some federal interest requires otherwise. Federal law does not include any property ownership rules; state law governs ownership of property of this kind. Under state law, upon death, the full ownership of the property vests in the wife under the right of survivorship. That divests the estate of any further interest in the property. Cohen v. Chernushin (In re Chernushin), 911 F.3d 1265 (10th Cir. 2018).
- 12.1.w Corporate officers do not have a fiduciary duty to advise a board against the board’s direction. Based on pressure from federal and state regulators and advice from its counsel, the debtor bank holding company’s board of directors determined to support its bank operating subsidiaries, whatever the effect on the holding company. The holding company received a large tax refund, which it invested in the bank. The holding company’s officers did nothing to inform the board about alternative uses of the refund and whether an early bankruptcy filing might preserve the refund for the holding company and its creditors. Ultimately, the bank failed and was taken over by the regulators. The holding company filed bankruptcy. The trustee sued the officers for breach of fiduciary duty for failing to investigate alternatives for the refund and how it might help the holding company and to inform the board of the alternatives. A claim for breach of fiduciary duty requires the existence of a fiduciary relationship, a breach of the resulting duty, and harm to the beneficiary. A corporate officer is a fiduciary to the corporation. Their duties are determined under agency law, which requires an agent to provide the principal with complete information. However, the duty is not absolute. If the principal (here, the board), after due consideration, directs a course of action, the agent need not provide information to the principal that does not support that course of action nor hire experts to second-guess the principal’s decision. Accordingly, the court dismisses the complaint. Levin v. Miller, 900 F.3d 856 (7th Cir. 2018).
- 12.1.x Directors do not violate duty of loyalty by declaring a dividend to all shareholders two years before insolvency. The Delaware LLC debtor suffered an insured accident, which destroyed the equipment that made the debtor competitive. Its directors, who also served as directors of its parent and were either members or representatives of members of the parent, determined to accept an insurance settlement and change their business model, rather than use the insurance proceeds to rebuild the equipment. Within months, they authorized distributions from the debtor to its parent, which authorized distributions to its members. Over the two years following the decision to accept the insurance settlement, the debtor lost money, opened a credit line with a new lender, and ultimately failed and filed bankruptcy. The creditors' committee sued the directors for breach of fiduciary duty. Under Delaware law, fiduciary duty includes the duties of care and of loyalty, exercised in good faith. A director breaches the duty of loyalty if the director has a conflict of interest and would stand to benefit from a decision in a way not shared by all shareholders or if the director acts in bad faith, which is conduct worse than gross negligence and involves a decision that cannot be understood as in the corporation's interest. A wholly-owned subsidiary exists to serve its parent, and its directors owe no duty to the subsidiary other than what the parent directs, unless the subsidiary is insolvent. Here, the directors did not have a conflict, because their actions, though benefitting themselves, benefitted all shareholders (members) equally. Nor did insolvency two years later affect the directors' duties when they made their decisions, because the debtor was not yet in financial trouble. The court dismisses the claims against the directors for breach of the duty of loyalty. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Meltzer, 589 B.R. 6 (D. Me. 2018).

12.1.y LLC debtor's trustee may not recover tax refunds paid after bankruptcy to LLC members.

Before bankruptcy, the debtor LLC distributed cash to its members to pay their taxes for two calendar years on the income of the LLC. As a pass-through entity, the LLC's income was attributed to the members for tax purposes. After bankruptcy, the members filed amended tax returns, seeking and obtaining a refund of the amounts paid for those two prior years. The trustee sued the members to recover the refunds either by turnover under section 542 as property of the estate or based on a conversion theory. Because the LLC distributed the cash before bankruptcy, the cash was not property of the estate. The LLC was not a tax-paying entity; all its income and expenses were attributed to its members, and it is not entitled to file a return or claim a refund. Therefore, the tax refunds do not belong to the estate, and the members' amendments to their prior returns did not effect a conversion. The Finley Group v. Roselli (In re REDF Marketing, LLC), 589 B.R. 534 (Bankr. W.D.N.C. 2018).

12.1.z Court recognizes limits on a shareholder's and vice president's duties of care and loyalty.

The debtor's principal investor and majority shareholder served as a director and vice president but was not involved at all in the operation or management of the business and had no particular duties as vice president. However, in the beginning, she authorized someone to start and operate the business. She did not actively supervise or manage him or the business operations. The business failed as a result of his mismanagement, self-dealing, and dishonesty. A majority shareholder does not owe fiduciary duties to a corporation, only to minority shareholders in dealings at the shareholder level. A vice president is a fiduciary who owes a duty of care, good faith, and loyalty to the corporation, but without specific duties delegated to the vice president in the operation and management of the corporation, a vice president does not breach those duties by inaction. A director owes a duty of care, good faith, and loyalty to the corporation. A failure to supervise and to take reasonable steps to inform oneself may constitute a breach of the duty of care. Therefore, the court dismisses the trustee's claims against the investor as shareholder and vice president, but not as director. Geltzer v. Bedke (In re Mundo Latino Market Inc.), 590 B.R. 610 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2018).

12.1.aa Court measures directors' breach of duty of loyalty to insolvent corporation by benefit to creditors, not shareholders or corporation.

The directors approved an LBO that rendered the debtor insolvent. The transaction benefitted the directors as shareholders to the same extent as other shareholders, but creditors ultimately suffered. The trustee sued them for breach of fiduciary duty. A director owes a duty of due care and loyalty, which includes a duty of good faith, to the corporation and its shareholders. However, when the corporation becomes insolvent, the creditors become the residual beneficiaries of the duty. "Because the duty of loyalty compels directors to maintain ‘an undivided and unselfish loyalty to the corporation[,]’ Guth v. Loft, Inc., 5 A.2d 503, 510 (Del. 1939) (emphasis supplied), a director of an insolvent corporation is interested in a transaction if he or she receives a personal benefit not shared by all of the insolvent corporation’s creditors.” Therefore, the complaint adequately alleges that the directors breached their duty of loyalty. In re Tribune Co. Fraudulent Conveyance Litigation, ___ B.R. ___ (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 23, 2019).

- 12.1.bb Insurance policy proceeds are property of the estate when insufficient to pay insured claims. The debtor operated a bus, which crashed, killing nine passengers and injuring numerous others. It had minimal assets but a $5 million insurance policy. Some claimants reached quick settlements with the insurer, which would have exhausted policy limits; others filed an involuntary petition against the debtor to prevent the settlements. Property of the estate includes all of the debtor’s interests in property. Thus, the policy itself is property of the estate. However, when policy proceeds are not payable to the debtor, they generally are not property of the estate, unless policy limits are insufficient to cover all claims under the policy. In those “limited circumstances,” the proceeds are property of the estate so that the bankruptcy court can oversee their distribution. Martinez v. OGA Charters, L.L.C. (In re OGA Charters, L.L.C.), 901 F.3d 599 (5th Cir. 2018).
- 12.1.cc Where debtor may consent to release of funds from escrow, debtor retains an interest in escrowed funds. The creditor asserted a claim against the debtor arising out of a real property transaction. The creditor and the debtor established an escrow to hold the property sale proceeds while they litigated the issue. The escrow instructions provided for release upon the agreement of the parties or a court order and for transfer to the court’s registry after a certain date. The transfer occurred, but the terms of release remained the same. The court ruled for the creditor, and the clerk released the funds to him. The debtor filed a bankruptcy petition less than 90 days later. The trustee may avoid a transfer to a creditor of an interest of the debtor in property made within 90 days before the petition if certain other conditions are met. When a debtor deposits money in escrow that is subject to release upon specified conditions, the debtor has divested a sufficient interest in the funds so the release is not a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property. But where the debtor has the right to consent to the release, the debtor retains an interest. As a result, the release here was a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property and subject to avoidance as a preference. Coulson v. Kane (In re Price), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109190 (D. Haw. June 29, 2018).
- 12.1.dd Determination of attachment of PACA trust requires true sale analysis of factoring agreement. The debtor produce dealer factored its accounts. Under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, the debtor held the produce it purchased and their proceeds (accounts receivable from its customers) in trust for its grower suppliers. However, the trust assets are no longer held in trust if the debtor sells them in a commercially reasonable manner. Here, the growers claimed that the debtor’s factoring arrangement was not a true sale of its accounts receivable but a secured lending arrangement. Because PACA releases the trust on assets only upon sale, the court must determine whether the factoring arrangement was a true sale or a secured lending arrangement. In doing so, the court should not be guided by the labels the parties use in the agreement but should apply a transfer-of-risk test to determine whether the accounts receivable were truly sold. S & H Packing & Sales Co. v. Tanimura Distrib., Inc., 883 F.3d 797 (9th Cir. 2018).
- 12.1.ee The debtor holds unclaimed (escheat) funds in trust, and they do not become property of the estate. At the petition date, the debtor held unclaimed property that was scheduled to escheat to the state. The state treasurer filed a proof of claim for the funds but did not pursue the claim further before plan confirmation and did not object to confirmation. After the plan effective date, the treasurer sought to recover the funds. Under applicable state law, the debtor held the funds as trustee for the true owner. The funds did not become property of the estate. The treasurer is entitled to the funds, also as a trustee for the rightful claimants, and so is not a creditor whose rights are cut off by plan confirmation. Oklahoma State Treasurer v. Linn Operating, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52890 (S.D. Tex. March 29, 2018).

- 12.1.ff First chapter 11 court may determine whether property transferred from old to new debtor is property of the estate in second chapter 11 case. The old debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan under which it retained real property subject to a mortgage. The plan permitted the reorganized debtor to sell or refinance the property only if the proceeds were sufficient to pay all allowed claims in the case. The court retained jurisdiction over the reorganized debtor and the property until full consummation to restrain interference with the plan or its execution and “to determine any dispute arising in connection with the interpretation, implementation, execution or enforcement of the Plan.” The reorganized debtor defaulted on the mortgage. Shortly before the foreclosure sale, it transferred the property to a new debtor, who filed a chapter 11 case in a different judicial district. The mortgagee filed a proceeding in the old district to reopen the case and to enforce the plan by voiding the transfer of the real property to the new debtor without satisfaction of the mortgage as having violated the plan. A court may retain post-confirmation jurisdiction over matters that have a close nexus to the plan if the plan provides for retention of jurisdiction. The proceeding in the old district required the court to determine whether the real property remained property of the reorganized debtor or was properly transferred. The court properly retained jurisdiction to do so. Until the court determined that issue, it was unclear whether the real property was property of the new bankruptcy estate and therefore whether the automatic stay applied to the mortgagee’s actions against the property, including the action to reopen the old case. Therefore, the court denies the debtor’s motion in the new case to enforce the automatic stay against the mortgagee’s action in the old case. MLMT 2005-MCP1 Washington Office Properties, LLC v. Olympia Office LLC (In re Olympia Office LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30548 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 26, 2018).
- 12.1.gg Assignment of rents that is enforceable under nonbankruptcy law excludes rents from the estate. The debtor owned rental real property. As additional collateral for its loan, it assigned rents to the lender. The lender granted the debtor a license to collect and retain rents until default, at which time the license would automatically terminate. The debtor defaulted, the lender began foreclosure proceedings, and the debtor filed bankruptcy. Under applicable nonbankruptcy law, the assignment is effective to transfer title, not just a security interest in the rents, until the debt is paid. Property of the estate includes all the debtor’s interests in property. Because the debtor no longer had any interest in the rents after the default, the rents did not become property of the estate. Town Center Flats, LLC v. ECP Comm’l II LLC (In re Town Center Flats, LLC), 855 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 2017).
- 12.1.hh In a derivative standing case, issues based on knowledge depend on the debtor’s, not the suing creditor’s, knowledge. The court granted a creditor derivative standing to pursue breach of fiduciary duty claims on behalf of the estate against directors and officers. The creditor had previously sued the defendants in its own right. The defendants raised a statute of limitations defense that was based on time the creditor learned of the facts giving rise to the claim. However, because the creditor asserted the claim on behalf of the estate, which derived from property of the debtor, the statute of limitations analysis depends on when the debtor, not the creditor, learned of the facts. Eugenia VI Venture Holdings, Ltd. v. MapleWood Holdings LLC (In re AMC Inv., LLC), 551 B.R. 148 (D. Del. 2016).
- 12.1.ii Under California law, directors’ duties do not shift upon insolvency. The liquidating trustee’s complaint alleged that the closely held California debtor’s directors used the debtor’s assets to purchase interests in unrelated businesses for themselves, disregarded the debtor’s deteriorating financial condition, failed to supervise business transactions so that the terms were deeply unfavorable to the debtor and failed to claim available tax refunds, all leading to the debtor’s ultimate failure and substantial loss for the debtor and its creditors and shareholders. Under California law, a director owes duties of due care, loyalty and good faith. Based on recent California appellate court authority, the court concludes that California courts would follow Delaware law and general modern jurisprudence on interpretation of these duties: the duties and their beneficiaries do not change upon the corporation's insolvency, though creditors obtain standing to pursue claims against directors for breach of these duties if the corporation is insolvent. The trustee may bring them on behalf of creditors. The trustee adequately pleaded self-dealing and utter disregard of corporate duties. The defendants' motion to dismiss is denied as to most claims. Solution Trust v. 2100 Grand LLC (In re AWTR Liquidation, Inc.), 548 B.R. 300 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2016).

12.1.jj Officer is self-interested if her employment and compensation is subject to control by one whose interests are adverse to the corporation. The debtor's controlling shareholder proposed that the debtor acquire another company the shareholder owned. A committee of independent directors approved the acquisition, after which the controlling shareholder appointed a junior target company employee as the debtor's chief financial officer and ultimately controlled her continued employment and compensation. The shareholder later proposed that the debtor pay an annual management fee to another of the shareholder's companies for work it performed for the debtor. The independent directors committee approved the first year's payment. On the debtor's CFO's recommendation, the committee approved the second year's payment, subject to year-end review of actual expenses the affiliate incurred. At the review, the CFO advocated for payment of a substantial increase over the first year's fee. The Committee approved the increase without independent adviser review or advice. An officer owes a fiduciary duty of due care and loyalty to the corporation. The business judgment rule protects the officer from a claim for breach of the duty of due care if the officer was not self-interested in connection with the action. Self-interest may arise not only from a direct financial interest in the action but also where the officer's employment and compensation are subject to the control of a person whose interests are adverse to the corporation. Because the CFO's employment and compensation were subject to the ultimate shareholder's control, her advocacy of the increased management fee payment was self-interested, and she was not entitled to the benefit of the business judgment rule. Spizz v. Eluz (In re Ampal American-Israel Corp.), 543 B.R. 464 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2016).

12.1.kk In bankruptcy of "stored value card" seller, card sale proceeds are not subject to a trust in favor of the card issuer. The debtor retail store chain sold "stored value cards," which the purchaser could use like cash at other stores not related to the debtor. Intermediary companies issued the cards and collected sale proceeds from the debtor. The debtor's lender swept the debtor's cash accounts daily, but the debtor either retained sufficient proceeds from the card sales, or was advanced sufficient amounts by the lender, to pay the intermediary issuers for the cards. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor had inadequate cash to pay for cards it had sold. The issuer sued in the bankruptcy court to impose a trust on all the debtor's assets to pay for the unpaid cards, citing both the issuer's agreement with the debtor and state money transmitter statutes, which impose a trust on card sale proceeds and, if the proceeds are commingled with other money, on "all commingled money and other property." The statutory language imposes a trust only on commingled money and commingled other property, not on all other property. If it imposed a trust on non-commingled property, it would apply in a bankruptcy case only to the extent not inconsistent with federal law. The Bankruptcy Code looks first to state law to determine the debtor's interest in property but determines priorities among creditors without reference to state law. Section 545 provides a general template to determine whether a state statute granting a lien or a trust interest is really a disguised priority. If the state-created right arises only on bankruptcy or insolvency or is invalid against a bona fide purchaser, the trustee may avoid it as a disguised state-created priority. Even where the right is not avoidable, the trust may apply only to assets that can be traced to the assets on which the state statute imposes the trust, based on applying general tracing rules such as the lowest intermediate balance rule. In this case, because the debtor's lender swept the card sale proceeds daily, the trust account's lowest intermediate balance was zero. Therefore, none of the estate's assets are subject to the trust, and the issuer's claim is a general unsecured claim. Blackhawk Network, Inc. v. Alco Stores, Inc. (In re Alco Stores, Inc.), 538 B.R. 383 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2015).

12.1.ii In pari delicto* doctrine is a defense to the faithless servant doctrine. The corporate debtor and several of its officers and senior employees were convicted in a kickback scheme. The trustee sued an employee who participated in the scheme but who was not convicted to recover all the employee's compensation and legal fees the debtor incurred associated with the criminal investigation. The faithless servant doctrine allows an employer to recover compensation paid to an employee who acts contrary to the employer's interest. The in pari delicto doctrine prohibits a wrong-doer from recovering damages from another wrong-doer in the same scheme. An employee acts as the employer's agent; agency law imputes the agent's acts and knowledge to the principal. Under New York's broad interpretation of the in pari delicto doctrine, the only exception to the doctrine is the adverse interest exception—where the employee totally abandons the employer's interests and acts entirely for his or her own purposes. The adverse interest exception does not apply where the employee's actions benefit both the employee and the employer. (In pari delicto allows a corporation's claim against a controlling insider who breaches a fiduciary duty to the corporation, but it does not admit of a general "insider" exception.) And the faithless servant doctrine is not an exception. Therefore, the trustee may not pursue the faithless servant claim against the employee. Flaxer v. Gifford (In re Lehr Constr. Corp.), 551 B.R. 732 (S.D.N.Y. 2016).

12.1.mm Malpractice claim against individual chapter 11 debtor's attorney is property of the estate under the "accrual" test. An inexperienced attorney represented the individual chapter 11 debtor. The attorney's inexperience led to several failures, including failure to list valuable assets on the debtor's schedules, to obtain permission to use cash collateral, and to file a confirmable plan. The debtor also improperly transferred property of the estate during the chapter 11 case. The court awarded the attorney fees during the case but eventually converted the case to chapter 7. After conversion, both the debtor and the trustee sued the attorney for malpractice. Section 1115(a)(1) provides that property acquired during an individual chapter 11 case and before conversion is property of the estate; by implication, property acquired upon or after conversion is property of the post-bankruptcy debtor. A malpractice claim is property of the estate if it arises before conversion. In a bankruptcy case, to determine when a claim arises, courts have used the "accrual" test, measuring when the claim accrues; the "conduct" test, based on when the wrongful conduct that ultimately causes harm occurred; and the "prepetition relationship" test, which modifies the conduct test to require a prepetition relationship to permit the debtor to identify and notify potential claimants. The issue typically comes up in the context of a claim against the debtor, because determining when a claim arises matters for the automatic stay and discharge. The policies behind those provisions counsel for a broad reading of when a claim arises, making the accrual test less appropriate. But in determining when a claim by the debtor or the estate arises, those policies do not predominate. The accrual test is an appropriate means to determine when property becomes property of the estate, because it focuses on whether the alleged wrongful conduct harmed the estate. A tort claim typically accrues when the defendant's wrongful conduct causes harm. Here, the loss of assets, the payment of the attorney's fees, and the failure of plan confirmation all harmed the chapter 11 case before conversion, so the malpractice claim is property of the estate. Cantu v. Schmidt (In re Cantu), 784 F.3d 253 (5th Cir. 2015).

12.1.nn Escrowed funds for professionals and unsecured creditors from a credit-bidding secured creditor are not property of the estate. All the debtor's assets, including its cash, were subject to the secured lender's lien. The debtor in possession sold all its assets, including its cash, to the secured lender under a credit bid of about 90% of the secured debt. The secured lender agreed before bankruptcy to put funds into escrow to pay the DIP's professional and, to settle an unsecured creditors committee objection to the sale, to fund into escrow a small distribution to unsecured creditors. The sale resulted in a large, administrative priority capital gain tax. The government objected to the sale and to the distribution of the escrowed funds to professionals and unsecured creditors and appealed the sale order, seeking payment of its tax claim from the escrowed funds. If the escrowed funds are property of the estate, section 507(a)'s priority rules might apply to their distribution. Section 541(a)(6) includes as property of the estate "proceeds ... of or from property of the estate." Because the purchase resulted in all the estate's cash being transferred to the secured creditor, and because the payments were not given as consideration for the purchased assets, the cash the secured creditor placed into escrow for the sole benefit of the professionals and the unsecured creditors was not proceeds of the sale or property of the estate. LCI Holding Co., Inc., 802 F.3d 547 (3d Cir. 2015).

12.1.oo Court denies claim for deepening insolvency but permits claim for asset diversion that increased the debtor's liabilities without corresponding asset value increase. The principals had loaned the debtor money, which had been used to fund the debtor's sole asset, a German subsidiary that manufactured the debtor's product. When the debtor encountered financial trouble, the principals offered to loan more and raise equity. Management preferred a third-party proposal, but that would have required the principals to subordinate their existing loans, which they refused to do. Ultimately, the debtor accepted the principals' proposal. One of the principals funded the full amount he had promised; the other did not. And they raised only additional debt financing, not equity. The debtor transferred the loaned funds to the insolvent German subsidiary to keep it afloat. The funding principal owned a potential customer of the debtor and used his position with the debtor to divert inventory of the German subsidiary for the benefit of the customer. Ultimately, the debtor and its German subsidiary failed. The trustee sued the debtor's principals for breach of fiduciary duty, alleging that the debtor lost enterprise value and incurred debt as a result of these events and that the debtor suffered from the principal's asset diversions. A fiduciary duty breach claim requires proof of causation and damages. A loss in enterprise value, even for an insolvent debtor, might constitute damages, because it might reduce amounts available for creditors or prevent a successful reorganization. Here, however, the principals' loan proposal did not breach their fiduciary duty and cause loss of enterprise value, because they had no duty, fiduciary or otherwise, to subordinate their existing loans to permit the third-party transaction, so the debtor had no alternative. Incurrence of additional debt does not constitute damages, because upon incurring the debt, the debtor typically receives assets (usually cash) of equal value. Therefore, the new loan does not deepen the debtor's insolvency or cause damage. However, diversion or waste of assets can breach fiduciary duty and cause damages. Here, the trustee adequately alleged that the lending principal caused the diversion and waste of assets. Therefore, the court denies the principals' motion to dismiss the trustee's complaint. Wirum v. Goel (In re Signet Solar, Inc.), 532 B.R. 70 (N.D. Cal. 2015).

12.1.pp Social media accounts are property of the debtor. An individual entrepreneur in Texas started a business that ultimately filed chapter 11. During the business's operation, the entrepreneur created a Facebook page and a Twitter account using the business's name. The accounts had thousands of followers. Upon confirmation of a plan that transferred control of the business to a minority shareholder, the entrepreneur refused to transfer the social media accounts on the ground that they were his personal property, not property of the business. However, the evidence showed that the accounts were used primarily, almost exclusively, to promote the business. Section 541(a)(1) includes in property of the estate all of the debtor's interests in property, wherever located, as of the commencement of the case. Texas courts have not yet resolved whether a social media account is a property interest, though other states' courts have. Like subscriber and customer lists, social media accounts provide valuable access to customers. Therefore, they are property and are property of the estate. The court orders the entrepreneur to turn over the accounts to the reorganized debtor. In re CTLI, LLC, 528 B.R. 359 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2015).

- 12.1.qq Ponzi scheme victim who had escrow agreement with debtor may trace funds to establish constructive trust. The New York debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. In one transaction, it agreed to hold funds in escrow for a seller and buyer of assets. It had not disbursed the funds before bankruptcy. The seller, who was entitled to the funds under the escrow agreement, filed a secured claim in the bankruptcy case. Under New York law, an escrow requires delivery of property to a third party, who is to deliver it to the grantor or the grantee upon the performance of an act or the occurrence of an event. Title to escrowed funds remains in the grantor until the act or event and then immediately vests in the grantee. The escrow holder holds only a legal interest as trustee. Under section 541(d), the escrowed property does not become property of the estate. A secured claim is a claim secured by property of the estate. Therefore, neither escrow party has a secured claim against the debtor. An escrow party may impose a constructive trust on escrowed property only if it is specifically identifiable, such as by being held in a segregated account or by being traceable. Although, out of fairness to all other victims, a Ponzi victim's right to trace is severely limited, a victim who was the beneficiary of a specific escrow agreement may be permitted to trace. Alarmex Holdings, LLC v. Gowan (In re Dreier LLP), 527 B.R. 126 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 12.1.rr Claim becomes property of the estate when it accrues under nonbankruptcy law. The individual chapter 11 debtors retained an inexperienced attorney to represent them. The attorney did not seek cash collateral use authority, did not adequately advise the debtors to schedule some valuable assets, and filed an unconfirmable plan. The court approved $200,000 in fees during the case but ultimately ordered the case converted to chapter 7. After conversion, the debtors and the chapter 7 trustee both sued the attorney for malpractice. The case against the attorney settled, but the debtors and the trustee each claimed the settlement proceeds. In an individual chapter 11 case, section 1115(a) provides that any property the debtor acquires during the case and before conversion is property of the estate. A debtor acquires a cause of action when it accrues, that is, when both wrongful conduct and legal injury have occurred. This test differs from the tests, such as the "conduct" and "prepetition relationship" tests, under section 101(5) used to determine when a claim against the debtor arises, because of the bankruptcy policies of allowing all possible claims to share in the bankruptcy distribution and providing the debtor the broadest possible fresh start. In this case, legal harm occurred when the estate was depleted by the use of cash collateral and the dissipation of unsecured assets and the payment of fees for an unqualified attorney, which harmed the estate before conversion. Therefore, the malpractice claim belongs to the estate. Cantu v. Schmidt (In re Cantu), 784 F.3d 253 (5th Cir. 2015).
- 12.1.ss Debtor's voting rights in LLC are property of the estate. The debtor was a member and the manager of an LLC, with a majority of the voting rights but without any share of profits or losses. All interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case become property of the estate. State law determines whether an interest is property; federal law determines whether it is property of the estate. State LLC law here provides that an LLC member need not have any economic rights to be a member, but a member's economic rights may include any economic right, not just an interest in profits and losses. The debtor's rights as the manager with majority voting control included economic rights such as the right to award incentive compensation and indemnification. But whether or not the debtor's rights included economic rights, non-economic rights also become property of the estate. Therefore, the debtor's voting rights are property of the estate. Walro v. The Lee Group Holding Co, LLC (In re Lee), 524 B.R. 798 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. 2014).
- 12.1.tt Creditors must allege insolvency adequately to sue director for breach of fiduciary duty. A single shareholder owned the holding company that was the debtor's sole owner. The shareholder was the sole director and the chief executive officer of the holding company and of the debtor. The plan created a liquidating trust and vested it with claims against the holding company and the shareholder. The liquidating trustee sued both for breach of fiduciary duty, alleging that the shareholder had severely mismanaged the debtor, causing its ultimate insolvency, failure, and chapter 11 filing. A subsidiary's director has an obligation to manage the subsidiary only in the parent's best interest, regardless of the effect on the subsidiary, because a parent forms a subsidiary for the parent's benefit. A shareholder may bring a breach of fiduciary duty claim derivatively against directors or officers if the corporation is solvent; a creditor may bring such a claim if the corporation is insolvent. Similarly, if the subsidiary is insolvent, then the directors might be liable to the corporation for managing the corporation solely for the parent's benefit. In this case, the complaint did not adequately allege the subsidiary's insolvency. Therefore, the court dismisses the claim. Lightsway Litigation Servs., LLC v. Yung (In re Tropicana Entertainment, LLC), 520 B.R. 455 (Bankr. D. Del. 2014).

- 12.1.uu Escrowed funds are not property of the estate. The debtor's agreement to sell real property required the debtor to place funds in escrow, to complete three stages of improvements to the property, and to receive payment from the escrow upon each phase's completion. If the debtor did not timely complete an improvement phase, the buyer could notify the debtor of its intention to complete the improvements itself, after which it could receive payment from the escrow of completion costs, with the balance going to the debtor. The debtor did not complete any of the phases before another creditor filed an involuntary petition against it. Nonbankruptcy law determines whether the debtor has an interest in property; section 541(a) determines whether any such interest becomes property of the estate. State law here limits an entity's interest in funds the entity has placed into escrow for a specific purpose if the purpose has not yet been achieved. Applying this rule, any claim the debtor might have against the escrowed funds is property of the estate, but the escrowed funds are not. Here, the debtor had not completed any phase of the improvements, so it had no claim against the escrowed funds. LTF Real Estate Com, Inc. v. Expert S. Tulsa, LLC (In re Expert S. Tulsa, LLC), 522 B.R. 634 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2014).
- 12.1.vv Successor liability claim is property of the estate. Before bankruptcy, the debtor sold substantially all its operating assets to an unrelated company. At the time, the debtor and the purchaser were aware of potential personal injury claims against the debtor. Ten months later, the debtor filed a bankruptcy case. The trustee asserted fraudulent transfer claims against the purchaser. The trustee and the purchaser settled; the trustee released the purchaser from all claims that were property of the estate. Later, class action plaintiffs brought an action under a successor liability theory against the purchaser as a mere continuation of the debtor's business. Claims that benefit all creditors generally are property of the estate; claims that are particular to certain creditors are not. The successor liability remedy is an equitable means of expanding the assets available to satisfy creditor claims. Although the personal injury claims here are particular to the members of the plaintiff class, the only basis on which they may assert those claims against the purchaser is on a successor liability theory. If the purchaser were liable to the debtor's creditor under that theory, then it would be liable to all creditors, for the benefit of all creditors. Therefore, the class plaintiffs' claims against the purchaser are property of the estate that the trustee released in the settlement with the purchaser. In re Emoral, Inc., 740 F.3d 875 (3d Cir. 2014).
- 12.1.ww Claim to a share of marital property not awarded before bankruptcy is a prepetition claim. The divorce court had not issued a decree for equitable distribution of the couple's property when the husband filed bankruptcy. Under applicable divorce law, a spouse does not have a right to share in the marital property until the divorce court enters a divorce judgment. A claim is a right to payment, whether or not reduced to judgment, liquidated, contingent, unmatured, disputed, legal or equitable. Upon the divorce filing, each spouse has a contingent, unliquidated and perhaps unmatured, disputed equitable claim against the other for a share of the marital property. Here, before divorce and before his bankruptcy, the husband held the valuable marital property, which became property of his bankruptcy estate. The wife therefore had a prepetition claim against his bankruptcy estate for her share of the marital property. In re Ruitenberg, 745 F.3d 647 (3d Cir. 2014).

- 12.1.xx A right to appeal a judgment defensively is property of the estate. A creditor obtained a sanctions judgment against the debtor before bankruptcy. The debtor appealed and later filed bankruptcy. The trustee proposed to sell the debtor's right to appeal as property of the estate. Section 541(a) looks first to state law to determine what is property, then to federal law to determine if it is property of the estate. State law here defines property as every species of valuable right and interest. The right to request a higher court to review a lower court's judgment and reduce claims against the debtor and its property is a valuable right that could be used to reduce a claim against the estate. Therefore, it is property of the estate that the trustee may sell. Croft v. Lowry (In re Croft), 737 F.3d 372 (5th Cir. 2013).
- 12.1.yy Property of the estate includes the debtor's management authority over an LLC, despite contrary state law. The debtor was a managing member of a Virginia LLC. The debtor filed a chapter 13 petition, which was dismissed 22 days later. Virginia law provides that an LLC interest is personal property and that upon an LLC member's bankruptcy, the member retains the economic interest but loses any management authority over the LLC. Nevertheless, while the case was pending, the debtor authorized the LLC to file a bankruptcy. After the chapter 13 case was dismissed, the debtor and the other managers ratified the prior managers' action in authorizing the LLC filing and re-authorized it. Section 541(a) includes in property of the estate all of the debtor's interests in property as of the commencement of the case. Section 541(c) overrides any nonbankruptcy law restriction on transfer of property to the estate. Therefore, despite the debtor's chapter 13 filing, his entire LLC interest, including his management authority, became property of the estate. Section 349(b)(3) provides that upon dismissal of a case, property of the estate reverts in the entity in whom it was vested as of the commencement of the case. Its effect is to undo all of the effects of the filing and to restore, to the extent possible, property to the position in which it was held at the commencement of the case. Here, the dismissal reverted the entire LLC interest in the debtor, who was then fully authorized to exercise management authority and to ratify the managers' prior actions. Therefore, the LLC petition was properly authorized. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. In re Virginia Broadband, LLC (In re Virginia Broadband, LLC), 498 B.R. 90 (Bankr. W.D. Va. 2013).
- 12.1.zz Provisional credit funds on an uncollected check are property of the debtor. The debtor title company received a check for its client trust account from a fraudulent borrower to pay a loan. The debtor deposited the check with its bank, which issued a provisional credit to the debtor. The debtor issued payment to the lender based on the provisional credit. The check bounced, and the bank charged back the debtor's trust bank account. The chargeback depleted all the debtor's funds, rendering it insolvent, and resulting in its bankruptcy. The trust account had other funds at the time of the chargeback, which remained at the time of bankruptcy. The funds included other clients' trust funds and fees owed to the debtor. The estate sued the lender to recover the entire payment as a fraudulent transfer. The estate may avoid and recover a transfer of property of the debtor made without receiving reasonably equivalent value in exchange if the transfer left the debtor with unreasonably small capital. The transfer here clearly left the debtor with unreasonably small capital, and the debtor did not receive reasonably equivalent value by payment of the lender's claim, because only the borrower, not the debtor, had an obligation to the lender. The trust account portion representing fees owed to the debtor was property of the debtor, and the other clients' trust funds were held in trust and not property of the debtor. A trust is created upon an express declaration of trust and conveyance of and vesting of title to property in the trustee. Because the check bounced, the borrower never conveyed property to the debtor, and the bank did not intend to create a trust. So the debtor did not hold the provisional credit funds in trust. Under U.C.C. § 4-210, the bank has a security interest in the check (an item) and its proceeds.

The check self-liquidated upon collection of the check. Proceeds includes whatever is acquired upon sale or other disposition of collateral. The bank's provisional credit to the debtor was not proceeds of the check. Therefore, the bank did not have a security interest in the provisional credit funds in the trust account, and the funds were unencumbered property of the debtor. As a result, the debtor's transfer to the lender was a fraudulent transfer that the estate could avoid and recover. The White Families Cos. v. Slone (In re Dayton Title Agency, Inc.), 724 F.3d 675 (6th Cir. 2013).

12.1.aaa Nondebtor parent's postpetition revocation of its own subchapter S status is not an avoidable transfer. A qualified subchapter S corporation (QSub) is not treated as a separate taxable entity, and its income and losses are passed through to its ultimate owner. A corporation may be a QSub only if its parent corporation is a subchapter S corporation. As of the petition date, the debtor was a QSub, and its nondebtor parent was a subchapter S corporation that was wholly owned by an individual, who reported all the debtor's income and losses on his own income tax return. After bankruptcy, the individual revoked the parent's S-corp status, resulting in the debtor's loss of its QSub status. Section 541(a) defines property of the estate very broadly, including the right to receive a future economic benefit, but it does not create new property rights unless some federal interest requires a different result, nor does it include an interest beyond the debtor's interest in property as of the commencement of the case. It does not extend to anything just because it would bring the estate value, and it does not override statutory rights of third parties. The Internal Revenue Code does not create any property rights but attaches federally defined consequences to state law-created rights. But the IRC addresses the treatment of tax attributes in bankruptcy, so it governs the characterization of entity tax status as a property interest for bankruptcy law purposes. A corporation's shareholder has the sole and unfettered right to determine the corporation's S-corp status. Moreover, an S-corp cannot transfer or monetize its S-corp status. It revokes automatically upon a transfer of shares to a disqualifying entity. Therefore, S-corp status is not property. If it were property, it is property of the shareholder, not of the debtor or the estate. In the course of its opinion, the court questions the validity of In re Prudential Lines, Inc., 928 F.2d 565 (2d Cir. 1991), which ruled that a parent's worthless stock deduction that would eliminate a debtor in possession's net operating loss carryover violated the automatic stay. The Majestic Star Casino, LLC v. Barden Dev., Inc. (In re The Majestic Star Casino, LLC), 716 F.3d 736 (3d Cir. 2013).

12.1.bbb Fourth Circuit applies in pari delicto defense to a trustee. The Ponzi scheme debtor's principal had complete management and control of the debtor. The assignee of the debtor's bankruptcy trustee, on behalf of the estate, sued the debtor's stockbroker on various tort claims, including aiding and abetting fraud and breach of fiduciary duty. Under section 541(a), the estate acquires only the debtor's interests in property as of the commencement of the case. Any tort claim that the debtor would have had against its stockbroker would have been subject to the in pari delicto defense, that is, that the law will not provide a remedy as between two wrongdoers. While recognizing the equitable pull of the trustee's argument as an innocent assignee for the benefit of defrauded creditors, the court rules that the statute requires application of the defense. The adverse interest exception vitiates the defense if the person acting on the debtor's behalf was acting adversely to the debtor's interest, but the sole actor exception makes the adverse interest exception inapplicable if the person were the only person controlling the debtor. Here, the assignee's complaint alleged that the perpetrator was the only person in control of the debtor in carrying out the Ponzi scheme, so the adverse interest exception does not apply. Grayson Consulting, Inc. v. Wachovia Secs., LLC (In re Derivium Cap. LLC), 716 F.3d 355 (4th Cir. 2013).

12.1.ccc Property of the estate includes payments for postpetition violation of a prepetition employment contract. The debtor entered into a three-year employment contract, which guaranteed his compensation for the entire period. One year later, he filed bankruptcy. The next day, his employer terminated his employment. He sued to recover the remaining two years' compensation. Property of the estate includes all interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case, including a contingent interest under a prepetition contract. However, it does not include earnings for services that the debtor actually performs postpetition. Here, the debtor did not perform any postpetition services; rather, his right to compensation existed as of the commencement of the case, independent of whether he performed services. Rather, the claim against the employer vests in the estate, which has the sole standing to assert it. A dissent argues that the employer prevented the debtor from performing the services, thereby injuring the debtor and giving him standing to assert the claim. Longaker v. Boston Scientific Corp., 715 F.3d 658 (8th Cir. 2013).

12.1.ddd Tracing fictions may not separate property from property of the estate if the trust fund contains only victims' funds. The statutes and regulations governing futures commission merchants and investment advisors require that they segregate customer funds. The debtor was both. It segregated funds in bulk. That is, its customer funds were invested in a common securities pool, rather than being segregated for each customer. As it sunk into financial trouble, it breached its segregation requirements and diverted segregated customer funds to its own lender. Shortly before bankruptcy, it transferred some of the remaining segregated funds to a customer. Property of the estate includes all of the debtor's interests in property as of the commencement of the case. It does not include property in which the debtor holds only bare legal title as trustee, such as segregated funds. Where the defendant has commingled or dissipated trust funds, a trust beneficiary is subject to common law tracing requirements as a condition to keeping funds from becoming property of the estate. Where a beneficiary cannot trace assets directly, it may apply a tracing fiction, such as the first in, first out or the lowest intermediate balance rule, to separate trust property from the wrongdoer's own property. However, the tracing fictions do not apply if the only funds in the trust account are beneficiary funds, because the issue is not allocation between the victims and the wrongdoer but between similarly situated victims. Therefore, unless the beneficiary can actually trace specific property, the remaining property in the trust is property of the estate. Grede v. FCStone, LLC, 485 B.R. 854 (N.D. Ill. 2013).

12.1.eee Claim retention under a plan requires express, specific reference. Two of the debtor's directors, who were also creditors, claimed during the case that the debtor in possession or the creditors committee should pursue state law claims against the other directors for breach of fiduciary duty and against the debtor's counsel. Neither did so. The debtor's chapter 11 plan provided that the reorganized debtor would retain "any claims ... that the Debtors or the Estate may hold against any entity ... under Chapter 5 of the Bankruptcy Code or any similar provisions of state law, or any other statute or legal theory." The disclosure statement said that the reorganized debtor "may be potential plaintiffs in other lawsuits, claims, and administrative proceedings" and would "continue to investigate potential claims". Neither specifically mentioned claims against the directors or the law firm. A reorganized debtor or a successor may retain a claim after confirmation only if the plan or the disclosure statement expressly, specifically and unequivocally provides for its retention and enforcement, so that creditors have notice and can determine whether the plan resolves matters to their satisfaction. Otherwise, the reorganized debtor or its successor loses standing to bring the claim. A general reference to all causes of actions or claims belonging to the debtor or the estate is inadequate. The reservation in this case was not specific. Therefore, the reorganized debtor lacked standing to bring the claim. Wooley v. Haynes & Boone, L.L.P. (In re SI Restructuring Inc.), 714 F.3d 860 (5th Cir. 2013).

12.1.fff An LLC operating agreement provision for dissolution upon a member's bankruptcy filing is unenforceable under section 541(c)(1). The debtor held membership interests in a family LLC, whose principal purpose was to own and maintain a family farm. The LLC operating agreement did not impose any obligations on the members but permitted the members to select or remove the manager, approve a sale of another member's interest and continue the LLC if there was a dissolution. The operating agreement provided for automatic dissolution if a member became a debtor in bankruptcy. Dissolution requires the manager to liquidate the LLC's assets and changes the members' ability to make decisions during the winding up phase. Section 365 applies only to an agreement under which the parties' obligations are so far unperformed that failure of one to complete performance would excuse the other's performance. Section 365 prevents modification or termination of rights under an agreement because of a party's bankruptcy. The debtor has no obligations under the operating agreement here, so section 365 does not apply. Section 541(c)(1) provides that the debtor's property becomes property of the estate despite any provision in an agreement or applicable law that is conditioned on the commencement of a bankruptcy case and effects "a forfeiture, modification, or termination of a debtor's interest in property". The dissolution provision in the LLC agreement deprives the debtor and the estate of the prepetition debtor's full panoply of economic and noneconomic rights by requiring the LLC's liquidation and limiting the members' management rights. Therefore, the dissolution provision is unenforceable. Sheehan v. Warner (In re Warner), 480 B.R. 641 (Bankr. N.D. W. Va. 2012).

12.1.ggg A right to appeal a judgment defensively is property of the estate. A creditor obtained a sanctions judgment against the debtor before bankruptcy. The debtor appealed and later filed bankruptcy. The trustee proposed to sell the debtor's right to appeal as property of the estate. Section 541(a) looks first to state law to determine what is property, then to federal law to determine if it is property of the estate. State law here defines property as every species of valuable right and interest. The right to request a higher court to review a lower court's judgment and reduce claims against the debtor and its property is a valuable right. Therefore, it is property of the estate that the trustee may sell. Croft v. Lawry (In re Croft), 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 174240 (W.D. Tex. Dec. 12, 2012).

12.1.hhh Substantive consolidation should be used to ensure the equitable treatment of creditors. The parent debtor owned units in a condominium project; the subsidiary managed the project. The two debtors shared directors and officers. The parent has only four creditors, including the owners' condominium association, and was solvent by about $9.6 million. The subsidiary has only one creditor, the association, arising from a state court judgment for $450,000 for actual and punitive damages for conversion related to misappropriated management fees and was insolvent by about $450,000. The same individuals control both entities, represent themselves as acting on behalf of both and do not distinguish the capacity in which they were acting. The parent advanced over $900,000 to the subsidiary without proper documentation, and the parent later converted the intercompany loan to a capital contribution. However, the debtors maintain separate bank accounts and file separate tax returns. They are engaged in different businesses, and there is no evidence that any creditor (including the association) was confused about the identity of the debtor with whom it was dealing. Substantive consolidation is an equitable doctrine that permits a bankruptcy court to disregard corporate forms so that they may not "be used to defeat public convenience, justify wrong or perpetrate fraud" and where necessary to ensure the equitable treatment of creditors. Here, there is only one active creditor, and no creditors would be harmed by consolidation, because the combined estates would be sufficient to pay all claims and leave a surplus for the debtor. Based on this record, the bankruptcy court should consider whether the factors favoring substantive consolidation apply and whether the equitable treatment of all creditors is served by consolidation. First Owners Assoc. v. Gordon Props., LLC (In re Gordon Props., LLC), 478 B.R. 750 (E.D. Va. 2012).

12.1.iii Sections 541(c) and 524(g) permit transfer of insurance policies to an asbestos trust, despite antiassignment provisions. The debtor proposed a plan that provided for transfer to an asbestos trust of $600 million by settling liability insurers and of $500,000 in cash, a promissory note for $1.25 million and a claim against another asbestos trust by the reorganized debtor and for the debtor's assignment to the trust of liability insurance policies issued by nonsettling insurers, despite antiassignment provisions in the policies that are enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Congress may preempt state law expressly, through a statute's express language or through its structure and purpose, or by implication, where it is impossible to comply with both state and federal requirements or where compliance with state law requirements interferes with Congress's purpose in the federal statute. Section 541(c) provides that "an interest of the debtor in property becomes property of the estate ... notwithstanding any provision in an agreement, transfer instrument, or applicable nonbankruptcy law ... that restricts or conditions transfer of such interest by the debtor." The insurance policies thus became property of the estate. The plan appoints the asbestos trust as the estate's representative. Therefore, there is no separate transfer to the trust that the antiassignment provisions would implicate. In addition, enforcement of the antiassignment provisions would prevent accomplishment of Congress's purpose in enacting section 524(g) to deal with asbestos cases. Therefore, there is implied preemption as well. Motor Vehicle Cas. Co. v. Thorpe Insulation Co. (In re Thorpe Insulation Co.), 677 F.3d 869 (9th Cir. 2012).

- 12.1.jjj Only the trustee may pursue a successor liability claim. The debtor law firm filed bankruptcy. Most of its partners decamped to four other firms, taking their clients and business with them. The firm's partnership agreement provided for retirement pay for retired partners, payable only by the firm or by "a partnership which may fairly be considered a successor partnership of the Partnership by reason of continuity of personnel and clients". A group of retired partners sued the four firms on a successor liability theory. A claim against a third party on a successor liability theory that does not allege particularized harm to the plaintiff but could be brought by any creditor of the debtor belongs to the estate, not to any creditor. This principle is based on the policy of vesting the estate with exclusive standing to pursue certain kinds of claims to prevent a race to the courthouse among creditors. If the four other law firms were a successor to the debtor, they would be liable to all creditors for all claims against the debtor. Therefore, the claim belongs only to the estate, and the retired partners do not have standing to bring it. Retired Partners of Coudert Bros. Trust v. Baker & McKenzie LLP (In re Coudert Bros. LLP), 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 168492 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 12, 2012).
- 12.1.kkk In pari delicto* bars trustee's action against the debtor's auditor. The trustee sued the debtor's auditor for negligence in failing to detect a Ponzi scheme in which the debtor participated. The trustee succeeds to the debtor's rights under section 541(a). Applicable nonbankruptcy law determines the extent of those rights; there is no bankruptcy public policy exception that permits expansion of the debtor's (and hence the trustee's) rights against third parties. Here, applicable nonbankruptcy law gave the auditor an in pari delicto defense to liability. The defense applies to the trustee's action, which must be dismissed. Peterson v. McGladrey & Pullen, LLP, 676 F.3d 594 (7th Cir. 2012).
- 12.1.iii Tax refunds payable to a subsidiary under a tax sharing agreement is property of the parent's estate. The debtor and its bank subsidiary had entered into a tax sharing agreement. The agreement provided that the debtor would act as the subsidiary's agent for purposes of filing tax returns and managing all procedural matters with the IRS and to prosecute and settle any refund claims. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor filed a refund claim for the consolidated group based on carryback of losses that the bank incurred in the most recent tax year. The IRS had not paid the refund as of the petition date. The FDIC was appointed receiver for the bank on the same day as the petition date and later in the receivership repudiated the tax sharing agreement. IRS regulations provide that a parent is the sole agent for members of the consolidated group with authority to act on all tax matters for the group's members. However, the regulation is solely for the IRS's protection. It does not establish an agency relationship, nor determine the relative rights, among a tax group's members, which an agreement among the members may determine. A tax sharing agreement that does not require a refund to be held in trust or placed in escrow for the group members and that requires only that the subsidiary's "share" of a tax refund be paid to the subsidiary within a reasonable period after receipt does not create an ordinary agency relationship under which the parent acts at the subsidiary's direction and control and instead creates a debtor-creditor relationship between the parent and the subsidiary. The absence of any trust or escrow requirement or limitation on the parent's use of a tax refund leads to the conclusion that the agreement created a debtor-creditor relationship. The debtor had the right to the tax refund on the petition date. All of a debtor's interests in property as of the petition date are property of the estate. Therefore, the tax refund was property of the estate. The FDIC's repudiation of the tax sharing agreement after the petition date does not retroactively change the estate's ownership of the asset. Therefore, the FDIC, as the bank's receiver, had only an unsecured claim under the tax sharing agreement. Zucker v. Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp. (In re Netbank, Inc.), 459 B.R. 801 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2010).

12.1.mmm SIFMA's standard form repo agreement effects a sale, not a secured loan. A lender transferred its interest in a loan using the Securities Industry and Financial Market Association's standard form master repurchase agreement. The agreement characterizes the parties as seller and buyer, describes the transaction as a sale, and expresses the parties' intent that the transaction be treated as a sale. The agreement required the seller to repurchase and the buyer to sell the identical securities at the end of the agreement's term, required the seller as custodian to maintain the securities in a segregated account for the buyer and permitted the seller to retain all payments on the securities during the term. If the seller defaulted under the agreement, the buyer's only remedy was to sell the securities in a commercially reasonable manner, apply the sale proceeds to the repurchase price, and pay any surplus to the seller. The explanatory documentation accompanying the form agreement says that the agreement "reflects the understanding of the market as a whole that the repurchase agreements for insolvency law purposes are purchases and sales". A court must construe an agreement as a whole to determine its effect. Here, there is consistent express language of sale and purchase throughout the agreement. The provision permitting the seller to retain distributions included the operative word "sold", and the custodianship provision does not detract from the sale characterization. The limitations on the buyer's remedies upon default is a reasonable contractual provision setting forth the legal consequences of a breach, not something that requires recharacterization of the agreement as a secured loan. Therefore, the agreement effects a sale. Palmdale Hills Prop., LLC v. Lehman Comm'l Paper, Inc. (In re Palmdale Hills Prop., LLC), 457 B.R. 29 (9th Cir. B.A. P. 2011).

12.1.nnn Court upholds security interest in economic value of FCC license. The debtor granted a security interest to the indenture trustee for its bonds in "all FCC License Rights [including] the right to receive monies, proceeds, or other consideration in connection with the sale, assignment, transfer, or other disposition of any FCC licenses ... or any goodwill or other intangible rights or benefits associated therewith", but excluding "any FCC License to the extent ... the Collateral Agent may not validly possess a security interest directly in the FCC License pursuant to applicable federal law". Under the Federal Communications Act, FCC policy determines the extent to which a licensee may grant a security interest in a license. FCC policy prohibits a security interest in a license but not in the proceeds of the sale of a license or "in the private economic value of an FCC license to the extent that such lien does not violate the FCC's public right to regulate license transfers". A license's private economic value is a general intangible under the U.C.C. Therefore, a security interest may attach to that value. Section 552 does not permit a lien on property that the estate acquires after bankruptcy except to the extent the property is proceeds of prepetition collateral. License sale proceeds that the estate acquires after bankruptcy are proceeds of the license's private economic value and therefore are subject to a security interest in the value that the debtor granted before bankruptcy. The value is also subject to the security interest for plan purposes, even when the estate does not sell the license, because the lien on the underlying intangible—the license's value—is valid during the case. Sprint Nextel Corp. v. U.S. Bank N.A. (In re TerreStar Networks, Inc.), 457 B.R. 254 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

- 12.1.000 A narrow D&O policy definition of “Loss” prevents a liquidating trust from recovering from the insurer on a claim against an “absolved” director. The plan vested claims against former directors in a liquidating trust but permitted the trust to collect only from the D&O insurer and prohibited it from collecting from the director. The trust obtained a judgment against the director and sued the insurer, who had refused coverage to the director on the ground that the policy definition of “Loss” did not include the judgment. “Loss” was the amount that “any Insured Person becomes legally obligated to pay on account of each Claim” but excludes “any amount not indemnified by the Insured Organization for which the Insured Person is absolved from payment by reason of any covenant, agreement, or court order.” The plan provision absolved the director, so the policy did not cover the director’s liability for the judgment. U.S. Bank N.A. v. Fed. Ins. Co., 664 F.3d 693 (8th Cir. 2011).
- 12.1.ppp SIPA trustee may not pursue claims belonging to customers. The debtor broker-dealer operated a Ponzi scheme. The debtor became subject to a SIPA liquidation proceeding. The SIPA trustee sued various third parties who had funneled money to the debtor for unjust enrichment, aiding and abetting fraud and aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty, based on their failure to adequately investigate the debtor despite being confronted with indicia of fraud. To have standing, a federal plaintiff must show a concrete and particularized injury in fact that can fairly be traced to the defendant’s conduct and that can be redressed by a favorable decision. A plaintiff must assert his own rights, not those of another. A SIPA proceeding is to be conducted in accordance with the Bankruptcy Code, to the extent it is consistent with SIPA’s provisions, and a SIPA trustee is vested with the same powers as a bankruptcy trustee. Thus, a SIPA trustee succeeds to all causes of action that the debtor had as of the petition date. But under Caplin v. Marine Midland Grace Trust Co., 406 U.S. 416 (1972), a bankruptcy trustee does not have standing to assert claims against third parties on behalf of creditors. SIPA does not generally give a SIPA trustee the status of a bailee of customer property, and even if it did, it does so only with respect to customer property, which does not include claims against third parties. Nor does the trustee’s duty to investigate and report on fraud confer a right to bring claims that the investigation uncovers. To the extent that SIPC advances funds to the trustee to satisfy customer claims, SIPA subrogates SIPC to customer net equity claims, but only to net equity claims. Picard v. HSBC Bank PLC, 454 B.R. 25 (S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 12.1.qqq Security interest in proceeds does not include interest in commercial tort claims that may have damaged the debtor’s business. Before bankruptcy, the debtor granted a security interest in substantially all its assets to its lender. The security interest did not specifically cover commercial tort claims. After bankruptcy, a trustee operated the business. The court approved an adequate protection order for the lender, which granted the lender a replacement lien on all assets. When trustee concluded that reorganization was no longer possible, it engaged a competitor to service the debtor’s accounts, to reduce damages from breach of the debtor’s contracts. The court gave the lender stay relief. The lender foreclosed and sold its collateral to a third party buyer. The buyer later sued the competitor for conversion, interference with contractual relationships, and breach of fiduciary duty. Granting a security interest in a commercial tort claims requires that the claims be described with specificity in the security agreement, so the claim must exist when the parties enter into the security agreement. A security interest may include proceeds, which includes claims arising out of loss of the collateral, but only to the extent of the value derived from the collateral, such as a claim arising from negligence that resulted in destruction of the collateral. General commercial tort claims, however, are not proceeds of collateral. Here, the buyer’s claims were all tort claims arising out of the business. Therefore, the lender did not have a security interest in them, and the buyer did not acquire them when it purchased the lender’s collateral at the foreclosure sale. City Sanitation, LLC v. Allied Wast Servs. of Mass., LLC (In re American Cartage, Inc.), 656 F.3d 82 (1st Cir. 2011).

12.1.rrr Disclosure statement disclosure of post-confirmation claims preserves the reorganized debtor's right to bring them. The debtor's plan provided that the reorganized debtor would retain all claims and causes of action belonging to the estate. The disclosure statement provided more detail, specifying, among other things, that the reorganized debtor might pursue claims against various prepetition shareholders for fraudulent transfers and recovery of dividends. Section 1123(b)(3)(B) permits a reorganized debtor to retain claims after confirmation, but the reorganized debtor may pursue them only if the plan expressly, specifically and unequivocally preserves the right to do so, to put creditors on notice so that they have sufficient information to cast an intelligent vote on the plan. The disclosure statement is the primary means of informing creditors about the plan, so disclosure of retained claims in the disclosure statement suffices. The disclosure need not identify the defendants, only the claims. Here, the disclosure of the existence of the claims against former shareholders, the possible amount of recovery, the basis for the actions and that the reorganized debtor intended to pursue the claims was sufficient to meet the disclosure requirements. Spicer v. Laguna Madre Oil & Gas II, L.L.C. (In re Tex. Wyo. Drilling, Inc.), 647 F.3d 547 (5th Cir. 2011).

12.1.sss Judicial estoppel does not apply against a trustee based on the debtor's nondisclosure of assets. The individual debtor did not disclose a major judgment in his favor in his schedules. The trustee closed the case as a no-asset case. When the trustee learned of the judgment, she reopened the case. The debtor consented to denial of his discharge. After the trustee's notice that assets may become available, creditors holding only about 15% of the debtor's scheduled claims filed proofs of claim, but the debtor's attorney and the trustee asserted large attorneys' fees claims against the estate arising from the judgment and the subsequent proceedings. The trustee attempted to substitute in to the proceeding in which the debtor obtained the judgment. The defendant incurred substantial additional attorneys' fees as a result of the additional proceedings. Judicial estoppel arises when a party intentionally takes a position in later litigation that is inconsistent with a position that a court accepted in earlier litigation. Judicial estoppel therefore bars the debtor from pursuing the judgment or benefiting from it. But the trustee is in a different position. The trustee did not take a position in prior litigation, either in the debtor's schedules or in the nonbankruptcy litigation. As an equitable doctrine, judicial estoppel must be consistent with law. The trustee takes the debtor's assets as they exist as of the commencement of the case. At that time, the debtor had not yet failed to disclose the judgment, so the trustee took the judgment free of any judicial estoppel claim that arose upon the later nondisclosure. Applying judicial estoppel against the trustee would be inequitable, because it would grant a windfall to the defendant based on the debtor's misconduct and deprive the creditors of an asset to which they would clearly be entitled in the absence of the debtor's misconduct. Therefore, the court permits the trustee to pursue the judgment, but only to the extent necessary to pay claims, including administrative expenses, without any surplus being returned to the debtor. Reed v. City of Arlington, 650 F.3d 571 (5th Cir. en banc 2011).

12.1.ttt Debtor's postpetition severance payment is property of his estate. The debtor had an employment contract with his employer as of the petition date. The contract entitled him to a severance payment, which did not increase over time, if the employer terminated his employment within two years after a change in control. To receive the severance, the debtor had to waive claims against the company and be subject to a two-year non-compete. Four months after his bankruptcy, his employer was acquired, triggering his right to severance. The trustee sought turnover of his severance payment. Property of the estate includes property that is rooted in the prebankruptcy past but does not include earnings for postpetition services. Courts construe the exclusion narrowly. The debtor had a contingent right to severance as of the petition date. Although the debtor had to continue working after bankruptcy to receive the payment, the employer's obligation was more an incentive for the debtor to enter into the employment agreement than to continue working. Therefore, the severance did not constitute postpetition earnings. The court, however, pro rates the severance payment between the debtor and the trustee based on the amount of time the debtor worked after bankruptcy relative to the entire time he worked under the contract. In re Jokiel, 447 B.R. 868 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2011).

12.1.uuu Section 108(a) extends adverse possession statute of limitations. A party may acquire title to land by adverse possession if the possession is, among other things, for at least a prescribed period without the true owner's commencement of an action to recover the land from the adverse possessor. In this case, the adverse possessor held a parcel for less than the 10-year period prescribed under applicable nonbankruptcy law. The debtor in possession objected in the bankruptcy court to the adverse possession more than 10 years after the adverse possession began and less than 2 years after the commencement of the chapter 11 case. Section 108(a) gives a trustee an additional two years to commence an action if applicable nonbankruptcy law fixes a period in which an action may be commenced and the period has not expired as of the commencement of the case. Section 108(a) extended the statute of limitations on commencing an action to defeat the adverse possession, and the DIP's objection in the bankruptcy court within two years after the petition date was timely. Jake's Granite Supplies, L.L.C. v. Beaver (In re Jake's Granite Supplies, L.L.C.), 442 B.R. 694 (D. Ariz. 2010).

12.1.vvv Judicial estoppel is a fact-specific, equitable inquiry that may apply against a trustee based on the debtor's nondisclosure of assets. The individual debtor did not disclose a major judgment in his favor as well as other assets in his schedules. The trustee closed the case as a no asset case. When the trustee learned of the judgment, she reopened the case. The debtor consented to denial of his discharge. After the trustee's notice that assets may become available, creditors holding only about 15% of the debtor's scheduled claims filed proofs of claim, but the debtor's attorney and the trustee asserted large attorneys' fees claims arising from the judgment and the subsequent proceedings. The trustee attempted to substitute in to the proceeding in which the debtor obtained the judgment. The defendant incurred substantial additional attorneys' fees as a result of the additional proceedings. Judicial estoppel arises when a party takes a position in later litigation that is inconsistent with a position that a court accepted in earlier litigation, giving the party an unfair advantage or imposing an unfair detriment on the opposing party. Attempting to harmonize three apparently inconsistent prior decisions, the Fifth Circuit applies judicial estoppel to the trustee based on a fact-intensive, equitable analysis. The trustee succeeds to the debtor's claim, with all its attributes, including the potential for judicial estoppel. The creditors are not materially disadvantaged by the application of the doctrine, because their claims would be subject to the payment of the administrative claims of the debtor's and the trustee's lawyers, which were increased only because of the nondisclosure. The defendant was victimized by its increased fees. Therefore, equity requires application of judicial estoppel against the trustee. Reed v. City of Arlington, 620 F.3d 477 (5th Cir. 2010).

12.1.www Alter ego claim does not belong to the estate. The creditors sued the corporate debtor's shareholders, alleging breach of contract and alter ego. If the claim belonged to the debtor and thereby became property of the estate, only the trustee may bring it; individual creditors may not. But the trustee may not bring claims that belong only to creditors, not to the debtor. Under California law, an alter ego claim is strictly procedural, not substantive. An alter ego claim is not general to all creditors but specific to the particular creditor to prevent unfairness and promote justice and equity. A corporation may assert a claim against its shareholders for the benefit of all creditors, but only for injury to the corporation, such as for a stockholder's conversion of corporate assets. However, that is not an alter ego claim. Therefore, any claim that a creditor may have against the shareholders belongs only to the creditors, not to the estate. Ahcom, Ltd. v. Smeding, 623 F.3d 1248 (9th Cir. 2010).

12.1.xxx Creditors do not have derivative standing as to a Delaware LLC. A lender to the parent company sued the managing members of an LLC for breach of fiduciary duty for failing to implement an adequate system of financial controls, for authorizing acquisitions without adequate financial information and for benefiting individually from the acquisitions. Delaware LLC Act section 18-1002 provides, “In a derivative action, the plaintiff must be a member or an assignee or a limited liability company interest at the time of bringing the action” and at the time of the challenged transaction. This phrasing precludes creditor derivative standing against managers of a Delaware LLC. Tracing the history of derivative standing in actions against directors, partners or managers of Delaware non-corporate entities, and the extensive rights that the Delaware LLC Act provides to creditors to allow them to protect themselves by contract and in an LLC agreement itself, the court concludes that the result is neither absurd nor at odds with the underlying policy of the LLC Act. CML V, LLC v. Bax, 6 A.3d 238 (Del. Ch. 2010).

12.1.yyy Proceeds of a postpetition sale of an FCC license is not subject to a prepetition security interest. The Federal Communications Act does not permit transfer, even of a security interest in, a broadcast license. The debtor granted the bank a security interest in the proceeds of the debtor’s FCC broadcast license. After bankruptcy, the trustee attempted to sell the debtor’s license. Section 552 permits a prepetition security interest to attach to property acquired after bankruptcy only if the property is proceeds of property in which the creditor had a security interest as of the date of bankruptcy. Before bankruptcy, the debtor did not have sufficient rights in any future sale proceeds of the license in which it could grant a security interest, because it did not have a contract of sale nor FCC approval of a transfer of the license. Therefore, proceeds of a postpetition license sale are not subject to the bank’s security interest. Spectrum Scan LLC v. Valley Bank & Trust Co. (In re Tracy Broadcasting Corp.), 438 B.R. 323 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2010).

12.1.zzz Lowest intermediate balance rule applies to funds that the debtor holds in a resulting trust. The debtor accepted funds from its affiliates for a pooled investment account. The debtor deposited the funds into its operating account, made appropriate accounting entries to show the affiliates’ increase in their pooled investment account balances but transferred funds to the pooled investment account only when the debtor had excess cash in its operating account. The debtor maintained complete and accurate records of all deposits to and withdrawals from the operating account and the pooled investment account. The affiliates and the debtor at all times treated the affiliates’ investments in the pooled investment account as property of the affiliates, which they could withdraw on demand. Property of the estate includes all interests of the debtor in property as of the petition date. However, under section 541(d), property of the estate does not include property in which the debtor holds only legal title and not an equitable interest, such as where the debtor holds the property in trust. A resulting trust arises where the parties intend a trust, even though they do not expressly establish one. Here, the parties intended the invested property to remain the affiliates’ property and consistently treated it as such. Therefore, the debtor held the affiliates’ funds in a resulting trust. The beneficiary still must identify the trust property when it has been commingled with the trustee’s property. There are two tests, the traditional common law lowest intermediate balance test and the more recent nexus test, which examines whether the property the debtor holds has a connection with the property placed in trust. The nexus test was developed based only on a specific legislative enactment treating withholding taxes as trust funds and therefore does not apply in the more general case of an express or implied trust. The lowest intermediate balance test entitles the beneficiary to the lowest balance in a commingled account between the deposit time and the petition date. Here, the affiliates could not show that the lowest intermediate balance in the operating account, into which their funds had been deposited, ever exceeded the amount of their deposits and so were not entitled to claim the funds as trust funds. The funds were property of the estate. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Catholic Diocese of Wilmington, Inc. (In re Catholic Diocese of Wilmington, Inc.), 432 B.R. 135 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010), reh’g denied, 437 B.R. 488 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).

12.1.aaaa Liability insurance policy proceeds are not property of the estate. The debtor’s liability insurance policy covered a third-party claim against an officer for a “Wrongful Act”. Two creditors alleged that the officer misrepresented the debtor’s legal right to enter into a loan transaction with them and that they suffered loss as a result. They sued the officer in state court, but limited their claim to policy proceeds. Section 541(a) includes as property of the estate all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case. If the debtor could have asserted a claim and the harm to creditors from the wrong is only indirect, through the debtor, then the claim becomes property of the estate. If the claim does not allege harm to the debtor, but only to the creditor, then it is not property of the estate, and the creditor may pursue the claim. The officer made negligent misrepresentations to the creditors; they, not the debtor, suffered harm. The claim therefore is not property of the estate. Insurance policy proceeds are property of the estate only where the debtor has the right to the proceeds. Here, the insurance policy is to insure against wrongful acts committed against third parties, and the insurer's obligation is to pay the parties harmed by the conduct, not to pay the debtor. Accordingly, the proceeds are not property of the estate. Tech. Lending P'ners, LLC v. San Patricio County Cmty. Action Agency, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91800 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 2, 2010).

12.1.bbbb Indenture may not override Article 9 requirement that the debtor retains ownership of funds subject to a security interest. The debtor agreed to deposit all revenues into a Revenue Fund with the bond trustee, who held a security interest in the debtor's net revenues. Money in the Revenue Fund could be used in the debtor's business operations. The bond indenture provided that the debtor did not have an interest in the Revenue Fund. U.C.C. Article 9 applies to any "transaction, regardless of form, that creates a security interest in personal property". Thus, despite the indenture's language, the bond trustee obtained only a security interest in the money in the Revenue Fund. In addition, serious fraudulent transfer questions would arise if the bond trustee acquired ownership of the money without applying it to reduce the debtor's indebtedness. Therefore, the debtor retained the ownership interest in the Revenue Fund. In re Las Vegas Monorail Co., 429 B.R. 317 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2010).

12.1.cccc Directors and shareholder are not liable for approving shareholder loans to failing corporation and for sale of stock that eliminated corporation's NOL's. To avert a going concern qualification in its audited financial statements, the debtor refinanced its debt by borrowing $90 million from its 100% shareholder on market terms. The debtor's independent directors negotiated and approved the transaction, without determining the debtor's solvency, hiring a restructuring professional, seek other financing or consider alternatives. Ten months later, the shareholder sold all its shares and loans for $100,000, taking a tax deduction for its losses and wiping out the debtor's ability to use $700 million in net operating losses. Ten months after that, it filed chapter 11. Directors owe a Delaware corporation a duty of care and of loyalty, which includes the duty to act in good faith and prohibits both self-dealing and failure of oversight. Delaware law gives great deference to management. It permits management of even an insolvent corporation to take steps to continue operations to improve creditor recoveries. Directors are not liable on a "deepening insolvency" theory, even when pleaded as a breach of duty of care. The transactions were fair and on market terms, and the independent directors did not profit personally. Therefore, claims for breach of the duty of care and of the duty of loyalty for approving the loans must be dismissed. A controlling shareholder does not have fiduciary duties to the corporation and may act in its self-interest, unless it causes the corporation to provide value to the shareholder to the exclusion of or detriment to minority shareholders or negates the corporation's independent board's judgment and dictates terms. Here, the stock and note sale did not require board approval, and the board was powerless to stop it. It did not affect other shareholders. It did not breach any duty the shareholder owed to the corporation. As the court notes, the shareholders "lost $90 million. They could have taken their tax losses without the additional losses of $90 million." Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Nat'l Amusements Inc. (In re Midway Games Inc.), 428 B.R. 303 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).

12.1.dddd Sections 541(a)(1) and 541(c)(2) determine the debtor's interest in property as of the petition date. The debtor was the beneficiary under a spendthrift trust, but the debtor was to receive the remainder interest in the trust when he reached a certain age, while his bankruptcy case was still open, free of any spendthrift restrictions. Applicable state law honored the trust's spendthrift clause and prevent the debtor from alienating any interest in the expected remainder interest. Under section 541(a)(1), property of the estate includes all interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case. Section 541(c)(2) enforces a trust's spendthrift provision to the extent it is enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. As of the commencement of the case, section 541(c)(2) protected the debtor's interest. Therefore, the remainder interest did not become property of the estate. Wachovia Bank, N.A. v. Levin, 419 B.R. 297 (E.D.N.C. 2009).

- 12.1.eeee Proceeds of prepetition letter of credit draw are not property of the estate. The debtor obtained insurance policies and secured reimbursement obligations in part by posting letters of credit in favor of the insurer. Before bankruptcy, the insurer drew the letters of credit, applied a portion of the proceeds both before and after bankruptcy to reimburse itself under the policies for claims that it had paid and held the balance to protect itself against claims that were yet to be asserted and paid. Property of the estate includes all interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case. Even though the letter of credit proceeds served to secure the insurer/creditor's reimbursement claims against the debtor, the funds came from the issuing bank, not from the debtor. They did not become the debtor's property as of the commencement of the case because the insurer had drawn the letter of credit before bankruptcy. Therefore, the proceeds were not property of the estate. However, any proceeds in excess of the amount necessary to satisfy all reimbursement obligations would be owed to the estate. S-Tran Holdings, Inc. v. Protective Ins. Co. (In re S-Tran Holdings, Inc.), 414 B.R. 28 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).
- 12.1.ffff Property held in a resulting trust is not property of the estate. The debtor provided a royalty distribution service for an oil well operator. The operator directed all receipts from the sale of oil to the debtor, who commingled the funds in its general operating account. The debtor made distributions to the royalty and working interest holders. The debtor did not charge a fee for the service because the operator was a good customer in other parts of the business. The two people who negotiated the oral agreement always intended that the funds remain the property of the operator and agreed that interest earned on the funds would be used for the operator's benefit. A resulting trust arises when the parties intend, but do not document or otherwise express, a trust relationship under which legal title to property passes from the beneficiary to the trustee and the beneficiary retains beneficial ownership. The beneficiary carries a heavy burden to prove that the parties intended a resulting trust rather than a debtor-creditor relationship. Here, the parties' intention was clear: neither of the people who negotiated the agreement intended the debtor to become the owner of the funds. Therefore, the relationship established a resulting trust. Property that the debtor holds subject to a trust is not property of the estate. Therefore, the debtor in possession must pay the operator the amount of the funds on deposit. Vess Oil Corp. v. SemCrude, L.P. (In re SemCrude, L.P.), 418 B.R. 98 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).
- 12.1.gggg Section 108(a) extension applies to statutes of repose as well as statutes of limitations. The trustee brought a legal malpractice claim against the debtor's lawyers within seven months after the petition date but 13 months after the debtor knew or should have known about the claim. Louisiana's peremptive statute terminates a legal malpractice claim 12 months after the plaintiff knew or should have known of the claim. It has the same effect as a statute of repose, in contrast to a statute of limitations, which simply bars the remedy. Property rights should be determined under applicable non-bankruptcy law, unless some federal interest requires a different result. Section 108(a) provides that if "applicable non-bankruptcy law ... fixes a period within which the debtor may commence an action, and such period has not expired before the date of the filing of the petition, the trustee may commence such action" within two years after the order for relief. This section evidences a Congressional policy that the trustee have at least two years to assess and pursue actions that belonged to the debtor as of the petition date. Congress did not distinguish between statutes of limitations and statutes of repose. Section 108(a) reflects a federal interest that overrides non-bankruptcy law. It therefore preempts a statute of repose (or a peremptive statute) and permits the trustee to bring an action within two years after the order for relief. Stanley v. Trinchar, 579 F.3d 515 (5th Cir. 2009).

12.1.hhhh A stockholder's failure to invest may breach the duty of loyalty. The corporate parent acquired the debtor as part of a deal with the parent's lender: the lender had exposure to the already troubled debtor, the parent sought financing for an unrelated acquisition and the lender agreed to finance the other acquisition if the parent would acquire the debtor and guarantee its debt to the lender. After the acquisition and the guarantee, the parent installed a restructuring officer at the debtor, who was unsuccessful in turning the business around. The restructuring officer took instructions from the parent's officers without any formal meeting of the debtor's board, which included those officers. The parent refused any investment in the debtor for needed working capital. After it became apparent that the debtor would not likely survive, the restructuring officer focused on getting the lender paid to minimize guarantee exposure, rather than on maximizing value for all creditors. Directors' fiduciary duties include the duties of care, loyalty and good faith, which is a subsidiary duty of the duty of loyalty. To prevail on a claim for breach of duty of loyalty, a plaintiff must establish a self-interested transaction that was unfair to the corporation. Here, the directors promoted their self-interest by acquiring the debtor and guaranteeing its debt to obtain financing for an unrelated acquisition. They acted unfairly while in control of the debtor by guaranteeing the debt and failing to invest any equity. A claim for breach of the duty of good faith requires a showing of conduct that is more culpable than lack of due care, such as intentionally acting with a purpose other than advancing the corporation's interests or violating positive law or failing to act in the face of a known duty to act. The restructuring officer's taking orders from the parent's officers and focusing on limiting the parent's guarantee exposure were intentional acts with a purpose to advance interests other than the corporation's and failure to act in the face of a known duty. Miller v. Greystone Bus. Credit II, L.L.C. (In re USA Detergents, Inc.), 418 B.R. 533 (Bankr. D. Del. 2009).

12.1.iiii D&O policy insured vs. insured exclusion prevents recovery in an action initiated by the debtor in possession. The debtor in possession asserted claims for breach of fiduciary duty against its former directors. The D&O insurance carrier refused coverage under the "insured vs. insured" exclusion, which provides, "The Insurer shall not be liable to make any payment for Loss in connection with any Claim made against the Directors ... brought or maintained by or on behalf of an Insured in any capacity". The debtor confirmed a plan that assigned its claims against its former directors to a creditors trust. The trustee settled with the directors and took an assignment of and pursued their claims against the carrier. A D&O policy is a liability policy, rather than a casualty policy, which therefore protects against third party claims, not against the risks under the insured's control; the exclusion implements this concept. Although the creditors, through the creditors trust, are the claim's beneficiaries, the claim is not brought on their behalf. A corporation owns the claim for breach of fiduciary duty, and the corporation, as debtor in possession, brought the claim here. The bankruptcy does not change the result. For these purposes, the debtor in possession is not a different entity from the debtor. Although interests differ after the debtor files bankruptcy, the debtor corporation is the source of the claim, and an action that will benefit creditors is not the same as an action on behalf of creditors. The court leaves open the question of whether an action by creditors or a committee through derivative standing would also be subject to the insured vs. insured exception. Biltmore Assocs., LLC v. Twin City Fire Ins. Co., 572 F.3d 663 (9th Cir. 2009).

12.1.jjjj Court may not grant derivative standing to an individual creditor in a chapter 7 case. The trustee discovered assets that the debtor had not disclosed and, jointly with an individual creditor, brought an action to recover them. The trustee ran out of funds to pursue the action and proposed to dismiss it. The creditor sought derivative standing to pursue the action on behalf of the estate. The statute supports derivative standing of a creditors committee in a chapter 11 case if a debtor in possession or trustee fails or refuses without justification to pursue an action that vests in the estate. Section 1103(c)(5) authorizes a committee to perform services in the interest of those it represents, section 1109(b) grants a committee (and an individual creditor) standing to appear and be heard on any issue and section 1123(b)(3)(B) permits a plan to vest causes of action in a representative of the estate. There are no comparable provisions in chapter 7. In addition, in chapter 7, there is always an independent fiduciary, while in chapter 11, the debtor in possession may be conflicted. “An experienced bankruptcy trustee, unlike a potentially angry and out-for-justice creditor, may have a better instinct for what is worth chasing and what is worth foregoing.” Finally, granting derivative standing would permit a creditor to “hijack” the case. Therefore, the court denies the motion for derivative standing. However, a creditor may fund the trustee’s pursuit of litigation if it wishes, as long as the trustee remains in control of all decision making. Reed v. Cooper (In re Cooper), 405 B.R. 801 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2009).

12.1.kkkk Trustee does not have standing to pursue assigned creditors’ claims. The debtor investment manager engaged in a fraudulent scheme by commingling and then leveraging customer assets. The debtor’s bank established an account structure that permitted commingling and did not require segregation. The debtor’s chapter 11 plan established a liquidating trust and provided that each customer creditor who accepted the plan assigned to the trustee its claim against the bank for aiding and abetting the fraud. The liquidating trust contained a subtrust for the assigned claims and any proceeds, which were to be distributed pro rata among the assigning customer creditors. The trustee and the bank settled the bank’s confirmation objections on grounds other than the trustee’s standing to sue on the customers’ claims. In the trustee’s postconfirmation action against the bank, the bank challenged the trustee’s standing to sue. Res judicata requires a final judgment on an identical action between the same parties. Although the bank objected to confirmation, plan confirmation is not res judicata of the trustee’s standing to sue the bank, because standing is jurisdictional and cannot be waived. Ordinarily, under sections 323 and 541, a trustee may not bring claims on behalf of creditors. A trustee must act for the benefit of the estate, and claims assignments cannot expand a trustee’s statutorily prescribed duties, as the plan provision here would do. In addition, the Code requires that any recovery be distributed in accordance with the Code’s priorities. Distribution to a subgroup of creditors, who assigned their claims, contravenes the Code distribution rules, even though the confirmed plan so provided. Therefore, the trustee does not have standing to sue the bank. Grede v. Bank of N. Y. Mellon, 409 B.R. 467 (N.D. Ill. 2009).

12.1.llll Section 546(e) protection applies to nonavoiding power claims against selling shareholders in a leveraged buyout. The debtor’s shareholders sold the debtor in a leveraged buyout. The payments to the shareholders were made through an escrow arrangement at a bank. The debtor in possession sought to recover the payments under the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act and as illegal shareholder distributions under state corporate law. Section 546(e) prohibits avoidance of a “settlement payment ... made by or to a ... financial institution”. “Settlement payment” is defined broadly to include “any other similar payment commonly used in the securities trade”. Whether or not Congress intended to cover only securities trades that affect public markets and to exclude share purchases such as the one involved here, the statutory language is broad and clear and would not lead to an absurd result if interpreted to protect these payments. In addition, the statute does not require that the financial institution, the bank here, have a beneficial interest in the transferred funds for the statute to apply. The transfer was from the buyers “to” the bank and “by” the bank to the selling shareholders. Therefore, section 546(e) applies and the transfers are not avoidable. The state law claims also fail. The federal Bankruptcy Code preempts state law to the contrary where the state law stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment of the federal goal. Here, section 546(e)’s goal is to protect these payments. State corporate law may not be used to attack them, even though section 546(e) does not by its terms apply to claims not asserted under the trustee's avoiding powers. Contemp. Indus. Corp. v. Frost, 564 F.3d 981 (10th Cir. 2009).

12.1.mmmm Court recognizes finance subsidiary's separateness. The debtor financed its accounts receivables through a special purpose, wholly owned subsidiary, which acquired receivables from the debtor by contribution and borrowed against them from the lender, sending borrowing proceeds back to the debtor-parent. The subsidiary's organization documents had various separateness covenants, including requirements for separate bank accounts, stationery, and financial statements. It violated some of the covenants. It did not generate separate financial statements and did not file tax returns. It occasionally used the parent's stationery. The parent's financial statements characterized the borrowings as its own. Nevertheless, the debtor acknowledged the subsidiary's separateness, the subsidiary made all loan funding requests and submitted its own borrowing base certificates and the lender expressly relied on the subsidiary's separateness. The court recognizes the subsidiary's separate existence from the parent. By its organizational documents, it was not intended to be an operating company, so the fact that it did not operate does not require the court to ignore corporate form. Neither does the absence of separate bank accounts, stationery, tax returns or financial statements. The lenders relied on separateness in performing the function for which it was created, and the court should not disregard it. The court similarly rejects an alter ego or veil piercing rationale to reach the subsidiary's assets. LaSalle Nat'l Bank Assoc. v. Paloian, 406 B.R. 299 (N.D. Ill. 2009).

12.1.nnnn Court recognizes the contribution (true sale) of debtor's receivables to finance subsidiary. The debtor financed its accounts receivables through a special purpose, wholly-owned subsidiary, which acquired receivables from the debtor by contribution and borrowed against them from the lender, sending borrowing proceeds back to the debtor-parent. The contribution documents expressed the intent that the debtor part with all interest in the receivables, and the subsidiary's law firm issued a "true sale" opinion. Whether a transfer is a sale depends on the totality of circumstances, but factors that courts consider include the parties' intent, the documents' language, recourse to the transferor, transferor's right to excess collections, ability to alter pricing and a transferor repurchase right. Here, the documents were clear in both language and intent, the parties complied with UCC requirements and the legal opinions, while not binding on the court, reflected the parties' intent. Therefore, the court determines the contribution to divest the debtor of all right, title and interest in the receivables. LaSalle Nat'l Bank Assoc. v. Paloian, 406 B.R. 299 (N.D. Ill. 2009).

12.1.oooo Chapter 7 trustee may bring derivative action for breach of fiduciary duty against debtor's directors. Most members of a corporate group filed chapter 11 and sought approval of debtor in possession financing. A nondebtor member of the group guaranteed the financing and granted a lien on its assets to secure the guarantee. The nondebtor member, which was a Delaware corporation, later became a chapter 7 debtor, in part because of the extra debt arising from the guarantee. The trustee sued the directors for breach of fiduciary duty for authorizing the guarantee and lien for no direct benefit to the chapter 7 corporation, alleging that they breached their duty of loyalty by authorizing the actions to perpetuate themselves in office at lucrative salaries and for the benefit of the chapter 11 debtors, for whom they also served as directors. Under Trenwick Am. Litig. Trust v. Ernst & Young, LLP, 931 A.2d 438 (Del. 2007), directors of a subsidiary may act in the interest of the parent, but only when the subsidiary is not insolvent or when the action would not render the subsidiary unable to meet its legal obligations. Here, the complaint adequately alleged this exception to the Trenwick rule and therefore survives a motion to dismiss. Under N. Am. Catholic Educ. Prog. Found. v. Gheewalla, 960 A.2d 92 (Del. 2007), creditors may have derivative standing to sue directors for breach of fiduciary duty if the corporation is insolvent. The chapter 7 trustee here may stand in the creditors' shoes to bring a derivative action against the directors. The court does not address the trustee's direct standing as successor to the debtor's claims against the directors or the limitation on a trustee's authority to bring claims against creditors under Caplin v. Marine Midland Grace Trust Co., 406 U.S. 416 (1972). Seidel v. Byron, 405 B.R. 277 (N.D. Ill. 2009).

12.1.pppp The equities that apply to determining a constructive trust claim in bankruptcy differ from those that apply outside of bankruptcy. A creditor that the debtor had insured claimed proceeds of the debtor's reinsurance contract under a constructive trust. Constructive trusts are determined under applicable nonbankruptcy law. In this case, applicable law requires, among other things, unjust enrichment, which incorporates the concepts of equity and good conscience. Generally, creditors' rights in bankruptcy are determined under applicable nonbankruptcy law, unless some federal interest requires otherwise. The equities in bankruptcy differ from the equities outside of bankruptcy. A bankruptcy trustee must marshal assets under judicial supervision for distribution according to the Bankruptcy Code. Therefore, refusing to apply a constructive trust in bankruptcy on facts under which it would be applied outside of bankruptcy is consistent with equity, and the estate's enrichment with the reinsurance policy proceeds is not unjust. The court therefore denies the creditor's constructive trust claim. Ades and Berg Group Investors v. Breeden, 550 F.3d 240 (2d Cir. 2008).

12.1.qqqq Breach of fiduciary duty claim must allege damage to the debtor. The plan established a liquidating trust comprised of "all property of the Debtors' Estates which has not previously been transferred" and empowered the liquidating trustee to prosecute any claims transferred to the Trust, including claims against directors and officers. The liquidating trustee sued the debtor's directors alleging that the directors breached their fiduciary duty owed to the creditors when the debtor entered the zone of insolvency and after it became insolvent. The complaint alleged the directors' actions caused damages to creditors and shareholders, alleged that the action was derivative on behalf of creditors and shareholders and sought recovery on behalf of creditors and shareholders, with any recovery to become property of the trust. The debtor was a Delaware corporation. Under No. Am. Catholic Educ. Programming Found., Inc. v. Gheewalla, 930 A.2d 92 (Del. 2007), creditors may assert only derivative claims against directors for breach of fiduciary duty. The claims actually belong to the injured corporation, so a derivative action is actually by the shareholders (or creditors) on behalf of the corporation. Because the claim belongs to the corporation, it becomes property of the estate upon a bankruptcy filing. In this case, the claims were properly transferred from the estate to the liquidating trust, and the trustee had standing to bring them, but only as trustee of the trust that now owned the claims, not as a representative of creditors or stockholders. The complaint alleged only damages to creditors and shareholders, not to the debtor. Therefore, the complaint fails to allege a claim on which relief may be granted and must be dismissed. The Torch Liquidating Trust v. Stocksill, 561 F.3d 377 (5th Cir. 2009).

12.1.rrrr A D&O insurance policy bankruptcy exclusion is not enforceable, but the policy limit on an action by the debtor is. The debtor's fully paid prepetition directors and officers liability insurance policy excluded coverage of any claims asserted by the debtor or any insured director or officer, except a derivative claim commenced without any involvement by the insureds. A policy endorsement denied coverage for any claim asserted by the debtor's bankruptcy estate or its representative. The trustee sued the carrier for coverage in his claim against the directors and officers for misconduct. Section 541(a)(1) includes as property of the estate any interest of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case. Under section 541(c)(1), any provision that restricts or conditions transfer of an interest of the debtor in property based on a bankruptcy filing is ineffective to prevent the interest from becoming property of the estate. Here, the policy became property of the estate, and the trustee had the same coverage as the debtor had before bankruptcy, despite the endorsement. That coverage excluded any action by the debtor or the other insureds. The policy would cover a derivative action that creditors or shareholders could bring before bankruptcy, even though a derivative action seeks recovery for the benefit of the insured company. When bankruptcy intervenes, the derivative action belongs to the estate, and creditors and shareholders may no longer bring it. Thus, even though the policy excepts derivative actions from the coverage exclusion, the exception does not apply once the action belongs to the estate and may be brought only by the trustee, because the policy exclusion on claims the debtor may bring applies equally to the trustee. Texas Atty. Gen'l v. Brown (In re Fort Worth Osteopathic Hosp., Inc.), 387 B.R. 706 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2008).

12.1.ssss “Equities of the case” exception to section 552(b) requires expenditure of unencumbered assets. Section 552(b) continues a prepetition security interest in proceeds of estate property if the security agreement extends to proceeds, except to the extent the court, “based on the equities of the case, orders otherwise”. The “equities of the case” exception attempts to prevent a windfall to a secured lender where unencumbered estate assets are devoted to improving the collateral’s value. Here, the debtor in possession expended substantial efforts to preserve and sell the estate’s property, resulting in a higher sale price than could have been obtained if the debtor in possession had not undertaken the efforts and sought an order withholding $1,000,000 from the sale proceeds available for secured creditors for unsecured creditors, based on the efforts. The work was funded by a debtor in possession loan that was fully repaid from the sale proceeds. Therefore, the estate did not expend unencumbered assets, and the equities did not permit withholding of proceeds for the estate. All Points Capital Corp. v. Laurel Hill Paper Co. (In re Laurel Hill Paper Co.), 393 B.R. 89 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. 2008).

12.1.tttt Judicial estoppel does not bar trustee from pursuing an action that the debtor did not disclose. The debtor had sued prepetition to recover for a personal injury. The debtor did not disclose the claim on his schedule of assets. The case was closed without the claim being administered. After discharge, the defendant moved for summary judgment arguing that the debtor’s nondisclosure in the bankruptcy case judicially estopped the debtor from pursuing the action. The debtor moved to reopen the bankruptcy case, the defendant removed the action to the bankruptcy court and the trustee moved to be substituted as the real party in interest. Under section 541, the claim became property of the estate. Because it was not scheduled and therefore not administered, it was not abandoned to the debtor upon closing; the estate retained the right to the claim. Judicial estoppel prevents a party from assuming an inconsistent position in litigation to gain unfair advantage. Here, the debtor would not have gained an unfair advantage, because the claim belonged to the trustee, for the benefit of the debtor’s creditors, not to the debtor. Therefore, judicial estoppel does not bar the trustee from proceeding. Kane v. Nat’l Union Fire Ins. Co., 535 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 2008).

12.1.uuuu Debtor in possession retains LLC membership interest, despite bankruptcy filing. The debtor was an LLC member. The LLC operating agreement, when read with the applicable LLC statute, provided that a person ceases to be an LLC member upon filing a bankruptcy petition unless the LLC agreement provides otherwise. The LLC agreement here did not. The debtor in possession sought to dissolve the LLC. Section 541(c) invalidates any restriction on transfer of any interest of the debtor in property that is conditioned upon a bankruptcy filing. The LLC agreement and statute therefore cannot affect the debtor’s LLC membership interest, either as to economic or non-economic matters, and the DIP had standing to seek dissolution. Klingerman v. ExecuCorp, LLC (In re Klingerman), 388 B.R. 677 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2008).

12.1.vvvv Complaint states claim against directors for good faith breach, but not against officers. The liquidating trustee’s complaint alleged that the distressed debtor’s directors abdicated their duties by selecting a restructuring advisor as COO and allowing him to sell the debtor’s principal assets without supervision within three weeks after his selection without an investment banker, a search for strategic or financial buyers or any marketing or auction, resulting in a sale to a buyer with whom the debtor had already begun preliminary discussions at a price that was substantially below the assets’ value, despite contemporary evidence that there was substantial market interest in the assets at a substantially higher price. The trustee also asserted breach of fiduciary duty claims against the officers, particularly the COO. A director's fiduciary duty of loyalty is not limited to preventing self-dealing. It also requires a duty to act in good faith. Failing to act when a director clearly should act violates the duty of loyalty by failing to discharge the duty in good faith. By abdicating decision-making authority to the COO and failing to supervise his activities, the directors here violated the duty of loyalty. A certificate of incorporation exculpation provision under Del. GCL section 102(b)(7) and the business judgment rule are effective to protect a director against liability for breach of the duty of due care only if the director acts in good faith and does not breach the duty of loyalty. Because the complaint adequately pleads that the directors breached the duty of loyalty, the trustee may pursue the due care claim as well, despite the exculpatory clause and the business judgment rule. An officer also owes fiduciary duties to the corporation, but the officer's duties are narrower, based on the function and duties of the office. The court dismisses the claims against the officers because the complaint does not allege what office each officer defendant held or how the officer's actions breached the duties of that office. Bridgeport Holdings Inc. Liquidating Trust v. Boyer (In re Bridgeport Holdings Inc.), 388 B.R. 548 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).

12.1.www Claim asserting direct injury to creditors in general does not belong to the estate.

The amount of secured debt an oil and gas debtor could issue under its unsecured bond indenture depended on certified reserve estimates. Based on reserve estimates that later proved to be materially overstated, the debtor issued debt secured by substantially all of its assets. After the debtor entered chapter 11, its trustee sued the directors, who had purchased half the secured notes, and the purchaser of the other half of the notes, on various theories relating to the overstated reserve estimates. The action was settled as part of the plan by the secured creditors' reduction of their claims and the estate's release of its claims against the secured creditors. The unsecured bondholders participated in the case and approved the plan and the release. After confirmation, the bondholders sued the non-insider secured note purchaser in state court for fraud and aiding and abetting fraud in the issuance of the secured notes, alleging that the unsecured bondholders either purchased or refrained from selling their notes based on the fraudulent reserve estimates. The secured creditor removed the action to the bankruptcy court. If the claims were property of the estate, the bankruptcy court would have post-confirmation jurisdiction and would properly dismiss them because the trustee, not the bondholders, has exclusive standing to bring them. The claims belong to the estate if the debtor could have asserted them as of the petition date. Claims that are common to a number of creditors belong to the estate if they allege injury to the estate, by way of fraudulent transfer, for example. Claims asserting specific injury directly to creditors, not derivatively through injury to the debtor, belong to creditors, not the estate. The bondholders assert here that the secured note purchaser aided in fraud that induced the bondholders to purchase or not to sell their bonds. Those claims belong to the creditors, not to the estate, so the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction and must remand the action to state court. That the bondholders participated in the chapter 11 case and consented to the estate's release of the secured note purchaser does not estop them from suing the purchaser. A contrary rule would inequitably penalize participation in the case. Highland Cap. Mgmt. LP v. Chesapeake Energy Corp. (In re Seven Seas Petroleum, Inc.), 522 F.3d 575 (5th Cir. 2008).

12.1.xxxx Estate representative has standing to sue auditor for losses resulting from undiscovered fraud.

To receive his maximum annual bonus and remain in control, the debtor's CEO falsified the debtor's books over two years to hide the debtor's poor performance. The debtor's auditor did not detect the fraud until after it had issued clean audit opinions for the two years' financial statements. The estate representative sued the auditor for breach of contract, negligence, negligent misrepresentation, and fraud or recklessness in connection with the two years' audits. Under New York law, a claim for defrauding a corporation with management's cooperation accrues to creditors, not to the corporation, so the corporation, or a party pursuing the corporation's claims, does not have standing to sue. However, if management cooperated intending to benefit only itself, its cooperation is adverse to the corporation, even if it incidentally benefits the corporation, and is not imputed to the corporation, which then has standing. An auditor's breach of contract, negligence and fraud are a single form of wrongdoing, so the debtor in possession would not have standing even to bring the breach of contract or negligence claim if management cooperated in the fraud. Because the debtor's management here acted adversely to the corporation, for its own personal benefit, the debtor owned the claims against the auditor, and the claims properly vested in the estate representative, who had standing to sue the auditor on all the claims the disbursing agent brought. Bankr. Servs., Inc. v. Ernst & Young (In re CBI Holding Co., Inc.), 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 12767 (2d Cir. 2008).

12.1.yyyy Estate representative may sue on a claim a creditor assigned to the estate. The debtor's CEO owned a 52% equity interest in the debtor. An independent investor owned the balance of the equity and was a substantial creditor as well. To receive his maximum annual bonus and remain in control, the CEO falsified the debtor's books over two years to hide the debtor's poor performance. The debtor's auditor did not detect the fraud until after it had issued clean audit opinions for the two years' financial statements. The estate representative objected to the auditor's claim for prepetition accounting fees and counterclaimed for breach of contract, negligence, negligent misrepresentation, and fraud or recklessness in connection with the two years' audits. As part of the plan settlement of the investor's claim, the investor assigned the estate representative its claims against the auditor for the same causes of action. Section 541(a)(7) includes in the estate any interest in property that the estate acquires after bankruptcy. Therefore, the estate may accept an assignment of a claim from a creditor. Here, the court-approved plan provided for the investor's assignment of its claim to the disbursing agent as representative of the estate, so the disbursing agent has standing to bring the claim against the auditor. Bankruptcy Servs., Inc. v. Ernst & Young (In re CBI Holding Co., Inc.), 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 12767 (2d Cir. 2008).

12.1.zzzz A corporate officer owes fiduciary duties to the corporation. The Florida-incorporated debtor engaged in extensive fraudulent financial reporting over several fiscal quarters. The trustee sued the former vice president and general counsel for breaching his fiduciary duty of care to the corporation by failing to implement an adequate monitoring system or to use such a system to safeguard against corporate wrongdoing. The court reviews Delaware and Florida case law, which relies on Delaware law, without examining the reasoning underlying the case law, to determine that corporate officers owe fiduciary duties to a corporation. Therefore, the court denies the officer's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Miller v. McDonald (In re World Health Alternatives, Inc.), 385 B.R. 576 (Bankr. D. Del. 2008).

12.1.aaaaa Property of the estate does not include real property held in the name of a mortgage servicer debtor. The debtor originated, sold, and serviced mortgages. The servicing agreement provided that the debtor would hold the mortgages in an express trust for the benefit of the buyer, who would be "the absolute record holder" and own "the entire equitable ownership" of the mortgages, that any property acquired upon a mortgage foreclosure would be acquired and held in the name of the buyer and that any deed would be issued to the buyer. However, foreclosure deeds were issued to the debtor, who held numerous properties on the petition date. Because the debtor held the properties in an express trust, section 541(d) prevents them from becoming property of the estate. Although section 541(d) provides that property in which the debtor holds only legal title becomes property of the estate under paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 541(a), it also prevents the equitable interest in the property from becoming property of the estate under paragraph (3), which includes as property of the estate any property the trustee recovers under the avoiding powers. Therefore, section 544(a)(3) does not permit the debtor in possession, as an ideal hypothetical bona fide purchaser of real property from the debtor as of the commencement of the case, to avoid the buyer's unrecorded interests in the foreclosed property. The court places particular emphasis on the facts that the debtor agreed not to assert an interest in the mortgages or foreclosed property and conducted itself prepetition in accordance with that agreement. Mortgage Lenders Network, US, Inc. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (In re Mortgage Lenders Network, US, Inc.), 380 B.R. 131 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007).

12.1.bbbbb Money order company must trace trust funds in a bankruptcy estate, despite state statute creating a floating trust. The debtor issued money orders in exchange for cash. Under the contract with the money order company, the debtor was required to hold the cash in a separate, segregated account, in trust for the company. However, the debtor put the cash in its general operating account and transferred a sufficient sum to the segregated trust account every week except for two. When the debtor filed bankruptcy, the trust account actually held nearly the amount that should have been transferred during those two weeks. A state statute provided that the cash received constitutes trust funds and that if the cash is commingled, all commingled cash is impressed with a trust. Funds held in trust are not property of the estate. State law determines what property is held in trust, absent a countervailing federal interest. Here, the countervailing federal interest is the Bankruptcy Code's policy of equality of treatment. To promote that policy, federal law requires tracing to show the property is actually held in trust, so state law cannot substitute a floating trust rule for the federal tracing requirement. Callaway v. Memo Money Order Co., 381 B.R. 650 (E.D. N. Car. 2008).

12.1.ccccc Debtor is not entitled to unclaimed funds. A chapter 7 trustee administered a case, sent final distribution checks to creditors, and closed the case. Some of the creditors did not cash the checks; some creditors could not be found. The unclaimed funds were deposited with the court under section 347(a), which requires payment into court and disposition under chapter 129 of title 28. Chapter 129 provides for escheat to the U.S. Treasury and delivery to "any claimant entitled to such money." Many years later, the debtor's assignee sought payment of the unclaimed funds. Unclaimed funds differ from surplus funds, which are funds remaining after all creditors and administrative expenses have been paid in full. Only the unpaid creditor is entitled to unclaimed funds, not the debtor. In re Ruch Hampton Indus., Inc., 379 B.R. 192 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2007).

12.1.ddddd Debtor is not entitled to unclaimed funds. A chapter 7 trustee administered a case, sent final distribution checks to creditors, and closed the case. Some of the creditors did not cash the checks; some creditors could not be found. The unclaimed funds were deposited with the court under section 347(a), which requires payment into court and disposition under chapter 129 of title 28. Chapter 129 provides for escheat to the U.S. Treasury and delivery to "any claimant entitled to such money." Many years later, a representative of the dissolved debtor sought payment of the unclaimed funds. Unclaimed funds differ from surplus funds, which are funds remaining after all creditors and administrative expenses have been paid in full. Only the unpaid creditor is entitled to unclaimed funds, not the debtor. In re Bradford Prods., Inc., 375 B.R. 356 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2007).

12.1.eeeee Discharge of debtor's liability to judgment creditor does not deprive trustee of debtor's legal malpractice claim. The debtor suffered a large judgment, was placed into involuntary bankruptcy, and received a discharge, without ever having paid any of the judgment. Because of the discharge, the debtor would never have to pay any of the judgment. The trustee brought a legal malpractice action against the debtor's former counsel for the representation leading up to the judgment. The legal malpractice claim vested in the estate upon the filing of the petition, before the discharge. It accrued no later than when the debtor suffered the injury of the judgment. It did not terminate just because the debtor would not suffer any loss from having to pay any of the judgment. Finally, state law prohibiting assignment of a legal malpractice claim does not prevent the claim from becoming property of the estate. Therefore, the trustee may pursue the claim. Stanley v. Trincharde, 500 F.3d 411 (5th Cir. 2007).

- 12.1.fffff Section 542(a)'s turnover obligation applies only while the defendant has the subject property. The debtor issued checks prepetition, which his bank honored postpetition. Section 542(a) requires “an entity ... in possession, custody, or control, during the case, of property [of the estate to] deliver to the trustee, and account for, such property or the value of such property”. The trustee sought turnover from the debtor, on the theory that the debtor had control of the bank account funds during the case, before the bank honored the checks. However, section 542(a) applies only to property of which the defendant has possession, custody, or control at the time of the turnover demand. Section 549 permits the trustee to recover property that has been transferred postpetition; section 542 does not. Brown v. Pyatt (In re Pyatt), 486 F.3d 423 (8th Cir. 2007).
- 12.1.ggggg Creditors' breach of fiduciary duty claims are derivative claims. Several creditors had sued the debtor and some of its directors prepetition for breach of fiduciary duty. After bankruptcy, the trustee settled the claims on behalf of the estate. Even though directors owe creditors a fiduciary duty under Delaware law when the corporation is insolvent, any claims for breach are derivative claims that must be asserted on behalf of the corporation. The trustee succeeds to those claims under section 541(a) as property of the estate and may settle them, to the exclusion of the creditors who had previously sued. The court therefore overrules creditors' objection to the settlements. Morley v. Ontos, Inc. (In re Ontos, Inc.), 478 F.3d 427 (1st Cir. 2007).
- 12.1.hhhhh Creditors may not assert a direct breach of fiduciary duty claim against directors. A corporation had agreed with plaintiff to develop a wireless network, using in part wireless spectrum licenses that the plaintiff transferred to the corporation. The corporation failed. The plaintiff sued the directors (the principal shareholder's employees) directly for breach of fiduciary duty, claiming that they owed their duties to the plaintiff as a substantial creditor because the corporation was either insolvent or in the “zone” of insolvency at the time of the alleged breach. Directors owe fiduciary obligations to the corporation, which shareholders may enforce for the benefit of the corporation in a derivative action. Creditors are afforded protection by contract and by fraud and fraudulent conveyance law, among other things, so directors do not in general owe creditors duties beyond these protections. Imposition on directors of direct fiduciary duties to creditors might inhibit a corporation's ability to engage in vigorous, good faith negotiations with its creditors at a time when it most needs that flexibility. Directors' duties do not change when the corporation is insolvent or even nearly so. However, because creditors may become the residual beneficiaries of the corporation's assets, they have standing to maintain a derivative claim against directors on behalf of the corporation for breach of fiduciary duty. But creditors do not have the right to assert direct claims for breach of fiduciary duty. N. Am. Catholic Educ. Programming Found., Inc. v. Gheewalla, 930 A.2d 92 (Del. 2007).
- 12.1.iiiii Plan confirmation does not resolve breach of fiduciary duty claim for decision to file bankruptcy. The directors breached their fiduciary duty by authorizing the filing of a bankruptcy petition. The corporation suffered damages as a result. The chapter 11 plan preserved any claims against the directors that existed immediately before the commencement of the case and vested them in a disbursing agent, who assigned them, with court approval, to the minority shareholders. The bankruptcy court does not have exclusive jurisdiction to resolve the claims, because they relate to the directors' pre-bankruptcy conduct, not to activities during the bankruptcy case. Nor does the Bankruptcy Code preempt the claims, because they arose before, not during, the bankruptcy case. And plan confirmation does not resolve the claims so that claim preclusion prevents their pursuit after the plan effective date, because the claims do not relate to any findings, such as the plan proponents' good faith or compliance with the terms of the Code, that must be determined as part of plan confirmation. Instead, the plan expressly preserves the claims, which relate solely to prepetition conduct, the breach of fiduciary duty in authorizing the filing of the bankruptcy petition. Davis v. Yageo Corp., 481 F.3d 661 (9th Cir. 2007).

- 12.1.jjjjj An action on behalf of the estate that benefits only creditors does not belong to creditors. The debtor's law firm assisted it in transferring assets prepetition while the debtor was insolvent for less than reasonably equivalent value to a company that an insider controlled. A claim against the law firm for aiding and abetting the breach of fiduciary duty belongs to the debtor and therefore to the estate, and the trustee has standing to pursue it. A trustee may not bring an action that belongs only to creditors. Even though the debtor was insolvent at the time of the breach and the recovery will likely benefit only creditors, in that any recovery by the estate will be distributed on creditors' claims, this claim is brought on behalf of the estate, not of creditors, and the trustee therefore is not barred. Moratzka v. Morris (In re Sr. Cottages of Am., LLC), 482 F.3d 997 (8th Cir. 2007).
- 12.1.kkkkk Participation agreement is not a loan. The debtor financed small businesses. It borrowed from a secured lender to support its operations and, separately, participated out to other financial institutions interests in its loans to its customers. The secured lender claimed a security interest in all of the debtor's assets, including the portion of customer loans that had been participated. Whether the security agreement, which was ambiguous, granted the secured lender a security interest in the participated portion of the customer loans may depend in part on whether the participation interests are loans to the debtor, because the characterization of the participation interests could determine whether they are property of the debtor in which it may grant a security interest. Although the court determines that the participation agreement meets the four requirements of a true participation (as distinguished from a loan)—advance of funds, right to repayment only from collections from the borrower, no legal recourse against the borrower, and parties' intentions—the court nevertheless analyzes whether the security agreement granted a security interest in the participation interests and concludes that it does not. Acro Bus. Fin. Corp. v. M & I Marshall and Isley Bank (In re Acro Bus. Fin. Corp.), 357 B.R. 785 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2006).
- 12.1.lllll Bankruptcy court may not substantively consolidate nondebtors. The bankruptcy court authorized the debtor in possession to purchase the assets of its two subsidiaries for nominal consideration. The purchase was not a substantive consolidation, because the subsidiaries were not in bankruptcy, and substantive consolidation is "impossible" with nondebtor entities. The court does not explain why this is so. Peoples State Bank v. Gen. Elec. Cap. Corp. (In re Ark-La-Tex Timber Co.), 482 F.3d 319 (5th Cir. 2007).
- 12.1.mmmmm Court recognizes finance subsidiary's separateness. The debtor financed its accounts receivables through a special purpose, wholly-owned subsidiary, which acquired receivables from the debtor by contribution and borrowed from the lender, sending borrowing proceeds back to the debtor-parent. The subsidiary's organization documents had various separateness covenants, including requirements for separate bank accounts, stationery, and financial statements. However, it violated those covenants, among others. Nevertheless, the subsidiary is not an alter ego of the parent. By its organization documents, it was not intended to be an operating company, so the fact that it did not operate does not require the court to ignore corporate form. Neither does the absence of separate bank accounts, stationery, tax returns or financial statements. The lenders relied on separateness in performing the function for which it was created, and the court should not disregard it. Doctors Hosp. of Hyde Park, Inc. v. Desnick (In re Doctors Hosp. of Hyde Park, Inc.), 360 B.R. 787 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007).
- 12.1.nnnnn Interpleaded funds from government contract are property of the estate. The debtor contracted with a ship owner, who operated the ship for the U.S. government, to repair the ship. The debtor filed bankruptcy before receiving final payment from the ship owner and before paying a subcontractor. The ship owner paid the money it received from the government into court and brought an interpleader action against the debtor in possession and the subcontractor. The funds are property of the estate. Pearlman v. Reliance Ins. Co., 371 U.S. 132 (1962), does not require otherwise. In that case, the Supreme Court awarded government funds originally owing to the bankrupt contractor to a surety who completed the contract with another contractor and paid the subcontractor. The surety had the rights by subrogation of the bankrupt contractor as well as the rights of the subcontractor. Here, the debtor had not parted with those interests as of the commencement of the case, so the funds remained property of the estate. Grochal v. Ocean Tech. Servs. Corp. (In re Baltimore Marine Indus.), 476 F.3d 238 (4th Cir. 2007).

12.1.00000 Prepetition income is not property of the estate. The debtor received income prepetition from a closely held business. He did not disclose the income in his bankruptcy filing. The government indicted him under 18 U.S.C. § 152(1) for concealing property of the estate. Income generated prepetition is not property of the estate under either section 541(a)(1), which includes all of the debtor interests in property as of the commencement of the case, or under section 541(a)(6), which includes proceeds of or from property of the estate. The income that arose prepetition could not derive of or from property of the estate, because the estate was created only when the petition is filed. Therefore, the debtor is not guilty of concealing property of the estate based on any concealment of income from the closely held business. United States v. Mitchell, 476 F.3d 539 (8th Cir. 2007).

12.1.ppppp In pari delicto* defense defeats a trustee's claims arising from a stock-for-stock merger. An acquiring corporation defrauded a target corporation's shareholders into agreeing to a stock-for-stock merger, which was executed by the target merging into a newly formed subsidiary of the parent. Bankruptcy followed. The trustee sued the parent's officers, directors, and professionals for the damages their fraud caused the target. The court does not resolve whether the claim properly belongs to the target and therefore its trustee as successor or to the target's shareholders. It concludes, however, that the in pari delicto defense bars liability to the target and its trustee. The defense requires the defendant to show at least the plaintiff's substantially equal culpability and that application "would not interfere with the purposes of the underlying law or contravene public policy." The court imputes the fraud to the new subsidiary, under the principle that controlling actors' fraudulent conduct may be imputed to a corporation when they have used the corporation to facilitate the fraud. Thus, any claim the subsidiary asserts is subject to the in pari delicto defense. Because the target merged into the new subsidiary and the trustee asserts the claims on behalf of the surviving entity, which was the subsidiary, the trustee is similarly subject to the defense. The trustee does not gain the adverse interest exception benefit, because the perpetrators were actually acting in the interest of the subsidiary, not adverse to it, by allowing it to obtain assets for little or no consideration. Nisselson v. Lernout, 469 F.3d 143 (1st Cir. 2006).

12.1.qqqqq Court permits lender to credit bid its secured claim, despite committee "wrongful lending" allegations. An investor loaned new funds, secured by all of the debtor's assets, and made a convertible preferred stock investment, to pay off existing secured debt and provide working capital for expansion at a time when the debtor's prospects looked strong. The investor got one board seat (out of four). The market shifted shortly thereafter, the debtor breached the investor's loan covenants, and the debtor needed fresh funds. The investor made an additional secured advance. The investor's board designee did not vote on the transaction. The debtor's condition still worsened. After the investor's board designee resigned, the debtor and the investor negotiated a stalking horse bid for the debtor's assets, using a credit bid of its secured claim. The debtor filed chapter 11 and conducted an auction, at which the investor sought to credit bid its secured claim. The creditors committee objected to the credit bid by objecting to the allowance of the investor's claim. The court concludes that the claim should be allowed in full. The claim should not be recharacterized as equity, because the parties' clear intent was that the loan portion of the investment be treated as debt. That the investor already held some convertible preferred and knew of the debtor's financial distress at the time of the new debt does not require recharacterization. New money from an existing equity holder need not be treated as equity when a new prudent lender would not lend, because it is legitimate for an existing lender or equity holder to lend to shore up an existing position. The claim should not be equitably subordinated, because the investor did not have sufficient control to be an insider—one board seat of four and the ability to call covenant defaults do not amount to control—and did not seek to benefit itself at the expense of others or mislead others. The investor did not breach any fiduciary duty or aid and abet the directors' breach of fiduciary duty by increasing the debtor's debts, because deepening the debtor's insolvency by itself is not a breach of the duty of care. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Tennenbaum Cap. P'ners, LLC (In re Radnor Holdings Corp.), 353 B.R. 820 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).

12.1.rrrrr Liquidating trust may not assert claims against the parent's directors. The parent had embarked on an acquisition strategy. In executing the strategy, the group increased its debt, which a wholly-owned subsidiary guaranteed. When the strategy failed, the subsidiary filed chapter 11. The post-effective date liquidating trust sued the parent's and the subsidiary's directors in Delaware Chancery Court for breach of fiduciary duty to the subsidiary (which it claimed was insolvent at the time of the transaction) and its creditors and for deepening the subsidiary's insolvency. The court dismisses the complaint. First, under Delaware law, a parent does not owe any fiduciary duties to a wholly-owned subsidiary or its creditors. Such duties arise only in the context of protecting the subsidiary's minority shareholders. "Wholly-owned subsidiary corporations are expected to operate for the benefit of their parent corporations; that is why they are created. Parent corporations do not owe such subsidiaries fiduciary duties." Second, "A subsidiary board is entitled to support a parent's business strategy unless it believes pursuit of that strategy will cause the subsidiary to violate its legal obligations. Nor does a subsidiary board have to replicate the deliberative process of its parent's board when taking action in aid of its parent's acquisition strategy." Third, the parent's directors do not owe fiduciary duties to the subsidiary. If the parent breached its duty as a shareholder, the directors are liable only if the plaintiff pierces the parent's corporate veil. Finally, Delaware does not recognize a cause of action for deepening insolvency "when a firm is insolvent [any more than] a cause of action for 'shallowing profitability' ... when a firm is solvent." "Even when a firm is insolvent, its directors may, in the appropriate exercise of their business judgment, take action that might, if it does not pan out, result in the firm being painted in a deeper hue of red. The fact that the residual claimants of the firm at that time are creditors does not mean that the directors cannot choose to continue the firm's operations in the hope that they can expand the inadequate pie." The only recourse is under a traditional claim for breach of fiduciary duty. Trenwick Am. Litig. Trust v. Ernst & Young, L.L.P., 906 A.2d 168 (Del. Ch. 2006).

12.1.sssss Payments under postpetition crop disaster relief legislation for prepetition crop losses are not property of the estate. The debtor suffered weather-related crop losses before bankruptcy. After bankruptcy, Congress enacted legislation to provide disaster relief for the losses. The payments the debtor received are not property of the estate. Section 541(a)(1) speaks only as of the commencement of the case. The debtor had no rights to the payments as of the commencement of the case, because Congress had not yet enacted the relief legislation. The payments were not sufficiently "rooted in the prebankruptcy past," Segal v. Rochelle, 382 U.S. 375 (1966), to become property of the estate, because section 541(a)(1) strictly limits the property analysis to the time of the commencement of the case. The payments also do not become property of the estate under section 541(a)(6), which includes only "proceeds ... of property of the estate." The prepetition crop losses are not property that can become property of the estate. Bracewell v. Kelley (In re Bracewell), 454 F.3d 1234 (11th Cir. 2006). Accord Burgess v. Sikes (In re Burgess), 438 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2006).

12.1.ttttt Lender's claim against controlling shareholder belongs to the estate. The debtor's controlling shareholder persuaded the lender to defer enforcement action and accept a restructuring proposal before bankruptcy by representing that there was a buyer for the debtor's assets. The sale never occurred. In the meantime, the controlling shareholder caused the debtor to transfer substantial assets to an affiliate. The lender soon filed an involuntary bankruptcy petition. The trustee settled claims against the controlling shareholder for fraudulent transfer and on a veil piercing theory. The court approves the settlement, because the claims belong to the estate, not the lender. The claim against the controlling shareholder arising from the transfer of the debtor's property to an affiliate asserts damage to the debtor and to all creditors alike, not to individual creditors. In addition, under Missouri law, a veil piercing claim related to a particular transaction belongs to the corporation, not to the individual creditors. Therefore, the trustee has authority to settle the claims against the controlling shareholder, and the lender does not have any rights in the claims. Highland Cap. Mgmt., L.P. v. Welsh, Carson, Anderson & Stowe VI, L.P. (In re Bridge Info. Sys., Inc.) 344 B.R. 587 (E.D. Mo. 2006).

12.1.uuuuu Corporate charter exculpatory provision does not protect against breach of duty of loyalty. Delaware law permits a corporate charter to exculpate directors for breach of the duty of care. Under such a provision, a director may not be held liable to the corporation in a derivative action that alleges poor decision-making that led to a bad result. The provision is enforceable against both shareholders and a bankruptcy estate representative who assert the corporate debtor's claims on behalf of creditors. However, where a complaint alleges specific facts that show that corporate directors acted at the direction of the controlling shareholder and without regard to the interest of the corporation, lacked independence because they were also officers or directors of the shareholder, were beholden to the controlling shareholder, and engaged in a scheme to prefer the shareholder over all other creditors and siphon off the corporation's assets for the benefit of the shareholder, the complaint adequately states a claim for breach of the fiduciary duty of loyalty. An exculpatory charter provision does not protect directors against such claims. Officers may similarly be held liable if they act within their discretionary authority. Although the exculpatory provision specifically protects only directors, not officers, the court applies the same standard to officers and dismisses claims against them based on breach of the duty of care. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Am. Tower Corp. (In re Verestar, Inc.), 343 B.R. 444 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006).

12.1.vvvvv Directors and officers dominated by the CEO lack independence and may be liable for breach of the duty of loyalty. The debtor's CEO, who was a director, repeatedly disregarded advice from his senior officers that an acquisition strategy would harm the company and hid that advice from the board and did so to maintain his position and compensation. Such conduct violates the CEO's duty of loyalty, because it was motivated by the "self-interest of entrenchment." The conduct caused harm to the debtor. Even though a majority of the board was not self-interested, the CEO's hiding of information on which the board could make an informed decision resulted in the harm. Similarly, the COO and CFO, who were also directors, breached their duty of loyalty. They had repeatedly warned the CEO of the likely problems but did not speak up at board meetings and voted to support the damaging transactions. They were dominated and controlled by the CEO and therefore lacked the independence to defeat a claim of a breach of the duty of loyalty. The general counsel was not a director but participated in board meetings. He failed to warn the board of the problems with the proposed transactions and participated in the formulation of information that would support a "business judgment" defense to any claim arising from the transactions, also because of the CEO's domination and control. Therefore, he too lacked independence and breached his duty of loyalty. Because of their lack of independence and their breaches of the duty of loyalty, the directors and officers were not entitled to a presumption that they acted with due care and in good faith or to rely on the business judgment rule defense or a due care exculpatory clause in the corporate charter. Boles v. Filipowski (In re Enivid, Inc.), 3345 B.R. 426 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2006).

12.1.wvvvv Reversion of residual upon payment of principal and interest creates a security interest, not a true sale. The debtor leased equipment to its customers. It financed the leases by assigning the leases to a bank. The agreement provided that the transaction was a sale, not a security interest grant, and that the debtor no longer had any interest in the leases, which “shall not be part of the estate of [the debtor] in the event of bankruptcy.” It provided for a servicer to collect payments under the leases, remit them to the bank, and pay all taxes on the payments. It also permitted the debtor to act as subservicer. However, there was no servicing fee. In addition, the agreement frequently referred to payments owing from the debtor to the bank as “principal” and “interest.” The agreement required that the transaction be characterized as a loan and security interest grant for tax purposes. The debtor could make “servicer advances” if a lessee failed to make a payment. Finally, upon the debtor’s payment to the bank of all “principal” and “interest,” the bank was required to transfer any remaining interest in the leases to the debtor. These documents create a loan and security interest, not a sale. Netbank, FSB v. Kipperman (In re Commercial Money Ctr., Inc.), 2006 Bankr. LEXIS 1845 (9th Cir. B.A.P. Aug. 25, 2006).

12.1.xxxxx Reversionary interest in workers’ compensation fund belongs to the estate, not the funding bank. The debtor self-insured its workers’ compensation liability. To do so, the state required it to obtain and post a letter of credit, which the state could draw if the debtor failed to pay claims. The state drew on the letter of credit and placed the drawn funds in a trust account for payment of claims. The trust agreement provided that when all claims had been paid, the debtor had a reversionary interest in the remaining trust funds. The letter of credit bank claimed the reversionary interest in the funds, arguing that the funds were proceeds of the letter of credit and the letter of credit was posted only to cover the debtor’s workers’ compensation liability, the excess should be returned to the bank, as though the excess had never been drawn. However, the independence principle and the terms of the trust agreement defeat the bank’s claim. Under the independence principle, once the beneficiary draws the letter of credit, the bank’s relationship to the beneficiary terminates, the bank cannot direct how the beneficiary uses the proceeds, and the bank has only a reimbursement claim against the debtor/account party. In addition, the trust agreement provided for a reversion of the trust funds to the debtor. Therefore, the excess became property of the estate. PNC Bank, N.A. v. Spring Ford Indus., Inc. (In re Spring Ford Indus., Inc.), 338 B.R 255 (E.D. Pa. 2006).

12.1.yyyyy Interline trust doctrine does not exempt interline balances from bankruptcy. The debtor motor carrier owed substantial interline balances to a railroad for its portion of the charges the debtor received for intermodal goods transport. The railroad asserted the interline trust doctrine to argue that the carrier, and therefore its bankruptcy estate, held the customers’ payments in trust for the railroad. The court declines to adopt the interline trust doctrine as a matter of federal common law. Neither the Bankruptcy Act nor the Interstate Transportation Act evidences a Congressional policy supporting creation and application of federal common law in this circumstance. Rather, the Bankruptcy Act policy is to apply state law “unless some federal interest requires a different result.” Butner v. United States, 440 U.S. 48 (1979). The Transportation Act does not support the creation of federal common law in this area, because promotes free competition rather than government regulation. Therefore, the railroad’s claim is a general unsecured claim. Norfolk. S. Ry. Co. v. Consol. Freightways Corp. (In re Consol. Freightways Corp.), 443 F.3d 1160 (9th Cir. 2006).

12.1.zzzzz Deepening insolvency does not create a theory of damages or an independent cause of action. The trustee sued the debtor’s accountants for malpractice in preparing financial statements on which investors relied in buying equity in the debtor. The availability of the equity investment enabled the debtor to keep operating and incur substantial additional debt, which drove it into bankruptcy. The deepening insolvency was not the result of the investment, but of management’s misuse of the investment and the squandering of the opportunity to use the funds to improve the business. Although a cause of action for deepening insolvency, “an injury to [a debtor’s] corporate property from the fraudulent expansion of corporate debt and prolongation of corporate life,” may lie, deepening insolvency does not create a theory or measure of damages that is independent of the damages arising from the malpractice claim itself. Therefore, the plaintiff cannot show harm necessary for liability if the only result of a defendant's action is the deepening insolvency of the debtor. In addition, a deepening insolvency claim requires proof of fraudulent conduct; negligence will not suffice. Seitz v. Detweiler, Hershey & Assocs., P.C., 448 F.3d 672 (3d Cir. 2006).

12.1.aaaaa Deepening insolvency claim requires fraud on the debtor. The liquidating trust plaintiff alleged that the defendant bank had acted as financial advisor to the debtor and as an advisor and holder of warrants to purchase 20% of the debtor's stock, had heavy influence over the debtor's decision making, persuaded the debtor to continue a business line and borrowings that were unsustainable and that the bank knew were unsustainable, resulting in the debtor's ultimate failure long after the debtor would have failed in the absence of the program, primarily for the purpose of generating fees for the bank. The complaint is sufficient to state a claim for breach of fiduciary duty, because it alleges that the bank was a person in control of the debtor. As an insider, the bank owed a duty to the corporation that it could breach by acting in its own self interest. In addition, although the courts are continuing to develop the theory of deepening insolvency as a cause of action, the Third Circuit has ruled that such a claim is viable under Pennsylvania law. New York, North Carolina, and Delaware law, which might apply here, adopt the same remedial purpose rationale as Pennsylvania, so the court concludes that such a claim exists under those states' laws. However, the claim is viable only if the plaintiff alleges and proves that the prolongation of corporate life and expansion of corporate debt was fraudulent and that the fraud was directed at the debtor, not at creditors, because the claim belongs to the debtor for injury to the corporation. This complaint sufficiently alleged such facts and would therefore not be dismissed. OHC Liquidation Trust v. Credit Suisse First Boston (In re Oakwood Homes Corp.), 340 B.R. 510 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).

12.1.bbbbbb Federal crop disaster relief payments are not property of the estate. The debtor suffered crop losses in 2001 and filed bankruptcy in 2002. In 2003, Congress enacted a crop disaster relief program that covered the crop losses, and the debtor became entitled to a payment under the program. Section 541(a)(1) creates an estate of property in which the debtor had an interest as of the commencement of the case. Although the losses occurred before bankruptcy, the debtor had no interest in the disaster relief payment until Congress enacted the relief program after the debtor's bankruptcy. The debtor did not have even a contingent interest, based on the contingency that Congress might enact such relief. It was a mere hope. Therefore, the payment is not property of the estate. The court notes that section 541(a)(1) enacts the result but not the Supreme Court's reasoning in Segal v. Rochelle, 382 U.S. 375 (1966), by defining property of the estate as all of the debtor's interests in property as of the commencement of the case. In Segal, the Supreme Court reached the conclusion that tax refunds for prepetition losses were property of the estate by balancing the Bankruptcy Act's twin policies of securing for creditors everything of benefit that the bankrupt might possess and allowing the bankrupt to accumulate new wealth after bankruptcy to promote the fresh start. With the enactment of the express statutory standard in section 541(a)(1), courts no longer need to balance these policies to determine what interests are included in property of the estate. Burgess v. Sikes (In re Burgess), 438 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2006), en banc.

12.1.ccccc Tobacco transition payments under FETRA are property of the estate. Congress enacted the Fair and Equitable Tobacco Reform Act of 2004 (FETRA) to replace the prior system of tobacco quota and production support payments. The debtor was a recipient of both kinds of payments under prior law. Entitlement to quota payments under the old system was based on ownership of a farm and related quotas. FETRA transition payments that substitute for quota payments are proceeds of the farm and quotas, which became property of the estate when the debtor filed bankruptcy. Entitlement to production support payments under the old system was based on assuming the risk of tobacco production. FETRA transition payments that substitute for production support entitlements are based on production during the 2002, 2003, and 2004 crop years. The debtor filed bankruptcy before the 2004 crop year, so the estate assumed the risk of production for 2004. But when the debtor filed bankruptcy, before FETRA's enactment, any expectation of payments based on 2002 and 2003 crop year risks of production were not a readily discernable interest and therefore did not become property of the estate. The production-based transition payments for 2002 and 2003 also were not proceeds of property of the estate. The 2004 crop year risk of production and the transition payments based on 2004 were property that the estate acquired after bankruptcy and became property of the estate under section 541(a)(7). In re Evans, 337 B.R. 551 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2005).

12.1.dddddd First Amendment does not require application of Canon Law to determine what is property of the estate. The Archbishop of Portland in Oregon (defined in Oregon law as a corporation sole) filed a chapter 11 case. It argued that much of its real property belonged to its parishes and schools as a matter of Canon Law and that the First Amendment deprived the bankruptcy court of subject matter jurisdiction to resolve disputes over the ownership of church assets. However, the First Amendment deprives a court of jurisdiction only with respect to matters of religious law, doctrine, or faith. Who owns property, which is regulated by civil law and authorities, is not a theological question and neither establishes religion nor interferes with its free exercise. Instead, the court must apply neutral secular principles to determine who owns the property and, therefore, whether it is property of the estate. In addition, such a determination does not violate the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb–2000bb-4, because it does not impose a substantial burden on the free exercise of religion. Tort Claimants Comm. v. Roman Catholic Archbishop of Portland in Oregon (In re Roman Catholic Archbishop of Portland in Oregon), 335 B.R. 842 (Bankr. D. Ore. 2005).

12.1.eeeeeee CEO may be liable for breach of fiduciary duty for accepting excess compensation. Consummating a particular merger was one of the CEO's principal goals for the year. He failed to achieve the goal. Nevertheless, the board voted him a substantial bonus for the year. The bonus was not required under any existing compensation agreement, and the corporation had no obligation to pay it. After bankruptcy, a liquidating trustee sued the board and the CEO for waste and breach of fiduciary duty. The court dismisses the complaint for breach of fiduciary duty against the directors, because there was no allegation that they acted out of self interest or in bad faith. Therefore, the business judgment rule and the corporation's by-laws exculpation provision protect them. However, the exculpation provision does not protect the CEO, as it applies only to directors, not officers. In addition, the CEO was self-interested in the transaction: he was receiving the bonus. Therefore, the court denies the motion to dismiss the complaint against the CEO for breach of fiduciary duty for accepting the bonus. J.P. Morgan Trust Co. N.A. v. Cleberg (In re Farmland Indus., Inc.), 335 B.R. 398 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2005).

12.1.fyyyyy Texas would not recognize an independent tort of deepening insolvency. The trustee sued the debtor's lender, who had continued to extend the debtor's loans even after the debtor's financial troubles became apparent, taking more collateral with each extension, under a deepening insolvency theory. The court traces the history of the theory and analyzes the cases that have applied it. It concludes that a claim for deepening insolvency involves the defendant's breach of a separate, already existing duty to the debtor, such as a fiduciary duty, or a claim for fraud, such as "fraudulent expansion of the corporation's debt or prolongation of its life." It also reviews the Texas Supreme Court's policy not to adopt new torts for actions that are already covered by existing tort liability. A tort under Texas law requires a duty, a breach of that duty, causation and damages. The deepening insolvency theory does not contain any duty that is independent of other torts. Therefore, the court concludes that the Texas Supreme Court would not recognize it as an independent tort and dismisses the claim for relief. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Rural Telephone Fin. Coop. (In re VarTec Telecom, Inc.), 335 B.R. 631 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2005).

- 12.1.gggggg Deepening insolvency claim under Pennsylvania law requires allegation of defrauding the debtor. The trustee sued the debtor's former lawyer under a deepening insolvency theory, alleging that the defendant "engaged in tortious conduct that caused injury to the debtor through the wrongful expansion of corporate debt and prolongation of corporate life beyond insolvency." The trustee has standing to bring the action under section 541(a), because the claim alleges harm to the debtor, not to creditors. However, under Pennsylvania law, the tort requires a showing of fraud. As the Third Circuit stated, it requires a showing of "the fraudulent expansion of corporate debt and prolongation of corporate life." Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. R.F. Lafferty & Co., 267 F.3d 340, 349 (3d Cir. 2001) (emphasis added). If the defendant's action defrauded only creditors, not the debtor, then whether or not creditors could maintain such a claim, the trustee does not have standing under section 541(a) to assert it. Because the trustee did not allege that the defendants defrauded the debtor, the court dismisses this claim for relief. Stanziale v. Pepper Hamilton LLP (In re Student Fin. Corp.), 335 B.R. 539 (D. Del. 2005).
- 12.1.hhhhhh Deepening insolvency claim under Pennsylvania law is subject to the in pari delicto defense. The trustee sued the corporate directors and officers under a deepening insolvency theory under Pennsylvania law, based on a series of transactions by which the debtor's assets were transferred to a new corporation. The old entity was allowed to continue to operate the new corporation and incur debt. Because the trustee brings this kind of action as a successor to the debtor under section 541(a), the trustee is subject to the same defenses that the defendants could assert against the debtor. In an action for harm to the corporation, the defendants may assert an in pari delicto defense, arguing that the corporation caused its own harm, for which the defendants should not be held liable. That defense is available against a deepening insolvency claim. Miller v. Dutil (In re Total Containment, Inc.), 335 B.R. 589 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2005).
- 12.1.iiiii In pari delicto* defense is available against a trustee bringing RICO claim. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. Some of the debtor's major investors were IRA custodians, who were responsible for managing IRA funds of individuals. The trustee sued the IRA custodians under RICO alleging active participation in the Ponzi scheme by making the individual IRA's funds available for use in the scheme. The trustee's claim was subject to the in pari delicto defense. The trustee takes such a RICO claim as a successor to the debtor under section 541(a), subject to all of the defenses that would have been available to the debtor, including the in pari delicto defense. The fact that an innocent trustee has succeeded to the claim does not vitiate the defense. The in pari delicto defense is available against a RICO claim because the policy of RICO is to deter racketeering and related wrongdoing. Rewarding one of the racketeers at the expense of the others would not further that policy. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Edwards, 437 F.3d 1145 (11th Cir. 2006).
- 12.1.jjjjjj Deepening insolvency claim belongs to the estate. The liquidating trustee brought claims against former directors, underwriters, and professionals, alleging that they breached their duty to the corporation by falsely representing the debtor's solvency and prolonging its life so that they could continue to receive compensation. The trustee has standing to bring the action, because the claims belong to the trustee as successor to the debtor, not to the creditors. Even though the conduct resulted in nonpayment of creditors and the recovery benefits creditors under the plan, the action belongs to the estate. Moreover, the principle that directors of an insolvent debtor may owe fiduciary duties to creditors goes only to the standing of creditors outside of bankruptcy to bring a derivative action, not to the ownership of the claim. The court does not address the merits of a deepening insolvency claim but holds only that the trustee has sufficient standing to establish the court's jurisdiction to hear the claim. Smith v. Arthur Andersen LLP, 421 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2005).

12.1.kkkkkk Committee may not pursue breach of duty and aiding and abetting claims against controlling buyer. While the debtor was insolvent, its president and sole shareholder agreed to sell the business. The president caused the debtor to enter into a sale agreement, and he entered into consulting agreements with the buyer, the net effect of which was to pay the president substantial sums, to turn control of the debtor over to the buyer during the sale process, and to prevent meaningful alternative bids. During the process, the debtor continued to lose money so that when it ultimately sold, it was worth substantially less than it would have been in a timely and properly conducted sale process. The creditors committee brought an action on behalf of the estate against the buyer for breach of fiduciary duty and for aiding and abetting the president's breach of duty. The court dismisses the action. The claim for breach of duty fails under the rule of Shearson Lehman Hutton, Inc. v. Wagoner, 944 F.2d 114 (2d Cir. 1991), because such a claim belongs only to creditors, not to the debtor or the estate. "A claim against a third party for defrauding a corporation with the cooperation of management accrues to creditors, not to the guilty corporation." (The Wagoner rule is a standing rule based on ownership of the claim and should not be confused with the in pari delicto rule, which provides an equitable defense.) Similarly, the aiding and abetting claim also fails. One insider (the buyer) cannot aid and abet another insider (the president). Here, the buyer took effective control under the sale agreement and therefore was an insider, even though it did not hold any equity interest, board seat, or office. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. McConnell (In re Grumman Olson Indus., Inc.), 329 B.R. 411 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).

12.1.iiiii Third Circuit narrows grounds for substantive consolidation. The parent operating company and its operating company subsidiaries were borrowers and guarantors under a bank credit line. The parent managed and controlled all the subsidiaries and their finances on a product line basis and provided funding for all the subsidiaries. The companies, not the banks, determined which entities would borrow funds. Financial reporting was done on a consolidated basis, and the banks obtained guaranties based on the book values of subsidiaries' assets, not their net worth. The debtors and asbestos plaintiffs, who had claims only against the parent, sought substantive consolidation only for chapter 11 plan voting and distribution purposes, preserving the corporate structure unchanged for all other purposes. To support substantive consolidation, the moving party must prove that "(i) prepetition [the debtor entities] disregarded separateness so significantly their creditors relied on the breakdown of entity borders and treated them as one legal entity, or (ii) postpetition their assets and liabilities are so scrambled that separating them is prohibitive and hurts all creditors." In this case, the banks (as well as the debtors) treated the entities as separate by negotiating for subsidiary guaranties specifically to give themselves structural seniority, and eliminating this bargained-for right requires a heavy showing that is not present here. The alternative test, that assets and liabilities were not hopelessly scrambled, requires that the cost of unscrambling will reduce recoveries for all creditors, not just that administration will be simplified. Finally, the "deemed" consolidation proposed here acts as a sword to gain strategic advantage in plan negotiations, rather than as a shield to remedy harm that the debtors imposed prepetition on creditors. In re Owens Corning, 419 F.3d 195 (3d Cir. 2005).

12.1.mmmmmm Court approves substantive consolidation under a plan. The three debtors operated a wholesale food distribution company, with separate locations in New Jersey, Texas, and Arizona. After the debtors' assets were sold, the chapter 11 trustee and the creditors committee proposed a liquidating plan that consolidated the three estates. Over objection, the court approved the consolidation. It found that the three debtors shared common directors and officers and conducted similar business operations under similar names. Intercompany transactions were done without compliance with formalities, and there were no promissory notes for intercompany transfers. In addition, there would be a substantial cost savings in not having to administer three separate estates, and separating the financial affairs of the three companies would be difficult and expensive. Costs and recoveries in adversary proceedings would have to be allocated among the three debtors. Therefore, there was a substantial identity among the three estates, and a benefit would be gained from consolidation. In addition, the creditors testified that they viewed the three entities as one for purposes of extending credit, so there was no material reliance of the separate credit of the debtors. Finally, there was no material harm to the objectors, because the evidence showed that the entity against which they claimed was insolvent, as were the others. Therefore, consolidation was proper. Lisanti v. Lubetkin (In re Lisanti Foods, Inc.), 329 B.R. 491 (D.N.J. 2005).

12.1.nnnnnn Court substantively consolidates owned golf course and related non-debtor tavern.

The debtor acquired a golf course and tavern under a single purchase agreement, which allocated the purchase price among golf course and tavern assets. After the acquisition, the debtor transferred the tavern assets to a new entity, owned by the same family members that owned the debtor, for no consideration. The debtor charged the tavern nominal rent. The debtor and the tavern were under the same management, used a single bank account for both entities, did not follow any particular method in allocating expenses between the two entities, did not keep separate financial records, and did not observe corporate formalities in the dealings between the two entities. The tavern was the alter ego of the debtor and, as a separate matter, should be substantively consolidated with the debtor under either the Auto-Train or Augie-Restivo test, even though it was not itself a debtor. Simon v. Brentwood Tavern, LLC (In re Brentwood Golf Club, LLC), 329 B.R. 802 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2005).

12.1.oooooo Nominee trust property is property of the estate. Fourteen years before bankruptcy, the debtor's parents transferred their houses to a Massachusetts nominee trust, with their daughter as trustee and their three children as equal co-beneficiaries. Section 365(h), permitting sale of interests of the debtor and of co-tenants in real property, applies to the houses. A nominee trustee differs from an express trust in that it creates more of an agent/principal relationship than a trustee/beneficiary relationship. The beneficiaries may direct the actions of the trustee, and the Massachusetts courts have treated a beneficiary's ownership interest in the trust as an ownership interest in the trust assets. The relationship among beneficiaries may be characterized as tenants in common or as partners, but will be characterized as partners only if the trust was formed for business purposes. Therefore, the debtor's interest in the trust's real property was as a co-tenant, to which section 365(h) applies. Genova v. ESM Realty Trust (In re Stoll), 330 B.R. 470 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).

12.1.pppppp Delaware district court adopts Production Resources analysis of fiduciary duty to creditors. A liquidating trustee sued the debtor's former director for breach of fiduciary duty in approving a merger that ultimately led to the debtor's financial troubles. The court adopts the Delaware Chancery Court's analysis in Prod. Res. Group, L.L.C. v. NCT Group, Inc., 863 A.2d 772 (Del. Ch. 2004), to determine that the directors' fiduciary duty does not change upon approaching insolvency, but only affects a different constituency, the creditors. Whether a debtor is in the vicinity of insolvency is determined by the Bankruptcy Code's definition of "insolvent"—liabilities exceeding assets "at a fair valuation." If the debtor was operating and satisfying its obligations following the questioned transaction, "fair valuation" should be determined on a going concern basis. Finally, directors are entitled to the benefit of the business judgment rule in defending against a claim of breach of fiduciary duty, even when the corporation is in the vicinity of insolvency. The plaintiff therefore must show that the directors breached one of their duties, of care, candor, and loyalty, that is, the duty to refrain from self-dealing or benefiting from the proposed transaction, to get past the business judgment rule and hold a director liable. Liquidation Trust v. Fleet Retail Fin. Group (In re Hechinger Inv. Co.), 327 B.R. 537 (D. Del. 2005).

12.1.qqqqqq Trustee may not bring breach of duty claim against directors where the corporate charter exculpates. The debtor's corporate charter contained the provision, authorized by Delaware law, that exculpates directors from liability to the corporation for the breach of the duty of care. The trustee nevertheless sued the directors for breach of their fiduciary duty of care, arguing that the debtor was in the vicinity of insolvency at the time of the breach, the directors therefore owed a fiduciary duty to creditors, and that the charter provision only exculpated the directors from liability to the corporation, not to creditors. The Second Circuit rejects the trustee's argument. Under section 541, the trustee may assert only the debtor's claims, not claims that creditors might have against third parties. Since the charter provision precludes the debtor corporation from bringing the claims, the trustee is similarly precluded. In reaching its conclusion, the court notes the Delaware Chancery Court's decision in Prod. Res. Group, LLC v. NCT Group, Inc., 863 A.2d 772 (Del. Ch. 2004), which held that a breach of fiduciary duty claim belongs to the corporation and not the individual creditors, who could raise the claim only derivatively. Pereira v. Farace, 413 F.3d 330 (2d Cir. 2005).

12.1.rrrrrr Parent company debt issuance that imposes restrictions on subsidiary may breach parent's fiduciary duty. Holdco I owned Holdco II, which owned Holdco III, which owned about 70% of the debtor's publicly traded common stock. Three of the debtor's four directors were also the Holdcos' directors. The Holdcos issued debt with covenants that required them to prevent the debtor from issuing debt under certain financial conditions. The Holdco debt proceeds were upstreamed to Holdco I's parent entity, also controlled by the same directors. The trustee sued the directors for breach of fiduciary duty. The directors argued that the debt at the Holdco levels did not harm the debtor, because the debtor was not a party to the debt instruments and was not in a position to issue any debt anyway, because of restrictions in the debtor's own loan agreements. The court concludes that the debt issuance may have constituted a breach of the duty of loyalty. A director's exploitation of his position for personal gain breaches the duty of loyalty and may justify an unjust enrichment award, even if there was no damage or detriment to the debtor. The fiduciary rules requiring loyalty are prophylactic, so any act of disloyalty, such as use of information or misuse of control that results in a personal profit, may be actionable. Cantor v. Perelman, 414 F.3d 430 (3d Cir. 2005).

12.1.ssssss Fraud against the debtor and veil piercing claims are property of the estate, which a creditor may not pursue. Before bankruptcy, the debtor's shareholders lied to a major creditor about a possible sale of the debtor. Believing the shareholders, the creditor did not file an involuntary petition against the debtor, but it did so once it learned the statement was untrue. In the meantime, the shareholders caused the debtor to transfer substantial sums to an affiliate. The creditor sued the shareholders after bankruptcy in state court claiming damages from the fraud; the shareholders removed to the bankruptcy court, where the trustee brought a separate action against the shareholders for recovery of the amounts transferred. The actions were consolidated. When the trustee sought to settle the actions, the creditor argued that the settlement should not bind the creditor, who should be free to pursue the state law action against the shareholders. The court disagrees. Although the creditor was indirectly harmed by the resulting loss in value of the debtor corporation, the primary harm was to the debtor, who was the sole owner of the claim against the shareholders. The claim became property of the estate under section 541, and the trustee had the exclusive right to pursue it. Therefore, the creditor could not pursue the claim that the trustee settled. In addition, the creditor's veil piercing claim against the shareholders belonged to the debtor as a matter of state law, so it vested solely in the trustee under section 541. The court notes that the question is solely one of state law, but reviews the numerous bankruptcy court decisions that have ruled on the issue. In re Bridge Info. Sys., Inc., 325 B.R. 824 (Bankr. E D. Mo. 2005).

12.1.tttttt Claim against directors for issuing false financial statements is not property of the estate. The liquidation trust trustee sued the debtor's former directors, relying on a plan provision that granted him standing to pursue the debtor's claims against the former directors. One claim sought recovery for damages arising from the directors causing the debtor to issue false financial statements, in violation of the securities laws. However, the trustee could not allege how the issuance harmed the debtor (as opposed to shareholders or other third parties who may have relied on the financial statements). Therefore, the debtor did not have a claim that the trustee could pursue. Rahl v. Bande, 328 B.R. 387 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).

12.1.uuuuuu Trustee may pursue claims assigned by creditors. With the aid of numerous appraisers, brokers, title insurance companies and others, the debtor conducted a real estate fraud scheme against mortgage lenders by obtaining under-collateralized mortgage loans to purchase properties. After bankruptcy, the lenders assigned their claims outright to the trustee, intending that the trustee pursue the accomplices for recovery. The mortgage lenders retained no interest in the claims, agreeing to share only as general unsecured creditors in the assets of the estate, which would be augmented by the trustee's recovery on the assigned claims. The trustee has standing to pursue the claims on the unique facts of this case. Because of the outright assignments, the claims belonged to the estate, so the trustee was not pursuing creditors' claims. The claims became property of the estate, and the trustee was authorized to take the assignments, because of section 541(a)(7), which includes property acquired after the commencement of the case. The transaction did not violate Caplin v. Marine Midland Grace Trust Co., 406 U.S. 416 (1972), because the lenders had decided for themselves how they wished to dispose of the claim and the defendants did not suffer the risk of inconsistent adjudications on the trustee's and the lenders' claims. Finally, the trustee is not subject to the in pari delicto defense, because he is pursuing the claims of creditors, not of the debtor under section 541(a)(1). Logan v. JKV Real Estate Servs. (In re Bogdan), 414 F.3d 507 (4th Cir. 2005).

12.1.vvvvvv Breach of duty claim against directors need not be pleaded with specificity in federal court. The bankruptcy trustee brought a claim against the directors in the bankruptcy court in Delaware. Under Delaware corporate law, a director has the benefit of the business judgment rule, which is a "presumption that directors making a business decision, not involving self-interest, act on an informed basis, in good faith and in the honest belief that their actions are in the corporation's best interest." Under Delaware Chancery Rules, which read the same as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure but are construed differently, a plaintiff must plead with specificity the facts that would enable it to overcome that presumption. However, that pleading rule does not apply in federal court, in which notice pleading is adequate. The plaintiff need plead only enough to give the defendant fair notice of the general factual background of the claim. Even so, pleading only that the directors made a bad business decision is not enough to withstand a motion to dismiss. The plaintiff must also plead enough facts to show that the decision was irrational, in bad faith, or a product of self-dealing. Stanziale v. Nachtomi (In re Tower Air, Inc.), 416 F.3d 229 (3d Cir. 2005).

12.1.wwwwww Claim related to improper letter of credit draw may be property of the estate. The debtor's non-debtor subsidiary contracted to build a steel mill. The debtor guaranteed completion, posted a letter of credit to secure the guarantee, and posted cash collateral with the letter of credit issuer to secure the reimbursement obligation under the letter of credit. A dispute arose over completion, the customer drew the letter of credit, and the issuer applied the collateral to the debtor's reimbursement obligation. The debtor in possession sued to recover the collateral. The claim is property of the estate. Although the letter of credit and its proceeds are not property of the estate, the collateral, which the debtor posted, and the claim to recover it based on the improper draw are property of the estate over which the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction. Int'l Fin. Corp. v. Kaiser Group Int'l, Inc. (In re Kaiser Group Int'l, Inc.), 399 F.3d 558 (3d Cir. 2005).

12.1.xxxxxx Funds were not property of the debtor where the debtor had only possession, not dominion or control. The debtor provided a service for freight shippers. It accumulated bills from their carriers each week, allowing its customer the shipper to make only one payment each week to the debtor, who would issue separate checks to each of the carriers. Under the debtor's contract with the shipper, the shipper would wire transfer the funds to the debtor each Monday, and the debtor would issue and mail checks to the carriers Monday evening. The debtor was not prohibited under the contracts from commingling shippers' funds. Shortly before bankruptcy, the debtor started taking advantage of the float and not issuing or mailing checks for up to 3 weeks, unless the shipper complained. One shipper did so, and the debtor issued and mailed $4.5 million of checks for this shipper within 90 days before bankruptcy. The payments were not a preference to the shipper, however, because the funds that the shipper advanced were never "property of the debtor," as section 547(b) requires for preference liability. Although the debtor could (and did) divert shippers' funds to its own uses, it did so without authority. It did not properly have dominion and control over the funds but was more like a bailee, who has only a possessory interest. In a footnote, the court questions whether the shipper is even a creditor, musing that because the debtor had used the shipper's funds to pay the carriers on time, a debt (which arises only when an obligation is part due) had not arisen. Lyon v. Contech Constr. Prods., Inc. (In re Computrex, Inc.), 403 F.3d 807 (6th Cir. 2005).

12.1.yyyyyy Controlling customers may be liable for breach of fiduciary duty and related claims. The debtor supplied parts to the automotive industry. When its costs of goods rose and its customer contracts became unprofitable, its three major customers asserted substantial control over its operations, brought in a turnaround management firm, which operated the debtor's business for the benefit of the customers, caused the debtor to enter into an Accommodation Agreement with the debtor's lender that resulted in the reduction of the lender's exposure, the lender's forbearance from exercising remedies, and a substantial increase in the customers' own accounts receivable from the debtor. The debtor's sole shareholder cooperated in the process and before the debtor's bankruptcy established a new corporation that subsequently took over the debtor's assets and customers. Within about 6 months, the debtor filed a chapter 7 case. After bankruptcy, the new corporation sold its assets to an unrelated third party in a transaction that the customers arranged, and the proceeds were used to pay the customers' accounts receivable from the debtor. The debtor's trustee sued the controlling customers, the debtor's sole shareholder, and the turnaround firm on numerous theories. In ruling on the defendants' motions to dismiss the complaint, the court made the following rulings. Being an "insider" under the Bankruptcy Code does not impose any fiduciary duties. However, under Tennessee law, a defendant that actually exercises domination and control over a corporation may owe fiduciary duties to the corporation the same as the directors or a majority shareholder. A defendant who owes a fiduciary duty to a corporation may be liable for the tort of deepening insolvency under Tennessee law, which is an actionable breach of fiduciary duty when it results in dissipation of assets that would otherwise be available for creditors, when debts are inflated without regard to the best interest of the corporation, and when the controlling defendants' debts are selectively paid. A claim for breach of fiduciary duty belongs to the corporation, so the trustee has standing under section 541 to bring the claim, to the exclusion of creditors. The in pari delicto defense is not available where the defendants so dominated and controlled the debtor that the debtor was not the principal wrongdoer but the controlling defendants caused the wrongs that the debtor may have perpetrated. The debtor's payment of its law firm's fees in connection with the Accommodation Agreement was for the benefit of the customers and so was potentially recoverable as a preference from the customers. Finally, under Tennessee law, a corporation may not assert a claim against its shareholder under an alter ego theory, so the trustee may not assert such a claim under section 541, nor is it a claim sufficiently common to all creditors that the trustee may assert it under section 544(a). Limor v. Buerger (In re Del-Met Corp.), 322 B.R. 781 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 2005).

12.1.zzzzzz In pari delicto* defense does not apply where only two of three directors participated in the breach of duty. The closely held debtor had three directors. Two of them formed a new corporation and diverted corporate opportunities and allowed the new corporation to use the debtor's assets for less than reasonably equivalent value. The trustee sued the two directors and the new corporation, who pleaded an in pari delicto defense, arguing that the debtor had caused the transfer of opportunities and assets. However, because fewer than all of the directors were involved in the breach of duty, the adverse interest exception applies, rebutting the presumption that the action of the debtor's agent should be imputed to the debtor. O'Neil v. New England Road, Inc. (In re NERI Bros. Constr.), 323 B.R. 540 (Bankr. D. Conn. 2005).

12.1.aaaaaaa The in pari delicto defense is available against a bankruptcy trustee. All of the debtor's principals were convicted for operating a fraudulent business scheme. The trustee alleged that a stockbroker assisted in the scheme and thereby harmed creditors. The trustee sued and sought damages. The stockbroker moved to dismiss based on an in pari delicto defense. On appeal, the district court concluded that the First Circuit would allow that defense against a trustee in bankruptcy, who was not involved in the fraud, because the action against the stockbroker was property of the debtor that vested in the estate under section 541. It was therefore subject to all of the defenses that would be available if the debtor had brought the action before bankruptcy. The action was therefore dismissed. Creditors were not precluded, however, from pursuing individual actions against the stockbroker for any damages that they may have suffered. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc. v. Nickless (In re Advanced RISC Corp.), 324 B.R. 10 (D. Mass. 2005).

12.1.bbbbbbb The in pari delicto defense and its exceptions apply in a partnership case. Where the plaintiff participated in the wrongdoing of which it complains, the defendant may assert the in pari delicto defense against liability. When the defendant was an agent of the plaintiff, the adverse interest exception may apply: when the agent is acting in a manner adverse to the interests of the principal, the normal rule that an agent's knowledge is imputed to the principal might not apply. The Revised Uniform Partnership Act codifies this rule in section 102(f). The sole actor doctrine is an exception to the adverse interest exception: when the agent and the principal are one and the same, the agent's knowledge is imputed to the principal, despite the adverse interest exception. RUPA does not codify the sole actor doctrine, but it applies under RUPA section 104, which permits supplementing of RUPA's provisions with "principles of law and equity." In this case, the sole individual who controlled the sole general partner in numerous investment limited partnerships defrauded the limited partners and their partnerships. In their bankruptcy case, the general partner and the investment partnerships were substantively consolidated. When the trustee sued a third party who had facilitated the fraud, the third party successfully argued that the in pari delicto doctrine applied, because the general partner masterminded the fraud. He also successfully argued that the sole actor doctrine applied, because, among other things, the individual in control of the general partner was the sole actor on behalf of the general partner and the investment limited partnerships, as the bankruptcy court had underscored by ordering substantive consolidation of the estates. Grassmueck v. Am. Shorthorn Ass'n., 402 F.3d 833 (8th Cir. 2005).

12.1.ccccccc Secured creditor receives both repaired collateral and insurance proceeds. The lender took cross-collateralized security interests in various aircraft engines and any insurance proceeds to secure several different loans. One engine was damaged. The debtor repaired it prepetition but did not seek insurance proceeds. After the chapter 11 case was filed, the lender repossessed the repaired engine. After the case converted to chapter 7, the trustee recovered the insurance proceeds. The lender claimed a security interest in the funds. The lender was entitled to both the engine and the insurance proceeds. Under UCC section 9-306(A), insurance proceeds are "proceeds" of collateral, even when the collateral has been repaired and has not been disposed of or otherwise transformed. Although UCC section 9-306 limits the creditor to only one satisfaction, on the facts of this case, the creditor was not receiving more. The creditor's other collateral had also been damaged, and overall, the creditor was undersecured. Therefore, receiving both the repaired engine and its proceeds did not amount to a double recovery. Stanziale v. Finova Capital Corp. (In re Tower Air, Inc.), 397 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 2005).

- 12.1.ddddddd A postpetition crop disaster relief payment is not property of the estate. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, Congress enacted a crop disaster relief program for a prepetition crop year. The payment under the program was not property of the estate. The debtor's interest in the payment at the petition date was at most a "mere hope" that legislation would be enacted and therefore did not qualify under section 541(a)(1) as an interest of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case. Moreover, because the payment was not made from proceeds of the non-existent crop, it did not qualify as property of the estate under section 541(a)(6), which "cannot retroactively create a property interest that did not exist at the commencement of the case." Burgess v. Sikes (In re Burgess), 392 F.3d 782 (5th Cir. 2004).
- 12.1.eeeeeee Court denies substantive consolidation of related debtors for lack of reliance. The debtors operated convenience store chains. Their principal also owned a nondebtor fuel supply company that supplied gasoline to the debtors. After the debtors' petition date, to secure its own obligations to Amoco Oil Co., the fuel supply company transferred to Amoco a lien that the fuel supply company had on the debtors' fuel inventory. Amoco then allowed the fuel supply company to provide the debtors in possession postpetition financing from funds otherwise payable to Amoco. When the debtors' business failed, Amoco asserted that its claim against the fuel supply company should be allowed as an administrative expense against the estate or that the debtors and the fuel supply company should be substantively consolidated, because Amoco dealt with them as a single economic unit. The court denies substantive consolidation, because consolidation should be used sparingly, especially to consolidate a nondebtor company with a debtor, which should be done only under the most unusual and compelling circumstances. Because Amoco dealt separately with the debtors and the fuel supply company, the affairs of the debtors and the fuel supply company were not entangled, and consolidation would harm the debtors' creditors, the court denies consolidation. In re FAS Mart Convenience Stores, Inc., 320 B.R. 587 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2004).
- 12.1.fyyyyyy Plan disbursing agent's claim against accountant is limited by debtor's fraud and creditor's privity with accountant. The debtor's management falsified the debtor's financial statements. The auditor performed its audits negligently and did not uncover the fraud. A minority creditor/stockholder was entitled to remove management based on financial statement triggers, but the fraudulent financial statements prevented the creditor from exercising its right to do so. Upon plan confirmation, the estate and the creditor each assigned their claims against the auditor to the plan disbursing agent to pursue on behalf of the general unsecured creditors. The disbursing agent's claims received from the estate, which received them under section 541 from the debtor, were limited by the in pari delicto doctrine. The court provides a thorough and detailed explanation of the operation of the doctrine, of the adverse interest exception to the doctrine, of the (so-called) innocent insider exception to the adverse interest exception, and of the sole actor rule. Similarly, the disbursing agent's claims received from the creditor may not be pursued unless the creditor was in privity with the auditor or the auditor knew, and showed that it knew, the creditor would rely on its work for a particular purpose. Ernst & Young v. Bankruptcy Servs., Inc. (In re CBI Holding Co.), 311 B.R. 350 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); rehearing granted, bankruptcy court's opinion vacated, judgment for defendants. The trustee did not prove the abandonment of the adverse interest exception necessary to claim in the right of the debtor against a third party. Ernst & Young v. Bankruptcy Servs., Inc. (In re CBI Holding Co.), 318 B.R. 761 (S.D.N.Y.2004).
- 12.1.ggggggg Bill of sale recharacterized as secured financing. The debtor leased equipment to a third party lessee. It later assigned the lease to CIT, granted CIT a security interest in the equipment, executed a bill of sale purportedly transferring the equipment to CIT, and agreed to repurchase the equipment as is, where is, from CIT at the end of the lease term for the remaining loan balance on the equipment if the lessee did not exercise the lease's purchase option. CIT did not file a financing statement for the transaction. The debtor's bank, however, had filed a financing statement to perfect its security interest in all of the debtor's equipment. After the lease expired, the lessee did not purchase the equipment, and the debtor filed bankruptcy, CIT and the bank each claimed the proceeds of the later sale of the equipment. Despite the bill of sale, the debtor's transaction with CIT was a secured financing, not a sale, as evidenced in part by the grant of a security interest but more importantly by the back-end repurchase obligation. Because the bank's security interest was perfected and CIT's was not, the bank was entitled to the proceeds. Stillwater Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. v. CIT Group/Equipment Fin., Inc., 383 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2004).

12.1.hhhhhh Asset non-disclosure results in judicial estoppel. The debtor was injured in a maritime accident one year before bankruptcy but did not disclose the claim in its schedules. He disclosed it at the 341 meeting, but said that it was barred by the statute of limitations. The trustee therefore did not pursue it and filed a no-asset report, which the bankruptcy court accepted. When the debtor pursued the action in state court, the defendant moved to dismiss on judicial estoppel grounds. Because judicial estoppel is designed to protect the court's integrity, it does not require the defendant's reliance. In this case, the claim is dismissed under judicial estoppel, because the debtor took clearly inconsistent positions, the bankruptcy court accepted the debtor's statute of limitations position, and the non-disclosure was not inadvertent. Even though the case was pending in state court, the federal (bankruptcy) judicial estoppel principles apply, because the debtor took the prior inconsistent position before the bankruptcy court. Without explanation, the court does not preserve the asset for the trustee or the debtor's creditors. Superior Crewboats Inc. v. Primary P & I Underwriters, 374 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2004).

12.1.iiiiii Debtor's malpractice claim arose postpetition and was not property of the estate. Before bankruptcy, the debtor sought alimony in state court. After bankruptcy, the state court ruled against the alimony request. The trustee sought to include the debtor's malpractice action against his divorce attorney as property of the estate. State law determines what interests in property the debtor has and when they arise; federal law determines what constitutes property of the estate. Under applicable state law, a legal malpractice claim does not accrue until the plaintiff suffers loss. In this case, that occurred after bankruptcy, so the asset is not property of the estate. Witko v. Menotte (In re Witko), 374 F.3d 1040 (11th Cir. 2004).

12.1.jjjjjj Court refuses to impose constructive trust on tax refund. Before bankruptcy, the debtor and its subsidiaries entered into a tax sharing agreement, under which the debtor would pay taxes for the consolidated group, income producing subsidiaries would pay their share to the debtor, and the debtor would pay tax savings or refunds to the subsidiaries that produced the losses that gave rise to the savings or refunds. After bankruptcy, the trustee received a tax refund largely attributable to the debtor's insurance company subsidiary, which was in liquidation. The insurance company's receiver sought to impose a constructive trust on the refund. The court, construing New York law, concludes that the presence of a written agreement precludes the imposition of a constructive trust, that there was no fraud or inequitable conduct that would justify its imposition, and that the interposition of bankruptcy requires courts to act cautiously before imposing a constructive trust, especially in this context. Although the estate was enriched, it was not enriched unjustly. "[T]he short—and conclusive—answer is that this is not injustice, it is bankruptcy." That is, bankruptcy defeats most contractual expectations, and that does not give rise to a right to a constructive trust. Superintendent of Ins. v. Ochs (In re First Central Fin. Corp.), 377 F.3d 209 (2d Cir. 2004).

12.1.kkkkkk Trustee does not succeed to breach of fiduciary duty claims as an avoiding power. The reorganization plan appointed a liquidating trustee as an estate representative to succeed to all causes of action under the avoiding powers in chapter 5 of title 11, but not to actions that were property of the estate under section 541. The liquidating trustee brought an action under section 544 against a former officer and director of the debtor. The trustee asserted the director breached his fiduciary duty by orchestrating a payment to a joint venture, where the director was also a director of one of the companies in the joint venture. The trustee did not have standing to pursue the action, because section 544(b) grants the trustee only the power to “avoid any transfer” of the debtor’s property. Because the action for breach of fiduciary duty belongs to the corporation as a matter of state law, it did not vest in the liquidating trustee. Moreover, section 550 provides the sole remedy for an action avoiding a transfer. Because the defendant here was neither the initial transferee or a person for whose benefit the transfer was made, the trustee did not have a remedy and therefore did not have an avoiding power of claim. Savage & Associates, P.C. v. BLR Services SAS (In re Teligent, Inc.), 307 B.R. 744 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2004).

12.1.IIIIII Debtor’s pension interest that is subject to IRS lien is not property of the estate.

Under ERISA and the Supreme Court’s decision in Patterson v. Shumate, 504 U.S. 753 (1992), the debtor’s interest in an ERISA qualified pension plan does not become property of the estate, because the plan contains anti-alienation language and section 541(c)(2) excludes from property of the estate the debtor’s interest in any property if it is subject to an enforceable non-bankruptcy law restriction on transfer. However, the IRS tax lien takes precedence over the ERISA transfer limitation, and the IRS tax lien attaches to the debtor’s interest in the pension plan. When the debtor files a chapter 13 case, if the pension interest becomes property of the estate, the IRS has a secured claim under section 506(a) and must be paid in full over the term of the plan. Otherwise, the IRS has only an unsecured claim in the case (though its lien will survive against the pension plan outside of bankruptcy), and its claim may be paid in part and discharged. The Ninth Circuit rules that the debtor’s interest in the pension plan is not property of the estate. The ERISA restriction on transfer is generally enforceable. Even though it is not enforceable against the IRS, the unenforceability against a single creditor does not cause the property to become property of the estate. United States v. Snyder, 343 F.3d 1171 (9th Cir. 2003).

12.1.mmmmmmm A breach of fiduciary duty claim against directors is property of the estate.

Minority shareholders brought claims against preferred shareholders and individual directors for breach of fiduciary duty in rejecting valuable offers to purchase the company and for imposing a refinancing that was expensive and not market tested. Because the damage from the alleged actions was to the corporation, rather than only to the minority shareholders, the action is a derivative action, which is an asset of the corporation and therefore an asset of its bankruptcy estate. Any recovery would be distributed in accordance with the Bankruptcy Code, first to creditors before payment to shareholders. Therefore, the district court properly dismissed the complaint. Kennedy v. Venrock Assocs., 348 F.3d 584 (7th Cir. 2003).

- 12.1.nnnnnnn Creditors' trust succeeds to debtor's actions against directors. The debtor in possession brought adversary proceedings against its directors and shareholders for a variety of claims, including breach of fiduciary duty to the corporation. Upon confirmation of the plan, the claims transferred to a creditors' trust. The alleged breach of duty occurred while the corporation was solvent, so the defendants argued that the creditors' trust, acting on behalf of creditors, could not maintain the action. The First Circuit holds, however, that the creditors' trust succeeds to the rights of the debtor in possession, who sues in the name of the debtor. As such, recoveries are for the benefit of the corporation, which are paid first to creditors because the breached obligation was owed to the corporation. Liston v. Gottsegen (In re Mi-Lor Corp.), 348 F.3d 294 (1st Cir. 2003).
- 12.1.ooooooo Court denies substantive consolidation because of prejudice to creditors. The parent holding company and two subsidiaries shared some officers and directors, guaranteed loans, and made intercompany loans without adequate documentation. The creditors' committee moved for substantive consolidation, which would have substantially decreased the recovery of creditors of two of the entities. In the Eighth Circuit, substantive consolidation requires a showing of necessity due to the inter-relationship among the debtors, that the benefits of consolidation outweigh the harms to creditors, and prejudice resulting from not consolidating. In re Giller, 962 F.2d 796 (8th Cir. 1992). This case did not meet that standard, because of the substantial prejudice to creditors from consolidating and the absence of prejudice from not consolidating to creditors who relied on the true relationship. In re Huntco Inc., 302 B.R. 35 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2003).
- 12.1.ppppppp Funds from a provisionally honored check funded into a trust account is property of the estate. The debtor was a title company, which maintained trust accounts for receipt and disbursement of funds. One of its customers tendered an NSF check, which the bank provisionally honored. The debtor issued a check to the party entitled to the funds, and that check cleared the debtor's trust account bank account before the deposited check was returned NSF. The court construes the provisional honoring of the deposited check as a provisional loan from the bank to the debtor, relying on In re Cannon, 277 F.3d 838 (6th Cir. 2002). It concludes that the funds were not held in trust, even though they were deposited in the trust account, because they were proceeds of a loan from the bank rather than a deposit by the customer. Accordingly, the check to the payee was paid from property of the debtor, and the trustee may recover the transfer if the other elements of the avoiding power cause of action are met. Dayton Title Agency, Inc. v. The White Family Companies (In re Dayton Title Agency, Inc.), 292 B.R. 857 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2003).
- 12.1.qqqqqqq Specially designated funds do not become property of the estate. The debtor installed and maintained advanced telecommunications services for the public schools. Under the 1996 Telecommunications Act, the government reimburses a school for installation and maintenance costs that it had paid to the debtor by paying the debtor. Under federal regulations, the debtor is required to forward the payment to the school within ten days. Upon bankruptcy, the trustee sought to recover the payment from the government and not pay it to the school. The First Circuit directs that the payment go to the school. First, the court looks to the role that the debtor was intended to play, which was merely a vehicle for delivering reimbursement to the school. Second, the regulatory controls in place required immediate pay over of the funds and prohibited the debtor from making use of any of the funds. Third, recognizing a greater ownership interest in the debtor would defeat the regulatory purpose. Finally, the court recognized that the debtor could not sue the government directly for the payment, because it had already been paid. The court eschewed the use of any trust language in reaching its conclusion, as possibly confusing. Springfield v. Ostrander (In re LAN Tamers, Inc.), 329 F.3d 204 (1st Cir. 2003).

- 12.1.rrrrrrr Interest of debtor as sole member of LLC passes to the trustee. The debtor was the sole member of a limited liability company. The debtor argued that upon bankruptcy, the trustee was entitled to a charging order on the LLC interest but not the interest itself. The court disagrees, holding that the trustee takes all of the debtor's interest. Although the applicable Colorado statute provides for a charging order in the case of the bankruptcy of an LLC member, the court rules that the provision is intended only to protect other LLC members. In this case, where there are none, the trustee is entitled to the interest and may then manage and dissolve the LLC as the trustee chooses. In re Albright, 291 B.R. 538 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2003).
- 12.1.sssssss Property held by Qualified Like-kind Exchange Intermediary must be conveyed to the buyer. The debtor was a Qualified Intermediary for like-kind exchange transactions under section 1031 of the Internal Revenue Code. Its client had completed all of its obligations under the like-kind exchange agreement. The only remaining performance at the time of the debtors bankruptcy was for the debtor to convey the purchased real property to the client. On the client's complaint for specific performance, the court rules that the like kind exchange contract is no longer an executory contract, because the only remaining performance is the transfer of title and because the trustee held only bare legal title to the property. Accordingly, the court orders specific performance. Manty v. Miller & Holmes, Inc. (In re Nation-wide Exchange Services), 291 B.R. 131 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2003).
- 12.1.ttttttt Substantive consolidation survives Grupo Mexicano. In Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S.A. v. Alliance Bond Fund, 527 U.S. 308 (1999), the Supreme Court ruled that without statutory authorization, the equity power of a federal court does not extend beyond remedies that were historically available from a court of equity in 1789. Because substantive consolidation is an equitable remedy that the bankruptcy court imposes, the equity committee objected to a plan providing for substantive consolidation. The bankruptcy court rules that the Grupo Mexicano rationale does not apply to substantive consolidation. The remedy was recognized by the Supreme Court in 1941 in Sampsel v. Imperial Paper and Color Corp., 313 U.S. 215 (1941). Moreover, the power to order substantive consolidation is to insure equitable treatment of all creditors as consistent with the bankruptcy court's general equitable powers. It is also contemplated under section 1123(a)(5)(C), which permits a plan to provide for "merger or consolidation of the debtor with one or more persons." In re Stone & Webster, Inc., 286 B.R. 532 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).
- 12.1.uuuuuuu Escrowed funds are not property of the debtor. The debtor lawyer maintained a client trust account for real estate closings. He misappropriated funds to invest in commodity futures. After his scheme collapsed and he filed for bankruptcy, the trustee sued the commodity brokerage for fraudulent transfer and for damages relating to fraud in connection with the commodity investments. The Sixth Circuit rules that the escrowed funds were not property of the debtor, because the debtor held bare legal title and no equitable interest. Even though the debtor converted the funds to his personal use by reason of the misappropriation, the debtor did not thereby obtain title to the property. What is more, the trustee did not have standing to claim damages from the commodity broker, because the damages were suffered by the beneficiaries of the escrow account, not by the debtor. Stevenson v. J.C. Bradford & Co. (In re Cannon), 277 F.3d 838 (6th Cir. 2002).
- 12.1.vvvvvvv Pre-petition security interest continues in post-petition fees. The debtor was a member of a law partnership which had done substantial work on a contingent fee matter. The law firm had granted a security interest in the contingent fee to the bank. During the litigation, the attorney filed a personal bankruptcy, dissolving the partnership. He reached an agreement with his former partners to take over the litigation in exchange for two-thirds of the contingent fee. The litigation was subsequently resolved. The bank claimed its security interest in the entire fee. The court of appeals upholds the bank's position on the ground that the transfer of the contingent fee receivable from the law firm, which had granted the security interest, to the individual lawyer did not extinguish the bank's interest, under former U.C.C. section 9-306. Although the attorney had performed substantial work on the matter after bankruptcy, the court found that the funds had been received before bankruptcy and the commitment of the security interest did not indicate that the receipt of the funds was contingent on the performance of substantial further legal services, so the assignment of the potential receivable did not prevent the bank from receiving the entire contingent fee. Cadle Company v. Schlichtmann, 267 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 2001).

12.1.wwwwwww Third Circuit recognizes claim for “deepening insolvency.” Standing in the shoes of the debtor, the creditors' committee sued the debtor's accountant for its participation in a Ponzi scheme that resulted in substantially deepening the insolvency of the debtor and unnecessarily prolonging the debtor's business life. Attempting to apply Pennsylvania law, the Third Circuit rules that a tort cause of action for deepening insolvency can be pursued by the corporation if it was harmed by the actions of others. In this case, however, the court concludes that the debtor was in pari delicto with the accounting firm and therefore cannot pursue the claim. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. R. F. Lafferty & Co., Inc., 267 F.3d 340 (3d Cir. 2001).

12.1.xxxxxxx Assets re-vest in estate after post-confirmation conversion. The confirmed plan provided for the establishment of a liquidating corporation, which would liquidate assets and distribute them to creditors pro rata based on their claims. The plan did not specifically provide what would happen to the assets remaining in the liquidating corporation if the case were converted to chapter 7 after confirmation. The Ninth Circuit rules that the assets re-vest in the chapter 7 estate, even though plan confirmation typically terminates the existence of the estate under section 1141. Pioneer Liquidating Corp. v. United States Trustee (In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortgage Entities), 264 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2001).

12.1.yyyyyyy State choice of law rules apply. A New York liquidator in a New York bankruptcy case of a Boston-based law firm filed an action against Idaho clients to collect fees earned by Boston partners in the law firm. The court of appeals rules that the New York bankruptcy court that heard the suit should apply the same choice of law rules that a New York state court would apply, unless there was a compelling federal interest in the action. Because the action was based solely on state law and found its way to federal court only because the law firm had filed bankruptcy, the choice of law rules of the forum state apply Bianco v. Erkins (In re Gaston & Snow), 243 F.3d 599 (2d Cir. 2001).

12.1.zzzzzzz Ninth Circuit adopts broad substantive consolidation rules. Raejean Bonham operated a Ponzi scheme in her own name and through two wholly-owned corporations, whose separate existence was never preserved and which did not file bankruptcy petitions. The trustee sought substantive consolidation to bring preference and fraudulent transfer claims against investors who had been repaid by the corporations in the Ponzi scheme. In approving the bankruptcy court's substantive consolidation order, the Ninth Circuit (1) adopts the Second Circuit's Augie/Restivo, 860 F.2d 515 (2d Cir. 1988), test of whether the creditors dealt with the entities as a single economic unit and did not rely on their separate identity in extending credit or whether the affairs of the debtor are so entangled that consolidation will benefit all creditors; (2) measures “harm” as harm to the entity being consolidated, not to investors, so that inability to recover fraudulent transfers and thereby equitably distribute assets would constitute harm; (3) adopts the more restrictive and sparing view of consolidation, contrary to the Eleventh Circuit's view permitting more frequent consolidation; (4) authorizes substantive consolidation for the sole purpose of preserving the trustee's avoiding powers; (5) permits nunc pro tunc consolidation, effective as of the date of the petition; and (6) permits consolidation between the debtor and non-debtor affiliates. Alexander v. Compton (In re Bonham), 229 F.3d 750 (9th Cir. 2000).

- 12.1.aaaaaaa A trust cannot have an “alter ego.” The debtor’s wife had created an irrevocable trust under which she was the sole trustee and the debtor was one of the beneficiaries. The court rejected a theory that the debtor was the alter ego of the trust on the grounds that the trust “is fundamentally a relationship” and does not have a separate existence as a legal entity. Babitt v. Vebeliunas (In re Vebeliunas), 252 B.R. 878 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2000); aff’d Babitt v. Vebeliunas (In re Vebeliunas), 332 F.3d 85 (2d Cir. 2003).
- 12.1.bbbbbbbb Property of the reorganized debtor does not vest in the post-confirmation chapter 7 estate. Several years after confirmation of the plan, the court converted the chapter 11 case of the debtor to a case under chapter 7. The trustee sought recovery of property that had been property of the chapter 11 estate. Holding that the property of the chapter 11 estate had fully revested in the reorganized debtor, the B.A.P. concludes that the reorganized debtor’s property did not become property of the chapter 7 estate upon conversion. As an alternative, the B.A.P. suggests an involuntary petition against the reorganized debtor, rather than conversion, as a means of bringing property into the chapter 7 estate. Harker v. Troutman (In re Troutman Ents., Inc.), 253 B.R. 1 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2000).
- 12.1.cccccccc Partner’s interest in partnership became property of the estate even though partner continued in the partnership. A partner in a law firm filed a voluntary chapter 7 petition but continued as a partner in the firm thereafter. The partner’s interest in the partnership became property of the estate as of the date of the petition, and the partnership was liable to the chapter 7 trustee for the value of that interest even though the trustee did not pursue the partnership until after year-end distributions had been made. Beaman v. Shearin (In re Shearin), 224 F.3d 346 (4th Cir. 2000); Beaman v. VanDebenter Black, L.L.P. (In re Shearin), 224 F.3d 353 (4th Cir. 2000).
- 12.1.dddddddd Malpractice claim for filing the wrong petition is property of the estate. The debtor’s attorney was supposed file a chapter 11 petition but mistakenly filed a chapter 7 petition instead. The debtor sued the attorney for malpractice. The Court of Appeals rules that the malpractice claim became property of the estate, because the malpractice claim accrued upon the filing of the petition. Section 541(a)(1) includes in the estate an interest of the debtor in property “as of” the commencement of the case. Because the malpractice claim arose as of the commencement of the case, it belonged to the estate, not the debtor. Johnson, Blakely, Pope, Bokor, Ruppel & Burns, P.A. v. Alvarez (In re Alvarez), 224 F.3d 1273 (11th Cir. 2000).
- 12.1.eeeeeeee Embezzled funds do not become property of the estate. The debtor embezzled funds from a corporation in which he was a 50% shareholder. The embezzled funds did not become property of his estate, because a thief does not take title to stolen property. The court contrasts embezzlement (a form of larceny) with false pretenses, on the grounds that the victim of larceny never intends to part with title to the property. However, goods that the debtor purchased with the embezzled funds become property of the estate, because the debtor actually obtained legal title to the goods, even though the debtor obtained no equitable interest in them. Kitchen v. Boyd (In re Newpower), 233 F.3d 922 (6th Cir. 2000).
- 12.1.ffffff Property obtained as an agent does not become property of the estate. The creditor gave the debtor a check, which the debtor was supposed to loan to a corporation jointly owned by the debtor and the creditor. The debtor instead embezzled the funds. The court held that the creditor was entitled to a return of the money because the debtor was the creditor’s agent for the purpose of making the loan to the corporation, and property that the debtor holds as an agent never becomes property of the state, because an agent never takes title as against his principal. Kitchen v. Boyd (In re Newpower), 233 F.3d 922 (6th Cir. 2000).

- 12.1.gggggggg Former community property is not property of the estate. The debtor and his former spouse partitioned their community property in a divorce action before the debtor filed bankruptcy. The trustee argued that because the partitioned property remained liable for community debts incurred before the divorce, the now-separate property of the former spouse became property of the estate under section 541(a)(2)(B), which makes interest of the “debtor’s spouse and community property as of the commencement of the case that is liable for an allowable [community] claim.” The Fifth Circuit rejects the trustee’s argument, holding that because the property was already the separate property of the former spouse before bankruptcy, it did not become property of the estate. Andersen v. Conine (In re Robertson), 203 F.3d 855 (5th Cir. 2000).
- 12.1.hhhhhhhh Court registry funds are not property of the estate. The Ninth Circuit rules that funds deposited by the debtor prepetition into the registry of the district court to secure the debtor’s obligation to pay a potential future judgment in a civil action did not become property of the estate upon the filing of the bankruptcy, because the prepetition jury verdict and judgment, as well as the court’s unentered order releasing the funds to the plaintiff, all occurred prepetition, divesting the debtor of any interest in the funds before the bankruptcy petition was filed. McCarthy, Johnson & Miller v. North Bay Plumbing, Inc. (In re Pettit), 217 F.3d 1072 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 12.1.iiiiiii A restaurant debtor may be subject to PACA claims. Under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, certain purchasers of perishable agricultural commodities such as brokers and dealers are subject to a floating trust on all of their assets in favor of unpaid produce suppliers. In a case of first impression at the court of appeals level, the Third Circuit holds that a restaurant that purchases products in wholesale or jobber quantities is a “dealer” within the meaning of the act. Magic Restaurants, Inc. v. Bowie Produce Co., Inc. (In re Magic Restaurants, Inc.), 205 F.3d 108 (3d Cir. 2000).
- 12.1.jjjjjjj Technical abandonment under section 554(c) may be revoked under Rule 60(b). Reviewing the various approaches to the effect of reopening a case under section 350(b) on a technical abandonment under section 554(c), the Tenth Circuit rejects all reported rationales (discretionary, automatic, or irrevocable) in favor of a rule that permits revocation under Rule 60(b) for a mistake or inadvertence. Woods v. Kenan (In re Woods), 173 F.3d 770 (10th Cir. 1999).
- 12.1.kkkkkkkk Inadvertent failure to disclose claim may create judicial estoppel. The debtor did not disclose a potential claim against an unsecured creditor in its schedules or in a list of assets attached to a stipulation for relief from the stay with a secured creditor. The failure to disclose, though perhaps inadvertent, created a judicial estoppel against the debtor, preventing it from taking a position inconsistent with the absence (that is, nondisclosure) of the claim. The claim against the unsecured creditor was therefore dismissed. Browning Manufacturing v. Mims (In re Coastal Plains, Inc.), 179 F.3d 197 (5th Cir. 1999).
- 12.1.llllllll Bankruptcy trustee is first in line in claims against defrauding principals. Where a numerous individual creditors of the debtor asserted claims against the former principals of the debtor for claims arising out of their fraud and the trustee on behalf of the estate asserted “claims to the same limited pool of money, in the possession of the same defendants, as a result of the same act, performed by the same individuals, as part of the same conspiracy,” the bankruptcy court properly enjoined the creditors’ action to allow the trustee to proceed first. Although the claims by the individual creditors were not property of the estate, their pursuit would interfere with the trustee’s claim and could be enjoined. Fisher v. Apostolou, 155 F.3d 876 (7th Cir. 1998).
- 12.1.mmmmmmmm Trustee may pursue assigned claims. A trustee may pursue, for the benefit of all creditors, claims assigned to the trustee postpetition by fewer than all of the general unsecured creditors. The property comes into the estate under section 541(a)(7), and the recovery is for the benefit of all creditors, not just the assignors. Steinberg v. Kendig (In re Ben Franklin Retail Stores, Inc.), 225 B.R. 646 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1998).

- 12.1.nnnnnnnn Court limits assignability of avoiding power claims. The debtor's liquidating plan assigned the right to bring all avoiding power actions to the debtor's sole secured creditor, for no additional consideration. The court rules that because there is no benefit to the estate or unsecured creditors, the assignment is invalid and the creditor does not have standing to bring the action. SouthTrust Bank, N.A. v. WCI Outdoor Products, Inc. (In re Huntsville Small Engines, Inc.), 228 B.R. 9 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 1998).
- 12.1.oooooo Collected sales taxes constitute a trust fund. The debtor collected Texas sales taxes from its customers before bankruptcy but failed to pay the taxes to the state once the petition was filed. The Ninth Circuit holds that under Texas law, the funds collected before bankruptcy constitute trust funds, using the lowest intermediate balance test as a tracing rule, and rejecting the debtors argument that only voluntary payment of commingled funds identifies the trust res. Nevertheless, even though the funds were property of the state, the debtor was liable to the state for the statutory rate of interest on the unpaid taxes, not just the interest earned on the state's funds, and the interest would be allowed as an administrative expense. Texas Comptroller of Public Accounts v. Megafood Stores, Inc. (In re Megafood Stores, Inc.), 163 F.3d 1063 (9th Cir. 1998).
- 12.1.pppppppp Post-petition contingent fee payment may be property of the estate. The debtor, an attorney, entered into a contingent fee agreement before bankruptcy. Seventy-five percent of the services were performed before bankruptcy. Based on the conclusion of the services after bankruptcy, a large fee was awarded. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel awarded 75% of the fee to the trustee. Even though post-petition services were required to obtain the contingent fee, the B.A.P. split the proceeds based on the percentage of work performed pre-petition and post-petition. Jess v. Carey (In re Jess), 215 B.R. 618 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).
- 12.1.qqqqqqqq Malpractice claim arises pre-petition and is property of the estate. The debtor was indicted and convicted for nondisclosure of significant assets in his bankruptcy filing, giving rise to a malpractice claim against his attorney. Rejecting the analysis of In re M. Frenville, Co., 744 F.2d 332 (3d Cir. 1984), the Fifth Circuit rules that the malpractice claim against the attorney arose pre-petition, when the debtor should have discovered the malpractice, rather than upon the occurrence of the injury, which under Mississippi law was at the time of the indictment. As a result, the claim is property of the estate. Only the trustee, not the debtor, may pursue it. Wheeler v. Magdovitz (In re Wheeler) 137 F.3d 299 (5th Cir. 1998).
- 12.1.rrrrrrrr Post-petition, prejudgment tort claims are property of the estate, but may not be sold. Employees of the debtor committed business torts against the debtor-in-possession. Another company bought all of the assets of the estate from a subsequently appointed bankruptcy trustee and sued the former employees for the torts. In a confused reading of the bankruptcy law, the Third Circuit holds that notwithstanding state law restrictions on transferability of prejudgment tort claims, the tort claims became property of the estate. The Third Circuit saw no purpose in distinguishing between pre- and post-petition tort claims in this case. The court went on to hold that although section 541 makes the claims property of the estate, the trustee may not sell the claims contrary to New Jersey state law. A simpler solution would have been to compare section 541(c), which pre-empts state anti-assignment law, with section 363(l), which does not. Integrated Solutions, Inc. v. Serv. Support Specialties, Inc., 124 F.3d 487 (3d Cir. 1997).

12.1.ssssssss Proceeds of letter of credit may constitute property of the estate. Prepetition, the debtor's potential long-term lender drew on a letter of credit issued by the debtor's bank to fund a commitment fee for the potential loan. The loan never closed, and the bankruptcy trustee sought recovery of the commitment fee from the potential lender as property of the estate. Holding first that the doctrine of independence does not apply because the action was against the recipient of the draw, the Sixth Circuit concludes that the trustee may seek recovery from the potential lender under section 542 (turnover of property of the estate) to the extent that the commitment fee was unearned. Demczyk v. Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York (In re Graham Square, Inc.), 126 F.3d 823 (6th Cir. 1997).

12.2 Turnover

12.2.a Debtor must turn over to the trustee funds in a bank account as of the petition date. An individual debtor had written several checks that were uncleared as of the petition date but cleared later. The trustee demanded turnover from the debtor of the funds that the bank paid after the petition date. Section 542(a) requires an "entity in possession, custody, or control, during the case [of property of the estate to], deliver to the trustee, and account for, such property or the value of such property" The section's only time reference is "during the case," which does not limit the trustee to a turnover action only against an entity that has possession, custody, or control at the time of the action, but permits such an action against an entity that had possession, custody, or control at any time during the case. In addition, the section permits the trustee to recover the value of the property, which is a remedy that makes sense where the defendant no longer has possession, custody, or control. Therefore, the court orders the debtor to turn over the funds in the bank account as of the petition date (or their value), even though she no longer has possession, custody, or control of the funds. Shapiro v. Henson, 739 F.3d 1198 (9th Cir. 2014).

12.2.b Trustee succeeds to client's right to turnover of attorney work product. The corporate debtor's plan created a liquidating trust as successor to the estate to pursue, among other things, claims against former officers for mismanagement. The trustee moved for turnover from the debtor's former counsel of all materials relating to the debtor that counsel had in its possession. Section 542(e) permits a court to order an attorney to turn over or disclose to the trustee recorded information relating to the debtor's property or financial affairs, subject to any applicable privilege. The work product privilege protects an attorney's work from an adversary, so as not to allow the adversary a "free ride" on an attorney's work. It does not protect against disclosure to the attorney's own client. The trustee succeeds to the debtor's rights as the attorney's client, so the attorney may not assert the work product privilege against the trustee, who is entitled to turnover. McKinstry v. Genser (In re Black Diamond Mining Co., LLC), 507 B.R. 209 (E.D. Ky. 2014).

12.2.c Turnover under section 542 does not apply to an action to collect a debt for unjust enrichment. The trustee sued the defendants under section 542(a) for turnover under an unjust enrichment theory. Section 542(a) requires an entity "in possession, custody, or control, during the case, of property that the trustee may use, sell, or lease under section 363 ... [to] deliver to the trustee, and account for, such property". By contrast, section 542(b) requires "an entity that owes a debt that is property of the estate and that is matured, payable on demand, or payable on order [to] pay such debtor to, or on the order of, the trustee". A third party's debt to the debtor for unjust enrichment becomes property of the estate under section 541(a)(1). Such a claim is not matured, payable on demand or payable on order, so section 542(b) does not apply. Section 542(a) does not apply to an action to collect a debt. Therefore, the trustee may not recover against the defendants in a turnover proceeding. Lovald v. Falzerano (In re Falzerano), 454 B.R. 81 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).

12.2.d Bank must turnover account balance, even without instructions. The debtor filed a chapter 7 petition. The bank where the debtor maintained deposits learned of the bankruptcy, froze the debtor's accounts and three days after the petition date sent a letter to the trustee advising that the balances were “in bankruptcy status” and would remain so until receipt of the trustee’s direction or until the time for objecting to exemptions expired (30 days after the 341 meeting) and requesting instructions on where to send the account balances. The same day, the bank sent a letter to debtor’s counsel advising of its actions. The bank was not a creditor and so did not assert a setoff right. The debtor did not claim the account balances as exempt in the schedules filed with the petition but amended his exemption claim 5 days after the date of the letter to claim 75% of the account balances as exempt. The trustee never responded to the bank, but the debtor demanded turnover of the funds and filed a motion seeking sanctions for a stay violation, all before the 341 meeting. Property that the debtor claims as exempt first becomes property of the estate and remains such at least until the trustee abandons it or sets it aside as exempt or the deadline for an exemption objection expires. Section 362(a)(3) stays any act to exercise control over property of the estate. It requires anyone who has control over property of the estate not to retain the property. Section 542(b) requires that a bank holding a debtor’s account pay the account balance to the trustee or his order, except to the extent the bank asserts a setoff right. Failure to turnover property of the estate violates both the automatic stay and the turnover provision. The debtor has standing to object to the stay violation, though not to the turnover violation, because the debtor’s right to exempt the property confers standing for purposes of section 362(k). Taking these provisions together, the bank is obligated to turnover the property (although the court does not say to whom), so as not to place the litigation burden on the debtor. Mwangi v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (In re Mwangi), 432 B.R. 812 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2010).

12.2.e Court orders turnover of letter of credit proceeds to the estate. The debtor sold and leased back property to its lessor. The lessor financed the purchase price with a lender. The lease required that the debtor obtain a standby letter of credit to secure damages payable upon breach of the lease. The lessor assigned the letter of credit to the lender. When the debtor filed bankruptcy and breached the lease, the lessor’s lender drew on the letter of credit. The amount drawn exceeded the lessor’s conceded damages arising from the debtor’s breach of the lease. The debtor in possession may obtain turnover from the lender of the excess as property of the estate. The letter of credit was to secure only the debtor’s obligation to the lessor under the lease, not the lessor’s obligation to the lender. Therefore, neither the lessor nor the lender is entitled to the benefit of a letter of credit draw in excess of the amount the debtor owes as damages under the lease. The turnover order does not implicate the independence principle, because it does not interfere with the bank’s payment on the draw. The court does not address, however, how letter of credit proceeds the bank paid to the lender are property of the debtor and therefore of the estate. Two Trees v. Builders Transport, Inc. (In re Builders Transport, Inc.), 471 F.3d 1178 (11th Cir. 2006).

12.2.f Trustee may not use turnover action to recover a disputed unsecured claim. The trustee brought a turnover action against the debtor’s credit card processor for amounts that the processor had collected but not paid over to the debtor or the estate. The processor claimed various recoupments and offsets arising out of fees and chargebacks. The court dismisses the trustee’s complaint, because the processor does not hold property of the estate. When a customer uses a credit card to pay for the debtor’s goods or services, the customer’s credit card bank pays the processor, who becomes liable to the debtor for the amount charged, subject to any charges or chargebacks allowable under the processing agreement. The processor does not thereby receive any property of the debtor. Accordingly, the trustee may not assert a turnover claim under section 542(a). The trustee may not assert a turnover claim under section 542(b) in this case either. That section requires “an entity that owes a debt that is property of the estate and that is matured, payable on demand, or payable on order” to pay the debt to the trustee. Where, however, there is a material dispute about the third party’s debt or its amount, the debt does not qualify as “matured, payable on demand, or payable on order,” and the trustee may pursue the claim against the third party only under a breach of contract theory. Leonard v. Optimal Payments Ltd. (In re Nat’l Audit Defense Network), 332 B.R. 896 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2005).

- 12.2.g Attorney's files are subject to turn-over. The buyer of the debtor's assets joined the debtor in seeking turn-over from the debtor's lawyers of their papers relating to litigation against the buyer's affiliate. The Purchase Agreement provided for the buyer to have access to the documents. Rejecting the lawyers' arguments, the court rules that section 542(e) applies to the files, even though all of the debtor's assets have been sold to the buyer, because section 542(e) applies regardless of whether the documents are property of the estate. In addition, the lawyers did not have liens on the files and were required by state bar rules to turn over client files upon termination of an engagement. Therefore, the court ordered turn-over without payment of any of the lawyers claims. American Metrocomm Corp. v. Duane Morris & Heckscher LLP (In re American Metrocomm Corp.), 274 B.R. 641 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).
- 12.2.h Use of subpoenaed documents turned over under Rule 2004 is limited. A receiver had seized all of the debtor's documents before the filing of an involuntary bankruptcy petition. The trustee sought turnover of the documents under Rule 2004 from the receiver. The court overruled the debtor's Fourth Amendment and Fifth Amendment objections to the request, holding that Fifth Amendment protection ended when the debtor turned the documents over to the receiver. But the court limited the trustee's ability to share the documents with any third party without prior approval of the court or in response to a search warrant or subpoena issued by another court. In re Lufkin, 255 B.R. 204 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2000).
- 12.2.i Trustee may use turnover power of section 542 to obtain property after avoiding a transfer. The trustee avoided an unrecorded leasehold under section 544(a), which merged with the estate's fee interest in the property, so that the estate had unencumbered title to the property. The trustee may seek turnover under section 542 instead of recovery of the property transferred under section 550(a), because the automatic preservation of section 551 had already rendered the entire property as property of the estate. Dunes Hotel Assocs. v. Hyatt Corp., 245 B.R. 492 (D.S.C. 2000).
- 12.2.j Debtor held in contempt for failure to revoke asset protection trust. The bankruptcy court found it incredible that the debtor would irrevocably transfer 90% of his net worth to an off shore asset protection trust with no ability to recover the trust res, and thus held the debtor in civil contempt with a fine of $10,000 per day plus incarceration until the debtor complied with the bankruptcy court's turnover order. In re Lawrence, 238 B.R. 498 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1999).
- 12.2.k Turnover power may not be used to recover property transferred pre-petition. A fifty percent shareholder used $40,000 of the corporation's funds and $90,000 of his own to purchase the corporation's note to the bank. The debtor later filed a bankruptcy. The trustee could not recover the $40,000 from the shareholder because he was no longer in possession of the debtor's funds when the adversary proceeding was brought. Hager v. Gibson, 109 F.3d 201 (4th Cir. 1997).
- 12.2.l Lack of knowledge of source of funds is not a defense to a turnover proceeding. A law firm received a deposit from a corporation, which filed bankruptcy four days later. The corporation's principal asked for a return of the money, advising the law firm (who knew about the bankruptcy) that the money had come from the individual. The law firm returned the funds to the individual, but was later required to account for the value of the funds to the bankruptcy trustee because the law firm had enough knowledge to place a reasonable person on notice that the property might have belonged to the debtor. Boyer v. Carlton, Fields, Ward, Emmanuel, Smith & Cutler, P.A. (In re U.S.A. Diversified Products, Inc.), 100 F.3d 53 (7th Cir. 1996).

12.3 Sales

- 12.3.a Trustee cannot sell water rights free and clear of a forfeiture action. The debtor owned disputed water rights. Under applicable state law, water rights constituted only a right to use a certain amount of water, not ownership of the water itself. The public owned all water. Failure to use the rights for a certain period forfeited the rights. Nearby landowners claimed the debtor had forfeited the rights and brought a forfeiture action in state court before the debtor's bankruptcy. Success in the forfeiture action results only in the water rights being returned to the state's water pool, not in an injunction or money judgment. In the bankruptcy, the trustee moved to sell the water rights free and clear of any adverse interest. Section 363(f) permits a sale of property of the estate free and clear of disputed interests. Because the forfeiture action would not result in a money judgment or injunction, the plaintiffs do not hold claims against the estate or any interest in the debtor's water rights. Therefore, section 363(f) does not permit sale free and clear of the forfeiture action. In re Sugarloaf Holdings, LLC, 640 B.R. 270 (Bankr. D. Utah. 2022).

12.3.b Court authorizes sale free and clear of successor multi-employer pension plan liability.

The debtor operated a grocery store. After it filed chapter 11, the debtor in possession proposed to sell the estate's assets to another grocery store operator. The debtor had been a signatory to a collective bargaining agreement that required the debtor to contribute to a multi-employer pension plan. It had accrued a large liability to the plan when the closure of its other stores resulted in withdrawal liability. It sought to sell the remaining store free and clear of any successor liability to the pension fund, which the buyer refused to assume. Section 363(f) permits a sale to be free and clear of any interests in property of the estate if one of five conditions is met, including if the interest holder could be compelled to accept a money satisfaction of the interest. As a claimant, the fund could be compelled to accept money to satisfy its claim. "Interest" is broader than lien and includes any claim or interest arising out of the operation of the debtor's property. Here, the claim arose only by reason of the debtor's operation of the assets that are being sold, and the buyer would be liable only because it intended also to operate a grocery store. Therefore, the fund's claim is an interest in the estate's property, and the court may order the sale to be free and clear of that interest, thereby obviating successor liability. In re Norrenberns Foods, Inc., 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 1896 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. July 8, 2022).

12.3.c Credit bid may be subject to auctioneer's buyer's premium. The debtor in possession proposed an auction sale of assets that were subject to a lender's lien. The auction procedures provided for the payment of a "buyer's premium," essentially a commission to the auctioneer payable by the buyer, rather than the seller, in cash to the auctioneer. Section 506(c) permits the trustee to recover from collateral the reasonable, necessary costs and expenses of preserving or disposing of the collateral to the extent of any benefit to the creditor. To the extent the trustee can show that the buyer's premium meets these requirements, neither section 506(c) nor any other Code provision prohibits the imposition of the charge. In re Dalton Crane, LC., ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. S.D. Tex. June 29, 2022).

12.3.d Settlement of an estate's claim is not necessarily a sale. A business divorce situation resulted in a chapter 7 for the business and a chapter 11 for its former principal. The business' creditors, who had forced out the principal, asserted claims against the business and the principal. The principal asserted claims against the creditors. The chapter 7 trustee asserted claims against both the principal and the creditors. The trustee agreed to compromise with the principal, transferring the claims against the creditors to an affiliate of the principal, accepting a cash payment and a percentage of the affiliate's recovery on the claims against the creditors, and allowing as subordinated claims the principal's claims against the chapter 7 estate. Bankruptcy Rule 9019 governs approval of a compromise of claims, and section 363 governs approval of a sale of assets. A compromise of an estate's claims against a third party may be evaluated as a sale of the claim, but it need not be. Evaluation as a sale is more appropriate where the defendant does not assert claims against the estate. Where the transaction involves a complex exchange of consideration and mutual release of claims, sale analysis is not required. Spark Factor Design, Inc. v. Hjelmset (In re Open Medicine Inst., Inc.), 639 B.R. 169 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2022).

12.3.e Buyer with actual knowledge of adverse interest is not a good faith purchaser under section 363(m). A partnership granted a right of first refusal over a real estate parcel; the grantee recorded the right in the land records office. The partnership later dissolved, and the individual partners obtained the real estate. The individual partners filed bankruptcy. They did not list the grantee as a creditor or party in interest. The trustee sold the parcel free and clear of adverse interests to a buyer who had searched the land records and learned of the right. Neither the trustee nor the buyer notified the grantee of the sale. Later, the buyer sought to sell the parcel. The grantee objected and sued in state court to assert the right. Section 363(m) provides that an appellate court's reversal or modification of an order approving a sale may not affect the validity of a sale to a good faith purchaser of property of the estate. Section 363(m) applies broadly to protect any good faith purchaser's interest and so would protect the buyer here if in good faith. However, the buyer's constructive knowledge (through the recorded interest) and actual knowledge (through its examination of the land records) of the adverse interest and its failure to notify the grantee or the court of the right prevented the buyer from being a good faith purchaser. Archer-Daniels-Midland Co. v. Country Visions Coop., ___ F.4th ___, 2022 U.S. Ap.. LEXIS 9008 (7th Cir. Apr. 4, 2022).

- 12.3.f Section 363(f) permits sale free and clear of an easement. The debtor in possession sold real property that was subject to an easement in favor of a state agency. Section 363(f) permits sale of property of the estate free and clear of all interests. Although an easement is a property interest of the easement holder, it is an encumbrance that burdens property of the estate and therefore is an interest that may be extinguished by a free and clear sale. Port of Corpus Christi Auth. v. Sherwin Alumina Co., L.L.C. (In re Sherwin Alumina Co., L.L.C.), 932 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2019).
- 12.3.g To the extent provided in sale order, a committee may challenge a portion of a credit bid after a sale closes. The second lien lender advanced debtor-in-possession financing and proposed to purchase the estate's assets through a credit bid of its entire $63 million secured claim. The court approved bidding procedures. No other bidders appeared. The creditors committee claimed $7 million of the lender's claim should be recharacterized as equity. The DIP financing order preserved the committee's right to challenge the validity and enforceability within a "challenge period," which the committee did by filing an adversary proceeding. The sale order provided it did not affect any rights or remedies the committee might have against the lender. After the sale closed, the lender moved to dismiss the challenge based on the sale. Although the lender could have reduced its bid to its full claim minus the challenged portion, it did not do so. Because the sale order preserved the committee's rights and remedies and because a portion of the lender's consideration was the challenged amount, the court could provide a remedy if the challenged amount was recharacterized. Therefore, the court permits the challenge to proceed. Emerald Cap. Advisors v. Victory Park Cap Advisors, LLC (In re Katy Liquidating, Inc.), 607 B.R. 398 (D. Del. 2019).
- 12.3.h Eighth Circuit affirms finality of sale order despite alleged undisclosed side deals. The debtor in possession proposed a sale to a stalking horse bidder and bid and auction procedures, which the court approved. At the auction, a group of second lien creditors submitted a bid that the DIP's advisers valued higher, even though it had a lower face amount than the stalking horse bid. The court approved the second lien creditors' bid, finding the bid to be the highest and otherwise best, and the sale closed. After the case was converted to chapter 7, the trustee brought an action against the buyer, the advisers, and the creditors committee claiming there was an undisclosed agreement between the largest holder on the committee and the second lien creditors that promised the committee member a lucrative contract if the second lien creditors purchased the assets and that the advisers were aware of the agreement and manipulated the valuations to favor the second lien creditors' bid, resulting in a substantial loss of value to the estate. An order under section 363 approving a sale is an in rem order that is good against the world, not just against the parties to the transaction. It prohibits any attack on the sale, even an indirect one against the participants in the sale process, if it challenges any of the sale order's finding. The trustee's action effectively challenged the bankruptcy court's finding that the bid was the highest and otherwise best bid and therefore must be dismissed. Fulmer v. Fifth Third Equip. Fin. Co. (In re Veg Liquidation, Inc.), 931 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2019).

- 12.3.i Debtor in possession may sell hospital free and clear of state attorney general's restrictions on hospital's operations. In connection with a restructuring three years before bankruptcy, the debtor non-profit hospital had agreed with the state attorney general to maintain specified levels of emergency, intensive care, cardiac, and other services based on historical experience of the hospital operator. The agreement was binding on "any and all current and future owners" of the hospital. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession proposed to sell the hospital free and clear of those restrictions. Section 363(f)(1) permits sale of property of the estate free and clear of interests in the property if permitted under applicable nonbankruptcy law. "Interests" include any monetary obligations arising from ownership of the property. The restrictions are interests in the hospital property because they arise from the prior use and operation of the hospital. Therefore, section 363(f)(1) applies. In re Verity Health Sys. Of Calif., Inc., 598 B.R. 283 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2018).
- 12.3.j Section 363(f) does not authorize sale free and clear of claims among third parties. The debtor owned several insurance policies that funded asbestos claims against the debtor. The debtor's insurers had equitable contribution claim against each other and had entered into a cost sharing agreement that apportioned defense and indemnity costs. In its chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession proposed to sell one of the policies to the issuing insurer, free and clear of all claims of other insurers, so that the issuing insurer would no longer be liable to the other insurers for any claims arising from injured parties' claims against the debtor, and to enjoin the other insurers from pursuing any such claims. Section 363(f) permits sale of property of the estate free and clear of other interests. Courts have construed this authority broadly to encompass any "obligations that may flow from ownership of property or ... that are connected to, or arise from, the property being sold." Third party claims that are not against the debtor are not interests in property of the estate unless they are truly derivative of the debtor's own claims or they seek compensation directly from policy proceeds the debtor owns. Here, the inter-insurer claims arise only from rights among the insurers and not from any relationship to the debtor or its property. Therefore, section 363(f) does not authorize sale free and clear of the insurers' claims against the settling insurer. In re Fraser's Boiler Serv., Inc. ___ B.R. ___, .2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37840 (W.D. Wash. March 8, 2019).
- 12.3.k Court overrules objection to a credit-bid claim absent a showing that the reduced price would have resulted in a different sale. Before bankruptcy, the debtor engaged an investment banker to sell its business as a going concern. Ultimately, the debtor's private equity owner teamed with another financial firm to form a partnership to bid on the purchase. The bid included a credit bid of the PE firm's prepetition second lien debt and of the debtor in possession financing provided by the partnership. No other bidders appeared. After the sale, the Creditors Committee, which had reserved rights to challenge the second lien claim's allowance and priority, the DIP financing, and certain terms of the sale, sought to subordinate or disallow the DIP financing claim. In its complaint, the Committee did not allege that any other bidder would have bid at all, let alone for an amount that would have been the highest bid after disallowing or subordinating the DIP claim portion of the credit bid. Because disallowance or subordination would not have made a difference in the sale, the Committee does not state a claim on which relief can be granted, and the court dismisses the complaint. Official Comm. Of Unsecured Creditors v. Victory Park Cap. Advs., LLC (In re Katy Indus., Inc.), 590 B.R. 628 (Bankr. D. Del. 2018).
- 12.3.l Court reconsiders and denies merger termination fee approval after merger termination. The debtor in possession proposed a plan involving a merger. Before confirmation, it sought and obtained court approval of the merger agreement, which contained a provision for a termination fee that was payable if the debtor or debtor in possession terminated the agreement and pursued an alternative transaction, including an internal reorganization plan, but not if the buyer terminated the agreement. The agreement did not have a closing deadline. At the hearing on the merger agreement approval, there was some confusion about the circumstances in which the termination fee would become payable, and neither the DIP, the buyer, nor any other party in interest explained clearly to the court that because of the absence of a closing deadline, a regulatory disapproval would almost certainly require the debtor to terminate the agreement to be able to confirm a plan and exit bankruptcy. The court confirmed the plan. The buyer sought regulatory approval of the sale, which the regulator denied. Because interest was continuing to accrue on secured claims and the buyer refused to terminate the agreement, the debtor negotiated and signed an alternative transaction for a lower value and terminated the merger agreement. On a motion to reconsider the approval of the termination fee one year after the prior approval, the court determined that it misapprehended the facts because of the confusing and incomplete record at the approval hearing, granted reconsideration, and disallowed the fee upon the failure of regulatory approval. On appeal, even though the order was interlocutory, the court accepts the bankruptcy court's application of the heightened standard to alter or amend a judgment under Bankruptcy Rule 9023, under which a court may reconsider an order if it "has overlooked or misapprehended some factual matter that might reasonably have altered the result" and reconsideration is necessary to prevent manifest injustice or to correct a clear error of law. In this case, because the fee was effectively payable even if the buyer failed to get regulatory approval, it did not meet the legal standards required for approval of providing an actual benefit to the estate. The appeals court affirms the grant of reconsideration of the approval order as a manifest error of law and denies approval of the fee. In re Energy Future Holdings Corp., ___ F.3d ___, 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 25945 (3d Cir. Sept. 13, 2018), reh'g denied, (Oct. 24, 2018).

- 12.3.m Purchaser's knowledge of adverse claims precludes good faith finding. Before bankruptcy, the debtor sued his business partners. After bankruptcy, a company in which he claimed a 25% interest sued the same defendants. During the bankruptcy, the trustee settled with the defendants by agreeing to a distribution to them and to the transfer of the causes of action in the two law suits to the defendants. The debtor objected on the ground, among others, that the second lawsuit was not property of the estate. The court approved the sale, and the debtor appealed. Section 363(m) prohibits the reversal or modification on appeal of an order approving a sale to a good faith purchaser from affecting the validity of the sale. Good faith requires a purchase for value, in good faith (that is, without collusion or fraud), and without notice of adverse claims. Mere notice of only objections to the sale or of an appeal is not sufficient to defeat good faith. However, where the purchaser has been involved in litigation over the objection and has detailed, long-standing knowledge of the adverse claims, the purchaser has sufficient knowledge to defeat a good faith finding. In re Cooper, ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 163240 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 24, 2018).
- 12.3.n Order approving sale under section 363 precludes later action against debtor, committee, and their professionals relating to validity of the sale. The chapter 11 debtor in possession conducted an auction of its business. The winning bidder was a new company formed by the debtor's second lien holders. The court approved the sale under section 363 based on findings of adequate notice, fair sale process, and good faith, among other things. After the sale, the debtor converted the case to chapter 7. The chapter 7 trustee sued the second lien holders, the creditors committee, and the debtor's directors and professionals for damages based on fraud, collusion, and nondisclosure of important information during the sale process. Section 363(m) provides that a reversal or modification of a sale order on appeal does not affect the validity of a sale to a good faith purchaser. It protects the reasonable expectations of good faith purchasers who rely on a sale order. A sale order is good against the world. The trustee's complaint contravenes section 363(m)'s policy and the nature of a sale order as binding on the world. Therefore, the court dismisses the complaint. In re Veg Liquidation, Inc., 583 B.R. 203 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2018).
- 12.3.o Taxing agency failed to establish amount of adequate protection to which it was entitled in sale free and clear of successor liability claim against purchaser. The debtor owed taxes to the state taxing agency, which were secured by a lien on the debtor's real property that was junior to its lender's lien. Under state law, the purchaser in a bulk sale becomes liable to the taxing agency for all taxes that the seller has not paid. The trustee sold the debtor's property in bulk to a single purchaser free and clear of all claims and interests, including the taxing agency's claim against the purchaser, for a price less than the amount owed to the lender. Section 363(e) requires the bankruptcy court to provide adequate protection of an entity's interest in property of the estate to the extent that the estate's sale of the property decreases the value of the interest. The free and clear portion of the sale order decreased the taxing agency's interest in the property, because it prohibited the agency from pursuing the purchaser to collect the delinquent taxes. The interest holder has the burden of establishing the amount of the decrease for which the interest holder is entitled to protection. Having argued only that the decrease was the full amount of taxes owing, it failed to meet its burden, because neither the purchaser nor the lender would have accepted the sale on those terms. Ill. Dep't of Revenue v. Hanmi Bank, ___ F.3d ___, 2018 U.S. App. LEXIS 18555 (7th Cir. July 9, 2018).

12.3.p Lack of time between sale approval order and closing for appellant to seek stay does not affect section 363(m)'s applicability. The debtor in possession conducted an auction sale under section 363. The winning bidder was the debtor's sole shareholder, who had not been involved at all in the debtor's management for over two months before bankruptcy. The court approved the sale over the competing bidder's objection. The DIP advised the court of the need to close quickly to avert further financing needs. The court waived Rule 6004(h)'s automatic 14-day stay, enabling the sale to close later on the day the order was entered. The disappointed bidder appealed. Under section 363(m), the reversal or modification of a sale order may not affect the validity of a sale to a good faith purchaser. The "good faith" requirement imports three factors: the purchaser (i) acted without fraud, misconduct, or collusion and did not take grossly unfair advantage of other bidders; (ii) gave value, and (iii) did not know of any adverse claims. In this case, the purchaser's prior relationship with the debtor did not give rise to collusion or unfair advantage. When a purchaser buys at a fairly conducted auction, the purchaser gives value. A competing bidder's objection and even the bidder's expressed intention to appeal do not constitute knowledge of an adverse claim, else section 363(m) could be neutered in every case by an appeal. The lack of time between the sale's approval and consummation for an appellant to seek a stay pending appeal does not deprive the appellant of due process, especially here, where the DIP made clear for several weeks before closing that it intended to close immediately. Therefore, the court dismisses the appeal as moot. Mission Prod. Holdings, Inc. v. Old Cold LLC (In re Old Cold LLC), 879 F.3d 376 (1st Cir. 2018).

12.3.q Court reconsiders and denies merger termination fee approval after merger termination. The debtor proposed a plan involving a merger. Before confirmation, the debtor in possession sought and obtained court approval of the merger agreement, which contained a provision for a termination fee that was payable if the debtor or debtor in possession terminated the agreement and pursued an alternative transaction, but not if the buyer terminated the agreement. The agreement did not have a closing deadline. At the hearing on the merger agreement approval, there was some confusion about the circumstances in which the termination fee would become payable, and neither the DIP, the buyer, or any other party in interest explained clearly to the court that because of the absence of a closing deadline, a regulatory disapproval would almost certainly require the debtor to terminate the agreement to be able to confirm a plan and exit bankruptcy. The court confirmed the plan. The buyer sought regulatory approval of the sale, which the regulator denied. Because interest was continuing to accrue on secured claims and the buyer refused to terminate the agreement, the debtor negotiated and signed an alternative transaction for a lower value and terminated the merger agreement. On a motion to reconsider the approval of the termination fee one year after the prior approval, the court determined that it misapprehended the facts, because of the confusing and incomplete record at the approval hearing. Under Bankruptcy Rule 9023, a court may reconsider an order if it "has overlooked or misapprehended some factual matter that might reasonably have altered the result" and reconsideration is necessary to prevent manifest injustice or to correct a clear error of law. Under Bankruptcy Rule 9024, a court may grant relief from an order based on, among other reasons, mistake or "any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment." In this case, because the fee was effectively payable even if the buyer failed to get regulatory approval, it did not meet the legal standards required for approval of providing an actual benefit to the estate. If the court had properly understood the facts, it would not have approved the fee. The court grants reconsideration of the approval order as a manifest error of law and denies approval of the fee. In re Energy Future Holdings Corp., 575 B.R. 616 (Bankr. D. Del. 2017).

12.3.r A trustee may sell real property free and clear of a lessee's rights under section 365(h).

The destination resort debtor leased some of its real property to affiliates for long terms at nominal rents. The affiliates no longer operated facilities on the leased property. The secured lender's mortgage was senior to the leases, and foreclosure would have eliminated the leases. The trustee proposed to sell the real property free and clear of all interests under section 363(f), subject to a post-closing determination of whether section 365(h), which protects a tenant's possessory right after the trustee's rejection, prevented a sale free and clear of the leases. Section 363(f) and section 365(h) appear to conflict, but they each operate in their own separate spheres—in the contexts of sale of property and rejection of real property leases—which may overlap in some circumstances, as they do here. The court must attempt to harmonize the two provisions. Section 363(e) requires the court to provide adequate protection of an interest in property; its command covers leasehold interests. Section 363(f)(1) authorizes a sale free and clear of an interest in the property if “applicable nonbankruptcy law permits sale of such property free and clear of such interest.” Here, foreclosure law would permit such a sale. Therefore, the trustee may sell free and clear of these leases, but subject to the lessees' rights to adequate protection. Pinnacle Restaurant at Big Sky, LLC v. CH SP Acquisitions, LLC (In re Spanish Peaks Holdings II, LLC), 862 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2017).

12.3.s Lack of notice vitiates sale free and clear of recorded right of first refusal.

The debtor had previously granted a right of first refusal if the debtor sold its real property. The grantee recorded the right in the land records office. The debtor did not list the grantee on its creditors list filed with its chapter 11 petition, so the grantee did not receive written notice of the filing. The chapter 11 plan provided for a sale at auction of the real property free and clear of all claims and interests. The grantee did not receive written notice of the sale, and whether the grantee's attorney received oral notice shortly before the hearing on the sale was disputed. After the buyer sold the real property to a third party, the grantee sued the buyer for violating its right of first refusal. Rule 60(b)(4) permits a challenge to a sale order “in the rare instance where a judgment is premised either on a certain type of jurisdiction error or on a violation of due process that deprives a party of notice of the opportunity to be heard.” The lack of notice to the grantee meets this requirement. Section 363(m) and general bankruptcy policy protect a good faith purchaser at a bankruptcy sale. The recording of the right of first refusal gave constructive notice to the world of the right, preventing the purchaser from being a good faith purchaser for this purpose. Therefore, the court determines that the sale order was not effective to convey the real property free and clear of the right of first refusal. In re Olsen, 563 B.R. 899 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2017).

12.3.t Court may reconsider and set aside sale approval order under Rules 9023 and 9024.

The debtor manufactured boats. It contracted with a design company to jointly design a new boat and with a manufacturing company to make the tooling needed to produce the boats. The contract with the manufacturer included a license of the design to permit manufacture and a schedule of payment for the manufacturing company's work. The boats were more difficult to build than expected, and the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The debtor in possession negotiated with the manufacturer and reached a settlement agreement, subject to court approval, under which the manufacturer would waive claims, make a one-time payment and pay royalties for each of the new boats sold during the next seven years. Separately, the debtor in possession moved to sell its assets in whole or in lots, depending on the bids. It did not mention the agreement with the manufacturer in the sale motion or any other sale materials. At the auction, the new boat-related assets were sold separately. The debtor in possession notified the manufacturer of the sale and that it would not seek court approval of the settlement agreement a few days after the sale hearing but before the entry of the sale approval order, which found the purchaser in good faith but did not refer to the license agreement. The sale closed five days after entry of the sale approval order, but the debtor in possession still retained the sale proceeds, and the purchaser had not yet taken physical possession of the assets. Fourteen days later, the manufacturer filed a motion to reconsider under Rule 9023 and to set aside the judgment under Rule 9024. Section 363(m) prohibits an order on appeal from affecting the validity of a sale to a good faith purchaser for value under section 363 unless the sale was stayed pending appeal. Rule 9023 incorporates F.R.C.P. 59(e), which permits a court to alter or amend a judgment to account for new law or new evidence or to correct a clear error of law or prevent manifest injustice. Rule 9024 incorporates F.R.C.P. 60(b), which permits a court to relieve a party from a judgment based on mistake, new evidence, fraud or any other reason that justifies relief. Because section 363(m) refers only to an appeal, it does not prevent a court from altering or amending a judgment or granting relief from a judgment under Rule 9023 or 9024. Here, the nondisclosure to the court of the license agreement and its effect on value is newly discovered evidence that warrants altering the sale order to excise the good faith finding. The nondisclosure, the lack of notice to the manufacturer, and the lack of prejudice to the purchaser provide sufficient reason to justify relief from the sale approval order. Therefore, the court revokes the sale order and orders a new auction, with full notice of all assets and contracts to be included. In re Gunboat Int'l, Ltd., 557 B.R. 410 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2016).

12.3.u Debtor in possession may sell free and clear of Coal Act-governed retiree benefits. The debtor operated coal mines with union labor. The 1992 Coal Industry Retiree Health Benefit Act established vehicles for retiree benefit payments and governed their operation. It requires coal mine operators to pay monthly premiums to a fund. In its chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession proposed to sell some of its mines. The only bidder required the debtor in possession to reject its collective bargaining agreements and its retiree benefits and that the sale be free and clear of all liabilities, including Coal Act obligations. The Tax Anti-Injunction Act (TAIA) prohibits an injunction against the collection of taxes. By its characterization of an exaction, Congress may determine whether it is subject to the TAIA. Here, Congress provided no alternative means to challenge payments after collection and treated the payments like ordinary ERISA plan payments. Therefore, Congress did not intend premiums to be subject to the TAIA, and the court has jurisdiction to consider a sale free and clear order that would prevent later collection of the premiums. Section 363(f) permits a sale free and clear of interests in the property if the interest holder could be compelled to accept a money satisfaction of the interest. Courts read “interest” broadly to promote flexibility and to maximize the estate’s value. Under the broad reading, Coal Act premiums are interests in property. The retirement benefit plan and the retiree beneficiaries could be compelled to accept a cash payment for their claims. Therefore, the bankruptcy court may authorize the sale free and clear of Coal Act premium liabilities. A corporate successor might be liable for its predecessor’s obligations. An asset purchaser of less than all a seller’s assets is not necessarily a successor, and an arms’-length purchaser does not generally become a successor in interest for Coal Act purposes. The Bankruptcy Code’s policy is to provide a breathing spell and enhance creditor recoveries. Therefore, the bankruptcy court has authority to provide in a sale order that the purchaser is not a successor in interest for Coal Act purposes. United Mine Workers of Am. Combined Benefit Fund v. Walter Energy, Inc., 551 B.R. 631 (N.D. Ala. 2016).

12.3.v Second Circuit adopts “prepetition conduct plus prepetition contact or relationship” test for scope of sale free and clear order. The debtor manufactured products with a serious defect, which it did not disclose. It filed a chapter 11 case, gave extensive publication notice and direct mail notice, but not direct mail notice to its customers who bought the product, and sold its assets under section 363 free and clear of all claims and interests. The product defect was revealed several years later, and people injured by the defect sued the buyer under a successor liability theory. Section 363(f)’s “free and clear” provision should be read in parallel with section 1141 to apply to claims and interests against the debtor that flow from the debtor’s ownership of the sold assets to the same extent as under a plan confirmation order. A claim is subject to treatment in bankruptcy if it arose before the order cutting off the creditor's rights (sale order or confirmation order). For this purpose, a claim arises if it is a right to payment that "resulted from prepetition conduct fairly giving rise to the claim" as long as there is "some contact or relationship between the debtor and the claimant such that the claimant is identifiable" at the release date. Here, people injured before entry of the sale order were subject to the bar order. So were people who purchased the product before the sale order but were not injured until after, because they had a relation with the debtor, and their claims were contingent at the date of bankruptcy. Therefore, subject to due process compliance, the claims were subject to release. Elliott v. General Motors LLC, 829 F.3d 135 (2d Cir. 2016).

- 12.3.w Court may authorize sale of real property free and clear of an easement. The debtor constructed a 15-story condominium tower that blocked an easement granted in 1920 in favor of adjacent property owners. Physical changes adjacent to the property rendered the easement effectively unusable. The debtor knew of the easement and brought litigation to have it declared void, but abandoned the litigation before its conclusion. The debtor proposed a plan to sell the property and the building free and clear of the easement to pay its secured lender. The lender agreed to a carve-out to pay the easement beneficiaries for their loss. One easement beneficiary objected to the sale free and clear. The beneficiary had an opportunity to litigate the easement's validity and obtain an injunction against the building before it was built but sat on his rights. Section 365(f)(5) permits a trustee to sell property free and clear of an interest if the interest holder may be compelled, in a legal or equitable proceeding, to accept a money satisfaction of the interest. An easement is an interest in property. Under applicable state law, an easement holder whose rights are violated can be compelled to accept a money satisfaction instead of an injunction directing removal of the obstruction based on the equities, such as the extent of impairment, the defendant's hardship in removing the obstruction, whether alternatives would afford more equitable relief and whether money damages would be a just and adequate remedy. Generally, equity will not require an encroacher to tear down a building unless the encroachment was willful and the violated property rights are substantial. In this case, preserving the easement would cause substantial harm to the debtor, the beneficiary's rights are not substantial, any benefit of the easement would be nominal and the beneficiary sat on his rights. Because, under state law, the beneficiary could be compelled to accept a money satisfaction, the plan may authorize the sale free and clear of the easement. In re Metroplex on the Atlantic, LLC, 545 B.R. 786 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2016).
- 12.3.x Section 363(n) action proceeds are not proceeds of the underlying sold property. The debtor in possession sold all its encumbered assets in a section 363 sale and paid the sale proceeds to the secured lender. The sale proceeds were less than half the lender's secured claim amount. After the case was converted to chapter 7, the trustee hired counsel to sue the purchaser for collusion under section 363(n), seeking actual and punitive damages equal to the balance of the secured lender's claim plus the amount of allowed unsecured claims. The purchaser prevailed. Counsel sought allowance of its fees. Section 330 does not permit allowance of compensation for professional services that were not reasonably likely to benefit the estate. The fee objector, who was the section 363(n) defendant, argued that if the secured lender was entitled to all the proceeds of the trustee's lawsuit, then the action would not have been reasonably likely to benefit the estate. A section 363(n) claim vests solely in the trustee and so is property acquired by the estate after the commencement of the case. Under section 552, property acquired after commencement is not subject to a prepetition lien except to the extent the property is proceeds of the petition-date collateral. "Proceeds" is what is acquired upon sale or other disposition of property or from loss or damage. Proceeds of the trustee's avoiding powers are not proceeds of petition-date property of the estate; the avoiding power claims arise only upon and because of the bankruptcy and are therefore independent of the underlying property from which they arise. Similarly, the trustee's section 363(n) claim was not proceeds of the lender's petition-date collateral, so counsel's services were reasonably likely to benefit the estate at the time they were rendered. Arlington Cap. LLC v. Bainton McCarthy LLC, 534 B.R. 337 (N.D. Ind. 2015).

- 12.3.y Trustee may sell fully encumbered property only under an approved carve-out agreement. The trustee determined that the secured lender's lien was valid and proposed to abandon the collateral. The lender asked the trustee to sell the collateral under section 363 in exchange for half the proceeds. The trustee agreed and sought bankruptcy court approval. Generally, a trustee should not sell fully encumbered property, because there is no benefit to the estate, and there is a risk that the estate could incur unnecessary expense or that a trustee would sell only to increase her fees, not unsecured creditor recoveries. However, a carve-out agreement is permissible if it will result in a meaningful distribution on unsecured claims. The court must review such an agreement under a heightened scrutiny standard, because of the risk of abuse, and there is a presumption against approval. A trustee may overcome the presumption if the trustee fulfilled her basic duties, there is a prospect for meaningful recovery on unsecured claims, and the trustee makes full disclosure. Here, the trustee fulfilled her duties by determining the validity of the creditor's lien and fully disclosed the proposed agreement to the bankruptcy court. The BAP remands for the bankruptcy court to determine whether the agreement will result in meaningful recoveries on unsecured claims. In re KVN Corp., Inc., 514 B.R. 1 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2014).
- 12.3.z Counterclaim against secured lender is not grounds to disallow credit bidding. The debtor in possession moved for authority to sell property of the estate that was encumbered by a valid lien securing an allowed claim. In connection with the sale motion, the DIP brought a counterclaim against the lender on issues not related to the claim's allowability but which could give rise to a setoff against the claim. Section 363(k) permits the holder of an allowed secured claim to credit bid at a sale of property of the estate, "unless the court for cause orders otherwise." A bona fide dispute over the claim's allowability might provide a ground to deny credit bidding, because a successful credit bid might result in the creditor's recovering property of the estate without a valid secured claim. Here, the claim was allowed, and the only dispute was over unrelated counterclaims. Therefore, the court permits the lender to credit bid at the sale. In re Charles St. African Methodist Episcopal Church of Boston, 510 B.R. 453 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2014).
- 12.3.aa "Cause" permits court to limit credit bidding. The creditor had a $170 million claim secured by most of the debtor's assets, though the committee disputed the creditor's lien on some of the assets. The debtor agreed to sell the creditor all its assets in a chapter 11 case for a credit bid of $75 million, but only if the sale were conducted within 24 business days after the petition date. The estate could realize maximum value only if all the debtor's assets were sold together. The committee produced another bidder who would bid only if the creditor's credit bid were limited to $25 million. Section 363(k) permits a secured creditor to credit bid its claim unless the court orders otherwise "for cause." "Cause" is broader than presence of the creditor's inequitable conduct; it may include a case where credit bidding prevents a competitive bidding environment. Here, credit bidding would prevent any other bidding, the creditor did not have a lien on all the assets being sold, and the creditor insisted on a rushed, unfair process. Together, these provide cause to limit the creditor's credit bid to $25 million. In re Fisker Automotive Holding, Inc., 510 B.R. 55 (Bankr. D. Del. 2014).
- 12.3.bb Inequitable conduct may lead to denial of credit bidding right. A creditor purchased a claim under a defaulted bank loan and immediately began negotiations with the debtor for a bankruptcy sale in which the creditor would credit bid to acquire all of the debtor's assets. The security interest for the loan did not encumber all of the debtor's assets. Without telling the debtor, the creditor filed financing statements to cover several otherwise unencumbered assets and continued to press the debtor to file a chapter 11 case and sponsor a section 363 sale. The creditor insisted that in advertising the debtor's assets for sale, the debtor's financial advisor prominently disclose that all assets were subject to the creditor's credit bid. The debtor resisted the creditor's demand and filed a chapter 11 case without an agreement. The debtor in possession promptly moved to sell substantially all its assets and challenged the creditor's security interest and its right to credit bid. The court determined that the creditor did not have a valid and perfected security interest in a substantial part of the debtor's assets. Generally, under section 363(k), a secured creditor may credit bid its claim in a sale of its collateral. But the court may order otherwise for cause. Cause includes a need to advance another policy of the Code, such as to ensure a successful reorganization, to facilitate a fully competitive auction, or to undo the effect of a creditor's inequitable conduct. Credit bidding generally protects against undervaluation of the assets at the sale, but where a credit bid of a purchased claim might depress market value, it does the opposite. Here, the court limits the amount of the creditor's claim it may bid because the creditor did not have a lien on all assets, because its loan-to-own strategy, including its aggressive negotiations and the unilateral filing of financing statements, was inequitable, and because its misconduct had an adverse effect on the auction. In re The Free Lance-Star Publishing Co. of Fredericksburg, Va., 512 B.R. 798 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2014).

- 12.3.cc Trustee may not sell property free and clear of an equitable servitude under section 363(f)(5). The debtor owned land in a tract that the city had redeveloped as an auto mall. The land was subject to an equitable servitude in favor of the city that gave the city the right to approve any buyer of the land. The debtor in possession moved to sell the property free and clear of the servitude to a buyer that the city did not approve. Section 363(f)(5) permits sale free and clear of an interest in property if the interest holder could be compelled, in a legal or equitable proceeding, to accept a money satisfaction of the interest. A foreclosure sale is a legal or equitable proceeding that would terminate a junior servitude. However, the servitude beneficiary would not be entitled to any monetary compensation from the foreclosure sale, even if the sale resulted in a surplus over the foreclosing lender's claim. Therefore, section 363(f)(5) does not permit sale free and clear of the servitude. In re Hassen Imports P'shp, 502 B.R. 851 (C.D. Cal. 2013).
- 12.3.dd Competing bidder who did not bid does not have standing to appeal. The debtor in possession proposed an all-cash auction of its assets. The sale process required a 10% cash deposit. A joint venture made the deposit and bid. Another bidder proposed an alternative purchase structure. The judge rejected the proposal and confirmed the sale to the joint venture. The sale closed. The disappointed bidder appealed on the ground, among others, that the joint venture constituted voidable collusive bidding under section 365(n). Collusive bidding would only depress prices and therefore cannot hurt a competing buyer, so only the seller (the trustee) may assert a section 365(n) violation. In re New Energy Corp., 739 F.3d 1077 (7th Cir. 2014).
- 12.3.ee Unemployment tax rating may not follow buyer in sale free and clear. The chapter 7 trustee sold all the debtor's business assets. The order approving the sale provided that the sale was "free and clear of all liens, claims, encumbrances and interests." After the sale, the state department of labor applied the debtors' experience rating to the purchaser for the purpose of determining the purchaser's unemployment tax rate. The purchaser moved in the bankruptcy court to enforce the sale order against the labor department. Section 363(f) allows the trustee to sell property of the estate "free and clear of any interest in such property." "Interest" includes any obligation that arises from the property being sold. An interest in property need not arise prepetition and does not require a right of payment. The labor department's state law right to apply the debtor's experience rating to the purchaser is an interest that arises from the debtor's property, because the debtor's prior ownership and use gave the department a contingent right to assign the experience rating to a purchaser. Therefore, the court enjoins the labor department from assigning the debtor's experience rating to the purchaser. In re USA United Fleet Inc., 496 B.R. 79 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2013).

- 12.3.ff Sale contract actual damages clause invalidates liquidated damages clause. The debtor in possession contracted with a bidder for a sale of substantially all of the property of the estate. The sale procedures provided that if the successful bidder failed to close, its good faith deposit “shall be retained by the Debtors ... without prejudice to the Debtors’ ability to seek to recover additional damages”. The bidder breached the contract and failed to close. The debtor in possession quickly sold the assets to another bidder for a higher price. The breaching bidder claimed for return of its deposit; the liquidating trustee sued for breach of contract and a declaration that it was entitled to retain the deposit. A contract for the sale of property may contain a liquidated damages provision, but New York law disregards a liquidated damages provision where a contract contains both that and an actual damages provision. The bid procedures provision permitting the debtor in possession to seek to recover additional damages is an actual damages provision, because it does not limit damages to the good-faith deposit. Therefore, the court disregards the liquidated damages and requires the estate to prove actual damages to retain any portion of the good-faith deposit. Brown Publishing Co. Liquidating Trust v. Brown Media Corp. (In re Brown Publishing Co.), 486 B.R. 46 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 12.3.gg Section 363(b)'s business judgment rule applies to an order authorizing reimbursement of a bidder's expenses. The debtor in possession proposed to sell assets that were difficult to evaluate. To encourage potential second round bidders, it sought court approval to reimburse their due diligence expenses. Section 363(b) authorizes a debtor in possession to use property of the estate outside the ordinary course of business, subject to court approval under a business judgment standard. By contrast, section 503(b) allows as an administrative expense only actual costs and expenses that are necessary to preserving the estate. Section 363(b) applies where the debtor in possession seeks to make discretionary use of the estate's assets. Section 503(b) applies to third parties who have already incurred expenses without prior court authorization. Therefore, in this case where the debtor in possession sought prior approval, the section 363(b) standard applies. ASARCO, Inc. v. Elliott Mgmt. (In re ASARCO, L.L.C.), 650 F.3d 593 (5th Cir. 2011).
- 12.3.hh A land swap is not a sale. The debtor owned two parcels of land, both of which were subject to the bank’s security interest. The debtor in possession proposed to exchange one parcel for another parcel that was owned by the city. Section 363(b) authorizes the use, sale or lease of property of the estate outside of the ordinary course of business. Any such use, sale or lease is subject, under section 363(e), to a secured lender’s right to adequate protection. The Code does not define “sale”. It defines “transfer” as any mode of disposing of an interest in property. Section 1123 authorizes a plan to provide for the transfer of property. The difference suggests that “transfer” is broader than “sale”. In addition, the debtor in possession here did not provide adequate protection of the lender’s interest. Therefore, the court denies authorization for the land swap. In re EQK Bridgeview Plaza, Inc., 447 B.R. 775 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2011).
- 12.3.ii Court refuses to reopen regularly conducted auction for higher bid. The court approved bid procedures involving an out-of-court auction of an assets of the estate. The bid procedures provided that bids would not be accepted after the auction was closed but that the DIP would be deemed to have accepted a bid only upon court approval. The debtor in possession’s counsel conducted the auction at his office. The bidding proceeded for nearly 12 hours, and all bidders rested after being given an opportunity to increase their bids. There were no irregularities at the auction. The DIP filed a notice of winning bidder two days later, as required by the bid procedures order, and the court held a hearing on the sale five days after that. At the hearing, a disappointed bidder offered more than the winning bid, based on new information that the disappointed bidder could have learned before but did not learn until after the auction. A court may reopen an auction where there are irregularities in the auction procedures, where the price is grossly inadequate, where complexity prevented a clear winner from emerging or where the bid procedures expressly authorize it. Otherwise, a court should not reopen bidding even to obtain a higher price for the estate, because doing so undermines bidder expectations, encourages bidders to hold their best bids until the court approval hearing after the auction and undercuts confidence and faith in the integrity of the judicial system. The court therefore refuses to reopen the bidding. It suggests that problems could be averted by holding all auctions before the court, where the judge would act as auctioneer. In re Bigler, LP, 443 B.R. 101 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2010).

- 12.3.jj A proposed compromise of a litigation claim is a sale to which section 363 applies. The trustee pursued the debtor's wife and two corporations owned by the wife under fraudulent transfer, reverse veil-piercing and constructive trust theories. The trustee sought court approval under Rule 9019 of a settlement with the defendants. The creditor who held over 85% of the unsecured claims objected and offered substantially more to buy the claims from the estate. Section 363(b) permits the trustee to sell property of the estate. The proposed compromise would have effected a disposition of property of the estate, in effect, a sale of the claim to the defendants. Therefore, section 363(b) applies, in addition to Rule 9019. If a potential buyer offers more than the proposed settlement amount, the must court consider the higher offer. The Cadle Co. v. Mims (In re Moore), 608 F.3d 253 (5th Cir. 2010).
- 12.3.kk Court prohibits sale because of inability to provide adequate protection of non-economic interests. The debtor National Hockey League team proposed to sell the team at an auction. The NHL By-Laws permit a team sale only with consent from three-quarters of the other teams, permit a team to veto team relocation to its home territory and require that a buyer have "good character and integrity". The high bidder at the auction proposed to move the team to a different city. The NHL had prior dealings with the buyer that caused the NHL to question its character and integrity. The bidder's bid was contingent on the court authorizing a sale free and clear of the NHL By-law provisions. The debtor in possession and the NHL disputed the enforceability of the By-Law provisions, both under bankruptcy and non-bankruptcy law. Section 363(f)(4) permits sale of property of the estate free and clear of any interest that is subject to bona fide dispute. Section 363(e) requires the court to prohibit or condition a sale to the extent necessary to provide adequate protection of the adverse party's interest in property of the estate. These provisions permit a sale pending dispute resolution by transferring parties' rights from the assets to its proceeds. They are most often and most easily invoked when the disputed interest is a lien or other economic interest. Where the disputed interest is a non-economic right to admit only new members who meet the NHL's written requirements and to control where teams play their home games, it would not be possible to provide adequate protection of the interest by, for example, impounding the sale proceeds. If the court later holds the NHL By-Law provisions enforceable, it would not be able to protect the NHL's interest after the sale and the move. Therefore, the court prohibits the sale. In re Dewey Ranch Hockey, LLC, 414 B.R. 577 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2009).
- 12.3.ll Buyer may not exclude disputed claims from payment of general unsecured claims under a sale. The debtor in possession proposed to sell its operations at a section 363 auction. The DIP and the debtor's principals favored the stalking horse bidder, whose bid was the highest but failed because it was contingent on a condition that could not be fulfilled. The next bidder's bid proposed to pay "all legitimate creditors", but specifically excluded the disputed claims of the debtor's principals. A section 363 sale risks depriving parties of the protections provided by the plan confirmation process, so the court should reject attempts to determine plan issues in connection with a sale. Equality of distribution is a fundamental bankruptcy policy. Therefore, a buyer must support with compelling evidence a proposal to pay some trade creditors if commercial factors and good will require. It may not select creditors not to pay based on disputes about the allowability of their claims. The court therefore denies approval of the sale. In re Dewey Ranch Hockey, LLC, 414 B.R. 577 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2009).
- 12.3.mm Court sets limits on debtor in possession's business judgment in approving a section 363 sale. The debtor's $35 million secured debt exceeded the debtor's value, and the debtor was in default. The debtor began a sale process, which resulted in a competitor's acquiring the secured debt and later entering into a $28 million asset purchase agreement (APA) and a $40 million debtor in possession loan facility with the debtor. The APA preserved the buyer's/secured lender's deficiency claim and proposed a break-up fee. The DIP loan facility provided for a roll-up of the lender's prepetition claim, a lending fee of 0.75%, a lien on all chapter 5 causes of action, super-priority administrative expense status for any deficiency (which was nearly certain, since the DIP loan amount exceeded the APA sale price), limited fee and expense carve-outs, a 90-day maturity and immediate automatic stay relief upon a default. The debtor filed a chapter 11 petition and sought prompt approval of the DIP facility and the sale. The Committee objected and sought discovery. After negotiation, the debtor, buyer and committee agreed to modify the sale to waive the buyer's/lender's deficiency claim, increase the carve-out and expense allowance, waive any interest in certain chapter 5 causes of action, limit insider releases to three individuals to be employed by the buyer and fund a trust for the sole benefit of unsecured creditors. The court succinctly summarizes the standards for authorizing a section 363 sale: a sale of all assets is not per se prohibited, but debtor in possession must consider its fiduciary duties and state a business justification. The sale may not evade chapter 11 plan protections, release claims against the estate, determine a plan's structure or obligate parties in interest to vote for or against a plan. A party in interest opposing a sale must articulate the specific chapter 11 rights or protections denied by the sale. Here, the court approves the sale, excluding the creditors' trust and releases, because they are unsupported by a business justification, noting that the debtor in possession had no interest in either, that the trust evaded protections of administrative and priority creditors and that the provisions resulted from the committee's "spoiler's argument" rather than a sound business reason. As such, they compromise the debtor in possession's fiduciary duties, so the court does not defer to the debtor's business judgment on these provisions. In re On-Site Sourcing, Inc., 412 B.R. 817 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2009).

12.3.nn Court denies a break-up fee where unnecessary to promote a bid. The debtor in possession conducted an extensive marketing effort to sell its principal asset. It received only one noncontingent bid and entered into an asset purchase agreement (APA) with the bidder. The APA required the debtor to seek approval of the sale without a further auction, but if the court ordered an auction, then the debtor was to seek approval of bid protections of a minimum overbid amount, expense reimbursement and a break-up fee. At the hearing, a previously contingent bidder objected to the bid protections. The court approved only the minimum overbid and expense reimbursement. The original bidder did not participate in the auction, and the objector won. A break-up fee is an administrative expense and therefore should be approved only if necessary to preserve the value of the estate. A break-up fee may be necessary to preserve the estate's value if it induces the bidder to bid before the court orders an auction or to adhere to its bid after the court orders an auction, thus providing a floor for the auction. Here, the bidder did not condition its bid on approval of the break-up fee, rather, only on the DIP's agreement to seek approval. Therefore, the break-up fee was not necessary to obtain or preserve the bid. In re Reliant Energy Channelview LP, 594 F.3d 200 (3d Cir. 2010).

12.3.oo Court may authorize sale of substantially all assets for a "good business reason". The debtor in possession manufacturing company sold substantially all its assets under section 363(b) for $2.0 billion within 30 days after the petition date. The buyer, a newly formed entity, assumed most trade claims and miscellaneous other general unsecured claims and would operate essentially the same business as the debtor, but with new technology, new management, a new union agreement and new access to dealerships. Equity ownership in the buyer was distributed 20% to an independent company that was providing new technology and a distribution network for the debtor's product, 55% to an employee health care trust and 10% to the debtor in possession lender, who provided $5 billion in DIP financing and $6 billion financing for the buyer. Senior secured lenders with claims totaling $6.9 billion would receive the $2.0 billion cash purchase price. A liquidation of the assets, which was the only alternative to the sale, would have yielded no more than $800 million, and the estate was losing up to $100 million a day while operations were shuttered pending the closing of the sale. Section 363(b)'s purpose is to permit an asset sale quickly to preserve and maximize value. The court must find a good business reason for the sale, so as to prevent a powerful, bullying creditor from forcing a sale to cash out quickly, leaving other creditors without chapter 11's protections. Section 363(b) does not give the court carte blanche to approve all sales. The court must balance which sales to approve, not by a rigid rule or prescription, but rather by the "good business reason" standard that In re Lionel Corp., 722 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1983), set forth. A sale of substantially all assets is not necessarily an impermissible reorganization plan, but the extent to which the sale terms effect distributions is one consideration. Based on the debtor's desperate situation, its continuing losses and the alternative to the sale, the bankruptcy court properly approved the sale. In re Chrysler LLC, 576 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2009).

12.3.pp Court may authorize sale of substantially all assets for a "good business reason". The debtor had obtained debtor in possession financing under terms that required the sale under section 363(b) within 40 days after the petition date of substantially all its assets to a new entity principally owned by the DIP lender. The sale price was enough cash to pay the debtor's pre-existing secured lenders, assumption of most operating executory contracts and certain liabilities, including most trade supplier claims, all customer warranty claims and some personal injury claims arising from the debtor's products, and 10% of the stock of the new entity. Under the sale terms, the lender would also provide financing to the new entity and additional DIP financing to the debtor in possession to fund wind down expenses. The lender would distribute stock in the new entity to a Voluntary Employee Benefits Association (VEBA), which was sponsored by the debtor's principal union and had substantial unsecured claims against the debtor. In addition, the new entity would assume the obligations to the VEBA not paid by the stock ownership. The debtor was losing substantial sums and could not remain in business without the DIP financing that the lender was providing. No other buyers expressed any interest in purchasing the business or assets, and without the sale, the business would close and liquidate. Liquidation would result in realization of substantially lower value for all creditors. Section 363(b) authorizes a sale of assets out of the ordinary course of business. It does not limit the nature or amount of assets that may be sold. However, it does not permit all sales. A sale of substantially all assets outside of a chapter 11 plan must be supported by a good business reason, as In re Lionel Corp., 722 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1983) set forth. Here, the absence of any alternatives to maintaining business operations and the substantially higher recovery to creditors overall provided a good business reason for the sale. Section 363(b) also requires the buyer's good faith, which is shown by the integrity of the buyer's conduct in the sale process. Here, there was no allegation of fraud, collusion or an attempt to take grossly unfair advantage of other bidders. The buyer's exercise of its negotiating leverage as DIP lender does not constitute bad faith or overreaching. A section 363(b) sale become an impermissible sub rosa plan if it short circuits plan confirmation requirements, dictates plan terms, constrains parties in exercising confirmation rights or allocates proceeds among creditors. The treatment of executory contract counterparties, the new entity's assumption of liabilities it needed to maintain operations and the lender's distribution of some of the new entity's stock to the VEBA are things the purchaser required to preserve an operating business and did not turn the sale into a sub rosa plan. The purchaser's allocation of ownership interests in the new enterprise does not affect the estate or its economic interests. Therefore, the court approves the sale. In re Gen. Motors Corp., 407 B.R. 463 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

12.3.qq Court may authorize sale free and clear of product liability claims. The debtor in possession manufacturing company sold substantially all its assets under section 363(b). The sale order authorized the sale free and clear of interests and extinguished the right to pursue claims "on any theory of successor or transferee liability, ... whether known or unknown as of the Closing, now existing or hereafter arising, asserted or unasserted ...". Among the debtor's general unsecured prepetition claims were personal injury product liability claims arising out of the debtor's production, which used the assets that were sold. Section 363(f) authorizes a sale of property “free and clear of any interest in such property”. The trend is toward a more expansive reading of this provision’s scope. It is not limited only to in rem interests such as liens. It encompasses claims that “arise from the property being sold”, which includes claims that are grounded on the use to which the property was put, such as the manufacturing operation here. Under section 1141(c), property dealt with by the plan is “free and clear of all claims and interests of creditors [and] equity security holders”. The inclusion of “claims” in section 1141(c) does not narrow the scope of section 363(f), which does not include “claims”. Section 363’s expanded role in bankruptcy cases, substituting to some degree for plans, suggests that the effects of the two procedures should be harmonized. Therefore, the sale is free and clear of the personal injury claims. By authorizing the sale free and clear of personal injury claims, the court precludes successor liability. The court leaves for another day, however, whether the free and clear order protects the buyer from successor liability for future claims. In re Chrysler LLC, 576 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2009).

12.3.rr Agent in secured credit facility may credit bid without unanimous consent of all lenders.

The debtor in possession auctioned its assets with court approval. On the direction of over 90% of the lenders, the agent under the debtor’s secured credit facility credit bid at the sale. One of the lenders objected. The credit agreement appoints the administrative agent and authorizes the agent to take such actions on the lenders’ behalf as are delegated under the loan documents. and provides that the credit agreement could not be amended to “release all or substantially all of the Collateral from the Liens of the Security Documents, without the written consent of each Lender”. The security agreement includes the collateral agent as a secured party and authorizes any secured party to credit bid. The credit bid does not amend the credit agreement but implements the loan document’s terms to permit majority decision-making. In re Metaldyne Corp., 409 B.R. 671 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

12.3.ss Court disapproves section 363(b) sale to secured lender as violating chapter 11

reorganization scheme. The debtor was an oil and gas exploration and production company. Oil price declines had made its business unprofitable. Its sole secured lender was substantially undersecured. Both before and after bankruptcy, the debtor had attempted to market its business but received offers of only about 20% of the secured claim. The debtor in possession and the lender had entered into a cash collateral stipulation that gave the lender stay relief if the debtor did not confirm a plan by a specified deadline. After the deadline, the debtor in possession moved for approval of a section 363(b) sale of all its assets. Although it proposed bidding procedures, the marketing and due diligence period’s shortness, the prior failed marketing efforts and the secured claim’s size made it very unlikely that anyone other than the secured lender would bid. The proposed sale provided for assumption and assignment of some but not all contracts but did not provide for any payment to administrative or general unsecured prepetition claims. The sale hearing proceeded on uncontested evidence. Under Fifth Circuit case law, a section 363(b) sale may not circumvent the requirement for plan confirmation and must be based on a sound business reason, and an objecting party must specify what confirmation protections a sale would deny. Going further, based on an extensive review of academic literature on the expanding role of section 363(b) sales in chapter 11 cases and on its evaluation that a properly conducted plan process need not be materially more cumbersome than a section 363(b) sale process, the court imposes a list of at least 12 considerations for approval of a sale of substantially all of an estate’s assets. The court concludes, “the movant must show that there is a need to sell prior to the plan confirmation hearing ... not merely a showing that it doesn’t matter” whether the sale proceeds under section 363 or a plan. “[T]he proposed transaction is a foreclosure supplemented materially by a release, by assignment of executory contracts (but only the contracts chosen by the secured lender), by a federal court order eliminating any successor liability, and by preservation of the going concern. Congress provided a process by which these benefits could be obtained. That scheme requires bargaining, voting, and a determination by the Court that Bankruptcy Code § 1129 requirements are met.” The court denies authority to sell. In re Gulf Coast Oil Corp., 404 B.R. 407 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2009).

- 12.3.tt Trustee may sell free and clear of junior lien under section 363(f)(5). The trustee sought to sell personal property free and clear of junior liens for a price less than necessary to pay all liens on the property. Section 363(f)(5) permits a sale free and clear of an entity’s liens if the “entity could be compelled, in a legal or equitable proceeding, to accept a money satisfaction of such interest”. Under Washington law, a junior lienor may be compelled to accept a money satisfaction, or indeed no satisfaction at all, if the property’s value is not adequate to cover the junior creditor’s lien, in a senior secured creditor’s foreclosure sale under Article 9, in a receivership action, in the liquidation of a probate estate, in a personal property tax sale or in a federal tax lien sale. Therefore, the trustee may sell the property free and clear of the junior lienor’s interest. In re Jolan, Inc., 403 B.R. 866 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 2009).
- 12.3.uu Trustee may not abandon property that the estate has contracted to sell. The debtor in possession obtained court authorization to auction real property. The auction was successful. Before the sale closed, the case converted to chapter 7. The trustee sought to abandon the real property to evade any specific performance obligation to the purchaser, because of a tax obligation that would be imposed on the estate as a result of the sale. When the gavel fell at the auction, the debtor in possession entered into a binding contract on behalf of the estate to sell the property. The contract binds the estate and therefore the chapter 7 trustee who succeeds the debtor in possession as representative of the estate. Therefore, the court refuses to authorize abandonment of the property, which would defeat the estate’s contract. In re Linton Props., LLC, 400 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2009).
- 12.3.vv Court denies sale free and clear of valueless junior lien. The trustee sold real property free and clear of a junior lien to the senior lienor under a credit bid equal to the senior lien claim amount. The junior lienor appealed the order approving the sale free and clear. Section 363(f) permits sale free and clear only under five circumstances, only two of which might be present here: “(3) such interest is a lien and the price at which such property is to be sold is greater than the aggregate value of all liens on such property;” or “(5) such entity could be compelled, in a legal or equitable proceeding, to accept a money satisfaction of such interest;”. Paragraph (3) uses “aggregate value of all liens” rather than the more common Bankruptcy Code phrase “aggregate value of all claims”. “Aggregate value of all liens” refers to their face value, not their economic value. Otherwise, paragraph (3) would authorize sale free and clear of all liens, as section 1206 does, and nothing indicates that Congress intended such a broad rule. In addition, the sale price must be greater than the aggregate value. Whenever the sale price is less than the face amount of all claims secured by the liens, it would be equal to, not greater than, their economic value. Thus, paragraph (3) authorizes sale free and clear only at a price greater than all claims secured by the liens. Paragraph (5) applies to liens, not just other interests, based on the use of the same word “interest” in section 363(f)’s introductory clause and in paragraph (3). Paragraph (5)’s requirement of being able to compel a money satisfaction means for less than full payment; otherwise, it would be so expansive as to apply to all liens, which can all be satisfied by full payment. It also requires a showing that a legal or equitable proceeding could compel money satisfaction. Plan confirmation under section 1129(b)(2) does not qualify as such a proceeding, because its use would require compliance with plan confirmation requirements, which are not present in a section 363 sale process, and if the proceeding to permit sale free and clear were found elsewhere in the Bankruptcy Code, paragraph (5) would be unnecessary. Therefore, the court may not authorize the sale free and clear of the junior lien at a price less than the full amount of all claims secured by liens on the property. Clear Channel Outdoor, Inc. v. Knupfer (In re PW, LLC), 391 B.R. 25 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2008).

- 12.3.ww Trustee may sell free and clear of a lease that the debtor had not assumed. The debtor's predecessor as real property owner leased the property for a billboard. The lessee failed to record the lease. The warranty deed from the predecessor to its successor described the lease, which gave constructive notice of the otherwise unrecorded lease, and the trustee actually became aware of the lease during his administration of the case. The trustee sought to sell the real property free and clear of all liens and interests. The trustee did not give the lessee notice of the sale. The court approved the sale free and clear, unaware that an interested party had not received notice. After the sale, the buyer sought an order that the sale was free and clear of the lease. Although a bankruptcy sale is in rem and generally good against the world, the sale does not cut off rights of someone who was entitled to direct notice yet did not receive it. Because the trustee knew of the lease, the lessee was entitled to direct notice and could challenge the validity of the sale order. In such a circumstance, some courts void the entire sale, some courts void the sale only as to the party not served with notice, and some courts balance the equities in fashioning appropriate relief, which the court adopts as the appropriate approach here. Section 365(h) permits a lessee to remain in possession of a leasehold under a lease that the trustee rejects, while section 363(f) permits sale free and clear of all interests. Because the Bankruptcy Code does not indicate whether one section or the other takes precedence, the court must give them both effect. If a subsequent property owner did not assume the lease and filed bankruptcy, section 365(h) would not apply, as the lease is not a "lease of the debtor". Therefore, section 365(h) is satisfied here, and the trustee may sell free and clear under section 363(f). The lease here had a cash-out option, which meets section 365(f)(5)'s requirement that the interest holder could be compelled to accept a money satisfaction of its interest. Therefore, the court affirms the sale order free and clear but gives the lessee a claim for the cash-out option amount. S. Motor Co. v. Carter-Pritchett-Hodges, Inc. (In re MMH Auto. Group, LLC), 385 B.R. 347 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2008).
- 12.3.xx Secured creditor who credit bids at an auction may be liable for costs of sale. The secured creditor twice moved for stay relief and twice withdrew its motions. The debtor in possession sought authority to retain a financial advisor to sell the secured creditor's collateral free and clear. The secured creditor objected and reserved the right to object to the advisor's fees and expenses. The court authorized the retention and a sale free and clear, with lien to attach to proceeds. The advisor conducted an auction, which started with a stalking horse bid. Ultimately, the highest and best offer was the secured creditor's credit bid. The court approved the sale to the secured creditor. The secured creditor is liable under section 506(b) to pay the fees and expenses of conducting the auction, because it benefited from actions taken to generate interest in the property and establish its value and from the sale. Borrego Springs Bank, N.A. v. Skuna River Lumber, LLC, 381 B.R. 211 (N.D. Miss. 2008).
- 12.3.yy Court denies partition of a commercial property and awards attorney's fees against co-owner. The debtor owned a 50% undivided interest as a tenant in common in rental property that housed a bar, a restaurant, and several apartments. Appraisals of the entire property ranged from $1.85 million to $2.25 million. The trustee received a $650,000 offer, later withdrawn, to purchase the debtor's 50% interest. Section 363(h) permits sale of the entire property if partition is impracticable, the price the estate would receive for a sale of the interest is "significantly less" than the price for the entire property, and the benefit to the estate outweighs the detriment to the co-owners. "Impracticable" does not mean impossible; it falls between the concepts of not possible and not practical, requiring only that partition not be feasible, sensible or practical. It is not practicable to partition this commercial building. The court need not perform a precise mathematical calculation to determine whether the price difference is significant. Here, the apparent difference meets the test. Section 365(j), which grants the co-owner effectively a right of first refusal or an interest in the proceeds, provides adequate protection; nothing more is required. When the co-owner refused to cooperate, so that the trustee had to sue to gain access to the building, the court may properly award attorney's fees to the trustee. 56 Assoc. v. DiOrto, 381 B.R. 431 (D.R.I. 2008).

12.3.zz Estate need not sell insurance policy claims free and clear. The estate asserted claims for indemnification and defense costs reimbursement under its directors and officers liability policies. The insurer disputed the claims. The debtors' directors and officers also asserted claims under the policies. The aggregate of the claims exceeded policy limits. The policies were "first come, first served" policies, so that whichever insured successfully asserted claims under the policies first would get paid, leaving the others without policy proceeds to recover. After plan confirmation, the estate proposed to settle with the insurer by selling it all of the estate's claims under the policies for a cash payment, free and clear of the claims of the directors and officers. The directors and officers may have contractual rights under the policies against the insurer. However, because of the nature of a first come-first served policy, they do not have an interest in the estate's claims under the policies against the insurer. The estate may assert a claim for the entire policy proceeds without the consent of the directors or officers. Accordingly, the directors and officers do not have an interest in the estate's interest in the policy proceeds; they have a direct, independent claim against the insurer. Therefore, they have no interest in the estate's property, and a sale free and clear is unnecessary and improper. In re Adelpia Comm'ns Corp., 364 B.R. 518 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

12.3.aaa Free and clear sale of stock does not protect against claims against the subsidiary. During its chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession sold the shares in its nondebtor subsidiary "free and clear of any and all ... claims (... as defined in § 105(5) of the Bankruptcy Code), [and] preferences." The liquidating trustee later sued the subsidiary for recovery of a preference. The purchaser (the subsidiary's new parent) sought declaratory and injunctive relief against the preference action. The new parent had standing to bring the declaratory relief action because the preference action could have deprived it of the benefit of its bargain with the estate. The court has jurisdiction over the declaratory relief action because it seeks interpretation and enforcement of the court's order approving the sale, even though neither the new parent nor the former subsidiary were debtors in this court. The court denies declaratory relief, however, because the sale order provided for a free and clear sale of only the stock, not the subsidiary's assets. Thus, the subsidiary remained liable for any claims against it, including claims that the estate of the former parent may have had. Amphenol Corp. v. Shandler (In re Insilco Tech., Inc.) 351 B.R. 313 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).

12.3.bbb Claim to ownership of property sold under section 363 does not defeat mootness rule of section 363(m). The trustee proposed to sell the debtor's interest in an oil and gas lease that the lessor claimed the debtor had abandoned long before bankruptcy. The court approved the sale without adjudicating the lessor's claim, and the sale closed. The lessor appealed but did not seek a stay of the sale order pending appeal. The lessor's appeal was moot under section 363(m), even though the lessor claimed that the estate had no interest in the property. Section 363(m) does not contain an exception for a claim of the kind the lessor asserts, and to recognize one would invite adverse claimants or sale objectors to object, eviscerating the finality policy of section 363(m). Hazelbaker v. Hope Gas, Inc. (In re Rare Earth Minerals), 445 F.3d 359 (4th Cir. 2006).

12.3.ccc Secured lenders may credit bid the full amount of their claim. At a section 363 sale, the secured lenders credit bid the entire face amount of their allowed claims. No other bidders appeared. The creditors' committee argued the lenders could credit bid only the secured portion, as determined under section 506(a). The court rejects the argument, reasoning that sections 363(k) and 506(a) do not require a 506(a) bifurcation valuation before an auction, and the auction in fact determines the market value of the collateral, based on the bids received, including the secured creditors' bid. Therefore, the lender may credit bid up to the full face amount of the allowed claim; the bid fixes the lender's allowed secured claim under section 506(a), which is equal to the amount bid. Cohen v. KB Mezz. Fund II, LP (In re Submicron Sys. Corp.), 432 F.3d 448 (3d Cir. 2006).

12.3.ddd Settlement of a dispute involving disposition of collateral might not implicate section 363(f). The debtor had contracted to build a methane gas recovery facility on a landfill and, separately, to sell the gas. The debtor's lenders had a security interest in all the debtor's assets, including both contracts. The debtor breached both contracts. The debtor's chapter 11 trustee settled disputes with the landfill operator and the gas purchaser over the debtor's breaches by agreeing to accept a small payment and a release of claims from both counterparties and to give up the estate's right to the gas. The settlement does not violate section 363(f). Outside of bankruptcy, the debtor could have entered into the settlement without the lenders' consent. The trustee has the same power. Because the settlement must be beneficial to the estate, the lenders' interests are protected; section 363(f) does not prevent transactions that make lenders better off. In re Resource Tech. Corp., 430 F.3d 884 (7th Cir. 2005).

12.3.eee Section 363 does not authorize sale free and clear and distribution of noncash sale proceeds in satisfaction of secured claims. The debtor in possession sold all of its assets to a new entity, which paid for the purchase in securities of the new entity. The assets were subject to liens in favor of first lien and second lien creditors. The first lien creditors objected to the distribution to them of a portion of the securities, which the court valued at an amount equal to their claim, in full satisfaction of their claims and of the balance to the second lien creditors, even if non-distribution would severely jeopardize both groups' recovery. The lien creditors are entitled to adequate protection of their liens upon the sale, which could be satisfied by the liens attaching to the sale proceeds—the securities. However, distribution of the securities did not adequately protect their interest in property of the estate, because upon distribution, the securities were no longer property of the estate. The sale order could not impair the first lien creditors' rights and interests to provide adequate protection of the second lien creditors' interests. Once the replacement lien attached to the securities, there was no need for further adequate protection by way of distribution, which permanently impaired the first lien creditors' rights. In short, the debtor in possession may not use a business judgment standard supporting a section 363 sale to effect a distribution other than in cash outside of a plan to a secured creditor who does not consent. Contrarian Funds, LLC v. WestPoint Stevens, Inc. (In re WestPoint Stevens, Inc.), 333 B.R. 30 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).

12.3.fff Bidding at an auction does not waive rights to object to the sale. The bankruptcy court authorized an asset sale, with a portion of the proceeds distributed to the first lien lenders and the balance to the second lien lenders. The first lien lenders, as a group, bid at the sale. The proceeds were the acquiring company's equity securities. The first lien lenders were willing to accept that consideration if they had been the successful bidder, but not from the competing bidder. Their participation in the auction does not waive their right to challenge whether the sale and the form of consideration were proper. Contrarian Funds, LLC v. WestPoint Stevens, Inc. (In re WestPoint Stevens, Inc.), 333 B.R. 30 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).

12.3.ggg Court allows disappointed bidder an administrative expense claim. The debtor in possession agreed to sell its assets to a stalking horse bidder, obtained approval of bid procedures which included a break-up fee and expense reimbursement, conducted an auction at which the stalking horse bidder was the successful bidder, and obtained approval of the sale. Before closing and before the order became final, a creditor who was also interested in bidding but who had not received notice of the auction moved for reconsideration of the sale approval order. The court vacated the approval, based on inadequate notice to the creditor-bidder and ordered a new auction, at which the creditor was the high bidder. After the sale closed, the stalking horse bidder sought reimbursement for expenses it incurred in connection with the sale.

The court allows the expenses incurred in connection with preparing to close the sale as an administrative expense, because they arose from a transaction with the estate that benefited the estate by permitting the quick closing of a sale that the debtor in possession had argued was essential to preserve value for the estate. In re Women First Healthcare, Inc., 332 B.R. 115 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).

- 12.3.hhh Trustee’s attorney’s fees may not be deducted from sale proceeds payable to a co-owner. Section 363(h) permits a trustee to sell an estate’s and a co-owner’s interest in real property; section 363(j) provides that “the trustee shall distribute to . . . the co-owners . . . the proceeds of such sale, less the costs and expenses, not including any compensation of the trustee, of such sale, according to the interests of such . . . co-owners.” The trustee here incurred attorney’s fees to defend against a stay relief action against the property and to market and sell the property. The trustee could not charge the fees against the co-owner, because they were included within “compensation of the trustee.” In addition, despite the trustee’s dispute with the co-owner over matters relating to the real property, the trustee must turn over the sale proceeds immediately and may not withhold them pending resolution of the disputes. Stine v. Diamond (In re Flynn), 418 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 2005).
- 12.3.iii Sales of avoiding power to defendant must be treated as a compromise. The trustee proposed to sell the estate’s avoiding power causes of action to a newly formed company owned by two of the defendants. A group of creditors, representing 70% of the claims in the case, was the other bidder. The court could not approve the sale to the defendants’ company unless it analyzed the transaction not only as a sale under section 363, but also as a compromise under Rule 9019. Although the defendants’ company’s offer price was ostensibly higher, making it the preferred buyer under section 363, the bid did not satisfy the fair and equitable requirement for a compromise. In particular, the interests of creditors are said to be of paramount importance and entitled to deference. The competing bidders represented 70% of the claims, and their interests were not adequately considered. In addition, the court should consider the alternative possibility of allowing the creditors to pursue the causes of action in the name of the trustee, allowing them their fees and expenses under sections 503(b)(3) and (4) if they are successful. Simantob v. Claims Prosecutor, LLC (In re Lahijani), 324 B.R. 282 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 2005).
- 12.3.jjj Appellate court remands for bankruptcy court to determine “good faith” to evaluate whether appeal from sale order is moot. Section 363(m) generally makes an appeal from an order authorizing a sale of property of the estate under section 363 moot if the purchaser purchased in good faith. If the bankruptcy court does not make findings on whether the purchaser purchased in good faith, the appellate court will not determine whether the appeal is moot but will remand for findings on whether the buyer purchased in good faith. It will not make the finding itself. First State Operating Co. v. Holbrook (In re Lotspeich), 328 B.R. 209 (Bankr. 10th Cir. 2005).
- 12.3.kkk Reorganized debtor may not sell assets free and clear after plan confirmation. After the effective date of the debtor’s plan, the reorganized debtor sought to sell its assets free and clear of liens under section 363(f). Although the plan provided for post-confirmation retention of jurisdiction to “hear and determine any and all pending or future applications for approval of the sale of the Assets or any portion thereof, free and clear of all liens pursuant to § 363 of the Bankruptcy Code,” the plan did not itself provide for the sale of assets free and clear of liens. The court refuses to approve the sale, “because Section 363(f) is not operational once the plan is confirmed.” It is not clear whether the court would have permitted the sale if the plan had been more explicit in providing for the post-confirmation asset sale. In re Golf, L.L.C., 322 B.R. 874 (Bankr. D. Neb. 2005).

- 12.3.iii Lien holder has standing to object to section 363 sale. Adverse parties, including a lien holder, disputed the trustee's claim that the debtor owned real property. The trustee commenced an adversary proceeding to determine title. Then, after 18 months of marketing the property, the trustee found a buyer and sought court approval by motion of a sale free and clear of the lien. The lien holder opposed the motion on essentially the same grounds as were being litigated in the adversary proceeding, but the court determined that the debtor "had some interest in the property" and authorized the sale. The lien holder has standing to object to the trustee's motion to approve the sale, even though the holder does not claim any ownership interest in the property. Because an unsecured creditor may object to the disposition of estate assets, a secured creditor may surely do so, especially where the sale is to be free and clear of the secured creditor's lien. The secured creditor is not limited to a challenge based only on the grounds set forth in section 363(f), which lists the circumstances under which property may be sold free and clear of a lien. Darby v. Zimmerman (In re Popp), 323 B.R. 260 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).
- 12.3.mmm Bankruptcy court must determine property ownership before it may authorize a sale under section 363. Adverse parties disputed the trustee's claim that the debtor owned real property. The trustee commenced an adversary proceeding to determine title. Then, after 18 months of marketing the property, the trustee found a buyer and filed a motion for court approval of the sale. The adversary proceeding defendants opposed the motion on essentially the same grounds as were being litigated in the adversary proceeding, but the court determined that the debtor "had some interest in the property" and authorized the sale. Under In re Rodeo Canon Dev. Corp., 362 F.3d 603 (9th Cir. 2004), opinion withdrawn, 2005 U.S. App. LEXIS 3786 (9th Cir. Mar. 8, 2005), if the estate's title to the property is in dispute and has not been determined, section 363 does not apply. Rodeo Canon states a prudential rule of efficient dispute resolution, not a rule prohibiting a bankruptcy court from determining ownership in a contested matter. Because the court here made no such determination, despite the pendency of the adversary proceeding for over 18 months, and found in the contested matter only that the debtor had "some interest in the property," a finding that ultimately could be inconsistent with the adversary proceeding outcome, it was improper for the court to authorize the sale. However, the Ninth Circuit withdrew its opinion two weeks after the BAP's decision, so whether the BAP's decision on this point will have any more than persuasive effect is unclear. Darby v. Zimmerman (In re Popp), 323 B.R. 260 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).
- 12.3.nnn Mootness rule does not apply to sale to which section 363 does not apply. Adverse parties, including a lien holder, disputed the trustee's claim that the debtor owned real property. The trustee commenced an adversary proceeding to determine title. Then, after 18 months of marketing the property, the trustee found a buyer and sought court approval of the sale by motion. The adversary proceeding defendants opposed the motion on essentially the same grounds as were being litigated in the adversary proceeding, but the court determined that the debtor "had some interest in the property" and authorized the sale. Under In re Rodeo Canon Dev. Corp., 362 F.3d 603 (9th Cir. 2004), if the estate's title to the property is in dispute and has not been determined, section 363 does not apply. Therefore, section 363(m) does not apply, and the appellate court may hear an appeal from the order approving the sale. In addition, the buyer expressly took the risk in the sale contract that the estate might not have title to the property, so equitable considerations did not require a mootness finding. Darby v. Zimmerman (In re Popp), 323 B.R. 260 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).
- 12.3.ooo Mootness rule of section 363(m) applies to a sale of a leasehold. The debtor in possession sold the right to designate an assignee of the debtor's leasehold interest. The lessor appealed. The leasehold interest is property of the estate. Therefore, even though section 365 governs an assignment of a lease, section 363(m) still applies. The fact that this transaction took place in two steps – first a sale of the right to designate an assignee and then the assignment – rather than one does not deprive it of section 363(m)'s protection. Weingarten Nostat, Inc. v. Service Merch. Co., 396 F.3d 737 (6th Cir. 2004).

12.3.ppp Court may not approve sale without adequate business justification. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case solely to sell its single real estate asset, which was overencumbered. It intended to convert its case to chapter 7 immediately after the sale. The secured creditor consented. The court refuses to authorize the sale, because of the absence of any business justification for the sale or need for chapter 11. The secured creditor could conduct a foreclosure sale outside of chapter 11 with the same effect. In re Encore Healthcare Assocs., 312 B.R. 52 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2004).

12.3.qqq Authorization to sell property of the estate is improper if the estate's ownership is disputed. A general partner, who was a chapter 7 debtor, held legal title to real property. The other general partner asserted that the partnership owned the property because it had been purchased with partnership funds. A lender made prepetition loans to the debtor partner, secured by the property. The nondebtor partner claimed the liens were invalid because the debtor partner did not own the property and therefore could not grant liens. The trustee sought to sell the property free of the disputed ownership claims and the disputed liens, with all interests to attach to the proceeds. The bankruptcy court authorized the sale and permitted payment of some of the proceeds to the lender, with the balance held pending resolution of the disputes. On appeal seeking disgorgement of the payments to the lender, the Ninth Circuit concludes that the order authorizing the sale was improper, because the bankruptcy court may not authorize a sale of property that is not property of the estate, and until the dispute about ownership was resolved, it could not authorize the sale. However, because the sale was consummated, the Ninth Circuit holds that it is no longer subject to collateral attack. The court addresses only the disgorgement issue. Warnick v. Yassian (In re Rodeo Canon Dev. Corp.), 362 F.3d 603 (9th Cir. 2004), petition for reh'g pending.

12.3.rrr Auction is reopened to permit overbids. A bid procedures order provided for an out-of-court auction two days before the sale approval hearing date, authorized the debtor in possession to conduct the auction, permitted the debtor in possession to modify the auction procedures at any time, and provided that only court approval of a bid would constitute acceptance. During the sale process, several bidders had objected to a key sale term. The debtor in possession revised that provision but inadvertently did not notify all bidders. At the auction, the debtor in possession advised all bidders of the revision, but one of the bidders could not contact his partners in time to determine how much that would affect his bid. He waited till the next day, after the auction had concluded, to notify the debtor in possession that he would overbid the winning bidder by 9% because of the change. The debtor in possession recommended to the court at the sale hearing that the bidding be reopened. The court agreed. At the subsequent auction, the original winning bidder won with a bid 16% higher than his prior winning bid. He appealed the reopening order. The court of appeals acknowledges the importance of finality of sales to protect the process and not defeat the legitimate expectations of bidders. In this case, however, the bid procedures order provision that permitted modifications at any time and that delayed acceptance of an offer until court approval defeated any legitimate expectation that the winning bidder may have had at the conclusion of the auction. Corporated Assets, Inc. v. Paloian, 368 F.3d 761 (7th Cir. 2004).

12.3.sss Sale free and clear of lien requires equity in the property. Noting the case law on both sides of the issue, the district court concludes that for a trustee to sell free and clear on liens under section 363(f)(3), the sale price must exceed the face amount of claims secured by liens on the property. Criimi Mae Services Limited Partnership v. WDH Howell, LLC (In re WDH Howell, LLC), 298 B.R. 527 (D.N.J. 2003).

- 12.3.ttt Settlement of a claim may be a sale and does not bind trustee until court approval. The bankruptcy court reopened the estate to allow the trustee to pursue an asset that had not been scheduled. After investigation, the trustee settled with a group that had suspiciously appeared to use the asset, for payment to the estate of $40,000. The trustee presented the agreement as a compromise. A creditor objected and a third party sought to overbid. The trustee, feeling bound by the agreement, pressed the approval of the compromise. The B.A.P. reversed the bankruptcy court's order approving the compromise. The B.A.P. rules that the trustee is not bound to press the compromise if subsequent events, such as a higher offer, change the evaluation of whether the compromise is in the best interest of the estate, especially where the agreement itself provided that it was subject to court approval. In addition, a compromise of this sort is in reality a sale, which should be subject to the bid procedures under section 363 and Rule 6004. Goodwin v. Mickey Thompson Entertainment Group, Inc. (In re Mickey Thompson Entertainment Group, Inc.), 292 B.R. 415 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 12.3.uuu A trustee may sell free and clear of a lessee's rights under section 365(h). The bankruptcy court authorized the sale of real property free and clear of all interests. A lessee did not object to the sale. The Seventh Circuit rules that "interest" includes a lessee's possessory interest, which is an interest under a lease. Selling free and clear of that interest is not inconsistent with section 365(h), because the latter section applies only to the rejection of a lease, not to the sale of the underlying property, and because the lessee can protect his interest under section 365(e), which requires the court to provide adequate protection. Precision Industries v. Qualitech Steel SEQ, LLC, 327 F.3d 537 (7th Cir. 2003).
- 12.3.vvv Sale free and clear releases unsecured claims. The plaintiff had sued the debtor before bankruptcy for injuries resulting from environmental clean-up activities. After the debtor filed chapter 11, it sold all of its assets free and clear of all claims. The order prevented the plaintiff from continuing its action against the purchaser. "Interest," as used in section 363(f), includes unsecured claims, at least to the extent that they are associated with the property being sold. In addition, the Bankruptcy Code preempts state law on successor liability. Myers v. United States, 297 B.R. 774 (S.D. Cal. 2003).
- 12.3.www Pre-plan sales do not qualify for transfer tax exemption. Section 1146(c) exempts from documentary transfer taxes a sale "under a plan confirmed under section 1129." Here, the sale was made before confirmation of a plan under section 363 but were said to be necessary for the plan, and the plan retroactively authorized the transfers. The court rules that "under a plan" requires that the sales be authorized by the plan, not authorized under section 363, for the tax exemption to apply. Baltimore County v. Hechinger Liquidation Trust (In re Hechinger Investment Co. of Delaware, Inc.), 335 F.3d 243 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 12.3.xxx Co-owner of estate property is liable for portion of attorney's fees related to sale. At the time of bankruptcy, the debtor and his co-owner were in litigation over partition of real property. After bankruptcy, the trustee continued the litigation, fended off a stay relief motion, and ultimately marketed the property, incurring attorney's fees in the course of doing so, including fees to negotiate a resolution of claims with the secured creditor. The trustee may charge the attorney's fees against the gross proceeds of sale, before allocation between the estate and the co-owner, because the attorney's fees were necessary to preserve the property and consummate the sale. Thus, the co-owner benefited from the services. In addition, the trustee may withhold payment of the co-owner's shares pending resolution of any disputes with the co-owner. Stine v. Diamond (In re Flynn), 297 B.R. 599 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).
- 12.3.yyy Airline assets may be sold free and clear of travel voucher claims. TWA had settled employment discrimination litigation by issuance of travel vouchers. The sale of TWA's assets to American Airlines was free and clear of all interests. The employment discrimination claimants asserted that American remained liable for the travel vouchers because they were not “interests” of the kind that could be extinguished in a sale free and clear under section 363(f). The Third Circuit rules otherwise. Section 363(f) does not apply only to interim interests such as liens but also to any obligations that are connected to or arise from the property being sold, even unsecured claims such as the travel vouchers. Moreover, the court rules that section 363(f)(5), which permits sale free and clear if the claimant could be compelled to accept a money satisfaction in a legal or equitable proceeding, permits the sale here. The court reasons that in a chapter 7 case, the travel vouchers would have been converted to dollar amounts, which would have been allowed and could be satisfied by distribution on unsecured claims. In re TransWorld Airlines, Inc., 322 F.3d 283 (3d Cir. 2003).

12.3.zzz Bankruptcy sale extinguishes interest in intellectual property. The debtor licensed financial markets data to its customer for an annual fee. When the debtor filed chapter 11, it sold all of its assets other than the licenses to one buyer and assumed and assigned the license agreements to another buyer. When the second buyer stopped providing the service, the customer sued the first buyer to provide the service without charge, on the ground that the license granted the customer an interest in the debtors’ intellectual property, which could not be extinguished by the sale of the underlying property. The Seventh Circuit rules against the customer on the grounds that the license did not reach future financial markets data that the debtor never created, that the sale, consistent with section 363(f), extinguished all interests in the assets acquired by the first buyer, including in the intellectual property that the first buyer acquired from the debtor, and that, to the extent the agreement was an executory contract to grant future licenses, the contract did not survive bankruptcy and bind the first buyer, because it had been assigned to the second buyer. The court of appeals notes that consent under section 363(f)(1) may be evidenced by failure to object to a sale free and clear, as long as there is notice. FutureSource LLC v. Reuters Ltd., 312 F.3d 281 (7th Cir. 2002).

12.3.aaaa Break-up fee allowed under “administrative expense” test. During the beginning of the bidding process for the estate’s principle asset, the bankruptcy court approved an agreement with a potential bidder that included among its terms a break-up fee. Later, after the bidder was unsuccessful, the bankruptcy court denied administrative expense priority to the break-up fee, even though it held that the bidder held a post-petition claim against the estate. The Eighth Circuit B.A.P. reverses. First, it reviews the three tests that courts have used to determine the allowability of break-up fees: the business judgment test, the best interest of the estate test, and the administrative claim test. It adopts the administrative claim test and determines that the bidders conduct provided a direct benefit to the estate and so should be allowed as an administrative expense claim. AgriProcessors, Inc. v. Iowa Quality Beef Supply Network, L.L.C. (In re Tama Beef Packing, Inc.), 290 B.R. 90 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).

12.3.bbbb Bankruptcy court may make “good faith” finding under section 363(m) on remand. The trustee moved to dismiss an appeal from a sale order as moot on the ground that the sale had been completed to a good faith purchaser. The bankruptcy court had not made any findings at the time of the sale on the issue of good faith. The B.A.P. remands to the bankruptcy court for the limited purpose of examining good faith and making findings under a motion under Rule 60(b). The B.A.P. reasons that, in the Ninth Circuit, the bankruptcy court is not required to make a good faith finding at the time of approval of the original sale, and, indeed, the evidence suggesting a lack of good faith is not likely to emerge until after the sale. Because an appeal from the sale order divests the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction to determine good faith, the B.A.P. remands for that limited purpose. Thomas v. Namba (In re Thomas), 287 B.R. 782 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).

12.3.cccc Good faith under section 363(m) must be proven and may not be assumed. After an objector to a sale argued that the sale was not in good faith, the trustee moved the bankruptcy court for an order determining good faith, but later withdrew the motion. On appeal, the B.A.P. rules that the trustee waived the finding of good faith and that without such a finding, section 363(m) does not apply. The proponent of section 363(m) good faith has the burden of proof, and the appellate court will not draw an inference of good faith from a trial court record that is silent on that question. T.C. Investors v. Joseph (In re M Capital Corp.), 290 B.R. 743 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).

12.3.dddd Court may approve break-up fee for plan bid. The buyer's purchase agreement for the debtor's assets provided for the sale to be approved under a plan rather than under section 363. The sale agreement provided for a termination fee if the bid were topped at a court approved auction of the plan was not confirmed. The bankruptcy court approved the break-up fee agreement before plan solicitation. Some creditors objected on the ground that the presence of the break-up fee would have a coercive effect on voting. The court rejected the argument, holding that a break-up fee in the context of a plan agreement was equally appropriate as in the context of a section 363(b) sale. DDJ Capital Management, LLC v. Fruit of the Loom, Inc. (In re Fruit of the Loom, Inc.), 274 B.R. 631 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).

12.3.eeee Purchaser of intellectual property does not receive royalties from rejected license agreements. The purchaser acquired all of the assets of the debtor, including its intellectual property. The debtor had granted an exclusive license outside the United States to a licensee. Because the debtor was unable to provide the service required under the license agreement, the debtor rejected the agreement. At the same time, the purchase excluded the agreement and any assets or liabilities related to that licensee from its purchase. After rejection, the licensee elected to retain the license to the intellectual property under section 365(n)(2)(B) and make net license royalty payments. On a dispute between the debtor and the purchaser over the entitlement to the net license royalty payments, the court rules that the exclusion of the license agreement from the purchase entitled the debtor to the royalty payments, despite the purchaser's acquisition of all of the debtor's intellectual property. The court reasons that section 365(n)(2)(B) requires the licensee to "make all royalty payments due under the contract," which requires the payments to be made to the party to the contract (the debtor), not the owner of the intellectual property. What is more, rejection did not terminate the debtor's rights under the agreement. Schlumberger Resource Mgmt. Servs, Inc. v. Cellnet Data Systems, Inc. (In re Cellnet Data Systems, Inc.), 277 B.R. 588 (D. Del. 2002).

12.3.ffff Order approving sale precludes subsequent collusive bidding challenge, except under Rule 60(b). An order approving a sale under section 363 is res judicata on the issue of whether the bidders engaged in collusive bidding prohibited under section 363(n). Therefore, the order can be challenged only under Rule 60(b)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (Bankruptcy Rule 9024), which imposes a one-year period of limitation and does not permit subsequent collateral attacks. Gazes v. Phillip Del Prete (In re Clinton Street Food Corp.), 254 B.R. 523 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2000).

12.3.gggg Section 363(m) sale mootness rule applies to assignment of executory contracts. The debtor in possession assumed and assigned a lease of real property as part of a sale of 41 leases. Because the assignments were part of a sale, section 363(m) applied, and the failure of the landlord to obtain a stay of the order authorizing the assignment pending the appeal rendered the appeal moot. L.R.S.C. Co. v. Rickel Home Centers, Inc. (In re Rickel Home Centers, Inc.), 209 F.3d 291(3d Cir. 2000).

12.3.hhhh Ambiguously designated purchaser defeats section 363(m) mootness protection. The bankruptcy court approved the sale of a franchise agreement to "Symbolic Motor Car Company," which was a d.b.a. of two separate corporations, but did not specify which corporation was taking the assignment. Holding that the requirement of a "good faith purchaser" in section 363(m) requires the identification of a “purchaser,” the Ninth Circuit rules that the appeal from the order approving the sale of the franchise agreements does not meet the requirements for section 363(m) protection and is not moot. The Ninth Circuit did not consider any equitable mootness argument, even though the purchaser was not a party to the appeal. Ferrari North America, Inc. v. Sims (In re R.B.B., Inc), 211 F.3d 475 (9th Cir. 2000).

- 12.3.iii Allowability of breakup fees is governed by section 503(b)’s “actual and necessary” standard. In a case of first impression at the court of appeals level, the Third Circuit rules that the allowability of a breakup fee is not governed by the business judgment test but rather by the test of section 503(b) of whether the fee is an actual and necessary expense of administration of the estate. In determining whether the fee provides some benefit to the estate, the Third Circuit examined whether the assurance of a breakup fee promoted more competitive bidding, guaranteed a high minimum bid, induced a bidder to research the value of the debtor in a way on which other bidders could rely, and did not chill the bidding. The court found the breakup fee in this case, in which numerous bidders competed to make the initial stalking horse bid, did not meet these standards. Calpine Corporation v. O’Brien Environmental Energy, Inc. (In re O’Brien Environmental Energy, Inc.), 181 F.3d 527 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 12.3.jjjj A no-shop clause is per se illegal in chapter 11. The debtor entered into a pre-petition agreement with a purchaser to sell all of its assets. The agreement contained a no-shop clause that prohibited the debtor from soliciting other bids or even sharing confidential information with potential bidders. In disallowing the purchaser’s claim for breach of the agreement, the court holds the no-shop clause per se illegal in a chapter 11 case, because it prohibits a debtor from fulfilling its fiduciary duty to maximize the value of the estate. The court condemns the conduct of the purchaser in forcing the debtor to complete the agreement without exposing it the possibility of a better offer. The court suggests, however, that a reasonable break-up fee would be legitimate. In re Big Rivers Electric Corp., 233 B.R. 726 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 1998), aff’d, 233 B.R. 739 (W.D. Ky. 1998).
- 12.3.kkkk Bankruptcy court sale order may not eliminate successor liability. Although the order authorizing the sale of all of the debtors assets stated that the buyer “is not a successor in interest [and does not] reflect a continuity of the operations of the Debtors,” the order could not protect the buyer against post-confirmation tort claims against the debtor, because the bankruptcy law could not preempt state law on this issue. In addition, the bankruptcy court could not give adequate notice to future tort claimants so as to bind them to the terms of the sale order. Schwinn Cycling and Fitness, Inc. v. Benonis, 217 B.R. 790 (N.D. Ill. 1997).
- 12.3.iiiii The mootness rule upon a sale applies to an assignment of an executory contract. The mootness rule of section 363(m) applies where the debtor assumed and assigned a franchise agreement, because the franchise agreement was property, that is, a license to use a trademark, among other things. Section 363(m) does not, however, imply a per se rule that every appeal from an order approving a sale must be dismissed. There are two prerequisites for mootness: the sale was not stayed and the court, if reversing or modifying the authorization to sell, would affect the validity of the sale. Krebs Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc. v. Valley Motors, Inc., 141 F.3d 490 (3d Cir. 1998).
- 12.3.mmmm A settlement is not a sale. An appeal from an order approving a settlement of a claim belonging to the estate is not governed by section 363(m), because the settlement of the claim is not a sale of an asset. Hicks, Muse & Co., Inc. v. Brandt (In re Healthco Intl., Inc.), 136 F.3d 45 (1st Cir. 1998).
- 12.3.nnnn Break-up fee disapproved. Although the standard for approval of a sale of assets out of the ordinary course of business under section 363(b) is the business judgment rule, the court applies a stricter standard to approval of a break-up fee, “that a court should ensure that revenues are maximized and that the best interests of the debtors’ estate, creditors and equity-holders are furthered.” In re Tiara Motor Coach Corporation, 212 B.R. 133 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 1997).

12.3.0000 Appeal is not moot despite sale of underlying property. An appeal from an order setting aside an earlier order approving sale of property was not moot, even though the property had subsequently been sold to an unrelated buyer. Section 363(m) did not apply, because the appeal did not challenge the validity of the subsequent sale. The court also noted the possibility of equitable relief on remand, because the proceeds of the subsequent sale were being held pending the outcome of the appeal. Goffland Entertainment Center, Inc. v. Peak Investment, Inc. (In re BCD Corp.), 119 F.3d 852 (10th Cir. 1997).

12.3.pppp Appeal from order authorizing sale of non-estate property is moot. The policy of section 363(m) of the Bankruptcy Code in favor of finality of sales is sufficiently strong that even a challenge that the property sold did not belong to the estate will not be heard on appeal if the purchaser was in good faith. Licensing by Paolo, Inc. v. Sinatra (In re Gucci), 126 F.2d 380 (2d Cir. 1997).

12.3.qqqq Second Circuit sets standard for good faith purchase under section 363(m). In an appeal challenging the good faith of a purchaser under Section 363(m), the Second Circuit limits the inquiry of good faith to the conduct of the purchaser in the course of the bankruptcy case, including actions and preparation for and during the sale itself. “That is, the good faith requirement prohibits fraudulent, collusive actions specifically intended to affect the sale price or control the outcome of the sale.” Licensing by Paolo, Inc. v. Sinatra (In re Gucci), 126 F.2d 380 (2d Cir. 1997).

13. TRUSTEES, COMMITTEES, AND PROFESSIONALS

13.1 Trustees

13.1.a Barton doctrine does not apply after a case is closed. After the closing of a chapter 7 case, the debtor and his affiliates sued the chapter 7 trustee in a distant federal district court. Under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), a court other than the appointing court does not have subject matter jurisdiction over an action against a receiver or trustee. The rule’s purpose is to prevent another court from interfering with the in rem jurisdiction of the appointing court. Otherwise, the other court could issue orders that would require expenditure or other use of property that is in custodia legis of the appointing court. Once a case is closed and the appointing court no longer has in rem jurisdiction over property, an action in another court does not interfere with the appointing court’s jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Barton doctrine does not apply after the case is closed. The trustee’s remedy is to rely on judicial immunity. In re Keitel, 636 B.R. 845 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2022).

13.1.b Barton doctrine applies to a subpoena issued to an estate fiduciary. The chapter 7 trustee received two subpoenas from a federal criminal case pending in another district, seeking production of information in the trustee’s possession. The Barton doctrine requires leave of the bankruptcy court before one may bring any legal proceeding against a trustee in another forum. Without leave, the other forum is without jurisdiction to hear the matter. A subpoena is an order of the issuing court commanding the recipient to appear in another court and may require a trustee who receives a subpoena to expend estate assets to comply, defend, or face contempt proceedings for noncompliance. In addition, a subpoena may seek to control information that is property of the bankruptcy estate in potential violation of the automatic stay. Another court may not interfere with such property or, in effect, order the trustee to expend estate property to address the subpoena. Therefore, the Barton doctrine applies to a subpoena as much as to an action against an estate fiduciary. In re Eagan Avenatti, LLP, 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 552 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Mar. 3, 2022).

- 13.1.c Representation of creditor against debtor’s shareholder in unrelated case disqualifies subchapter V trustee as not disinterested. The subchapter V debtor’s equity holder was a holding company that was jointly owned by a husband and wife. The husband was a director of another company that was a debtor in an unrelated bankruptcy case. The subchapter V trustee represented a creditor in the other bankruptcy case in litigation against the husband for matters related to the other case. The trustee moved to dismiss the case as a bad faith filing and opposed plan confirmation. Section 1183 requires a subchapter V trustee to be disinterested, that is, not to have “an interest materially adverse to the interest of ... equity security holders.” The creditor in the other case has an interest materially adverse to the interest of the husband. For these purposes, an attorney assumes the interest of the client. Although the husband owns the equity interest in the debtor indirectly, through a holding company, the concern is the holder’s interest, not the form of ownership. Disinterestedness is especially important in a subchapter V case, because subchapter V requires the trustee to actively facilitate a plan and, in effect, to act more as a mediator, who is not adverse to the debtor or its equity holders. Thus, the disinterestedness requirement must be enforced strictly. The trustee here is not disinterested, and his appointment and compensation are denied. In re 218 Jackson LLC, 631 B.R. 937 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2021).
- 13.1.d Chapter 7 trustee does not succeed to committee’s right to bring estate action against prepetition lenders. The debtor in possession’s financing agreement stipulated to the validity of the debtor’s prepetition LBO financing and waived all claims of the debtor and the estate against the lender but permitted the unsecured creditors committee or “any party-in-interest, including a ... trustee appointed or elected during the [75-day] Investigation Period” to challenge the validity of the prepetition financing. The committee brought a fraudulent transfer action against the prepetition lenders. Later, the case converted to chapter 7. Upon conversion, the committee ceased to exist. The trustee sought to substitute for the committee in the action. Because the trustee did not bring an action within the Investigation Period, the trustee may not assert a challenge to the financing. The committee’s right to bring the action is not transferrable. The committee’s claims are derivative of the DIP’s, because the DIP granted the rights to the committee. But because the DIP barred itself from bringing those claims, the trustee, who succeeds only to such rights as the debtor and the estate had, could not. Official Committee v. The CIT Group/Business Credit, Inc. (n re Jevic Holding Corp.), 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 1203 (Bank. D. Del. May 5, 2021).
- 13.1.e Trustee’s appellate standing does not depend on a pecuniary interest. The bankruptcy court awarded counsel for the debtor in possession fees for services performed before the chapter 11 trustee was appointed. Two creditors objected and appealed. During the appeal, the creditors settled with counsel but not with the trustee and sought to dismiss the appeal, arguing the appeal was moot and the trustee did not have standing to appeal. Ordinarily, for standing to appeal, a party must show a direct and adverse pecuniary interest that the order affected. However, trustees can never show they were pecuniarily affected, because they have no pecuniary interests in the cases they administer. Their standing arises from their duty to enforce the bankruptcy law in the public interest. Here, the trustee was responsible for paying the fees if they were awarded and therefore had an interest in determining whether they were proper. The court finds the trustee has standing and affirms the fee award on the merits. Edwards Family P’ship v. Johnson (In re Cmty. Home Fin. Servs.), 990 F.3d 422 (5th Cir. 2021).
- 13.1.f Barton doctrine does not apply after a receivership concludes. After the conclusion of a state court receivership, the plaintiff, whose property the receiver administered, sued the receiver and others under a conspiracy theory. Under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), a court lacks jurisdiction over an action against a federal court receiver unless the appointing court has given permission for the action. The doctrine arises from the in rem nature of a receivership and the resulting protection of property that is subject to the receivership and is in custodia legis. Once the receivership concludes, there is no longer a receivership estate to protect, so Barton protection ends. However, a receiver and counsel are entitled to judicial immunity for acts within the scope of the receiver's authority, even if their acts were "in error, malicious, or ... in excess of [the appointing court's] jurisdiction." Chua v. Ekonomou, 1 F.3d 948 (11th Cir. 2021).

- 13.1.g Language of liquidation trust determines whether dissolution is self-executing. The chapter 11 plan created a liquidating trust, which provided "the Trust shall be dissolved" upon the occurrence of certain events and "shall be dissolved" no later than three years after the plan effective date unless upon a party in interest's request within three months before the third anniversary, the court determined to extend the trust. None of those events had occurred. The trustee failed to seek an extension within the three-month period, but sought an extension about six months later. The terms of the trust govern its dissolution. The language, "the Trust shall be dissolved," is not self-executing; it requires an action by the trustee or perhaps a party in interest or the court to effect the dissolution. Therefore, although the court refuses to grant the trustee's motion to extend the trust because the motion was untimely, the trust is not dissolved. In re Black Elk Energy Offshore Operations, LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 2248 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Aug. 21, 2020).
- 13.1.h Barton* doctrine does not apply after bankruptcy court jurisdiction over the case ceases. Debtor in possession counsel misrepresented that the bankruptcy court had approved special counsel's employment. It had not. At the conclusion of the case, the court denied special counsel's fees and ordered disgorgement. After the court dismissed the case, special counsel sued DIP counsel in district court for intentional and negligent misrepresentation. The parties agreed that the action would have no conceivable effect on the estate. The Barton doctrine requires that before suing a fiduciary for the estate, the plaintiff must obtain leave of the bankruptcy court so as not to usurp the bankruptcy court's control over the estate and its fiduciaries. DIP counsel is such a fiduciary. But when the bankruptcy court no longer has jurisdiction over a matter, Barton does not apply, because there are no powers or duties belonging to the bankruptcy court that the other court might usurp. Here, because the action would not have any conceivable effect on the estate, the bankruptcy court did not have even related-to jurisdiction. Therefore, Barton did not apply, and leave of court was not required. Tufts v. Hay, 977 F.3d 1204 (11th Cir. 2020).
- 13.1.i Trustee's compensation is based only on disbursements in the case, not in any related case. The chapter 7 trustee became the managing member of the debtor's 100%-owned LLC, which was a chapter 11 debtor. During the chapter 11 case, the trustee, acting as managing member of the LLC and not as the chapter 11 trustee, sold the LLC's assets and paid a substantial distribution to creditors under a plan, returning a surplus to the chapter 7 estate. The trustee paid claims in the chapter 7 case from the surplus and from other funds on hand. Section 326(a) permits compensation of a trustee, not to exceed certain percentages "upon money disbursed or turned over in the case by the trustee to parties in interest." In the context of the chapter 7 case, "in the case" refers only to the chapter 7 case and not to the moneys disbursed or turned over in the "subsidiary" chapter 11 case. Therefore, the trustee's compensation is based only on the moneys disbursed to creditors of the chapter 7 estate. Connolly v. Morreale (In re Morreale), 959 F.3d 1002 (10th Cir. 2020).
- 13.1.j Court did not abuse discretion in refusing to appoint a chapter 9 avoidance trustee. Section 926 permits the court to appoint a trustee to pursue avoiding power claims if the municipal debtor refuses to pursue them. The decision is committed to the sound discretion of the trial court and will be reversed only for an abuse of discretion. Courts should hesitate to appoint a trustee. In exercising its discretion, the court need not apply the same test as used for derivative standing in a commercial case—evaluating the costs and benefits to the debtor and determining whether the claims are colorable. Because the debtor is a governmental unit, the court may apply a more holistic approach. Therefore, when the trial court refused the creditors' motion for appointment of a trustee to pursue avoiding power claims against an affiliated debtor that adopted a statute before bankruptcy to transfer funds from the debtor to the affiliate, the court did not abuse its discretion. Andalusian Global Designated Activity Co. v. The Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd. for Puerto Rico (In re The Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Bd. For Puerto Rico), 954 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 2020).

- 13.1.k Liquidating trust does not have standing to bring breach of fiduciary duty action against a limited partnership debtors' principals. During the chapter 11 case, the court granted the creditors committee authority to bring claims against the debtor's directors and officers for breach of fiduciary duty. The chapter 11 plan transferred those claims to a creditors trust, which pursued the claim. Section 17-1001 of the Delaware Limited Partnership Act authorizes a limited partner to bring a derivative action on the partnership's behalf; section 17-1002 requires the plaintiff to be "a partner or an assignee of a partnership interest at the time of bringing the action." Because neither the debtor nor the creditors were a partner or an assignee of a partner at the time of bringing the action, the trust did not have standing to bring the action. Gavin/Solmonese LLC v. Citadel Energy P'ners, LLC (In re Citadel Watford City Disposal P'ners, L.P.), 603 B.R. 897 (Bankr. D. Del. 2019).
- 13.1.l A plan may vest section 542 turnover rights in a liquidation trustee. Before bankruptcy, the debtor's board appointed an audit committee to investigate financial statement irregularities. The committee hired counsel and a forensic accountant to investigate. The chapter 11 plan created a liquidation trust and vested the trustee with all the debtor in possession's causes of action under section 542 through 550 and with all rights, titles, and interests in any privilege or immunity applicable to the documents, records, and information related to the investigation. The liquidation trustee sought turnover under section 542 of the documents from counsel and the accountant, who argued that the attorney-client privilege applied to their work for the audit committee separately from the debtor. Section 542 permits the estate, subject to applicable privilege, to obtain turnover of recorded information relating to the debtor's property or financial affairs. Section 1123(b)(3) permits a plan to provide for the retention and enforcement by a representative of the estate of any claims or interests belonging to the debtor or the estate. The plan properly vested the section 542 right in the liquidating trustee, which may obtain the counsel's and accountant's documents, subject to any applicable privilege. In re Old BPSUSH Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 1867 (Bankr. D. Del. June 20, 2019).
- 13.1.m Liquidating trustee succeeds to audit committee's attorney-client privilege. Before bankruptcy, the debtor's board appointed an audit committee to investigate financial statement irregularities. The committee hired counsel and a forensic accountant to investigate. The chapter 11 plan created a liquidation trust and vested the trustee with all the debtor in possession's causes of action under section 542 through 550 and with all rights, titles, and interests in any privilege or immunity applicable to the documents, records, and information related to the investigation. Upon the filing of a bankruptcy petition, the trustee obtains control over a corporation's attorney-client privilege. An audit committee is a committee of the board of directors and thus is a component of the debtor. Therefore, the trustee succeeds to control of the audit committee's attorney-client privilege and may obtain all privileged documents. In re Old BPSUSH Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 1867 (Bankr. D. Del. June 20, 2019).
- 13.1.n Barton doctrine protects trustees of an asbestos trust. Asbestos claimants brought an action in state court for breach of fiduciary duty against the trustees of a trust established under a chapter 11 plan to pay future asbestos claimants. The trustee removed the action to the district court, which transferred venue to the bankruptcy court where the chapter 11 case was pending. Under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), a plaintiff may not sue a receiver except in the appointing court. Courts have extended the Barton doctrine to protect bankruptcy trustees and liquidating trusts created under a chapter 11 plan. The doctrine's purposes are to ensure consistent and equitable administration of the estate, to protect against judgments issued outside of the appointing court, and to permit the appointing court to exercise appropriate supervisory authority over the trustee. Those considerations apply equally to a trust created under a plan to pay future asbestos claims. Therefore, the doctrine prohibits the filing of an action against the trustees except in the bankruptcy court. Because the plaintiffs filed the action without leave of the bankruptcy court, the court dismisses the action. However, preventing the plaintiffs from bringing their claim at all would defeat the supervisory purpose of the doctrine, so the court dismisses without prejudice. Smith v. Hilton (In re Swan Transp. Co.), 596 B.R. 127 (Bankr. D. Del. 2018).

- 13.1.o Barton doctrine does not apply to an action against the trustee in the bankruptcy court. The trustee defended a WARN act claim but failed to raise certain defenses and thereby waived them and lost the action. He then sued principals of the company in the bankruptcy court to recover his losses. They counterclaimed against him for breach of fiduciary duty and breach of trust for inadvertently waiving the defenses and filed a motion under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), for leave to pursue the counterclaim. Under Barton, a court does not have jurisdiction to hear an action against a receiver appointed by a different court without the permission of the appointing court. Barton serves three principal purposes. It maintains the integrity of the appointing court's jurisdiction by preventing an action in another court from invading the corpus the trustee is charging with administering. It helps control burdensome litigation that could interfere with the administration. And it allows the appointing court to monitor the receiver's performance. Barton applies to bankruptcy trustees. However, Barton does not apply to an action brought in the appointing court, in this case, the bankruptcy court. None of the three purposes are served by requiring permission to sue in the appointing court, so the doctrine does not apply in this case. The court makes clear that the Barton doctrine deprives a court of jurisdiction, addressing the power of the court to hear the case; it is not a grant to a trustee of immunity, which is an affirmative defense. Therefore, the trustee must await the proper time to raise an immunity defense and may not raise it in response to the motion for leave to sue. In re World Marketing Chicago, LLC, 584 B.R. 737 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2018).
- 13.1.p A liquidating trustee need not be disinterested. A turnaround manager assisted the debtor in its chapter 11 case. The debtor's confirmed plan provided for the creation of a liquidating trust. In accordance with the plan's terms, the liquidating trust oversight committee selected the turnaround manager as the permanent trustee. Section 1104 governs the appointment of a trustee before confirmation of a plan. It requires that a trustee be disinterested, but it does not control the appointment of a post-confirmation trustee. Section 1123(b) permits a plan to vest estate causes of action in a "representative of the estate." A liquidating trust is such a representative. Section 1123(b) and the plan control the requirements and qualifications for a liquidating trustee. Section 1123(b) does not impose a disinterestedness requirement. Therefore, the court approves the appointment. In re Health Diagnostic Lab., Inc., 584 B.R. 525 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2018).
- 13.1.q Chapter 7 trustee is entitled to Harlow qualified immunity. After the tenant had neglected the landlord debtor's property, resulting in water damage from frozen pipes, the debtor's chapter 7 trustee took possession of the debtor's real estate, changing the lock and locking out the tenant. The trustee promptly sought a court order approving the action. The tenant sued the trustee, seeking damages and a TRO against the trustee, which the court denied at the same time it granted the trustee's approval order. In Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982), the Supreme Court held that a governmental official performing discretionary duties is protected from civil liability for actions taken in an official capacity that does not violate a clear statutory or constitutional right that a reasonable person would have known. A chapter 7 trustee is created by federal statute, appointed and supervised by the U.S. trustee, and entrusted with statutory duties. A trustee is entitled to Harlow qualified immunity. Although state law prohibits tenant eviction without due process, the trustee's action was authorized under federal law, which required her to collect and reduce to money property of the estate. Therefore, the trustee had qualified immunity from the tenant's claim. Tracing the history of trustees in bankruptcy, a concurring opinion argues that the trustee should be protected by quasi-judicial immunity, not Harlow qualified immunity. Phoenician Mediterranean Villa, LLC v. Swope (In re J&S Props.), LLC, 872 F.3d 138 (3d Cir. 2017).

- 13.1.r Insured-versus-insured exception applies to a chapter 11 liquidating trustee. The debtor’s chapter 11 plan assigned claims against directors to a liquidating trustee, seeking to recover from the debtor’s directors and officers insurance policy. However, the policy excluded coverage for “any claim made against an Insured Person ... by, on behalf of, or in the name or right of the company or any Insured Person.” After the trustee filed the lawsuit, the insurance carrier sought a declaration that the exclusion applied. Here, the debtor in possession, which for these purposes was the same entity as the Company, assigned the claims to the liquidating trustee, which therefore stands in the Company’s shoes. Accordingly, the exclusion applies to the liquidating trustee the same as it would apply to the debtor. The court suggests the result might differ if there had been a chapter 11 trustee, which the dissent seizes upon as a reason for a different result. Indian Harbor Ins. Co. v. Zucker, 860 F.3d 373 (6th Cir. 2017).
- 13.1.s Barton applies to a foreign proceeding. The plan confirmation order vested assets, including causes of action, in a plan administrator, whom the plan charged with collecting and distributing them. The plan administrator established a Delaware LLC, of which the administrator was the managing member, and assigned to the LLC claims under insurance policies. The policies were issued by Bermuda insurers and had Bermuda arbitration clauses. The administrator and the LLC commenced an action in the bankruptcy court to collect on the policies. While asserting in the bankruptcy court that the claims were subject to arbitration in Bermuda, the insurers commenced an action against the administrator and the LLC in Bermuda seeking to enjoin them from pursuing the bankruptcy court action and requiring arbitration in Bermuda. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), held that a state court lacks jurisdiction over an action against a federal court receiver brought without leave of the court that appointed the receiver. Any such action interfered with the administration of the receivership and therefore with the jurisdiction of the receivership court. The courts have extended the doctrine to encompass bankruptcy trustees, those assisting them in carrying out their duties (such as counsel), those who are the trustee’s “functional equivalent,” and those whose statutory duties are similar to a trustee’s, all with the purpose of centralizing bankruptcy litigation in the bankruptcy court and keeping a watchful eye on bankruptcy professionals. Accordingly, the doctrine also applies to a plan administrator appointed under a plan confirmation order, and it applies whether the action is brought in a domestic or foreign court. In Barton, the Supreme Court, acting as the court of last resort over federal courts’ decisions and certain state court decisions implicating federal rights, had power to determine the extent of the interfering state court’s jurisdiction. It does not have similar power over a foreign court. Perhaps recognizing this inherent weakness in the doctrine’s international reach, the bankruptcy court enjoins the insurers from pursuing the Bermuda action and requires they dismiss it. MF Global Holdings Ltd. v. Allied World Assur. Co Ltd. (In re MF Global Holdings Ltd.), 562 B.R. 866 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 13.1.t Barton doctrine prohibits subpoena to a liquidating trustee. The debtor’s plan provided for the appointment of a liquidating trustee, who was vested with all remaining assets, including claims against third parties. The trustee maintained staff to deal with discovery and other matters relating to litigation, but as settlements were reached, he dismissed staff. A party with whom he had settled subpoenaed him for additional discovery. To provide it, he would have had to hire professionals and experts, because he no longer employed anyone who had any knowledge of the subject matter of the discovery. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), requires permission of the appointing court before an action may be brought against a court-appointed fiduciary, in part to protect the court-supervised estate from third party claims that are not approved by the court. Barton applies to liquidating trustees. Barton applies here because compliance with the subpoena would require the trustee to expend funds to hire experts and professionals to comply, which would dissipate trust assets for a purpose that the confirmation order did not contemplate. Therefore, the court enjoins the party’s enforcement of the subpoena. In re Circuit City Stores, Inc., 557 B.R. 443 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2016).

- 13.1.u A chapter 7 trustee’s fee in excess of the distribution to unsecured creditors is not per se extraordinary circumstances to deny the statutory commission. The trustee administered only a single asset in the debtor’s chapter 7 case, yielding a payment to the secured creditor and a small surplus. The trustee’s final report proposed to use about 75% of the surplus to pay the trustee a fee that was less than the statutory commission amount and about 25% to make a 5.7% distribution to general unsecured creditors. Section 326(a) provides a formula to determine a chapter 7 trustee’s maximum compensation, which the court should award in the absence of extraordinary circumstances. A fee greater than the distribution to unsecured creditors does not per se constitute extraordinary circumstances. Fear v. U.S. Trustee (In re Ruiz), 541 B.R. 892 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2015).
- 13.1.v Joint effort does not preclude fee enhancement. The chapter 11 trustee achieved an extraordinary result in a case that appeared at the outset to be administratively insolvent, collecting over $200 million for distribution to hundreds of tort creditors. The outcome resulted from the efforts of numerous professionals, who cooperated in achieving the recoveries, though the trustee played a leading role. The trustee sought a fee that was more than compensation at the trustee’s ordinary hourly rate but less than the commission section 326(a) allows. Courts consider numerous factors in determining whether to award a fee more than the “lodestar,” which in this case was the trustee’s hourly fee. However, being solely responsible for the case’s successful outcome should not be a factor. If it were, professionals might be discouraged to cooperate, which would more likely harm the estate. The court awards an enhancement even though the trustee was not solely responsible for the favorable results. In re New England Compounding Pharmacy, Inc., 544 B.R. 724 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2016).
- 13.1.w Trustee succeeds to audit committee’s attorney-client privilege. The Cayman debtor’s board of director’s audit committee retained counsel to conduct an investigation into allegations that might have involved violation of U.S. securities laws. After the investigation, a creditor filed a winding up petition against the debtor in the Cayman Islands. The Cayman liquidator obtained recognition in the U.S. under chapter 15 and then sought documents from the audit committee’s counsel, which asserted attorney-client privilege under U.S. law as a ground to withhold documents. Federal Rule of Evidence 501 governs privilege. Where, as here, federal law provides the rule of decision, federal common law also determines privilege choice of law. The “touch base” doctrine, which bases privilege choice of law on which jurisdiction has the predominant or most direct and compelling interest in governing privilege, applies. In this case, that is the United States. The internal affairs doctrine applies the law of a corporation’s domicile to matters of corporate governance and structure. If that doctrine applied here, the court might have to determine whether the debtor’s audit committee was a separate entity from the debtor and therefore entitled to assert or waive separately from the debtor. However, that doctrine does not apply because only privilege law governs the issues here. Under CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343 (1985), a trustee in bankruptcy succeeds to a corporation’s privilege. An audit committee is a committee of the board and therefore part of the corporation. Moreover, its interests, to the extent they are adverse to management involved in wrongdoing, are aligned with the trustee’s interests. Therefore, the liquidator succeeds to the privilege and is entitled to turnover of documents that were withheld on attorney-client privilege grounds. Krys v. Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton, & Garrison LLP (In re China Med. Techs., Inc.), 539 B.R. 643 (S.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 13.1.x Credit bid is not “moneys disbursed” for the purpose of calculating a trustee’s compensation. The chapter 7 trustee negotiated the sale of the estate’s principal real property asset to the secured creditor, by credit bid, subject to overbids. There were no overbids. At closing, the trustee conveyed the property free and clear of liens to the secured creditor’s designee and applied the credit bid to reduce the amount owing on the lien. The trustee sought compensation for his work in the case. Section 326(a) limits a trustee’s compensation to a percentage of “moneys disbursed or turned over in the case by the trustee to parties in interest ... including holders of secured claims.” “Money” is a medium of exchange. “To disburse” means to pay out money. A credit bid is not a medium of exchange that would constitute money disbursed under section 326(a). Therefore, the trustee may not base compensation on the amount of a secured creditor’s credit bid. Tamm v. U.S. Trustee (In re Hokulani Square, Inc.), 776 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2015).

13.1.y Barton doctrine does not apply to counterclaim against the trustee in the appointing court.

The defendants in an action by the trustee filed a counterclaim against the trustee for breach of duty and willful misconduct. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), deprives a court of jurisdiction over an action against a bankruptcy trustee brought without leave of the appointing court. By its terms, Barton applies to an action in a different court. Where the action is brought in the appointing court, the appointing court can exercise adequate supervision over the action to protect the trustee and the estate to the extent appropriate. Finally, it would be a waste of judicial resources to require a separate motion for leave to bring the action. Therefore, Barton does not prohibit the action here. CERx Pharmacy P’ners, LP v. RPD Holdings, LLC (In re Provider Meds, LP), 514 B.R. 473 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2014).

13.1.z Section 326(a) grants a chapter 7 trustee a commission. The court determined that the chapter 7 trustee did not adequately administer the estate and therefore awarded the trustee a fee based on an hourly rate, rather than the commission rate under section 326(a). Section 330(a)(1) permits the court to award reasonable compensation to a trustee. Section 330(a)(2) permits the court to award less compensation than requested. Section 330(a)(7) provides, “in determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to a trustee, the court shall treat such compensation as a commission, based on section 326.” By this language, Congress determined that the commission rates in section 326(a) are reasonable compensation for a trustee, absent extraordinary circumstances. Although the statute does not use the term “extraordinary circumstances,” using the term helps to reconcile section 330(a)(7) with sections 330(a)(1) and (2), permitting the court to award only reasonable compensation and less compensation than requested, and does not impute to Congress the intent to find the commission rates reasonable when extraordinary circumstances are present. However, in determining whether to reduce fees for extraordinary circumstances, the court must first determine the commission rate and then decide whether that fee is unreasonable under the circumstances, explaining the reasons for any reduction. The court of appeals remands for that determination. Gold v. Robbins (In re Rowe), 750 F.3d 392 (4th Cir. 2014).

13.1.aa Standing chapter 13 trustee qualifies as a federal officer. A standing chapter 13 trustee fired an employee. The employee sued in state court for racial discrimination. The trustee removed the action to federal court. Section 1442(a)(1) of title 28 permits removal of an action against “any officer (or any person acting under that officer) of the United States ... in an official or individual capacity, for or relating to any act under color of such office.” A person acts under a federal officer if the person actively assists the officer in carrying out the officer’s duties or functions. The standing trustee assists the United States Trustee in carrying out the duties of administering chapter 13 cases. An assertion that the defendant was acting under color of his office is a colorable federal defense and is adequate to qualify for removal. Because the trustee asserted that his actions in firing the employee were performed in his role as standing chapter 13 trustee, he adequately asserted that he was acting under color of his office. Therefore, removal is proper. Bell v. Thornburg, 743 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2014).

13.1.bb Section 108(a) statute of limitations extension applies to a liquidating trustee. The estate had a malpractice claim against the debtor’s counsel. The claim’s statute of limitations expired within two years after bankruptcy. The debtor confirmed a plan that vested the claim in a liquidating trust under section 1123(b)(3)(B) as a representative of the estate for the benefit of two classes that did not receive any other distribution under the plan. The liquidating trustee brought the claim within two years after bankruptcy but after the state law statute of limitations expired. Section 108(a) permits the trustee to bring an action within two years after the order for relief, despite any shorted nonbankruptcy statute of limitation, if that statute has not expired as of the date of the filing of the petition. The liquidating trust is a successor to the trustee and therefore succeeds to any rights that the trustee had. Therefore, section 108(a) applies to a liquidating trustee. Antioch Litigation Trust v. McDermott Will & Emery LLP, 500 B.R. 755 (S.D. Ohio 2013).

- 13.1.cc SLUSA may bar a trustee’s action as assignee of creditors’ claims. The trustee received assignments of creditors’ claims against third parties who might have had liability to creditors (but not to the debtor, because of the in pari delicto doctrine) and brought an action against the third parties. The action included a claim that would be a “covered class action” claim under the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998 (SLUSA), 15 U.S.C. § 78bb, that is, a claim alleging “a misrepresentation or omission of a material fact in connection with the purchase or sale of a security” in an action in which “damages are sought on behalf of more than 50 persons or prospective class members, and questions of law or fact common to those persons or members of the prospective class, without reference to issues of individualized reliance on an alleged misstatement or omission, predominate over any questions affecting only individual persons or members.” A bankruptcy trustee’s claim that is property of the estate is not a covered class action. Even though the action is for the benefit of numerous creditors, the trustee is a single entity, succeeding to a single entity’s claim. However, where the trustee takes assignments of claims, he stands in the multiple assignors’ shoes and therefore the number of assignors must be counted in determining whether the action is a covered class action. Securities Inv. Protec. Corp. v. Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs. LLC), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 172638 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 6, 2013).
- 13.1.dd Court may terminate trustee’s appointment when circumstances that led to appointment no longer exist. The debtor electric cooperative’s board deadlocked and agreed to the appointment of a trustee. Eventually, the board members agreed on a course of action. Section 1105 permits the court to terminate a trustee’s appointment and restore the debtor to possession and management of the estate and business. Section 1105 does not specify any standards to guide the court’s discretion. Here, the court concludes that the circumstances that prompted the trustee’s appointment—a deadlocked board—no longer existed and so terminated the trustee’s appointment. In re Southern Mont. Elec. Gen. & Trans. Coop., Inc., 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 5009 (Bankr. D. Mont. Nov. 26, 2013).
- 13.1.ee Trustee is liable personally and on her bond for gross negligence. The chapter 7 debtor came into an inheritance within 180 days after the petition date. The trustee demanded turnover, but the debtor resisted. The trustee took no further action to recover the assets until after the debtor received the cash from the probate estate and spent it. A creditor sued the surety on the trustee’s bond for damages. A trustee is liable for gross negligence (or willful misconduct), not for ordinary negligence, which “is an act or omission respecting legal duty of an aggravated character It amounts to indifference to present legal duty and to utter forgetfulness of legal obligations.” The trustee’s complete failure to act here met this standard. Expert testimony is required under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 to show gross negligence only where it will help the trier of fact “understand evidence or determine a fact in issue.” Where common sense will allow the trier of fact to determine the fact, expert testimony is not required. Because a lay person could determine, based on common sense, that the trustee’s complete failure to act constituted gross negligence, expert testimony was not required. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. U.S. by Lamesa Nat’l Bank (In re Schooler), 725 F.3d 498 (5th Cir. 2013).
- 13.1.ff State law does not provide the statute of limitations for suit on a trustee’s bond. The chapter 7 debtor came into an inheritance within 180 days after the petition date. The trustee demanded turnover, but the debtor resisted. The trustee took no further action to recover the assets until after the debtor received the cash from the probate estate and spent it. A creditor sued the surety on the trustee's bond for damages before the trustee was discharged but after the state statute of limitations on a negligence claim expired. The bond made the trustee and the surety jointly and severally liable for any damages arising from the trustee's failure to perform her duties faithfully. Section 322(c) provides that a "trustee is not liable personally or on such trustee's bond in favor of the United States for any penalty or forfeiture incurred by the debtor." Section 322(d) provides that a "proceeding on a trustee's bond may not be commenced after two years after the date on which such trustee was discharged." A trustee's and a surety's liability on a bond is exclusively a federal question, governed by section 322. Therefore, the state statute of limitations on the claim against the trustee would not defeat the creditor's claim against the trustee, and the surety could not rely on it to defeat its own liability on the bond. Moreover, the surety was jointly and severally liable with the trustee, not derivatively liable, so even if state law applied, the surety could not rely on a state statute of limitations defense that would apply only to the trustee. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. U.S. by Lamesa Nat'l Bank (In re Schooler), 725 F.3d 498 (5th Cir. 2013).

13.1.gg Bankruptcy court may hear and determine ERISA plan trustee's compensation. The debtor maintained an ERISA-qualified defined benefit plan for its employees. The chapter 7 trustee assumed plan administration responsibilities as required under section 704(a)(11). The court had ruled that the trustee's compensation, whether from the plan or the estate, was subject to bankruptcy court approval. After completing administration and disbursing plan funds to plan participants, the trustee applied for bankruptcy court approval of his compensation, which was to be paid in part from plan assets (which are not property of the estate) and in part from the estate. Under ERISA, plan fees are not subject to prior court approval, but the Department of Labor, which administers ERISA, may sue a trustee who receives unreasonable compensation. The DOL objected to the bankruptcy court's determination of plan-paid compensation on the ground that ERISA does not require prior court compensation approval and the DOL should not be bound by any such ruling. The bankruptcy court may determine the compensation if ERISA and the Bankruptcy Code do not conflict. Section 326(a) bases a trustee's compensation on "moneys disbursed or turned over in the case by the trustee to parties in interest." The statute does not apply only to money that is property of the estate, so the amount the trustee disburses from the plan is a proper basis for calculating trustee compensation. However, section 330 requires that the compensation be reasonable. A party in interest is one who has a practical stake in the case's outcome or who will be significantly affected by a decision in the case. Plan participants are parties in interest, because a ruling on the trustee's compensation from plan assets will affect them. ERISA requires a plan fiduciary to use due care and discharge his duties for the sole benefit of participants, and prohibits a plan fiduciary from self-dealing, such as by setting his own fees. The Bankruptcy Code's requirements are consistent with these provisions, though there is a procedural difference between the statutes. But the Code's prior fee approval requirement does not compromise the rights of any parties to object to the trustee's compensation. Therefore, the statutes do not conflict, and the bankruptcy court may hear and determine the trustee's compensation application. In re The Robert Plan Corp., 493 B.R. 674 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2012).

13.1.hh Quasi-judicial immunity and Barton v. Barbour bar debtor's law firm's actions against trustee for malicious prosecution. The trustee brought an action in the bankruptcy court against the debtor's law firm to avoid a transfer of property of the debtor's subsidiary made during the involuntary gap period. The bankruptcy court granted the law firm's motion to dismiss for failure to state the claim that the property was property of the estate. The trustee brought another action in state court against the law firm for breach of fiduciary duty, conspiracy to commit fraud and other state law claims arising out of the same transfer. The state court dismissed the action on statute of limitations and other grounds. The law firm then sued the trustee in bankruptcy court, and sought leave from the bankruptcy court to sue in state court, for malicious prosecution. A trustee is entitled to quasi-judicial immunity for actions taken in his official capacity and within his authority, though not for a lawsuit by an estate beneficiary for the trustee's breach of fiduciary duty to the estate. Prior court approval of the trustee's action is not required as a condition to the immunity. Seizure of property that is not property of the estate is outside the trustee's authority, but bringing an action to recover property, even if unsuccessful because the property was not estate property, is within the trustee's official capacity and not outside the trustee's authority. Bringing the action is part of the trustee's duties, even if the trustee is unsuccessful. In this case, the trustee acted within his official capacity in bringing the avoiding power action and did not improperly seize the property. He was therefore entitled to quasi-judicial immunity in the bankruptcy court action. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), requires that a party seeking to sue a trustee in another court for an act done in the trustee's official capacity and within his authority first obtain leave from the appointing court. For the same reasons that the trustee's avoiding power action was entitled to quasi-judicial immunity in the bankruptcy court, the court denied the law firm leave to sue the trustee in state court on account of the trustee's unsuccessful state court action. Grant, Konvalinka & Harrison, PC v. Banks (In re McKenzie), 716 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2013).

- 13.1.ii Barton v. Barbour* requires dismissal of post-closing action for mismanagement and misconduct. The debtor consulted a lawyer before bankruptcy. The lawyer later became the trustee in the debtor's chapter 7 case. After the case was closed, the debtor sued the trustee in his individual capacity in federal district court for mismanagement of the estate and misconduct, to the debtor's detriment. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), deprives a federal court of jurisdiction to hear an action against a federal receiver that is brought without leave of the receiver's appointing court. The doctrine has been expanded to include bankruptcy trustees. It does not apply, however, to an action for redress of a trustee's ultra vires action, such as seizure of a third party's assets, because such an act is not related to the administration of the estate. Where the action seeks redress for estate administration, even if the action alleges that the trustee acted maliciously, Barton applies. Suing the trustee in his individual capacity does not escape Barton, nor does waiting until after the case is closed. Finally, 28 U.S.C. 959(b) permits an action against a trustee for claims arising from the trustee's conduct of the debtor's business, but it does not apply to ordinary administration of an estate, as is the ordinary case in a chapter 7 liquidation. Therefore, the court dismisses the debtor's action against the trustee. Satterfield v. Malloy, 700 F.3d 1231 (10th Cir. 2012).
- 13.1.jj Discharged trustee in closed case has standing to be heard on motion to reopen. The chapter 7 debtors received their discharge, their case was closed and their trustee was discharged without their having disclosed a prepetition personal injury claim. They moved to reopen the case and convert it to chapter 11. The trustee joined the motion to reopen but opposed the motion to convert. Because the motion to reopen was combined with the motion to convert, the previously discharged trustee had not been reappointed at the time of the hearing on the motion. Nevertheless, to deny the trustee standing in these circumstances would be a hypertechnical reading of the statute that would exalt form over substance. The trustee is the most knowledgeable person about the issues in the case and the only one with sufficient incentives to challenge a debtor who seeks to reopen based on a previous failure to disclose assets. Under section 554, the estate retains any undisclosed assets, and the trustee is the representative of the estate and so should have standing to be heard on a combined motion. Section 727(e) implicitly recognizes a discharged trustee's standing by granting authority for the trustee to seek revocation of the debtor's discharge after the case is closed. After reopening, the U.S. trustee might not appoint the same trustee for the case. But until that happens, the former trustee is in the best position to challenge a nondisclosing debtor's motion to convert. Therefore, the trustee has standing to oppose the motion. Levesque v. Shapiro (In re Levesque), 473 B.R. 331 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

13.1.kk Section 326(a) grants a chapter 7 trustee a commission. The chapter 7 trustee initially filed a no-asset report. Later, the trustee collected tax refunds owing to the debtor and issued a notice to creditors to file proofs of claim. He distributed a portion of the refunds to the debtor as an exemption and a portion as a dividend on general unsecured claims. He applied for compensation based on the percentages of money disbursed that section 326(a) lists, independent of the time or effort spent in the case. Section 326(a) provides “the court may allow reasonable compensation under section 330(a) of this title to a trustee ... not to exceed [specified percentages] upon all moneys disbursed or turned over to parties in interest.” Section 330(a)(1) permits the court to “award to a trustee ... reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered.” Section 330(a)(7) provides, “In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to a trustee, the court shall treat such compensation as a commission, based on section 326.” Section 330(a)(3) provides additional factors, which are similar to the lodestar analysis, that the court must consider in determining reasonable compensation to a chapter 11 (but not chapter 7) trustee. Section 330(a)(7) consists of two clauses, the introductory dependent clause, and the independent “commission” clause. The commission clause requires a commission, that is, a percentage fee, tied to the percentages listed in section 326(a). Fixed commissions are generally not subject to adjustment for reasonableness, but the dependent clause suggests a court may apply a reasonableness assessment. The reasonableness factors in section 330(a)(3) apply only to a chapter 11 trustee’s fees. A chapter 7 trustee’s fees are subject to a different reasonableness assessment, which is whether there is a rational relationship between the commission and the services rendered. Congress has fixed both the chapter 7 trustee’s duties and the commission rate, so there is a presumption that there is a rational relationship between them. That relationship breaks down only in extraordinary circumstances. In such cases, the court may apply a reasonableness analysis. Otherwise, a chapter 7 trustee is entitled to the commission rate. Hopkins v. Asset Acceptance LLC (In re Salgado-Nava), 473 B.R. 911 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2012).

13.1.ii Barton v. Barbour* applies to an action against a liquidating trustee for activities taken in administering the estate. The trustee sold the estate’s real property, without the court’s approval, in violation of a covenant restricting the sale. A purchaser of a different, related parcel sought leave to sue the trustee in state court for violation of the covenant and for depriving it of property without notice and due process. Under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), an action against a federal court equity receiver first requires permission of the court that appointed the receiver. Otherwise, the effect of the action would be to take property from the receiver to satisfy the plaintiff’s claim, without regard to the claims of other creditors. Without such permission, no other court has jurisdiction to hear the action. Courts have applied Barton to protect bankruptcy trustees, because they are similarly officers of the court whose possession of assets is effectively the court’s possession. A judgment against a trustee may affect the administration of assets in the same way that an action against a receiver might. In addition, 28 U.S.C. § 959(a) implicitly codifies the Barton rule in bankruptcy cases. It permits an action against a trustee or debtor in possession “with respect to their acts ... in carrying on business”, but not otherwise. Section 323(b), which establishes that a trustee has the capacity to sue and be sued, addresses only capacity, not the procedures a plaintiff must follow before bringing an action. In this case, the action against the trustee was for activities in administering the estate, not in conducting the debtor’s business. Therefore, Barton applies and section 959(a) does not. In determining whether to permit the action to proceed, the bankruptcy court must consider only whether the claim is “not without foundation”. It need not conduct a trial on the merits or even consider a claim of immunity or other defenses the trustee might raise. Those may be heard in the nonbankruptcy forum. In re Vistacare Group, LLC, 678 F.3d 218 (3d Cir. 2012).

13.1.mm Barton v. Barbour* applies to a trustee’s attorneys who are accused of wrongful conduct or even fraud in pursuing assets for the estate. The trustee sued the debtor’s former officers to avoid transfers and for breach of fiduciary duty. The defendants later brought an action against the trustee’s attorneys, claiming that in depositions and to support expert testimony, they used copies of the tax returns that they knew were not the debtor’s tax returns and that they wrongfully obtained and used copies of the defendants’ individual tax returns. Under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), a plaintiff may not sue a receiver appointed by a federal court without leave of court. Barton applies equally to bankruptcy trustees and their attorneys for conduct within the context of their roles of recovering assets for the estate. Barton applies to a trustee’s attorney even if the trustee did not specifically direct the conduct that is the subject of the action and to conduct that the plaintiff alleges was wrongful. The doctrine also applies to conduct that the plaintiff alleges was fraudulent, because trustees and their attorneys equally need protection from unfounded allegations of fraud, and because bringing such matters before the appointing court helps that court to police its appointees. The attorneys’ conduct here was in pursuit of recoveries for the estate and is therefore covered by Barton, so the action must be dismissed. McDaniel v. Blust, 668 F.3d 153 (4th Cir. 2012).

- 13.1.nn Credit bid is not “moneys disbursed” for the purpose of calculating a trustee’s compensation. The chapter 7 trustee negotiated the sale of the estate’s principal asset to the secured creditor, by credit bid, subject to overbids. There were no overbids. At closing, the trustee conveyed the property free and clear of liens to the secured creditor’s designee and applied the credit bid to reduce the amount owing on the lien. The trustee sought compensation for his work in the case. Section 326(a) limits a trustee’s compensation to a percentage of “moneys disbursed or turned over in the case by the trustee to parties in interest ... including holders of secured claims”. “Money” is a medium of exchange. “To disburse” means to pay out money. A credit bid is not a medium of exchange that would constitute money disbursed under section 326(a). Such a reading is consistent with the use of “money” elsewhere in the Code, such as in section 345 and in section 704(a)(1), which requires a trustee to “collect and reduce to money the property of the estate”. It is also consistent with the purpose of section 704(a)(1), because it measures the trustee’s compensation only by the amount of money that the trustee produces consistent with the section 704(a)(1) duty, not by the value of property that the trustee simply turns over to parties in interest. Property turnover or transfer on a credit bid does not produce a net benefit to the estate or additional disbursements to holders of unsecured claims, who would have to bear the expense of the trustee’s compensation based on the credit bid. Therefore, the trustee may not base compensation on the amount of a secured creditor’s credit bid. U.S. Trustee v. Tamm (In re Hokulani Square, Inc.), 460 B.R. 763 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2011).
- 13.1.oo Declaratory action against the trustee to determine avoidability of a transfer violates Barton v. Barbour. The trustee brought an action to recover voidable transfers from the initial transferee and from its related subsequent transferee. The subsequent transferee then brought an action in the Grand Court of the Cayman Islands for a declaration that it was not liable to the trustee. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), prohibits an action against a trustee without leave of the appointing court. The Cayman action violates Barton. The court enjoins the subsequent transferee from proceeding with the action. Picard v. Maxam Absolute Return Fund, L.P. (In re Bernard L. Madoff Inv. Secs., LLC), 460 B.R. 106 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 13.1.pp Section 326(a) percentages may apply to noncash disbursements where chapter 11 trustee confirms plan that does not provide for cash distributions. A chapter 11 trustee administered a case and proposed and confirmed a plan that resulted in distribution of securities (rather than cash) to creditors and investors. Section 326(a) limits a chapter 7 or chapter 11 trustee’s compensation to a percentage of “all moneys disbursed or turned over in the case by the trustee to parties in interest”. In this case, the trustee’s fee request exceeded the percentage of cash disbursed but not the percentage of securities distributed under the plan. Section 704(a)(1) requires a chapter 7 trustee to “collect and reduce to money the property of the estate for which such trustee serves”. There is no comparable duty of a chapter 11 trustee, who is required instead to propose and confirm a plan, which might provide for distribution of property other than cash. It would create an absurd result to apply section 326(a) literally to deny the trustee compensation for doing what the statute requires. Therefore, the court applies a “constructive disbursement” exception to section 326(a) to permit the trustee to be compensated for his efforts. In re Radical Bunny, LLC, 459 B.R. 434 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2011)

- 13.1.qq Trustee may employ counsel at the expense of the estate to defend a malicious prosecution action. The trustee sued to recover a postpetition transfer. The court dismissed the complaint on the pleading, because the trustee failed to allege that the transfer was of property of the debtor or the estate. The defendants in the action sued the trustee and his counsel for malicious prosecution and abuse of process. Trustees are entitled to quasi-judicial immunity for actions within the scope of their official duties and a presumption that they act within the scope of their duties, to protect them from claims, so that they will not refrain from aggressively pursuing actions to recover assets for the estate. Consistent with the policy to protect trustees in carrying out their official duties, a trustee should be able to employ counsel at the expense of the estate to defend an action asserting claims against the trustee arising out of the trustee’s official duties. In re McKenzie, 453 B.R. 737 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2011).
- 13.1.rr A trustee needs court approval to compensate professionals from pension plan assets in administering an ERISA plan. The debtor maintained an ERISA-qualified defined benefit plan for its employees. The chapter 7 trustee assumed plan administration responsibilities as required under section 704(a)(11). Under ERISA, a plan administrator may retain and compensate professionals and may compensate himself without any court or agency approval. However, section 327(a) requires that the trustee obtain court approval to hire a professional “to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee’s duties under this title”. In addition, section 330(a) permits the court to award compensation to the trustee and professionals. Trustees are creatures of the Bankruptcy Code; they “arise under” the Bankruptcy Code, and their oversight and compensation are within the bankruptcy courts’ core jurisdiction. By delegating to a trustee the responsibility to administer pension plans, Congress brought their compensation for doing so within the bankruptcy court’s core jurisdiction. Therefore, the court has jurisdiction to review the compensation request. In re Franchi Equip. Co., Inc., 452 B.R. 352 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2011).
- 13.1.ss Court holds trustee liable on her bond. The debtor’s father died two months after her bankruptcy, leaving a substantial estate. The trustee inquired of the debtor about the assets to which she would be entitled under the will, but the debtor resisted turnover. A creditor pressed the trustee several times to act, but the trustee took no action to recover the assets from the debtor until over seven years later, by which time the debtor had spent the assets. Section 322(a) requires a trustee to file a bond in favor of the United States conditioned on the faithful performance of the trustee’s official duties. The trustee here did so. Rule 2010(b) permits a creditor to bring an action on the bond in the name of the United States. The creditor sued the surety on the bond under Rule 2010(b). Section 322(d) prohibits commencement of an action on the bond more than two years after the trustee’s discharge. The statute of limitations does not supplement nonbankruptcy statutes but completely supplants them. Although the state statute for recovery on a bond had expired when the creditor brought the action, the section 322(d) had not. Therefore, the action was timely. A trustee is personally liable only for gross negligence. The same standard applies to liability on a bond, as the liability of the surety is joint and several with the liability of the trustee. Although courts disagree on the proper standard to define gross negligence, the trustee’s failure here to pursue substantial assets for over seven years qualifies. Therefore, the surety is liable for the loss occasioned by the trustee’s inaction. The liability is to the estate, not to the creditor bringing the action, because the bond is in favor of the United States to cover losses to the estate. U.S. ex rel. Lamesa Nat’l Bank v. Liberty Mut. Surety (In re McSchooler), 449 B.R. 502 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2010).

- 13.1.tt Court approved contract does not create a relationship that renders a trustee not disinterested. After bankruptcy, the debtor transferred his principal asset. Upon learning of the transfer, the trustee sued the transferee. A creditor claimed the debtor had held the asset as agent for the benefit of the creditor and had no authority to transfer it. A claims buyer bought the creditor's claim and later entered into an asset purchase agreement with the trustee to buy the estate's interest in the asset and the trustee's claim against the transferee. The agreement provided for a payment to the claims buyer if the trustee settled the suit against the transferee without the buyer's consent. The court approved the agreement. The transferee filed a chapter 11 plan that provided for dismissal of the trustee's suit against him, turnover of all the estate's property to him, payment to the buyer of any amounts that would be owing under the asset purchase agreement if the trustee settled the suit without the buyer's consent and payment in full of all claims, including the claim buyer's claim. The trustee and the buyer filed a competing plan. The transferee objected to confirmation of the trustee/claim buyer's plan on the ground that the trustee was not disinterested. (The opinion does not explain why non-disinterestedness provided a plan objection ground.) A person is "disinterested" when the person "does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors or equity security interest holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor or for any other reason". A court approved, non-personal relationship with a creditor based on a postpetition contract does not render the trustee interested. Search Market Direct, Inc. v. Jubber (In re Paige), 439 B.R. 786 (D. Utah 2010).
- 13.1.uu Disinterestedness requirement applies to personal interests, not to a interest held in a representative capacity. Some of the companies in the debtor group conducted a Ponzi scheme; others conducted legitimate business. Upon the government's civil action against the debtors for an asset freeze and forfeiture, the district court appointed a receiver for all the companies. The receivership order authorized the receiver to act as management of and to file bankruptcy petitions for all of the debtors. It also directed the receiver to "[c]ooperate with the United States Attorney's office and Court personnel as needed to ensure that any assets subject to the terms of this Order are available for criminal restitution, forfeiture, or other legal remedies in proceedings commenced by or on behalf of the United States." The receiver filed chapter 11 petitions for all of the debtors and remained receiver in the civil action. The court granted the U.S. Trustee's motion for a trustee, and, over the objection of a creditor of one of the legitimate businesses, the U.S. Trustee appointed the receiver as trustee for each of the debtors. Section 1104 requires that a trustee be a disinterested person. The definition of disinterested addresses only a person's personal interests, not interests held in a representative capacity, for example, as a receiver. In any event, the receivership orders did not create an adverse interest, as they required only transparency in operation of the receivership, not that the receiver align with the U.S. Attorney's office in seeking forfeiture. Therefore, the receiver was a disinterested person and qualified to serve as trustee. Rule 2009 permits appointment of a single trustee for related cases unless prejudice would result to the separate estates. Because the cases were still in the phase of locating assets, inter-estate conflicts were not yet apparent, and the appointment of a single trustee was appropriate. Ritchie Spec. Credit Invs. v. U.S. Trustee, 620 F.3d 847 (8th Cir. 2010).
- 13.1.vv A trustee needs court approval for retention of professionals and compensation in administering an ERISA plan. The debtor maintained an ERISA-qualified defined benefit plan for its employees. The chapter 7 trustee assumed plan administration responsibilities as required under section 704(a)(11). Under ERISA, a plan administrator may retain and compensate professionals and may compensate himself without any court or agency approval. However, section 327(a) requires that the trustee obtain court approval to hire a professional "to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under this title". In addition, section 330(a) permits the court to award compensation to the trustee and professionals. Neither section 327 nor section 330 is limited to situations in which the trustee or professionals are to be paid from the estate. Therefore, they apply to the trustee's employment and compensation of professionals and to the trustee's own compensation, even though the pension plan, and not the estate, will make all payments. The court does not address whether the compensation that it awards is also an administrative expense under section 503(b)(2), which provides, "there shall be allowed administrative expenses ... including ... (2) compensation and reimbursement awarded under section 330(a)". In re The Robert Plan Corp., 439 B.R. 29 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2010).

13.1.ww Liquidating trustee under a chapter 11 plan may pursue creditor-assigned claims.

The debtor defrauded many of its investors. The investors asserted claims against the debtor's clearing bank, lender and depository. The chapter 11 plan created a liquidating trust to pursue the estate's claims and permitted individual investors to assign claims to the trustee to pursue collectively on their behalf. Caplin v. Marine Midland Grace Trust Co., 406 U.S. 416 (1972), prohibited a bankruptcy trustee from asserting creditors' claims, for three reasons: the Bankruptcy Act did not authorize the trustee to do so; the defendant might have had a subrogation right against the estate which would have defeated any recovery for the estate; and the trustee's action risked double recovery, as the creditors could still pursue their own claims. The Bankruptcy Code did not affect authorization. However, the Code's restrictions on a bankruptcy trustee do not limit the power a plan may grant to a reorganized debtor, including a liquidating trustee. Where creditors assign claims, Caplin's latter two reasons do not apply. Therefore, the liquidating trustee may assert the assigned claims against the bank. Grede v. Bank of N.Y. Mellon, 598 F.3d 899 (7th Cir. 2010).

13.1.xx Trustee may not receive early discharge of ERISA plan fiduciary claims. The debtor maintained a 401(k) plan. After bankruptcy, the trustee distributed all funds in the plan to the plan beneficiaries and sought court approval of a procedure that would have set a 60-day bar date for asserting claims under the plan and discharged the trustee thereafter from any claims not asserted. The Department of Labor objected. Section 704(a)(11) requires a trustee to serve as a plan administrator for any ERISA plan for which the debtor served as plan administrator. ERISA has a six-year statute of limitations for claims against a plan fiduciary, such as an administrator, but section 704(a)(1) requires the trustee to close the estate "as expeditiously as is compatible with the best interests of parties in interests". Section 704(a)(11) creates the trustee's duties, not ERISA. By placing the duties in the Bankruptcy Code, Congress intended to fit the trustee's ERISA duties within the Bankruptcy Code's framework. Section 350(a) authorizes the court to discharge the trustee "[a]fter an estate has been fully administered. The court therefore has jurisdiction to discharge the trustee from any ERISA liabilities, but only at the end of the case, not piecemeal during the case. Thus, the court denies the trustee's motion but notes that the trustee will be entitled to the discharge once the estate is fully administered and the case is ready to be closed. In re NSCO, Inc., 427 B.R. 165 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2010).

13.1.yy Chapter 7 trustee's compensation must be reasonable, despite section 330(a)(7)'s "commission" requirement. The trustee quickly handled about $120,000 in a chapter 7 case, for which the maximum fee under section 326(a) would be about $9,200. Section 326(a) permits the court to award a "reasonable" fee, subject to a maximum based on a percentage of the "handle". Section 330(a)(7) provides that in determining the amount of reasonable compensation for a chapter 7 trustee, "the court shall treat such compensation as a commission, based on section 326(a)". This provision begs the question of what commission is reasonable under the circumstances. Section 330(a)(3) requires the court to consider several factors in determining the reasonableness of the compensation of estate professionals other than a chapter 7 trustee, but it does not prohibit the court from considering those factors in awarding a chapter 7 trustee compensation. Finally, section 326(a) and section 330(a)(7) both refer to "reasonable" compensation. Therefore, the court reviews the extent of work the trustee did in this case and awards a fee of $5,000. The court notes that such compensation is higher, because of section 330(a)(7), than would have been awarded under a straight "lodestar" analysis, thereby giving some effect to section 330(a)(7)'s "commission" requirement. In re Ward, 418 B.R. 667 (W.D. Pa. 2009).

13.1.zz Barton immunity does not apply in the appointing court, but the trustee may still get derived quasi-judicial immunity. The trustee sued the debtor and his wife for a fraudulent transfer. They settled. The settlement contemplated the sale of the recovered property. The trustee negotiated a sale and, on notice to creditors and the debtor, obtained bankruptcy court approval. The debtor later sued the trustee in state court alleging that the sale violated the settlement agreement. The trustee removed the action to the bankruptcy court. The Barton doctrine requires that a party obtain leave of the appointing court before suing a trustee in another court for acts done in the trustee's official capacity. The doctrine's purpose is to permit the appointing court to supervise the case's administration, not to deny a forum to an unwary plaintiff. Once the trustee removed the action to the bankruptcy court, therefore, the doctrine's purpose had been met, and the debtor plaintiff's failure to obtain prior leave of court did not require dismissal of the action for lack of jurisdiction. However, derived quasi-judicial immunity protects a trustee who acts within her authority, after candid disclosure of her proposed action to the bankruptcy court and notice to the plaintiff and with bankruptcy court approval. Here, all requirements were met. The court therefore properly dismissed the action. Harris v. Wittman (In re Harris), 590 F.3d 730 (9th Cir. 2009).

13.1.aaa Trustee has quasi-judicial immunity for statements made at 341 meeting and in written communications to creditors. The court ordered the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee, who, upon investigation, determined that the debtor had been conducting a Ponzi scheme. At the section 341 meeting, the trustee advised creditors present that the debtor's principal had lied to and defrauded them. The principal then wrote to creditors defending himself and urging creditors to take action in the bankruptcy court. The trustee wrote in response and posted his letter on his official website, once again accusing the principal of conducting a Ponzi scheme. The principal sued in state court; the trustee removed the action to the bankruptcy court. Determining whether a non-judicial officer has quasi-judicial immunity requires a two-step process. The first step examines whether the common law accorded the relevant officer immunity. The second examines whether immunity covers the particular functions at issue. In this case, bankruptcy trustees have historically received absolute quasi-judicial immunity for their official acts because they perform some functions that are judicial in nature. The functions for which the principal sued here were the trustee's conduct of the 341 meeting, orally reporting on his ongoing investigation and informing creditors about the estate's assets to protect the estate from further dissipation and harm. The trustee's statutory duties give him broad authority to investigate, inform creditors and preserve the estate's assets. These functions are "essential to the authoritative adjudication of private rights to the bankruptcy estate" and therefore protected by quasi-judicial immunity. Nilsen v. Neilson (In re Cedar Funding, Inc.), 419 B.R. 807 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2009).

13.1.bbb Trustee for a creditors liquidating trust does not have a bankruptcy trustee's immunity. The debtor in possession asserted claims for breach of fiduciary duty against its former directors. The D&O insurance carrier refused coverage. The debtor confirmed a plan that assigned its claims against its former directors to a creditors trust. The trustee settled with the directors and took an assignment of and pursued their claims against the carrier, which the court dismissed. Applicable state law shifted attorney's fees to the losing party. A bankruptcy trustee is not generally liable personally for acts taken solely in its representative capacity. However, the trustee of a liquidating creditors trust is not a bankruptcy trustee for these purposes. The court characterizes the trustee as having been employed by the creditors committee under section 1103 and notes that this action took place outside of bankruptcy court, so the trustee here does not have a bankruptcy trustee's immunity. However, applicable nonbankruptcy law protects a trustee against personal liability if the trustee is not personally at fault for the obligation. Biltmore Assocs., LLC v. Twin City Fire Ins. Co., 572 F.3d 663 (9th Cir. 2009).

- 13.1.ccc Barton doctrine protects the trustee’s professionals and lenders. The chapter 7 trustee retained lawyers and an investigator to pursue assets that a debtor had hidden. He also borrowed funds from existing creditors to finance the investigation and pursuit. The debtor sued the trustee, the lawyers, the investigator and the creditor/lenders and their counsel in district court alleging violation of federal wiretapping laws, RICO, the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act and other laws. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), deprives a court of jurisdiction over an action against a court-appointed receiver unless the appointing court has granted leave to sue. Later case law has applied Barton to trustees in bankruptcy, to protect the administration of a bankruptcy estate, because the trustee is acting as an officer of the court in carrying out his official duties. Court-approved professionals for the trustee function as the equivalent of court-appointed officers by assisting the trustee in his official duties. Similarly, court-approved lenders who finance the trustee’s duties also function as the equivalent of court-appointed officers, as does their counsel. Therefore, Barton protects all the defendants in this action, and the district court must dismiss the action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Lawrence v. Goldberg, 573 F.3d 1265 (11th Cir. 2009).
- 13.1.ddd Barton doctrine applies to a litigation trustee, but only if the court has jurisdiction over the proposed action. The confirmed chapter 11 plan provided for the creation of a litigation trust, for the vesting in the trust of prepetition causes of action and for the bankruptcy court to retain jurisdiction over matters relating to the trust. After the trust expired, but while it was still in wind-down, a trust beneficiary sued the trustee in the bankruptcy court for breach of contract and breach of fiduciary duty in administering the trust. The Barton doctrine prohibits a party from suing a trustee appointed by a federal court without the court’s permission. The doctrine protects the court’s jurisdiction over the property that the trustee administers. Although the court did not appoint the liquidating trustee, the liquidating trustee is the functional equivalent of a bankruptcy trustee, because the liquidating trustee is administering the remaining assets of the bankruptcy estate. The bankruptcy court’s postconfirmation jurisdiction is more limited than its preconfirmation jurisdiction, extending only to matters that affect implementation or execution of the plan. The bankruptcy court has postconfirmation jurisdiction over a matter involving a liquidating trust where the cause of action arose prepetition or arises under title 11 but not where the cause of action has only an incidental effect on the reorganized debtor or the implementation of the plan. Here, the court did not have postconfirmation jurisdiction over the action. As a result, the Barton doctrine cannot bar the action against the trustee. In re WRT Energy Corp., 402 B.R. 717 (Bankr. W.D. La. 2007).
- 13.1.eee Court allows full “commission” to chapter 7 trustee. The chapter 7 trustee sought compensation calculated using section 326(a)’s percentages. Section 330(a)(7) provides, “In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to a trustee, the court shall treat such compensation as a commission, based on section 326.” The typical Johnson compensation factors used to determine reasonableness of compensation are stated only in section 330(a)(3), which applies by its terms only to a chapter 11 trustee and other professionals. Sections 330(a)(1) and (2), which permit the court to grant reasonable compensation in an amount less than requested, still apply to a chapter 7 trustee. Therefore, a chapter 7 trustee is entitled to compensation based on the commission structure, but the court may determine reasonableness, may award less than requested and may use the Johnson factors in determining a chapter 7 trustee’s compensation. In this case, the trustee performed well and should receive the full commission amount. In re Coyote Ranch Contractors, LLC, 400 B.R. 84 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2009).

- 13.1.fff “Cause” for trustee removal requires analysis of the totality of the circumstances. The chapter 7 trustee in a Ponzi scheme case had represented the former CFO, who resigned when he learned of the Ponzi scheme, and the CFO’s domestic partner in recovering the partner’s investment in the debtor. Both engagements preceded the petition date by at least two years. The trustee initially disclosed the latter representation but disclosed the former only in the context of litigation on behalf of the estate. The bankruptcy court properly removed the trustee under section 324 for cause. “Cause” is to be determined based on the totality of the circumstances. Lack of disinterestedness under the catch-all provision of section 101(14)(E), that is, based on “an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate ..., by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor ... or for any other reason,” is similarly to be determined based on the totality of circumstances. The trustee’s prior connection with the debtor’s former CFO and an investor, the lack of prompt disclosure, even though inadvertent, the general distrust that these facts engendered among some of the creditors and the appearance that the trustee might not act impartially as to the former CFO fully supported the bankruptcy court’s determination of adequate cause for removal. Dye v. Brown (In re AFI Holding, Inc.), 530 F.3d 832 (9th Cir. 2008), adopting lower court opinion at 355 B.R. 139 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).
- 13.1.ggg Barton* doctrine does not apply to sanctions against a trustee in a nonbankruptcy court action the trustee initiates. The trustee sued the corporate debtor’s principal and attorney in state court to recover a fraudulent transfer the debtor made. State law was clear that such a claim would not lie. State law provides for an award of attorney’s fees against a plaintiff that brings an action not supported by the facts or the law. The state court awarded fees against the trustee (in her official capacity) and her lawyer. The Barton doctrine prohibits an action against a trustee without leave of the appointing court. This action was by, not against, the trustee, and none of the rationales for the Barton doctrine apply. The sanctions award was against the estate, not the trustee personally, so allowing the award would not necessarily discourage trustee service or increase a trustee’s insurance costs. The trustee chose the forum, so allowing the sanctions would not encourage creditors to pick apart the estate by bringing actions in different courts or prevent uniform application of the bankruptcy laws. Therefore, the defendants may obtain the sanctions order from the state court without leave of the bankruptcy court. In re Ridley Owens, Inc., 391 B.R. 867 (Bankr. N.D. Fla. 2008).
- 13.1.hhh Court may consider time spent in determining a chapter 7 trustee’s compensation. The 2005 amendments added section 330(a)(7), which provides that in determining the trustee’s compensation, “the court shall treat such compensation as a commission, based on section 326.” In addition, it deleted chapter 7 trustees from the list of professionals subject to lodestar review under section 330(a)(3). Nevertheless, in determining compensation, the court may still consider the time a chapter 7 trustee reasonably spends. First, “commission” is ambiguous, and section 330(a)(3), which still applies to chapter 11 trustees, requires consideration of time a chapter 11 trustee spends, despite section 330(a)(7). Second, under section 330(a)(1), compensation must still be reasonable. Third, according some weight to time spent is not the same as a full lodestar analysis. Fourth, the 2005 amendments give the bankruptcy court greater discretion in awarding compensation to chapter 7 trustees, because they eliminated the lodestar standard and did not substitute another. Fifth, duties and work vary substantially from case to case, unrelated to the amount distributed to creditors. Sixth, the only other two reported cases and a leading treatise support requiring consideration of time spent. Finally, imposing timekeeping requirements will not create an undue burden. In re McKinney, 374 B.R. 726 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2007).
- 13.1.iii Court may remove a trustee on its own motion. Section 324 permits “[t]he court, after notice and a hearing, [to] remove a trustee ... for cause.” It does not require a motion by a party in interest or the U.S. Trustee. Therefore, after the court gave the trustee notice by order to show cause of the basis for removal and an opportunity to rebut the charges, the court could remove a trustee who gave false testimony in a chapter 13 case. Doing so did not cast the judge in the role of both prosecutor and adjudicator. The judge simply determined a basis existed for removal and gave the trustee the opportunity to prove otherwise. A dissent argues that by effectively shifting the burden of proof to the trustee, the court acted improperly and should instead have asked the U.S. Trustee to investigate, report, and recommend. In re Morgan, 375 B.R. 838 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

- 13.1.jjj “Cause” for trustee removal requires analysis of the totality of the circumstances. The chapter 7 trustee in a Ponzi scheme case had represented the former CFO, who resigned when he learned of the Ponzi scheme, and the CFO’s domestic partner in recovering the partner’s investment in the debtor. Both engagements preceded the petition date by at least two years. The trustee initially disclosed the latter representation but disclosed the former only in the context of litigation on behalf of the estate. The bankruptcy court properly removed the trustee under section 324 for cause. “Cause” is to be determined based on the totality of the circumstances. Lack of disinterestedness under the catch-all provision of section 101(14)(E), that is, based on “an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate . . . , by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor . . . or for any other reason,” is similarly to be determined based on the totality of circumstances. The trustee’s prior connection with the debtor’s former CFO and an investor, the lack of prompt disclosure, even though inadvertent, the general distrust that these facts engendered among some of the creditors, and the appearance that the trustee might not act impartially as to the former CFO fully supported the bankruptcy court’s determination of adequate cause for removal. Dye v. Brown (In re AFI Holding, Inc.), 355 B.R. 139 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).
- 13.1.kkk BAPCPA’s section 330(a)(7) does not entitle a chapter 7 trustee to a straight commission. Section 330(a)(1) authorizes the court to award “reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered.” Section 326(a) imposes a maximum on trustee compensation, calculated as a percentage of distributions. BAPCPA added section 330(a)(7), which provides, “In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to a trustee, the court shall treat such compensation as a commission, based on section 326.” The new provision does not supersede the reasonableness of “actual, necessary” requirements of section 330(a)(1). It adds only another consideration of what should go into the analysis of a reasonable fee. In this case, the trustee requested a fee based on the percentage schedule in section 326(a), without any other evidence of reasonableness or whether the services were actual or necessary. Allowance of the requested amount would have left a distribution on general unsecured claims of 38%, an aggregate distribution approximately equal to the fees requested. The court denies the request and requires the trustee to support the fee application with additional evidence. In re Clemens, 349 B.R. 725 (Bankr. D. Utah 2006).
- 13.1.iii Barton doctrine applies to trustee’s counsel. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), held that a plaintiff may not sue a federal court appointed receiver for acts done in the receiver’s official capacity and within the receiver’s authority as an officer of the court without leave of the appointing court. Later case law has extended the doctrine to suits against a trustee in bankruptcy. The doctrine applies equally to trustee’s counsel. Moreover, the court will presume that the defendant counsel’s actions were a part of the trustee’s official duties unless the plaintiff “initially alleges at the outset facts demonstrating otherwise.” This presumption protects the bankruptcy court’s exclusive jurisdiction over matters affecting the officers of the estate and prevents a plaintiff from using unsupported allegations to deprive the court of jurisdiction. Here, plaintiff sued trustee’s counsel for defamation for bringing a contempt action against her for actions she took in her former husband’s bankruptcy. Her complaint alleged only that counsel was unjustified on the facts from making defamatory allegations in the contempt action, not that he was acting outside his official duties. Thus, the state court did not have jurisdiction over plaintiff’s suit against trustee’s counsel, and the bankruptcy court was not required to abstain from hearing the action. Lowenbraun v. Canary (In re Lowenbraun), 453 F.3d 314 (6th Cir. 2006).

13.1.mmm Creditor who received substantial preference is not qualified to vote for a trustee.

After the chapter 11 case was converted to a chapter 7 case, members of the chapter 11 committee attempted to elect a chapter 7 trustee. Before the creditors meeting, the chapter 7 interim trustee had investigated the claim of the largest creditor and concluded that the creditor had received a substantial preference, estimated at about 20% of the total amount of unsecured claims. A creditor is eligible to vote for a chapter 7 trustee if the creditor holds an allowable claim, is not an insider, and does not hold or represent an interest materially adverse to the estate. Because the creditor had received a preference, it held an interest adverse to the estate. Its interest would be in electing a trustee who was less likely to pursue the preference vigorously. Moreover, the size of the preference relative to the size of the case was material. Therefore, the creditor is not eligible to vote. Because the court resolves the issue on that ground, it does not reach the question of whether the receipt of the preference and section 502(d) render the creditor's claim not allowable. In re Amherst Techs., LLC, 335 B.R. 502 (Bankr. D.N.H. 2006).

13.1.nnn Barton doctrine, which requires leave of appointing court to sue a trustee, applies to a chapter 11 plan liquidating trustee.

A chapter 11 plan provided for a liquidating trustee, who brought an action against the debtor's former parent entity for a fraudulent transfer in the bankruptcy court in California. The former parent sued the liquidating trustee in Delaware, alleging a violation of a venue selection clause in a Settlement Agreement that the debtor and the parent had entered into before bankruptcy. The trustee asked the bankruptcy court to enjoin the Delaware action. The action violated Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), which requires leave of the appointing court before suing an equity receiver or, by subsequent case law extension, a bankruptcy trustee. Barton applies equally to a liquidating trustee appointed under a chapter 11 plan, and 28 U.S.C. § 959(a), which permits suits without leave of court against an operating trustee, does not repeal Barton, because it applies only to claims arising out of the active operation of a business. Beck v. Fort James Corp. (In re Crown Vantage, Inc.), 421 F.3d 963 (9th Cir. 2005).

13.1.ooo Suit against trustee requires leave of court.

After the chapter 11 plan had been confirmed and the case was closed, the debtor's principal sued the trustee for misfeasance, malfeasance, and breach of fiduciary duty. Under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), leave of the bankruptcy court is required to bring an action against a trustee. Section 959(a) of title 28 permits an action against a trustee without leave of court if the action arises out the trustee's operation of the business of the estate. That exception to Barton does not, however, apply to the claims brought here, which went to the trustee's conduct towards the estate, rather than the operation of the business. Muratore v. Darr, 375 F.3d 140 (1st Cir. 2004).

13.1.ppp Appointment of interim trustee does not toll the avoiding power statute of limitation.

After conversion of a case from chapter 11 to chapter 7, an interim trustee was appointed within two years after the date of the filing of the chapter 11 petition. Creditors requested an election, which was held more than two years after the date of the filing of the petition. Under the express language of section 546(a), the avoiding power statute of limitation expires "the later of two years after the entry of the order for relief; or one year after the appointment or election of the first trustee under section 702 . . ." Because the interim trustee was appointed under section 701 and the permanent trustee was elected under section 702 more than two years after the order for relief, the statute of limitations expired before the election of the permanent trustee. Singer v. Franklin Box Board Co. (In re American Pad and Paper Co.), 303 B.R. 27 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003).

13.1.qqq Avoiding power statute of limitations is extended by the appointment of an interim trustee.

Section 546(a) imposes a statute of limitations on the commencement of an avoiding power action of two years after the order for relief or "one year after the appointment or election of the first trustee under section 702, 1104, 1163, 1202, or 1302." In this case, an interim trustee was appointed under section 701 within two years after the order for relief. A permanent trustee was never appointed or elected under section 702, so the interim trustee served as the permanent trustee under section 702(d). Under these circumstances, the appointment of the interim trustee applied to extend the statute of limitations for one year. Burtch v. Georgia-Pacific Corp. (In re Allied Digital Technologies), 300 B.R. 616 (Bankr. D. Del.).

- 13.1.rrr Trustee entitled to interest on fees in a surplus case. Section 725(a)(5) provides for payment of interest at the legal rate from the date of the filing of the petition on any claims paid under section 726(a)(1), in a case in which all claims have been paid in full. Because the trustee's fees are paid under section 726(a)(1), which incorporates by reference the priorities set forth in section 507, including administrative expenses, the court rules that the trustee is entitled to interest on his fees at the legal rate from the date of the filing of the petition. In re Hembree, 297 B.R. 515 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 2002).
- 13.1.sss Court may not appoint examiner with expanded powers or a limited purpose trustee. The debtor in possession refused to bring a fraudulent transfer action. The committee moved for the appointment of an examiner with expanded powers to bring the action. The court denies the motion on the ground that an examiner may perform only trustee's duties "that the court orders the debtor in possession not to perform," and the debtor's refusal to bring the action is an exercise of its statutory prerogative, not a duty that the court orders the debtor in possession not to perform. The court also denies the motion to appoint a limited purpose trustee on the ground that by its nature, the Code makes the trustee the representative of the estate, and a trustee cannot share its powers or duties with the debtor in possession. Official Committee of Asbestos Personal Injury Claimants v. Sealed Air Corp. (In re W.R. Grace & Co.), 285 B.R. 148 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).
- 13.1.ttt Liquidating trustee controls attorney-client privilege. The chapter 11 plan established a liquidating trust to which all assets of the debtors and the estates were transferred. As a result, the liquidating trustee became the holder of the debtor's attorney-client privilege. In this case, where the liquidating trustee did not assert privilege in a reasonable period of time in a discovery dispute between third parties and the debtor's former law firm, the privilege was deemed waived. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Fleet Retail Finance Group (In re Hechinger Investment Co. of Delaware), 285 B.R. 601 (D. Del. 2002).
- 13.1.uuu Chapter 13 trustee receives absolute quasi-judicial immunity. The chapter 13 trustee failed to give notice of the confirmation hearing to the debtor, the debtor failed to appear at the hearing, and the court therefore dismissed the chapter 13 case, allowing the mortgagee to foreclose on the debtor's home. In response to the debtor's action against the trustee, the Ninth Circuit rules that the trustee has absolute quasi-judicial immunity, because the scheduling of a confirmation hearing is a function that is judicial in nature, related to a court's inherent power to control its docket. Because the act of giving notice of the hearing cannot be separated from the act of scheduling it ("a hearing without notice is not a hearing"), the Ninth Circuit gives the chapter 13 trustee absolute immunity from a lawsuit for failing to give notice of the hearing. Curry v. Castillo (In re Castillo), 297 F.3d 940 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 13.1.vvv Court limits trustee's fee. The bankruptcy court awarded the trustee a fee based on the maximum percentages contained in section 326(a). The court of appeals reverses on the grounds that the maximums do not constitute a commission but rather are limits on what constitutes a reasonable fee. The Tenth Circuit instead applies the Lodestar approach. Connolly v. Harris Trust Co. of California (In re Miniscribe Corp.), 309 F.3d 1234 (10th Cir. 2002).
- 13.1.www Trustee not bound by settlement agreement until court approval. The trustee had entered into a settlement agreement with various parties in interest in the case. Before the court approved the agreement, the trustee entered into a broader settlement agreement that would have resolved most issues in the case but that was inconsistent with the first settlement agreement. The trustee sought approval of the second agreement and withdrawal from the first. The court permitted the withdrawal, because the first settlement agreement was not binding until the court had approved it. Circumstances had changed since the trustee entered into the first settlement agreement so as to make approval of that agreement not in the best interest of the estate, even though the changed circumstances were principally the result of the trustee entering into the second settlement agreement. United States ex rel. Rahman v. Oncology Assocs., P.C. (In re Equimed, Inc.), 269 B.R. 139 (D. Md. 2001).

- 13.1.xxx Section 341 meeting is concluded unless the trustee announces an adjourned date. Bankruptcy Rule 2003(e) permits adjournment of a 341 meeting but requires the trustee to announce the adjourned date and time. In this case, the trustee adjourned the meeting “until further notice,” so the meeting was concluded, starting the time running for objections to a claim of exemptions. What is more, conversion of the case from chapter 11 to chapter 7 does not restart the time for filing an objection to a claim of exemptions. Once the property has been exempted in the chapter 11 case, it reverts in the debtor and is not property of the estate when the case is converted to chapter 7. Thus, it cannot again be exempted, and the creditors may no longer object to the claim of exemption. Smith v. Kennedy (In re Smith), 235 F.3d 472 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 13.1.yyy Fourth Amendment applies to trustee’s search of debtor’s home. The trustee had substantial evidence from the 341 meeting and other sources that the debtor was concealing assets. The trustee obtained an ex parte order from the bankruptcy court to search the debtor’s home. On the debtor’s motion to suppress the evidence that the trustee found, the bankruptcy court rules that the Fourth Amendment applies to a chapter 7 trustee because of the trustee’s sufficiently close relationship with the government. Taunt v. Barman (In re Barman), 252 B.R. 403 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2000).
- 13.1.zzz Fifth Circuit holds bankruptcy trustee liable only for gross negligence. Recognizing the split in the circuits holding bankruptcy trustees liable either for ordinary negligence (9th Cir.) or only for willful and deliberate violation of fiduciary duties (6th, 7th, and 10th Cir.), the Fifth Circuit takes a middle course and rules, in a case of first impression, that a bankruptcy trustee is liable to the estate only for gross negligence. Dodson v. Huff (In re Smyth), 207 F.3d 758 (5th Cir. 2000).
- 13.1.aaaa Secured creditor’s credit bid amount is not included in calculating maximum trustee compensation. In determining the maximum compensation allowable to a trustee under section 326(a), the court may not include as “monies disbursed or turned over to parties in interest” the amount of a secured creditor’s credit bid. In addition, although the factors set forth in section 330(a) are not exclusive, the court may not consider factors that do not concern the value of the services rendered, such as the delay by the United States Trustee in bringing an objection or the hardship on the trustee from a potential disgorgement order. Staiano v. Cain (In re Lan Assocs. XI, L.P.), 192 F.3d 109 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 13.1.bbbb Trustee may have judicial immunity. A bankruptcy trustee can be held personally liable (surcharged) for negligence in the performance of his official duties. However, if his action was approved by the court, the trustee has derived judicial immunity, as long as there has been complete disclosure to creditors and the court. LeBlanc v. Salem (In re Mailman Steam Carpet Cleaning Corp.) 196 F.3d (1st Cir. 1999).
- 13.1.cccc Court awards trustee hourly rate rather than percentage compensation. The court rules that section 330 requires that a trustee receive “reasonable compensation,” rather than a commission equal to the maximum compensation permitted under section 326. The court then determines that the chapter 11 trustee's services were competent and merited compensation at the trustee's normal hourly rate as a lawyer ($400 per hour). In an opinion highly critical of the trustee's request for a commission of approximately $4.4 million but uncritical of the trustee's performance, the court awards $352,000 as reasonable compensation. The opinion concludes with a table showing billing rates for 16 law firms with fee applications submitted to the Delaware district court in 1998. In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 234 B.R. 21 (D. Del. 1999).

- 13.1.dddd An attorney may collect fees from a debtor postpetition. The debtor agreed to pay her attorney in installments both before and after her chapter 7 petition. She gave the attorney post-dated checks for the postpetition payments. In a ruling of first impression, the Ninth Circuit holds that the cashing of the post dated checks does not violate the automatic stay, because, in this case, the checks were actually for postpetition services, rather than for the prepetition services of preparing for and filing the petition. The Ninth Circuit recognizes the absence of any statutory guidance on this issue and creates its own rule, based on its conclusions that a contingent claim does not include the right to payment that arises only upon the performance of future services. Gordon v. Hines (In re Hines), 147 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 1998).
- 13.1.eeee Debtor/creditor acrimony may be cause for the appointment of the trustee. Although the court did not adopt a per se rule, the Third Circuit affirms the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee "for cause" under section 1104(a)(1), based on "deep seated conflict and animosity" between the debtor and its creditors. The court also affirms under section 1104(a)(2), ruling that the acrimony gives grounds for the appointment of a trustee as "in the best interest of the creditors, the debtor, and the estate." In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463 (3d Cir. 1998).
- 13.1.ffff Post-bankruptcy suit against trustee requires leave of court. After the bankruptcy case was closed, the debtor sued the trustee for malicious prosecution of a fraudulent transfer adversary proceeding that the trustee brought but dropped during the bankruptcy case. The post-bankruptcy state court action required approval of the bankruptcy court in advance, just as an action against the trustee during bankruptcy would have required. In re Linton, 136 F.3d 544 (7th Cir. 1998).
- 13.1.gggg Common election of trustee for five subsidiaries is approved. In a case of apparent first impression, the bankruptcy court holds under Bankruptcy Rule 2009(a) that all of the creditors of a group of subsidiaries, as a whole, may elect a single trustee for the subsidiaries. However, a creditor of one subsidiary may not solicit proxies from creditors of the other subsidiaries. In re Ben Franklin Retail Stores, 214 B.R. 852 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1997).
- 13.1.hhhh Trustee may not withhold payments to creditor from unrelated cases. The secured creditor was overpaid by insurance proceeds on destroyed collateral. Rather than seeking a recovery from the secured creditor, the chapter 13 withheld payments to the creditor that he was making from other, unrelated chapter 13 cases. Such an action is improper and violates the trustee's duties. Ford Motor Credit Company v. Stevens (In re Stevens), 130 F.3d 1027 (11th Cir. 1997).
- 13.2 Attorneys
- 13.2.a Attorney-client relationship does not transfer from debtor to liquidating trust. Creditors proposed and confirmed a plan that provided for the creation of a liquidating trust, transfer of all the debtor's assets (including the debtor's attorney-client privilege) to the trust, and the liquidation of the debtor. The liquidating trustee objected to a tax claim. The debtor's former attorney appeared for the tax creditor, and the trustee moved to disqualify him. An attorney who has formerly represented a client in a matter may not, without consent, later represent another client in the same or a substantially related matter in which the later client's interest are materially adverse to the former client’s interests. The transfer of the debtor’s assets to the liquidating trust under a creditor plan does not create an attorney-client relationship between debtor’s counsel and the trust, despite the transfer of the attorney-client privilege to the trust, because the trustee does not substitute for the debtor’s management. Instead, the trustee oversees the liquidation, free from the debtor’s corporate structure, so the attorney-client relationship does not transfer. However, the attorney may not disclose to the new client confidential information that was obtained in the prior representation. In re Las Uvas Valley Dairies, ___ B.R. ___, 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 3407 (Bankr. D.N.M. Dec. 2, 2022).

- 13.2.b Court may reduce fees based on results obtained. Trustee’s counsel investigated and drafted a complaint to pursue a claim that could have recovered $1.6 million for the estate. After presenting the draft complaint to the defendant, the trustee was able to settle for only $38,000. Counsel applied for fees of $37,000. The bankruptcy court awarded only 50%. Section 330(a)(3) permits, but does not require, a bankruptcy court to award fees based on the nature, the extent, and the value of the services, taking into account all relevant factors. Section 330(a)(4) prohibits the court from allowing fees for, among other things, services that were not reasonably likely to benefit the estate. By listing “all relevant factors” in a non-exclusive list, section 330(a)(3) does not prohibit the court from considering the results obtained. Section 330(a)(4)’s provision requiring a court to consider whether services were likely beneficial at the time rendered, without hindsight, does not suggest otherwise. It permits but does not require a court to award fees for services that were likely to benefit the estate, even if the services did not do so, and bars the court from disallowing fees in every case where the services were unsuccessful. In this case, because the fees almost equaled the recovery, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in considering the results obtained and reducing the fee award to 50% of the amount requested. In re Village Apothecary, Inc., 45 F.4th 940 (6th Cir. 2022).
- 13.2.c Approval of employment of named attorney includes the attorney’s law firm. The trustee employed an individual as special counsel and obtained court approval of employment of just the individual lawyer. While employed by the trustee, the lawyer changed law firms twice, submitted fee applications that included time spent by other lawyers at his firms, and did not file disclosures under Rule 2014(a) for any of the three law firms. Section 327(a) permits the trustee to employ a professional who is disinterested and does not have an interest adverse to the estate. Rule 2014(a) requires a professional to disclose all connections with parties in interest to assist the court and creditors in evaluating whether the professional qualifies under section 327(a). Rule 2014(b) permits partners or associates of a named attorney whose employment the court has approved to be employed without further court order. Therefore, the use of attorneys at the lawyer’s first firm was permissible, although not a best practice. A literal reading of that Rule also permits use of the later firms as well. However, Rule 2014(a) disclosures are still required for the new firms. In re Final Analysis, Inc. 640 B.R. 633 (Bankr. D. Md. 2022).
- 13.2.d Model Rule compliance protects against disqualification. A liquidating trust under a plan sued the debtor’s shareholder. A lawyer at a big firm successfully pitched to represent the shareholder and spent a fair amount of time on the matter. In the middle of the litigation, the lawyer joined the plaintiff’s law firm, where her fiancé (and later, husband) practiced, which immediately screened her from the new firm’s work on the matter, obtained her agreement to comply with the screen, advised the shareholder in writing of the screen, and offered the shareholder periodic updates on compliance with the screen. The shareholder moved to disqualify the new firm in the litigation. Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.10(a) prohibits a firm from representing a client when any lawyer at the firm would be prohibited, unless the disqualified lawyer is timely screened and written notice of the screen and certification of compliance is given promptly to the former client. The bankruptcy court’s local rules incorporated the Model Rules. Compliance with the Model Rules, which do not include any “exceptional circumstances” additional requirements, is adequate. Therefore, the court denies the shareholder’s disqualification motion. The Maxus Liq. Trust v. YPF S.A. (In re Maxus Energy Corp.), 49 F.4th 223 (3d Cir. 2022).

- 13.2.e Section 327 protects the estate from conflicts but does not otherwise incorporate the rules of professional conduct. Before bankruptcy, the debtor’s general reorganization attorney represented the debtor’s insurer on reinsurance matters related to the debtor’s chapter 11 case. It ceased the representation around the petition date. The debtor had already retained separate insurance counsel to pursue its claims against the insurer, and the reorganization counsel had no involvement in those claims. Section 327(a) permits the debtor in possession to retain counsel who is disinterested and does not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate. The focus is on protection of the estate, and the requirement does not incorporate the applicable rules of professional conduct except insofar as they implicate the interest of the estate. Here, counsel’s prior representation of the insurer on matters related solely to reinsurance, and not to matters pending in the case, was not the representation of an interest adverse to the estate and therefore did not require denial of the application to approve the employment. In re Boy Scouts of America, 35 F.4th 149 (3d Cir. 2022).
- 13.2.f Court may not award attorney compensation for performing trustee duties. The trustee employed counsel to assist in administering the estate. The trustee ultimately paid all claims and returned a surplus to the debtor. The attorney’s services included some tasks that might have been part of the trustee’s duties, such as reviewing the debtor’s records, liquidating property of the estate, and investigation the debtor’s financial affairs. Section 330(a) permits the court to authorize fees for actual, necessary services rendered by an attorney for the trustee. Section 704 specifies the trustee’s duties. It is not “necessary” (or proper) for an attorney to perform any of the trustee’s duties, since the trustee must perform them. Section 326 fixes the trustee’s compensation as a commission. The trustee may not evade section 326’s limits by delegating some of the duties to an attorney, who would be compensated separately. Finally, section 327 permits the trustee to serve as attorney or accountant for the estate, and section 328 limits the compensation for doing so to compensation for services generally performed by the trustee without the assistance of a professional. Taken together, these provisions require the court to scrutinize an attorney’s services to ensure the attorney is not compensated for trustee services. The existence of a surplus estate does not lessen the court’s duty. Sylvester v. Chaffee McCall, L.L.P. (In re Sylvester), 23 F.4th 543 (5th Cir. 2022).
- 13.2.g Court may approve attorney employment retroactively to petition date. The debtor in possession filed an “ordinary course professionals” motion two days after the petition date, seeking to employ attorneys in the ordinary course, with approval nunc pro tunc to the petition date. The court granted the motion. Three months later, the debtor in possession filed a motion to employ one of the ordinary-course attorneys under section 327(e), nunc pro tunc to the petition date. In Roman Catholic Archdiocese of San Juan v. Acevedo Feliciano, 140 S. Ct. 696 (2020), the Supreme Court prohibited the use of nunc pro tunc orders except to reflect on the docket what had actually occurred. However, that case involved the lower court’s jurisdiction, which could not be created retroactively. Properly read, the decision does not prohibit a court of equity “to deem an action to have been taken as of a time when it should have been taken, but was not due to circumstances not attributable to the laches of the parties.” This principle permits a bankruptcy court, under appropriate circumstances, which are present here, to approve employment of professionals retroactive to the petition date. City of Rockford v. Mallinckrodt PLC, 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54786 (D. Del. Mar. 28, 2022).
- 13.2.h Court may authorize postpetition retainer for counsel. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sought to substitute new counsel. The application provided for counsel to receive a retainer from the estate, to be held in counsel’s trust account until the court allowed fees that could be collected from the retainer. Section 327 authorizes the debtor in possession to employ counsel, and section 328(a) authorizes the employment “on any reasonable basis, including a retainer.” Therefore, the Code authorizes the application, which the court grants. In re Golden Fleece Beverages, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 3319 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. Nov. 24, 2021).

- 13.2.i Court cautions attorney on plagiarism. Debtor's counsel in a subchapter V case included with the schedules and statement of affairs a 10-page disclaimer, which counsel copied from various mega-case filings. The disclaimer denied any obligation to update the documents or to notify creditors of any changes, contrary to the requirements of the Bankruptcy Rules. The court takes counsel to task for such a broad disclaimer. The court goes further, challenging the ethics of an attorney who copies work written by another attorney in another case. Ultimately, the court acknowledges that attorneys (and judges too) often copy from prior documents, but admonishes attorneys to "copy smart," that is, to make sure the facts match up and the law is correct and hasn't changed since the original text was written. In re Summit Fin., Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 3077 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Nov. 5, 2021).
- 13.2.j Court approves employment retroactively to date before the employment application was filed. The trustee employed an accountant effective January 28, 9 days after the petition date, but did not file the application to approve the employment until February 17. Roman Catholic Archdiocese v. Acevedo Feliciano, 140 S. Ct. 696 (2020), prohibits a federal court from issuing a nunc pro tunc order except to correct the record to reflect what actually happened. Section 327 requires court approval of the employment of a professional, but it does not have a temporal limitation, as other sections, which require approval "after notice and a hearing," do. Applying Acevedo to an employment application would add a timing requirement that Congress did not impose. Moreover, Rule 9013 imposes a delay on approval because it requires a written application and a hearing. If Acevedo did not permit approval after a professional started work, the trustee would be severely hampered in carrying out duties. Moreover, this case differs from those where the employment application was delayed for months or years, often until the time of the final fee application. Since section 327 permits employment approval after actual employment, the court approves the employment effective as of January 28. In re Hunanyan, 631 B.R. 904 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2021).
- 13.2.k An adequate ethical screen defeats a disqualification motion. A partner at the defendant's law firm, who billed 300 hours to an adversary proceeding over three years, left the firm to join the firm representing the plaintiff. Her new firm immediately implemented an ethical screen that prohibited her from sharing any information she learned in the representation, from accessing any information in the new firm's files about the litigation, from discussing the matter with anyone at her new firm, and from sharing in any part of the fee from the litigation. Model Rule 1.10(a)(2) permits a screen to protect an attorney's duty of confidentiality to prevent disqualification, which should be granted only in exceptional circumstances. Here, there was no indication that the attorney or her new firm would not abide fully with the screen. Her limited involvement in this major litigation indicated that she was not a critical part of the trial team that would make this an exceptional case. Therefore, the court denies the defendant's disqualification motion. Maxus Liquidating Trust v. YPF S.A. (In re Maxus Energy Corp.), 626 B.R. 249 (Bankr. D. Del. 2021).
- 13.2.l Bankruptcy costs in a mass torts case are not defense costs recoverable from the debtor's general liability insurers. The debtor had been sued for numerous torts, for which it claimed insurance coverage. When the suits became too numerous, the debtor filed chapter 11 to stem, manage, and resolve the litigation. The debtor sued its insurers for costs related to its bankruptcy, claiming they are covered defense costs under the insurance policies. Under applicable state law, the insurer's duty to defend is purely contractual. The policies required the insurers to pay costs of defense of any suit against the debtor the insurers defend but denied reimbursement to the debtor for any costs the debtor incurred without the insurers' consent. In light of the policy limitations, the debtor's reason for filing bankruptcy to resolve the suits against it is not relevant to the insurers' liability for bankruptcy costs. The bankruptcy bars debt collection, but does not eliminate liability and therefore is not a civil suit against the insured. Objections to claims do not arise in a "suit" covered by the policies. Finally, the chapter 11 case is not a defense strategy that the debtor may control in responses to the insurers' reservation of rights to defend. Therefore, the bankruptcy costs are not covered defense costs under the policies and may not be recovered from the insurers. USA Gymnastics v. Ace Am. Ins. Co. (In re USA Gymnastics), 624 B.R. 443 (S.D. Ind. 2021).

- 13.2.m Court disallows oversecured creditors' fees as unreasonable. The chapter 12 debtor's secured creditor was substantially oversecured. The debtor proposed four different plans during the case. The creditor's counsel spent substantial time preparing for the confirmation hearing for each plan, even though the issues were largely the same for each one. Fees totaled about $220,000, while debtor's counsel's fees totaled only $160,000, at higher hourly rates. Section 506(b) allows an oversecured creditor to recover reasonable attorneys' fees provided in the credit agreement; it does not provide unfettered license to bill. Counsel's duplicative efforts and overall fees were not reasonable, especially in light of debtor's counsel's fees by comparison. The court disallows fees to that extent. In re Kurtenbach, ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 3336 (N. D. Iowa Nov. 30, 2020).
- 13.2.n Sanction for nondisclosure of fees under section 329 should ordinarily be complete denial of fees. An attorney for a chapter 7 debtor also represented its affiliates. He prevailed in litigation for the debtor and the affiliates and received a significant contingent fee from the litigation. He did not disclose the fee agreement or the fee at the outset of the case nor when he received the fee. He disclosed them only after the court ordered disclosure following a hearing on approval of a related settlement, in which the litigation results and fees came up. Section 329(a) and Bankruptcy Rule 2016 require an attorney representing a debtor to disclose any compensation or agreement for compensation in or in connection with the case, including any fee sharing agreement. The attorney's disclosure duty is that of a fiduciary, and violations are intolerable, warranting harsh sanctions going beyond compensation for the damage done. Accordingly, absent specific, sound mitigating factors, the sanctions should be total denial of fees. The appellate court remands for the bankruptcy court to determine whether any such factors apply. SE Prop. Holdings, LLC v. Stewart (In re Stewart), 970 F.3d 1255 (10th Cir. 2020).
- 13.2.o Prohibition on nunc pro tunc orders does not prevent retroactive approval of employment. The debtor forgot to schedule a mass tort claim in her filing. Several years after the closing of her no-asset case, the tort claim settled. The court reopened the case and reappointed the trustee, who later sought approval to employ the debtor's tort counsel and pay its contingent fee. Under Roman Catholic Archdiocese v. Acevedo Feliciano, 140 S. Ct. 22 696 (2020), the court may not issue a nunc pro tunc order except to correct the record to reflect a fact that existed at the prior date. However, Acevedo does not prohibit retroactive relief in appropriate circumstances. It limits the court's authority to issue orders that purport to rewrite history, not a discretionary grant of retroactive relief for something that does not by its terms require prior approval. The circumstances of this case warrant such relief, including approval of the employment and approval of the contingent fee for work performed since the beginning of the debtor's bankruptcy case. In re Miller, ___ B.R. ___, 2020 Bankr. LEXIS 2856 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. Oct. 13, 2020).
- 13.2.p Court denies nunc pro tunc employment approval but authorizes payment for pre-approval services. Eleven months after counsel started work, the trustee filed an application for approval of the employment of counsel nunc pro tunc to the time counsel started work. Section 327 authorizes the trustee to employ counsel with the court's approval. Section 330(a) authorizes compensation from the estate to counsel whose employment the court approved under section 327. Section 330 does not limit compensation to work performed after the court's approval of employment, although counsel takes a risk that a delayed application and approval might shed light on whether the services rendered before employment were beneficial to the estate and compensable. In Roman Catholic Archdiocese of San Juan, Puerto Rico v. Acevedo Feliciano, 140 S. Ct. 696 (2020), the Supreme Court held that nunc pro tunc orders are permissible only "to reflect the reality of what has already occurred," not to make orders retroactive. Therefore, the court denies the request for nunc pro tunc application of the order, but recognizes the late application and order do not of themselves prevent compensation for services rendered before the approval. In this case, however, the application did not provide sufficient explanation of the reason for the delayed application, so the court denies it without prejudice. In re Benitez, ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. Mar. 13, 2020).

- 13.2.q Court denies use of estate assets to pay for debtor’s criminal defense counsel. After bankruptcy, the individual debtor was indicted for prepetition tax fraud. As debtor in possession, he sought court approval of the employment of criminal defense counsel at the expense of the estate. Section 327(a) authorizes employment of counsel at the expense of the estate but only if counsel’s employment benefits the estate. Protection of the debtor against a criminal indictment does not benefit the estate. The debtor’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel does not supersede section 327(a)’s requirements. Denial of using estate assets to pay counsel does not deprive the debtor of counsel in the criminal case, since the debtor can still use nonestate assets or a public defender in his criminal case. In re Kearney, 609 B.R. 383 (Bankr. D.N.M. 2019).
- 13.2.r Court denies disgorgement of attorneys’ fees in administratively insolvent case. Based on an agreement between the chapter 11 trustee and debtor in possession’s counsel, the court awarded final compensation in an amount substantially less than the total fees requested, allowing counsel to keep fees paid before the trustee was appointed. When it became apparent that the estate was administratively insolvent, the trustee moved to distribute funds on hand and dismiss the case. In connection with the motion, the trustee and the United States, which was owed substantial unpaid withholding taxes, moved for an order requiring counsel to disgorge about half the fees already paid. Czyzewski v. Jevic Holding Corp., 137 S. Ct. 973 (2017), prohibits a structured dismissal that does not respect priorities. But it does not address disgorgement or pro rata distributions within a creditor class and therefore does not require disgorgement. Section 330(a)(5) expressly provides for disgorgement where interim compensation already paid exceeds final compensation ultimately allowed. Otherwise, the bankruptcy court has discretion whether to order disgorgement, taking into account all relevant circumstances. Here, the bankruptcy court properly exercised its discretion not to order disgorgement, based on the value of services rendered. U.S. v. Seiller Waterman LLC (In re St. Catherine Corp. of Ind., LLC), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 165112 (S.D. Ind. Sept. 26, 2018).
- 13.2.s Counsel does not violate a lender’s unperfected security interest in cash by receiving a prepetition retainer from a debtor. The debtor paid counsel a prepetition security-type retainer after it had defaulted on its bank loan agreement and before filing its chapter 11 petition. Counsel knew of the default when the debtor paid the retainer. The bank claimed a security interest in the deposit account from which the debtor paid the retainer, but the security interest was not at the lender bank and was unperfected by a control agreement. In the chapter 11 case, the bank sought to require counsel to turn over the retainer to the estate so that it would be subject to the bank’s security interest and available for payment of the bank’s claim. Because the bank’s security interest was unperfected, it could be avoided in the case. As a result, counsel was not liable for collusion with the debtor to violate the bank’s right, for unjust enrichment, for conversion, or for tortious interference. The court also strongly suggests that even if the bank’s security interest were perfected, counsel would not have been liable to return the retainer, because such a ruling would effectively prevent debtors from retaining counsel to file chapter 11 cases. Armstrong Bank v. Shraiberg, Landau & Page, P.A. (In re Tuscany Energy, LLC), 581 B.R. 681 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2018).
- 13.2.t Baker Botts does not prohibit fee allowance for supplementing a fee application. The chapter 7 trustee’s counsel filed a fee application. The U.S. Trustee objected, requesting that the fee application be supplemented with a more detailed description of the work counsel performed. Counsel prepared the supplement and sought fees for the time spent doing so. The U.S. trustee objected to the fees incurred for preparing the supplement. Baker Botts LLP v. ASARCO, 135 S. Ct. 2158 (2015), held that a court may not allow fees under section 330 for litigating an objection to a fee application, because the time spent does not provide any service to the estate. Here, the extra time counsel spent to prepare the supplement provided the same service to the estate that the time spent on preparing an initial fee application provided—it described the services rendered so that the court could determine the fees' reasonableness. Even though the extra fees were incurred after an objection, the time was not spent on litigating the objection but only on providing the additional information. Therefore, Baker Botts does not prohibit allowing fees for the time spent. In re Stanton, 569 B.R. 840 (Bankr. N.D. Fla. 2017).

- 13.2.u Court approves engagement agreement with fee defense fees provision. The debtor in possession's law firm sought approval of its employment at the expense of the estate. Its engagement letter provided for the debtor in possession to pay fees that counsel incurred in successfully defending any objection to its fee application. The American Rule requires that each party to litigation pay its own attorneys' fees, unless a statute or contract provides otherwise. Baker Botts LLP v. ASARCO LLC, 135 S. Ct. 2158 (2015), held that the American Rule prohibited the bankruptcy court from approving fees under section 330(a) for the debtor's counsel's successful defense of an objection to its fee application, because section 330(a) limits fee allowance to a reasonable fee for services to the estate. Fee litigation defense does not provide a service to the estate. However, section 330(a) is subject to section 328(a), which permits the court to approve employment on any reasonable terms and conditions. ASARCO did not hold that a fee litigation defense provision was per se unreasonable. In fact, such a provision may be reasonable, even though it does not provide a service to the estate, just as other engagement provisions for counsel's benefit are reasonable, such as the client's agreement to pay promptly, to replenish a retainer, to pay returned check fees or interest on late payments, to permit counsel to withdraw if fees are not paid, and granting a lien on recoveries. The court approves the provision in the engagement letter, subject to two conditions. First, fee recovery applies only when the fee defense litigation is successful. Second, the debtor in possession must also agree to a similar provision in committee counsel's engagement, to level the playing field. In re Hungry Horse, LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2017 Bankr. LEXIS 3183 (Bankr. D.N.M. Sept. 20, 2017).
- 13.2.v Section 502(b)(4) reasonableness standard for disallowing a prepetition attorney's fee does not differ from state law. The debtor's attorney successfully prosecuted a contingent fee matter, earning a fee of $2.5 million. The debtor disputed the fee. The attorney sought arbitration. The arbitrator awarded the fee, finding it reasonable under applicable state law. The attorney confirmed the award in a state court judgment. Before paying, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. Section 502(b)(4) provides for disallowance of a claim for services of an attorney of the debtor to the extent the claim exceeds the reasonable value of the services. The proper analysis of a section 502(b)(4) objection to claim requires the court to determine whether the attorney's fee contract was breached, the state law damages assessment, the reasonableness of the damages under section 502(b)(4), and reduction by the extent, if any, the damages are excessive. Reasonableness under section 502(b)(4) does not contemplate a different analysis than under state law. Where a state court finds a fee reasonable, the bankruptcy court should not impose a different reasonableness standard to review the fee. Because the arbitrator found the fee reasonable and the state court confirmed the award, the fee should be allowed. Spiller McProud v. Siller (In re CWS Enterps., Inc.), 870 F.3d 1106 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 13.2.w Attorney directed by state court to prepare show cause order against debtor's counsel is not entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity for acts to collect the debt. The debtor obtained a personal injury settlement, which his attorney placed in his client trust account. The attorney withdrew his own fees but held the balance for distribution to lien claimants to the funds. One of the lien claimants filed an interpleader action in state court but did not name the debtor or his attorney in the action. The debtor soon filed a chapter 7 case. The state court judge initially determined that a state law precedent required the debtor's attorney to deposit the funds in the state court and at a second hearing asked which attorney would prepare an order to show cause to bring the debtor's attorney before the state court to explain why the funds had not been deposited into the state court, rather than with the bankruptcy trustee. The interpleader plaintiff's attorney volunteered, and the state court ordered him to do so. The plaintiff's attorney prepared a draft and sent it to the debtor's attorney. In a later telephone call, the plaintiff's attorney told the debtor's attorney he would attempt to have the debtor's attorney held in contempt of the state court if the funds were not deposited with the state court. After another state court hearing, at which the debtor's attorney did not appear, the plaintiff's attorney sent the debtor's attorney a letter with a draft order to show cause. The debtor's attorney then brought an action to hold the plaintiff's attorney in contempt for violating the automatic stay by advocating that the funds belonged in the state court, urging that he be held in contempt for not doing so, and threatening with being held in contempt. Absolute judicial immunity insulates a court, and absolute quasi-judicial immunity its officers, from liability for judicial actions. It applies where an exercise of judicial or quasi-judicial discretion is required. Based on this functional approach, the plaintiff's attorney is not entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity, because each of the actions alleged in the complaint were independent of merely drafting the order to show cause and were private advocacy attempts to collect, not discretionary adjudicatory acts. Therefore, the attorney is subject to sanctions for violating the stay. Burton v. Infinity Cap. Mgmt., 862 F.3d 740 (9th Cir. 2017).

- 13.2.x Court allows creditor's substantial contribution claim in a chapter 7 case. The creditor and his counsel provided substantial assistance to the trustee in the trustee's action to recover property for the estate. Counsel applied for allowance of an administrative expense claim for a substantial contribution to the case. Under section 503(b), the court shall allow "administrative expenses ... including ... (3) the actual, necessary expenses ... incurred by ... (D) a creditor ... in making a substantial contribution in a case under chapter 9 or 11." Because the introductory language is nonexclusive, the limitation in paragraph (3)(D) to a chapter 9 and 11 case does not prohibit allowance of a substantial contribution claim in a case under another chapter. Therefore, the court allows the claim. In re Maqsoodi, 565 B.R. 40 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2017).
- 13.2.y Absence of a creditors committee does not relax the standard for "substantial contribution" reimbursement under section 503(b)(4). A creditor sought reimbursement of its attorney's fees for raising objections to the debtor's plan that a creditors committee might have raised if a committee had been serving in the case. Section 503(b)(4) permits the court to award a creditor reimbursement of its fees for making a substantial contribution in the case. The standard for awarding fees under section 503(b)(4) does not vary based on whether a creditors committee is serving in the case. Because the creditor did not meet that standard, the court denies the request for reimbursement. In re KIOR, Inc., 567 B.R. 451 (D. Del. 2017).
- 13.2.z Res judicata effect of sale order does not bar claim against law firm for breach of fiduciary duty to former clients who were unsuccessful bidders. Before bankruptcy, the debtor's principals retained a law firm to advise them how to retain control over their closely-held corporation in the face of impending defaults to lenders. After advising them on strategies, including the benefits of a bankruptcy sale, and without obtaining a conflict waiver from the principals, the law firm switched to representing the debtor, filed the debtor's bankruptcy case, and arranged for a former partner to represent the principals. The law firm did not disclose the prior engagement in its employment application. During the case, the law firm helped to engineer a sale of the debtor's assets to a competing bidder with which it also had a relationship. Because of delays in the sale process and in collateral proceedings, the principals lost their financing for the purchase and did not bid at or object to the sale. After the bankruptcy court approved the sale and the sale closed, the bankruptcy court confirmed a liquidation plan. The principals later sued the law firm and two partners for breach of fiduciary duty, tortious interference with economic advantage, and common law fraud. Res judicata bars a claim that was or could have been brought in a prior action if a prior final judgment on the merits between the same parties involved the same causes of action. Translating res judicata principles to bankruptcy judgments is "awkward" because of the different procedural posture of bankruptcy proceedings, among other reasons. Courts are careful not to allow later actions to undo the effect of a bankruptcy court order. Here, although the principals could have raised their claims of law firm misconduct in the sale proceeding, they could not have sued the law firm in that proceeding. The claim against the law firm does not involve the estate or the purchaser and so does not threaten the finality of or impair the rights or interests established by the bankruptcy court's sale and plan confirmation hearing. Therefore, res judicata does not bar the principals' post-bankruptcy claim against the law firm. Brown Media Corp. v. K&L Gates, LLP, 854 F.3d 150 (2d Cir. 2017).

13.2.aa Court orders payment of committee counsel's fees in excess of carve-out amount after confirmation. The debtor in possession financing approval order provided that "up to $250,000 in aggregate proceeds of the [secured lender's collateral] may be used to pay fees and expenses of the professionals retained by the Committee that are incurred in connection with investigating (but not prosecuting or bringing a challenge to)" certain claims. Committee counsel investigated and prosecuted the claims. The parties ultimately reached a settlement that resulted in a confirmed plan. Committee counsel applied for approval of $8.5 million in fees. The secured lender objected. A court may not order the payment of administrative expenses from a secured creditor's collateral without the creditor's consent. Under section 1129(a)(9), the court may not confirm a plan that does not provide for payment of administrative expenses. Under section 503(b), committee counsel's fees, to the extent allowed, are administrative expenses. The DIP financing order authorized the carve-out for an investigation but did not limit using the creditor's collateral for payment of administrative expenses. The secured creditor sought plan confirmation under the settlement, impliedly consenting to the payment of administrative expenses. Therefore, the court may allow committee counsel's fees and order their payment. In re Molycorp, Inc., 562 B.R. 67 (Bankr. D. Del. Jan. 5, 2017).

13.2.bb Attorney may not contract under section 328 for fees for defense of a fee application. Following the Supreme Court's decision in Baker Botts L.L.P. v. ASARCO LLC, 135 S. Ct. 2158 (2015), counsel for an unsecured creditors committee sought approval under section 328(a) of a provision in its engagement agreement that would allow it fees for defense of its fee application. Section 330(a) permits the court to award reasonable fees. Baker Botts held the American Rule, under which each side bears its own fees unless a statute or contract provides otherwise, prohibits allowance of fees under section 330(a) for an estate's counsel's defense of its fee application. Section 328(a) is an exception to section 330(a) and permits the court to approve any reasonable terms and conditions of employment. But section 328(a) is not a specific statutory exception to the American Rule. Baker Botts does not preclude a contractual exception to the American Rule, and counsel's employment agreement is a contract, but it is not a contract with the estate, which would be liable for the fee-defense fees, and the fee-defense provision is not a reasonable term or condition of employment. Although some caselaw has permitted courts to look to the market to determine section 328(a) reasonableness and approved fee-defense fee provisions, the caselaw predated Baker Botts, which now prohibits such a provision. Therefore, the court denies approval of committee counsel's fee defense provision. In re Boomerang Tube, Inc., 548 B.R. 69 (Bankr. D. Del. 2016).

13.2.cc Filing of an employment application and plan confirmation limit the period for which the court may approve compensation for debtor's counsel in a chapter 11 case. Due to the press of first-day motions, the debtor in possession filed its counsel's employment application one month after the petition date and did not seek retroactive approval until three months later. The court confirmed a liquidating plan that transferred all the estate's assets to a liquidating trust. Counsel sought approval of fees for work during the case from the petition date and after confirmation. Section 327(a) requires the court's approval of a debtor in possession's employment of counsel. Any work performed before approval is as a volunteer; the estate may not compensate counsel for such work. Caselaw prohibits retroactive approval in the absence of extraordinary circumstances. The demands on counsel from first-day papers is not an extraordinary circumstance, as it happens in many cases. Therefore, the court may not award fees for services rendered before the application date. A debtor is a debtor in possession unless a trustee has been appointed and is serving in the case. A debtor in possession remains in possession of the debtor's prepetition assets and administers them for the benefit of the estate. Confirmation of a liquidating plan that vests assets in a liquidating trust divests the estate of the assets and the debtor of possession of the assets. The debtor is no longer a debtor in possession after confirmation. The court may not award compensation to counsel for the debtor in possession for the period after the debtor ceases to be a debtor in possession. Mark J. Lazzo, P.A. v. Rose Hill Bank (In re Schupback Invs., L.L.C.), 808 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2015).

13.2.dd PACA trust funds may not be used to pay special PACA counsel without PACA creditor's consent. The bankruptcy court appointed special counsel to represent the estate for PACA matters, with authority to determine which assets were PACA trust assets, examine PACA claims, collect receivables, and liquidate PACA trust assets. Counsel applied for allowance of fees from the PACA trust. One PACA creditor objected; the other PACA creditors either consented or were silent. PACA requires agricultural commodity purchasers to hold the commodities and their proceeds in trust until full payment of the sellers. Because the seller beneficiaries of the trust are entitled to a fixed sum rather than just whatever the trust holds, the trustee may not receive payment from the trust funds until the beneficiaries are paid in full. However, individual beneficiaries may waive their entitlement or direct the proceeds to counsel. Counsel's role here was tantamount to a trustee's. Therefore, counsel could not be paid the pro rata portion allocable to the objecting PACA creditor from the PACA trust funds. Kingdom Fresh Produce, Inc. v. Stokes Law Office, L.L.P. (In re Delta Produce, L.P.), 817 F.3d 141 (5th Cir), aff'd on reh., 845 F.3d 609 (5th Cir. 2016) 2016).

13.2.ee Barton doctrine protects debtor in possession's general counsel and subsidiary director. The debtor in possession's chief restructuring officer asked the company's general counsel to continue to serve as such, and the court approved an "Executive Service Agreement" between the DIP and the general counsel. The CRO then elected the general counsel to the board of the DIP's principal subsidiary to facilitate the subsidiary's sale. The board issued an SEC Form 8-K shortly after the general counsel's appointment, which an attorney claimed was defamatory. After plan confirmation, the attorney sought the court's permission to sue the general counsel in federal district court. Under Barbour v. Barton, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), a plaintiff must obtain leave of the bankruptcy court to sue a trustee or other court-approved officer, including an attorney or investigator that the trustee hires. The general counsel, acting as a director of the subsidiary, was a court-approved officer, even though the court approved only his employment agreement, not him personally, and is therefore protected by Barton. Section 959(a) is an exception to the Barton doctrine for acts committed in carrying on the estate's business. It does not apply here because the general counsel's actions were in furtherance of administering the estate, not operating the business. The court denies permission to sue. Coen v. Stutz (In re CDC Corp.), 610 Fed. Appx. 918 (11th Cir. 2015).

13.2.ff Barton v. Barbour does not apply to an action against the trustee arising from an order in a withdrawn adversary proceeding. The trustee sued the debtors and their children in bankruptcy court to avoid and recover fraudulently transferred property. The district court withdrew the reference of the adversary proceeding. It then authorized the trustee to seize certain property from the debtors' home. The debtors and their daughter claimed the trustee seized more than authorized and sued the trustee in the district court for a Fourth Amendment violation. Under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), a federal court does not have jurisdiction over an action against a court-appointed officer unless the appointing court has given leave to the plaintiff to proceed. Barton protects the officer and the appointing court from another court's usurping its control over the officer and the underlying proceeding and protects the officer from unjustified personal liability for acts taken within the scope of official duties. Generally, Barton applies to prevent a suit in the district court against a trustee appointed by the bankruptcy court in the same district. However, here, the suit concerned an order the district court had issued, giving the district court the interest in protecting its proceeding and trustee. Therefore, Barton does not apply. Carroll v. Abide, 788 F.3d 502 (5th Cir. 2015).

- 13.2.gg Barton v. Barbour requires leave to sue a state court-appointed trustee. The state court appointed a trustee to sell the debtor’s marital home to collect the amount owed to the debtor’s ex-wife. The debtor took several steps to frustrate the sale and then filed a bankruptcy case. The state court found the debtor in contempt for failing to cooperate with the trustee and imposed sanctions. Without leave of the state court, the debtor filed an adversary proceeding against the trustee for violation of the stay. Under Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), a federal court does not have jurisdiction over an action against a court-appointed officer unless the appointing court has given leave to the plaintiff to proceed. The doctrine applies in federal court equally to actions against an officer appointed by a state court. Because the debtor did not obtain leave of the state court before bringing the action, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to hear it. Tshiani v. Monahan, 533 B.R. 506 (D. Md. 2015).
- 13.2.hh Section 330(a) does not allow compensation for defending a fee application. The debtor in possession’s counsel successfully sued the debtor’s parent to recover a fraudulent transfer and guided the debtor through a chapter 11 that resulted in full payment of creditors and return of the company to the parent. The parent objected to counsel’s fees. Under the American Rule, each party in a dispute must bear its own legal fees, unless a statute provides otherwise. Section 330(a)(1) permits a court to award “reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered.” “Services” refers to labor performed for another, in this case, the estate, not the professional itself. Preparation of a fee application is a service for the estate required by the Code, but defense of an application is not. It is a service only for the professional. Therefore, section 330(a) does not displace the American Rule. Fees for defending a fee application are not compensable by the estate. Baker Botts L.L.P. v. ASARCO LLC, 576 U.S. ___, 135 S. Ct. 2158 (2015).
- 13.2.ii Fifth Circuit adopts prospective fee award standard, overrules Pro-Snax en banc. The debtor attempted to reorganize under chapter 11 but was unsuccessful, as was its counsel in most of the litigation it had pursued during the case. The court converted the case to chapter 7. Debtor’s counsel applied for fees for work performed in the chapter 11 case, but applying In re Pro-Snax Distributions, Inc., 157 F.3d 414 (5th Cir. 1998), the bankruptcy court denied most of the application on the ground that the work had not provided an identifiable, tangible, material benefit to the estate. Section 330(a) authorizes a court to award fees to the estate’s professionals, setting the fee amount based on “the nature, the extent, and the value” of the services, including factors listed in section 330(a)(3), including “whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the service was rendered toward the complication of, a case”. Section 330(a)(4)(A)(i) prohibits a court from allowing compensation for services “that were not (I) reasonably likely to benefit the debtor’s estate.” It thus specifies, in both positive and negative terms, that the court should determine the reasonableness and value of services when rendered, not with hindsight based on whether they were successful. Therefore, in an en banc ruling, the Fifth Circuit overrules Pro-Snax. Barron & Newburger, P.C. v. Texas Skyline, Ltd. (In re Woerner), 783 F.3d 266 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc).
- 13.2.jj Court denies compensation for services rendered before an employment application and after confirmation. Counsel represented the LLC debtor and debtor in possession in its chapter 11 case and its two individual principals in their later-filed chapter 13 cases. Due to inadvertence, he filed his employment application in the LLC case five weeks after the petition date. Some of his legal services involved both substantive consolidation and dischargeability issues for the individuals in connection with plan negotiations. The court denied substantive consolidation. Ultimately, the court confirmed a creditors’ plan that vested all estate assets in the creditors and in a liquidating trust. After the effective date, counsel performed services on behalf of the debtor that the plan required for its implementation. Section 330 permits the court to award compensation to a professional employed under section 327. An employment application may be granted post facto only in extraordinary circumstances. Inadvertence does not amount to extraordinary circumstances, so the court may not grant his employment retroactively for the five-week immediate postpetition period. Accordingly, he was not “employed” under section 327 during that period, so section 330 does not permit allowance of his compensation for that period. For the period during which counsel was employed, the court may award compensation if the services are necessary and benefit the estate, both measured as of the time the services are rendered. Benefit may derive from promoting the bankruptcy process and estate administration, even if counsel’s position is not ultimately successful or does not result in confirmation of his client’s plan. Therefore, counsel may be compensated for services related to consolidation and dischargeability. Section 330 permits compensation only for counsel for the trustee or debtor in possession. Vesting of the estate’s assets upon the plan’s effective date terminates the estate. After that, counsel’s services are not for the estate or for the benefit of the estate. Therefore, the court disallows compensation for post-effective date services, even though the plan required the debtor’s actions to carry out the plan. Rose Hill Bank v. Mark J. Lazzo, P.A. (In re Schupach Investments, LLC), 2014 Bankr. LEXIS 4936 (10th Cir. B.A.P. Nov. 25, 2014).

- 13.2.kk Attorney directed by state court to prepare show cause order against debtor’s counsel is not entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity. The debtor obtained a personal injury settlement, which his attorney placed in his client trust account. The attorney withdrew his own fees but held the balance for distribution to lien claimants to the funds. One of the lien claimants filed an interpleader action in state court but did not name the debtor or his attorney in the action. The debtor soon filed a chapter 7 case. The state court judge initially determined that a state law precedent required the debtor’s attorney to deposit the funds in the state court and at a hearing asked which attorney would prepare an order to show cause to bring the debtor’s attorney before the state court. The interpleader plaintiff’s attorney volunteered, and the state court ordered him to do so. The debtor’s attorney brought an action to hold the plaintiff’s attorney in contempt for violating the automatic stay. Absolute judicial immunity insulates a court, and absolute quasi-judicial immunity its officers, from liability for judicial actions. It applies where an exercise of judicial or quasi-judicial discretion is required. Based on this functional approach, the plaintiff’s attorney is not entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity, because preparing a draft order has no judicial effect; the judge exercises the necessary discretion in determining whether to sign the order at all and whether to revise it. Therefore, the attorney is not entitled to immunity and is subject to sanctions for violating the stay. Burton v. Infinity Cap. Mgmt., 753 F.3d 954 (9th Cir. 2014), rev’d on reh’g, 862 F.3d 740 (9th Cir. 2017).
- 13.2.ii Court disallows fees for fee defense litigation. The debtor’s reorganization resulted in 100% payment to creditors and a substantial return to shareholders, in large part because of the successful prosecution by counsel to the debtor in possession of a $6 billion fraudulent transfer action against the debtor’s parent. Counsel applied for fees in excess of hourly rates. The debtor’s restructured parent objected, waging extensive fee review litigation against counsel. The bankruptcy court awarded $113 million in “core” fees at hourly rates plus a $4 million enhancement for work in the fraudulent litigation plus $5 million in fees for defending the fee award. The court of appeals affirmed the core fees and fee enhancement. Section 330(a) lists the factors the court must consider in awarding fees, including “whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial ... toward the completion” of the case and disallows compensation for services that were not reasonably likely to benefit the estate or necessary to case administration. It limits compensation for fee application preparation “based on the level and skill reasonably required to prepare the application,” implying that fee applications require “scrivener’s skills over other professional work.” Parties in interest receive notice of and may object to a fee application, so the Code contemplates possible fee litigation. Fee litigation benefits only the professional, not the estate. Attorneys can compensate for any potential dilution in fees resulting from disallowance of fee litigation fees by adjustment of their rates, and in any event, the dilution is not substantial. Fee litigation can become costly if counsel can be compensated for self-interested work. Therefore, the court of appeals reverses the award of fees for fee defense work. Asarco, L.L.C. v. Jordan Hyden Womble Culbreth & Holzer, P.C. (In re Asarco, L.L.C.), 751 F.3d 291 (5th Cir. 2014).

13.2.mm Rule 2014 requires disclosure of lawyer in a law firm who represents creditors in unrelated matters but not personal relationships with other bankruptcy professionals. The closely held debtor consulted before bankruptcy with counsel at a law firm about a sale to its insiders. Once sale negotiations started, counsel recommended a friend with whom he had worked at a prior law firm to represent the insiders. In the debtor's chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession applied for approval of the law firm's employment. Counsel filed a Rule 2014 statement in which he disclosed the law firm's prior representation of 488 of the debtor's 1215 creditors, including the agents for the debtor's two secured loans in unrelated matters. But he did not disclose either that he personally represented the two agents in the unrelated matters or his prior relationship with the insiders' counsel. Rule 2014 requires proposed counsel to disclose all "connections" with creditors and other parties in interest and their professionals without limit, to allow the court, rather than counsel, to determine what information is relevant to the court's determination of whether counsel is disinterested. Information about lead counsel's, not just the lead law firm's, representation of significant creditors in unrelated matters is relevant and must be disclosed. However, information about personal relationships with other bankruptcy professionals in the case is not required. KLG Gates LLC v. Brown, 506 B.R. 177 (E.D.N.Y. 2014).

13.2.nn Bankruptcy court may consider only section 330(a)(3) factors in awarding attorneys fees. Before bankruptcy, an attorney agreed to represent the debtor for half the attorney's normal hourly rate and 15% of the recovery to pursue a risky claim against a third party. After bankruptcy, the court authorized the debtor in possession to employ the attorney with fees to be determined by the court under section 330. The attorney spent only 43 hours and produced a settlement with a recovery to the estate of at least $2.25 million more than could have been expected before the commencement of litigation, based on the attorney's creative strategy. Creditors were paid in full, and the debtor received a surplus. The bankruptcy court awarded a fee based on the prepetition agreement, based in part on the big risk the attorney took and the big reward. Section 330(a)(3) permits the court to award a fee based on (A) the time spent, (B), the rates charged, (C) necessity or benefit, (D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable time, (E) the attorney's skill and experience in bankruptcy, and (F) reasonableness, based on customary compensation. The Tenth Circuit applies the adjusted lodestar approach, which takes into account the factors under section 330(a)(3) and the 12 factors set forth in Johnson v. Ga. Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1974), including time and labor, novelty and difficulty, required skill, customary fee, whether the fee is contingent, amount involved, results obtained and awards in similar cases. The lodestar subsumes four Johnson factors (novelty and complexity, counsel's skill, quality of the representation and results), so the court may make an adjustment based on results only in a rare and exceptional case. In Perdue v. Kenny A. ex rel. Winn, 130 S. Ct. 1662 (2010), the Supreme Court rejected use of the Johnson factors in cases involving fee shifting statutes and limited consideration to the lodestar. The Court of Appeals determines that standards in bankruptcy cases differ from those in fee-shifting cases and so does not apply Perdue. The bankruptcy courts remain bound by section 330(a)(3) and relevant Johnson factors. Further, the bankruptcy courts must consider all the section 330(a) factors and no other factors, other than relevant Johnson factors. They may not consider "big risk/big reward" or the attorney's prepetition compensation arrangement. Within those limitations, they have substantial discretion. But the fee here was based on impermissible factors, so the court of appeals reverses and remands for further consideration. Market Center E. Retail Prop., Inc. v. Lurie (In re Market Center E. Retail Prop., Inc.), 750 F.3d 1239 (10th Cir. 2013).

13.2.oo Section 329(b)'s remedy is limited to attorney compensation and does not encompass other transfers. The debtor filed a chapter 13 petition, which the court dismissed. The court then dismissed the debtor's second chapter 13 petition three months later. The debtor's attorney received an $1,800 fee for the first case and disclosed that he had received $12,000 in the second case. Three months after the court dismissed the second case, the court reopened the case and converted it to chapter 7. Between dismissal and reopening, the debtor was sentenced to life for a criminal conviction and transferred to his attorney real property that was subject to a lien. The attorney did not disclose the real property transfer to the court in a Rule 2016 statement. He later bought the property for $99,000 in cash at the lienor's foreclosure sale. On the trustee's motion, the bankruptcy court ordered return of the cash and real property compensation under section 329, without regard to the amount the attorney had paid to the lienor at the foreclosure sale. Section 329(a) requires an attorney to disclose compensation received in contemplation or in connection with the case. Section 329(b) permits the court to order a return of any compensation "to the extent excessive." To do so, the court must determine the value of the services and, if the court imposes sanctions, must determine and justify the amount of the sanctions. By disregarding the amount the attorney paid to acquire the real property, the court effectively ordered the attorney to pay $99,000 to the estate. To justify such an order, the court had to evaluate the attorney's conduct and state a reason for sanctions and for the amount of the sanctions. The court could not properly make a blanket "return" order without such an analysis. Baker v. Cage (In re Whitley), 737 F.3d 981 (5th Cir. 2013).

13.2.pp PACA trust may not pay attorneys fees before full payment of PACA claims. After bankruptcy, the debtor's suppliers asserted trust fund claims under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act (PACA). The court issued a procedures order governing the filing, consideration and resolution of such claims, the collection of trust assets from the debtor's customers and the employment of special counsel at the expense of the trust to carry out the order. Generally, a trustee may incur expenses, payable from trust assets, to collect and preserve trust assets. However, PACA differs. It requires full payment of amounts owing to suppliers before any trust funds are used for any other purpose. Therefore, special counsel's fee may not be paid from the PACA trust until all PACA suppliers are paid in full. Kingdom Fresh Produce v. Bexar County (In re Delta Produce, LP), 498 B.R. 731 (W.D. Tex. 2013).

13.2.qq Case dismissal deprives bankruptcy court of jurisdiction to rule on fee application. The chapter 13 debtor sued her mortgage lender to avoid a foreclosure sale. While the court's decision was on appeal, the debtor failed to make plan payments. The bankruptcy court dismissed the chapter 13 case. The debtor's attorney applied for fees for representing the debtor in the litigation. A bankruptcy court has jurisdiction if a proceeding is at least "related to" the bankruptcy, that is, if it would increase or reduce the estate or claims or affect priorities. Once the case is dismissed, fees cannot have an effect on the estate, and the bankruptcy court thereby loses jurisdiction. Under section 349, a dismissal order may provide that the court retains jurisdiction to determine and allow fees, but the order here did not do so. Therefore, the court does not have jurisdiction to allow the fees. The court specifically declines to rule on whether the attorney may collect the fees from the debtor under state law. The court does not address whether the proceeding might "arise in" the case or "arise under title 11." Iannini v. Winnecourt, 487 B.R. 433 (W.D. Pa. 2013).

13.2.rr Plan may provide for payment of creditors committee members' attorneys' fees. The confirmed plan provided that creditors committee members were entitled to reimbursement of fees they paid to their attorneys, separate from attorneys for the committee. Section 503(b)(3)(F) permits allowance of a committee member's expenses other than professional fees incurred in the performance of committee duties. Section 503(b)(4) authorizes fees for a professional retained by one whose expenses are allowable under sections 503(b)(3)(A) through (E), but not (F). However, section 1123(b)(6) permits a plan to include any "appropriate provision not inconsistent with the applicable provisions" of the Code. Section 1129(a)(4) requires as a confirmation condition that any payment for professional services in or in connection with the case be subject to court approval, suggesting that a plan provision authorizing professional fee payments is not inconsistent with applicable Code provisions. Therefore, the plan provision properly authorizes court allowance of attorneys' fees for creditors committee members. In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc., 487 B.R. 181 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

- 13.2.ss Court may not authorize attorney fee payment from property that has reverted in the debtor. The chapter 11 trustee sold the debtor's principal asset, producing a surplus after payment of all expenses and claims. The debtor's attorney applied for compensation for services rendered after the trustee's appointment, to be paid from the surplus that was to be returned to the debtor. Before the court ruled on the application, however, the state attorney general obtained an injunction against the trustee's further disbursement of estate funds. Section 330(a) permits a court to award compensation to counsel for the debtor only if the court has previously approved counsel's employment. Here, the estate's employment of counsel terminated upon the trustee's appointment. Therefore, the court may not award compensation. Section 349(b) provides that upon dismissal, property reverts in the debtor, except to the extent that the court, for cause, orders otherwise. However, section 349(b) does not authorize the court to direct the disbursement of fund once they leave the estate and revert in the debtor, and it may not be used as a means of circumventing section 330(a)'s limitations. Moreover, in this case, payment of counsel would subordinate the attorney general's claim to the surplus. Therefore, the court denies counsel's fee application. Harrington v. Nickless (In re Int'l Gospel Party Boosting Jesus Groups, Inc.), 487 B.R. 12 (D. Mass. 2013).
- 13.2.tt Secured creditor's unreasonable fees that are disallowed under section 506(b) may be allowed under section 502(b) only to the extent enforceable under nonbankruptcy law. The secured creditor's loan documents required the debtor to pay or reimburse the lender's "reasonable out-of-pocket costs and expenses ... including ... the reasonable fees and disbursements of counsel." After confirmation, lender's counsel filed an application under section 506(b) for its fees and expenses. The court determined that the fees were unreasonable. Section 506(b) allows to the holder of an oversecured claim "reasonable fees, costs, or charges provided for under the agreement ... under which such claim arose". Section 502(b) requires allowance of a claim except for specified reasons, including that the claim is not enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Postpetition fees are generally allowable as part of a prepetition claim under Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 549 U.S. 443 (2007), to the extent that they are enforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law. Thus, section 502(b) could provide a separate ground for allowance of an oversecured creditor's fees as part of the creditor's claim. Here, however, the loan agreement allowed only reasonable fees. The court had already determined that the fees were not reasonable. Therefore, they are unenforceable under the agreement and so unenforceable under applicable nonbankruptcy law and thus not allowable as part of the creditor's prepetition claim. In re Latshaw Drilling, LLC, 481 B.R. 765 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. 2012).
- 13.2.uu Attorneys' fees for the debtor's opposition to a trustee motion may be compensable. One week after the petition date, the U.S. trustee filed a motion for the appointment of a trustee. The court denied the motion as not in the interests of creditors and the estate. The U.S. trustee objected to the debtor's attorneys' fees incurred in defending against the trustee motion. A debtor enjoys a presumptive right to continue in possession and therefore may oppose a trustee motion. If there was a reasonable basis at the time to contend that the estate would be benefited by defeating the motion, compensation would be allowable. A debtor is not required to consent to any trustee motion, even one filed by the U.S. trustee. Counsel acts at the debtor's direction. In this case, because the motion was filed so soon after the petition date, it left the debtor little time to evaluate the longer term implications and required the debtor to contest it. Ultimately, the court denied the motion as not in the interests of creditors and the estate. Accordingly, fees may be awarded for contesting the motion. In re West End Fin. Advcs., 2012 Bankr. LEXIS 3045 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. July 3, 2012).

- 13.2.vv Court denies attorney employment application for lack of adequate information about the attorney. A chapter 7 trustee filed an application for approval to employ an attorney to represent him in the case. The application stated only that the attorney had previously represented the trustee in numerous bankruptcy cases and that the trustee and the attorney had a personal friendship, which fostered confidence and trust. The application did not provide any information about the prior representations, whether they were successful in achieving the results sought or whether they provided any benefit to the estate. Rule 2014 requires an employment application to describe, among other things, the specific facts showing the need for the employment, the reasons for selecting the attorney and the services the attorney will provide. The application must therefore describe the scope of the assignment, with a detailed description of the attorney's duties, and the extent to which the attorney has successfully undertaken such an assignment before. The reference to personal friendship undermines the application, because it is irrelevant to qualifications and may be viewed as a conflict. Therefore, the court denies the employment application without prejudice to refile a proper application. In re Bechuck, 472 B.R. 371 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2012).
- 13.2.ww The debtor in possession may employ a law firm that agrees to accept payment of its prepetition claim only from any equity distribution. A law firm represented the debtor in litigation before bankruptcy. The debtor owed the firm for the representation. The debtor's sole shareholder had guaranteed the obligation. The debtor in possession sought to employ the firm as special bankruptcy counsel. The firm agreed to waive the claim against the debtor and pursue only the shareholder for the amounts owing, but in doing so, took an assignment from the shareholder of his right to any distributions from the estate. Section 327(a) permits the debtor in possession to employ an attorney who is disinterested, that is, one who "is not a creditor ... and does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors ... by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor, or for any other reason." Section 1107(b) relaxes this restriction slightly by preventing disqualification "solely because of ... employment by or representation of the debtor" before bankruptcy. The court should apply this section using a "totality of the circumstances" test. Listing and applying 14 factors, the court concludes that the debtor in possession may employ the firm, subject to periodic reporting by the general bankruptcy counsel on issues that might create a conflict. In re SBMC Healthcare, LLC, 473 B.R. 871 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2012).
- 13.2.xx A security retainer is not subject to disgorgement in a superseding chapter 7 case. The chapter 11 debtor's attorney received a security retainer, which he deposited into his client trust account. After the filing, the court authorized an interim compensation procedure. The attorney applied for fees, but before the court acted on the application, the case was converted to chapter 7. The chapter 7 case was administratively insolvent, so the chapter 7 trustee sought disgorgement of the retainer from the attorney. Section 726(b) subordinates chapter 11 administrative expenses to chapter 7 administrative expenses and permits the court to order disgorgement of chapter 11 administrative expense payments, including professional compensation that the court has already awarded, if the chapter 7 administration would otherwise be insolvent. However, an attorney who holds a valid security retainer is not subject to disgorgement, because of the attorney's security interest in the retainer. The court therefore remands the case for a determination of whether the attorney had perfected a lien on the retainer. Cupps & Garrison, LLC v. Rhiel (In re Two Gales, Inc.), 454 B.R. 427 (6th Cr. B.A.P. 2011).
- 13.2.yy Section 329 "contemplation of bankruptcy" test depends on the debtor's state of mind. The debtor retained counsel to represent him in a short sale of his over-encumbered real property and to represent him in various foreclosure proceedings. He decided not to proceed with his defense of the foreclosure. Counsel then recommended that he seek bankruptcy counsel, which he did. He filed a chapter 11 case three months later. As debtor in possession, he sought disgorgement of fees from his prior counsel under section 329. Section 329 requires a lawyer who has represented a debtor “in a case or in connection with a case” to file a statement with the court of any agreement or payment made for the attorney’s “services rendered or to be rendered in contemplation of or in connection with the case” and permits the court to order disgorgement of any such fees. Services are “in contemplation” of bankruptcy if, based on a subjective test of the debtor’s state of mind, they were rendered when the debtor was considering bankruptcy, was influenced by the imminence of bankruptcy or were for the prevention of bankruptcy. The services need not be as the debtor’s bankruptcy counsel, but they must have more than a casual connection to the later bankruptcy. The district court therefore remands for a factual determination of the debtor’s state of mind and the purposes of counsel’s services. Garcia v. Miller (In re Garcia), 465 B.R. 361 (N.D. Ill. 2011).

13.2.zz Sections 327, 328 and 330 apply to involuntary chapter 11 debtor’s employment of counsel to defend the petition. Creditors filed an involuntary petition under chapter 11 against the debtor. The debtor retained counsel to defend the involuntary petition. Counsel filed an employment application under section 327, which the court approved, with the stipulation that counsel could reapply for employment under chapter 11 if the court ordered relief. During the involuntary gap, counsel received fees from other creditors for defending against the petition. The court ordered relief on the petition and later converted the case to chapter 7. The trustee sought recovery of fees paid to counsel during the gap. Section 303(f) permits the debtor to “continue to use, acquire, or dispose of property as if an involuntary case concerning the debtor had not been commenced”. However, section 541(a) creates the estate upon the filing of the petition, and section 1107(a) provides that “debtor in possession” means debtor in a chapter 11 case except when a trustee is serving, even during the involuntary gap period. A debtor in possession has all of the rights and powers, and is subject to all of the limitations, of a trustee. Section 327 requires a trustee to obtain court approval of employment of counsel. Therefore, the debtor must obtain court approval of employment of counsel in an involuntary chapter 11 case, despite section 303(f), and sections 328 and 330, requiring court approval of compensation, also apply. The court notes that the same result would not apply in an involuntary chapter 7 case. Rushton v. Woodbury & Keller, P.C. (In re C.W. Mining Co.), 440 B.R. 878 (Bankr. D. Utah 2010).

13.2.aaa Court disqualifies law firm based on conflict of interest in fraudulent transfer action involving dividend. The law firm represented the debtor before bankruptcy in arranging a dividend to the debtor’s parent and affiliates. The firm’s engagement agreement provided for a fully informed, full future conflict waiver for any disputes between the debtor and the parent and permitted the firm to represent the parent and its affiliates against the debtor if a conflict arose. After bankruptcy, the trustee sued the parent and its affiliates as well as two companies related to the debtor and several individual defendants, who were directors or officers of the debtor and the parent, its affiliates or the debtor, for a fraudulent transfer in connection with the dividend. The firm appeared on behalf of all of the defendants except two of the individual defendants. The trustee moved to disqualify the firm for conflict of interest. A conflict of interest exists here because the firm represented the debtor on the transaction that was the subject of the litigation. A specific future conflict waiver limited to specified parties is enforceable, so the firm may represent the parent and the affiliates. However, the waiver did not cover the individuals or the defendants not designated in the complaint as affiliates of the parent, so the firm is disqualified from representing them in the action. The court does not distinguish between the trustee and the debtor for these purposes. Miller v. Sun Cap. P’ners, Inc. (In re IH 1, Inc.), 441 B.R. 742 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).

13.2.bbb Soliciting potential committee members with whom counsel had no prior relationship disqualifies counsel from committee employment. Immediately after the petition date, a law firm contacted Dr. Liu, with whom the firm had worked before as a translator, to solicit proxies from Chinese creditors listed on the list of top 20 creditors. Dr. Liu obtained proxies from two Chinese creditors, with whom neither the law firm nor Dr. Liu had a prior relationship.

Because of the U.S. Trustee's rules, the law firm arranged for another proxy holder for one of the creditors. The law firm gave advice to the creditors on the treatment of their claims for goods in transit. Although there was no agreement on how the proxies would be voted, correspondence between Dr. Liu and the firm suggested that the process was to be "a two-way street". Dr. Liu's proxy was selected for committee membership. At the committee formation meeting, he recommended the law firm as committee counsel, and the committee unanimously voted to select the firm. The firm then recommended that the committee retain Dr. Liu as a translator. The debtor and the U.S. Trustee objected to the combined employment application for the law firm and Dr. Liu. The debtor is a party in interest in the case and so has standing to object to the application. The Rule 7.3 of Delaware's Rules of Professional Conduct prohibits a lawyer from soliciting a client unless the lawyer has a prior relationship with the client and prohibits employing a third party to do so. Moreover, solicitation has been criticized under the Bankruptcy Act, and the Code contained provisions to discourage it. Although there was no express agreement that Dr. Liu would support the law firm's engagement as committee counsel, there was at least a tacit understanding. The violations are sufficient to disqualify the firm from employment as committee counsel. In addition, the firm did not disclose that it gave advice to and therefore acted as counsel to the two creditors. Acting as counsel is not disqualifying, but nondisclosure is, especially in the context of proxy solicitations. Therefore, the court denies the employment applications. In re Univ. Bldg. Prods., 486 B.R. 650 (Bankr. D. Del. 2010).

13.2.ccc Counsel for prepetition committee may receive substantial contribution award. The debtor operated a Ponzi scheme. After the scheme was revealed, various investors notified other investors of the formation of an unofficial committee and invited participation. Six investors agreed to serve, formed an unofficial committee and retained counsel. The committee's goal was to represent unsecured creditors' interests. The committee successfully sought the appointment of a receiver who would have the power to file a chapter 11 case and would be able to serve as debtor's management and therefore assume the duties of a debtor in possession. The committee's efforts laid the groundwork for a chapter 11 case, including conducting research on potential claims of the estate, which the committee turned over to the receiver. The receiver filed a chapter 11 case. The members of the unofficial committee were appointed as the official committee in the case. Sections 503(b)(3)(D) and (b)(4) authorize allowance as an administrative expense of expenses, including attorney's fees, of a creditor or unofficial committee incurred "in making a substantial contribution in a case" under chapter 11. The contribution, not the activity, must be "in the case". Thus, prepetition services qualify if they result in a substantial contribution in the case. Services provide a substantial contribution when they substitute for efforts that estate compensated professionals would ordinarily be responsible for performing but for whatever reason do not perform. Services that primarily serve the creditor's interest or that are merely extensive participation in the case do not qualify. "Thus, section 503(b)(3)(D) and (b)(4) may not be used to buy off a pest, who did little if anything to advance, and in fact may have impeded, the proper administration of the case." Prepetition services may qualify because estate compensated professionals are not yet in place to perform the necessary services. Here, the unofficial committee set up the chapter 11 case, helped arrange financing, secured the receiver's appointment and assisted him in launching the chapter 11 case. These activities qualify as a substantial contribution in the case. In re Bayou Group, LLC, 431 B.R. 549 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

13.2.ddd Conflict waiver and conflicts counsel do not permit section 327(a) employment in the face of a disabling conflict. The debtor owned and operated a gas turbine manufactured and maintained by a General Electric turbine subsidiary. The turbine failed, resulting in the debtor's financial troubles, and a dispute arose between them over maintenance, resulting in an arbitration award in favor of the GE turbine subsidiary. Resolution of issues with the GE turbine subsidiary was central to the debtor's effort to reorganize. Although it had resolved some disputes with the subsidiary, further work was needed to normalize the turbine operations and the relationship fully. The debtor filed chapter 11. It sought to employ the U.S. affiliate of an international law firm group under section 327(a) as its general reorganization counsel. The law firm was a member of a Swiss Verein, of which all the firm's foreign affiliates were also members. The firm advertised itself as being able to provide seamless worldwide representation to its clients. Although the U.S. firm did not represent the GE turbine subsidiary, it represented other GE affiliates, and the firm's Norwegian affiliate actively represented the GE turbine subsidiary. The U.S. firm obtained a conflicts waiver letter from GE, apparently applicable to all GE affiliates, including the turbine subsidiary, waiving any objection to the firm's continued representation of the debtor in the chapter 11 case in matters adverse to any GE affiliate, except for litigation or threatening litigation. The debtor retained conflicts counsel, also under section 327(a), to handle all litigation relating to the GE turbine subsidiary. Section 327(a) permits employment of a professional only if the professional does not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate. Whether a professional holds an adverse interest is determined on a case-by-case basis. Representation of a creditor in an unrelated matter is not automatically disqualifying, though an actual conflict of interest is. The law firm's conflict waiver treated GE and the GE turbine subsidiary as a single entity, and its marketing materials treated its affiliated entities as a single worldwide law firm. The disputes between the debtor and the GE turbine subsidiary had not been fully resolved. Therefore, there is an actual conflict as to GE in the firm's representation of the debtor in possession. Where there is an actual conflict on an issue that is central to the resolution of the chapter 11 case, neither a conflict waiver nor conflicts counsel permits employment of the firm, because neither satisfy the requirement of section 327(a) that the firm neither hold nor represent an interest adverse to the estate. In addition, in this case, the conflicts waiver was limited and would have hampered the firm's ability to take aggressive positions against the GE turbine subsidiary. A conflicts waiver and conflicts counsel may be necessary and appropriate where the underlying conflict is not itself disabling, but that was not the case here. In re Proj. Orange Assocs., LLC, 431 B.R. 363 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

13.2.eee BAPCPA's restriction on attorney advice and its advertising requirement are constitutional. An attorney, her law firm and her clients challenged the constitutionality under the First Amendment of sections 526(a)(4), 528(a) and 528(b)(2), which BAPCPA added to the Bankruptcy Code. Section 526(a)(4) prohibits a "debt relief agency" from advising "an assisted person ... to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title". A "debt relief agency" is "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person" for valuable consideration. "Bankruptcy assistance" is any services "provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, [or] counsel ... or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title". Although the "debt relief agency" definition excludes five categories of persons and institutions, it does not expressly exclude attorneys. Under the plain meaning rule, therefore, "debt relief agency" includes attorneys. Second, the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy" has commonly been associated with abusive conduct. Thus, its use here "refers to a specific type of misconduct designed to manipulate the protections of the bankruptcy system", that is, "to incur more debt because the debtor is filing for bankruptcy, rather than for a valid purpose". Other statutory provisions, such as the exceptions to discharge by fraud or false pretenses or for luxury purchases on the eve of bankruptcy, for dismissal for abuse and requiring an attorney to certify that a bankruptcy filing does not constitute an abuse, support this reading. Such activities can be harmful to the debtor or to creditors and are therefore the prohibition's focus. When so interpreted, the prohibition does not prevent discussing the covered subjects, only affirmative advice to engage in abusive conduct. Nor does it prohibit advice to incur debt for other purposes, such as to refinance a mortgage at a lower rate or buy a reliable car on credit, which may improve the debtor's financial prospects, or to make purchases necessary to support the debtor or a dependent of the debtor. Thus interpreted, the provision is both sufficiently narrow and not too vague to pass constitutional muster. Finally, section 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) require a debt relief agency's advertisements of bankruptcy or debt relief services to contain, "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy” or a substantially similar statement. A statute may require commercial speech if the requirement is reasonably related to preventing consumer deception. The disclosure requirement is directed at ensuring that debt relief agencies’ advertisements disclose that their services involve bankruptcy, which is reasonably related to Congress’s purpose and factually correct, and does not prevent the agencies from disclosing additional information about their services or that they are attorneys as well as debt relief agencies. Therefore, the requirement is constitutional. Notably, the Court determines that the context in which the statute uses the term “assisted person” shows that it does not include a consumer creditor. Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. U.S., 559 U.S. 229, 130 S. Ct. 1324, 176 L. Ed. 2d 79 (2010).

13.2.fff Court disqualifies counsel for, among other things, bringing a substantive consolidation motion. A debtor subsidiary contractor held a joint account with a subcontractor. A dispute arose between them over liability and the account’s ownership. An arbitrator determined that the subsidiary was liable to the subcontractor for the amount the subcontractor asserted. The subsidiary and its parent filed chapter 11 cases, both represented by the same counsel that had defended the subsidiary in the nonbankruptcy litigation. The debtor’s largest asset was its claimed interest in the account, and its largest liability was to the subcontractor. The bankruptcy court determined that the subcontractor owned the account. While the decision was on appeal, the parent and subsidiary debtors moved for substantive consolidation of their estates, the intent of which was to make the account, if determined on appeal to be owned by one of the debtors, available for payment of all claims, rather than available to pay only the subcontractor’s claim against the subsidiary. An attorney employed to represent the estate must be disinterested, which requires that the attorney not have “an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate”. Thus, the attorney may not represent conflicting interests. A debtor in possession owes a fiduciary duty to its creditors and therefore may not act solely in its self-interest to the exclusion of creditors’ interests. An attorney who represents multiple debtors in possession risks breaching its fiduciary duties when working to benefit one debtor’s estate or creditors at the expense of another debtor’s estate or creditors. Therefore, because counsel violated its fiduciary duties by bringing and persisting in the substantive consolidation motion, counsel is disqualified from representing the subsidiary in any substantive consolidation proceeding. Raymond Mgmt. Servs., Inc. v. Wm. A. Pope Co. (In re Raymond Prof. Group, Inc.), 421 B.R. 891 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2009).

13.2.ggg Chapter 11 trustee may employ former counsel for the creditors committee. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor consented to the appointment of a trustee. The trustee was initially unable to employ counsel because of conflict, geographic, capacity and risk of nonpayment issues. Counsel to the unsecured creditors committee agreed to serve as counsel to the trustee. The committee retained separate counsel, which advised the committee in connection with any conflict waiver that its former counsel required to represent the trustee. The trustee’s employment of counsel must meet three requirements under sections 327(a) and (c). Counsel must be disinterested, not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate and not have an actual conflict of interest. Disinterestedness requires, among other things, that counsel not be a creditor or not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate. To hold an adverse interest is “to possess or assert an economic interest that would tend to decrease the value of the estate”, and to represent an adverse interest is to serve as counsel for an entity with such an adverse interest. Counsel here is not a creditor and does not have or hold an adverse interest. Prior committee representation does not amount to representation of an adverse interest or create an actual conflict, as counsel represents only the committee, not individual creditors on the committee. Adversity is a federal question but informed by state ethical rules. Under applicable ethical rules, a client’s informed written consent suffices to resolve adversity issues, but in a chapter 11 case, section 327(a) makes the issue a public affair. In this case, all parties in interest supported the representation, and there appears to have been full disclosure and no appearance of impropriety. Therefore, the court approves the employment. In re Kobra Props., 406 B.R. 396 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 2009).

- 13.2.hhh Bankruptcy court may suspend attorney from practice for bad faith misconduct. The chapter 13 debtor's attorney failed to appear at the section 341 meeting or the confirmation hearing. Even though the court confirmed the debtor's plan, the attorney sent the debtor a letter the day after the hearing advising her that her case had been dismissed. The attorney also solicited the debtor five times to list her home for sale with him and referred her to a loan broker that conditioned the loan on listing the home for sale with the attorney. The bankruptcy court issued an order to show cause why the attorney should not be disbarred or suspended for bad faith misconduct. A bankruptcy court has civil contempt power under section 105(a) and inherent sanction authority. Civil contempt authority may be used only to remedy violation of a specific order and may only compensate a party that has been harmed by violation or coerce compliance. Larger penalties implicate criminal contempt and are beyond the bankruptcy court's power. Inherent sanction authority is broader and therefore must be used more cautiously but may be used to sanction bad faith or willful misconduct. Exercise of inherent sanction authority requires notice of the specific conduct to be sanctioned, notice of the authority that is the basis for the sanction and an opportunity for a hearing but does not require all the protections afforded to a criminal defendant. In this case, the attorney was given the required notices and hearing, and the conflict of interest conduct showed bad faith. Therefore, suspension from practice for three months was authorized and appropriate. Price v. Lehtinen (In re Lehtinen), 564 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2009).
- 13.2.iii Creditor may obtain derivative standing in a chapter 7 case. The debtor transferred assets to an affiliate. A creditor brought a fraudulent transfer action against the affiliate and later filed an involuntary chapter 7 petition against the debtor. After the order for relief, the trustee determined not to pursue a fraudulent transfer action against the affiliate. The creditor sought derivative standing. Although section 544 grants the trustee authority to pursue a fraudulent transfer action, it says nothing about derivative standing. However, section 503(b)(3)(B) implies derivative standing by authorizing payment as an administrative expense of the costs and expenses of a creditor who recovers, after court approval, assets for the estate. In addition, pre-Code practice clearly permitted derivative standing. Other courts have permitted derivative standing in chapter 11 cases. There is no textual basis for different treatment in chapter 7 cases, and section 503(b)'s applicability in chapters 7 and 11 suggests that the rule should be the same. In chapter 11, the need to guard against a non-disinterested debtor in possession's refusal to an action does not apply to an independent chapter 7 trustee. However, other reasons equally support derivative standing in chapter 7, including the frequent absence of funds for the trustee to pursue an action. Therefore, the court may grant derivative standing to the creditor in this chapter 7 case. Hyundai Translead, Inc. v. Jackson Truck & Trailer Repair, Inc. (In re Trailer Source, Inc.), 555 F.3d 231 (6th Cir. 2009).
- 13.2.jjj Order approving counsel's fee application does not always bar a later action for malpractice. The debtor confirmed a plan. The confirmation order provided a bar date for executory contract rejection claims. Debtor's counsel failed to give notice of the bar date to an employee who had an employment contract. The reorganized debtor terminated the employee shortly after confirmation but before the bar date. The employee asserted a severance claim and sued the reorganized debtor after confirmation but did not file an administrative claim. Separately, debtor's counsel sought final allowance of its fees. The court held the fee hearing after the employee's termination but before the employee sued the reorganized debtor. Debtor's counsel continued to represent the reorganized debtor for another nine months. The bankruptcy court later held that the employee stated a claim for breach of her employment agreement because of the lack of notice of the bar date. The reorganized debtor then sued its former counsel for malpractice. Res judicata bars a later action if a prior decision was a final judgment on the merits, the parties were the same, the prior court had jurisdiction and the causes of action were the same. A malpractice claim, however, remains viable unless the a party could and should have brought it in the prior case. Here, at the time of the fee application hearing, counsel continued to represent the reorganized debtor, and the employee had not yet brought her action. Therefore, the reorganized debtor did not have a full and fair opportunity to raise the malpractice claim at the fee application hearing. The fee application hearing therefore does not bar the reorganized debtor's malpractice action. Penthouse Media Group, Inc. v. Pachulski Stang Ziehl & Jones LLP, 406 B.R. 453 (S.D.N.Y. 2009).

13.2.kkk Section 526(a)(4), narrowly construed, and section 527(b) are constitutional. An attorney challenged the constitutionality under the First Amendment of sections 526(a)(4) and 527(b). Section 526(a)(4) prohibits a “debt relief agency” from advising “an assisted person ... to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title”. A “debt relief agency” is “any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person” for valuable consideration. “Bankruptcy assistance” is any services “provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, [or] counsel ... or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title”. Although the “debt relief agency” definition excludes five categories of persons and institutions, it does not expressly exclude attorneys. Under the plain meaning rule, therefore, “debt relief agency” may include an attorney. The doctrine of constitutional avoidance requires a court to construe a statute to avoid any constitutional question. Broadly construed, section 526(a)(4)'s prohibition on advice to incur debt in contemplation of bankruptcy might raise constitutional questions, because it would prohibit even legitimate advice to incur debt before bankruptcy. However, Congress may restrict speech to prevent abusive behavior. Section 526(a)(4) may be narrowly construed to avoid the constitutional question. The section prohibits advice to incur debt “in contemplation of” bankruptcy. “In contemplation of” often suggests an abuse of the bankruptcy system. Therefore, section 526(a)(4) should be construed to prohibit advice only “to incur debt in contemplation of bankruptcy when doing so would be an abuse or improper manipulation of the bankruptcy system”. Section 527(b) requires a debt relief agency to provide a statement to an assisted person outlining certain information about bankruptcy. Although the First Amendment protects against compelled speech, a statute may require speech under certain circumstances. Here, the government's interest is compelling, because of the large amount of debt discharged in bankruptcy each year. The statement section 527(b) requires is general and therefore may be inaccurate as to applied in certain circumstances. However, section 527(a) does not prohibit the debt relief agency from adding to the statement to explain why the general statement might or might not apply in particular cases. Therefore, the statute does not violate the First Amendment. Hersh v. U.S. ex re. Mukasey, 553 F.3d 743 (5th Cir. 2008).

13.2.iii Court upholds contingent fee award under section 328. The estate employed an attorney on a contingent fee basis. The application for employment sought approval under sections 327 and 328, and the order approving the employment provided for employment in accordance with the terms of the contingent fee engagement agreement. The order approving the attorney's employment did not specifically reference section 328. The litigation became long and protracted. The debtor in possession's and the committee's positions on settlement diverged substantially, the attorney took instructions from the debtor in possession rather than the creditors, the litigation was unusually prolonged and the attorney was an obstacle to the committee's settlement. The committee negotiated a settlement, which the Court of Appeals overturned based on the attorney's appeal. After exclusivity ended, the committee filed a plan that incorporated a larger proposed settlement amount. The attorney sought fees based on that amount. Whether an employment order pre-approves a fee arrangement or makes the final fee subject to reasonableness review under section 330 “depends on the totality of the circumstances, including whether the professional's application, or the court's order, referenced section 328(a), and whether the court evaluated the propriety of the fee arrangement before granting final, and not merely preliminary, approval.” Here, the judge’s comments on approval of the employment and the reference in the application to section 328 made clear that the court pre-approved the fee arrangement under section 328(a). The court could therefore reduce fees only based on circumstances that could not have been anticipated, not on circumstances that simply were not anticipated. Here, divergence of positions between the debtor in possession and its creditors and the attorney’s following the debtor in possession’s instructions can be anticipated in any chapter 11 case. The length of the litigation was a result of the court’s stay and the appeal, which was successful, all of which were capable of being anticipated at the outset. Therefore, the court allows the attorney’s fees in full. Riker, Danzig, Schere, Hyland & Perretti LLP v. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Smart World Techs., LLC), 552 F.3d 228 (2d Cir. 2009).

13.2.mmm BAPCPA’s restriction on attorney advice is unconstitutional on its face; its advertising requirement is unconstitutional in part, as applied. The Connecticut Bar Association challenged the constitutionality of sections 526(a)(4), 527 and 528(a) and 528(b)(2), which BAPCPA added to the Bankruptcy Code in 2005. Section 526(a)(4) prohibits a “debt relief agency” from advising “an assisted person ... to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title”. A “debt relief agency” is “any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person” for valuable consideration. “Bankruptcy assistance” is any services “provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, [or] counsel ... or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under” the Bankruptcy Code. Although the “debt relief agency” definition excludes five categories of persons and institutions, it does not expressly exclude attorneys. Under the plain meaning rule, therefore, “debt relief agency” may include an attorney. A “strict scrutiny” test requires speech restrictions to be narrowly tailored to promote a compelling governmental interest; the “balancing test” balances First Amendment rights against the government’s legitimate regulatory interest; both tests require that restrictions be narrow. Under either test, the advice restriction is not sufficiently narrow and necessary to further legitimate governmental interests, because it prohibits attorneys from advising even prudent and legal conduct. The government argues that the provision should be interpreted narrowly to prohibit only advice that would lead to abuse of the bankruptcy law, but the statute does not contain any such restriction. It is therefore overbroad and unconstitutional on its face. Section 527 requires disclosure to a client in an engagement agreement of specified “facts”, including statements with which the Bar Association does not agree. Requiring the disclosure is permissible regulation of professional services because the contents “are reasonably related to a government objective and not unduly burdensome” and are subject to further explanation by the attorney to the extent the attorney disagrees. Sections 528(a)(3), (a)(4) and (b)(2) require a debt relief agency’s advertisements of bankruptcy or debt relief services to contain, “We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy” or a substantially similar statement. A statute may require advertising disclosure if the requirement is reasonably related to preventing consumer deception and not unjustified or unduly burdensome. The “debt relief agency” definition includes attorneys who provide services to non-debtor consumers, such as consumer creditors, landlords and non-debtor spouses and ex-spouses. As applied to these attorneys, the required disclosure is false and therefore not reasonably related to the government’s interest in preventing deception. Therefore, the requirement is unconstitutional as applied to debt relief agencies who do not help people file for bankruptcy. Conn. Bas Assoc. v. United States, 394 B.R. 274 (D. Conn. 2008).

13.2.nnn BAPCPA restriction on attorney advice is unconstitutional; advertising requirement is constitutional. An attorney, her law firm and her clients challenged the constitutionality under the First Amendment of sections 526(a)(4) and 528(a) and 528(b)(2), which BAPCPA added to the Bankruptcy Code in 2005. Section 526(a)(4) prohibits a “debt relief agency” from advising “an assisted person ... to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title”. A “debt relief agency” is “any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person” for valuable consideration. “Bankruptcy assistance” is any services “provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, [or] counsel ... or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title”. Although the “debt relief agency” definition excludes five categories of persons and institutions, it does not expressly exclude attorneys. Under the plain meaning rule, therefore, “debt relief agency” may include an attorney. If the court imposes strict constitutional scrutiny on the statute, “the government has the burden to prove that the constraints are supported by a compelling governmental interest and are narrowly tailored”. If the restrictions are merely ethical regulation, then the court may invoke a more lenient standard under which it balances an attorney’s First Amendment rights against the government’s legitimate interest in regulating the activity. Although the government argues that the provision should be interpreted narrowly to prohibit only advice that would lead to abuse of the bankruptcy law, the statute does not contain any such restriction. Because its prohibition is broad, covering even legitimate advice and legal activities, the statute violates both the strict scrutiny and more lenient standards and is unconstitutionally overbroad on its face. Section 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) require a debt relief agency’s advertisements of bankruptcy or debt relief services to contain, “We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy” or a substantially similar statement. A statute may require speech if the requirement is reasonably related to preventing consumer deception or if not related to potentially deceptive advertising, under an intermediate standard that requires the government to show a substantial interest to be achieved by the restrictions that cannot be served by a more limited restriction. The requirement here is designed to prevent deception and so receives “reasonably related” review. The disclosure requirement is directed at ensuring that debt relief agencies’ advertisements disclose that their services involve bankruptcy, which is reasonably related to Congress’s purpose and factually correct, and does not prevent the agencies from disclosing additional information about their services or that they are attorneys as well as debt relief agencies. Therefore, the requirement is constitutional. Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. U.S., 541 F.3d 785 (8th Cir. 2008).

13.2.ooo Court upholds contingency fee award under section 328. The estate employed an attorney on a contingency fee basis. The order approving the employment provided for employment in accordance with the terms of the engagement agreement. The litigation became long and protracted and generated substantial acrimony and animosity between the debtor in possession and its attorney on the one hand and the creditors committee on the other, which the committee attributed to the debtor in possession’s breach of fiduciary duty in seeking a risky higher recovery in the litigation rather than a certain settlement. After exclusivity ended, the committee filed a plan that incorporated its proposed settlement amount. The attorney sought fees based on that amount. The order approving the attorney’s employment did not specifically reference section 328 but was sufficiently clear that employment was approved on a pre-determined contingency basis rather than a reasonableness standard under section 330. The court could therefore reduce fees only based on circumstances that could not have been anticipated, not on circumstances that simply were not anticipated. Here, acrimony between the debtor in possession and its creditors is anticipatable in any chapter 11 case, as is the attorney’s taking direction from its client the debtor in possession. Finally, the court did not find any breach of fiduciary duty. Therefore, the firm was entitled to its full contingent fee. Riker, Danzig, Schere, Hyland & Perretti LLP v. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Smart World Techs., LLC), 383 B.R. 868 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

13.2.ppp Section 504 fee sharing prohibition applies to a sale of a contingent interest in a contingent fee. The estate hired a law firm on a contingent fee basis to prosecute an action. The estate obtained a substantial judgment at trial, which would entitle the law firm to a substantial fee. The defendant appealed. While the appeal was pending, the law firm requested court approval to enter into a “hedge” transaction with a financial institution, under which the financial institution would pay the law firm an undisclosed amount and the law firm would pay the financial institution the first $10 million in fees (if any) it received after conclusion of all appeals. The agreement would take effect, and money would change hands, only after the bankruptcy court awarded the law firm fees. To prevent the financial institution from exercising influence over the case, it agreed not to object to any proposed settlement of the underlying action. The agreement violates section 504, under which a professional receiving compensation from the estate “may not share or agree to share ... any such compensation ... with any other person”. Section 504’s purpose is to prevent referral fees and other sharing that removes bankruptcy court control over fees or that undermines the bankruptcy proceeding’s integrity. This agreement does none of that but nevertheless qualifies within the literal meaning of “share” and so is prohibited. In re Winstar Comm’ns, Inc., 378 B.R. 756 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007).

13.2.qqq Attorneys are entitled to fees for a successful appeal from denial of fees for filing an involuntary petition. The attorneys successfully represented the petitioning creditors in an involuntary petition and sought fees under section 503(b)(4). The bankruptcy court denied the request. The B.A.P. reversed. Section 503(b)(4) uses the same standard for awarding attorney’s fees as section 330(a)(1), “reasonable compensation for professional services ... based on the time, the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, and the cost of comparable services other than in a case under this title”. Although section 503(b)(4) is silent on allowance of fees for preparing and prosecuting a fee application, denial would dilute an attorney’s fee recovery. Therefore, such fees are allowable, as long as the services for which the fees are sought satisfy the requirements of section 503(b)(4), and the case “exemplifies a ‘set of circumstances’ where the time and expense incurred by the litigation is ‘necessary’”, just as under section 330(a). Here, the creditors’ attorney’s fees for the appeal meet these requirements, because the underlying services are compensable, and the appeal was necessary to correct the bankruptcy court’s and then the B.A.P.’s error in denying fees at the two different stages. N. Sports, Inc. v. Knupfer (In re Wind N’ Wave), 509 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2007).

13.2.rrr Court disqualifies law firm for failure to disclose a claim under an opinion letter. The debtor’s law firm represented the company for many years before the chapter 11 case. During its representation, it had issued an opinion letter to bondholders that the bonds were enforceable in accordance with their terms. Although the law firm disclosed its prior representation of the debtor, it did not disclose the “connection” with the bondholders arising from the opinion letter. During the case, the law firm, on behalf of the debtor in possession, challenged the allowability of the claims under the bonds. The bondholders asserted an indemnification claim against the law firm under the opinion letter. The law firm promptly turned the allowability litigation over to counsel for the committee, which the bondholders controlled, but neither the law firm nor committee counsel disclosed the connection nor the litigation transfer until six months later, after litigation over the disclosure statement brought all the facts to light. The nondisclosure requires disqualification of the law firm, as its motives would remain suspect if its role were simply limited. However, the best interest of creditors requires the appointment of a trustee to restore creditor confidence in the system and to eliminate any lingering taint from the law firm’s role. The court also criticizes committee counsel for its role, raising questions over whether counsel can adequately examine the bondholders’ claims when they control the committee, and suggests that committee counsel may be motivated by a desire to protect its referral sources in a manner reminiscent of the “‘opprobrious’ bankruptcy ring and the cronyism that Congress decried in ... 1978.” The court similarly criticizes bondholder counsel, who actively participated, to the exclusion of committee counsel, in the settlement of litigation in a manner that would advantage the bondholders under their subordination clause at the expense of other unsecured creditors, who never appeared in court until the disclosure dispute arose, and “During the four years of this case, ... operated in the shadows.” In re SONICblue Inc., 2007 WL 926871 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. Mar. 26, 2007).

13.2.sss Law firm is not liable for failing to give business advice. The trustee sued directors, officers, and lawyers for breaches of fiduciary duty and deepening insolvency, among other things, based on the debtor’s cozy relationship with its principal lender and the directors’ and officers' self-dealing. He alleged that the law firm defendants committed malpractice, because they knew or should have known that numerous transactions on which they gave advice would have deepened the debtor's insolvency, that directors breached their fiduciary duty by approving the increased debt, and that the law firm failed to advise the debtor of the effects of the increased debt. A law firm owes no duty to provide business advice and is not responsible for its client's business decisions. It does, however, owe an obligation to inform a client of a breach of fiduciary duty. Because acquisition of additional debt or deepening insolvency is not by itself a tort or a breach of fiduciary duty, the law firm did not commit malpractice by approving the transactions and issuing opinion letters without advising its client of the effects of the increased debt. Moreover, the law firm did not have an obligation to verify the factual assumptions in the opinions. By stating that the facts are assumed, the law firm gives adequate notice that it is not vouching for their accuracy. However, if the law firm certifies to the accuracy of certain facts (or states it has no reason to know that they are not accurate), then the client may rely on them and has a claim against the law firm if they were not accurate. Alberts v. Tuft (In re Southeast Cmty. Hosp. Corp.), 353 B.R. 324 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2006).

13.2.ttt Court denies bonuses to counsel in solvent case. The plan resulted in payment of all creditors in full and a substantial return to equity. Counsel for the debtors in possession and committees sought bonuses. To merit a bonus, not only must the result be excellent, but counsel must provide exceptional efficiency and must guide its client in the exercise of the client's fiduciary duties. In addition, where counsel with a lower hourly rate provides services of comparable quality to counsel with a higher hourly rate, enhancement is more justifiable. Here, counsel did not provide services efficiently (as evidenced in part by the number of non-participating attorneys present in court at hearings and the presence of more than one law firm per client at most hearings) and did not counsel its client adequately in pursuing its fiduciary responsibilities in the chapter 11 case. Counsel should not be penalized for following its client's instructions, but it should not be rewarded for overplaying its hand or pursuing overly aggressive positions. The court therefore denies the bonuses. In re Mirant Corp., 354 B.R. 113 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006).

13.2.uuu Plan exculpation provision does not violate state bar rules. The plan provided an injunction against any action against the debtors, the committee, the principal lender, the indenture trustee, and any of their directors, officers, employees, and professionals and limited their liability for any matters related to the chapter 11 case or the plan process except for acts or omissions resulting from fraud, gross negligence, or willful misconduct. State bar rules prohibit an attorney from prospectively limiting liability to a client for malpractice and prohibit an attorney from settling a liability claim before advising the client to consider seeking independent advice. The plan exculpation provision does not violate the state bar rules, because it exculpates only for past acts, not prospectively, and does not involve a settlement of any claim. In re Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., 356 B.R. 239 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2006).

13.2.vvv Lamie prohibits use of trust account security retainer to pay postpetition fees. Debtor's counsel received a $5,000 retainer, which it deposited in its trust account before the petition. As of the date of the filing of the petition, $2,600 remained in the trust account. Counsel acknowledged that the trust account funds were property of the estate but claimed a lien on the funds to secure payment for his postpetition services to the debtor. The court denies his claim. State law recognizes the lien, but United States v. Lamie, 540 U.S. 526 (2004), permits payment for postpetition services only from a flat fee retainer, not from a retainer in which counsel has only a security interest, because the security retainer remains property of the estate. Although state law recognizes the lien, section 330 prohibits payment and preempts state law. In re Hill, 355 B.R. 261 (Bankr. D. Or. 2006). Accord, Redmond v. Lentz & Clark, P.A. (In re Wagers), 355 B.R. 268 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2006), aff'd 514 F.3d 1021 (10th Cir. 2007).

13.2.www Fees for a dismissed case are unenforceable without court approval. The attorney represented the debtor and debtor in possession in a chapter 11 case that was dismissed. After dismissal, the debtor signed a promissory note to the attorney for the unpaid fees incurred during the case. The court did not approve the post-dismissal debtor's agreement to pay. In a subsequent bankruptcy, the trustee sued to recover a fraudulent transfer. Whether the debtor was insolvent at the time of the transfer depended on the enforceability of the note. Section 330 requires approval of fees, and section 329 permits a court to consider and order disgorgement of fees paid outside of bankruptcy, even by a third party. Approval of fees is a core proceeding and is part of the bankruptcy case. The court therefore retains jurisdiction to approve fees even after a case is dismissed. Neither dismissal nor a private agreement abrogates the court's exclusive authority to review fees. Because the court in the first case did not approve the fees, the note is unenforceable. Dery v. Cumberland Cas. & Sur. Co. (In re 5900 Ass'ns, Inc.), 468 F.3d 326 (6th Cir. 2006).

13.2.xxx Services rendered after conversion from chapter 11 to chapter 7 are not compensable from a security retainer. Counsel had been retained with approval of the court to represent the debtor and debtor in possession. It performed services for the debtor in connection with but after the conversion, including handling a motion to amend the case caption upon the debtor's name change, the conversion motion itself, attendance at the 341 meeting after conversion to chapter 7, consultation with the chapter 7 trustee about transition, and final fee application preparation. Counsel received a prepetition retainer that had not been fully applied when the debtor's chapter 11 case converted to chapter 7. None of the retainer could be applied to the post-conversion services. In a narrow reading of Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526 (2004), the court concludes that the representation of the debtor in possession terminates upon the conversion to chapter 7, that chapter 11-related services rendered after conversion are not authorized by counsel's employment order after conversion, and that the Supreme Court's mention of a prepetition retainer to compensate counsel for necessary services to a chapter 7 debtor refers only to a fixed fee retainer, not a security retainer. Once the case converts, a security retainer becomes property of the estate, and any state law lien on the retainer in favor of the attorney is superseded by the Bankruptcy Code as interpreted by Lamie. Morse v. Ropes & Gray, LLP (In re CK Liquidation Corp.), 343 B.R. 376 (D. Mass. 2006).

13.2.yyy Final fees awarded after plan confirmation need not be disgorged after conversion. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan. The court awarded and the reorganized debtor paid its counsel final compensation for its chapter 11 work. Eighteen months after confirmation, the debtor failed, and its chapter 11 case converted to chapter 7. The trustee sought disgorgement of counsel's fees to equalize distributions of chapter 11 administrative expenses under section 726(a)(1). However, section 105(a) does not provide roving authority to fill a gap in section 726(a), which does not provide for recovery of chapter 11 payments. Section 549 authorizes recovery of postpetition transfers, but only if not authorized by the Code or the court. Interim compensation paid to professionals may differ from payment of other, authorized administrative expenses, because section 331 requires disgorgement of interim compensation to the extent it exceeds the final award. Absent that, however, the court does not have a statutory basis to order disgorgement. Because the fees here were awarded as final compensation, they need not be disgorged. In re St. Joseph Cleaners, Inc., 346 B.R. 430 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2006).

13.2.zzz Vermont bankruptcy court specifies detailed standards for allowance of fees and expenses. Under In re S.T.N. Enters., Inc., 70 B.R. 823 (Bankr. D. Vt. 1987), the Vermont bankruptcy court had limited compensation to hourly rates charged in the community. The court overrules the S.T.N. decision but imposes detailed requirements for allowance of compensation and reimbursement of expenses, based on the requirements of section 330. The professional must "conscientiously set forth the hours expended on each task and the nature of the services rendered at a level of specificity that would allow the Court to evaluate the application." The application must “clearly identify each discrete task billed to the estate” and “include a specific analysis of each task for which compensation is sought.” For “meetings and conferences among multiple professionals, ... the professional must demonstrate the benefit [to] the estate and document consistent amounts of time by all participants ... or set forth an explanation for any differential.” Otherwise, “the question is raised as to whether the compensation requested by any of the meeting participants is reasonable.” Time charged for review and response to email must “identify the participants, describe the substance of the communication, explain its outcome and justify its necessity.” Non-working travel time may be billed at only 50% of hourly rates. Reimbursement for out-of-town meals is permitted only if the applicant shows “there were no other reasonable alternative available that would have been less expensive.” Computer-assisted legal research costs are reimbursable if “the applicant: (1) demonstrates that the use charges incurred were reasonable and necessary (which necessarily includes a description of the research topic and the length of time spent on each topic); ... and (3) certifies the invoiced cost from the vendor.” Although the court awards compensation for reasonable time preparing fee applications, it does not indicate whether and to what extent the record keeping requirements imposed by the opinion would be compensable in situations where they exceed the time spent on the substantive task. In re Fibermark, Inc., 349 B.R. 385 (Bankr. D. Vt. 2006).

13.2.aaaa Bankruptcy law does not limit postpetition attorney’s fees on an unsecured claim in a solvent case. The bankruptcy court awarded an unsecured creditor attorney’s fees only for enforcing the debt contract itself and disallowed fees for the creditor’s bankruptcy case participation. It reasoned that section 506(b), which denies postpetition fees to an undersecured creditor, implies that an unsecured creditor is not entitled to such fees. However, section 506(b) does not limit postpetition interest on undersecured or unsecured claims when the debtor is solvent. By analogy, it does not deny fees in a solvent case. The contract terms and applicable nonbankruptcy law determine the extent to which the creditor may collect fees. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Dow Corning Corp. (In re Dow Corning Corp.), 456 F.3d 668 (6th Cir. 2006).

13.2.bbbb Unsecured creditor’s postpetition attorney’s fees are not allowable. The indenture required the debtor to pay the indenture trustee’s attorney’s fees. The indenture trustee filed a proof of claim for fees incurred postpetition, arguing that its statutorily imposed fiduciary duty to bondholders supports allowance. The court disallows the fees, unpersuaded that the claim for attorney’s fees incurred after bankruptcy are contingent, unliquidated claims as of the petition date. If they were, then every unsecured creditor with an attorney’s fees clause in a contract would be able to continue to incur fees, effectively at the expense of the estate, for continued monitoring of the case and for defending its claim. A bar date would not be effective, because the claims amount would keep increasing, and those creditors with an attorney’s fees clause would receive better treatment in the case than those without. Section 506(b) does not require a different result. By expressly authorizing postpetition fees for an oversecured creditor, it should be read to imply disallowance of postpetition fees for all other creditors. Global Indus. Techs., Inc. v. J.P. Morgan Trust Co., N.A. (In re Global Indus. Techs., Inc.), 344 B.R. 382 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2006).

13.2.cccc Fees and costs are not allowable pre-BAPCPA on a statutory lien claim. The creditor performed work on the debtor’s oil well under an agreement that did not provide a security interest to secure payment of the work’s cost. When the debtor failed to pay, the creditor obtained a lien on the well under the state’s statutory materialmen’s lien law. Section 506(b) provides, “To the extent that an allowed secured claim is [oversecured], there shall be allowed to the holder of such claim ... any reasonable fees, costs, or charges provided under the agreement [or State statute] under which such claim arose.” (BAPCPA added the bracketed language.) Although the creditor’s claim arose under an agreement, the lien did not; it arose under the state statute. The court reads “such claim” narrowly to refer to the “allowed secured” portion of the phrase, rather than just the “claim” alone. Therefore, the lien did not arise “under the agreement,” and the fees were not allowable. The result would differ under BAPCPA. Bridgeport Tank Trucks v. Lien Agent (In re EnRe LP), 457 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2006).

13.2.dddd Security retainer does not disqualify counsel and is not subject to disgorgement.

The debtor’s chapter 11 counsel took a prepetition retainer, which it applied (with court permission) to its chapter 11 fees and expenses. After the case converted to chapter 7, the court ordered counsel to disgorge the retainer to permit pro rata distribution among chapter 11 administrative claims. The B.A.P. reverses. A security retainer provides a security interest to counsel to secure postpetition fees. It does not render counsel disinterested, however, because it does not make counsel a creditor, which is defined as an entity holding a prepetition claim. If the retainer secures only postpetition fees, then counsel is not a “creditor.” The priority scheme of section 726(a) and case law permitting disgorgement under that section apply only to the unencumbered assets of the estate and to unsecured claims. Disgorgement is not permitted here, because the retainer is counsel’s collateral, and counsel’s claim is secured. A dissent argues that security retainers are never permitted, because they defeat the pro rata distribution principle among administrative claims. Rus, Miliband & Smith, APC v. Yoo (In re Dick Cepek, Inc.), 339 B.R. 730 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2006).

13.2.eeee Counsel for second lien creditor disqualified from representing first lien creditors.

The law firm advised a creditor who held both first and second lien bonds about the relative rights of the liens. The creditor terminated the engagement shortly after the debtor filed bankruptcy. A committee of first lien creditors, not including the former client, retained the law firm to advise and represent it in protecting the position of the first lien holders against the second lien holders. On the former client’s motion, the law firm is disqualified from representing the first lien holders. The matters are substantially related under Model Rule 1.9(a), because the subject of the first representation was the debtor’s prepetition debt structure. By representing the creditor in that matter, the law firm gained confidential information about the debtor’s debt and Stanfield’s position, which could benefit the first lien holders if the representation continues. The law firm could continue to represent the first lien holders only with the informed written consent of the former client, which it did not have. In re Meridian Auto. Systems-Composite Operations, Inc., 340 B.R. 740 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006).

13.2.ffff Court allows fees for defending fee application. The liquidating trustee sought an across-the-board 7% fee reduction from the professionals in the case. When one law firm refused, the trustee filed an objection to its fees. The bankruptcy court awarded the firm 95% of the fees claimed and 86% of the fees to which the trustee objected. The fees incurred for defending the fee application were allowable, consistent with the policy that professionals in bankruptcy cases should receive compensation comparable to those outside. The absence of benefit to the estate here does not require that the fees be disallowed. Otherwise, parties would have an unhealthy incentive to object to fees because requiring the professional to bear the cost of the objection would be no different from cutting the fees. Hennigan, Bennett & Dorman LLP v. Goldin Assocs. L.L.C. (In re Worldwide Direct Inc.), 334 B.R. 108 (D. Del. 2005).

13.2.gggg Attorney need not segregate “advance payment retainer.” The chapter 13 attorney took a prepetition fee from his debtor client, which he characterizes as payment for preparation of the chapter 13 petition and which the client forfeits if the client determines not to file the case. Such a retainer is an “advance payment retained” under Texas law, which is a flat fee paid for services to be rendered that passes to counsel upon payment, with the client retaining no interest. It differs from a “classic retainer,” which is a payment in consideration for counsel’s employment rather than services rendered, and from a “security retainer,” which merely secures payment of the attorney’s fees once services are rendered. Despite a local bankruptcy rule requiring that prepetition advance payment retainers be placed in the attorney’s client trust account and not drawn without court approval, counsel is not required to do so, because the property is not property of the debtor upon filing and does not become property of the estate. In a footnote, the court suggests that such a rule is not generally followed in chapter 11 cases and if it were, it might deprive many chapter 11 debtors of competent counsel. Disclosure and reasonableness, both required under section 329, provide an adequate policing device. In re Barron, 432 F.3d 590 (5th Cir. 2005).

- 13.2.hhhh Debtor in possession may hire counsel to represent employees in connection with an investigation. Because the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's office started an intense investigation of the debtor shortly after the bankruptcy filing, the debtor in possession retained one law firm to represent all the employees who were to be interviewed or required to produce documents. The firm would not continue to represent any employee who later became a target of the investigation. Section 363(b) authorizes the retention. Even though section 327 touches on employment of attorneys at the expense of the estate, it addresses representation of the estate, not third parties, such as employees. The fact that another section touches a subject does not exclude the use of section 363(b) to authorize the transaction. Here, the debtor in possession showed good business judgment in retaining the law firm, because it reassured employees who were being interrogated and thereby facilitated the production of information and helped retain the employees for the chapter 11 case, and it reduced cost by concentrating the effort in a single law firm, who could coordinate all investigations, among other reasons. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Enron Corp. (In re Enron Corp.), 335 B.R. 22 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).
- 13.2.iiiii Undisclosed interest in potential purchaser requires fee disallowance. The debtor in possession's section 327(e) counsel was actively involved in representing the DIP in negotiations to sell the debtor's business, including supporting the DIP's preference for a particular buyer, which the debtor's CEO had created, and litigating against and threatening other potential buyers. When counsel applied for compensation at the end of the case, it was discovered that counsel was negotiating with the CEO-sponsored buyer to provide it financing to complete the sale. The negotiations were ultimately unsuccessful, so the CEO-sponsored buyer withdrew its offer, and the DIP supported the sale to an unaffiliated third party. Section 327(e) does not permit special counsel to hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, which counsel did by supporting the buyer financially. In addition, Rule 2014 requires disclosure of the connection, even though it arose after counsel was first retained. Therefore, denial of compensation was mandatory. I.G. Petroleum, L.L.C. v. Fenasci (In re West Delta Oil Co.), 432 F.3d 347 (5th Cir. 2005).
- 13.2.jjjj Court interprets section 327(e) narrowly and includes firm's prepetition conduct in the analysis. The debtor's prepackaged chapter 11 plan was to be funded by recoveries from claims against insurers related to asbestos liabilities. The debtor employed an insurance coverage law firm as special insurance counsel to provide strategic advice on insurance issues related activities, including pursuing claims against the insurers. The firm participated extensively in the prepetition plan negotiation and formulation. The firm frequently served as co-counsel with asbestos plaintiffs firms in other asbestos cases, representing large numbers of asbestos claimants, many of whom also had claims against this debtor. Finally, the firm owned a 70% interest in an asbestos claims screening firm, which would process and review claims against the debtor in this case. The insurers, even though not creditors in the chapter 11 case, had standing to raise the conflict issue, based on the duty of bar members to police the profession. The New Jersey Rules of Professional Conduct prohibit the law firm from representing the debtor without the informed written consent of its claimant clients, which it did not have. In addition, the firm may not be employed as special counsel under section 327(e). Whatever its postpetition role, the court should look at the firm's entire involvement before and during a prepackaged case, because the important work in a prepackaged case occurs before the filing, and the protections that section 327(a) imposes are equally important then to the integrity of the bankruptcy process. Therefore, the firm could not be employed under section 327(e); its work was too central to the entire case and the plan. It could not be employed under section 327(a) either, because it was not disinterested. Its involvement as co-counsel to plaintiffs asbestos firms and its ownership of the claims processing firm prevented it from being completely loyal to the debtor. Century Indem. Co. v. Congoleum Corp. (In re Congoleum Corp.), 426 F.3d 675 (3d Cir. 2005).

13.2.kkkk Nondisclosure of representation of creditors in unrelated matters results in fee disgorgement. After the chapter 11 case was filed and counsel filed its disclosure statement under Rule 2014, counsel became aware of the claims of two major creditors, which counsel represented in unrelated matters. Counsel represented the estate in pursuing claims against the first creditor for four months before disclosing the connection and handing the matter over to the committee to pursue. The disclosure came too late. The late disclosure required the estate to incur additional fees in the matter's transition to committee counsel. Counsel objected to the second creditor's claim and litigated its motion to compel assumption of its lease without disclosure of the connection, through "an inadvertent oversight." Nevertheless, there was an actual conflict. The court orders counsel to disgorge all fees received for the work related to those two creditors. In re eToys, Inc., 331 B.R. 176 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).

13.2.llll Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction over post-confirmation committee, liquidating trustee and their professionals. The confirmed plan provided for a Plan Administrator to administer the remaining estate assets and a Post-Effective Date Committee. The Administrator had been the debtor in possession's chief executive officer. As Administrator, he retained the debtor's counsel. The plan provided that the Administrator could retain and compensate professionals without court approval. The court's post-confirmation jurisdiction is limited and does not extend to the issue of replacement of professionals for a plan administrator or a post-confirmation committee because it does not have such a significant impact on the estate to be "related to" the bankruptcy case. In re eToys, Inc., 331 B.R. 176 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).

13.2.mmmm Attorney may be employed under section 327(e) even for core functions of chapter 11. The debtor's law firm had represented the creditors committee in the debtor's prior chapter 11 case and was therefore not disinterested and was disqualified for employment under section 327(a). Nevertheless, the court could approve the law firm's employment under section 327(e) for the purposes of negotiating and implementing a cash collateral agreement with the lender, conducting the debtor's "going out of business" asset sale, and negotiating a key employee retention plan. Although these functions were central to the conduct of the chapter 11 case, they did not constitute "represent[ing] the trustee in conducting the case," which section 327(e) prohibits special counsel from doing. The court does not, however, provide a definition of the quoted clause or a general test to determine whether it has been met. Stapleton v. Woodworkers Warehouse, Inc. (In re Woodworkers Warehouse, Inc.), 323 B.R. 403 (D. Del. 2005).

13.2.nnnn Attorney with unpaid prepetition bill, secured by a cash retainer, is not disinterested. The debtor's attorney took an adequate prepetition retainer to cover prepetition services and some postpetition services. He did not, however, withdraw funds from the retainer to pay for all outstanding amounts immediately before bankruptcy, but allowed the retainer to sit pending final fee applications in the case. The court strictly follows United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138 (3d Cir. 1994) (unsecured prepetition claim for nonbankruptcy services) and determines that the attorney's status as a secured creditor, despite the contrary In re Martin, 817 F.2d 175 (1st Cir. 1987) (secured claim for prepetition bankruptcy services), disqualifies the attorney from representing the debtor in possession. As a sanction, the court disallows the attorney's claim for prepetition services. In re Lackawanna Med. Group, P.C., 323 B.R. 626 (Bankr. M.D. Pa. 2005).

13.2.oooo Security retainer cannot be applied to a chapter 7 debtor's attorney's postpetition fees without court approval of the attorney's employment. The debtor's attorney took a prepetition retainer and placed it in his client trust account. Before bankruptcy, he drew a portion of the retainer, representing the billed amount but not including incurred but unbilled prepetition fees. He performed postpetition services as well. Upon his final application for fees in the case, he was entitled to apply the retainer to the unbilled prepetition fees. The retainer became property of the estate upon the filing, and the attorney retained a lien on it to secure the prepetition fees, which could be paid from the retainer. However, the retainer could not be used to pay for the attorney's postpetition services. Property of the estate may not be used to pay a debtor's attorney unless his employment has previously been approved by the court. Fiegen Law Firm, P.C. v. Fokkena (In re On-Line Servs. Ltd.), 324 B.R. 342 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2005).

13.2.pppp Liquidating chapter 11 corporation retains attorney-client relationship with former counsel. The debtor sold all its assets in its chapter 11 case and then confirmed a liquidating plan. The plan authorized the creditors committee to bring the estate's avoiding power actions on behalf of the debtor in possession. In one such action, the committee moved to disqualify defendants' counsel, who had previously represented the debtor on related matters. Because the beneficial owner of the actions was the same entity that counsel had previously represented, counsel was disqualified from representing the defendants in the avoiding power actions, even though the debtor had been completely liquidated, no longer had any business operations, and had changed its name. It was the same corporate entity and therefore retained the attorney-client relationship and privilege that underlie the conflicts rules. Post-Confirmation Committee v. The Feld Group (In re I Successor Corp.), 321 B.R. 640 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).

13.2.qqqq Use of company email does not necessarily waive personal attorney-client privilege. Before bankruptcy, individual officers of the debtor communicated over the company's email system with their personal attorneys. A trustee was appointed immediately upon the filing of the bankruptcy petition and ordered the officers not to return to their offices and to turn over their keys immediately to the trustee. The trustee later sued the officers on various causes of action and sought discovery, including copies of the individual emails between the officers and their personal attorneys. The fact that the emails were transmitted unencrypted over the company's email system did not per se waive any attorney-client privilege. However, if the company had an express policy denying confidentiality to email traffic on the company's system, the privilege would not apply. In re Asia Global Crossing, Ltd., 322 B.R. 247 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).

13.2.rrrr General partnership debtor in possession's lawyer may owe duty to pursue actions against debtor's general partners. Counsel for the general partnership chapter 11 debtor and debtor in possession also represented the partnership's two individual general partners. Before bankruptcy, counsel had assisted the general partners in transferring their assets to family limited partnerships, at least in part to shield their assets from creditors, but counsel did not disclose the representation in its employment application. The partnership's sole asset was real property that declined in value rapidly after the chapter 11 case was filed. After bankruptcy, counsel represented to the court that the property had declined in value, that the debtor could be reorganized without significant capital contributions from the general partners, and that the general partners were able to answer any necessary capital calls. Counsel did not conduct any investigation of the latter two representations, both of which counsel should have known, based on the nature of the debtor's assets and counsel's work in setting up the family limited partnerships, were false. Counsel was liable to the trustee for malpractice. Although the debtor in possession had ceased to exist, the cause of action belonged to the estate, not to the debtor in possession, and the chapter 7 trustee was the proper estate representative to bring the action. Counsel had a duty to the partnership debtor in possession, including the duty to maximize the value of the estate and the recovery of property for the estate. Counsel breached the duty by not rendering its services free of any conflict of interest — the simultaneous representation of a partnership and its general partners “almost invariably entails a plain conflict of interest” — and by not filing or threatening to file a contribution action against the general partners. The court comes close to imposing a duty on counsel for a debtor in possession to make decisions about whom to sue on behalf of the estate, thus transferring to counsel the apparent duty to act as the client, although the court may have suggested such a duty only in a case such as this, where a conflict of interest may have effectively prevented the debtor in possession from making the decision on its own. Bezanson v. Thomas, 402 F.3d 257 (1st Cir. 2005).

13.2.ssss Substantial contribution attorney's fees are allowable even if the creditor/client is not liable for them. In a prepackaged asbestos case, the claimants' attorney asserted a "substantial contribution" claim for fees under section 503(b)(4). The asbestos claimant clients were not liable to the attorney for any fees incurred. Section 503(b)(3)(D) grants administrative priority to expenses, other than attorney's fees, "incurred by ... (D) a creditor ... in making a substantial contribution" in the case. Section 503(b)(4) grants administrative priority to a claim for attorney's fees "of an entity whose expense is allowable under paragraph (3)" The court reads the latter provision as not requiring that the fees be incurred by the creditor and allows the fees against the estate. In re Western Asbestos Co., 318 B.R. 536 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2004).

13.2.tttt Disgorgement of professional fees is mandatory in an insolvent estate. Rejecting the decision of the Sixth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel in In re Unicast, 219 B.R. 741 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 1998), that disgorgement of professional fees is discretionary with the bankruptcy court, the Sixth Circuit rules that disgorgement is mandatory, at least where the trustee seeks disgorgement. In this case, a failed chapter 11 that was converted to a chapter 7, counsel for the debtor in possession had received a retainer and was awarded chapter 11 fees on a final fee application heard during the chapter 7 case. The Sixth Circuit nevertheless characterizes the fee award as interim compensation and notes that "retainers are held in trust," although the court does not say whether the retainer was paid before or after the petition. As the retainer is property of the estate, it is available to all administrative claimants. They are entitled to share equally, because section 726(b) provides that claimants at the same level of priority "shall" receive pro rata distribution. The court does not indicate whether a trustee is required to seek disgorgement, whether from professional fee claimants, ordinary administrative creditors, or both. Specker Motor Sales Co. v. Eisen, 393 F.3d 659 (6th Cir. 2005).

13.2.uuuu Rule 2019 permits court to order disclosure of referral and fee information. The bankruptcy court ordered attorneys for thousands of asbestos claimants to file statements under Rule 2019, disclosing the agreements with their clients and, more importantly, with their forwarding counsel, including all fee-sharing provisions in those agreements. The court had subject matter jurisdiction to do so, even though the agreements were among nondebtors, because the relationships may have a significant effect on the conduct of the case and the court's evaluation of the good faith and fairness of any plan. The order's scope, requiring disclosure of referral fee information, was permissible for the same reason. Rule 2019's purpose is to ensure openness and fairness in process and result, not simply to ensure that attorneys have the requisite authority to represent the clients they purport to represent. Finally, the court does not require that the information need be kept confidential. Baron & Budd, P.C. v. Unsecured Asbestos Claimants Comm., 321 B.R. 147 (D.N.J. 2005).

13.2.vvvv Allowed interim fees may be reviewed at any time. The bankruptcy court allowed interim fees in the full amount requested, but limited payment to 75%. At the end of the case, upon the final fee application, the court cut the fees substantially. The prior interim allowance does not restrict the court's authority to reduce the fees upon a final fee application, because interim fees are by their nature interlocutory and subject to review at any time. Leichty v. Neary (In re Strand), 375 F.3d 854 (9th Cir. 2004).

13.2.wwww Attorney is responsible for fees incurred. The trustee's attorney pursued an action against the IRS that foreseeably would have only minimal benefit to the estate. In the absence of any evidence that the client trustee had insisted on pursuing the action despite the attorney's contrary recommendation, the attorney is ultimately responsible, and it is not unfair to deny the attorney fees for an action that the client requested he pursue. If the attorney believes it should not be pursued, counsel should seek to withdraw or at least recommend that the client get a second opinion. Leichty v. Neary (In re Strand), 375 F.3d 854 (9th Cir. 2004).

13.2.xxxx Evergreen retainers permitted, with limits. The court permits an evergreen retainer, but limits interim compensation requests to once every 120 days, rather than once every 60 days as it would have permitted in the absence of the retainer, even in this mid-sized case. The court reasons that the evergreen retainer is a risk-minimizing device, just as interim compensation payments are. The debtor in possession should not be required to take on all of the risk of the reorganization; counsel should bear some of the risk too. In re Pan Am. Hosp. Corp., 312 B.R. 706 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2004).

13.2.yyyy Debtor's settlement of claims does not prevent attorney's fees for administering estate. The debtor made fraudulent transfers, which the chapter 7 trustee pursued. Before the claims went to trial, the debtor settled with all of its creditors, so that the fraudulent transfer recoveries would not have benefited them at all. The trustee still pursued the avoidance claims and trustee's counsel filed an application for the fees incurred in pursuing the action. The debtor objects, arguing that the avoidance would not be "for the benefit of the estate." The court awards the fees. It reasons that the estate is not synonymous with "unsecured creditors," that the estate encompasses other interests as well, such as administrative claimants. This was not a case where the trustee pursued the claims only to generate fees or where there would be no net benefit to the estate, because the unsecured claims had not been settled when the claims were brought, and the claims may have pressured the settlement. The debtor's settlement may not thwart the professionals' efforts to collect fees for their work to administer the estate. Stalaker v. DLC, Ltd., 376 F.3d 819 (8th Cir. 2004).

13.2.zzzz Court awards substantial contribution fees for proposing confirmed plan. The debtor, in a bitter dispute with two of its major creditors, did not file a plan. After exclusivity expired, they did, and it provided for waiver of their claims and full payment for all creditors. They sought substantial contribution fees under section 503(b)(3) and (4) over the debtor's objection. The court grants the fees. It notes the circuit split on whether a creditor's pursuit of its self-interest disqualifies it from receiving substantial contribution fees—the Third and the Tenth hold that it does; the Fifth and Eleventh hold that it does not—but does not reach the issue. It notes that there will rarely if ever be a case in which a creditor does not have at least some self-interest in the outcome, but in this case, the benefits to the estate outweighed the benefit to the creditors. Cellular 101, Inc. v. Channel Comm., Inc. (In re Cellular 101, Inc.), 377 F.3d 1092 (9th Cir. 2004).

13.2.aaaaa Prepetition retainer may be used to pay post-conversion chapter 7 fees. Debtor's counsel had taken a prepetition retainer. Its fees during the chapter 11 case were paid from a debtor in possession financing carve out. After conversion of the case to chapter 7, counsel incurred additional fees. Under Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526 (2004), debtor's counsel could not be compensated at the expense of the estate unless the bankruptcy court had approved its employment. But Lamie specifically permitted post-conversion fees to be paid from a prepetition retainer, which the bankruptcy judge permitted here. In re Channel Master Holdings, Inc., 309 B.R. 855 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004).

13.2.bbbbbb DIP financing carve out does not limit professional fees. Under the debtor in possession financing order, the court approved a carve out for professional fees, which was separately allocated to the debtor in possession's professionals and the committee's professionals. The committee's professionals incurred and requested compensation in excess of the carve out amount. The court had authority to allocate the total fees allowed under the carve out and had approved the financing with that limitation. In addition, the court has authority to order disgorgement of fees paid to some professionals so as to equalize the distribution to all professionals in an insolvent administration. In re Channel Master Holdings, Inc., 309 B.R. 855 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004).

13.2.ccccc Debtor's attorney denied fees in chapter 7. The 1994 amendment to section 330(a) deleted "or the debtor's attorney" from the lead-in to section 330(a) but left the word "attorney" in section 330(a)(1)(A) and in section 331. The courts of appeals had split over whether this created an ambiguity on the issue of whether the debtor's attorney could be compensated from the estate for services rendered in a chapter 7 case. The Supreme Court rules that the section cannot be found to be ambiguous based on the pre-amendment version. Rather, the plain language of the section as it currently exists must determine its meaning. Despite the provision's awkward and ungrammatical construction, the meaning as written is plain, and the internal inconsistency does not appear to arise from scrivener's error. Therefore, section 330(a) does not authorize payment from the estate of the debtor's attorney for services rendered in a chapter 7 case, unless the bankruptcy court has previously approved the attorney's employment in the chapter 7 case. Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526 (2004).

13.2.ddddd Non-disclosure of limitation in conflict waiver letter results in denial and disgorgement of fees. The debtor retained Perkins Coie to represent it in its chapter 11 case. The debtor's prepetition secured lender and DIP lender was a Wells Fargo affiliate. Wells Fargo was a client of Perkins Coie. Perkins obtained a conflict waiver which acknowledged a conflict of interest and provided a waiver, but prohibited Perkins from representing the debtor "in litigation directly adverse to Wells." Despite Perkins' statements under Rule 2014 that it would disclose all connections and update the court regularly on any new connections that it discovered, it did not disclose the limitation on its conflict waiver with Wells Fargo. When the limitation was disclosed after the business failed and litigation against Wells ensued, Perkins withdrew from representing the debtor in the litigation. Nevertheless, the court denied Perkins all fees and ordered disgorgement of all fees and expenses already paid (with minor exceptions). Rule 2014(a) requires complete disclosure. Perkins violated the rule by failing to disclose the litigation limitation on its conflict waiver. The court has discretion to deny fees in toto, which it did in this case. In re Jore Corp., 298 B.R. 703 (Bankr. D. Mont. 2003).

13.2.eeeee Debtor's counsel is disqualified because of bank representation. Sonnenschein, Nath & Rosenthal occasionally represented Bank of America, which accounted for less than 0.3% of Sonnenschein's annual revenues. It was retained by the debtor, whose principal secured creditor was Bank of America. In response to the debtor in possession's application to employ Sonnenschein, a creditor objected under section 327(c). Because the bank has been a Sonnenschein client for at least two years, the court concludes that Sonnenschein has a predisposition to bias in favor of the bank and is therefore not disinterested. The court is concerned that Sonnenschein would not be able to take an aggressive position on behalf of the estate against the principal secured creditor. In re Premier Farms, L.C., 305 B.R. 717 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 2003).

13.2.fffff Attorney client privilege limited. The individual debtor in a chapter 11 case communicated with one of her attorneys (whose employment had not been approved by the court) regarding the formation of a new corporation, which might have resulted in a transfer or dissipation of property of the estate. After the case was converted to chapter 7, the trustee sought information from the attorney for the debtor in possession regarding the new corporation. The trustee may waive the attorney-client privilege as to those communications. As the chapter 11 debtor in possession, the individual debtor was the representative of the estate and owed fiduciary duties to creditors and the estate. The chapter 7 trustee succeeded as the representative of the estate and therefore could waive the privilege, but only with respect to communications surrounding the formation of the corporation that occurred while the debtor served as chapter 11 debtor in possession. The trustee may also waive the privilege for communications regarding a malpractice claim against the attorney that the debtor listed as an asset of the estate on her schedules. In addition, because of section 329(a), all communications between the debtor and counsel, including prepetition communications, regarding retention and compensation are not privileged. In re Eddy, 304 B.R. 591 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2004).

- 13.2.ggggg Debtor's attorney's prepetition retainer is discharged. Before bankruptcy, the consumer debtor signed a retainer agreement with his lawyer, promising to pay the fee in installments beginning before bankruptcy and ending after bankruptcy. The debtor's discharge under section 727(b) discharges the fees. Section 329(b), which gives the bankruptcy court authority to determine the reasonableness of the promised fees, does not detract from the broad reach of the discharge. What is more, the retainer can not be divided into pre- and post-petition portions, permitting nondischargeability of the post-petition portion, because the retainer agreement itself did not provide either for such division or for hourly services, and the Bankruptcy Code treats the agreement as one claim. The court notes the split with the Ninth Circuit's decision in In re Biggar, 110 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 1997). Bethea v. Robert J. Adams & Assoc., 352 F.3d 1125 (7th Cir. 2003).
- 13.2.hhhhh Court allows evergreen retainer. Counsel for the debtor provided for an evergreen retainer, that is, a retainer that would be held as security for the payment of fees until the end of the case. Despite the presence in the case of additional risk minimizing devices, such as a carve-out and an interim compensation procedure, the court approves the evergreen retainer as reasonable under section 328. However, the court requires clear disclosure of an evergreen retainer, as well as a copy of the engagement agreement. In re Insilco Technologies, Inc., 291 B.R. 628 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003).
- 13.2.iiii Attorney's fees allowed in full despite unanticipated circumstances. The bankruptcy court approved employment of an attorney on a contingent fee. The attorney's success in obtaining judgment and collecting was far easier than anticipated, although the parties had argued at the time of approval that the case might not be difficult. The bankruptcy court reduced the attorney's fee. The Fifth Circuit reversed, holding that the language of section 328(a) permits the bankruptcy court to reduce allowed compensation only for circumstances that could not have been anticipated. In this case, the circumstances were not anticipated, but they could have been, so the lawyer should be allowed the entire fee as originally approved. Daniels v. Barron (In re Barron), 325 F.3d 690 (5th Cir. 2003).
- 13.2.jjjjj Fees not recoverable from attorney under section 330. After the case was converted to chapter 7, the debtor's wife paid fees to the debtor's bankruptcy lawyer and the debtor's criminal lawyer. Before the fees were paid, the trustee advised the attorneys that he was investigating whether the source of the funds might be recoverable under one of the avoiding powers. After the fees were paid and the trustee completed his investigation, the trustee sought recovery from the attorneys of the fees paid on the grounds that they came from property of the estate. He claimed that they were paid by a Cook Islands asset protection trust, where the debtor had established more than one year before bankruptcy, to the wife, who paid them to the attorneys. Finally, the court concludes that the criminal attorney did not need to file a statement under section 329, because that section applies only to fees paid "for services rendered or to be rendered in contemplation of or in connection with the case." Wasserman v. Bressman (In re Bressman), 327 F.3d 229 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 13.2.kkkkk Secured creditor need not file fee application to recover attorneys fees. A secured creditor seeking attorneys fees under section 506(b) may include the amount in its proof of claim, even if the fees are incurred postpetition, and need not file a fee application under Bankruptcy Rule 2016. Atwood v. Chase Manhattan Mortgage Co. (In re Atwood), 293 B.R. 227 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).

13.2.IIIII Disinterestedness conflicts check is compensable. Following the courts of appeals decisions that allow compensation for time spent preparing fee applications, the court rules that the time spent checking disinterestedness and providing disclosure and otherwise complying with the requirements of Bankruptcy Rule 2014(a) is compensable under section 330. However, time spent on initial conflicts checks as required under applicable state law is not compensable. In re Sterling Chemicals Holdings, Inc., 293 B.R. 701 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2003).

13.2.mmmmm Section 328 employment is not disfavored. Counsel had been employed on a contingent fee under an order that required counsel to submit a fee application to the court for approval. After the court determined that a section 330 reasonableness standard, rather than the contingent fee agreement contained in the employment order, should apply, counsel appealed. The Sixth Circuit B.A.P. rules that a requirement in an employment order to file a fee application or a provision that the fees are subject to review by the court is not a sufficient statement that the fees will be reviewed under a section 330 reasonableness standard rather than based on the terms and conditions of employment under section 328. The B.A.P. specifically rejects the Ninth Circuit rule, expressed in In re Circle K Corp, 279 F.3d 669 (9th Cir. 2002), which requires specific reference to section 328 in the application and order, as a mere housekeeping rule it will not follow, because there is no presumption in the statute that the section 330 reasonableness rule should take precedence over the section 328 terms and conditions rule unless the order specifies otherwise. The B.A.P. directs the courts to determine what arrangement the court approved, not to look for any particular magical words in the order. Nischwitz v. Airspect Air, Inc. (In re Airspect Air, Inc.), 288 B.R. 464 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2003).

13.2.nnnnn Allowance of fees precludes later malpractice claim. After his bankruptcy case, the debtor sued his former law firm for malpractice. The Fourth Circuit rules that the claim is barred on grounds of res judicata. The award of fees was a final prior judgment. The debtor was in privity with the estate, because the debtor's liability for non-dischargeable taxes would have been reduced by disallowance of the fees. Finally, the malpractice claim is based on the same cause of action involved in the fee application, because both relate to the nature and quality of the legal services that the law firm rendered. Grausz v. Englander, 321 F.3d 467 (4th Cir. 2003).

13.2.ooooo Unsecured creditor may be awarded attorney's fees for litigating state law issue. After prevailing on its appeal on the enforceability of a swap agreement, which required the defaulting party to pay attorney's fees incurred "by reason of the enforcement or protection of its rights under this agreement," the bank sought an award of attorney's fees incurred in connection with the appeal. The Ninth Circuit awards the fees to the extent that state law both governs the substantive law issue and authorizes the court to award fees. In this case, there were both bankruptcy law and state contract law issues. The fees were awarded only to the extent of the litigation with respect to the state law issue. Thrifty Oil Co. v. Bank of America N.T. & S.A., 322 F.3d 1039 (9th Cir. 2003).

13.2.ppppp Preference recipient is disqualified from employment. The debtor's counsel had received substantial payments in the ninety-day period before the chapter 11 case. The district court approved employment on the condition that if the firm was determined to have received a preference, it promptly return the preference and waive any unsecured claim arising from the return. The Third Circuit rules that the conditions were not adequate. If indeed the firm had received a preference, it was not disinterested and could not be employed. Therefore, the bankruptcy court had to determine whether it had received a preference before it could authorize the employment. In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246 (3d Cir. 2002).

- 13.2.qqqqq Court allows debtor's attorney fees for litigating fee application. The Ninth Circuit reaffirms its prior ruling that the 1994 amendment to section 330 did not prohibit allowance of fees for a debtor's attorney, even after the appointment of a trustee. The court looks to section 330(a)(4)(A) to determine that fees for a debtor's attorney must be for services that were not unnecessarily duplicative, reasonably likely to benefit the estate, and necessary for the administration of the case. In this case, the court goes further to permit allowance of fees for a debtor's attorneys for litigation of his fee application over the objection of the debtor and permits allowance of fees for outside counsel that the attorney hired to defend the objection to the fee application. Smith v. Edwards & Hale, Ltd. (In re Smith), 305 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2002).
- 13.2.rrrrr DIP's attorney does not owe fiduciary duty to the estate or creditors. A dispute arose between counsel for the DIP and the holder of the principal secured claim over funding for the plan, which included payment of part of the attorney's fees from a carve-out and the balance as administrative expenses under the plan. As a result of the dispute, the plan could not be consummated, and the case was converted to chapter 7. In an action by the secured creditor against DIP counsel, the court rules that counsel does not owe a fiduciary duty to the estate or creditors. Relying on Hansen, Jones & Leta, P.C. v. Segal, 220 B.R. 434 (D. Utah 1998), the court rules that counsel owes its duty only to the debtor-in-possession. Because of the conflicting and competing interests of the debtor, secured creditors, unsecured creditors, and other parties, counsel for the DIP could not owe duties to all parties in interest. The court distinguishes cases that have stated that DIP counsel is a fiduciary of the estate and an officer of the court on the grounds that they dealt with direct conflicts of interest and other breaches of statutory provisions, not breach of fiduciary duty to the estate. ICM Notes, Ltd. v. Andrews & Kurth, L.L.P., 278 B.R. 117 (S.D. Tex. 2002).
- 13.2.sssss Fourth Circuit denies fees to chapter 7 debtor's attorney. Recognizing the split in the circuits and the ambiguity in section 330(a), the Fourth Circuit concludes that the ambiguous 1994 amendment to section 330(a) should be read literally to deny a debtor's attorney fees from a chapter 7 estate. What is more, the court concludes that a pre-petition retainer that the attorney held could not be applied to fees incurred after conversion of the case to chapter 7, because the retainer was property of the estate, which could not be used to pay fees for a debtor's attorney. United States Trustee v. Equipment Services, Inc. (In re Equipment Services, Inc.), 290 F.3d 739 (4th Cir. 2000).
- 13.2.ttttt Disqualified counsel may be compensated under section 503(b)(3). Counsel for a creditor had brought a prepetition action against the debtor's principals to recover fraudulently transferred property. After bankruptcy, the trustee retained the law firm as special counsel at the expense of the estate, with fees contingent upon recovery from the debtor's principal, but without disclosing that the creditor was continuing to pay counsel. When a dispute arose regarding approval of a settlement between the trustee and the debtor's principals (negotiated by the trustee's general counsel), the detailed facts regarding special counsel were revealed to the court. Although these facts disqualified counsel from representing the trustee (section 327(e) does not apply to a creditor's counsel), the B.A.P. rules that the disinterestedness requirement of section 327 does not apply in a section 503(b)(3)(B) creditors suit and that the creditor could seek reimbursement from the estate for attorney's fees incurred in prosecuting the action if the result was a substantial contribution to the case. Com-1 Info, Inc. v. Wolkowitz (In re Maximus Computers, Inc.), 278 B.R. 189 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).
- 13.2.uuuuu Attorney's files are subject to turn-over. The buyer of the debtor's assets joined the debtor in seeking turn-over from the debtor's lawyers of their papers relating to litigation against the buyer's affiliate. The Purchase Agreement provided for the buyer to have access to the documents. Rejecting the lawyers' arguments, the court rules that section 542(e) applies to the files, even though all of the debtor's assets have been sold to the buyer, because section 542(e) applies regardless of whether the documents are property of the estate. In addition, the lawyers did not have liens on the files and were required by state bar rules to turn over client files upon termination of an engagement. Therefore, the court ordered turn-over without payment of any of the lawyers' claims. American Metrocomm Corp. v. Duane Morris & Heckscher LLP (In re American Metrocomm Corp.), 274 B.R. 641 (Bankr. D. Del. 2002).

13.2.vvvvv Bankruptcy bar admission not governed by state bar rules. In a case in which the lawyer was admitted to the bar of the bankruptcy court but not the state bar, the Sixth Circuit rules that the lawyer may practice before the bankruptcy courts (including counseling clients outside of court), even though he is not admitted to the local state bar. In this case, the local bankruptcy court rules permitted admission to the bar as long as the lawyer was admitted before a court of record in any state, not just the state where the bankruptcy court sits. Rittenhouse v. Delta Home Improvement (In re Desilets), 291 F.3d 925 (6th Cir. 2002).

13.2.wvvvvw Chapter 7 debtor's attorney's fees may be allowed under Section 330. The Sixth Circuit B.A.P. joins the Second and Ninth Circuits and departs from the rule in the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits in construing section 330(a) to permit a payment from the estate of the attorney's fees of the debtor in a chapter 7 case. In this case, the debtor's attorney defended a creditor's motion to dismiss the bankruptcy case, assisted in the preparation of the schedules and statement of affairs, and attended the first meeting of creditors. The B.A.P. reaches its conclusion based upon the "drafting error" in the 1994 amendment to section 330(a). Unites States Trustee v. Egelston Works Loudspeaker Co. (In re Egelston Works Loudspeaker Co.), 253 B.R. 519 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2000).

13.2.xxxxx Debtor's attorney may be compensated under section 330. Following the Second and Ninth Circuits, the Third Circuit concludes that the attorney for the debtor may be compensated under section 330, despite the garbled 1994 amendment to that section. Nevertheless, the court requires compliance with section 330(a)(4)(A), which permits compensation only for services that are reasonably likely to benefit the estate. In re Top Grade Sausage, Inc., 227 F.3d 123 (3d Cir. 2000).

13.2.yyyyy Court denies "employment gap" fees to disqualified lawyer. The law firm for the debtor in possession also represented the debtor's sister corporation, which owed the debtor $78,000. The law firm had first claim on the proceeds of the sale of the sister corporation, creating an interest adverse to the estate of the debtor. The law firm fully disclosed all of this information and so was disqualified after rendering services to the debtor in possession for about 20 days. The law firm applied for fees for that "employment gap" period. Although the bankruptcy court awarded the fees, the Seventh Circuit reversed on the ground that section 503(b)(2) was the sole source of authority to pay professional fees (excluding section 503(b)(1)(A)) and section 503(b)(2) referred to sections 327 and 330, which prohibited fees to counsel whose employment was not approved by the court. In re Milwaukee Engraving Co., Inc., 219 F.3d 635 (7th Cir. 2000).

13.2.zzzzz Creditors' motive is irrelevant to determination of "substantial contribution." Although an attorney's extraordinary efforts toward negotiating a consensual plan in a chapter 11 case were conducted on behalf of his clients and not for the particular benefit of the estate, the attorney still qualified for an award of compensation under section 503(b)(3)-(4) for making a substantial contribution to the case. Speights & Runyan v. Celotex Corp. (In re Celotex Corp.), 227 F.3d 1336 (11th Cir. 2000).

13.2.aaaaa State bar admission required as condition to regular practice in the bankruptcy court. The attorney maintained an office in Michigan. Though not admitted to the Michigan bar, he was admitted to the Federal District Court, where he regularly filed bankruptcy petitions on behalf of local clients. The District Court upheld an order requiring him to disgorge fees on the grounds that he was not properly admitted to practice law in Michigan, where he advised his clients. The bankruptcy court could rely on state law standards in determining whether the lawyer was an “attorney” as defined in section 101(1). Rittenhouse v. Delta Home Improvement, Inc., 255 B.R. 294 (W.D. Mich. 2000).

- 13.2.bbbbbb Attorney denied nunc pro tunc employment approval. The trustee retained counsel and sought immediate approval from the bankruptcy court under section 327. Several weeks later, the approval was denied. The court refused to allow the attorney compensation for the services rendered while the court was considering the application. The court also refused compensation under section 503(b)(1)(A) (actual and necessary expenses of administration) and on equitable grounds. In re Albrecht, 245 B.R. 666 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2000).
- 13.2.cccccc Law firm may keep fees despite disinterestedness challenge. Before bankruptcy, a partner in the law firm was an assistant secretary to the debtor. The law firm represented the debtor in possession. The former assistant secretary performed no services during the case. The United States trustee challenged the law firm’s employment on disinterestedness grounds, but its objection was overruled and its appeal was dismissed as interlocutory. When the case concluded, the court awarded the firm fees, and the U.S. trustee appealed from the final order. The Ninth Circuit holds that even though the appeal was not equitably moot, it would be inequitable to require the law firm to disgorge the fees after the services were rendered because of the difficult ethical dilemma it would create for counsel. The court notes that the law firm fully disclosed the relationship and acted entirely properly during the case. S.S. Retail Stores Corp. v. Ekstrom (In re S.S. Retail Stores Corp.), 216 F.3d 882 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 13.2.dddddd Failure to disclose hiring of law clerk is not malpractice. The law firm hired the law clerk of a bankruptcy judge before whom the firm was appearing. The law firm did not inform the client or opposing counsel. The judge did not fully insulate the clerk from the matter on which the law firm was appearing and ultimately recused herself based on appearance of impropriety. The matter was tried to a new judge, where the client did not fare as well as it expected it would fare before the original judge. As a result, the client sued the law firm for malpractice for failure to disclose the employment of the law clerk. The Ninth Circuit rules that the law firm did not commit malpractice, because the duty is on the Judge and the law clerk to prevent lapses of the sort that occurred in this case. First Interstate Bank v. Murphy Weir & Butler, 21 F.3d 983 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 13.2.eeeeeee Bankruptcy fees should be based on non-bankruptcy practices. In determining whether to allow compensation for travel time, the bankruptcy court failed to determine whether and to what extent counsel would have charged non-bankruptcy clients for such time. Such a determination is the benchmark to carry out the congressional intent to eliminate the differential between compensation for bankruptcy and non-bankruptcy work. In re Raytech Corp., 241 B.R. 785 (D. Conn. 1999).
- 13.2.ffffff Debtor’s attorney may be compensated in a chapter 7 case. Joining the Second Circuit in construing an ambiguity in Section 330(a)(1) created by the 1994 amendments, the Ninth Circuit holds that a debtor’s attorney may be compensated for work performed during a chapter 7 case. The decision is contrary to the decisions of the Fifth Circuit on the same issue. United States Trustee v. Garvey, Schubert & Barer (In re Century Cleaning Services, Inc.), 195 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 1999).
- 13.2.gggggg Debtor’s chapter 11 attorney not entitled to payment from the estate. Following the Fifth Circuit and disagreeing with the Ninth Circuit, the Eleventh Circuit holds that the 1994 amendment to section 330(a) eliminates the authority for the debtor’s attorney to be paid from the estate. Inglesby, Falligant, Horne, Courington & Nash, P.C. v. Moore (In re American Steel Product, Inc.), 197 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 1999).

13.2.hhhhhh All you ever wanted to know about disinterestedness. In an opinion whose footnotes far exceed the length of the text, and which might cite every bankruptcy case ever decided on the issue of disinterestedness and conflict of interest, the court ruled that the chapter 7 trustee may employ counsel who represents both the corporate debtor and its president and certain related entities in a legal malpractice action against another attorney. In re Covenant Financial Group, 243 B.R. 450 (Bankr. N.D. Ala. 1999).

13.2.iiiii A preferee is disqualified as a professional. Counsel for the debtor in possession accepted prepetition payment of its invoices in property of the debtor other than cash. Holding that the transaction was not in the ordinary course of business and was therefore an avoidable preference, the Third Circuit, without analysis, rules that a law firm that has received a preference is not disinterested, citing In re BH&P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300 (3d Cir. 1991). United States Trustee v. First Jersey Securities, Inc. (In re First Jersey Securities, Inc.), 180 F.3d 504 (3d Cir. 1999)

13.2.jjjjj Total disgorgement ordered for nondisclosure. Counsel took a prepetition security retainer from the debtor's president and postpetition replenishment of the retainer from the debtor. Counsel withdrew amounts from the retainer postpetition, contrary to the bankruptcy court's order and without disclosure until substantially later. The bankruptcy court's order ordering disgorgement of all fees received was not an abuse of discretion and was upheld. Miller v. U.S. Trustee (In re Independent Engineering Company, Inc.) 197 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 1999).

13.2.kkkkk Trustee and his counsel denied compensation for egregious conflict. The successor trustee was appointed in large part to investigate the actions of the initial trustee. He retained a counsel who also represented the prior trustee in an unrelated case. Counsel failed to disclose the representation, and the trustee made no specific inquiry. Counsel was denied all compensation in the case. The trustee was denied compensation for the period after he learned of the conflict. In addition, the trustee was removed. Kagen v. Stubbe (In re San Juan Hotel Corp.), 239 B.R. 635 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 1999).

13.2.iiiii Standing orders reducing fees in chapter 13 cases without hearings are overruled. The bankruptcy judges in the District of Colorado did not permit hearings on fee applications in chapter 13 cases, instead routinely reducing fees by use of a "check the box" order which listed a variety of reasons for reduction of fees. In reversing the procedure, the District Court criticizes the assembly line, non-hearing approach to fees and orders the bankruptcy judges to develop a procedure that is more consistent with the statute and with the need for customized, personal services to chapter 13 debtors. In re Ingersol, 238 B.R. 202 (D. Colo. 1999).

13.2.mmmmm Bankruptcy court wrongly fails to evaluate individual debtor's attorney-client privilege claim. The individual debtor and his counsel opposed turnover of documents to the trustee on both attorney-client privilege and Fifth Amendment grounds. The parties agreed, and therefore the court did not decide, that the trustee succeeds to an individual debtor's claim of privilege. Against that background, the Court of Appeals held that the bankruptcy court should have evaluated the individual documents as to which privilege was claimed, in balancing the interests of the debtor and the interest of the trustee, rather than balancing only the general interest of the estate in recovering assets against the interest of the debtor in protecting the privilege. Foster v. Hill (In re Foster), 188 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 1999).

13.2.nnnnn Counsel disqualified for bias. Because trustee's counsel made very intemperate remarks about the debtor's credibility before ever meeting or examining the debtor, the bankruptcy court concluded that counsel was biased and that counsel's independent judgment had been seriously compromised. The court disqualified counsel and his entire law firm under the disinterestedness test and under the rules of professional responsibility. In re Vebeliunas, 231 B.R. 181 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1999).

13.2.ooooo Bankruptcy courts have the inherent power to disbar attorneys. An attorney signed a bankruptcy petition as a petition preparer rather than as attorney for the debtor and failed to disclose all fees received. As a sanction, the bankruptcy court ordered disgorgement of the fees and disbarred the attorney from the bankruptcy court in that district. The district court, although not finding an adequate record for disbarment, affirmed the bankruptcy court's power to disbar from practice within the bankruptcy court in a district. In re M.P.M. Enterprises, Inc., 231 B.R. 500 (E.D.N.Y. 1999).

13.2.ppppp Employment under section 327(e) limits scope of conflict of interest inquiry. The Second Circuit reads the adverse interest provision of section 327(e) narrowly, so that potential conflicts must be evaluated only with respect to the scope of the proposed retention. Thus, counsel's representation of one creditor does not necessarily disqualify counsel from representation of the trustee in an action against other creditors who are at risk to the first creditor. Bank Brussels Lambert v. Coan (In re Arochem Corp.), 176 F.3d 610 (2d Cir. 1999).

13.2.qqqqq Bankruptcy court awards compensation based on value billing. Starting with the lodestar test but relying heavily on Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1974), the bankruptcy court criticizes undue reliance on hourly rates and grants fees based on the value of the services rendered to the estate. In a lengthy opinion analyzing the many aspects of determination of fees, the bankruptcy court concludes that the amount of a fee in excess of the hourly rate is not a "bonus" or "enhancement," but rather is part of a reasonable fee based on the value of the services. In re Vista Foods U.S.A., Inc., 234 B.R. 121 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. 1999).

13.2.rrrrr Court limits secured creditor reimbursement of fees and expenses. The real estate lender was oversecured and included within its claim under section 506(b) a consultant's fee, attorney's fees, and fees of salaried employees. The court disallowed them all, the attorney's fees on the ground that most "were based on time spent on making and litigating its unreasonable demands." First Bank of Ohio v. Brunswick Apartments of Trumble County, Ltd. (In re Brunswick Apartments of Trumble County, Ltd.), 169 F.3d 333 (6th Cir. 1999).

13.2.sssss Out-of-state attorney may collect fees. An attorney had no residence or office in Arizona and was not a member of the State Bar, but was admitted to practice in the United States District Court by local District Court rule. That admission satisfies Bankruptcy Code section 101(4), which defines attorney as one "authorized under applicable law to practice law." Thus, the attorney was entitled to fees for the chapter 13 case, notwithstanding his non-admission to the Arizona State Bar. Brown v. Smith (In re Mendez), 231 B.R. 36 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1999).

13.2.ttttt A mortgage servicer involved in a bankruptcy case engages in the unauthorized practice of law. The bankruptcy court dismissed objections to confirmations of chapter 13 plans brought by lawyers representing mortgage servicers, on the grounds that the mortgage servicers, having procured the services of the attorneys on behalf of the true parties in interest (the mortgagees), the servicers were engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. In addition, the attorneys were referred to the state bar for possible disciplinary proceedings. In re Morgan, 225 B.R. 290 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1998).

13.2.uuuuu Attorney-client privilege prevents objection to discharge. While an attorney was representing a client in a dissolution proceeding, the client admitted that he had concealed assets. The client failed to pay the lawyer and filed bankruptcy, again hiding the same assets. The lawyer objected to discharge, but the bankruptcy appellate panel ruled that the lawyer learned of the concealment by a privileged conversation, which could not be revealed in pursuing an objection to discharge. Dubrow v. Rindlisbacher (In re Rindlisbacher), 225 B.R. 180 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).

13.2.vvvvvv Court approval not required for Chapter 11 debtor's attorney. Once a trustee is appointed, the debtor is ousted of possession and is not required to obtain court approval to employ an attorney. On that basis, the court denied the motion, but noted that the debtor's attorney remained subject to the disclosure obligations of section 329(a) and Rule 2016(b). In re The Apollo Group 224 B.R. 48 (E.D. Mich. 1998)

13.2.wwwwww Debtor's attorney may not be paid after the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee. Strictly construing the 1994 amendment to section 330(a)(1), the Fifth Circuit holds that the debtor's attorney may not be paid for any work performed after the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee, no matter what the contribution to the case. Andrews & Kurth L.L.P. v. Family Snacks, Inc. (In re Pro-Snax Distributors, Inc.), 157 F.3d 414 (5th Cir. 1998).

13.2.xxxxxx An attorney may not be disqualified on appearance of conflict alone. The trustee's counsel represented a creditor on an unrelated matter and had an unconditional waiver from the creditor. Such a relationship was not disqualifying. The court must disqualify counsel when there is an actual conflict of interest, may disqualify counsel when there is a potential conflict of interest, and may not disqualify when there is only an appearance of conflict. In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463 (3d Cir. 1998).

13.2.yyyyyy Attorney fees slashed for appearance of conflict of interest. The trustee retained a law firm to investigate potential causes of action against the defendant. The law firm had occasionally represented the potential defendant in the past. While representing the trustee, the law firm opened numerous new matters for the potential defendant, without further disclosure to the trustee or the court. The court disallowed all fees for the investigation, holding that the failure to disclose and the appearance of partiality created by the firm's extensive work for the potential defendant so tainted the investigation that it was worthless, and the firm therefore could not be compensated. In re Granite Partners, L.L.P., 219 B.R. 22 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1998).

13.2.zzzzzz Court defines and limits fiduciary duties of counsel for the debtor in possession. In a lengthy, thorough, and well reasoned opinion, the district court in Utah rules that the client of counsel for the debtor in possession is the debtor in possession, not the estate as a new entity. The court also debunks prior case law that suggested that counsel owed a fiduciary duty to creditors and shareholders rather than just to the debtor in possession client. Hansen, Jones & Leta, P.C. v. Segal, 220 B.R. 434 (D. Utah 1998).

13.2.aaaaaa Section 329 requirement of reasonable fees may not be measured by agreement. A consumer debtor lawyer charged clients for simple no-asset chapter 7 cases a flat fee of two to four times the going rate in the area. Although the clients had agreed to the fees, the court upholds an order requiring disgorgement of the excess, even though there was no evidence of over-reaching or evidence that the excess fee would benefit the estate. In re Geraci, 138 F.3d 314 (7th Cir. 1998).

13.2.bbbbbb Non-refundable retainer permitted. A law firm took a non-refundable retainer from a debtor that was about to be subject to civil liability and criminal prosecution for check-kiting to a credit union. As long as the amount of the retainer was reasonable in light of the services expected to be rendered, the law firm did not act in bad faith in taking the retainer, and for purposes of the Federal Credit Union Act, "acceptance of a non-refundable retainer from a bankrupt is improper only if the retainer was excessive or a means of hiding assets of the bankrupt.” National Credit Union Administration Board v. Johnson, 133 F.3d 1097 (8th Cir. 1998).

- 13.2.cccccc A retainer may be applied to post-petition fees. An attorney for the debtor may be paid only from property of the estate where the Bankruptcy Code specifically authorizes. Property that an attorney holds as a retainer pre-bankruptcy becomes property of the estate upon the filing of the petition. Nevertheless, the retainer may be used to satisfy post-petition fees under an attorney’s charging lien which can secure obligations arising from the performance of services in the future. United States Trustee v. Garvey, Schubert & Barer (In re Century Cleaning Services, Inc.), 215 B.R. 18 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).
- 13.2.dddddd Mortgage for post-petition fees is invalid as of the petition date. The tax attorney took a mortgage on the debtor’s residence to secure fees related to tax refunds. Under Missouri law, the mortgage is terminated as to future advances when the lender receives notice. The Eighth Circuit construes the bankruptcy petition as just such a notice, analogizing the mortgage to a cash security retainer, which requires bankruptcy court approval of the application before it may be drawn. Snyder v. Dewoskin (In re Mahendra), 131 F.3d 750 (8th Cir. 1997).
- 13.2.eeeeeee Attorneys’ fees allowed for substantial contribution, even though creditor incurs no other expense. Section 503(b)(4) permits recovery of attorneys’ fees “of an entity whose expense is allowable under paragraph (3) [the substantial contribution provision].” If the creditor incurs no allowable expense under paragraph (3), may attorneys’ fees nevertheless be reimbursed? The 9th Circuit B.A.P. holds “yes,” suggesting however, that if the creditor was not liable to the attorney for the fees in the first place, then section 503(b)(4) does not impose that obligation on the estate. Law Offices of Neil Vincent Wake v. Sedona Institute (In re Sedona Institute), 220 B.R. 74 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1998).
- 13.2.ffffff Court approves fixed fees in advance. In a complex chapter 11 case, the bankruptcy court authorizes attorneys’ employment on a fixed fee basis with fixed monthly draws, based on estimates of the amount of work required to complete matters in the case. The court also permits modification of the fees under section 328, based on events that were unanticipatable at the time the fees were fixed. In re Home Express, Inc., 213 B.R. 162 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 1997).
- 13.2.ggggggg Counsel may be awarded fees for protecting the estate, despite the client’s contrary instructions. After the filing of a chapter 11 case, the unperfected secured creditor exercised its stock voting power, ousted management, and directed counsel to seek dismissal of the case, so that the creditor could perfect its security interest. Counsel refused and opposed the creditor’s motion to dismiss the case. The court may properly award fees for such effort. More important, counsel for the debtor in possession may not simply resign where the client refuses counsel’s advice on the fiduciary duties of the debtor in possession, but must inform the court in some manner. Zeisler & Zeisler, P.C. v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America (In re JLM, Inc.), 210 B.R. 19 (2d Cir. B.A.P. 1997).
- 13.2.hhhhhh Bankruptcy court authorization of employment does not guarantee fees. The bankruptcy court authorized employment of criminal counsel for the debtor in a chapter 11 case, but denied any compensation at the expense of the estate, finding that the services provided did not benefit the estate. The Third Circuit, in a divided opinion, affirmed. Ferrara & Hantman v. Alvarez (In re Engel), 124 F.3d 567 (3d Cir. 1997).
- 13.2.iiiiiii Professional fees may be reduced if the professional fails to exercise billing judgment. Where counsel for the creditor’s committee continued to incur fees and expenses in pursuing a sale that had little or no possibility of recovery for the unsecured creditors, the firm’s fees could be reduced because the firm failed to exercise appropriate billing judgment. Lobel & Opera v. U.S. Trustee (In re Autoparts Club, Inc.), 211 B.R. 29 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1979).

- 13.2.jjjjjj Bankruptcy Court lacks jurisdiction to review fees after dismissal of case. The debtor's schedules and statement of affairs and the attorney's employment application and affidavit were substantially inaccurate regarding pre-petition payments to the attorney. Nevertheless, the court approved the attorney's employment. After the case was dismissed, the attorney sued in state court for recovery of fees earned during the chapter 11 case. The debtor reopened the Bankruptcy Court to seek disallowance of fees. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel rules that the Bankruptcy Court does not have jurisdiction after the dismissal of the case to grant new relief. Judge Russell, in a very strong dissent, argues that the ethical violations require the Bankruptcy Court to set aside the order authorizing employment and disallow all fees, despite the dismissal of the case. Elias v. Lisowski Law Firm, Chtd. (In re Elias), 97 D.A.R. 15617 (9th B.A.P. Oct. 27, 1997).
- 13.2.kkkkkkk Appeal from fee disgorgement is not moot. The bankruptcy court ordered a law firm to disgorge fees that it had paid. The disgorged amount was distributed to creditors. On the law firm's appeal, the B.A.P. held that the appeal was not moot, because "turnabout is fair play" and the court could require the same disgorgement from creditors who receive the fees." Lobel & Opera v. U.S. Trustee (In re Autoparts Club, Inc.), 211 B.R. 29 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1979).
- 13.2.iiiiiii Service as a director creates a potentially disqualifying interest for a lawyer. A lawyer served on the board of directors of a company when the board approved a particular transaction, but resigned shortly thereafter. When litigation ensued after the transaction, the lawyer and his entire law firm were disqualified from representing the adverse party, because the lawyer held a fiduciary relationship to the company, and there was an irrebuttable presumption he received confidential information in approving the transaction. The possession of the information was imputed to the entire law firm. Value Property Trust v. Zim Co. (In re Mortgage & Realty Trust), 195 B.R. 740 (Bankr. C.D. Calif. 1996).
- 13.2.mmmmmmm A disqualified lawyer does not necessarily disqualify his law firm. Service by a lawyer as an assistant secretary of a corporation disqualifies the lawyer as not disinterested under section 101(14) to serve as counsel for a chapter 11 debtor, but his status will not be attributed to his law firm, who can continue to serve as counsel for the debtor. United States Trustee v. S. S. Retail Stores Corporation (In re S.S. Retail Stores Corporation), 211 B.R. 699 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).
- 13.2.nnnnnnn Pre-petition attorneys' fees are dischargeable. The attorney for the debtor was to receive his fees in installments after the filing of the debtor's chapter 7 petition. The Ninth Circuit holds that the debtor's obligation to the attorney was dischargeable. Hessinger & Associates v. U.S. Trustee (In re Biggar), 110 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 1997).
- 13.2.ooooooo Court of appeals orders disgorgement of attorney's fees. The debtor's attorney failed to disclose the fees he received from a third party after a commencement of the chapter 11 case; he did not file the statement required under section 329(a) or Bankruptcy Rule 2016. The bankruptcy judge sanctioned the attorney by requiring him to return one-half of the fees paid. The court of appeals reversed, making mandatory as a sanction for such an egregious violation a return of all fees paid, affirming the inherent power of bankruptcy courts, like Article III courts, to sanction parties for improper conduct. Mapother & Mapother, P.C. v. Cooper (In re Downs), 103 F.3d 472 (6th Cir. 1996).
- 13.2.ppppppp Post-petition retainer ordered disgorged. A bankruptcy court has inherent authority to order an attorney for the debtor to disgorge fees received post-petition in a chapter 11 case without conducting an inquiry into the reasonableness of the fees received. In this case, the attorney failed to comply with the disclosure requirements of Rule 2016(b) and falsely stated in his employment application that the fees received post-petition were, in fact, received pre-petition. Law Offices of Nicholas A. Franke v. Tiffany (In re Lewis), 113 F.3d 1040 (9th Cir. 1997).

13.2.qqqqqq Lack of knowledge of source of funds is not a defense to a turnover proceeding. A law firm received a deposit from a corporation, which filed bankruptcy four days later. The corporation's principal asked for a return of the money, advising the law firm (who knew about the bankruptcy) that the money had come from the individual. The law firm returned the funds to the individual, but was later required to account for the value of the funds to the bankruptcy trustee because the law firm had enough knowledge to place a reasonable person on notice that the property might have belonged to the debtor. Boyer v. Carlton, Fields, Ward, Emmanuel, Smith & Cutler, P.A. (In re U.S.A. Diversified Products, Inc.), 100 F.3d 53 (7th Cir. 1996).

13.2.rrrrrr Creditor allowed fees for substantial contribution. The Fifth Circuit orders the award of fees and expenses for a substantial contribution, even though the creditor was acting only in its own self-interest, ruling "that a creditor's motive in taking actions that benefit the estate has little relevance whether the determination whether the creditor has [made] a substantial contribution to a case." Moreover, the creditor is not required to give advance notice before confirmation of the debtor's plan of its intent to seek substantial contribution fees and expenses. Hall Financial Group, Inc. v. DP Partners Ltd. Partnership (In re DP Partners Ltd. Partnership), 106 F.3d 667 (5th Cir. 1997).

13.3 Committees

13.3.a A creditor has neither a right to serve nor a pecuniary interest in serving on a committee. The bankruptcy court removed four committee members because their counsel disclosed confidential information. They appealed. Standing to appeal in a bankruptcy case requires the appellant to be a "person aggrieved," that is, to have a pecuniary interest adversely affected by the order. Removal from a committee does not affect a creditor's pecuniary interest. In some circumstances, a creditor who has been sanctioned may appeal from the sanction order. Removal from the committee is not a sanction, because the creditor has no right to serve on a committee. Therefore, the court dismisses the appeal for lack of standing. In re Roman Catholic Church of the Archdiocese of New Orleans, 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 151083 (E.D. La. Aug. 11, 2022).

13.3.b Court has authority to disband a committee. The debtor filed its chapter 11 case in a Bankruptcy Administrator district. The Administrator recommended a committee to the court, who appointed an eleven-member committee. The court then transferred venue to a United States trustee district. The U.S. trustee reconstituted the existing committee and appointed a new committee, with some of the members of the existing committee. The existing committee and the debtor in possession sought to void the U.S. trustee's appointment. Although the U.S. trustee ordinarily has authority to appoint and reconstitute committees, that authority does not extend to overruling an order in the case, which is law of the case. Because section 1102(a) permits a court to order appointment of an additional committee or order a change in committee membership, the court may review the U.S. trustee's action, including actions regarding committees. In addition, Bankruptcy Rule 2020 permits the court to review any act by the U.S. trustee. Under section 105(a), that review includes the power to disband a committee the U.S. trustee has appointed. Here, because the U.S. trustee asserted absolute authority over committee appointments, it did not provide a record to justify its actions. Without such a record, the court strikes the U.S. trustee's notice of appointment, with the effect of disbanding the additional committee and reconstituting the original committee. In re LTL Mgmt., LLC, 636 B.R. 610 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2022).

13.3.c Court orders appointment of additional committee. The archdiocese debtor filed chapter 11 to address numerous sexual abuse claims but also had substantial unsecured commercial creditors.

The U.S. trustee appointed a committee comprising six abuse claimants and one commercial creditor but later removed the commercial creditor. The committee participated vigorously in the case, espousing positions particularly favorable to abuse claimants, but not so vigorously with respect to ordinary commercial issues. The commercial creditor moved for the appointment of an additional committee to represent commercial creditors generally. Section 1102(a) requires the U.S. trustee to appoint one committee and authorizes the U.S. trustee to appoint one or more additional committees to assure adequate representation of creditors or equity holders. Section 1102(a)(4) authorizes the court to direct the U.S. trustee to change the membership of a committee, or to appoint one or more additional committees, to assure adequate representation. A committee owes a fiduciary duty to the entire class of creditors represented by the committee, whether or not a particular subgroup of the class is a committee member. A subgroup may be adequately represented only if it has a meaningful voice on the committee in relation to its position in the case. Determining whether a committee adequately represents all creditors, including a subgroup, and whether to order appointment of additional members or an additional committee requires consideration of the committee's ability to function, the nature of the case, various constituencies' standing and desires and their ability to participate even without an official committee. Here, the uniform committee membership, the complex case nature, and the potentially divergent interests of abuse and commercial claimants create a need for an additional committee to represent the commercial creditors adequately. The court orders the U.S. trustee to appoint such a committee. In re The Roman Catholic Church of the Archdiocese of New Orleans, ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 302 (Bankr. E.D. La. Feb. 8, 2021).

- 13.3.d Committee counsel need not be disinterested. The committee sought approval under section 1103 of the employment of counsel who had, three years before the chapter 11 case, represented one of the debtor's 50% shareholders in estate planning matters. The representation had concluded. Section 1103 authorizes a committee to employ counsel who does not "represent any other entity having an adverse interest in connection with the case." Section 327(a)'s disinterestedness requirement does not apply. Therefore, the counsel's prior representation of a shareholder is not disqualifying. However, the court notes that section 328, which governs compensation of committee professionals, permits the court to deny compensation "if, at any time during such professional person's employment under section ... 1103, such professional person is not a disinterested person" but leaves application of that section (or not) to the determination of any fee application. Bingham Greenebaum Doll, LLP v. Glenview Health Care Facility, Inc. (In re Glenview Health Care Facility, Inc.), 620 B.R. 582 (6th Cir. B.A.P. 2020).
- 13.3.e Committee member's fiduciary duty includes duty of disclosure. A creditors' committee member asserted a first priority domestic support claim. When pressed by the trustee on the scope, extent, and priority of the claim and whether the creditor would permit payment of the expenses necessary to administer the estate's assets, the creditor evaded the question. When the trustee and her professionals later filed interim compensation applications, the creditor objected on the ground that her claim had priority over the administrative expenses. It was unclear whether there would be sufficient assets to satisfy her claim. Creditors' committee members owe fiduciary duties of care and loyalty to the creditors whom they represent. Those duties include the duty of full disclosure. The creditor's failure to disclose her position on payment of the expenses necessary to administer the estate until after fee applications were filed violated that duty, because it enabled the trustee and her professionals to expend time and effort in administering the estate, which they likely would not have done if they had known the first priority domestic support obligation would consume all available assets. Naylor v. Farrell (In re Farrell), ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 3782 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Nov. 15, 2019).
- 13.3.f U.S. Trustee may not appoint a committee in a chapter 9 case. The U.S. Trustee appointed a committee of creditors holding unsecured claims in a chapter 9 case. The debtor moved to disband the committee. Section 901(a) makes section 1102 applicable in a chapter 9 case. Section 1102(a)(1) requires the U.S. Trustee to appoint such a committee "as soon as practicable after the order for relief under chapter 11." Nothing in chapter 9 provides for a different interpretation in a chapter 9 case of the phrase “order for relief under chapter 11.” Because there is no order for relief under chapter 11 in a chapter 9 case, the U.S. Trustee does not have authority to appoint a committee of creditors in a chapter 9 case. In re Coalinga Regional Med. Center, ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 5552 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. Oct. 2, 2019).

- 13.3.g Committee dissolves upon conversion to chapter 7. The bankruptcy court denied approval of a structured dismissal motion. The creditors’ committee did not appeal. The court converted the case to chapter 7. The committee opposed conversion and then appealed. Section 1103 provides for the appointment of a creditors’ committee, but section 1103 applies only in chapter 11. Once the case is converted to chapter 7, the Code provides no authority for the continuance of the committee. The Code also does not provide for a successor to the committee after conversion or for the committee to transfer its rights, if any, to another party. Therefore, even treating the committee as a post-conversion ad hoc committee would not save the appeal. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Constellation Enterps. LLC (In re Constellation Enterps. LLC), 587 B.R. 275 (D. Del. 2018).
- 13.3.h Creditors committee’s ability to seek derivative standing prevents tolling of statute of limitations under adverse domination doctrine. The debtor corporation’s principals breached their fiduciary duty to the debtor, resulting in a loss of the debtor’s valuable license. After the initial administrative ruling on the license revocation, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case. The revocation did not become final until years later, after the state supreme court affirmed the revocation order. The court then converted the case to chapter 7, and a trustee was appointed. By then, the state statute of limitations for a claim for breach of fiduciary duty had run. The state statute permitted tolling while the corporation was under adverse domination, which was the case here. However, during the chapter 11 case, the creditors committee could have asked the bankruptcy court for permission to sue the principals on the estate’s behalf but, hoping for a settlement and a sale of the license, did not do so. Because the committee was independent of the debtor and its management and could have sought authority to sue, the statute was not tolled. Gecker v. Estate of Flynn (In re Emerald Casino, Inc.), 867 F.3d 743 (7th Cir. 2017).
- 13.3.i Creditors’ committee has right to intervene in adversary proceedings. The creditors’ committee moved to intervene in an adversary proceeding. Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 24, incorporated into adversary proceedings by Bankruptcy Rule 7024, permits intervention when a federal statute gives a right to intervene. Section 1109(b) provides “a party interest, including ... a creditors’ committee ... may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in a case” under chapter 11. A “case” is commenced by a petition. A “proceeding” is any particular dispute or matter arising within a case. An issue may arise only in a proceeding of some kind, so that all proceedings in a chapter 11 case, including adversary proceedings, take place within the larger case. The phrase “any issue in a case” is sweeping language that should be read broadly to include issues arising in a proceeding in a case. Therefore, section 1109(b) gives a right to intervene in an adversary proceeding. The right is not unlimited. It does not give the party in interest the right to settle the adversary proceeding or to appeal, and the court may impose reasonable restrictions on the scope of intervention, including limitations on the relief sought, on discovery, and on participation in the trial. In addition, because of the intervenor’s potentially narrower role, in an appropriate case, the court may excuse the requirement under Rule 24(c) that the intervenor accompany the motion to intervene with a pleading. Assured Guaranty Corp. v. Fin. Oversight and Mgmt. Board, 872 F.3d 57 (1st Cir. 2017).
- 13.3.j Court may not disband additional statutory committee. The U.S. Trustee appointed a committee of creditors holding unsecured claims and a separate committee of creditors holding second lien notes, which were likely undersecured or unsecured. The debtor moved to disband the noteholders committee. Section 1102(a)(1) authorizes the U.S. Trustee to appoint additional committees of creditors or equity security holders. Section 1102(a)(2) authorizes the court to order the appointment of additional committees. Section 1102(a)(4) authorizes the court to change committee membership if necessary to assure adequate representation. (Section 1102(a)(3) applies only in small business cases.) The Code does not grant the court any other powers over committee formation or membership. Therefore, under the statutory construction rule that expression of one thing excludes another, the court does not have authority to disband a committee the U.S. Trustee appointed. Section 105(a) does not provide an alternative route, because a court may rely on section 105(a) only to implement what the Code authorizes, not what it does not permit. In re Caesars Entertainment Op. Co., Inc., 526 B.R. 265 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2015).

- 13.3.k Committee members do not have standing to sue a committee professional. The debtor confirmed a plan that provided for a sale to an unrelated entity. The price was to be paid in four installments, secured by a lien, with the sale proceeds paid to unsecured creditors. Debtor's counsel failed to file a financing statement to perfect the lien. The buyer defaulted. The unperfected lien resulted in a lower recovery than otherwise would have been the case. The creditors committee sued its counsel in state court for malpractice for failing to ensure that the lien was properly perfected. The chapter case was reopened and converted to chapter 7, dissolving the committee. The committee members substituted as plaintiffs. A chapter 11 committee professional represents the committee, not its members, and the professional's duty runs solely to the committee. Therefore, the committee members lacked standing to sue the committee's counsel. Schultze v. Chandler, 765 F.3d 945 (9th Cir. 2014).
- 13.3.l Court may disband a committee. After the order for relief in a chapter 9 case, the U.S. trustee appointed a committee of creditors holding unsecured claims. Four of the five committee members had already been active litigants in the case and active participants in court-ordered mediation. Section 105(a) gives the court the power to "issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of" the Bankruptcy Code. This power is broader than the equitable authority available under traditional equity jurisprudence, but does not permit the court to issue an order that is inconsistent with the Code. Section 1102(a) requires the U.S. trustee to appoint a creditors committee and authorizes the U.S. trustee to appoint additional committees. It does not address disbanding a committee. Therefore, an order under section 105(a) disbanding a committee is not inconsistent with the Code. The committee would add expense and would duplicate the members' activity in the case and therefore would not add value to the case. Accordingly, the court disbands the committee. In re City of Detroit, Mich., 519 B.R. 673 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2014).
- 13.3.m Plan may provide for committee members' attorneys' fees. The chapter 11 plan provided for payment of creditors committee members' attorneys fees. Section 503(b)(3)(F) allows as an administrative expense a creditors committee member's expenses, other than professional fees, and section 503(b)(4) allows as an administrative expense the professional fees incurred by an entity whose expenses are allowed under section 503(b), except a committee member. Section 1123(b)(6) permits a plan to contain any provision not inconsistent with chapter 11; section 1129(a)(4) imposes a confirmation requirement that any payments to be made for services in connection with the case or in connection with the plan are disclosed and reasonable. Section 503(b)(4) does not prohibit payment of a committee member's professional fees. It only denies the member the right to the fees' allowance as an administrative expense. A committee is free to negotiate for the fees as a plan term, which is then subject to disclosure, creditor voting and reasonableness. Thus, the two chapter 11 sections permit a plan to provide for their payment. In re AMR Corp., 497 B.R. 691 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 13.3.n Creditors committee acts under color of law for purpose of RFRA. The archbishop is the trustee of a trust that the debtor archdiocese maintains for the maintenance and care of cemeteries, which is central to the practice of the archdiocese's religion. Acting on behalf of the debtor in possession as representative of the estate, the creditors committee sought to invade the trust corpus to pay claims against the archdiocese. The federal Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) prohibits the government from substantially burdening a person's exercise of religion. RFRA defines government as any person acting under color of law. A person acts under color of law if the action is fairly attributable to the government. An action is fairly attributable if it involves the "exercise of some right or privilege created by the [government] or by a rule of conduct imposed by the [government]" and the actor "may fairly be said to be a state actor." A debtor in possession is an officer of the court. A creditors committee is entitled to the same quasi-judicial immunity that a trustee in bankruptcy enjoys for actions within the scope of the committee's statutory duties and powers. Therefore, the committee acts under color of law, and its actions are government actions under RFRA. Listecki v. Official Committee of Creditors (In re Archdiocese of Milwaukee), 496 B.R. 905 (E.D.Wis. 2013).

- 13.3.o A committee is not a governmental actor. The debtor archdiocese transferred substantial funds about three years before bankruptcy to a separate trust to provide for the perpetual care of the debtor's cemetery property. The creditors committee, which had been granted derivative standing on behalf of the estate, asserted that the property was property of the estate or that the transfer was an avoidable fraudulent transfer. The Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) generally forbids the "government" from substantially burdening religion. "Government" is defined to include a "branch, department, agency, instrumentality, and official" of the United States. The committee comprises five creditors, appointed by the U.S. trustee, subject to court approval, and is entitled to limited judicial immunity. Still, the committee neither acts on behalf of the government, under the government's direct supervision nor in concert with the government. Therefore, RFRA does not apply to the committee's actions. Listecki v. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Archdiocese of Milwaukee), 485 B.R. 385 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2013).
- 13.3.p Barton v. Barbour* applies to protect creditors committee. The debtor brought an action in district court, without leave of the bankruptcy court, against members of the creditors committee for wrongs allegedly committed against the debtor during their service on the committee. Barton v. Barbour, 104 U.S. 126 (1881), deprives a court of subject matter jurisdiction over an action against a trustee or receiver appointed by a federal court unless the plaintiff has first obtained leave of the appointing court to sue. Its purpose is to centralize litigation related to a case's administration and assist the appointing court in supervising its appointees. The doctrine has been expanded to apply to litigation against trustees in bankruptcy cases and, more generally, against any officer appointed by a bankruptcy court, for acts done in the officer's official capacity. Although creditors committee members are appointed by the U.S. trustee, their appointments are subject to the court's approval under section 1102(a)(4) and are thus functionally equivalent to court-appointed officers. The action here was based on the members' conduct on the committee. Therefore, the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction and dismisses the action. Blixseth v. Brown, 470 B.R. 562 (D. Mont. 2012).
- 13.3.q Court disbands committee after trustee's appointment. The chapter 11 case was essentially a liquidation. The court ordered the appointment of a trustee. After the appointment, the committee continued to participate in the case, taking extensive discovery ostensibly to protect creditors' interests but not contributing to case's progress. Section 1102 requires the appointment of a committee to represent unsecured creditors' interests, whether or not a trustee is appointed. A chapter 11 trustee's role is also to represent unsecured creditors' interests. Section 105 permits the court, on its own motion, to issue an order "as the court deems appropriate to ensure that the case is handled expeditiously and economically" unless inconsistent with another Code provision. The Code does not provide for a committee in a chapter 7 case. This case is essentially a liquidation case, though under chapter 11. The trustee here adequately represents unsecured creditors' interests, and the committee is causing an increase in administrative burden in the case. Therefore, the court disbands the committee. In re Pacific Ave., LLC, 467 B.R. 868 (Bankr. W.D.N.C. 2012).

- 13.3.r Plan may provide for reimbursement of legal fees of ad hoc committees pursuing its members' own interests. Numerous ad hoc committees heavily litigated a chapter 11 case, at times using scorched earth tactics. All the litigation was designed only to benefit each committee's members, not the estate. Ultimately, all parties settled. The settlement required the plan to provide for reimbursement of the committees' reasonable legal fees and expenses incurred during the case. Sections 503(b)(3) and (4) permit allowance of fees and expenses that a creditor or a committee incurs in making a substantial contribution in a case. However, section 503(b) is not exclusive. Section 1129(a)(4) conditions confirmation on the court's finding that "[a]ny payment made ... for costs and expenses in or in connection with the case, or in connection with the plan and incident to the case" is subject to court approval, suggesting that the Code contemplates payments other than those allowed under section 503(b). Section 1123(b)(6) permits a plan to include "any other appropriate provision not inconsistent with the applicable provisions of this title". A provision is "appropriate" when it does not violate any case law or a nonbankruptcy statute. Although payment of creditors' fees and expenses for pursuing their own recoveries may not be sound policy, it is not clearly against public policy. Therefore, the court allows the reimbursement of reasonable fees and expenses as provided under the plan. Fees and expenses for pursuing overly aggressive or scorched earth litigation tactics are not reasonable and may not be reimbursed. In re Adelphia Commun's Corp., 2010 Bankr. LEXIS 3915 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Nov. 18, 2010).
- 13.3.s Committee must maintain website to comply with section 1102(b)(3) obligation. The debtor had about 70 priority claimants and 150 general unsecured claimants, with claims exceeding $36 million. The debtor's schedules listed assets of over $25 million. The creditors committee proposed to meet its obligation under section 1102(b)(3) to "provide access to information" for represented creditors by establishing a call center to which committee counsel would respond and not by establishing a website, which would cost from $500 to $3,000 per month. The only prior reported decision on section 1102(b)(3), In re Refco Inc., 336 B.R. 187 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006), required a website. Although this case is smaller, it is still substantial enough to warrant a website, and the relatively insignificant expense should be given little weight against the creditors' need for current information. In re S & B Surgery Center, Inc., 421 B.R. 546 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2009).
- 13.3.t Court denies equity committee appointment in apparently insolvent case. An active ad hoc equity committee moved for appointment under section 1102(b) of an official equity committee. The hearing was held after the debtor's filing of a plan and disclosure statement that provided no recovery for equity. In determining whether to order the appointment of an equity committee, courts may consider the number of shareholders, the case's complexity, whether a committee's cost significantly outweighs the concern for adequate representation, whether there is a substantial likelihood of a meaningful equity distribution and whether shareholders are unable to represent their interests in the case without an official committee. The latter two considerations predominate. Here, the debtor was not likely to prove solvent, so there would not likely be any distribution to equity. In addition, the ad hoc committee had represented equity's interests adequately during the case, so there was no need to order the appointment of an official committee to provide adequate shareholder representation. Therefore, the court denies the motion. In re Spansion, Inc., 2009 Bankr. LEXIS 3958 (Bankr. D. Del. Dec. 18, 2009).
- 13.3.u Standards for appointing an equity committee. The debtor appeared solvent. The debtor's board comprises eight outside directors, several insiders and the founder, who holds 62% of the debtor's stock (which is publicly traded), loaned substantial sums to the debtor and guaranteed the banks' secured claims. An ad hoc shareholders group sought appointment of an equity committee. The creditors committee alleged that a member of the group and its counsel had engaged in misconduct in recruiting the ad hoc group and seeking the equity committee appointment. Section 1102(a)(2) authorizes a court to order the appointment of an equity committee. Four factors govern the decision: apparent solvency, adequate representation, case complexity and likely cost. Any misconduct in the process of bringing the matter to the court does not affect application of these factors as necessary to protect shareholders but can be addressed in the U.S. Trustee's selection of committee members and the court's approval of committee counsel's employment. Here, the debtor appears solvent. The business and valuation issues make the case complex. The complexity and the other forces at work in negotiations prevent the board from acting as an adequate representative of the shareholders in recovering value under a plan. The founder's multiple roles and the debtor's motivation to get its senior lenders' consent to a plan, as well as the demands on management of operating the debtor and preserving its value prevent them from adequately representing the shareholders in seeking maximum valuation of the debtor and maximum recovery for the shareholders. The duty to maximize value does not require, and differs from any duty, to press for a higher valuation that would enhance shareholder recoveries. Therefore, the debtor's shareholders, directors and officers do not adequately represent the equity, and appointment of a committee is appropriate. However, to address the cost factor, the court warns the committee not to duplicate the creditors committee role and to focus primarily on valuation and plan negotiation and fixes a tentative budget for committee professionals. In re Pilgrim's Pride Corp., 407 B.R. 211 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2009).

- 13.3.v Bankruptcy court may withdraw derivative standing. During the case, the court granted the equity committee derivative standing to pursue the estate's claims against certain creditors. The plan vested the claims in a litigation trust, which divested the committee of derivative standing to pursue the claims. Derivative standing does not transfer ownership of the claims, which remains with the estate. The bankruptcy court must regulate the derivative prosecution of litigation and therefore may withdraw the grant of derivative standing in its discretion. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in doing so here, because the transfer of the claims to the litigation trust was an integral part of a confirmed plan and because the equity committee had threatened disruptive tactics as against other interests of the estate in connection with pursuing the litigation. Official Comm. of Equity Sec. Holder v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re Adelpia Comm'ns Corp.), 544 F.3d 420 (2d Cir. 2008).
- 13.3.w Committee may not pursue an equitable subordination claim for the estate's benefit without court approval. The committee sought to bring an equitable subordination claim against a major creditor who had improved its position from unsecured to secured by lending additional funds shortly before bankruptcy. The chapter 11 trustee concluded the subordination claim lacked merit and refused to bring it. The court refuses to permit the committee to bring it, because the claim was for injury the debtor may have suffered. An individual creditor might have standing to bring such a claim if the claim were directed to a particularized injury the creditor may have suffered. But the committee does not have its own interest in subordination separate and apart from the estate's interest, which the trustee represents. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. Halifax Fund, L.P. (In re Applied Theory Corp.), 493 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2007).
- 13.3.x Court may revoke a committee's derivative standing. The court granted the equity committee derivative standing to pursue claims against the debtor's banks. Seventeen months later, after the committee had brought litigation against the banks on behalf of the estate, the court confirmed a chapter 11 plan that vested the claims in a litigation trust and deprived the committee of authority to pursue the claims any longer. To confer derivative standing, the court must find that doing so is in the best interest of the estate and necessary and beneficial to the fair and efficient resolution of the case. Once those conditions no longer exist, the court may withdraw derivative standing. The estate, acting through the debtor in possession, continues to own the claims, despite the court's grant of derivative standing to the committee to pursue them, thus presenting no obstacle to the withdrawal. In re Smart World Techs. LLC, 423 F.3d 166 (2d Cir. 2006), does not suggest otherwise. There, the court of appeals reversed the bankruptcy court's grant to the committee of derivative standing to settle a claim that the debtor in possession controlled. Smart World should be read as confirming the DIP's continued ownership of the claim, despite the grant of derivative standing, not (as others might suggest) as prohibiting the court from allowing a party in interest other than the named plaintiff to settle an action or from granting derivative standing after the action had been brought. (Interestingly, this judge had ruled in another proceeding in the same case that a creditors' committee would likely prevail on its claim on appeal that the debtor in possession could not settle an adversary proceeding that the committee was pursuing under derivative standing. ACC Bondholder Group v. Adelpia Comm'ns Corp. (In re Adelpia Comm'ns Corp.), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7416 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 24, 2007)). Official Comm. of Equity Sec. Holders v. Adelpia Comm'ns Corp. (In re Adelpia Comm'ns Corp.), 371 B.R. 660 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

13.3.y Debtor in possession may not settle committee's claim. The court granted the unsecured creditors committee standing, jointly with the debtor in possession, to pursue claims belonging to the estate. After extensive litigation and a mediation, the debtor in possession, but not the committee, agreed to a settlement with the defendants. Relying on In re Smart World Techs. LLC, 423 F.3d 166 (2d Cir. 2005), which prohibited a committee from settling claims belonging to the estate that only the debtor in possession was authorized to pursue, the bankruptcy court approved the settlement. In the context of a motion for a stay pending appeal, the district court rules that it was likely error for the bankruptcy court to approve the settlement without the committee's approval. The committee was an authorized party to the litigation, and the debtor in possession's agreement to a settlement could not deprive the committee of its rights as a plaintiff without its consent, in the same way that the committee in Smart World could not deprive the debtor in possession of its rights as plaintiff. ACC Bondholder Group v. Adelpia Commc'ns Corp. (In re Adelpia Commc'ns Corp.), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7416 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 24, 2007).

13.3.z A committee pursuing an estate cause of action does not succeed to the debtor's attorney-client privilege. The bankruptcy court gave the committee authority to pursue a fraudulent transfer action against the debtor's controlling shareholder, who also controlled the debtor's management. In response to committee discovery requests, the debtor asserted attorney-client privilege. The committee moved to compel discovery, based on CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343 (1985), arguing that as a plaintiff in an avoiding power claim, it succeeded to the debtor's attorney-client privilege, the same as a trustee does. The court rejects the argument. A conflict between the debtor and the estate does not by itself transfer control of the privilege to the committee. A committee's interests are narrower than a trustee's, as a committee represents only a segment of parties in interest. Control of the privilege remains with the debtor's management if the debtor remains in possession. Official Comm. of Asbestos Claimants v. Heyman, 342 B.R. 416 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

13.3.aa Committee's attorney's privileges apply only to work for the committee as a whole. Because of a seemingly intractable dispute between the debtor and the creditors committee and among committee members, the parties agreed to the appointment of an examiner. The court authorized the examiner to have access to attorney-client and work product privileged documents for the purpose of preparing the report, without waiving the privileges as to third parties, and temporarily sealed the report pending a determination of whether it should be sealed to protect privilege or as required under section 107(b). The report was sharply critical of some committee members, who asked that the report be sealed. The privileges for committee counsel apply only when counsel is advising the committee as a whole, not any of its individual members, because the committee exists to represent all creditors' interests, not just the interests of its individual members, and only on legal issues, not on matters of business strategy, such as the post-confirmation division of corporate governance powers among committee members. Information protected by the attorney-client privilege and the work-product privilege of a committee counsel do not fall within the ambit of section 107(b)(1)'s definition of "confidential research, development, or commercial information” because it does not relate to competitive advantage or commercial operations. In re Fibermark, Inc., 330 B.R. 460 (Bankr. D. Vt. 2005).

13.3.bb Committee member owes fiduciary duty to other members, even as to non-estate property.

The debtor was the recipient of a prepetition HUD housing grant. When the debtor encountered management problems, a competitor nonprofit agency agreed to provide management services. After the competitor terminated its services, the debtor filed chapter 11. The competitor had a claim and was appointed to the creditors’ committee. While serving on the committee, the competitor, without disclosure to other committee members, obtained a transfer of the HUD grant to itself. Once the debtor lost the grant, it became liable to matching fund donors for the return of their contributions, thereby increasing unsecured claims against the estate. The court of appeals had previously determined that the HUD grant was not property of the estate. Still, the competitor owed a fiduciary duty to other members of the committee in dealing with the grant. Committee service is to be used to advance the interests of unsecured creditors generally, not to advance the particular interests of the committee member. By taking advantage of what it learned during its committee service, the competitor breached its fiduciary duty to the committee’s other members. It should have advised the committee of its intent to pursue the grant and obtained court approval, because of the potential adverse effect on the estate. If the committee determined that it would not have an adverse effect on unsecured creditors, court approval might not have been required. In these circumstances, however, the competitor breached its fiduciary duty and was liable to the trustee. Westmoreland Human Opportunities, Inc. v. Walsh, 327 B.R. 561 (W.D. Pa. 2005).

13.3.cc Committee may pursue equitable subordination claim. A committee may bring an action to subordinate another creditor’s claim under section 510(c) directly, in its own right, and not derivatively through the estate. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors of Grand Eagle Cos. v. Asea Brown Boveri, Inc., 312 B.R. 219 (N.D. Ohio 2004).

13.3.dd Committee may not pursue derivative action once trustee acts. The committee brought an action, as authorized by a cash collateral order, against the lender to avoid prepetition transfers. After a trustee brought an action asserting the same claims, the committee no longer could sue derivatively, because a condition for a derivative action is that the trustee refuses to bring the action. In addition, an agreement between the trustee and the committee that the trustee would not settle the action without the committee’s consent was enforceable, because the action vested solely in the trustee, and the committee no longer had any right to control it. The committee represents only general unsecured creditors, while the trustee owes a fiduciary duty to the entire estate and all interests. Given the potential conflict between those positions, the committee may not control the trustee’s discretion. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors of Grand Eagle Cos. v. Asea Brown Boveri, Inc., 312 B.R. 219 (N.D. Ohio 2004).

13.3. ee Court may authorize creditors’ committee to sue on behalf of the estate. The creditors’ committee, with the consent of the debtor’s Bahamian liquidator (who had all the rights and powers of a trustee in the U.S. case), sued the debtor’s officers and directors for breach of fiduciary duty and mismanagement. In response to the defendants’ challenge to the standing of the creditors’ committee to sue, the Second Circuit rules that the committee may sue if it has the consent of the trustee and if the court finds that suit by the committee is both in the best interest of the estate and necessary and beneficial to the fair and efficient resolution of the bankruptcy case. Commodore Intl. Ltd. v. Gould (In re Commodore Intl. Ltd.), 262 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 2001).

13.3. ff Equity Committee allowed to purchase liability insurance. Equity Committee members threatened to resign unless they were authorized to purchase a liability insurance policy. The bankruptcy court approved the purchase as an administrative expense. The District Court affirmed, ruling that the expense was permissible if the existence of the Equity Committee was beneficial to the case, the Committee could not function without the expenditure, and the expenditure was reasonable under the totality of circumstances of the case. McDow v. Official Committee of Equity Security Holders (In re Criimi Mae Inc.), 247 B.R. 146 (D. Md. 1999).

- 13.3.gg Creditors' committee member may receive reimbursement of attorney's fees. The 1994 amendments to section 503(b) authorize a committee member to receive reimbursement for attorney's fees for its separate attorney for services rendered in connection with the member's performance of its duties as a member of the committee. First Merchants Acceptance Corp. v. J.C. Bradford & Co., 198 F.3d 394 (3d Cir. 1999).
- 13.3.hh Cash collateral order granting committee time to object is not authority to sue. In the usual cash collateral order, the creditors committee was given 30 days to challenge the banks security interest. The committee did so by filing an adversary proceeding to avoid the security interest. The court rules that the "authority to object" language in the order did not authorize the committee to commence an adversary proceeding. Nevertheless, the court authorized the adversary proceeding nunc pro tunc. Official Committee Of Unsecured Creditors Of America's Hobby Center, Inc. v. Hudson United Bank (In re America's Hobby Center Inc.), 223 B.R. 275 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1998).
- 13.3.ii Securities purchase rescission claimants may not serve on an equity committee. The United States trustee appointed a committee consisting of stockholders and class action claimants who were former stockholders and who asserted claims for rescission or damages relating to purchases of equity securities. The court disbanded the committee because it was composed of both equity security holders and creditors, even though the claims of the creditors were subordinated under section 510(b) to a level equal to the priority of common stock. In re Mercury Finance Co., 224 B.R. 380 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1998).
- 13.3.jj Committee granted authority to sue on behalf of the estate. After the unsecured creditors' committee brought an action on behalf of the estate for violation of the automatic stay, the debtor stipulated to the committee's representation of the estate for that purpose. The bankruptcy appellate panel approves the retroactive authorization, subject to court approval, of the committee representation of the estate. Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. Official Unsecured Creditors' Committee of Spaulding Composites Co. (In re Spaulding Composites Co., Inc.), 207 B.R. 899 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1997).
- 13.3.kk Creditors' committee lacked standing to sue for debtor's fraudulent conduct. The sole shareholder of the debtor looted the debtor, making numerous fraudulent transfers. After the statute of limitations had expired for the estate to bring a fraudulent transfer action under section 544(b), the creditors' committee brought an action on behalf of the estate against the transferees on state law grounds of breach of duty and misappropriation of corporate assets. Because of the participation by the debtor's principal in the transfers, the debtor would not have been authorized to bring the action against the transferees. As a result, the creditors' committee was not authorized to bring the action on behalf of the estate. The Mediators, Inc. v. Manney (In re The Mediators), 105 F.3d 822 (2d Cir. 1997).
- 13.4 Other Professionals
- 13.4.a Claims agent may not charge fee for private arrangement with claims trading platform. The debtor in possession employed a claims agent to receive and record filed proofs of claim and to maintain the claims register for the clerk of court. The claims agent had contracted with a company that runs a claims trading marketplace website to provide the claims register data in special electronic format for the website and to receive a portion of the fee that the company receives for each claim trade. 28 U.S.C. § 156(c) permits the court to use facilities to manage claim processing where paid for by the estate, which includes an estate-hired claims agent. The claims agent is an agent of the clerk. As such, it may not do anything the clerk may not do. Under sections 156 and 1930, the clerk may collect specified fees for specified services and for no others and may not take a fee for assisting a for-profit business. Therefore, the claims agent's agreement with the claims trading website provider violates section 156(c) and may not be approved. In re Madison Sq. Boys & Girls Club, Inc., 642 B.R. 487 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2022).

- 13.4.b Court denies financial advisor's request to increase fee cap under section 328(a). Three months after the COVID-19 pandemic began, the debtor in possession employed a financial advisor to arrange DIP and exit financing and to negotiate a reorganization plan. The engagement letter provided for a monthly fee, a financing fee (a percentage of each financing that the advisor arranged), and a restructuring fee, as well as a fee cap. The case took much longer than expected and required more financing than originally anticipated, primarily because of the length of the COVID-19 pandemic. As a result, the debtor in possession and the advisor requested an increase in the fee cap. The court approved the employment and the fee under section 328(a), which permits approval of employment on any reasonable terms and conditions and permits the court to allow compensation different from the approved amount only if the terms and conditions "provided to have been improvident in light of developments not capable of being anticipated" at the beginning. Showing a need for modification faces a high hurdle. Here, the services actually provided were all covered by the engagement letter; no additional kinds of services were rendered. The financial advisor provided no evidence of the scope and amount of services initially contemplated nor of how the additional time required could not have been anticipated. Therefore, the court denies the supplemental application to modify the terms and conditions of employment, In re LATAM Airlines Group S.A., 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 2553 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Sept. 17, 2022).
- 13.4.c Future Claims representative need not be disinterested. The debtor moved for the appointment of a future claims representative who had served in that role prepetition. The FCR's law firm represented him and also represented several insurance companies in coverage litigation on asbestos issues. The law firm had obtained an advance conflicts waiver from the insurers, making explicit that the firm might serve as counsel to an asbestos FCR. Section 524(g) requires the bankruptcy court to "appoint a legal representative for the purposes of protecting the rights" of future claimants but does not specify the representative's necessary qualifications. A legal representative is by nature one who owes fiduciary duties to an absent, represented constituent. Therefore, an FCR is, and must meet the standards applicable to, a fiduciary. The FCR need not be disinterested, as defined in the Code. That definition applies to a professional who owes duties to the estate, not to creditors and other parties in interest as an FCR does. To the extent any ethical conflict might have disqualified the FCR, the advance waiver cured it. Prospective waivers do not require a second round of consent once the conflict arises. Moreover, the conflict is not direct, because the coverage litigation and the claimants the FCR represents do not involve substantially related matters. They do not involve the same transactions or legal disputes, nor was there any substantial risk that the FCR would use any confidential information from the insurers in representing the future claimants. In re Imerys Talc Amer. Inc., 38 F.4th 361 (3d Cir. 2022).
- 13.4.d Disappointed professional has standing to assert RICO claim against competitor for noncompliance with disclosure obligations. In at least 13 cases in which the financial adviser was employed at the expense of the estate, it did not disclose all its connections, as required by Rule 2014. A competitor sued, claiming a RICO violation and a pay-to-play scheme. The competitor claimed it was injured by not being able to pitch for positions in a number of the cases and that the defendant adviser received employment in cases in which full disclosure would have disqualified it as not disinterested, taking opportunities away from the competitor. RICO provides a private right of action to anyone injured by a violation but requires an adequate showing that the violation caused the injury. In determining the complaint adequately alleged cause, the court of appeals stresses the importance of insuring the integrity of the bankruptcy system. Finding that the complaint adequately alleged that the financial adviser's conduct corrupted the employment process, the court determines that unsuccessful participants in the process are directly harmed, as are litigants who are entitled to a level playing field. The fraud alleged requires the courts' unique supervisory responsibilities. Therefore, the claim may proceed. Alix v. McKinsey & Co., Inc., ___ F.4th ___, 2022 U.S. App. LEXIS 1596 (2d Cir. Jan 19, 2022).

- 13.4.e A non-creditor party in interest is not entitled to a “substantial contribution” claim under section 503(b)(3). The debtor in possession settled with an adverse claimant. The county objected on the ground the settlement violated county ordinances; the court ordered mediation of the objection; and the parties reached a revised settlement agreement. The county did not have a claim but sought reimbursement of fees and expenses under section 503(b)(3)(D) for making a substantial contribution to the case. Section 503(b)(3)(D) permits reimbursement of expenses of a creditor, indenture trustee, equity security holder, or ad hoc committee for making a substantial contribution. The provision does not extend to parties in interest generally, only to the listed entities. Accordingly, the county did not have standing to seek reimbursement. In re Mt. Creek Resort, Inc., 616 B.R. 45 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2020).
- 13.4.f GOB sale advisor is not a professional person. Immediately before bankruptcy, the debtor contracted with a firm that specializes in conducting or advising on going-out-of-business sales for retail merchants. The agreement required the firm to advise on pricing, timing, staffing coordination, accounting, and communication relating to the DIP's planned retail GOB sales, but the DIP retained full authority over these matters. The agreement also permitted the firm to sell furniture, fixtures, and equipment and receive a 15% commission. The prices for the retail sales and the FF&E sales were fixed, not subject to bidding or negotiation, with the DIP fixing the retail prices, and the firm fixing the FF&E prices. Section 327(a) authorizes the employment of “appraisers, auctioneers, or other professional persons” subject to certain requirements and conditions. An auctioneer is one who conducts sales by bidding and sale to the highest bidders. A court determines whether a firm is an “other professional person” based on six factors: control or management of assets that are significant to the reorganization, involvement in negotiating a plan, direct relationship to the debtor's routine business operations, discretion to exercise professional judgment in part of administering the estate, extent of involvement in administration, and degree of specialized knowledge or skill employed. Here, the firm did not accept bids for assets and so was not an auctioneer. The firm did not control assets significant to the reorganization, was not involved in plan negotiations, had no discretion to administer the estate, and was not involved in administering the estate. Although the firm had specialized knowledge and skill, that factor is largely meaningless, since substantially all who work for any business requires specialized knowledge and skill. The work was not related to the debtor's routine operations, but that factor alone does not predominate in these circumstances. Therefore, the firm is not a section 327(a) “professional person.” In re Brookstone Holdings Corp., 592 B.R. 27 (Bankr. D. Del. 2018).
- 13.4.g Bankruptcy court affirms Alix Protocol. Four years before bankruptcy, the debtor hired a restructuring advisory firm and a managing director of the firm to manage day-to-day operations and supplement traditional in-house functions, including to supervise operational, financial, accounting, and treasury functions at the company, assist in cost reductions, and help develop budgets and business plans. The managing director was appointed as Interim Vice President of Operations. His role changed over the years, gaining increasing responsibility and titles. At one point, he became a director of a wholly-owned subsidiary. He spent little time as director; the board merely ratified decisions that the parent company and the officers, including the managing director, had already reached. He never served on the parent board. When the debtor filed chapter 11, he resigned his director position but continued as the debtor's CEO. The debtor sought to employ him and the advisory firm under section 363(b). Section 363(b) permits the debtor in possession to enter into non-ordinary course transactions after notice and a hearing. Courts have routinely permitted restructuring advisors to serve under section 363(b), without requiring that they meet the qualifications of a professional under section 327(a). To address the U.S. Trustee's position in these situations, the Executive Office of the U.S. Trustee had adopted the "Alix Protocol," under which the U.S. Trustee would not object to a restructuring manager's employment as an officer of the debtor in possession if the restructuring firm served in only one capacity and was subject to the board's direction and control. The Protocol was designed to prevent a manager from using a position in one capacity to benefit the manager in another capacity. The Protocol contains an exception when the manager served on the debtor's board. But the board service here was insignificant and, importantly, not at the parent company. Section 327's requirements were designed to apply to those brought in to reorganize the debtor and guide it through chapter 11; it was not intended to apply to traditional managers, including officers and directors, who would play a role in the reorganization through their ordinary roles at the company. The manager's service here as a director was de minimis, and he had served for four years as regular management of the company. Under the circumstances, section 327 does not apply to him or his firm, and the court authorizes his employment under section 363(b). In re Nine West Holdings, Inc., 588 B.R. 678 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2018).

- 13.4.h A prepetition custodian's postpetition expenses are allowable. The debtor made an assignment for the benefit of creditors. The assignee auctioned the debtor's assets. After the auction but before the closing of the sale, creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor. The debtor did not oppose, and the court entered an order for relief. Section 543(b) generally requires a custodian, including an assignee, to deliver property of the debtor to the trustee, but section 543(d)(2) permits the court to excuse an assignee's compliance with the turnover requirement. During the involuntary gap period, the court permitted the assignee to remain in possession and consummate the sale. The assignee and his counsel sought compensation from the estate. Section 503(b)(3)(E) permits the court to allow an administrative expense claim for "the actual, necessary expenses ... incurred by ... a custodian superseded under section 543 of this title, and compensation for the services of such custodian." Section 503(b)(4) permits an administrative expense for "reasonable compensation for professional services rendered by an attorney ... of an entity whose expense is allowable under" section 503(b)(3)(E). Section 543(c)(1) requires the court to "protect all entities to which a custodian has become obligated," and section 543(c)(2) requires the court to "provide for the payment of reasonable compensation for ... costs and expenses incurred by such custodian." The three provisions overlap to a degree and contain different standards for determining allowable amounts. Section 503(b)(3)'s "actual and necessary" standard should apply to the custodian's compensation that is to be paid from the estate, and section 543(c)(2)'s "reasonableness" standard should apply to compensation paid from another source. Sections 503(b)(3) and (4) are not limited to compensation and reimbursement for postpetition services, but such services are best reviewed under those sections. Finally, employment approval under section 327 is not required for allowance of postpetition compensation of the custodian or its counsel. In re Stainless Sales Corp., 583 B.R. 717 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2018).
- 13.4.i Real estate broker may not recover attorney's fees for defending a fee application. The estate employed a real estate broker on a 4% commission. The engagement letter contained a prevailing party attorneys' fees provision, but the order approving the employment did not specifically approve that provision. After the court overruled the estate's objection to the commissions, the broker sought its attorneys' fees for defending its commission. Under Baker Botts L.L.P. v. ASARCO LLC, 135 S. Ct. 2158 (2015), a professional may not receive reimbursement of attorneys' fees for defending a fee application under section 330(a)(1) because the American Rule requires each party to bear its own litigation costs and because such fees are not for services provided to the estate, as required under section 330(a)(1) for allowance. Although some courts have approved such fees where a specific agreement with the estate so provides, here, the order approving employment did not specifically approve such fees, and approval would be contrary to section 330(a)(1)'s command that professional fees be awarded only for services provided to the estate. Moreover, the broker's attorney's employment was not approved by the bankruptcy court, so its fees did not qualify for award under section 330(a). In re Capitol Litho Printing Corp., 573 B.R. 771 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2017).

13.4.j Court disallows investment banker's attorneys' fees incurred in litigating a success fee.

The court approved the debtor's employment of an investment banker, with compensation to be determined under section 328(a). The engagement agreement provided for payment of the banker's attorneys' fees to collect its compensation if not paid "when due." The banker raised capital, but the debtor disputed the right to a success fee. After confirmation, the court awarded the success fee, and the appellate courts affirmed the award, after which the bankruptcy court allowed the claim. The banker sought allowance of the attorneys' fees incurred in litigating the award. The confirmed plan provided that administrative expense claims must be filed within four months after the effective date and were due when allowed. Because the success fee was not due until allowed, the agreement's attorneys' fee provision did not apply to the pre-award attorneys' fees. Moreover, by waiting until after the award to seek attorneys' fees, the banker's claim was late. ASARCO, LLC v. Baker Botts LLP, 135 S. Ct. 2158 (2015), held that attorneys' fees incurred in collecting compensation from the estate are not allowable under section 330(a). Although the banker's success fee was governed by section 328(a), the agreement did not extend the section 328(a) standard to the attorneys' fees provision. So under ASARCO, the court applied section 330(a) and disallowed the fees. Finally, section 330 permits allowance of attorneys' fees only for counsel employed under section 327 at the expense of the estate. The banker's counsel was not so employed and so is not entitled to an award of fees. Roth Cap. P'ners, LLC v. Valence Tech., Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2017 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167539 (W.D. Tex. Oct. 10, 2017).

13.4.k Court questions Blackstone Protocol and allows a banker's transaction fee based on section 328(a) employment order.

The debtor in possession employed an investment banker, agreeing to pay a monthly fee and a "transaction fee" that was payable upon consummation of a restructuring transaction. The court approved the employment under section 328(a), with the "Blackstone Protocol," under which the U.S. trustee (but no other party) reserves the right to object to the banker's fees under section 330(a) at the case's conclusion. The case resulted in a restructuring transaction. The debtor in possession, the unsecured creditors committee and the U.S. trustee agreed on the appointment of a fee examiner and that the fee examiner would have the U.S. trustee's right to object to the banker's fees under section 330(a). The court approved the stipulation and the fee examiner's appointment, but provided in the approval order that the appointment did not change the standard for fee approvals. The banker applied for the transaction fee. The fee examiner objected, but the U.S. trustee did not. Section 328(a) permits the court to approve a professional's employment on any reasonable terms and conditions, which may not be revised except upon the occurrence of unanticipatable circumstances. Section 330(a) permits the court to allow reasonable fees for a professional's actual, necessary services but is mutually exclusive with employment approval under section 328(a). So the Blackstone Protocol might be inconsistent with the statute, unless the possibility of later U.S. trustee objection under section 330(a) is considered one of the terms and conditions of employment, but the court does not reach the issue here, because the U.S. trustee did not object. The appointment of a fee examiner was not an unanticipatable circumstance, so it did not permit the court to vary the terms and conditions of employment so as to permit the fee examiner to object under section 330(a). A banker's transaction fee in addition to monthly fees is common in the banking industry outside of bankruptcy and therefore a reasonable term and condition of employment, which the court may approve under section 328(a). If approved in advance under section 328(a), it is not a "bonus" or "fee enhancement" that requires a special showing. The court must allow it if the conditions for paying it under the employment agreement have been met. Here, the conditions were met, so the court allows the fee. In re Relativity Fashion, LLC, 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 4339 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Dec. 16, 2016).

- 13.4.l Plan may not provide for payment of committee members' professional fees. The debtor's plan provided for payment of the professional fees and expenses incurred by creditors committee members. Section 1123(b)(6) permits a plan to include any appropriate provision not inconsistent with applicable Bankruptcy Code provisions. The latter requirement prevents a plan provision from overriding any Bankruptcy Code requirement or prohibition. Section 503(b) authorizes the allowance of administrative expenses. Section 503(b)(3) authorizes allowance of committee expenses, excluding professional fees. Section 503(b)(4) authorizes allowance of professional fees for any entity whose expenses are covered under paragraph (3), including a committee, but excludes professional fees for committee members. Therefore, the plan provision is inconsistent with section 503(b)(4) and may not provide for the payment of the committee members' professional fees. However, section 503(b)(4) does not independently prohibit the payment of such fees under the "substantial contribution" provisions of that section. Davis v. Elliot Mgmt. Corp. (In re Lehman Bros. Holdings Inc.), 508 B.R. 283 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 13.4.m Firm's sharing of compensation with regular contract executive does not violate section 504 but does require a separate conflicts check and disclosure. The debtor in possession employed a turnaround management firm. The lead turnaround manager from the firm on the assignment was actually a contractor to the firm through his wholly-owned single member LLC, though he had the title of Executive Director with the firm. His contract provided that he would work exclusively for the firm and would be paid a fixed monthly amount plus 80% of the fees that he generated on this case plus an incentive payment related to the fees from this case. The firm charged the estate hourly fees. During the engagement, the firm and the lead manager amended his contract to permit him to seek assignments that might compete with the firm. The firm submitted a statement of disinterestedness under Bankruptcy Rule 2014 but had not run separate conflicts checks on the lead manager's connections. Section 504 prohibits a professional employed at the expense of the estate from sharing compensation with any other person, except that members, partners and regular associates of firms may share compensation among themselves. Whether a professional qualifies under the exception is based on a functional analysis rather than on the professional's title with the firm. Bankruptcy Rule 2016(a) requires that a fee application disclose any sharing agreement or understanding, "except that the details of any agreement by the applicant for the sharing of compensation as a member or regular associate of a firm of lawyers or accountants shall not be required." One of the disclosure's purposes is to require separate retentions, ensure disclosure of the contractor's connections that might show conflicts and thereby to leave decisions about retention with the bankruptcy court, rather than with the firm. Because the lead manager was acting as part of the firm, even though only under a contract with his single member LLC, he should be considered a regular associate or member of the firm. Still, Rule 2016(a) requires disclosure of the relationship, and Rule 2014 requires disclosure of any of the lead manager's connections, in addition to the firm's connections, with parties in interest in the case. Therefore, the firm's use of the lead manager in this case was proper, but its disclosure and its conflicts checks were inadequate. The court reduces the firm's and the lead manager's compensation as sanctions for the violations. In re GSC Group, Inc., 502 B.R. 673 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).
- 13.4.n Section 330 does not determine fees based only on financial benefit to the estate. The debtor's plan appointed a "Distribution Agent" who was also responsible for investigating and pursuing claims, objecting to creditors' claims and administering the post-confirmation assets. The Agent performed these tasks, resulting in limited creditor recoveries. A disappointed creditor objected to the Agent's fee application. Section 330 authorizes the court to allow reasonable fees for actual, necessary services, based on factors set forth in the section and in caselaw. A court may consider whether services benefit the estate. Services may be necessary to estate administration without providing financial benefit and may therefore benefit the estate without increasing creditor distributions. A court should not use hindsight to determine whether services were necessary. The standard is whether the services had a reasonable likelihood of benefitting the estate when provided. Otherwise, all bankruptcy compensation would be de facto contingent fees, which section 330 does not require. Because the Agent did not perform unnecessary services, adequately documented them and applied appropriate billing judgment, the court allows the fees. In re Blue Stone Real Estate, 487 B.R. 573 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2013).

- 13.4.o Court imposes high bar to revise compensation approved under section 328(a). The debtor in possession employed a financial advisor. The engagement agreement provided a list of services to be rendered and for a fixed monthly fee for two years, a lower monthly fee thereafter and a transaction fee. At the time, the DIP and the financial advisor anticipated that the advisor's role would be limited, because the estate's assets would be sold quickly. The bankruptcy court approved the fee agreement under section 328(a). The DIP later requested that the court approve additional compensation, based on a substantial increase in the advisor's work, but the court denied the request. The work increase resulted from a substantial increase in the length of the case, serious deficiencies in management capabilities and internal reporting systems, the departure of the board and the CEO and an unusual employee exodus. As a result, the advisor performed many services not covered by the agreement, essentially filling the management void. At the end of the case, the bankruptcy court awarded the advisor additional compensation for these services. Section 328(a) permits a court to approve terms and conditions of employment and later to allow different compensation "if such terms and conditions prove to have been improvident in light of developments not capable of being anticipated at the time of fixing such terms and conditions". Section 328(a) permits a court to approve terms and conditions without pre-approving final compensation, such as where a court approves an hourly rate but not the number of hours. But where the court approves terms and condition, the bar to revision at the case's end is very high. They may not be reviewed under section 330(a), only under the "not capable of being anticipated" standard of section 328(a). Developments are capable of being anticipated if the fee agreement contemplates their possibility. Here, the agreement provided for a monthly fee over a long period, so it anticipated that the chapter 11 case would not be just a quick sale. The advisor also could have contemplated that a company filing a chapter 11 case might have deficiencies in management and internal controls that would make reorganization more difficult. If the advisor did not know of these problems before agreeing to the fee, it could have sought compensation instead under section 330(a). Therefore, the advisor is not entitled to additional compensation for the extra work. ASARCO, L.L.C. v. Barclays Capital, Inc. (In re ASARCO, L.L.C.), 702 F.3d 250 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 13.4.p Court denies disqualification of expert witness for lack of specific conflict information. In unrelated class action litigation alleging that the defendants manipulated the natural gas markets, a fraudulent transfer adversary proceeding defendant had employed an expert to consult and testify on the defendant's risk management practices in connection with natural gas investments. The defendant's counsel deemed communications with the expert to be privileged and confidential for the purpose of assisting counsel in providing legal services, and the expert received numerous "confidential" and "highly confidential" documents from the defendant and its counsel. After the class action litigation settled, the adversary proceeding plaintiff (the trustee) sought to employ the same expert to testify on the defendant's due diligence processes in making investments with the Ponzi scheme debtor. The defendant objected on conflicts grounds but did not specify in any detail, even in camera, exactly what confidential information the expert had received. A federal court's power to disqualify an expert is based on its duty to protect the integrity of the legal process. To disqualify an adverse expert based on a prior relationship, the objector must show that it was objectively reasonable for it to conclude that it had a confidential relationship with the expert and that it disclosed relevant confidential information to the expert. The defendant here showed that it had a confidential relationship with the expert and that it was objectively reasonable for the defendant to believe that the information it provided to the expert was given in confidence. However, the defendant did not show that the information was relevant to the adversary proceeding. Without specifying what information the expert had received, the defendant had not shown that information about gas markets post-investment risk management practices were relevant to real estate pre-investment due diligence. Therefore, the court overrules the objection. In re Dreier LLP, 482 B.R. 863 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

- 13.4.q Realtor’s undisclosed adverse interest results in disgorgement. The debtor in possession retained a realtor to sell the estate’s real property. The realtor located a buyer with whom the realtor had a prior business relationship. The proposed buyer submitted a stalking horse bid and purchased the property with the court’s approval when no other bidders appeared. During the sale process, the buyer offered the realtor the opportunity to manage and acquire an interest in the property, and the realtor performed various administrative and financial tasks for the buyer. The realtor disclosed neither the buyer’s offer nor any of these activities to the court. After the sale closed, a creditor discovered the realtor’s activities and moved the bankruptcy court to order the realtor to disgorge his commission. A bankruptcy court may reduce a professional’s fee award on motion of a party in interest or on its own motion. Therefore, the creditor’s standing to request the disgorgement is not an issue that would prevent the bankruptcy court from acting. The bankruptcy court may deny fees where a professional has an interest adverse to the estate, which includes serving as a professional for a person who has “an economic interest that would tend to lessen the value of the bankruptcy estate” or that would create a dispute against the estate. Here, the realtor’s interest in the post-transaction operation gave him a reason to pursue the sale even if not in the estate’s interest. Therefore, the court orders disgorgement of the commission. Denison v. Marine Mile Shipyard, Inc. (In re New River Dry Dock, Inc.), 497 Fed. Appx. 882 (11th Cir. 2012).
- 13.4.r Fee-shifting statute limitations do not apply to bankruptcy fee awards. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has previously held that bankruptcy courts must determine fee awards based first on the lodestar principle (the number of hours reasonably spent times the prevailing hourly rate for similar work), which is subject to adjustment based on section 330(a) and on the 12 factors set forth in Johnson v. Ga. Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1974), including time and labor, novelty and difficulty, required skill, customary fee, whether the fee is contingent, amount involved and results obtained and awards in similar cases. The lodestar subsumes four Johnson factors (novelty and complexity, counsel’s skill, quality of the representation and results), so the court may make an adjustment based on results only in a rare and exceptional case. In Perdue v. Kenny A. ex rel. Winn, 130 S. Ct. 1662 (2010), the Supreme Court rejected use of the Johnson factors in cases involving fee shifting statutes and limited consideration to the lodestar. The Court of Appeals concludes that Perdue does not effectively overrule its prior precedents in bankruptcy cases. Although Congress has not defined what constitutes a “reasonable fee” in a fee-shifting case, it has done so through section 330 in bankruptcy cases. Therefore, Perdue’s conclusions about reasonableness in a fee-shifting case do not apply in a bankruptcy case. On that basis, over the U.S. Trustee’s Perdue-based objection, the Court affirms the bankruptcy court’s 15% ($1 million) fee enhancement to the debtor’s chief restructuring officer in a case that resulted in a 100% return to all creditors and $450 million in value to the debtor’s shareholders. CRG Partners Group, L.L.C. v. Neary (In re Pilgrim’s Pride Corp.), 690 F.3d 650 (5th Cir. 2012).
- 13.4.s Court denies expert witness fees because testimony did not provide identifiable, tangible, material benefit to the estate. The debtor retained an expert witness to testify at confirmation in support of its plan. The court denied confirmation without mentioning the witness’s testimony. The witness assisted the debtor in preparing for the confirmation hearing on an amended plan, which the court confirmed. The witness requested compensation of $27,475 under section 330. To be compensable under section 330, the services “must be necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time” rendered, and in retrospect, the services “must result in an identifiable, tangible, and material benefit to the bankruptcy estate”. A quantifiable or monetary return is not required. Here, the expert witness services were prospectively necessary to the administration of the case, and the witness did prepare and testify. However, because the court refused to confirm the plan and did not even mention the witness’s testimony in its findings or ruling, the services did not result in an identifiable, tangible and material benefit to the estate. The court denies the fee application. In re IRH Vintage Park Partners, L.P., 456 B.R. 673 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2011).

- 13.4.t Retained nonattorney professional's legal fees may be allowed. The debtor in possession retained a compensation consultant under section 327. The engagement agreement provided for reimbursement of the consultant's legal fees and expenses incurred in connection with the engagement. The court approved the engagement and the agreement. The consultant sought fees and expenses, including reimbursement for legal fees it had incurred in prosecuting approval of its retention and of its fee application. Section 327 requires prior court approval of employment of a professional by the estate. It does not, however, require prior court approval of employment of an attorney that does not represent the estate. It authorizes reimbursement of actual, necessary expenses of a retained professional. Because the Code and the Rules impose substantial obligations on a retained professional in connection with approval of its employment and of its fees, its employment of an attorney to represent it in carrying out those obligations may be necessary, and its legal expenses incurred therefore may be compensable, subject to ordinary reasonableness constraints. In re Borders Group, 456 B.R. 195 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).
- 13.4.u Estate-employed appraiser is entitled to quasi-judicial immunity. The individual chapter 11 debtor co-owned real property with a third party, who had agreed to pay a portion of the appraised value to the estate in settlement of disputes. The debtor in possession retained an appraiser under section 327, with court approval, to value the property. Based on the valuation and the resulting payment, the debtor confirmed a plan that paid all creditors in full. The court approved the appraiser’s fees. Later, the debtor sued the appraiser for fraudulent misrepresentation, gross negligence and willful and deliberate wrongful acts. A debtor in possession has the same role in a chapter 11 case as a trustee. A trustee would have had the role of valuing the property and determining the treatment of creditors. Those duties require judgment, for which a trustee is entitled to quasi-judicial immunity, because the judgment occurs in the exercise of a discretionary function and is functionally comparable to that of a judge. The same applies to an appraiser that a trustee or debtor in possession hires to perform similar judgmental duties. The appraiser is therefore entitled to the same immunity to which a chapter 11 trustee is entitled. McClelland v. Grubb & Ellis Consulting Servs. Co. (In re McClelland), 418 B.R. 61 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).
- 13.4.v Court disallows custodian’s fees and expenses incurred in opposing an involuntary bankruptcy petition. The state court appointed a liquidator for a partnership. One of the partners filed an involuntary petition against the partnership; the other opposed. The liquidator also opposed the petition. The bankruptcy court ultimately granted the order for relief. The custodian sought reimbursement of fees and expenses for its work. A state court liquidator is a “custodian”. Section 543(b) requires a custodian to deliver property to the trustee and file an accounting. Under section 543(c), the bankruptcy court must provide for reasonable compensation and reimbursement of expenses for the custodian. Section 503(b)(3)(E) grants administrative expense priority to “the actual, necessary expenses ... incurred by ... a custodian ... and compensation for the services of such custodian”. The words “actual, necessary” import a benefit to the estate requirement. Therefore, a custodian may not be compensated or reimbursed except for services that provide a benefit to the estate. Opposing the involuntary petition did not provide such a benefit and is not among a custodian’s enumerated duties in section 543(b). Therefore, the court denies compensation or reimbursement to the custodian for opposing the involuntary petition. Szwak v. Earwood (In re Bodenheimer, Jones, Szwak, & Winchell L.L.P.), 592 F.3d 664 (5th Cir. 2009).

- 13.4.w Court denies section 328(a) employment of committee financial advisors who proposed large nonrefundable fees. The debtor proposed a plan that left equity without any recovery. The equity committee believed that equity might be worth $200 million and sought to retain a financial advisor to value to the debtor and testify at the confirmation hearing. The equity committee rejected use of a favorable valuation that an individual shareholder had already obtained, because the valuation firm was not an industry expert nor in the valuation business. The proposed engagement provided for a nonrefundable initial fee of $500,000, a nonrefundable expert witness fee of $25,000 per day of testimony, and an extended assignment fee of $100,000 per month starting seven weeks after the engagement. The equity committee represented that it had investigated a dozen other firms and negotiated seriously with three of them, with a range of compensation arrangements, but selected this firm because of its attractive fee level and industry expertise. In response to the potential valuation litigation from the equity committee, the creditors committee also retained a financial advisor. The proposed engagement provided for a nonrefundable initial fee of $500,000 covering the initial two-week period, two additional nonrefundable fees of $100,000 for each of the next two two-week periods. The committee testified that the fee was the product of robust negotiations. Both employment applications sought fee approval under section 328(a). All testimony about market rates was conclusory, without specific examples. The debtor in possession would have to pay both sets of fees from cash collateral but had not been authorized to use cash collateral for that purpose, and the secured lender objected. Because section 328(a) applications bind the estate absent extraordinary circumstances, the court must act as a gate keeper on such applications. The court should consider the market, the sophistication of the parties, the best interest of the estate, creditor opposition and the reasonableness of the size relative to the size of the case. In this case, market data was insufficient to support the fees, and testimony about arms'-length bargaining over the fees was insufficient. The court must apply the section 330 hindsight best interest test to section 328 applications to prevent evasion of section 330's requirements. The evidence was insufficient to show a tangible, material benefit to the estate from the employment. Finally, the amounts, especially the per-day witness fee, were unreasonable. Therefore, the court denies the applications to approve employment. In re Energy P'ners, Ltd., 409 B.R. 211 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2009).
- 13.4.x Turnaround manager's and counsel's fees qualify for 506(c) surcharge on collateral. The debtor's secured lender had a lien on all of the debtor's assets. Upon filing its chapter 11 case, the debtor operated its business as a debtor in possession for about six weeks after bankruptcy, until a trustee was appointed. A liquidating trustee, who succeeded to the chapter 11 trustee's rights and claims, later sought to surcharge the secured creditor's collateral under section 506(c) for the costs and expenses incurred by the debtor in possession's turnaround management firm and the debtor in possession's counsel. Section 506(c) permits surcharge for "the reasonable, necessary costs and expenses of preserving, or disposing of, [collateral] to the extent of any benefit to the holder of the [secured] claim". Section 506(c) does not require that the estate actually have expended funds as a prerequisite to surcharge. Incurring the cost or expense suffices. The cost or expense must be necessary and reasonable. The cost of turnaround management, who takes over upon the CEO's unexpected resignation and maintains the business until it can be sold, is necessary to preserving and disposing of the secured creditor's collateral as a going concern. The debtor's law firm's services in filing and prosecuting the chapter 11 case are also necessary, because chapter 11's powers and protections allow the debtor in possession to maintain business operations and get the business ready for sale. The costs and expenses must be intended primarily to benefit, and must provide a direct benefit to, the secured creditor, as distinguished from the generalized benefits of chapter 11 to the estate, although the existence of incidental benefits to the estate does not disqualify the costs and expenses from eligibility for surcharge. Here, the effort to preserve the business and position it for sale in the six weeks before the trustee's appointment, and the costs and expenses of the turnaround manager and the debtor in possession's counsel, could qualify as costs and expenses incurred primarily for the secured creditor's benefit. Rifkin v. CapitalSource Fin. LLC (In re Felt Mfg. Co., Inc.), 402 B.R. 502 (Bankr. D.N.H. 2009).

- 13.4.y Committee retains standing even when its members no longer have unsecured claims. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan, which vested in the unsecured creditors committee the right to bring actions for recovery of claims the estate owned. During the course of one such action, all but one of the committee members had resigned. The remaining committee member's claim had been disallowed. The remaining committee member appointed substitute members (later confirmed by the U.S. Trustee) and resigned. Section 1102 requires that committee members hold unsecured claims when they are appointed, but does not require that they continue to do so during their service on the committee (even though the better practice is for them to do so or resign). A committee appointed under section 1102 has fiduciary duties independent of any obligations of individual committee members and a role that is separate from the role or standing of any individual committee member. Therefore, the remaining committee member's failure to have an allowed unsecured claim during most of the litigation did not affect the committee's standing to prosecute the litigation. Official C'tee of Unsecured Creditors v. Qwest Comm'ns Corp., 405 B.R. 234 (E.D. Mich. 2009).
- 13.4.z Court authorizes patient care ombudsman to employ counsel and medical advisor. The U.S. Trustee appointed a patient care ombudsman under section 333, who sought approval to employ counsel and his own hospital consulting firm as a medical operations advisor. Section 333 requires the appointment of a patient care ombudsman. Unlike other estate professionals, an ombudsman's interest may be adverse to the estate, and professional expenses that an ombudsman incurs will not necessarily benefit the estate. Still, section 333 contemplates that an ombudsman may be required to file and advocate motions, which requires the assistance of counsel. Therefore, employment of counsel is authorized for the limited purpose of assisting the ombudsman with legal issues and appearing in court. The ombudsman may also employ his consulting firm as an advisor, because the scope of services required of the ombudsman may be in excess of those that can be performed by one person. In such circumstances, the U.S. Trustee should consider appointing a firm, rather than an individual. But because the ombudsman here is an individual, the court authorizes limited employment of the consulting firm. In re Renaissance Hospital-Grand Prairie, Inc., 399 B.R. 442 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2008).
- 13.4.aa In pari delicto defense is available to estate professionals. The debtor reorganized based on faulty financial projections that the debtor and its professionals knew were stale. Six months later, the debtor failed and filed another bankruptcy case. The trustee sued the professionals in the first case for their gross negligence and breach of fiduciary duty in presenting the faulty financial information in support of confirmation. The in pari delicto defense bars a claim by a wrongdoer that is at least equally culpable with the defendants and where its application would not contravene public policy. The debtor knew as well as the professionals that the financial information supporting the confirmation order was faulty and therefore was at least equally culpable. The debtor's responsibility is not diminished by the defendants' being professionals the debtor retained. Finally, application of the defense is consistent public policy that courts should not resolve disputes among wrongdoers nor pardon the plaintiff's conduct by holding the defendant liable for actions for which the plaintiff is at least equally at fault. Gray v. Evercore Restructuring L.L.C., 544 F.3d 320 (1st Cir. 2008).
- 13.4.bb Bankruptcy court may apply lodestar analysis to financial advisor's fees. The debtor in possession sought to retain its financial advisor on a fixed fee basis. The bankruptcy court authorized employment only subject to fee review for reasonableness under section 330 at the end of the case. Having done so, the bankruptcy court may apply a lodestar analysis in determining a reasonable fee, despite the initial fixed fee agreement. Miller, Buckfire & Co., LLC v. Citation Corp. (In re Citation Corp.), 493 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2007).

- 13.4.cc Plastic surgery practice debtor is a “health care business”. The professional corporation debtor operates a plastic surgery practice, in which the sole physician performs some surgeries in his medical office. The debtor is a health care business, as defined in section 101(27A)(A), because it offers “services” to “the general public” for the “treatment of injury, deformity, or disease” and for “surgical care” and has a “surgical treatment facility”, as included under section 101(27A)(B)(i)(II), even though none of the treatment involves hospitalization, in-patient care, or a hospice, nursing, intermediate care, assisted living, or domiciliary care facility. Nevertheless, the physician had practiced for over 20 years with an unblemished medical record and carefully maintained patient records, and the debtor in possession projected positive cash flow during the case. Therefore, the court declines to order the appointment of a patient ombudsman, relying on the exception in section 333 that excuses appointment if the appointment “is not necessary for the protection of patients under the specific facts of the case”. In re William L. Saber, M.D., P.C., 369 B.R. 631 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2007).
- 13.4.dd Financial advisor does not typically owe fiduciary duties to its client. The debtor retained a financial advisor to advise on “strategic alternatives” under a common form of financial advisory services contract. Its duties included identifying possible strategic alternatives, evaluating them, presenting them to the debtor, assisting the debtor in narrowing the scope of alternatives, and assisting in execution. The debtor was running out of cash. Nevertheless, with full knowledge and based on the financial advisor’s advice, it selected a merger candidate that itself was short on cash and only expected to be able to raise funding to support the merged entity. After the merger failed and the debtor filed bankruptcy, the trustee sued the financial advisor for breach of fiduciary duty. The financial advisor did not owe the debtor a fiduciary duty. Its contract did not give it authority to act as an agent for the debtor, it was not the debtor’s broker, managing the debtor’s funds or other assets, and its advisory services were just that—advisory. They did not rise to the level of an involvement in the business, financing, or merger that would give rise to fiduciary duties to the debtor. e2 Creditors Trust v. Stephens, Inc. (In re e2 Commc’ns, Inc.), 354 B.R. 368 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006).
- 13.4.ee Despite criticizing their performance, court awards financial advisors bonuses. The plan resulted in payment of all creditors in full and a substantial return to equity. The financial advisors for the debtors in possession and the committees did not, however, contribute significantly to that success. They did not adequately perceive market shifts that led to higher valuations and stubbornly defended lower valuations. As a result, their positions delayed agreement in plan negotiations. In addition, they contributed little to formulating the plan’s post-confirmation simple capital structure. Nevertheless, they had negotiated success fees in their engagement agreements, and the court could not find that the agreements should be modified in light of circumstances that were not capable of being anticipated at the time. Therefore, the court awards the fees. It notes, however, that subsequent information showed that some financial advisors agree to serve estate fiduciaries under section 330’s standards to be determined after the services are rendered. The court notes the inappropriateness in future cases of awarding compensation without regard to either time spent (lodestar) or the result achieved, the benefit to the estate, and the financial advisor’s contribution to the result (contingency). In re Mirant Corp., 354 B.R. 113 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006).
- 13.4.ff Court denies substantial contribution fees to an ad hoc committee. The plan resulted in payment of all creditors in full and a substantial return to equity. Counsel for several ad hoc committees sought fees under section 503(b)(4) for making a substantial contribution to the case. Although courts have often required it for a section 503(b)(4) award, the section does not require a showing of benefit to the estate, only of a substantial contribution to the case, which the court in this case applies to mean a contribution to the proper allocation of value among stakeholders. Second, section 503(b)(4) permits an award even if the creditor did not work for the benefit of all parties in the case, as long as the creditor worked for the benefit of all members of its class.

Third, the creditor must not have taken the action primarily for the purpose of receiving compensation, but rather for the purposes of benefiting the case, its class, or recoveries. Fourth, the award's cost must not exceed the benefit conferred. Fifth, the creditor's efforts must not have duplicated the efforts of an estate-compensated party, such as an official committee. In addition, the cost of participation in the case of a distressed debt buyer who made a substantial investment profit by its participation is a cost of doing business, not a cost to be borne by creditors and shareholders generally. Here, the court denies fees for an ad hoc committee, formed to provide a voice for creditors who did not want to serve on the official committee and become restricted, for work which largely duplicated the official committee's work (but did so more aggressively and therefore may have delayed the case's resolution or otherwise increased costs). The court also denies fees for expert witnesses, because section 503(b)(4) mentions only attorneys and accountants. In re Mirant Corp., 354 B.R. 113 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006).

- 13.4.gg British Virgin Islands liquidator succeeds to debtor's attorney-client privilege. The debtor was in a liquidation proceeding in the British Virgin Islands. The liquidator filed an ancillary proceeding under section 304. Based on the reasoning of CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343 (1985), that "the actor whose duties most closely resemble those of management should control the privilege in an insolvency proceeding," the court determines that the liquidator, whose powers and duties are comparable to those of a chapter 7 trustee, controls the privilege. In re Gold & Appel Transfer S.A., 342 B.R. 386 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2006).
- 13.4.hh Court may reduce a professional's fee under an approved engagement agreement only based on unanticipatable improvidence. The bankruptcy court authorized the debtor in possession's employment of a financial advisor at a fixed monthly fee and a fixed restructuring fee, determining that the requested fees were reasonable, but subject to final review under sections 328 and 330. Section 328(a) provides that the court may not reduce the previously approved fee unless the "terms and conditions prove to have been improvident in light of developments not capable of being anticipated at the time of the fixing of such terms and conditions." Upon final application, despite the reservation of section 330 review in the initial employment, the court may not re-determine reasonableness under section 330(a) at the end of the case without compliance with section 328(a). Lazard Freres & Co. v. NorthWestern Corp. (In re NorthWestern Corp.), 344 B.R. 40 (D. Del. 2006).
- 13.4.ii Court denies indenture trustee's and its counsel's fees. The assets in a chapter 11 case were sold in a section 363 sale, and a plan was subsequently confirmed to distribute the cash and remaining assets. The indenture trustee, who served on the creditors' committee, sought compensation for itself and its counsel as an administrative expense for a substantial contribution in the case and as an unsecured claim against the debtor under the indenture. The court denies a substantial portion of the request. The indenture trustee acts as a fiduciary for its noteholders. It may be allowed fees for a substantial contribution only to the extent it demonstrates that its services actually benefited the estate, rather than only the noteholders. Its service on the committee does not qualify as such a benefit, because committee members are not entitled to compensation for their service for the estate. The trustee and its counsel were allowed substantial contribution claims only for their work on the plan and other aspects of the case that covered matters that committee counsel would normally handle but that did not duplicate committee counsel's work. Moreover, its counsel's fees for attending committee meetings would be denied under the substantial contribution standard and as an unsecured claim, because most of the time was spent accompanying the indenture trustee's representative, who was inexperienced in reorganization cases, to committee meetings and acting, in effect, as an additional committee member. That is not a proper role for counsel. In re Worldwide Direct Inc., 334 B.R. 112 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).

- 13.4.jj Examiner’s report should not be sealed under section 107(b). Several individuals who were discussed in an examiner’s report asked the bankruptcy court to seal the report under section 107(b)(2), which requires sealing of any document filed in a bankruptcy case that contains scandalous or defamatory material. Because section 107 addresses public access to documents filed in a bankruptcy case, it supplants the common right of access to court records. Therefore, section 107 completely abrogates the common law process of first determining whether the document is a “judicial record” and, if so, balancing the public interest against privacy interests. Section 107(b)(2) permits sealing of defamatory material only if the statements in the material would alter a person’s reputation in a reasonable person’s eyes and the material is untrue or potentially untrue and is either irrelevant to the proceeding in which the material is filed or is included in the material for an improper purpose. The material in the examiner’s report may be potentially untrue, because the examiner notes that his conclusions are not final and may be changed by further investigation. But the statements are relevant and included for a proper purpose in that the report and its scope were ordered by the bankruptcy court. Therefore, the court does not seal the report. Gitto v. Worcester Telegram & Gazette Corp. (In re Gitto Global Corp.), 422 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2005).
- 13.4.kk Examiner’s report should not be sealed under section 107(b). Because of a seemingly intractable dispute between the debtor and the creditors committee and among committee members, the parties agreed to the appointment of an examiner. The court authorized the examiner to have access to attorney-client and work product privileged documents for the purpose of preparing the report, without waiving the privileges as to third parties, and temporarily sealed the report pending a determination of whether it should be sealed to protect privilege or as required under section 107(b). The report was sharply critical of some committee members, who asked that the report be sealed. When a party has consented to the appointment of an examiner, the party cannot object to the publication of the report on the grounds that the report contains information unfavorable to the party. Section 107(b)(2)’s “scandalous or defamatory” exception to disclosure does not encompass statements in an examiner’s report that may be inflammatory or intemperate, as the examiner’s report reflects opinion and advice, not determination of facts, and the court should not need to determine whether the examiner’s report should be adopted as the findings of the court before it may be placed in the public record. Nevertheless, it is appropriate to include a cautionary legend on each page of the report. In re Fibermark, Inc., 330 B.R. 460 (Bankr. D. Vt. 2005).
- 13.4.ll Bankruptcy court may impose hourly rates on financial advisor who normally bills monthly. The court had previously ordered that all professionals in the case must keep time records and that fees would be based primarily on time spent and hourly rates. The creditors committee still applied to employ a financial advisor at a monthly rate. The financial advisor agreed at the employment hearing that its fees would be subject to reasonableness review at the case’s end. On the final fee application, the bankruptcy court disallowed the monthly rate and imposed an hourly rate. Doing so was well within the bankruptcy court’s discretion, because there was no prior agreement that the financial advisor was entitled to monthly rates. In addition, section 330 looks to the time spent on an engagement. It does not require hours as the unit of time measurement, but hours is a useful measure of the effort devoted to an engagement. Therefore, the advisor’s monthly fees are disallowed in favor of a calculation based on hours spent. Houlihan Lokey Howard & Zukin Capital v. Unsecured Creditors’ Liquidating Trust, 427 F.3d 804 (10th Cir. 2005).
- 13.4.mm Bankruptcy court may not reduce compensation approved under section 328(a) except upon unforeseeable circumstances. The bankruptcy court approved the employment of the creditors committee’s financial advisor under section 328(a) on a monthly and transaction fee basis. Upon the advisor’s final fee application, the court reduced the monthly fee by 50%, based on the duplication of effort by the committee’s and the debtor’s financial advisors. The two advisors' engagement letters clearly set forth the services of each, much of which overlapped. Therefore, the duplication of effort was "capable of being anticipated at the time of the fixing of [the] terms and conditions" of employment and could not form the basis for reducing the fee. In re Northwestern Corp., 332 B.R. 534 (D. Del. 2005).

13.4.nn Debtor in possession's officers must disclose potential conflicts relationships. Shortly after bankruptcy, the debtor in possession hired a new president to oversee the liquidation. The president was a 50% partner in a company whose other partner was a senior partner in the law firm representing the creditors committee. There was no actual conflict of interest, as the company was not involved in the chapter 11 case at all, nor was disclosure required by Rule 2014 or by section 327(a), which apply only to professionals. Nevertheless, the court announces that failure to disclose such relationships, involving potential conflicts, in future cases may subject the officer to review and possible compensation disgorgement. In re eToys, Inc., 331 B.R. 176 (Bankr. D. Del. 2005).

13.4.oo Court denies indenture trustee's substantial contribution claim. The indenture trustee acted on behalf of bondholders in the chapter 11 case, achieving a better recovery for them as compared to the recovery of the general unsecured creditors. It also assisted in communications with bondholders, including in noticing, voting, and distribution procedures. The court denies a claim for reimbursement of the indenture trustee's attorneys' fees under section 503(b)(4) for making "a substantial contribution in the case." The applicant's motive in performing the services is irrelevant, as long as the services foster and enhance the progress of the case. But the applicant has made a substantial contribution only if the estate would not have received the benefit but for the applicant's efforts. In addition, the benefit must be conferred on the estate, not only to a limited class of creditors. Expected or routine activities do not qualify. Here, the indenture trustee's activities on behalf of the bondholders, to whom it owed a fiduciary duty, do not constitute a substantial contribution. Protecting the rights of the bondholders in plan negotiations and litigation is not a contribution that benefits the estate. The communications procedures were both routine and expected and also primarily for the benefit of the bondholders. Fulfilling fiduciary duties does not benefit the estate. Finally, a provision in the indenture granting administrative expense priority to such expenses establishes only a contractual right; it has no bearing on the substantial contribution analysis. Therefore, the fees were denied. In re American Plumbing & Mech., Inc., 327 B.R. 273 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2005).

13.4.pp Court denies equity holders' substantial contribution claim. The debtor's founders participated actively in negotiating a plan and contributed to a consensual resolution of the case. These activities do not justify an award of attorneys' fees for making "a substantial contribution in a case." Negotiation is an expected activity in a chapter 11 case. Reaching settlement requires more than one party to agree. Finding one party's agreement to constitute a substantial contribution would require finding all other parties' agreements to constitute a substantial contribution as well, ultimately entitling all participating creditors to attorneys' fees. Therefore, the fee application is denied. In re American Plumbing & Mech., Inc., 327 B.R. 273 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2005).

13.4.qq Financial advisor's transaction fee is limited, based on amount of debt restructured. The debtor engaged a financial advisor's prepetition, who obtained investors for a restructuring plan. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession moved for court approval of the engagement, with a fixed transaction fee if the plan were consummated and a reasonable fee to be determined if an alternative, stand-alone plan that did not involve a new money investment were consummated instead. The court granted the application under section 328. Upon consummation of the latter plan, the advisor sought a transaction fee equal to the fee approved for the new money plan. The court approves a lower transaction fee, based on a percentage of the amount of debt actually restructured — that is, that received a recovery under the plan — rather than on the total amount of the debtor's debts. In doing so, the court notes that "success" is not required to support a transaction fee; the market should determine reasonableness. In re XO Communications, Inc., 323 B.R. 330 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005).

- 13.4.rr Financial advisor's success fee is paid only from recovery of benefited class. The U.S. trustee appointed a bondholders committee and a trade creditors committee. The court approved the trade committee's employment of a financial advisor, but required that the advisor's success fee be paid only from trade creditor recoveries, not as a general administrative expense. Section 328(a) permits employment "on any reasonable terms and conditions." The restriction on the payment of the advisor's fees is reasonable under the circumstances of this case. Therefore, the court of appeals rules that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in imposing it. In re Farmland Indus., Inc., 397 F.3d 647 (8th Cir. 2005).
- 13.4.ss Examiner with undisclosed personal interest is denied all fees. Shortly after his appointment, the examiner negotiated secret, private deals with at least one unsecured creditor for payment of his fees based on a percentage of increased recoveries to the creditor. Despite Rule 2016(a), the examiner did not disclose the arrangements or the negotiations in any of his interim fee applications. His conduct prevented him from being disinterested, because he had a personal stake in the recovery of selected creditors. Second, he violated his disclosure obligation by failing to disclose the arrangement. Third, he violated his duty of loyalty to the estate by misrepresenting his actions to the court and the parties during his negotiations. For his conduct and his personal interest in the outcome, he was denied all fees and ordered to disgorge all fees that he had previously received. Although the court does not formally require it, it suggests that such a denial and disgorgement order is required if a fiduciary such as an examiner or a trustee is not disinterested at any time during his service to the estate. United States v. Schilling (In re Big Rivers Electric Corp.), 355 F.3d 415 (6th Cir. 2004).
- 13.4.tt Financial advisor's fees are disallowed for nondisclosure. During the chapter 11 case, individual principals of the financial advisor conducted negotiations with an individual major stockholder and creditor of the debtor over an unrelated joint venture investing in troubled companies. The joint venture might use the services of the financial advisor in connection with those investments. One of the principals was named as the person responsible for the financial advisor's engagement by the debtor but charged less than 1% of the financial advisor's time. The court rules that the negotiations constituted a "connection" that must be disclosed under Bankruptcy Rule 2014 and ordered disgorgement of approximately two-thirds of the financial advisor's fees. In re Condor Systems, Inc., 302 B.R. 55 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2003).
- 13.4.uu Bankruptcy court may impose monthly fee cap on a professional. The equity committee sought to retain a financial advisor. The bankruptcy court approved the employment, but imposed a monthly cap of $30,000 and required the advisor to use accounting and other financial information generated by the debtor's financial advisor. Such a decision was proper. Section 328 permits employment on "any reasonable terms and conditions." The bankruptcy court is permitted by that section to impose limits. Moreover, requiring the committee's financial advisor to rely on data generated by other financial advisors does not create a conflict of interest under section 1103, because obtaining such information does not amount to representation of another entity in connection with the case. Committee of Equity Securityholders v. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Federal Mogul-Global Inc.), 348 F.3d 390 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 13.4.vv A nursing home consultant is not a section 327 professional. The U.S. Trustee objected to fees paid to nursing home consultants who developed operating protocols, helped restructure the salary scale, and consulted on dietary, housekeeping, and laundry services. The U.S. Trustee argued that the employment had not been previously approved under section 327. The court traces the history of the use of the term "professional" and the case law construing it and concludes that it should be applied principally to those whose position in a reorganization case “could be leveraged into questionable commitments for future work [in bankruptcy] based on factors other than qualification.” As a result, the court overrules the objection. Office of U.S. Trustee v. McQuaide (In re CNH, Inc.), 304 B.R. 177 (Bankr. M.D. Pa. 2004).

- 13.4.ww Third Circuit approves financial advisor indemnification. The Third Circuit approves as reasonable a financial advisor’s retention agreement under which the debtor in possession indemnifies the financial advisor for losses other than those resulting from the advisor’s gross negligence, bad faith, willful misfeasance, or reckless disregard of its obligations, but including those caused by the advisor’s ordinary negligence. In doing so, however, the court defines a new standard of negligence for financial advisors, based on the standard applicable to corporate directors under Delaware law. Under the new standard, financial advisors may be indemnified against liability “when they (1) have no personal interest (2) have a reasonable awareness of available information after prudent consideration of alternative options, and (3) provide that advice in good faith.” Failure to meet that standard amounts to “gross negligence” for which the advisor may not be indemnified. The advisor also may not be indemnified for losses resulting from its own breach of the engagement agreement nor limit the gross negligence exclusion to losses caused “solely” by gross negligence. In re United Artists Theatre Co., 315 F.3d 217 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 13.4.xx Court rejects indemnification for committee financial advisor. The committee sought to employ a financial advisor, with a provision in the engagement agreement that the debtor would indemnify the financial advisor for all acts except gross negligence, willful misconduct, breach of fiduciary duty, bad faith, or self dealing. The bankruptcy court found that the indemnification was not reasonable under the circumstances of the case, particularly because the debtor/indemnitor had no control over or direct relationship with the financial advisor/indemnitee. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit B.A.P. concludes that the bankruptcy court did not adopt a per se rule against indemnification and that the court did not abuse its discretion in denying indemnification in this case. Unsecured Creditors Committee v. Pelofsky (In re Thermadyne Holdings Corp.), 283 B.R. 749 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2002).
- 13.4.yy Nondisclosure of fee negotiations renders examiner not disinterested, requires disgorgement. Though disinterested at the time he was appointed, the examiner subsequently attempted to get certain major creditors to pay his fees directly if he was not paid from the estate at the conclusion of the case. Once one of the creditors agreed, the examiner promptly disclosed it. The court rules, however, that his prior negotiations rendered him not disinterested, because a disclosure of the negotiations would have removed his neutrality and the appearance of impartiality that is required under the disinterestedness standard, especially for an examiner. As a result, because the negotiations happened early in the case, before the examiner had received any fees, he was not disinterested at all relevant times, and, under section 328(c), the court required him to disgorge all fees received. In re Big Rivers Electric Corp., 284 B.R. 580 (W.D. Ky. 2002).
- 13.4.zz Pre-approval of a professional’s terms of employment require express reference to section 328 in the application. Section 327 permits a trustee to employ professionals, while section 328 permits approval of the terms and conditions of employment and restricts the court from revising the terms and conditions at the end of the case or from examining the fees for reasonableness under section 330. In this case, although the professional’s employment application provided for the specific terms and conditions of employment and the fees to be paid, it did not specifically refer to section 328. Because of that omission, the bankruptcy court could examine the fees for reasonableness under section 330, without regard to the terms and conditions upon which the professional was originally employed. The court of appeals adds that it is the better practice for the employment order as well as the application to make specific reference to section 328. Circle K Corp. v. Houlihan, Lokey, Howard & Zukin, Inc. (In re Circle K Corp.), 279 F.3d 669 (9th Cir. 2002).

- 13.4.aaa Liquidating trust has fiduciary duty to creditors. The confirmed plan provided for the establishment of a liquidating corporation to liquidate the assets of the estate and distribute them to creditors. The liquidating corporation refused to account to the creditors on collection and disbursements. Its refusal constituted a breach of fiduciary duty to the creditors to provide an accounting. The absence of the word “trust” from the plan language did not detract from the liquidating corporations fiduciary to creditors. Pioneer Liquidating Corp. v. United States Trustee (In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortgage Entities), 264 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2001).
- 13.4.bbb Court upholds broad indemnity provision for financial advisor. Rejecting the United States trustee’s argument that a financial advisor may not be indemnified at all, let alone for negligence, the court approves a broad financial advisor indemnity provision that carves out only bad faith, gross negligence, and willful misconduct. The court rejects a per se rule based on the ability of a fiduciary to obtain indemnity for negligence, finding that the common law and corporate statutes permit indemnification of fiduciaries, such as trustees and corporate officers and directors, for negligence. Based on the facts of the case, the court finds the retention agreement reasonable. In re Joan and David Halpern, Inc., 248 B.R. 43 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2000).
- 13.4.ccc Professionals disqualified for inadequate disclosure. In its employment application, Pricewaterhouse disclosed its engagement by the plaintiff in a state court prepetition action against the debtor only in general terms, without naming the creditor. When the creditor later objected to PricewaterhouseCoopers’ employment, the court disqualified PricewaterhouseCoopers for its inadequate disclosure under Bankruptcy Rule 2014. Hale and Dorr also represented the same plaintiff, but not in the state court litigation. It was involved, however, in the transaction that gave rise to the plaintiff’s claim against the debtor. Once again, it described its involvement too generally, without specifics such as the fact that three of Hale and Dorr’s partners had been called as deposition witnesses in the litigation. The court disqualified Hale and Dorr for both nondisclosure and nondisinterestedness reasons, blending together a single standard that encompasses nondisinterestedness and holding or representing a material adverse interest. In re Filene’s Basement, Inc., 239 B.R. 845, 850 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1999).
- 13.4.ddd A creditor is denied standing to object to examiner’s fees. A creditor who would not be affected by the amount of compensation paid to an examiner in a chapter 11 case was denied standing to object to the fees. Only the reorganized debtor, which would actually pay the fees, had standing to object. In re Big Rivers Electric Corp., 233 B.R. 754 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 1999).
- 13.4.eee Agreed fees allowed in full. An investment banker was retained with an agreement under section 328 fixing its compensation. At the conclusion of the case, the bankruptcy court reduced the allowed compensation. The Fifth Circuit reversed, holding that an agreement under section 328 takes priority over the reasonableness standard of section 330. Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Securities Corporation v. National Gypsum Company (In re National Gypsum Company), 123 F.3d 861 (5th Cir. 1997).

13.5 United States Trustees

- 13.5.a Liquidating trust must pay U.S. trustee fees. The debtor’s plan provided for the creation of a liquidating trust and transfer to the trust of all its assets, with the trust to be the successor to the debtor for all purposes. It also provided for the trust to pay quarterly fees imposed under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) until the issuance of a final decree or the case is closed or dismissed. Section 1930(a)(6) requires payments of a fee calculated based on “all disbursements.” Although the statute does not specifically say who shall pay, context suggests it is the debtor. The liquidating trust succeeded to that obligation. Disbursements include payments to the debtor’s creditors, even though they became trust beneficiaries and therefore equitable owners of the trust's assets upon the plan's effective date. The payments are still disbursements and subject to the fees. In re Health Diagnostics Lab., Inc., ___ B.R. ___ (Bankr. E.D. Va. Jan. 4, 2023).

- 13.5.b 2018 U.S. trustee fee increase violates Constitution's Uniformity Clause. Effective January 1, 2018, Congress enacted U.S. trustee fee increases for all pending and future chapter 11 cases. The Judicial Conference is authorized to impose fees on chapter 11 cases in Bankruptcy Administrator districts and had done so since 2001, mirroring the same rates as the U.S. trustee fees. However, it did not implement the 2018 increase until October 1, 2018 and applied it only to newly-filed cases. The Constitution requires that laws on the subject of bankruptcies be uniform throughout the United States. "Laws on the subject of bankruptcies" is broad and encompasses both substantive and procedural laws. This law, which addresses bankruptcy fees, is therefore a law on the subject of bankruptcies. Although the uniformity requirement permits Congress some flexibility to address regional or geographic differences, it does not permit arbitrary geographically disparate treatment of debtors. The fee difference here resulted from a budgetary shortfall in the U.S. trustee districts that did not occur in the Bankruptcy Administrator districts. But that difference resulted only from Congress' arbitrary separation of the districts into two separate systems with two separate funding mechanisms. Congress may not treat debtors differently based on an artificial funding distinction that Congress itself created. Therefore, the fee disparity violates the uniformity requirement. Siegel v. Fitzgerald, 596 U.S. ___, 142 S. Ct 1770 (2022).
- 13.5.c 2018 U.S. Trustee fee increase is unconstitutional as applied to then-pending chapter 11 cases. The debtors filed their cases in 2016. In 2017, Congress amended section 1930(a) of title 28, which governs U.S. trustee fees for chapter 11 cases, to increase the fees effective January 2018 for each case for disbursements made in each quarter after the effective date. The fee increase did not apply in Bankruptcy Administrator districts, where chapter 11 fees are set by the Judicial Conference under a statute that then authorized, but did not require, that the Judicial Conference set BA district fees to be equal to UST district fees. Courts apply a presumption against retroactive application of a new statute to avoid notice and other issues, first determining what the statute expressly provides and second whether the statute would impair a party's rights, increase liability for past conduct, or impose new duties regarding completed transactions. If it would, then the statute would not apply retroactively unless it expressly provided otherwise. Here, the statute is sufficiently clear that it applies to disbursements in each quarter starting in January 2018, without excluding pending cases, and so applies to the debtors' cases. Moreover, it applies only to post-enactment disbursements, so it does not apply to past conduct or completed transactions. The Constitution authorizes Congress to enact "uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States," which requires geographic uniformity. Because the statute imposes a fee that estates must pay before paying creditors and therefore affects the relation between a debtor and its creditors, it is a law on the subject of bankruptcies. Uniformity requires that a bankruptcy law apply uniformly to a defined class of debtors, not based on their geographic location. The fee increase applies based on location and therefore violates the Uniformity Clause. John Q. Hammons Fall 2006, LLC v. U.S. Trustee (In re John Q. Hammons Fall 2006, LLC), ___ F.4th ___, 2021 U.S. App. LEXIS 29917 (10th Cir. Oct. 5, 2021).
- 13.5.d 2017 U.S. Trustee fee increase is constitutional and applies to pending cases. In 2017, Congress amended 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) to increase U.S. Trustee fees, effective January 1, 2018, including to then-pending chapter 11 cases. The fees are entitled to priority as an administrative expense. At the time, section 1930(a)(7) authorized but did not require the Judicial Conference to charge the same fees in chapter 11 cases pending in Bankruptcy Administrator district. The Judicial Conference increased fees effective October 1, 2018, but not for then-pending cases. The debtor filed its chapter 11 case in 2008. Under its confirmed plan, a liquidating trustee administered the case. The trustee brought an action to recover the difference in fees it paid compared to the fees it would have paid in a Bankruptcy Administrator district.

Laws on the subject of bankruptcies must apply uniformly to a defined class of debtors and be geographically uniform. The uniformity requirement does not prohibit a law that addresses regionally isolated problems. Here, the U.S. Trustee program suffered budgetary pressures, while the Bankruptcy Administrator program did not. Because the fee increase was directed to addressing the budget problems in the U.S. Trustee districts, it qualified as a law that addressed only a regionally isolated problem. Siegel v. Fitzgerald (In re Circuit City Stores, Inc.), 996 F.3d 156 (4th Cir. 2021).

- 13.5.e 2017 U.S. Trustee fee increase is unconstitutional. In 2017, Congress amended 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) to increase U.S. Trustee fees, effective January 1, 2018, including to then-pending chapter 11 cases. The fees are entitled to priority as an administrative expense. At the time, section 1930(a)(7) authorized but did not require the Judicial Conference to charge the same fees in chapter 11 cases pending in Bankruptcy Administrator district. The Judicial Conference increased fees effective October 1, 2018, but not for then-pending cases. In 2020, Congress amended section 1930(a)(7) to require the Judicial Conference to charge the same fees, although the Judicial Conference has not yet implemented the change with respect to cases that were pending on October 1, 2018. The debtor filed its chapter 11 case in December 2017. It later brought an action to recover the difference in fees it paid compared to the fees it would have paid in a Bankruptcy Administrator district. A law imposing fees on bankruptcy estates is a law on the subject of bankruptcies, because it affects the recoveries of creditors, who may receive payment only after payment of the U.S. Trustee fees. Therefore, it must comply with the Constitution's uniformity requirement. The treatment of estates in U.S. Trustee districts differs from their treatment in Bankruptcy Administrator districts and is therefore non-uniform. Non-uniformity may be justified by a geographically isolated problem. However, in this case, the difference between the U.S. Trustee districts and the Bankruptcy Administrator districts, though geographically isolated, is based on a geographical distinction Congress created, which cannot then be used to justify additional geographical differences. Therefore, the fee increase is unconstitutional, and the debtor in possession is entitled to the refund. Clinton Nurseries, Inc. v. Harrington (In re Clinton Nurseries, Inc.), 998 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2021).
- 13.5.f Litigation trust disbursements are not subject to U.S. Trustee fees. On the debtor's plan effective date, the estate transferred claims against a third party to a litigation trust for the benefit of creditors. The transfer to the trust was in consideration of the releases of claims against the debtor, and for tax reasons, the parties were required to treat the transfer as a transfer directly to the trust beneficiaries, followed by a contribution by the beneficiaries to the trust. Upon the transfer, the debtors and their estates had no further interests in the trust assets or the trust. During the calendar quarter in which the trust transfer was made, the estate paid U.S. Trustee fees under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a), based on the amounts included in the transfer. Later, the trust settled the litigation against the third party and received a payment, which it distributed to the trust beneficiaries. Section 1930(a)(6) requires payment of U.S. Trustee fees each quarter in every chapter 11 case based on the amount of "disbursements" until the case is closed or dismissed. Courts have interpreted "disbursements" to mean those made by or on behalf of a debtor or its estate and those in which the debtor or estate had some interest in or control over the money disbursed. Because the debtor and the estate had no interest in the litigation proceeds, the transfer to the trust was actually to and for the benefit of the trust beneficiaries, and the estates had paid a U.S. Trustee fee based on the distribution to the trust, the disbursement of litigation proceeds were not by or on behalf of the debtor and were not subject to the U.S. Trustee fee. In re Paragon Offshore, PLC, Case no. 16-10386-CSS (Bankr. D. Del. June 28, 2021).
- 13.5.g 2017 UST fee increase does not apply to pending cases and would be unconstitutional otherwise. The debtor filed a chapter 11 case in 2016. In 2017, Congress increased the chapter 11 U.S. trustee fee schedule under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) with respect to "disbursements made in any calendar quarter that begins on or after the date of enactment." The U.S. trustee applied the new schedule to the debtor's case. By contrast, in the bankruptcy administrator districts, the amended schedule applied nine months later and not to pending cases. After a structured dismissal, the debtor sued the U.S. trustee for a refund of the increased fees it had paid. Legislation is prospective unless Congress expressly provides otherwise. Unlike other provisions in the same enacting statute and in prior amendments to the same schedule, the fee schedule amendment did not say it applied to pending cases. Although the "disbursements" language in the effective date provision suggests application to pending cases, the lead-in to section 1930(a), "The parties commencing a case under title 11 shall pay ... the following fees," fixes the fee payment obligation at the petition date. The fee calculations in later quarters are ministerial based on the schedule that the statute imposed at the filing date. Therefore, without express language that the amendment applied to pending cases, it did not. If it did, the disparity between the fee schedule in the U.S. trustee districts and in the bankruptcy administrator districts would violate the Constitution's Bankruptcy Uniformity Clause. In re USA Sales v. Office of the U.S. Trustee, ___ B.R. ___, 2021 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64396 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 1, 2021).

- 13.5.h Increase in U.S. Trustee fees is temporarily unconstitutional. In October 2017, Congress increased quarterly U.S. Trustee fees for chapter 11 cases, effective January 1, 2018. The increase did not apply in the non-U.S. Trustee districts of Alabama and North Carolina. In those districts, the Judicial Conference determines Bankruptcy Administrator fees, which had been previously set in the same amounts as U.S. Trustee fees. The Judicial Conference increased fees in those districts effective October 1, 2018 to the same amounts as Congress imposed in U.S. Trustee districts effective January 1, 2018. The Constitution authorizes Congress to enact uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. Although different results in bankruptcy cases are permissible based on underlying state law, Congress may not enact different results in different parts of the country. By increasing U.S. Trustee fees in only 48 states, Congress enacted a non-uniform bankruptcy law. Therefore, the increase violates the Uniformity Clause for the nine months between January and October 2018 when the fees in the two states were different, and the estate is not required to pay the increased fees during that time. In re Buffets, LLC, ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 396 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. Feb. 8, 2019).
- 13.5.i U.S. trustee fee does not apply to re-advance of funds swept under a roll-over postpetition credit facility. The debtor in possession agreed with its prepetition revolving lender on a postpetition facility. Under the facility, the DIP deposited its collections of both pre- and postpetition accounts receivable into its account with the lender, who swept the funds to reduce the prepetition loan amount, and re-advanced the same amount (less interest and other charges) under the postpetition facility. The DIP and the lender viewed the arrangement as a cash management device for the DIP and a means of rolling over the lender's prepetition claim into a postpetition claim that is entitled to administrative expense priority. The arrangement did not reduce the lender's claim; it just changed its priority. Section 1930 of title 28 requires a trustee or DIP to pay quarterly fees to the United States trustee equal to a percentage of "disbursements." The statute does not define "disbursements." Most ordinary usage definitions define it as paying out money. However, because the total indebtedness amount did not change, the deposit and sweep, followed by a re-advance in the same amount, should not be considered a disbursement that is subject to the U.S. trustee fee. In re Cranberry Growers Coop., ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 2878 (Bankr. W.D. Wisc. Sept. 21, 2018).
- 13.5.j U.S. Trustee has standing to appeal an order striking a petition. The debtor filed her voluntary petition without obtaining the credit briefing (counseling) that section 109(h) requires. The bankruptcy court struck the petition. The U.S. Trustee appealed. Ordinarily, an appellant must be a "person aggrieved", which requires that the appellant be directly and adversely pecuniarily affected by the order on appeal. However, the pecuniary interest standard is not the sole test for bankruptcy appellate standing. Section 307 provides that the U.S. Trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in a case. It evidences a Congressional intent that the U.S. Trustee represent the public interest in bankruptcy cases and therefore in appeals. The U.S. Trustee therefore has standing to appeal the bankruptcy court's dismissal order. Adams v. Zarnel (In re Zarnel), 619 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2010).

- 13.5.k U.S. Trustee is entitled to chapter 11 fees for any quarter in which the estate makes no disbursements. The debtor confirmed a chapter 11 plan, but the case remained open pending resolution of an adversary proceeding.. The debtor made no disbursements during the post-effective date period. It sought an order closing the case. The U.S. Trustee requested payment of quarterly fees for the post-effective date period. Section 1930(a)(6) provides that a quarterly fee "shall be paid" to the U.S. Trustee in a chapter 11 case "for each quarter ... until the case is converted or dismissed" or closed. The minimum fee is payable for each quarter "in which disbursements total less than $15,000". Zero is less than $15,000, and the statute provides that the fee "shall be paid" for each quarter. Therefore, according to its plain meaning, the statute requires the payment of the minimum fee even for quarters during which there is no disbursement. Clippard v. Ky. Processing Co. (In re Ky. Processing Co.), 418 B.R. 217 (E.D. Ky. 2009).
- 13.5.l United States trustee has standing to bring equitable subordination action. The United States trustee brought an adversary proceeding alleging that the defendants' actions had resulted in an improper diminution in the estate's value, to the detriment of creditors, including the United States government. The United States trustee also claimed to be a creditor of the estates. The United States trustee has standing to bring this action. A creditor has standing to bring an adversary proceeding to equitably subordinate a claim. In addition, the United States trustee may act in the public interest in bringing an action, relying on its standing under section 307 to raise and appear and be heard on any issue in a case. Clippard v. LWD, Inc. (In re LWD, Inc.), 342 B.R. 514 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 2006).
- 13.5.m Post-confirmation U.S. Trustee fees are based on all disbursements made by a reorganized debtor. The quarterly United States trustee fee payable under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) is based on disbursements. The Ninth Circuit holds that the phrase is not limited to disbursements from the bankruptcy estate but includes payments made by a reorganized debtor during the post-confirmation period. Tighe v. Celebrity Duplicating Services, Inc. (In re Celebrity Duplicating Services, Inc.), 210 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2000).
- 13.5.n U.S. trustee fees granted priority. Following the decision of the Eighth Circuit, the Ninth Circuit rules that the unpaid quarterly chapter 11 fees of the United States trustee share pro rata with chapter 7 administrative expenses in a case that is converted from chapter 11 to chapter 7. U.S. Trustee v. Endy (In re Endy), 104 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1997).

14. TAXES

- 14.1.a State's strict property tax foreclosure law is unconstitutional. Under state law, a county could conduct strict foreclosure—that is, take title without a foreclosure sale process—to real property on which there were delinquent real property taxes. The Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause prohibits the government from taking private property for a public use without just compensation. A land owner retains equitable title, that is, the equity in the property's value over and above the amount of any liens, including tax liens, on the property. The courts protect that equity by requiring a foreclosure sale to determine the property's value and to provide the portion of the sale price in excess of the lien to the land owner. The state's failure to do so under its real property tax foreclosure statute amounts to a taking of the land owner's property without just compensation and so is unconstitutional. Hall v. Meisner, 51 F.4th 185 (6th Cir. 2022).

- 14.1.b Liquidating trustee may not make refund determination request under section 505. The debtor confirmed a liquidation plan, which provided for creation of a liquidation trust and appointment of a liquidation trustee. The liquidation trustee filed a request with the IRS for a refund based on prior year losses. The IRS issued a tentative refund, but it had about two years in which to initiate deficiency proceedings to recover the refund. The trustee requested a court determination of the trust’s liability for return of the refunds. Section 505(a)(1) permits the court to determine the amount or legality of any tax, but section 505(a)(2)(B)(i) prohibits the court from determining a right to a refund for 120 days after the trustee properly requests the refund. Section 505 is a jurisdictional statute and must be narrowly construed. A liquidating trustee, as a representative of the estate under section 1123(b)(3), is not a “trustee” as that term is used in the Bankruptcy Code. Therefore, section 505(a)(1) does not permit the liquidating trustee to make the refund determination request. In re GUE Liquidation Cos., 642 B.R. 683 (Bankr. D. Del. 2022).
- 14.1.c Section 505 gives the bankruptcy court jurisdiction to determine a state or local property tax. The county imposed a prepetition ad valorem property tax on the debtor’s property. The debtor paid the tax and sued for a refund in state court. After plan confirmation, the reorganized debtor brought an adversary proceeding under section 505 to determine the amount or legality of the tax. Section 505(a)(1) gives the bankruptcy court jurisdiction to determine the amount or legality of any tax, whether or not paid and whether or not contested. However, the Tax Injunction Act deprives the court of jurisdiction to “enjoin, suspend or restrain the assessment, levy or collection of any tax under State law.” Because the TIA has been interpreted to prohibit determination of refunds, the two statutes conflict. Section 505’s predecessor statute was enacted 29 years after the TIA. Generally, the later enacted statute controls. Section 505 is more specific than the TIA, and the more specific statute generally controls the more general one. Section 505(a)(2)(C) prohibits the court from determining the amount or legality of an ad valorem property tax if the period under applicable nonbankruptcy law to challenge the tax has expired, and section 505(b)(1)(A) requires the clerk to maintain a list of federal, state, and local taxing authorities addresses for service of requests under section 505. Both provisions evidence Congressional intent that section 505 applies to state and local property taxes. Therefore, the court denies the county’s motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. WPG Northtown Venture, LLC v. Cnty. of Anoka (In re Wash. Prime Grp., Inc.), 642 B.R. 771 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2022).
- 14.1.d Erroneous postpetition refund claim and tax on prepetition straddle-year income are not entitled to administrative expense priority. About two weeks after its return was due, the debtor paid the IRS $15.8 million to apply to its anticipated income tax liability. Two weeks later, it filed bankruptcy. During the case, the trustee filed the debtor’s tax return for the year before the petition date. The IRS issued a $15.5 million refund to the trustee. The IRS later disallowed deductions claimed on the return and filed an administrative expense claim to recapture the refund amount. The trustee also filed a return for the year in which the petition date occurred. All the debtor’s income in that year was accrued before the petition date. The IRS filed an administrative claim for the taxes owing for that year as well. Section 503(b)(1) grants administrative expense priority to any tax “incurred by the estate,” except a tax entitled to priority under section 507(a)(8). Section 507(a)(8) grants priority to “a tax on or measured by income ... for a taxable year ending on or before” the petition date. Section 507(c) provides a governmental unit’s claim “arising from an erroneous refund or credit of a tax has the same priority as a claim for the tax to which such refund or credit relates.” This provision is not limited to erroneous prepetition refunds. Therefore, the claim for the erroneous refund is entitled only to prepetition priority under section 507(a)(8). Federal income taxes are incurred when they accrue, not when payment is due. The debtor’s income for the straddle year occurred, and therefore the tax on it was incurred prepetition, and therefore is entitled only to prepetition priority under section 507(a)(8). Darr v. U.S. (In re TelexFree), 615 B.R. 362 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2020).
- 14.1.e Straddle year corporate income taxes are entitled to administrative expense priority. The debtor sold all its property before filing its bankruptcy petition, which it filed on October 15. Its regular tax reporting year ended on December 31. Section 503(b)(1)(B) grants administrative expense priority to “any tax incurred by the estate ... except a tax of a kind specified in section 507(a)(8).” An income tax of a kind specified in section 507(a)(8) is one for which the return is due prepetition. The return for the straddle year was due postpetition, after the close of the tax year. A tax is “incurred.” When it accrues and becomes a fixed liability. Applicable tax law determines when that occurs. For federal income taxes, the tax accrues and becomes fixed at the close of the tax year. Therefore, the tax was incurred by the estate, not by the prepetition debtor, and is entitled to administrative expense priority. U.S. v. Beskrone (In re Affirmative Inc. Holdings Inc.), 620 B.R. 73 (D. Del. 2020).

- 14.1.f Straddle-year taxes are not entitled to tax priority or full administrative priority. The debtor shut down most of its operations before it filed its chapter 11 petition in October. It had only minimal income between the petition date and year end. The IRS filed an administrative expense claim for the taxes for the full calendar year. Section 507(a)(8)(A) grants eighth priority to income tax claims “for a taxable year ending on or before the date of the filing of the petition.” Because the taxable year here ended after the petition date, the tax claim is not entitled to eighth priority. Section 503(b)(1)(B) grants administrative expense priority to taxes “incurred by the estate.” An income tax is incurred on the last day of the taxable year. However, prepetition income on which the tax is imposed is not earned by the estate; and administrative expense priority should be given only to obligations that resulted in a benefit to the estate. Accordingly, the tax associated with prepetition income is not “incurred by the estate.” Only the tax arising from the postpetition income is entitled to administrative expense priority. In re Affirmative Ins. Holdings, Inc., 607 B.R. 175 (Bankr. D. Del. 2019).
- 14.1.g Section 505 permits a tax refund claim initiated by the debtor before bankruptcy. The debtor challenged the state taxing authority’s assessment of its real property for ad valorem tax purposes and, before bankruptcy, filed an action in state court for a refund of taxes previously paid based on the challenged valuation. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession sought the refund in an action in the bankruptcy court. Section 505(a) permits the court to “determine the amount of legality of any tax ... whether or not previously assessed, whether or not paid” However, section 505(a)(2)(B)(i) prohibits the court from determining “(B) any right of the estate to a tax refund, before ... 120 days after the trustee properly requests such refund” In a chapter 11 case, the debtor is a debtor in possession, which has all the rights and powers of a trustee, and is not a separate entity. Therefore, in a chapter 11 case in which the debtor remains in possession, the debtor’s prepetition request for a refund satisfies the requirement that the trustee have properly requested the refund. However, the court ultimately dismisses the action on sovereign immunity grounds. In re La Paloma Generating Co., 588 B.R. 695 (Bankr. D. Del. 2018).
- 14.1.h The IRS’s claim against a debtor for transferee liability under IRC 6901(a) is not a priority tax claim. The debtor was an employee of and owned a minority stock interest in a corporation that failed to pay any income taxes that it owed. The debtor received dividends on the stock interest while the corporation was insolvent. After the United States assessed the taxes against the corporation, it sued the debtor under the state’s Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act and obtained a judgment against the debtor, relying on section 6901(a) of the Internal Revenue Code, which provides that transferee liabilities under state law “shall be assessed, paid, and collected in the same manner ... as in the case of the taxes with respect to which the liabilities were incurred.” Section 507(a)(8)(A) grants a priority for any tax “on or measured by income or gross receipts.” Section 6901(a) is a procedural statute providing for collection; it does not impose a tax. Liability under section 6901(a) is based solely on state transferee liability law and is measured by the transfer amount, not the tax amount. Accordingly, transferee liability under section 6901(a) does not meet the requirements of section 507(a)(8) for priority. In re Kardash, 573 B.R. 257 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2017).
- 14.1.i State law specifying interest rate only in bankruptcy is not a “nonbankruptcy law.” The debtor’s chapter 13 plan provided for payment of delinquent taxes, plus interest at 12%. A state statute imposed a 12% interest rate and a 6% penalty rate on overdue taxes. The statute provided, “For purposes of any claim in a bankruptcy proceeding ..., the assessment of penalties ... constitutes the assessment of interest.” Under section 511, the present value calculation of plan tax payments must use “the rate determined under applicable nonbankruptcy law.” States may promulgate bankruptcy laws, as long they are not inconsistent with federal law. Therefore, “nonbankruptcy law” in section 511 means federal or state law that applies generally, not only in bankruptcy. The state law here treating the penalty as interest applies only in bankruptcy cases and is therefore a bankruptcy law. Therefore, under section 511, it is not a “rate determined under applicable nonbankruptcy law.” Tennessee v. Hildebrand (In re Corrin), 849 F.3d 653 (6th Cir. 2017).

- 14.1.j Bankruptcy and Internal Revenue Codes do not preempt state insurance company rehabilitation order prohibiting non-insurance parent from taking worthless stock deduction. The debtor’s sole subsidiary was an insurance company that entered rehabilitation before the debtor filed its chapter 11 case. The debtor and its subsidiary were part of a consolidated tax group. Their tax allocation agreement did not address treatment of tax attributes, such as NOLs. The subsidiary had accrued large NOLs, and the debtor in possession wished to abandon the subsidiary’s stock and take a worthless stock deduction, which would have prevented the subsidiary from using the NOLs to reduce its future taxes. The rehabilitation order prohibited waste of the subsidiary’s assets, which the court interpreted to include reduction or elimination of its NOLs, in which the subsidiary retained a property interest. The debtor’s right to abandon the stock and take a worthless stock deduction were property of the estate, which is determined as of the commencement of the case. At that time, the rehabilitation order prohibited the debtor from exercising any such rights, so they came into the estate with the same restriction. Federal law or a court order preempts a state law or court order by doing so expressly or impliedly, by occupying the field of if the state law obstructs the federal law’s accomplishment of its purposes. Here, the rehabilitation order does not conflict with the uniform application or purpose of the Internal Revenue Code in permitting a worthless stock deduction. It is solely directed at rehabilitation of an insurance company, does not occupy the same space as the Code and does not change the standards or rules for taking the deduction. Therefore, the Code does not preempt the rehabilitation order. Triad Guar. Inc. v. Triad Guar. Ins. Corp. (In re Triad Guar. Inc.), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82932 (D. Del. June 27, 2016).
- 14.1.k Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to determine tax penalty in non-surplus individual chapter 7 case. The individual chapter 7 debtors admitted liability for tax deficiencies but disputed the associated penalty. The tax claim plus other undisputed claims exceeded the value of property of the estate, so any penalty, which is subordinated under section 726(a), would not affect the distribution to other creditors. The debtors challenged the penalty in the bankruptcy court under section 505(a), which gives the bankruptcy court authority to determine the amount or legality of any tax or penalty. 28 U.S.C. § 1334 establishes the bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction. Section 505 does not expand it. The bankruptcy court may hear a proceeding only if it comes within the scope of section 1334’s jurisdictional grant of “arising in,” “arising under” or “related to.” A proceeding arises in a case only if it may arise only in bankruptcy. The tax penalty arises independently. A proceeding arises under title 11 if it invokes a substantive right that title 11 provides, not if it only invokes a procedural right. The tax penalty arises under the Internal Revenue Code, not title 11. A proceeding is related to a case if it affects distributions to creditors from the estate. Because there are insufficient assets to pay all creditors in full, the allowance of the subordinated tax penalty will not affect distribution. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction over the proceeding. In re Bush, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106671 (S.D. Ind. Aug. 12, 2016).
- 14.1.l Tax foreclosure sale not based on a competitive auction might be avoidable as a fraudulent transfer. The county auctioned the tax lien on the debtor’s property under the “interest rate method” of tax foreclosure. Under this method, potential buyers purchase only the tax lien, not the underlying property, and they bid only the interest rate they will charge the delinquent tax payer if it redeems from the tax lien within two years. Bidding is not based directly on the property’s value. The buyer purchased the tax lien for the delinquent tax amount, which was between 4% and 8% of the property’s value. The debtor failed to redeem, so the buyer obtained and recorded a tax deed to the property. Within two years after the buyer obtained the tax lien deed from the county, the debtor filed a chapter 13 case and sued to avoid the tax sale as a constructively fraudulent transfer. A chapter 13 debtor may avoid a transfer as constructively fraudulent if the transfer was made for less than reasonably equivalent value, while the debtor was insolvent and within two years before bankruptcy. Under BFP v. Resolution Trust Corp., 511 U.S. 531 (1994), a regularly conducted mortgage foreclosure sale is deemed to be for reasonably equivalent value. BFP’s touchstone is the competitive auction for the property itself at the foreclosure sale. Here, there is no such auction, and the sale price has no particular relation to the property’s value. Therefore, the BFP presumption does not apply. A purchase price of 4% to 8% of the property’s value is not reasonably equivalent value. Therefore, the debtor may avoid the transfer. Smith v. SIPI, LLC (In re Smith), 811 F.3d 228 (7th Cir. 2016).

- 14.1.m Section 502(b)(3) does not apply to secured water and sewer charges but limits secured property tax claim to the property’s value and disallows any deficiency claim. The county asserted two secured claims against the debtor’s hotel, one for delinquent property taxes for about $1.9 million, the other for unpaid water and sewer charges also for about $1.9 million. The hotel was worth only about $700,000. Section 502(b)(3) requires the court to disallow a claim for property taxes to the extent that the claim exceeds the value of the debtor’s interest in the property. The water and sewer charges are for actual usage. If unpaid, state law provides that the delinquent charges shall be entered as a lien on the tax roll and “be enforced in the same manner as provided for the collection of taxes.” The requirement that they be collected in the same manner as taxes does not convert them into a tax claim, so section 502(b)(3) does not apply. The Tax Injunction Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1341, prohibits a district court from enjoining, suspending, or “restraining the assessment, levy, or collection of any tax under State law where a plain, speedy and efficient remedy may be had in the courts of such State.” But it does not prevent enforcement of the Bankruptcy Code’s provisions governing allowance of tax claims against an estate. Therefore, the county’s secured property tax claim is limited to the hotel’s value. Because section 502(b)(3) limits the claim’s allowed amount, not just the allowed secured claim amount, the county does not have a deficiency claim under section 506(a) to which section 1111(b) would apply. Shefa, LLC v. Oakland County Treasurer (In re Shefa, LLC), 535 B.R. 165 (E.D. Mich. 2015).
- 14.1.n Trustee may pay administrative tax liability only “after notice and a hearing.” The debtor filed its chapter 11 petition in January 2005. The case converted to chapter 7 in October 2005. In May 2009, the chapter 7 trustee filed a federal income tax return for the estate’s 2005 income tax liability and paid the tax owing on the return. In May 2012, the trustee filed his final report and account. A creditor objected on the ground that the trustee should have given notice of his intent to file the return and pay the tax. Section 503(b) provides that administrative expenses shall be allowed “after notice and a hearing.” The estate’s tax liability is an administrative expense, and the Internal Revenue Code requires the trustee to file a return for the estate’s liability and pay the tax owing even if the IRS does not file an administrative expense claim. Section 503(b)’s requirement of notice and a hearing is mandatory and does not conflict with the IRC’s filing and payment requirement. Therefore, the court may not approve the trustee’s final report without providing an opportunity to determine the estate’s tax liability. Dreyfuss v. Cory (In re Clooback), 788 F.3d 1243 (9th Cir. 2015).
- 14.1.o Tax attributes of disregarded entity are not property of the debtor or the estate. The single-member LLC debtor incurred losses for four years before bankruptcy. The debtor was a disregarded entity for tax purposes. Its parent corporation applied the debtor's tax losses in the parent's tax return, creating a tax benefit for the parent. After bankruptcy, the trustee sought turnover and recovery from the parent under sections 542 and 549. A disregarded entity does not have a separate existence for purposes of the Internal Revenue Code; its taxpayer parent is treated as owning all the entity's assets and owing all the entity's liability. Therefore, any tax benefit that the debtor generated was not property of the debtor or the estate, so the trustee may not obtain turnover from the parent, and there was no transfer that the trustee could avoid and recover. Stanziale v. CopperCom, Inc. (In re Conex Holdings, LLC), 518 B.R. 792 (Bankr. D. Del. 2014).

- 14.1.p Section 505 does not apply to a liquidating trustee appointed under a plan. The liquidating trustee appointed under the confirmed plan sought a refund from the U.S. of prepetition taxes by way of a counterclaim to the government's administrative expense claim. Neither the debtor in possession nor the liquidating trustee had previously filed a refund request with the IRS. A federal court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over an action against the government unless the government has waived sovereign immunity. Section 505 permits the bankruptcy court to determine the amount and legality of any tax refund claim, but only if the trustee has properly requested the refund from the government and the government has either determined the request or 120 days has elapsed. Sections 106 and 505 provide an immunity waiver, but as a jurisdictional statute, section 505 must be strictly construed. Its reference to the "trustee" includes only a trustee appointed during the case, whose rights and powers are determined by the Code, not under a plan, which determines a liquidating trustee's rights and powers independent of the Code. Therefore, section 505's immunity waiver is not available to a liquidating trustee, and the bankruptcy court is without jurisdiction to hear the refund claim, which the liquidating trustee must pursue in district court. U.S. v. Bond, 762 F.3d 255 (2d Cir. 2014).
- 14.1.q Severance pay is subject to FICA taxes. The debtor in possession terminated its entire workforce in stages during its chapter 11 case as it closed its retail locations and wound down its headquarters operations. It paid some employees severance payments under a prepetition severance plan during their regular pay periods starting upon their termination and others upon termination under a postpetition plan in a lump sum. None of the payments were compensation for any services. An employer owes FICA taxes on wages. Separately, the Internal Revenue Code defines a category of supplemental unemployment compensation benefits (an SUB payment) as a payment to an employee under an employer's plan that is made because of the employee's involuntary separation from service resulting from a reduction in force, discontinuance of a plant or operation or other similar condition and that is included in gross income. The Code does not expressly specify whether SUB payments are wages for purposes of FICA taxes. Reviewing legislative history and case law, the Court concludes they are. Therefore, the debtor in possession is not entitled to a refund of FICA taxes paid on the employees' severance payments. U.S. v. Quality Stores, Inc., 572 U.S. ___, 134 S. Ct. 1395 (2014).
- 14.1.r Unemployment tax rating may not follow buyer in sale free and clear. The trustee sold an operating business. The order approving the sale provided that the sale was "free and clear of all liens, claims, encumbrances and interests" and that the sale would not cause the purchaser "to be deemed a successor in any respect to the Debtors' businesses within the meaning of any ... state ... tax ... law, rule or regulation." After the sale, the state department of labor applied the debtors' experience rating to the purchaser for the purpose of determining the purchaser's unemployment tax rate. The purchaser moved in the bankruptcy court to enforce the sale order against the labor department. Section 363(f) allows the trustee to sell property of the estate "free and clear of any interest in such property." "Interest" includes any obligation that arises from the property being sold. The department of labor's attempt to transfer the unemployment insurance compensation rating is an attempt to collect money that the debtor would have paid if it had not sold its assets, so the asset transfer, rather than the continuation of the business, triggers the imposition of the higher experience rating and therefore violates the sale order. In re Tougher Indus., Inc., 2013 Bankr. LEXIS 1228 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. Mar. 27, 2013).

- 14.1.s Shareholders' agreement to pay taxes provides reasonably equivalent value to a Subchapter S corporate debtor in exchange for tax dividends. The debtor corporation's shareholders agreed to make a Subchapter S election for the corporation, and in exchange, the shareholders' agreement was revised to require the debtor to declare a dividend each year to each shareholder in an amount equal to the taxes that the shareholder owes on the debtor's income for the preceding year. A Subchapter S election results in a corporation's income being taxed only to the shareholders, relieving the corporation of income tax liability. After the debtor filed bankruptcy, its liquidating trustee sued one of the shareholders to avoid and recover a dividend that the debtor declared and paid to the shareholder in accordance with the shareholders' agreement's terms. A trustee may avoid a transfer of the debtor's property for less than reasonably equivalent value if the debtor was insolvent when it made the transfer. In determining whether the debtor received reasonably equivalent value, benefit to creditors is not the test; whether creditors are worse off is. Here, the debtor would have had to pay income taxes if it had not elected Subchapter S treatment and in exchange agreed to pay dividends equal to the shareholders' tax liabilities. It received value by the shareholders' agreement to pay the income taxes attributable to the debtor's income, for which the debtor would have been liable without the Subchapter S election. Therefore, the court dismisses the trustee's complaint. Crumpton v. Stephens (In re Northlake Foods, Inc.), 483 B.R. 247 (M.D. Fla. 2012), aff'd sub nom. Crumpton v. McGarrity (In re Northlake Foods, Inc.), 715 F.3d 1251 (11th Cir. 2013).
- 14.1.t Severance pay is not subject to FICA taxes. The debtor in possession terminated its entire workforce in stages during its chapter 11 case as it closed its retail locations and wound down its headquarters. It paid some employees severance payment during their regular pay periods starting upon their termination under a prepetition severance plan and others upon termination in a lump sum under a postpetition plan. None of the payments were compensation for any services. FICA taxes are owing on wages. Separately, the Internal Revenue Code defines a category of supplemental unemployment compensation benefits (SUB payment) as a payment to an employee under an employer's plan that is made because of the employee's involuntary separation from service resulting from a reduction in force, discontinuance of a plant or operation or other similar condition and that is included in gross income. The Code does not specify whether SUB payments are wages for purposes of FICA taxes. Reviewing legislative history and case law, the court of appeals concludes they are not. Therefore, the debtor in possession is entitled to a refund of FICA taxes paid on the employees' severance payments. U.S. v. Quality Stores, Inc. (In re Quality Stores, Inc.), 693 F.3d 606 (6th Cir. 2012).
- 14.1.u Bankruptcy court may determine tax refund claim under section 505(a) as long as the trustee makes a refund request to the IRS at least 120 days before the determination. The corporate debtor did not file a federal income tax return for a 2001 "stub period" between January 1 and the date of the filing of the petition, because of uncertainty over which other corporation was its parent and responsible for including it in the parent's return. After bankruptcy, it filed a return for the "short period" remainder of 2001 but did not seek a prompt determination under section 505(b) of the tax due for the short period. It filed 2002 and 2003 returns with section 505(b) prompt determination requests. The IRS did not complete its examination of those returns before the section 505(b) deadlines. The debtor in possession also amended the debtor's 1998 return to seek a refund, based on net operating loss carrybacks and filed an unsigned return for the 2001 stub period. The IRS rejected the refund request. The IRS filed a request for payment of administrative expense for interest and penalties for the 2001 short period. The liquidating trustee under the debtor's confirmed plan objected to the request, sought to carry forward and carry back losses against the short period income, recover the disallowed 1998 refund and recover a refund of taxes paid with the 2001 short period return. Later, the trustee requested a refund from the IRS for 1998 and for the 2001 short period. Section 505(a) permits the court to determine the amount or legality of any tax, including a tax refund, brought on behalf of a bankruptcy estate except “before the earlier of (i) 120 days after the trustee properly requests such refund” or a determination of the request. Section 106(a) waives the United States’ sovereign immunity for determination of a tax refund by an estate by listing section 505(a) as a triggering section. Although plan confirmation terminates the estate, where the plan specifically provides for transfer of estate claims to a liquidating trust, the trustee represents the remainder of the estate, and the refund claim is brought on behalf of the estate. The “properly request” provision requires exhaustion of administrative remedies; its focus is not on whether it is a trustee in bankruptcy who requests the refund. A liquidating trustee may fill the role. Finally, on the facts of this case, where the trustee requested the refund from the IRS after commencing the claims objection and refund litigation in the bankruptcy, the bankruptcy court may determine the claim. Some cases permit a bankruptcy court to determine the refund claim without a prior refund request where the claim is a counterclaim to an IRS proof of claim or administrative expense request. However, the statutory language still requires a refund request. But the bankruptcy court may “determine” the refund claim as long as the refund request is made at least 120 days beforehand. Therefore, section 505(a) applies to this action. United States v. Bond, 486 B.R. 9, (E.D.N.Y. 2012).

14.1.v The IRS’s failure to respond to a section 505(b) determination request prevents the IRS from using any amount owing to offset any liability to the taxpayer. The corporate debtor did not file a federal income tax return for a 2001 “stub period” between January 1 and the date of the filing of the petition, because of uncertainty over which other corporation was its parent and responsible for including it in the parent’s return. After bankruptcy, it filed a return for the “short period” remainder of 2001 but did not seek a prompt determination under section 505(b) of the tax due for the short period. It filed 2002 and 2003 returns with section 505(b) prompt determination requests. The IRS did not complete its examination of those returns before the section 505(b) deadlines. The debtor in possession also amended the debtor’s 1998 return to seek a refund, based on net operating loss carrybacks and filed an unsigned return for the 2001 stub period. The IRS rejected the refund request. The IRS filed a request for payment of administrative expense for interest and penalties for the 2001 short period. The liquidating trustee under the debtor’s confirmed plan objected to the request, sought to carry forward and carry back losses against the short period income, recover the disallowed 1998 refund and recover a refund of taxes paid with the 2001 short period return. Later, the trustee requested a refund from the IRS for 1998 and for the 2001 short period. The court granted the refund claims and disallowed the IRS’s prepetition and administrative expense claims. The plan barred setoff and recoupment rights that arose before confirmation. A plan may not bind the IRS unless the United States has waived sovereign immunity. Section 106(a) lists section 1141 as a waiver section, but section 1141(a) applies only to “creditors”, that is, holders of prepetition claims, not to holders of administrative expense claims. However, the IRS’s failure to respond to the trustee’s section 505(b) determination request discharged the liability of the trustee and the estate for the tax. Because neither the trustee nor the estate was liable, there was nothing for the IRS to offset against its liability to the trustee. United States v. Bond, 486 B.R. 9, (E.D.N.Y. 2012).

14.1.w Subchapter S debtor’s payment of shareholders’ income taxes is not a fraudulent transfer. The Subchapter S debtor agreed with its shareholders that it would reimburse them for the additional income taxes for which they were liable as a result of the corporation having made the Subchapter S election and passing through its income to the shareholders for tax purposes. The corporation paid some but not all of such taxes to the IRS before bankruptcy. The trustee may avoid a transfer that the debtor made while insolvent and without receiving reasonably equivalent value in exchange. Value may include value that comes from someone other than the transferee, as long as the estate is no worse off. Here, the corporation derived a benefit by paying its shareholders’ Subchapter S liabilities. By electing Subchapter S treatment, the corporation in this instance reduced its own taxes by at least as much as it paid to the IRS for the shareholders’ taxes. The shareholders' assumption of the tax burden provided reasonably equivalent value to the corporation. Gold v. U.S. (In re Kenrob Info. Tech. Solutions, Inc.), 474 B.R. 799 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2012).

- 14.1.x “Tax priority stripping” provision of section 1222(a)(2)(A) does not apply to a chapter 12 postpetition farm asset sale. The debtor farmers sold their farm at a gain during their chapter 12 case and proposed a plan that did not provide for payment in full of the resulting capital gains taxes. Section 1222(a)(2)(A) permits a plan to provide for less than full payment of a tax claim that arises from a property sale and that is entitled to priority under section 507. A tax on a postpetition transaction would be entitled to priority, if at all, only under section 507(a)(2), which grants priority to claims allowed under section 503(b), including “any tax ... incurred by the estate”. The Internal Revenue Code provides that a chapter 12 petition does not create a separate taxable estate. Therefore, the chapter 12 estate does not incur a tax upon a gain on sale. The tax remains with the debtor. Therefore, the plan may not be confirmed. U.S. v. Hall, 566 U.S. ___, 132 S. Ct. 1882 (2012).
- 14.1.y Nondebtor parent’s postpetition revocation of its own subchapter S status is an avoidable transfer. A qualified subchapter S corporation (QSub) is not treated as a separate taxable entity, and its income and losses are passed through to its ultimate owner. A corporation may be a QSub only if its parent corporation is a subchapter S corporation. As of the petition date, the debtor was a QSub, and its parent was a subchapter S corporation that was wholly owned by an individual, who reported all the debtor’s income and losses on his own income tax return. After bankruptcy, the individual revoked the parent’s subchapter S status, resulting in the debtor’s loss of its QSub status. Section 541(a) defines property of the estate very broadly, to include something that can be used to satisfy claims. The ability not to pay taxes has a value, and an estate has a property interest in the benefit that status affords. The revocation of that ability diminishes the estate’s ability to satisfy claims. Therefore, even though the ability depends on the individual’s election as to the parent, the estate has a property interest in the election. The revocation disposed of that property interest. Therefore, the revocation was an avoidable postpetition transfer. The Majestic Star Casino, LLC v. Barden Dev., Inc. (In re The Majestic Star Casino, LLC), 466 B.R. 666 (Bankr. D. Del. 2012).
- 14.1.z Estate may sell property free and clear of state’s right to impose unemployment tax rate on asset purchaser based on debtor’s claims history. The debtor in possession sold all of its assets free and clear, under section 363(f), of any claims that might arise under state unemployment compensation laws. The sale order provided that the purchaser would not assume or be obligated to pay any liabilities, including claims that might arise under such laws. After the closing, the state division of unemployment assistance (DUA) treated the purchaser as a successor employer and assessed a high unemployment compensation rate, based on the debtor’s prior unemployment claims history. Section 363(f)(5) permits a sale free and clear of interests in property of the debtor if the interest holder “could be compelled ... to accept a money satisfaction of such interest”. The statute does not define “interest”, so the court must examine the relationship between the contribution rate and the unemployment tax rate to determine whether it is an “interest”. The state’s right to tax a successor employer according to the predecessor’s experience rating is grounded in part on the fact that the same assets were used by the debtor. There is a relationship between the state’s right to tax at the higher rate and the use to which the assets have been put. Therefore, the right is an interest in the property. The interest is a right of taxation, which is satisfied by the payment of money, and the DUA could be compelled to accept a money satisfaction of the interest. Therefore, the sale was free and clear of the DUA’s right to impose a tax based on the debtor’s history, and it may tax the purchaser only at the lower rate. In re PBBPC, Inc., 467 B.R. 1 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2012).

- 14.1.aa Section 505(a) proceeding against a state does not violate sovereign immunity. The state imposed a tax on the debtor's receipts. Before its chapter 11 case, the debtor paid the tax but challenged whether collections that it was required by statute to remit to third parties are included in "receipts". It sought a refund from the state of the excess taxes. After bankruptcy, the debtor in possession brought a motion under section 505(a) for a determination of the legality of the taxes. Section 505(a) permits a bankruptcy court to determine "the amount or legality of any tax ... whether or not previously assessed, whether or not paid, and whether or not contested before and adjudicated by a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction." It confers jurisdiction on the bankruptcy court to determine federal and state tax claims, not to enjoin a state in its tax collection. Therefore, a section 505(a) motion does not seek an in personam injunction against the state, which might violate the state's sovereign immunity. Rather, it seeks a determination of issues concerning property of the estate by asking the court to determine whether the estate must keep making tax payments based on gross collections. As an in rem action relating to property of the estate, the motion does not violate the state's sovereign immunity. Similarly, the motion does not violate the Tax Injunction Act, which prohibits a federal court from enjoining the assessment or collection of a state tax, because the TIA does not affect a bankruptcy court's subject matter jurisdiction under section 505(a). In re Indianapolis Downs, LLC, 462 B.R. 104 (Bankr. D. Del. 2011).
- 14.1.bb The estate's entitlement to a tax refund is pro rata based on the number of prepetition days in the year. The debtor filed bankruptcy on September 25, 268 days or 73% into the year. The debtor's income had been relatively constant for the prepetition period and remained so for the rest of the year. After the first of the next year, the debtor received a tax refund resulting from excess withholding. Section 541(a)(1) determines what constitutes property of the estate as of the petition date. An asset that is rooted in the prebankruptcy past is property of the estate, even if received after bankruptcy. Although the debtor's tax liability is not determined or fixed until the end of the taxable year on December 31, the "pro rata by days" method fairly allocates a tax refund between the prepetition and postpetition periods. Therefore, the debtor must turn over 73% of the tax refund, reduced by any applicable exemption, to the trustee. In re Meyers, 616 F.3d 626 (7th Cir. 2010).
- 14.1.cc Liquidating trustee is personally liable for nonpayment of sales taxes. The liquidating trustee under a confirmed plan was required to operate the debtor's business and attempt orderly sales of the debtor's operating units. The trustee failed to pay sales taxes to the state, and on the state's motion, the case was converted to chapter 7. Applicable state law imposes personal liability on a controlling person for willful failure to remit sales taxes collected from customers. Failure is "willful" if the responsible person knew the taxes were due and paid other creditors instead. The trustee's nonpayment was therefore willful, and the trustee is personally liable for the taxes under applicable state law. Neither the Bankruptcy Code nor the liquidating trust agreement protects the trustee from personal liability. Sections 959 and 960 of title 28 require a trustee to operate in accordance with the valid laws of the state and to pay all applicable taxes and permit the trustee to be sued. These provisions apply equally to a liquidating trustee. The liquidating trust agreement protected the trustee from liability for the trust's debts and for any action taken, except in the case of fraud, willful misconduct or gross negligence. The state statute is not a liability shifting provision but imposes liability directly on the controlling person. Therefore, the trust agreement provision does not protect the trustee, because the state is not pursuing the trustee for the trust's liability. The trustee's failure to remit the taxes was willful misconduct, because the nonpayment was unlawful and the trustee withheld payment willfully. Therefore, the latter provision does not protect against liability either. Tex. Comptroller of Pub. Accounts v. Liuzza (In re Tex. Pig Stands, Inc.), 610 F.3d 937 (5th Cir. 2010).
- 14.1.dd "Tax priority stripping" provision of section 1222(a)(2)(A) does not apply to a post-chapter 12 farm asset sale. The debtor farmers sold their farm at a gain during their chapter 12 case and proposed a plan that did not provide for payment in full of the resulting capital gains taxes. Section 1222(a)(2)(A) permits a plan to provide for less than full payment of a tax claim arising from a property sale that is entitled to priority under section 507. A tax on a postpetition transaction would be entitled to priority, if at all, only under section 507(a)(2), which grants priority to claims allowed under section 503(b), including “any tax ... incurred by the estate”. The Internal Revenue Code provides that a chapter 12 petition does not create a separate taxable estate. Therefore, the chapter 12 estate does not incur a tax upon a gain on sale. The tax remains with the debtor. Therefore, the plan may not be confirmed. U.S. v. Hall, 617 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2010).

- 14.1.1.ee “Tax priority stripping” provision of section 1222(a)(2)(A) applies to all post-chapter 12 farm asset sales. The debtor farmers proposed a chapter 12 plan that provided for the sale of farm assets and payment of less than all the resulting capital gains taxes. Section 1222(a)(2)(A) is a “priority stripping” provision, that treats any claim entitled to priority under section 507 and “owed to a governmental unit that arises as a result of the sale ... or other disposition of any farm asset” as a general unsecured claim. A tax arising upon the sale of property of the estate is an administrative expense under section 503(b)(1)(B) and entitled to priority under section 507(a)(2), but a tax the debtor incurs postpetition is not entitled to section 507(a)(2) priority. Although a chapter 12 petition creates a bankruptcy estate, under the Internal Revenue Code, it does not create a separate taxable entity or estate. However, section 503(b)(1)(B) should be construed to apply to a tax incurred postpetition, even though it is not imposed on the estate. Therefore, the tax arising upon the debtor’s sale of farm assets is entitled only to general unsecured status. The marginal tax allocation method, rather than the proportional method, treats the tax on the gain upon sale as being the last dollars earned and therefore subject to the highest tax rate. Because the marginal method strips priority from a larger tax amount, and because the courts should construe the Bankruptcy Code liberally to give the debtor a full measure of relief, the debtor may use the marginal allocation method. Internal Rev. Serv. v. Ficken (In re Ficken), 430 B.R. 663 (10th Cir. B.A.P. 2010).
- 14.1.1.ff Tax sale certificate purchaser is not entitled to “tax claim” treatment under section 511. The creditor purchased a tax sale certificate from the taxing agency at a taxing agency’s sale of tax liens. State law grants the purchaser only a lien on the underlying property, which the purchaser may foreclose. The property owner was a chapter 11 debtor, which proposed a plan to pay the tax sale certificate holder over time with interest at a market rate. Section 511 requires that interest on a “tax claim” be paid at the nonbankruptcy statutory interest rate on the tax. State law determines the nature of a claim. Because the tax sale certificate here does not give its holder the same rights against the property and the taxpayer as the taxing agency has, the tax sale certificate is not a “tax claim” within the meaning of section 511. In re Princeton Office Park, L.P., 423 B.R. 795 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2010).
- 14.1.1.gg Section 505(a)(2)(C) prohibits court determination of tax liability after expiration of state law deadline. The local taxing agency assessed taxes on the debtor’s real property. The deadline for a state court challenge expired 30 days after bankruptcy. The state court challenge involved a de novo hearing, not an appeal or review. Accordingly, section 108(a), which applies to the commencement of an action and extends the statute of limitation for two years after bankruptcy, applies, rather than section 108(b), which applies to taking action in a pending proceeding, such as filing a notice of appeal or review, and extends the deadline for only 60 days. However, section 505(a)(2)(C) prohibits the bankruptcy court from determining an ad valorem property tax if the applicable period for contesting the amount under nonbankruptcy law “has expired”. But section 505(a)(2)(C) does not specify when the court must measure whether the contest period has expired. Measuring as of the petition date would make the provision redundant with section 505(a)(2)(A), which prohibits determination of any tax if contested and adjudicated before the petition date. However, the specific controls the general. So section 505(a)(2)(C) controls over the general extension of time in section 108, and the trustee must seek determination of the tax before the period for seeking de novo review has expired. In re Village at Oakwell Farms, Ltd., 428 B.R. 372 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2010).

14.1.1h Bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to determine tax liability of a liquidating trust.

The plan created a liquidating trust and authorized it to “request an expedited determination of taxes ... under section 505(b) ... for all returns filed for, or on behalf of, the [trust] for all taxable periods through the dissolution of the” trust. The IRS appeared at the confirmation hearing but did not object to this provision. The trustee filed tax returns for excise taxes related to a pension fund transaction, reporting no tax due and an income tax return for the trust reporting and paying tax. The trustee also filed with both returns a request with the IRS for a prompt determination under section 505(b). The trustee also filed a motion under sections 505(a) and 505(b) for a determination of the taxes due. Section 505(a) authorizes the bankruptcy court to determine the amount or legality of any tax. The plan provision to which the IRS did not object gives the trustee standing to seek the determination. However, section 505(a) does not apply to postconfirmation taxes, and the plan cannot confer jurisdiction. Therefore, the court does not have jurisdiction to determine the taxes under section 505(a). The court does not address whether section 505(b) applies to a liquidating trust. In re Agway, inc., 412 B.R. 32 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 2009).

14.1.1i Postconfirmation sale that was approved preconfirmation is exempt from transfer taxes.

The chapter 11 trustee obtained court approval for the sale of real property before plan confirmation. The trustee then proposed a “pot” plan that distributed the sale proceeds to administrative and priority creditors, with the balance divided among unsecured claims. The property sales were necessary to funding the plan. Because of matters unrelated to the chapter 11 case’s progress, the sales did not close until after plan confirmation. Section 1146(a) exempts a sale “under a plan confirmed under section 1129” from transfer taxes. In Piccadilly Cafeterias, Inc., 128 S. Ct. 2326 (2008), the Supreme Court ruled that section 1146(a) does not exempt preplan sales from transfer taxes. In doing so, it established a bright line rule that applies the tax exemption to facilitate plan implementation if the court confirms a plan. Here, though the court approved the sale under section 363 before confirmation, the sale occurred after confirmation and was necessary to plan consummation and was therefore made “under a plan confirmed” and exempt from transfer taxes. In re New 118th Inc., 398 B.R. 791 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

14.1.1j TEFRA requirement to determine partners’ taxes at the partnership level does not preempt bankruptcy court jurisdiction under section 505(a) over a debtor partner’s tax liability.

Section 505(a) permits a bankruptcy court to determine the amount or legality of any tax of the debtor that has not been contested before and adjudicated by a judicial or administrative tribunal before bankruptcy. To defeat bankruptcy court jurisdiction, the tribunal must provide a full judicial-style review, even if before an administrative hearing officer, and the debtor must actually have litigated the matter. A default arising from the debtor’s failure to bring an action within the deadline for doing so after a taxing agency’s final determination of the tax does not preclude bankruptcy court jurisdiction. Complicating this provision for a partner debtor is the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (TEFRA), which requires that the partners’ tax liability be determined at the partnership level and provides that any judicial review of an IRS partnership item determination be deemed to include all partners, whether or not they actually participate in the judicial proceeding. If one of the partners is in bankruptcy, however, the automatic stay prevents continuation of any such judicial proceeding. So the IRS has provided by administrative regulation and the courts have held that the debtor partner is severed from the judicial proceeding, and the debtor partner’s liability based on partnership items may be determined separately in the bankruptcy court, whether under section 505 or otherwise. In this case, after an IRS Appeals Office review, the IRS issued a partnership item determination at the partnership level. Neither of the partners brought a proceeding for a judicial determination within the statutory deadline, but one of the partners filed bankruptcy some time after the deadline expired. The debtor in possession sought a determination of the partnership item in the bankruptcy court under section 505(a). Because the review process within the IRS Appeals Office more closely resembles a settlement conference than an administrative tribunal review, the partnership's participation before the Appeals Office did not preclude section 505(a) review. In addition, even though partnership items must generally be determined at the partnership level, when one of the partners is in bankruptcy, partnership items are as much a subject of section 505(a) review as the debtor's ultimate tax liability, and TEFRA does not deprive the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction over partnership items. Therefore, the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction under section 505(a) to determine the debtor's tax liability based on the disputed partnership items. Central Valley Ag Enterps. v. U.S., 531 F.3d 750 (9th Cir. 2008).

14.1.kk Section 1146(a) does not exempt a preplan sale from stamp taxes. The debtor in possession agreed to sell substantially all the estate's assets as a going concern in a section 363(b) sale. As part of the negotiations for consent to the sale, the debtor reached a global settlement agreement concerning proceeds distribution with representatives of its secured and unsecured creditors. The debtor filed a plan embodying the agreement 10 days after the sale closed. The court ultimately confirmed the plan. The order approving the sale exempted the sale from stamp taxes under section 1146(a), which provides, the "making or delivery of an instrument of transfer under a plan confirmed under section 1129 of this title, may not be taxed under any law imposing a stamp tax or similar tax". The more natural reading of "under a plan confirmed under section 1129" is that the transfer must be authorized by a plan that has been confirmed under section 1129, rather than "in accordance with a plan confirmed under section 1129", without a temporal (i.e., postconfirmation) requirement. The statutory context supports this reading, because the section appears in a subchapter entitled "Postconfirmation Matters". In addition, a preconfirmation transfer cannot be said to be "in accordance with" a plan that has not yet been drafted or filed, let alone confirmed. Rather, a preconfirmation transfer is made "in accordance with" or "under" section 363(b), not a plan. Finally, canons of statutory construction lead to the same reading. A statute limiting state taxation must be narrowly construed in the absence of a clear exemption, which this is not, and the Bankruptcy Code, though a remedial statute, balances many policies and therefore cannot be liberally construed to favor the estate against state taxation. Although the reason for treating preconfirmation and postconfirmation transfers may not be readily apparent, such a distinction is not absurd and will not be overturned. Therefore, the property sale here is subject to state real property stamp taxes. Fla. Dep't of Rev. v. Piccadilly Cafeterias, Inc., 554 U.S. 33, 128 S. Ct. 2326 (2008).

14.1.ii IRS may offset tax NOL carryback refund for year ending postpetition against prepetition taxes. Creditors filed an involuntary petition against parent and subsidiary debtors on December 19. Upon the close of the debtor's tax year 11 days later, the trustee filed an unconsolidated tax return for the parent alone reflecting a substantial loss for the year just ended and carried back the loss to a prior year, resulting in a substantial refund entitlement. Later, the bankruptcy court ordered substantive consolidation of the parent and subsidiary debtors and two nondebtor subsidiaries retroactive to the petition date. The IRS refused to pay the refund because it asserted a setoff right against prepetition taxes the subsidiary owed. First, although I.R.C. section 6402 creates a setoff right, it does not override section 553, which determines the right's enforceability in bankruptcy. In addition, section 106(a)(4), which requires enforcement of an award against the United States be consistent with applicable nonbankruptcy law, and section 106(c), which provides for offset of claims by and against a governmental unit, do not override section 553. They operate only to waive sovereign immunity to permit the estate to offset claims against a governmental unit, not to change the standards of section 553 on the requirements for a valid setoff in bankruptcy. Second, the refund claim did not arise postpetition. A tax refund can usually be determined only after the tax year's close. Here, however, all but 11 days of the year had passed at the petition date, and "a substantial portion of [the parent's] losses probably took place and were reasonably ascertainable before the end of the ... tax year." The losses and therefore the refund were rooted in the pre-bankruptcy past. The refund right was contingent and unliquidated until the year ended, but it existed and was therefore a prepetition right. Third, substantive consolidation alone only combined the assets and liabilities of the two entities and did not merge the two entities or determine that they are alter egos. However, the separate determination that the subsidiary was the parent's alter ego establishes the mutuality required for the IRS to offset the parent's refund against the subsidiary's taxes. U.S. v. Carey (In re Wade Cook Fin. Corp.), 375 B.R. 580 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

- 14.1.mm Preplan sale is exempt from transfer taxes. The debtor in possession, in a sale arranged before bankruptcy, sold substantially all of the estate's assets, with the court's approval. Shortly after the sale, the debtor filed a plan, which provided, among other things, for distribution of sale proceeds. Section 1146(c) (now 1146(a)) exempts an asset transfer "under a plan confirmed under section 1129" from stamp or similar taxes. "Under a plan" should be read to mean "necessary to consummation of a plan," rather than "authorized by a plan." Otherwise, certain postconfirmation sales that are necessary to consummation but not directly authorized would not be exempt, contrary to Congress' intent to carry over the effect of Bankruptcy Act section 267. Although that section similarly exempted transactions "under any plan confirmed under this chapter [X]," courts interpreted it to include transactions that serve to execute or make effective a confirmed Chapter X plan. Once the temporal connection between sale and confirmation is broken, there is no reason to limit the exemption to postconfirmation sales. Here, the sale was necessary to the consummation of the plan that was filed and confirmed after the sale, so the sale was exempt. Florida Dept. of Rev. v. Piccadilly Cafeterias, Inc. (In re Piccadilly Cafeterias, Inc.), 484 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2007).
- 14.1.nn Court may not determine whether plan distributions are wages for tax purposes. During the chapter 11 case, the debtor in possession renegotiated the debtor's union contract. In exchange, it agreed to provide a distribution of securities to employees under the plan. Shortly before confirmation, it sought a declaratory judgment under section 505(a) that the distribution would not be "wages" subject to withholding taxes. The bankruptcy court did not have authority under section 505 to determine the characterization of the plan payments for tax purposes, which is a determination of the tax effects of the plan. Section 505 applies only to claims against the debtor or the estate, not to tax claims that may arise against the reorganized debtor. Moreover, section 1146(d), which permits a bankruptcy court to determine a plan's state or local tax effects, expressly excludes federal taxes. Section 505 is an exception to the exception in the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201, that prohibits a declaratory judgment about tax liability. Therefore, the Declaratory Judgment Act prohibits the determination. In re UAL Corp., 336 B.R. 370 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006).
- 14.1.oo Motor fuel tax is both an excise tax and a trust fund tax. Illinois imposes a tax on fuel which it requires the fuel distributor to "collect at the time of distribution" of the fuel. Although the tax may be an excise tax, because it is imposed on a transaction, it is imposed on the buyer, not the seller. Federal law determines whether a tax is entitled to priority, but the federal courts may look to the state courts' own interpretation of the tax regime. Here, the Illinois Supreme Court had determined that the tax was imposed on the buyer. Therefore, even though the tax is an excise tax, it is "collected or withheld from and for which the debtor is liable in whatever capacity," as provided in section 507(a)(8)(C), and it is entitled to priority regardless of age. Illinois Dep't of Revenue v. Hayslett/Judy Oil, Inc., 426 F.3d 899 (7th Cir. 2005).
- 14.1.pp A non-profit debtor's unemployment compensation reimbursement obligation is not a priority tax. Under New Jersey law, as authorized by Federal law, a nonprofit employer may choose not to make quarterly unemployment tax contributions but instead to reimburse the state if the state makes unemployment compensation payments to the nonprofit's terminated employees. The debtor's reimbursement obligation is not a tax that is entitled to priority. A tax is an involuntary exaction imposed for general public purposes. Unemployment contribution obligations are such an exaction, because the funds benefit the government generally, whether or not the nonprofit's employees are terminated. The reimbursement obligation, however, is imposed to repay the government for the actual cost of unemployment compensation directly related to the nonprofit's terminated employees and is not for general governmental purposes. Reconstituted Comm. of Unsecured Creditors v. New Jersey Dep't of Labor (In re United Healthcare Sys., Inc.), 396 F.3d 247 (3d Cir. 2005).

- 14.1.qq Tax Injunction Act limited bankruptcy court's authority to interpret its own order. A sale order authorized a sale free and clear of all liabilities, including taxes. When the state revenue department sought to collect a tax based on pre-sale events from the buyer, the buyer sought declaratory and injunctive relief in the bankruptcy court. Although the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to interpret the sale order, the Tax Injunction Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1341, limits its power to do so (though not its jurisdiction). Where the Bankruptcy Code grants specific authority to the bankruptcy court to consider taxes, such as section 1146(c), section 505, or the discharge, the Tax Injunction Act does not limit the court. However, the general power to interpret orders and to authorize the sale of property under section 363 is not sufficiently specific to take priority over the Tax Injunction Act. United Taconite, L.L.C. v. Minnesota (In re Eveleth Mines, L.L.C.), 318 B.R. 682 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2004).
- 14.1.rr Nondebtor's property refinancing transaction under a plan is exempt from taxes under section 1146(c). The debtor was able to refinance its property to pay off its secured lender under its plan only if the nondebtor adjoining property owner also refinanced with the same new lender, who imposed the nondebtor refinancing as a condition to the plan. The plan contemplated the nondebtor refinancing, and the court confirmed. The nondebtor's refinancing was exempt from stamp taxes under section 1146(c), which exempts transfer "under a plan." "Under a plan" means authorized by or necessary to the consummation of the plan. The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to determine the tax liability of the nondebtor, because the dispute involved a construction of a section of the Bankruptcy Code limiting taxes. Florida v. T.H. Orlando Ltd. (In re T.H. Orlando Ltd.), 391 F.3d 1287 (11th Cir. 2004).
- 14.1.ss IRS may refuse to consider chapter 11 debtor's offer in compromise. The chapter 11 debtor filed a plan providing for the adjustment of taxes owing to the IRS and, at the same time, proposed an offer in compromise to the IRS on IRS Form 656. The IRS refuses as a matter of discretionary policy to consider offers in compromise in bankruptcy cases, so the debtor brought an action against the IRS to require it to consider the offer on the merits, rather than reject it outright based on the pendency of the bankruptcy. The court refuses the requested relief on the ground that the IRS's refusal to consider the offer is not discrimination prohibited under section 525 because it is not with respect to "a license, permit, charter, franchise, or other similar grant." Section 105 does not provide a basis for relief, because a section 105 order directed against a governmental agency is in the nature of mandamus, an extraordinary remedy that is not proper when a matter is committed to the government's discretion, as consideration of an offer in compromise is. Finally, because the debtor proposed an adjustment in its plan of the taxes owing, the matter was referred to the Department of Justice, which is not governed by IRS rules and regulations on how to process offers to adjust or compromise tax liabilities. 1900 M Restaurant Assocs., Inc. v. United States (In re 1900 M Restaurant Assocs., Inc.), 319 B.R. 302 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2005). Contra, In re Peterson, 321 B.R. 259 (Bankr. D. Neb. 2004).
- 14.1.tt Bankruptcy court may redetermine tax liability that has not been finally adjudicated before bankruptcy. Section 505(a) permits the bankruptcy court to determine the amount or legality of any tax asserted against the debtor, but prohibits the court from determining the amount or legality "if such amount or legality was contested before and adjudicated by a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction before the commencement of the case under this title." In this case, the state taxing agency had adjudicated the debtor's tax liability, but its order had not yet become final, and the debtor had filed a motion for re-hearing, which was pending at the time of the commencement of the bankruptcy case. The Ninth Circuit concludes that the limitation on redetermination applies only if the state tax adjudication has become final before the commencement of the bankruptcy case. It also concludes that section 505(a)(2)(A) takes priority over the Full Faith and Credit Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1738, which requires federal courts to give preclusive () effect to state court judgments to the same extent that the state court would do so. The court notes, however, that the bankruptcy court is not required to redetermine a tax and that the same factors that underlie the res judicata doctrine may persuade the bankruptcy court in the exercise of its discretion not to redetermine the debtor's liability. Mantz v. California State Board of Equalization (In re Mantz), 343 F.3d 1207 (9th Cir. 2003).

- 14.1.uu Pre-plan sales do not qualify for transfer tax exemption. Section 1146(c) exempts from documentary transfer taxes a sale “under a plan confirmed under section 1129.” Here, the sale was made before confirmation of a plan under section 363 but were said to be necessary for the plan, and the plan retroactively authorized the transfers. The court rules that “under a plan” requires that the sales be authorized by the plan, not authorized under section 363, for the tax exemption to apply. Baltimore County v. Hechinger Liquidation Trust (In re Hechinger Investment Co. of Delaware, Inc.), 335 F.3d 243 (3d Cir. 2003).
- 14.1.vv Chapter 13 filing tolls three-year look-back for income tax dischargeability. The debtor had filed a chapter 13 within three years after an income tax return was due, entitling the tax claim to priority and non-dischargeability. The debtor later dismissed the chapter 13 case and filed a chapter 7 case more than three years after the tax return was due. The Supreme Court holds that the pendency of the chapter 13 case, which prevented the IRS from enforcing the tax claim against the debtor, tolled the three-year period of section 507(a)(8)(A). The Supreme Court characterized the three year period as a statute of limitations and applied the doctrine of equitable tolling to conclude that it would be inequitable to permit the statute to run while the IRS was prohibited from taking collection action. Young v. United States, 535 U.S. 43 (2002).
- 14.1.ww Debtor's officers are personally liable for ERISA plan contributions. The debtor withheld ERISA plan contributions (401(k) and health insurance) from its employees pay, but did not pay over the amounts to the plan trustee, because it had insufficient funds. The debtor's funds were controlled by a working capital lender through a lock-box facility. Under ERISA, a plan fiduciary (one who exercises discretionary authority or control over management of the plan or its assets) is personally liable for any plan losses. The debtor's officers were ERISA plan fiduciaries and were therefore liable for the losses that the plan suffered as a result of their failure to pay over employee withholdings. Dannistor v. Ullman, 287 F.3d 395 (5th Cir. 2002).
- 14.1.xx Use of NOL in consolidated tax return is not a “transfer.” The debtor's corporate parent used the debtor's NOL's in preparing a consolidated tax return for pre-petition years. The debtor sought to recover from the parent the value to the parent of the use of the debtor's NOL's. The court rules that the parent's use of the NOL's was not a transfer of property of the debtor, because the Internal Revenue Code required application of the NOL's at the parent level, so the debtor did not have a property interest. Rather, the NOL's are merely hypothetical and do not constitute property. Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc. v. MAFCO Holdings, Inc. (In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc.), 273 B.R. 58 (D. Del. 2002).
- 14.1.yy Chapter 11 plan stamp tax exemption applies to pre-plan sales. Affirming the bankruptcy court, 254 B.R. 306 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001), the district court rules that sales before confirmation or even proposal of a plan may get the benefit of the transfer tax exemption of section 1146(c), as long as the sales are an essential component of plan confirmation. Baltimore County v. Hechinger Investment Co. (In re Hechinger Investment Co.), 276 B.R. 43 (D. Del. 2002).

- 14.1.zz Pre-plan real property sales are exempt from transfer taxes under section 1146(c). The debtor sold real property during its chapter 11 case in order to position itself better for its liquidating plan, which it intended to file. Interpreting the language, “under a plan confirmed” in section 1146(c), the bankruptcy court rules that the language applies to a transfer that is an integral part of the plan process for a plan later confirmed, thereby excluding only transfers incidental to the debtor’s business operations. In re Hechinger Investment Co. of Delaware, Inc., 254 B.R. 306 (Bankr. D. Del. 2000).
- 14.1.aaa Fraudulent non-payment of tax does not create nondischargeable debt. The debtor failed to report taxes owing, but not in a fraudulent manner. Nevertheless, the debtor fraudulently transferred property to evade payment of the tax. Following its earlier decision in In re Haas, 48 F.3d 1153 (11th Cir. 1994), a panel of the Eleventh Circuit holds that fraudulent non-payment does not amount to a willful attempt “to evade or defeat such tax,” as required by section 523(a)(1)(C). However the panel expresses substantial doubt about the scope of the Haas decision and suggests reconsideration of the case en banc. Griffith v. United States (In re Griffith), 174 F.3d 1222 (11th Cir. 1999).
- 14.1.bbb Tax liability of the estate is not discharged under section 505(b). Section 505(b) permits the trustee to request a determination of “any unpaid liability of the estate for any tax incurred during the administration of the case.” Upon resolution, the determination discharges “the trustee, the debtor, and any successor to the debtor” from liability. The court holds that the discharge does not apply to the estate, so the administrative expense claim of the IRS remains allowable. In re Goodrich, 215 B.R. 638 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1997).
- 14.1.ccc Bankruptcy court determines property tax liability. Under section 505(a), a bankruptcy court may determine the amount or legality of any tax, unless it was contested before and adjudicated by a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction before bankruptcy. A complaint filed in the state tax court that was withdrawn before litigation does not prevent the bankruptcy court from redetermining the tax, nor does the remoteness of the tax years from the date of the filing of the petition. Custom Distribution Services, Inc. v. City of Perth Amboy Tax Assessor (In re Custom Distribution Services, Inc.), 216 B.R. 136 (Bankr. D.N.J. 1997)

15. CHAPTER 15—CROSS-BORDER PROCEEDINGS

- 15.1.a Corporate governance and fraud remediation proceeding that does not address creditors’ claims is not a foreign proceeding. The Cayman company entered into questionable transactions, which some of the shareholders challenged. Upon their petition, the Cayman High Court appointed provisional joint liquidators to take steps to protect and preserve and prevent dissipation of the company’s assets and to commence any winding up proceedings or insolvency process in Cayman or elsewhere. The liquidators had not commenced winding up proceedings or insolvency process in Cayman. The company’s creditors had not received formal notice of the proceeding, and the proceeding had not involved any attempt to identify or classify creditors or determine how and whether to satisfy their claims. The liquidators sought recognition of the proceeding under chapter 15 as a foreign main proceeding. A bankruptcy court may grant recognition to a “foreign proceeding,” which is defined in section 101(23) of the Code as a collective judicial or administrative proceeding in a foreign country under a law relating to insolvency or adjustment of debt for the purpose of reorganization or liquidation. Although the definition is to be broadly construed, it is not limitless. The proceeding must involve the treatment of and potential benefit to creditors as a whole. Here, the proceeding involved primarily a corporate governance and fraud remediation effort, not one to reorganize or liquidate the company or deal with its creditors. Therefore, it does not meet the definition of “foreign proceeding,” and the chapter 15 petition must be denied. In re Global Cord Blood Corp., ___ B.R. ___, 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 3426 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Dec. 5, 2022).

15.1.b Bankruptcy court issues anti-suit injunction against the trustee pursuing Singapore avoiding power actions in a cross-border case in Singapore. A U.S. debtor and its Singapore affiliate filed bankruptcy cases in the U.S. The U.S. trustee obtained recognition in Singapore of the U.S. proceedings as foreign main proceedings. The trustee brought U.S. preference and fraudulent transfer actions against several defendants. The U.S. bankruptcy court granted motions to dismiss on the ground that the avoiding powers did not apply extraterritorially. The trustee filed an amended complaint without the preference claims. The court granted motions to dismiss those claims as well. The trustee appealed. While the appeal was pending, the trustee brought actions in the Singapore court under Singapore avoiding power law to avoid and recover the same transfers from the same defendants involved in the U.S. action. The defendants brought an action in the U.S. bankruptcy court for an anti-suit injunction against the trustee. Although the Singapore recognition action permitted the trustee to bring those actions in the Singapore court, it did not require him to do so. The Code does not expressly grant the trustee rights to bring foreign avoiding power actions, but here, the trustee’s powers as a foreign representative in Singapore on behalf of the U.S. estates made the Singapore avoiding power actions property of the U.S. estates. U.S. law, not an order of a Singapore court, determines whether the U.S. court has jurisdiction to hear an action, even an action under Singapore law. Because those claims are related to the bankruptcy cases in the U.S., the court had jurisdiction to hear them. The court may issue an anti-suit injunction if the parties and the issues are the same in both jurisdictions, at least one Unterweser factor applies, and the injunction’s effect on international comity is tolerable. The parties here are the same. Whether the issues are the same may be analyzed under principles of res judicata, as a court may issue an anti-suit injunction if res judicata would bar a later foreign action. Res judicata applies when the parties are identical, the first action involved the same cause of action as the second, and the first action was resolved by a final judgment. Although the second action here is based on Singapore law, rather than U.S. law, the underlying facts, transactions, and transfers are all the same. Therefore, res judicata applies. The Unterweser factors are whether the foreign action would frustrate the local forum’s policy, would be vexatious, or oppressive, or prejudice other equitable considerations. Here, the Singapore action would frustrate the bankruptcy court’s judgment in the first action, would be vexatious or oppressive because it is a second action for the same claims against the same parties, and would prejudice equitable considerations, because the trustee’s choice of forum in Singapore strongly suggests forum shopping. Finally, because there are no government litigants, issues of foreign relations, or concerns involving international law, any effect on comity of an anti-suit injunction would be tolerable. Therefore, the court grants the injunction. King v. Exp. Dev. Can. (In re Zetta Jet USA, Inc.), 644 B.R. 12 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2022).

15.1.c Court grants recognition as foreign main proceeding for debtor incorporated in Cayman and conducting business in China. The debtor was incorporated in the Cayman Islands and owned numerous subsidiaries incorporated there, managed holding company corporate business there, and worked with legal counsel there, but conducted all its business operations in China. It issued several series of notes, all governed by New York law. When it encountered financial stress, it convened the holders of a substantial majority of one series of notes to negotiate a scheme of arrangement under Cayman law. The negotiations were successful, resulting in a restructuring support agreement that provided for and resulted in the initiation in Cayman of a scheme proceeding, but not a provisional liquidation with the appointment of a provisional liquidator. The Cayman court convened the scheme and ordered a creditors’ meeting, voting on the scheme, and the appointment of a foreign representative. All but two creditors (out of 370) holding nearly 95% in amount of the debt approved the scheme. The Cayman court ultimately sanctioned the scheme, which provided for a discharge of the note series in exchange for cash and new notes. The foreign representative sought recognition of the scheme under chapter 15 in

New York. Chapter 15 provides for recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if the foreign proceeding is in the debtor's center of main interest (COMI) and as a foreign nonmain proceeding if the debtor merely has an establishment in the jurisdiction conducting the foreign proceeding. The Code has a rebuttable presumption that a debtor's place of incorporation is its COMI. In addition, the courts consider whether the debtor's COMI would be ascertainable by third parties based on factors available in the public domain, whether the debtor (including any liquidators or provisional liquidators) conducted business at its putative COMI, and the law that governs the debtor's operations. An establishment sufficient to support recognition as a foreign nonmain proceeding requires nontransitory economic activity in the forum jurisdiction. Neither existence of debts in the forum nor conduct of the foreign proceeding qualifies; rather, there must be assets to administer and some effect on the local marketplace. Here, the creditors expected the scheme to proceed in Cayman, the debtor maintained some corporate activities in Cayman, and Cayman law governed the debtor's corporate operations. Accordingly, the court grants the scheme recognition as a foreign main proceeding. The absence of a provisional liquidation and of a provisional liquidator does not prevent recognition, because where the debtor is able to effect a consensual restructuring without the need for a liquidation proceeding, the court should not burden the process by requiring such a proceeding. The court denies recognition as a foreign nonmain proceeding. In re Modern Land (China) Co, Ltd., 641 B.R. 768 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. July 18, 2022).

- 15.1.d Court denies recognition to proceeding in “letter-box” debtor’s place of incorporation. The debtor incorporated in the Isle of Man. Its directors were located there, but they were employees of a corporate service company, and there was no evidence they independently managed or exercised control of the debtor. The debtor had no creditors, assets, or operations there. After a dispute arose over a sale of an aircraft, resulting in claims against the debtor, it commenced a voluntary winding up proceeding in the Isle of Man. The Isle of Man liquidator sought recognition of the proceeding in the United States under chapter 15. A court may grant recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if the debtor's center of main interests is in the jurisdiction where the proceeding is pending. Chapter 15 presumes that a debtor's COMI is where it is incorporated, but the presumption is rebuttable. The court must consider the location of the debtor's headquarters, where the debtor is actually managed, where its assets and creditors are located, and the jurisdiction whose law would apply to most disputes. Here, headquarters, management, operations, assets, creditors, and applicable law were not in the Isle of Man. Therefore, the Isle of Man was not the debtor's COMI. A court may grant recognition as a foreign nonmain proceeding if the debtor has an establishment in the jurisdiction where the proceeding is pending. An establishment requires some presence in the jurisdiction, an economic impact on the local market, maintenance of a minimum level of organization for a period, and the objective appearance to creditors of a local presence. Here, the debtor had none of these on the Isle of Man, so the court denies recognition as a foreign nonmain proceeding. In re Petition of Shimmin, as Liquidator of Comfort Jet Aviation, Ltd., 2022 Bankr. LEXIS 2932 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. Oct. 14, 2022).
- 15.1.e Section 109 eligibility requirements do not apply in chapter 15. The foreign debtor did not own any property in the United States but owned a corporation that owned U.S. property. The foreign representatives sought recognition of the debtor's foreign proceeding. Section 109 permits only an entity with a domicile, a residence, property, or a place of business within the United States to be a debtor under the code. Section 103 provides that chapter 1 (which includes section 109) applies in a case under chapter 15. Section 1502(1) defines “debtor for purposes of chapter 15 as “an entity that is subject of a foreign proceeding.” Section 1517 provides the court shall grant recognition if the foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding or a foreign nonmain proceeding, the foreign representative is a person or body, and the petition meets section 1515's requirements. Because chapter 15 uses a special definition of “debtor,” section 109's eligibility requirements, which apply to a debtor as defined more generally in section 101, do not apply, and the mandatory language of section 1517 requires the court to grant recognition if section 1517's conditions are met. The court grants recognition. In re Al Zawawi, 634 B.R. 11 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2021).

- 15.1.f Debtor's or foreign representative's bad faith is not a ground to deny recognition. The foreign debtor and the foreign representative acted together in bad faith in filing a petition seeking recognition of a Monegasque insolvency proceeding. Section 1501 states the purposes of chapter 15, including to "promote fair and efficient administration of cross-border insolvencies" and "protect the interests of all creditors." Section 1517 requires recognition of a foreign proceeding if the petition meets section 1515's requirements. Section 1506 permits a court to deny recognition if it would be manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. Section 1501 is not intended to confer any substantive rights, is intended only to assist in interpretation, and therefore is not a ground to deny recognition. Section 1506 applies only to the foreign law, not to the conduct of the debtor or the foreign representative. Here, the Monegasque insolvency regime, though differing in substantial ways from U.S. law, is not manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. Therefore, the court must grant recognition to the Monegasque proceeding. The court may deal with bad faith through other means, including abstention under section 305, granting stay relief, or modifying or terminating recognition under section 1517(d) if grounds for granting it were fully or partially lacking or ceased to exist. Samba v. Int'l Petro. Prods. and Additives Co., Inc. (In re Black Gold S.à.R.L.), 635 B.R. 517 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2022).
- 15.1.g Section 109 does not limit Chapter 15 eligibility. The individual foreign debtor had no property in the United States. The foreign liquidators filed a chapter 15 petition to investigate the debtor's affairs in the United States, to recover any property they discovered, and to bring claims against third parties. Section 109(a) provides that only an entity with a domicile, residence, place of business, or property in the United States may be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code. Section 1517 requires a court to recognize a foreign representative if the foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding or a foreign nonmain proceeding (as defined), the foreign representative is a person or body, and the petition meets section 1515's requirements. Section 1517 is mandatory and does not cross-reference section 109. The definition of "debtor" in chapter 15 ("entity that is the subject of a foreign proceeding") differs from the definition for section 109 (person "concerning which a case under this title has been commenced"). Section 109 specifies eligibility requirements only for other chapters, not chapter 15, and contains other eligibility requirements, such as credit counseling, that could not apply in a chapter 15 case. Chapter 15 permits commencement of an ordinary bankruptcy case against the debtor if the debtor has assets in the United States, implying that having assets in the United States is not a chapter 15 eligibility requirement. These provisions, taken as a whole, show that section 109 does not limit chapter 15 eligibility. In re Abdulmunem al Zawawi, ___ B.R. ___, 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 2367 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. Aug. 30, 2021).
- 15.1.h Chapter 15 filing as a tactic to stay U.S. litigation does not constitute bad faith warranting refusal of recognition. Minority shareholders derivatively sued a Bermuda company in New York over a refinancing and a large dividend. After the court dismissed the action and before the time for appeal had run, the company entered a members voluntary liquidation in Bermuda. After many more years of litigation and the depletion of most of the assets of the Bermuda company, leaving it insolvent, the liquidators initiated a Bermuda court-supervised liquidation proceeding. The liquidators then sought an anti-suit injunction from the Bermuda court. In response, the New York plaintiffs sought a TRO to enjoin the anti-suit action. After a stand-still on those matters, the liquidators sought recognition of the Bermuda liquidation as a foreign main proceeding under chapter 15 to ensure the Bermuda proceedings would be binding and enforceable in the United States so as to preclude the New York plaintiffs, under the automatic stay, from continuing the New York action. The recognition petition met all the requirements for recognition under chapter 15, but the New York plaintiffs argued that the court should deny recognition because the petition was filed in bad faith as a litigation tactic. Section 1506 permits the court to refuse to take an action that would be manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. Courts generally do not apply this section to prohibit recognition where the debtor has engaged in bad faith. However, though the liquidators clearly sought recognition as a litigation strategy and their action might constitute bad faith under a different Bankruptcy Code chapter, in chapter 15, section 1506 does not examine whether the debtor's actions violate public policy but whether the foreign court's procedures and protections do not comport with U.S. public policy. Here, the Bermuda court's do, so the liquidators' motivation in filing the chapter 15 petition does not warrant denial of recognition. In re Culligan Ltd., 2021 Bankr. LEXIS 1783 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. July 2, 2021).

- 15.1.i Court recognizes Indonesian proceeding, despite exclusion of bondholders' vote, but refuses to enforce plan. The Indonesian debtor's subsidiary issued bonds under a New York-law governed indenture. The issuer loaned the funds to the debtor, who issued a note to the issuer and directly guaranteed the bonds. The debtor commenced and concluded a suspension of payments proceeding in Indonesia in which the issuer's claim under the note was allowed and the indenture trustee's claim was not. The plan in that proceeding provided for a very long-term, contingent payout to the issuer on the bonds and released various subsidiary guarantors of the bonds. Objecting bondholders brought an action in New York state court for a judgment on their bonds, which they obtained. In response, the debtor sought the appointment of a foreign representative in the Indonesian court, who then filed a chapter 15 case in New York to obtain recognition and enforcement of the suspension of payments plan. Chapter 15 provides for recognition of a foreign proceeding, which is a collective proceeding, on a foreign representative's petition. A collective proceeding considers the obligations of all creditors, for the creditors' general benefit, even if some creditors are not allowed to participate. Despite the disallowance of the indenture trustee's claim and the bondholders' inability to vote on the plan, the proceeding was collective because it considered the obligations of all creditors. A court may enforce a foreign proceeding's plan if there was just treatment of all holders and protection of U.S. creditors against prejudice and inconvenience in claims processing and is based on comity principles. A court may grant comity only if the foreign proceeding complied with fundamental standards of procedural fairness, did not violate U.S. laws or public policy, and was not affected by fraud. A U.S. court may recognize and enforce a third-party release in a foreign proceeding if the foreign proceeding meets these requirements. Here, the record was insufficient to show how the third-party release was presented to and justified in the foreign proceeding. Therefore, the court denies enforcement without prejudice. In re PT Bakrie Telecom TBK, 628 B.R. 859 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2021).
- 15.1.j Rule 7004(f) does not apply to service of a chapter 15 recognition petition, and Rule 60(b) does not apply to termination of a recognition order. The bankruptcy court recognized a foreign proceeding concerning an individual debtor. The debtor moved for an order terminating recognition on the ground, among others, that the court did not have personal jurisdiction over the debtor. Section 1517(d) permits termination or modification of a recognition order if the basis for recognition was flawed or the grounds for recognition have ceased to exist. Bankruptcy Rule 9024, applying Civil Rule 60(b), permits a court to grant relief from a final judgment, order, or proceeding for mistake, inadvertence, surprise, excusable neglect, newly discovered evidence, or fraud. Because section 1517(d) specifies the grounds for terminating or modifying a recognition order, Rule 60(b) does not apply to a recognition order. Bankruptcy Rule 7004(f) provides for serving a summons to establish personal jurisdiction over an individual. Bankruptcy Rule 2002(g) governs service of a chapter 15 petition and notice of a recognition hearing. A chapter 15 case is an in rem proceeding involving only the debtor's property in the United States and does not require personal jurisdiction over the debtor. Therefore, Rule 7004(f) does not apply, and the court properly issued the recognition order without establishing personal jurisdiction over the debtor. In re Foreign Econ. Indus. Bank, 607 B.R. 160 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2019).

- 15.1.k Section 1521(a)(4) discovery is not limited to the United States. The foreign representative sought from the debtor and her lawyer discovery of documents held by the debtor's attorneys and agents outside the United States. Section 1521(a)(4) permits the court to grant relief "providing for the examination of witnesses, the taking of evidence or the delivery of information concerning the debtor's assets, affairs, rights, obligations or liabilities." By its terms, it is not limited to discovery within the United States. Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 45, which authorizes subpoenas and is incorporated into Bankruptcy Rule 9016, is also not limited to the United States. Therefore, a subpoena in a chapter 15 case may reach documents held outside the United States, as long as they are in the possession, custody, or control of the person to whom the subpoena is directed. In re Markus, 607 B.R. 379 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 20019).
- 15.1.l Court may recognize a foreign representative appointed after a foreign proceeding has been closed. A creditor of an Indonesian debtor opened a PKPU proceeding against the debtor in the debtor's COMI in Indonesia to obtain a suspension of payments order and to restructure the debtor's debts. The Indonesian court appointed administrators. The debtor completed a financial restructuring in the proceeding, and the court closed the proceeding, which was then no longer subject to reopening. However, the administrators retained authority to ensure the restructuring plan was carried out. Following the court's approval of the restructuring, an ad hoc bondholders committee pursued litigation in New York to collect on their bonds. After several rulings that were adverse to the debtor, the debtor's board adopted resolutions authorizing a director to act as foreign representative and authorizing him to file a chapter 15 petition in New York for recognition of the PKPU proceeding. A chapter 15 case may be commenced only by a foreign representative, which the Code defines as "a person or body ... authorized in a foreign proceeding to administer the reorganization or the liquidation of the debtor's assets or affairs or to act as a representative of such foreign proceeding." The definition does not require the appointment to occur while the foreign proceeding remains open. To promote chapter 15's broad purposes, courts should read the requirement broadly and include an appointment that occurs in the context of a foreign proceeding. Therefore, the delay in the appointment does not prevent the foreign representative from qualifying to file a chapter 15 case. In re PT Bakrie Telecom TBK, ___ B.R. ___, 2019 Bankr. LEXIS 1496 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. May 30, 2019).
- 15.1.m Foreign debtor need not seek chapter 15 recognition as a condition to a recognition of the foreign insolvency judgment. The debtor commenced a CCAA proceeding in Canada to restructure its obligations. The Canadian court set a claims bar date, gave notice to creditors, and ultimately sanctioned an arrangement that converted debt to equity and discharged securities fraud claims against the debtor and its CEO. U.S. securities fraud plaintiffs knew of the CCAA proceeding and the bar date but chose instead to commence an action in New York against the debtor and its CEO for U.S. securities law violations. The defendants moved to dismiss on international comity grounds. Comity is particularly appropriate in connection with foreign insolvency proceedings and should be granted when the foreign proceeding satisfies fundamental due process standards and when granting comity would not violate any U.S. laws or public policies. A CCAA proceeding involves notice to creditors and an opportunity to be heard and similar treatment of similarly situated creditors and so satisfies fundamental due process requirements. Nothing in the CCAA proceeding or the sanction order, including the release of the CEO from securities fraud claims, violates fundamental U.S. law or public policy. Although the debtor could have sought recognition under chapter 15 in the United States of the CCAA proceeding, its failure to do so does not preclude a U.S. court from giving the Canadian court the recognition that the United States allows to the acts of a foreign nation. Therefore, the court dismisses the action against the debtor and its CEO on grounds of international comity. EMA Garp Fund v. Banro Corp., ___ B.R. ___, 2019 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27387 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 21, 2019).
- 15.1.n Court recognizes Curacao insurance rehabilitation proceeding. Curacao law permits a Curacao court, on short notice and after hearing from the insurance regulator and the insurance company, in “the interest of the joint creditors,” to issue an order authorizing the regulator to seize and control an insolvent insurance company with a view to continuing its operations and rehabilitating it. Here, the regulator sought the order on July 3, the court gave notice of a hearing on July 4 at 10:00 AM, on July 4 at 10:30 AM, adjourned the hearing to July 4 at 2:15 PM, heard from the regulator and the company, and issued the decree. The court later appointed a foreign representative, who sought recognition under chapter 15 of the Curacao rehabilitation proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. In the chapter 15 case, the foreign representative and the objector disputed whether creditors are entitled to participate in the Curacao proceeding. To grant recognition, the court must find, among other things, that the foreign proceeding is a collective proceeding in which the debtor’s assets and affairs are subject to the control or supervision of a foreign court. A proceeding is collective if it considers the rights of and obligations to all creditors, rather than a single creditor or a single group of similarly-situated creditors. Because the proceeding expressly provides that it be conducted in the interest of joint creditors, the proceeding is collective in nature, whether or not the creditors may participate. Section 1502(3) defines “foreign court” as “a judicial or other authority competent to control or supervise a foreign proceeding.” An administrative agency is an “other authority” as provided in the definition. The Curacao regulator has authority to control and supervise the debtor in the rehabilitation proceeding. Therefore, the proceeding meets the requirement of supervision or control by a foreign court. Under section 1506, a court may not recognize a foreign proceeding if doing so would be manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States. Courts must construe the limitation narrowly. Lack of due process would meet the standard. The Curacao court heard the insurance company, though on shortened notice, and many U.S. state insurance regulations permit seizure and rehabilitation ex parte. Therefore, the limited notice to the insurance company of the Curacao proceeding was not manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. In re ENNIA Caribe Holding N.V., ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 3986 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Dec. 20, 2018).

- 15.1.o Financial contract safe harbor prohibits a foreign representative from avoiding a transfer under foreign avoiding powers. In a chapter 15 case, the foreign representative brought an action to recover transfers the debtor made before its foreign liquidation to non-U.S. persons to redeem the debtor’s own securities. The actions were based on the foreign jurisdiction’s avoiding power statutes that were similar to the Code’s preference and fraudulent transfer provisions. Section 546(e) prohibits a trustee from avoiding a prepetition transfer by, to, or for the benefit of a financial institution or financial participant in connection with a securities contract, unless the transfer is avoidable under section 548(a)(1)(A) (actual fraudulent transfer). The section 546(e) safe harbor is designed to prevent the ripple effects in the financial markets of unwinding certain financial transactions. Section 561(d) extends the safe harbor “to limit avoidance powers to the same extent as in a proceeding under chapter 7 or 11.” Because a foreign representative may not exercise the Code’s avoiding powers, section 561(d) must apply to a foreign representative’s attempt to use foreign avoiding powers in a chapter 15 case. Therefore, section 561(d) limits a foreign representative’s ability to recover property covered by the section 546(e) safe harbor, and the foreign representative may not avoid a transfer in connection with a securities contract to a financial institution or financial participant. Fairfield Sentry Ltd. v. Theodoor GGC Amsterdam (In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd.), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 3827 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Dec. 6, 2018).
- 15.1.p New York court grants recognition to Croatian plan approval that discharges English law governed debt, whether or not recognizable in England. The Croatian debtor holding company and numerous subsidiaries had issued debt governed by English law and debt governed by New York law. Upon insolvency, they opened insolvency proceedings in the jurisdiction of their center of main interests. They negotiated and presented a “settlement agreement,” which is similar to a chapter 11 plan, to their creditors. The settlement agreement provided for classification of creditors, equal distribution among creditors of the same class, discharge of claims, and third-party releases. Non-insider creditors voted heavily in favor of the settlement agreement, and the court approved it. The foreign representative of the holding company and eight subsidiaries, with both English and New York law governed debt, sought recognition under chapter 15 in New York of the foreign proceedings and of the foreign court’s order approving the settlement agreement. The New York court had previously granted recognition of the foreign proceedings as foreign main proceedings. Section 1507 permits recognition of the settlement agreement as “additional assistance” if consistent with principles of comity and with the fairness considerations of section 1507(b). The settlement agreement and its approval met all such considerations. English law generally refuses to enforce a foreign discharge of debt governed by English law (the Gibbs rule). Here, granting comity to the Croatian court’s approval of the settlement agreement might constitute a refusal to extend comity to the laws of England, which might refuse to recognize not only the Croatian discharge but also the U.S. court’s recognition and enforcement of that discharge within the United States. However, the court must apply only U.S. law in determining whether to grant comity to the Croatian order and not be deterred from doing so based on other countries’ laws. Because the factors required to support a grant of comity and recognition to the Croatian ruling are present, and because an order granting recognition would have effect only within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, the court recognizes and enforces the settlement agreement within the territorial jurisdiction, even though the English courts might not enforce the order as to English law governed debt. In re Agrokor d.d., ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 3267 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. Oct. 24, 2018).

- 15.1.q Foreign representative may take U.S. discovery despite discovery restrictions in the home court. The foreign representatives of a Cayman Islands debtor obtained recognition of the Cayman proceeding as a foreign main proceeding and then sought discovery in the United States from the debtor’s accountant, which might not have been permitted under Cayman law. Section 1521(a)(4) authorizes the bankruptcy court, after recognition of a foreign proceeding, to “provide for the examination of witnesses, the taking of evidence or the delivery of information concerning the debtor’s affairs, rights, obligations, or liabilities.” This grant of power is independent of the foreign jurisdiction’s discovery rules. Therefore, the court may order discovery, whatever Cayman law may provide. CohnResnick LLP v. Foreign Representatives (In re Platinum P’ners Value Arbitrage Fund L.P.), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109684 (S.D.N.Y. June 29, 2018).
- 15.1.r U.S. situs of foreign debtor’s claims is sufficient for chapter 15 jurisdiction. The foreign representatives of an Australian debtor filed a chapter 15 petition in New York to pursue discovery on breach of fiduciary duty claims the Australian estate had against two Australian insiders who currently resided in New York. Section 109(a) permits a chapter 15 case only if the debtor has “a domicile, a place of business, or property in the United States.” The substantive law of the breach of fiduciary duty claim determines the situs of the claim. Under Australian law, the situs of a breach of fiduciary duty claim is where the defendant resides. As the defendants reside in New York, the debtor has property in the United States and is eligible for chapter 15. In re B.C.I. Finances Pty Ltd., 583 B.R. 288 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2018).
- 15.1.s Court grants recognition to Italian foreign main proceeding and requires U.S. creditor to liquidate its claim there. The Italian debtor confirmed a restructuring under an Italian Concordata Preventivo. The Italian foreign representative obtained recognition of the Italian proceeding as a foreign main proceeding under chapter 15 and sought recognition and enforcement of the Italian confirmation order, which resulted in a discharge of the debtor. A U.S. creditor objected, claiming that its contract was governed by Florida law and provided for Florida jurisdiction to resolve any claims. Chapter 15 does not require such a result. It is appropriate to require U.S. creditors to file and litigate their claims in the foreign main proceeding court. Therefore, the court overrules the objection and grants the recognition order. In re Energy Coal S.P.A., 582 B.R. 619 (Bankr. D. Del. Jan. 2, 2018).
- 15.1.t Court grants recognition to Hong Kong voluntary liquidation. The debtor commenced a voluntary liquidation in Hong Kong under the Companies (Winding Up and Miscellaneous Provisions) Ordinance. A liquidator administers the liquidation without direct court supervision, but creditors may seek court intervention. The liquidator sought recognition under chapter 15, which permits recognition of a “foreign proceeding.” The Code defines “foreign proceeding” as “a collective judicial or administrative proceeding in a foreign country ... under a law relating to insolvency or adjustment of debt in which proceeding the assets and affairs of the debtor are subject to control or supervision by a foreign court, for the purpose of reorganization or liquidation. A proceeding is a statutory framework that sets forth a liquidator's duties and responsibility, distribution priorities, and rights to pursue avoiding powers. A proceeding is administrative if the liquidator's task are administrative, including collecting and distributing assets, conducting investigations and pursuing recovery of voidable transfers, and preparing reports to and convening meetings of creditors. It also might be judicial if creditors may involve the courts in the process. Court or governmental supervision is not required to meet this test. A proceeding is collective if it considers all creditors' rights, rather than just the rights of the initiating creditors, such as in a receivership action. The Hong Kong liquidation meets all these requirements and is in a foreign country, subject to supervision and control by a foreign court, and for the purpose of liquidation. Therefore, it is a foreign proceeding. Because it also meets the requirements under section 1515 and 1517 for recognition, the court grants recognition to the liquidation. In re Manley Toys Ltd., 580 B.R. 632 (Bankr. D.N.J. 2018); aff'd sub nom. ASI, Inc. v. Foreign Liquidators (In re Manley Toys Ltd.), 597 B.R. 578 (D.N.J. 2019).

- 15.1.u Court denies recognition to Korean case commencement order to the extent it would apply Korean bankruptcy law in the United States. A U.S. company licensed intellectual property and technology to a Korean company. The license contained a bi-directional ipso facto clause and specified that New York and federal law would apply, without regard to conflict of laws rules. The U.S. company filed a chapter 11 case in New York. The Korean company filed a proceeding under the Korean Debtor Rehabilitation and Bankruptcy Act (DBRA) soon after. The Korean bankruptcy court accepted the petition but did not order a stay or grant any other relief. The Korean debtor obtained recognition under chapter 15 of the Korean proceeding. The DBRA renders ipso facto clauses unenforceable. The U.S. debtor terminated the license agreement under the ipso facto clause. The Korean debtor challenged the termination in the New York bankruptcy court. The New York choice of law clause is enforceable without a conflict of laws analysis. An ipso facto clause is enforceable under New York law. The federal choice of law clause does not incorporate federal comity principles. Those principles exist independently of the parties' agreement, because comity is "neither a matter of absolute obligation ... nor of mere courtesy and good will." There is abstention comity (comity among courts), which is concerned with which court should decide and whether a U.S. court should enforce a foreign bankruptcy court's order relating to the debtor's assets and claims, and choice of law comity (comity among nations), which is concerned with which nation's laws should apply. Because the issue here is whether to enforce the DBRA's prohibition on enforcement of ipso facto clauses, this case involves choice of law. The contract selected New York law. The Korean order accepting the DBRA proceeding did not direct the application of Korean law throughout the world nor supersede U.S. bankruptcy law and state law. Nor does the chapter 15 recognition order provide for enforcement of Korean law in a U.S. bankruptcy case. Accordingly, the court declines to grant comity to the Korean order to prohibit the U.S. debtor's ipso facto termination of the contract. SMP Ltd. v. SunEdison, Inc. (In re SunEdison, Inc.), 577 B.R. 120 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 15.1.v Court enforces affiliate releases granted under U.K. scheme. The U.K.-based debtor obtained sanction of a scheme that converted its New York law-governed junior notes to equity and released guarantees by its non-debtor affiliates. Over 98% of the affected class accepted the scheme. The foreign representative sought and obtained recognition of the scheme under chapter 15 and sought recognition and enforcement of the affiliate releases. Section 1521(a)(7) permits the court, upon recognition, to grant "any additional relief that may be available to a trustee" except avoiding power claims. Additional relief may include recognizing and enforcing a foreign plan confirmation order. Section 1507 requires a court in "determining whether to provide additional assistance [to] consider ... consistent with principles of comity" a variety of factors. Comity is the most important consideration. A U.S. court should recognize and enforce a foreign judgment if the foreign forum has jurisdiction, fair procedures, due notice, and no prejudice against foreign litigants. Although granting third-party releases under U.S. law is limited, nothing in chapter 15 suggests they should not be recognized and enforced as part of a foreign plan confirmation order where the order is based on overwhelming non-insider creditors' plan acceptance. Here, over 98% of affected creditors accepted. The affiliate releases are central to the plan, and failure to enforce them could result in prejudicial treatment of creditors to the detriment of the plan and could prevent the fair and efficient administration of the scheme. Accordingly, comity principles permit enforcement, and the court so orders. In re Avanti Comm'n's Group PLC, 582 B.R. 603 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2018).

- 15.1.w Chapter 15 court permits recognized Cayman liquidators to obtain broad discovery in the United States. The Cayman liquidators of a Cayman investment fund obtained recognition as foreign representatives under chapter 15 and subpoenaed records of the funds accountants in New York. Section 1521(a)(4) permits the court, after granting recognition, to grant appropriate relief, including “the taking of evidence or the delivery of information concerning the debtor’s assets, affairs, rights, obligations or liabilities” and “any additional relief that may be available to a trustee,” but “only if the interests of the creditors and other interested entities . . . are sufficiently protected.” Section 1507 permits additional assistance, consistent with principles of comity. Bankruptcy Rule 2004 authorizes a party in interest to subpoena documents relating to “the acts, conduct, or property or to the liabilities and financing condition of the debtor.” Comity requires due regard for Cayman law, which might not permit such broad pre-litigation discovery as U.S. law does. But Cayman courts are receptive to evidence gathered in the United States under its more liberal pre-litigation discovery rules. Accordingly, enforcing the liquidators’ subpoena is consistent with principles of comity. In re Platinum P’ners Value Arb. Fund L.P. (In Official Liquidation), ___ B.R. ___, 2018 Bankr. LEXIS 1156 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. April 17, 2018).
- 15.1.x Section 1517(d), not section 1517(a), governs an application to recognize a different foreign proceeding for a debtor whose foreign proceeding the court has already recognized. The Brazilian debtor and its Netherlands-incorporated SPV finance subsidiary sought and obtained chapter 15 recognition of their Brazilian restructuring proceedings as foreign main proceedings. Soon thereafter, a major creditor initiated Netherlands insolvency proceedings against the SPV. The Netherlands insolvency trustee sought chapter 15 recognition of the Netherlands proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. Section 1517(a) requires the court to grant recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if, among other things, the foreign proceeding is pending in the jurisdiction in which the foreign debtor has its center of main interest. Section 1517(d) provides that chapter 15 provisions “do not prevent modification or termination of recognition if it is shown that the grounds for granting it were fully or partially lacking or have ceased to exist,” giving due weight to possible prejudice to parties who relied on the recognition order. Subsection (d) does not require a court to modify or terminate recognition even if the necessary grounds are shown; the court has discretion. But modification or termination need not meet Rule 60(b) standards of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, excusable neglect, fraud, or newly discovered evidence, because the statute authorizes a modification or termination on specified grounds. In this case, the original recognition order was based on the SPV’s single purpose and connection to the parent holding company, which used the SPV for financing. Nothing about the opening of the Netherlands proceeding changed the basis for recognition of the SPV’s Brazilian proceeding. Accordingly, the court denies recognition of the Netherlands proceeding. In re Oi Brasil Holdings Coöperatief U.A., 578 B.R. 169 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 15.1.y Court recognizes and enforces a French court’s order sanctioning a safeguard proceeding. The French debtor commenced a “safeguard proceeding” in a French court and sought and obtained recognition of the proceeding as a foreign main proceeding in the bankruptcy court. The debtor prepared a plan, solicited acceptances, and obtained the requisite percentages of acceptances under French law, and the French court sanctioned the plan. The debtor then sought the bankruptcy court’s recognition of the French judgment sanctioning the plan. Section 1521(a)(7) permits the court, after recognition of the foreign proceeding, to “grant appropriate relief” that is necessary to effectuate the purpose of chapter 15 and to protect the assets of the debtor and the interests of creditors, but only if the interests of creditors and other interested parties, including the debtor, are sufficiently protected. Appropriate relief may include enforcement of a foreign confirmation order. Because creditors accepted the plan under French law, the French court sanctioned the plan, and recognition and enforcement in the United States of the sanction order is a condition to implementation of the plan, such relief is appropriate in this case. In re CGG S.A., 579 B.R. 716 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).

- 15.1.z Court denies recognition of Canadian proceeding of U.S. subsidiaries who are not debtors in the proceedings and do not have an establishment in Canada. The Canadian parent company filed a scheme of arrangement proceeding in Canada to restructure its bond debt. In the proceeding, it sought and obtained an order enjoining creditor collection action against its U.S. subsidiaries, which had guaranteed the debt. The U.S. subsidiaries were ineligible to file their own proceedings in Canada, because they were not Canadian companies. They had no operations, employees, or place of business in Canada. The parent sought recognition of the Canadian proceeding under chapter 15 as a foreign main proceeding and enforcement of the Canadian court's order approving the scheme. The U.S. subsidiaries sought recognition of the Canadian proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding. The court may recognize a proceeding for a foreign debtor as a nonmain foreign proceeding if the debtor is a debtor in the proceeding and has an establishment in the country where the proceeding is pending. The U.S. subsidiaries were not debtors in the Canadian proceeding, despite the Canadian court's order enjoining creditor action against them. An establishment requires a nontransitory place of carrying on business. The U.S. subsidiaries did not have an establishment in Canada. Therefore, the court denies recognition for the U.S. subsidiaries, but in recognizing the Canadian court's order, enforces the injunction in the United States in favor of the U.S. subsidiaries. In re Mood Media Corp., 569 B.R. 556 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017).
- 15.1.aa Court accepts foreign bankruptcy tourism as basis for COMI and recognition. The holding company debtor's and its three subsidiaries' business was owning and operating deep water drilling rigs. They were incorporated in the Marshall Islands as non-resident corporations and operated their business from Cyprus. They issued New York-law governed debt. When they encountered financial distress and within a year before commencing a Cayman scheme of arrangement proceeding and then a chapter 15 case, the parent re-incorporated in the Cayman Islands as an exempted company, which requires that the company's objects be carried out mainly outside Cayman. When it did so, it moved its main corporate office to Cayman, conducted its management and operations, established bank accounts, maintained its books and records, and held its board meetings in Cayman, and gave public notice of its relocation to Cayman, all with the express purpose of effecting a Cayman scheme, because the Marshall Islands has no restructuring law. The parent and the subsidiaries deposited a substantial amount in their New York lawyer's trust account. The joint provisional liquidators from the Cayman scheme proceeding sought recognition in a chapter 15 case. The court may grant recognition to a foreign proceeding if it is a foreign main proceeding or a foreign nonmain proceeding and if the debtor has property or a place of business in the United States. The deposit in the trust account and the New York law-governed debt instruments suffice as property in the United States. A foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding if it is at the debtor's center of main interest. The court determines the COMI as of the chapter 15 petition date based on where third parties can determine where the debtor conducts regular business, unless the COMI was manipulated in bad faith. The facts here support COMI in the Cayman Islands for the parent and the subsidiaries. Courts determine bad faith manipulation based on insider exploitation, untoward manipulation, and thwarting third party expectations, among other factors. No such factors are present here. Rather, the debtors moved their operations because the Marshall Islands' debt process would have resulted in a value-destroying liquidation rather than reorganization. Therefore, the court grants recognition to the Cayman scheme proceedings. In re Ocean Rig UDW Inc., 570 B.R. 687 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2017), appeal dismissed, 585 B.R. 31 (S.D.N.Y. 2018).
- 15.1.bb Foreign representative may bring state avoiding power action if doing so does not require reliance on Code avoiding power rights. The Brazilian banking supervisor appointed a trustee for the liquidation of a bank. The trustee obtained recognition under chapter 15 as a foreign representative and brought an action against entities owned by the individuals who controlled the bank, alleging that the individuals looted the bank and transferred the proceeds to the defendants. The trustee's action included claims under New York's Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act. Section 1521(a)(7) permits a bankruptcy court to grant a foreign representative additional relief, except for relief available under the Code's avoiding powers. Ordinarily, a bankruptcy trustee brings an action under state fraudulent transfer law, which typically permits only a creditor to sue to avoid a fraudulent transfer, by asserting a creditor's rights that section 544(b) give the trustee. However, if the trustee has standing in its own right to bring the action, such as if the trustee has the rights of creditors under the authorizing foreign law, the trustee need not rely on section 544(b) to bring the action. In this case, the court finds Brazilian law gives the trustee the rights of the bank's creditors, and on that basis, the trustee has standing to bring a New York fraudulent conveyance action. Laspro Consultores LTDA v. Alinia Corp. (In re Massa Falida do Banco Cruzeiro do SUL S.A.), 567 B.R. 212 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2017).

15.1.cc Chapter 15 does not prevent giving preclusive effect to a foreign judgment in a U.S. case.

The defendant had brought a winding up petition in the Cayman Islands against a company in which he was a 50% owner. The plaintiff (the other 50% owner) opposed the winding up petition on various grounds relating to the defendant's conduct and sued the defendant in Connecticut for damages resulting from that conduct. Section 1501 permits a court to grant recognition of a foreign proceeding under chapter 15 where a foreign representative seeks assistance in the United States in connection with a foreign proceeding, assistance is sought in a foreign country in connection with a title 11 case, a foreign proceeding and a title 11 case concerning the same debtor are pending concurrently, or creditors or other parties in interest in a foreign country have an interest in requesting the commencement of, or participating, in a title 11 case or proceeding. None of those conditions apply in this case. Therefore, chapter 15's recognition procedures and requirements do not apply to the Cayman judgment, and they do not prevent the Connecticut court from giving it issue preclusive effect. Trikona Advisers Ltd. v Chugh, 846 F.3d 22 (2d Cir. 2017).

15.1.dd Court grants limited stay relief under section 1522 to permit commencement of FLSA actions against directors and officers.

The debtor filed a CCAA proceeding in Canada. The Canadian court issued a broad stay of all actions against the debtor and its officers and directors. The debtor and its monitor filed a chapter 15 case and sought relief under section 1520, which includes imposition of the section 362 automatic stay of action against the debtor or its property. The court granted the relief and in its order also stayed "the commencement or continuation of any action or proceeding concerning the liabilities of the Chapter 15 Debtor ... to the extent not stayed under Section 1520(a)" and provided that the Canadian court's order "shall apply to the Chapter 15 Debtor ... and other parties-in-interest." The U.S. Fair Labor Standards Act gives employees claims against an employer's directors and officers, subject to a rigid statute of limitations. Employees sought stay relief from the bankruptcy court to bring FLSA claims in the U.S. against the directors and officers. Section 362 does not stay actions against directors and officers, so stay relief under section 362 would not help the employees. Section 108(c) extends statutes of limitations during the automatic stay, but only as to claims against the debtor, not claims against directors or officers. Section 1522(c) permits the court to modify or terminate relief granted under section 1521 based on a balancing of hardships and sufficient protections of the debtor's and creditors' interests. Here, because section 108(c) does not protect the employees, the statute of limitations could run before the employees could get stay relief in Canada. The employees would suffer hardship from having to seek relief in Canada. The debtor would suffer a burden of distraction arising from the FLSA litigation. The court may fashion appropriate relief. It permits the employees to seek discovery on the identity of the debtor's directors and officers and only to commence the FLSA actions to prevent the running of the statute of limitations. In re Sanjel (USA) Inc., 2016 Bankr. LEXIS 2771 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. July 29, 2016).

- 15.1.1.ee New York law-governed and enforceable indenture is property in New York for chapter 15 eligibility purposes. The Singapore-based debtor issued bonds under a New York-law governed indenture, naming a New York bank as indenture trustee and consenting to jurisdiction in New York courts. It opened an insolvency proceeding in Singapore, and its foreign representative sought recognition under chapter 15. Under controlling Second Circuit law, section 109(a), which requires a residence, domicile, place of business or property in the United States as a condition to eligibility to be a debtor in a title 11 case, applies in chapter 15. Intangible property suffices to meet the requirement. A contract and the rights it creates are intangible property. Under New York law, intangible property may have more than one situs, depending on the purpose of the analysis. The indenture requires the notes to be discharged in New York, and the indenture and New York law permit enforcement of the contract in the New York courts, fixing the situs of the contract and the contract rights in New York. Therefore, the foreign representative is eligible to file the chapter 15 case in New York. The court also notes the potential irony if it ruled otherwise of permitting creditors to sue the debtor on the indenture in New York but not permitting it to commence a chapter 15 case there to address its liability on the bonds. In re Berau Cap. Res. Pte Ltd., 540 B.R. 80 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 15.1.1.ff Liquidators' minimal activities in the forum state does not shift the debtor's COMI to the forum. A creditor obtained a large judgment in a UK court against a BVI "letterbox" company that operated primarily in London. The company had no operations in the BVI. Immediately after the court issued judgment, the debtor transferred nearly $10 million from London to other jurisdictions. It then filed a voluntary liquidation proceeding in the BVI, with its principals guaranteeing compensation for the liquidator only sufficient for minimal administration of the estate. The liquidator in fact did only the minimum and did almost nothing to pursue the debtor's pre-liquidation transfers, which would have been recoverable under English or BVI law. The company had unliquidated assets in New York, and the creditor had been pursuing collection there. The liquidator filed a petition for recognition in New York. The court must grant a petition for recognition if, among other things, the foreign proceeding is in the debtor's center of main interest (COMI). If a liquidator has taken over the debtor's operations in its letterbox jurisdiction and has conducted substantial activities there, the debtor's COMI might shift to the liquidator's location. However, in this case, the liquidator did not conduct any substantial operations, even in the liquidation proceeding, so the debtor's COMI remained in the UK. Therefore, the court denied recognition. In re Creative Fin. Ltd., 543 B.R. 498 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2106).
- 15.1.1.gg Foreign representative may bring unjust enrichment claim that seeks relief similar to a fraudulent transfer claim. The New York bankruptcy court granted recognition to the foreign representatives of a U.K. foreign main proceeding. The foreign representatives sued under U.K. fraudulent transfer law and under unjust enrichment law to avoid and recover the debtor's transfers to its parent entities and their shareholders. Section 1521(a)(7) permits the bankruptcy court to grant a foreign representative "additional relief, except for relief available under sections 522, 544, 545, 547, 548, 550, and 724(a)." Although an unjust enrichment claim might seek the same relief as to the same transfers as a fraudulent transfer claim, the claims are not identical. An unjust enrichment claim is a common law claim that exists independently of a bankruptcy case. A fraudulent transfer claim seeks to void a transaction. A plaintiff may seek rescission for an unjust enrichment claim, but the primary purpose of such a claim is restitution, not voiding. Therefore, the claims are not identical, and section 1521(a)(7) does not bar a court from permitting a foreign representative to pursue an unjust enrichment claim in a chapter 15 case. Hosking v. TPG Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Hellas Telecomm. (Luxembourg) II SCA), 535 B.R. 543 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 15.1.1.hh A special purpose finance subsidiary's COMI may be at its parent's headquarters. A Brazilian group of companies commenced reorganization cases in Brazil, including for the holding company and several principal operating subsidiaries, which maintained their registered offices in Brazil, and a special purpose finance company, which maintained its registered office in Austria but had no actual operations in Austria. In fact, all finance company decisions were made by its Brazilian directors in Brazil. The finance company had issued U.S.-dollar denominated notes. The note proceeds were loaned to other subsidiaries, who guaranteed the notes. The notes were governed by New York law, and the parties consented to New York jurisdiction. A foreign representative of the finance subsidiary petitioned for recognition of its Brazilian reorganization case under chapter 15. Chapter 15 permits recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if, among other things, the foreign proceeding is at the foreign debtor's center of main interests (COMI). Absent contrary evidence, a debtor's COMI is presumed to be at the location of the debtor's registered office. The debtor may show that it actually operated at a different location, based on, among other things, the location of its headquarters or its principal management (its "nerve center) or of its primary assets or a majority of its creditors. Here, the finance subsidiary's sole business was the repayment of the notes, which could be accomplished only by the repayment to the subsidiary from the other companies to which it loaned the note proceeds. Under the circumstances, Brazil is the finance subsidiary's COMI. In re OAS S.A., 533 B.R. 8 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

- 15.1.ii An officer authorized by the debtor's board of directors may serve as a foreign representative to seek chapter 15 recognition. A Brazilian group of companies commenced reorganization cases in Brazil, including for the holding company and several principal operating subsidiaries that maintain their registered offices in Brazil. Under Brazilian reorganization law, the court appoints a judicial administrator, but his role is limited. The debtor retains authority to operate the business and propose a reorganization plan. The debtors' boards of directors authorized the group's chief legal officer as agent and attorney-in-fact to seek relief available under chapter 15 as a foreign representative. The CLO petitioned for chapter 15 recognition for the foreign proceedings. Under section 1517, only a foreign representative may petition for recognition. Under section 101(24), a "foreign representative" is a person "authorized in a foreign proceeding to administer the reorganization or liquidation of the debtor's assets or affairs or to act as a representative of such foreign proceeding." Judicial authorization is not required. All that is required is that the authorization occurs in the context of a foreign proceeding. Authorization from a debtor holding the power to administer the proceedings is adequate, even if those powers are not co-extensive with the powers of a chapter 11 debtor in possession. Here, Brazilian law provides adequate powers and authority to the reorganizing debtors, and their appointment of the CLO to act as the representative of the foreign proceeding was adequate. In re OAS S.A., 533 B.R. 8 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).
- 15.1.jj Court may not permissively abstain from a proceeding in a chapter 15 case. The state court defendant removed an action to the district court as related to a chapter 11 case. While the plaintiff's remand motion was pending, the liquidators for entities related to the chapter 11 debtor filed chapter 15 cases for those entities. The district court permissively abstained under section 1334(c)(1) and ordered remand under section 1452(b) of title 28. Section 1334(c)(1) permits abstention in the interest of justice or of comity with State courts, "except with respect to a case under chapter 15." Section 1334(c)(1) distinguishes between cases and proceedings, so "case" should not be read to mean "proceeding." Therefore, the "except" clause means that a court may not permissively abstain from anything in a chapter 15 case. Section 1452 refers to section 1334(c) and so should be read in pari materia with it. The filing of the chapter 15 case after removal does not change the result. Section 1334(c)(1) applies at the time of abstention, not at the time of removal. Therefore, the court reverses the abstention and remand order. Firefighters Retirement System v. Citco Group Ltd., 788 F.3d 425 (5th Cir. 2015).
- 15.1.kk Foreign representative may bring state fraudulent transfer action in the U.S. only if the foreign law authorizes the representative to assert claims on creditors' behalf. U.K. liquidators obtained chapter 15 recognition in the U.S. of their foreign proceeding. They then brought an action in the bankruptcy court under state fraudulent transfer law, without relying on section 544(b), which is unavailable to a foreign representative in a chapter 15 case, to avoid and recover transfers the U.K. debtor had made to its shareholders. The state law granted standing to a creditor, receiver, or trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor. Because the U.K. law does not authorize the liquidators to bring claims on behalf of creditors, the liquidators lack standing to bring the state fraudulent transfer action. Hosking v. TPC Cap. Mgmt., L.P. (In re Hellas Telecomm'ns (Luxembourg) II SCA), 524 B.R. 488 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2015).

15.1.ii Court enforces Brazilian confirmation order. The Brazilian debtors confirmed a reorganization plan under Brazilian bankruptcy law. The plan provided 25% recoveries to U.S. and non-U.S. holders of U.S. dollar-denominated bonds but higher recoveries to holders of other claims against the debtors, based on a deemed consolidation of the Brazilian debtors for distribution purposes. The foreign representative sought enforcement of the plan in the U.S. Holders of 37% of the U.S. bonds objected. Section 1521(a) permits a court to grant appropriate relief to a foreign representative, including staying U.S. enforcement actions, subject to any conditions it deems appropriate, and only if the debtor's and creditors' interests are sufficiently protected. The court may also grant additional assistance to a foreign representative under section 1507(a), consistent with comity principles, considering whether the additional relief will reasonably assure just treatment of creditors, protection of U.S. claim holders against prejudice and inconvenience in prosecuting claims in the foreign proceeding, prevention of preferential or fraudulent transfers, and distributions substantially in accordance with the Bankruptcy Code. Section 1507 relief is available only if section 1521 relief is unavailable or inadequate. Relief is discretionary with the court. Relief is not available, however, if it would be manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy, which is narrowly defined. An order enforcing a foreign proceeding confirmation order is available under section 1521(a). In this case, the debtors' and creditors' interests are sufficiently protected, because the Brazilian confirmation order permits reorganization and creditor distributions, even though holders of a minority of U.S. bonds found the distribution unsatisfactory. Denying enforcement would scuttle the plan and allow the minority to negotiate for a more favorable recovery without any evidence that any such effort would be successful. Therefore, the court grants enforcement. In re Rede Energia S.A., 515 B.R. 69 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).

15.1.mm Section 363 applies in a chapter 15 case to a foreign representative's sale of a claim against a U.S. bankruptcy estate. The foreign representative agreed to sell an allowed claim against a New York SIPA estate. The sale agreement was governed by New York law and was subject to the approval of the foreign court and of the bankruptcy court in the chapter 15 case. Section 1520(a)(2) provides "sections 363 ... apply to a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property that is within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States to the same extent that the sections would apply to property of an estate." Section 1502(8) defines "within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States" to include "intangible property deemed under applicable nonbankruptcy law to be located within that territory, including any property subject to attachment or garnishment that may properly be seized or garnished by an action in a Federal or State court in the United States." Under New York law, property that can be assigned or transferred is subject to attachment. The location of intangible property whose subject is a legal obligation to perform is the location of the party who is obligated to perform, here, the SIPA trustee in New York. Therefore, the SIPA claim is located in New York, and section 363 applies. Chapter 15 requires the bankruptcy court to consider comity, but the requirement is not absolute. Section 1520(a)(2)'s requirement that section 363 apply to U.S. property to the same extent as it would apply in a domestic case creates a comity exception, requiring the bankruptcy court to conduct an ordinary section 363 review of the sale agreement without deference to the foreign court. Krys v. Farnum Place, LLC (In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd.), 768 F.3d 239 (2d Cir. 2014).

15.1.nn Court need not give comity to all foreign proceeding orders after recognition. After obtaining recognition under chapter 15, the Mexican foreign representative represented to the bankruptcy court that the secured lender's claim was $103 million, but represented to the Mexican concurso court that the claim was only $27 million, and proposed a concurso plan that discharged all amounts over $27 million. The lender held $8 million in cash collateral, which was the foreign debtor's only U.S. asset. The foreign representative failed to report to the bankruptcy court, as ordered, on the status of Mexican proceedings. The representative also appeared to be working with the Mexican guarantors in Mexico in their effort to invalidate the New York law-governed guarantees. The lender moved to terminate the recognition order. Section 1517(d) permits termination if "the grounds for granting it were fully or partially lacking or have ceased to exist," bringing to bear the same considerations as apply to the original recognition grant. Section 1517 makes the recognition grant subject to section 1506, which permits the court to deny recognition if granting it would be "manifestly contrary" to U.S. public policy. Once a court grants recognition, it need not grant comity to every order the foreign court issues, but may refuse comity on the ground that a particular order is manifestly contrary to public policy. However, the court may not effectively act as an appellate court to the foreign court by invalidating or circumventing its orders, and dissatisfaction with the foreign court's order does not implicate the recognition decision. In this case, the foreign representative's behavior was less than exemplary, but proceedings were ongoing in Mexico, and the lender has appeal rights there. The bankruptcy court also need not grant comity to all final orders of the Mexican court. These protections, combined with the cash collateral deposit, provide the lender sufficient protection. Therefore, the court denies the motion to revoke recognition. In re Cozumel Caribe, S.A. de C.V., 508 B.R. 330 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).

- 15.1.oo Claim against a U.S. defendant is adequate property in the United States for purposes of section 109(a). The Australian foreign representative sought chapter 15 recognition of the Australian foreign main proceeding. The foreign debtor's only U.S. asset was a claim against a U.S. investment fund that was not subject to and had not consented to jurisdiction in the Australian courts to recover transfers that the foreign representative alleged were wrongfully transferred to the United States. The foreign representative had already commenced actions against the investment fund in state and federal courts. Section 109(a) requires as a condition to eligibility to file a bankruptcy petition that the debtor has a domicile, residence, place of business or property in the United States. A claim subject to litigation is located in a court that has both subject matter and personal jurisdiction, rather than at the plaintiff's domicile. The court distinguishes In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd., 484 B.R. 615 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013), on the ground that the U.S. had no interest in that case in determining whether a foreign representative who held a claim against a U.S. bankruptcy estate could sell the claim without U.S. court authorization under section 1520(a)(2). Therefore, the court finds that the debtor has property in the United States and grants recognition to the foreign representative. In re Octaviar Admin. Pty Ltd., 511 B.R. 363 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2014).
- 15.1.pp Section 109(a) applies to limit chapter 15 eligibility. The foreign representatives sought recognition under chapter 15 to take discovery in the U.S. against directors of an investor in the foreign debtor. The foreign debtor did not have a residence, domicile, place of business or assets in the United States. Section 109(a) requires, "Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, only a person that resides or has a domicile, a place or business, or property in the United States ... may be a debtor under this title." Section 103(a) makes chapter 1 applicable in a chapter 15 case. Nothing in chapter 15 excludes section 109(a). Therefore, a court may not grant recognition to a foreign representative for a debtor that is not eligible under section 109(a). Drawbridge Spec. Opp. Fund LP v. Barnet (In re Barnet), 737 F.3d 238 (2d Cir. 2013).
- 15.1.qq Section 1517 recognition requirements do not permit reexamination of the foreign court's judgment. The debtor was an Irish citizen who had resided in the Cayman Islands for 20 years. The Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas asserted substantial tax claims against him and had obtained default judgments for the taxes, which the debtor disputed. He filed a bankruptcy petition in the Cayman court, which approved the petition and ordered that the proceeding continue there, in part to obtain a stay on the tax cases while he could pursue relief. The foreign representative sought recognition of the Cayman proceeding in the United States under chapter 15 as a foreign main proceeding. Section 1517 requires recognition as a foreign main proceeding of a proceeding in a foreign country under a law relating to insolvency or debt adjustment that is pending in the country where the debtor has his center of main interests. The statutory requirements dictate whether the court grants recognition, based on the nature of the foreign proceeding, not on the U.S. court's determination of whether the foreign debtor properly qualified under the foreign proceeding. Because the Cayman court found the debtor eligible for a Cayman bankruptcy proceeding, the court grants recognition. A court may refuse recognition if recognition would be manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States. Courts must construe the exception narrowly. The debtor's ability to challenge a judgment without posting a bond is not contrary to U.S. public policy. Nor is a filing to stay enforcement pending challenge in bad faith. Even if it were, section 1517's mandatory recognition requirement does not contain a bad faith exception. Therefore, the court grants recognition. In re Millard, 501 B.R. 645 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

15.1.rr Chapter 15 discovery order is appealable and brings up the recognition order for review.

The foreign representatives sought recognition under chapter 15 to take discovery in the U.S. against directors of an investor in the foreign debtor. The court granted recognition of the foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding and then issued an order authorizing discovery. The directors appealed. Only a person aggrieved may appeal from a bankruptcy court order. The recognition order does not directly and adversely affect the directors, so they do not have standing to appeal from it. However, the discovery order does affect them pecuniarily, and because it permits discovery in aid of a foreign proceeding, rather than constituting a step in the chapter 15 case, is an appealable final order. The recognition order was a prerequisite to the discovery order. Therefore, an appeal from the discovery order brings up the recognition order for review. Drawbridge Spec. Opp. Fund LP v. Barnet (In re Barnet), 737 F.3d 238 (2d Cir. 2013).

15.1.ss Court applies section 365(n) in a chapter 15 case to prevent termination of technology licenses.

The German debtor filed an insolvency proceeding in Germany. The German Insolvency Administrator obtained recognition under chapter 15 of the German proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. In the German proceeding, the Insolvency Administrator elected nonperformance of the debtor's intellectual property cross-license agreements with international technology companies that operated in the United States. Under German insolvency law, upon electing nonperformance, the Insolvency Administrator may prevent the licensees from using the licensed technology, contrary to the protection that section 365(n) gives licensees in a U.S. bankruptcy case. The U.S. licensees developed expensive factories that incorporated the licensed technology and could suffer major losses of sunk costs (although the court was unable to estimate how much the losses would be) or exposure to royalty demands if they did not receive protection in the chapter 15 case comparable to the protection that section 365(n) provides. Section 1509(b) requires a U.S. court, after recognition of a foreign proceeding, to grant comity and cooperation to the foreign representative. Section 1521(a) requires the court, upon request of the foreign representative, to grant "any appropriate relief," subject to the debtor's and creditors' rights being "sufficiently protected." The court may require application of section 365(n) to provide protection to creditors, even if the foreign representative does not specifically request its application. Section 1522(a)'s sufficient protection provision requires the court to balance the respective interests, based on relative harms and benefits, of the foreign representative and the creditors who would be affected by the order the foreign representative seeks, not just determine whether the requested relief leaves the creditors on an equal footing with other creditors. Here, the Insolvency Administrator would realize less (but some) value if section 365(n) applies, but section 365(n) would not impose any affirmative obligation on him. By contrast, the licensees could lose substantial value in existing investments, so they are not sufficiently protected without application of section 365(n). In addition, failure to apply section 365(n) could destabilize the pervasive technology cross-licensing regime. Therefore, the court applies section 365(n) and protects the licensees. Jaffé v. Samsung Electronics Co., 737 F.3d 14 (4th Cir. 2013).

- 15.1.tt Court recognizes Australian liquidation proceeding despite the simultaneous pendency of a receivership proceeding. The Australian debtor initiated a liquidation proceeding in Australia. The floating charge creditors secured the appointment of a receiver to liquidate their collateral, which comprised all the debtor's assets that otherwise would have been the subject of the liquidation proceeding. Under Australian law, a receiver may liquidate the secured creditor's collateral but is responsible to the liquidator for any surplus, and the debtor has a redemption right. An unsecured creditor obtained a judgment in the U.S. against the debtor's U.S. subsidiary. The Australian liquidators then sought recognition of the Australian liquidation proceeding under chapter 15. Chapter 15 requires recognition of a foreign main proceeding that meets the chapter's administrative requirements, unless recognition is manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States. A foreign main proceeding is "a collective ... proceeding in a foreign country ... under a law relating to insolvency ... in which proceeding the assets and affairs of the debtor are subject to control or supervision by a foreign court, for the purpose of reorganization or liquidation." A proceeding is collective when it provides an orderly procedure in which all creditors are treated equally. Although the Australian receivership is for the sole benefit of the secured creditors, the liquidation proceeding addresses all creditors' claims and so is a collective proceeding, even though the debtor's assets are fully encumbered and it may be unlikely that there will be any surplus from the receivership. The public policy exception is narrowly construed and applies where the foreign proceeding's procedural fairness is suspect or would impinge severely upon a U.S. statutory or constitutional right. The Australian law's recognition of the secured creditor's priority is consistent with U.S. law. Therefore, the court recognizes the Australian liquidation proceeding. In re ABC Learning Centres Ltd., 728 F.3d 301 (3d Cir. 2013).
- 15.1.uu Section 1519 request to apply automatic stay requires satisfaction of injunction test. The debtor had not conducted business for three years. It filed a voluntary petition for liquidation in the British Virgin Islands, where it was incorporated. The liquidator filed a chapter 15 petition and under section 1519 sought application of the automatic stay of section 362 to stay litigation against the debtor that was about to start trial. Section 1519(a) permits relief "of a provisional nature" pending the court's ruling on a recognition petition if "urgently needed to protect the assets of the debtor or the interests of creditors." Section 1519(e) applies the "standards, procedures, and limitations applicable to an injunction" to such relief. Section 1519(e) is not limited to a request for an injunction but applies to any kind of relief sought under section 1519. Because the liquidator did not provide evidence to support any of the grounds for injunctive relief, the court denies the motion for provisional relief. In re Worldwide Educ. Servs., Inc., 494 B.R. 494 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2013).
- 15.1.vv Court grants comity to French safeguard proceeding. The French debtor's principal guaranteed the debtor's loan from a New York lender. The debtor commenced a French safeguard proceeding, available when the debtor is illiquid but not insolvent. In a safeguard proceeding, the French Commercial Court appoints a supervising judge to ensure the quick resolution of the proceeding, an agent (mandataire) to act for the creditors, and a receiver to supervise the debtor, and permits creditors to participate in a manner similar to creditors on a creditors' committee. In the proceeding, the debtor proposed and the court approved a plan that provided for full payment of the lender's claim and an injunction against collection from the guarantor. The lender sued the guarantor in New York. A court should grant comity unless doing so would be prejudicial to the nation's interests and should ordinarily decline to resolve creditor claims that are the subject of a foreign proceeding because of the importance of the orderly and equitable resolution of all claims against a distressed debtor. Courts extend comity to pre-insolvency proceedings as well as formal insolvency or bankruptcy proceedings, as long as there is procedural fairness in the proceedings and the results do not contravene U.S. public policy. The proceeding need not be identical to a U.S. proceeding to qualify. The French safeguard proceeding centralizes all claims against the debtor, provides creditors the opportunity to submit claims, empowers the agent to act in the creditors' interests and permits creditors to object. These features meet the procedural fairness requirement. The proceeding need not be consensual or respect U.S. priority rights to qualify. The safeguard procedure is modeled on chapter 11, so it is not contrary to public policy. The French court determined that the discharge of the guarantor was necessary to protect the debtor's plan implementation, and the safeguard plan provides for full payment of the lender's claim, so it does not violate public policy. Therefore, the guarantor discharge is enforceable, and the court dismisses the lender's action against the guarantor. Oui Financing LLC v. Dellar, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146214 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 9, 2013).

15.1.ww Court authorizes turnover of documents. The court recognized the foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. The foreign representatives sought turnover of documents under sections 542 and 543, through section 1521(a)(7), which permits the court, after recognition, to grant "any additional relief that may be available to a trustee, except for relief available under sections 522, 544, 545, 547, 548, 550, and 724(a)." Other courts have authorized foreign representatives to seek turnover under section 1521(a)(5), which permits the court to entrust "the administration or realization of all or part of the debtor's assets within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States to the foreign representative." However, sections 542 and 543 are not excluded from the form of additional relief that section 1521(a)(7) authorizes. Therefore, the Code does not prohibit the court from authorizing a foreign representative to seek turnover under those sections. Section 1522(a) conditions the grant of relief under section 1521 on sufficient protections of "the interests of creditors and other interested entities." Here, the court requires that the foreign representatives seek turnover only by noticed motion. The court applies the same condition on any discovery under section 1521(a)(4). In re AJW Offshore, Ltd., 488 B.R. 551 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2013).

15.1.xx Court may hear foreign nonmain proceeding representative's breach of fiduciary duty claim against directors. The court recognized a foreign proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding. The foreign representative of the foreign nonmain proceeding sued the debtor's former directors in the bankruptcy court for breach of fiduciary duty. The bankruptcy court had personal jurisdiction over the directors. Under section 1334(b), a bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over a proceeding that is related to a case under title 11. Generally, an action is related to a title case if its outcome "could alter the debtor's rights [or] liabilities ... and impacts upon the handling and administration of the bankrupt estate." In a chapter 15 case, the case itself substitutes for the concept of the estate. Alternatively, the court may consider the estate in the foreign proceeding. Under either view, the proceeding here is related to the chapter 15 case, because its outcome could alter the debtor's rights and impacts administration of the chapter 15 case and the foreign proceeding estate. Section 1521(a)(5) permits a bankruptcy court to entrust to the foreign representative the administration of "the debtor's assets within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States." It limits the court's in rem jurisdiction, which may substitute for personal jurisdiction over the defendant, to U.S. assets, but it does not address the liquidation of claims through litigation nor limit the court's subject matter jurisdiction. The claim here does not implicate the court's in rem jurisdiction, because the court has personal jurisdiction over the defendants. However, even if the claim did implicate the court's in rem jurisdiction, the claim is located within the United States. Determining where the claim is located here does not require the court to issue a ruling on claims against a res that would bind the world. Where the court has subject matter jurisdiction over the claim and personal jurisdiction over the parties, the claim is present in the court and therefore within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. British Am. Ins. Co. Ltd. v. Fullerton (In re British Am. Ins. Co.), 488 B.R. 205 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2013).

15.1.yy Absent manipulation, court must determine COMI at time of chapter 15 petition. The British Virgin Islands-incorporated investment fund maintained its registered office, agency and secretary and its corporate documents in the BVI but was managed by its New York-based investment manager. It had no directors in the BVI, and its principal (over 95%) investments were in New York, in a Ponzi scheme. When the scheme unraveled, the fund immediately suspended operations and redemption, and its directors focused on winding down the business. The directors held numerous telephonic board meetings initiated by the fund’s registered agent in the BVI, and its correspondence with its shareholders originated in the BVI. The fund’s shareholders obtained the appointment of a liquidator about seven months after the fund ceased operations. One year later, the liquidator filed a chapter 15 recognition petition in New York. A bankruptcy court may recognize a foreign proceeding “as a foreign main proceeding if it is pending in the country where the debtor has the center of its main interests”. The statute uses the present tense, suggesting that the court test COMI as of the chapter 15 petition date, not as of an earlier time. Using a single point in time, rather than reviewing the history of the debtor’s operations, furthers the statutory goal of promoting certainty corresponding to the regular place where creditors can ascertain the debtor conducts its business. However, courts may review a broader time period to guard against possible bad-faith COMI manipulation between the commencement of the foreign proceeding and of the chapter 15 case. All business activities are relevant, including liquidation activities and administrative functions, depending on each case’s facts. Here, the debtor’s sole business for seven months before the foreign proceeding and for 19 months before the chapter 15 petition was liquidation, which was conducted primarily in the BVI by a BVI liquidator. Therefore, the debtor’s COMI was the BVI, and the BVI proceeding was a foreign main proceeding. Morning Mist Holdings Ltd. v. Krys (In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd.), 714 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2013).

15.1.zz Foreign proceeding’s secrecy is not a ground for denying recognition. A British Virgin Islands court placed the debtor into liquidation and appointed a liquidator. The liquidator filed a chapter 15 recognition petition in New York. The BVI court conducts its proceedings in secret, but public summaries of proceedings are available, and the BVI court may permit non-parties access to sealed documents. Section 1506 permits a court to refuse recognition “if the action would be manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States”. Because the statute uses “manifestly”, courts should construe the public policy exception narrowly and apply it only in exceptional circumstances. Though the United States places great importance on the public nature of judicial proceedings, U.S. courts also permit confidential proceedings and matters to be filed under seal. Thus, unfettered access to court records is not absolute or a fundamental right. Therefore, the BVI proceeding’s confidentiality is not manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. Morning Mist Holdings Ltd. v. Krys (In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd.), 714 F.3d 127 7608 (2d Cir. 2013).

15.1.aaa Comity prevents bankruptcy court from examining the conduct of a foreign proceeding. A Canadian creditor sued a French debtor in a French court and in a Canadian court. Before the French court reached a decision, the debtor filed a French sauvegarde (reorganization) proceeding, creating, according to French law, an automatic stay with international effect. Despite the stay, the Canadian court issued judgment against the debtor. The creditor domesticated the judgment in Florida, obtained a writ of execution and caused the sheriff to seize a vessel owned by the debtor. The French foreign representative then filed a chapter 15 petition for recognition, which the Florida bankruptcy court granted. The French foreign representative sought an order entrusting the vessel to him. The creditor opposed and sought discovery of proceedings in the sauvegarde case to show that the French court did not treat the creditor fairly in that case. Section 1521(a)(5) permits a bankruptcy court, after recognition, to grant any appropriate relief to a foreign representative, including entrusting the administration of the debtor’s property in the United States to the foreign representative, and section 1521(b) permits the court to entrust distribution of the property to the foreign representative if “the interests of creditors in the United States are sufficiently protected”. Section 1522(a) permits the court to grant such relief, however, “only if the interests of creditors and other interested entities, including the debtor, are sufficiently protected”. Taken together, these sections provide that a bankruptcy court may not entrust distribution unless local creditors are protected but has discretion to ensure that foreign creditors are protected. The creditor here is a foreign creditor, despite its domestication of its judgment in the United States. Therefore, the bankruptcy court may consider protection of the creditor’s interests. However, in doing so, it is subject to section 1507, which requires the court to consider principles of comity. Comity permits the court to determine whether the foreign law in general sufficiently protects a particular creditor’s interest, but it does not permit the court to determine whether a particular proceeding under that law protects that creditor’s particular interest. Otherwise, the bankruptcy court would be acting effectively as an appellate court over the foreign court. Therefore, the bankruptcy court may not order discovery about the conduct of the sauvegarde case. SNP Boat Serv. S.A. v. Hotel Le St. James, 483 B.R. 776 (S.D. Fla. 2012).

15.1.bbb Court recognizes debtor-appointed foreign representative in a Mexican concurso proceeding. A Mexican debtor commenced a proceeding under the Mexican Business Reorganization Law (Ley de Concursos Mercantiles). The debtor appointed two of its directors as foreign representatives to seek relief in the United States under chapter 15. In a concurso proceeding, the debtor and its board of directors remain in possession and control of its assets, are entrusted with management and retain the ability to litigate claims. A “foreign representative” is “a person ... authorized in a foreign proceeding to administer the reorganization of the liquidation of the debtor’s assets or affairs.” Application of this definition is a question of U.S., not foreign, law. The definition does not by its terms require that the foreign representative be appointed by a court. Nor does it require that the person authorized to administer the reorganization of the debtor’s affairs have powers co-extensive with the powers of a chapter 11 debtor in possession. The Mexican debtor’s powers here are sufficient to meet the definition’s requirements. Therefore, the court recognizes the directors as the foreign representatives. Ad Hoc Group of Vitro Noteholders v. Vitro SAB de CV (In re Vitro SAB de CV), 701 F.3d 1031 (5th Cir. 2012).

15.1.ccc Court recognizes Bermuda liquidators; denies “public policy” challenge to recognition. A single creditor commenced an involuntary winding up proceeding in Bermuda against the debtor, who was incorporated and had its registered office in Bermuda and maintained an office, an employee, its books and records and a bank account there. Before ordering winding up and appointing liquidators, the Bermuda court permitted the debtor to pay off the creditor. When the debtor failed to do so, the court issued the winding up order, even though the majority of its creditors opposed the winding up. The debtor appealed. While the appeal was pending, the liquidators sought recognition of the Bermuda proceeding in the United States as a foreign main proceeding under chapter 15. Chapter 15 requires a court to recognize a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if the debtor’s center of main interests (COMI) is where the foreign proceeding is pending. The debtor’s registered office is presumed to be its COMI unless there is evidence to the contrary. Although the debtor had international investments, including many in the United States, there was no evidence submitted that the debtor’s registered office location was not its COMI. Section 305(a)(1) permits a court to dismiss or abstain if the interests of creditors would be better served. This section is intended to permit an out-of-court restructuring to proceed, despite a few objecting creditors, not to require dismissal of a foreign representative’s recognition petition, even though U.S. creditors may oppose it, as chapter 15 acts in aid of the foreign proceeding, not in opposition to it, as would an involuntary case during an out-of-court workout. Section 305(a)(2) permits a court to dismiss or abstain from a chapter 15 case if chapter 15’s purposes would be best served by dismissal or abstention, but only after recognition. Section 1506 permits the court to refuse action that would be manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States. The exception is narrowly drafted. It does not require the court to refuse relief simply because a foreign proceeding’s rules or outcomes differ from those in the United States. Neither a single-creditor involuntary petition nor a debtor's ability to pay off a petitioning creditor, though differing from U.S. law, is manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. Therefore, the court grants recognition. In re Gerova Fin. Group, Ltd., 482 B.R. 86 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

15.1.ddd Court grants recognition as foreign main proceeding to Indian Sick Industrial Companies Act proceeding. An Indian company commenced a proceeding before the Board for Industrial and Financial Reconstruction (BIFR) under the Indian Sick Industrial Companies Act (SICA) and sought recognition under chapter 15 of the proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. Under SICA, the BIFR controls the debtor's assets, imposes guidelines of conduct of a business in an SICA proceeding, has the authority to suspend contracts and supervises the debtor's rehabilitation. SICA does not expressly permit general unsecured creditors' participation in the process, but in practice such creditors are allowed to intervene and be heard. A bankruptcy court may recognize a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if it is judicial or administrative, collective in nature, authorized or conducted under an insolvency or debt adjustment law, subjects the debtor's assets and affairs to the foreign court's control or supervision and is for the purpose of reorganization or liquidation. BIFR is an administrative board with powers similar to those of a U.S. bankruptcy court. A proceeding is collective if it contemplates treatment of various classes of claims, whose holders may participate in the proceeding, and adequate notice to creditors. Courts consider de facto, rather than de jure, ability to participate. Here, the SICA proceeding meets this requirement, as BIFR had permitted several general unsecured creditors to intervene and participate. SICA is an insolvency law, because it deals with corporate insolvency and debt adjustment and provides for a scheme of rehabilitation. The debtor's assets are subject to BIFR's control. Although BIFR does not have full control over the debtor's affairs, the standard is low, and BIFR has enough control through the ability to suspend contracts and impose conduct guidelines to meet it. Therefore, the court grants recognition to the SICA proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. Armada (Singapore) Pte Ltd. v. Shah (In re Ashapura Minechem Ltd.), 480 B.R. 129 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

15.1.eee Court denies enforcement of Mexican concurso that releases nondebtor subsidiary guarantees. The Mexican debtor had issued New York law-governed notes that its U.S. subsidiaries guaranteed. In a proceeding under the Mexican Business Reorganization Law (Ley de Concursos Mercantiles) concerning only the debtor and not the subsidiaries, the debtor confirmed a plan that provided for reduction of the principal and interest rates on the U.S. subsidiaries' guarantee obligations and retention by the Mexican parent of substantial equity value in the subsidiaries. The debtor filed a chapter 15 case and sought enforcement of the plan in the United States. Section 1521(a) permits the court, upon recognition of a foreign proceeding, to grant appropriate relief, including staying collection actions against the debtor in the United States, that is co-extensive with the relief that was available under former section 304, but, under section 1522(a), only if the interests of creditors are sufficiently protected. Section 1507(a) permits the court to provide additional assistance to a recognized foreign representative, consistent with principles of comity. Section 1057(b)(4) requires the court to consider whether the relief will reasonably assure distribution substantially in accordance with the distribution under the Bankruptcy Code. Section 1507 is a broad "catch-all", but a court may not use it to circumvent other chapter 15 restrictions. In applying these sections, the court must first consider whether relief is available under section 1521 and, if not, only then consider whether additional assistance under section 1507 is appropriate. In this case, section 1521(a) does not permit enforcement of the concurso. Enforcement would be more than a stay of collection action. It would be a permanent injunction against collection. Such relief was not available under section 304, because third-party releases are generally not available under U.S. law except in rare circumstances that are not present here. In addition, section 1522(a) prohibits enforcement because the concurso plan does not provide sufficient protection of creditors' interests. For the same reason, section 1507 does not permit enforcement. In addition, section 1507(b)(4) limits additional assistance if it would not reasonably assure distribution in accordance with distribution under the Bankruptcy Code. The Bankruptcy Code would not permit the parent to retain substantial value in the subsidiaries while discharging the subsidiaries' obligations for less than full payment to the subsidiaries' creditors. Therefore, the court denies enforcement of the concurso under chapter 15. Ad Hoc Group of Vitro Noteholders v. Vitro SAB de CV (In re Vitro SAB de CV), 701 F.3d 1031 (5th Cir. 2012).

15.1.fff Section 1520(a)(2) does not apply to a foreign representative's sale of a claim against another estate. The recognized British Virgin Islands foreign representative agreed to sell a claim against a U.S. bankruptcy estate. The sale contract provided that New York law governs. The foreign court approved the sale. The foreign representative sought U.S. bankruptcy court approval as well. Under section 1520(a)(2), upon recognition, section 363 "appl[ies] to a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property that is within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States." Under section 1502(8), intangible property is within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States if deemed so "under applicable nonbankruptcy law". New York law is the applicable law, because the sale contract so provides. Under New York law, the claim is a "general intangible", whose location is determined under a flexible test based on "a common sense appraisal of the requirements of justice and convenience in particular conditions". Here, the court has recognized that the seller/foreign representative is deemed to have custody and control of the debtor's assets, the seller is a BVI entity, appointed by a BVI court, and the proceeding is being administered in the BVI. Therefore, the claim is not within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and section 1520(a)(2) does not apply. Comity principles are central to chapter 15. The BVI court has the paramount interest in the claim, so deferral to that court's proceeding is consistent with comity. In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd., 484 B.R. 615 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2013).

15.1.ggg U.S. court stays property ownership proceedings to grant comity to Mexican court to determine ownership. The Mexican debtor and its nondebtor affiliates borrowed under a U.S. indenture governed by U.S. law to finance hotel construction in Mexico. Hotel revenue was directed to a lock-box account held by the loan servicer in New York. After the debtor's and nondebtors' default on the loan, the debtor commenced a proceeding under the Mexican Business Reorganization Law (Ley de Concursos Mercantiles). The Mexican court issued a Precautionary Measure enjoining the loan servicer from applying any of the lock-box funds. The foreign representative then obtained recognition under chapter 15 in New York of the concurso as a foreign main proceeding. The loan servicer brought an adversary proceeding in the New York bankruptcy court for a declaration that the funds in the lock-box account are not property of the debtor and not subject to the stay. The foreign representative moved to stay the adversary proceeding on comity grounds, in deference to the Mexican court. Section 1509 grants a recognized foreign representative a right of direct access to U.S. courts and provides that a U.S. court "shall grant comity or cooperation to the foreign representative", subject to any limitations specified in other sections. However, it does not require that the court to which the foreign representative has access grant any request for comity or recognition of foreign court orders. Such recognition depends on chapter 15's substantive provisions providing for relief to the foreign representative. Section 1521(a)(7) permits the court to grant "any additional relief that may be available to a trustee", including a stay of U.S. proceedings in favor of the foreign proceeding. A U.S. court may determine property ownership issues that are governed by U.S. law but may defer to the foreign court for interpretation of its own orders affecting property in the United States. Here, the court stays its own proceedings to grant comity to permit the Mexican court to determine how much of the lock-box account is the nondebtors' property and therefore not part of the debtor's estate but agrees to revisit the stay if the foreign representative and the Mexican court do not act promptly. CT Inv. Mgmt. Co., LLC v. Cozumel Caribe, S.A. de C.V. (In re Cozumel Caribe, S.A. de C.V.), 482 B.R. 96 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

15.1.hhh A Bermuda hedge fund’s COMI was in Bermuda. A Bermuda-incorporated investment fund’s registered office, two of its three directors, its administrator, its bank account, its custodian and its auditor were located in Bermuda. Its fund manager was located in Guernsey, its investment manager was “based in” London, its prime brokerage accounts were in London and New York, its valuation agent was located in the United States and substantially all of its funds were invested outside of Bermuda. The fund’s offering documents described it as exclusively Bermudan and stressed that the fund was not to be resident in the United Kingdom for tax purposes. All subscriptions and withdrawals were through Bermuda and a Bermudan bank. The fund commenced liquidation proceedings in Bermuda, where Bermudan joint liquidators were appointed and conducted the liquidation proceedings. The joint liquidators sought recognition under chapter 15 more than two years after the opening of the Bermudan liquidation proceedings to investigate and prosecute claims against a U.S. company. The court may grant recognition to a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if it is pending in the jurisdiction “where the debtor has the center of its main interests” (COMI). To determine COMI, courts look at the location of the debtor’s headquarters, of those who manage the debtor, of the debtor’s primary assets and of where the majority of the affected creditors are, at the jurisdiction whose law would apply to most disputes and at the expectations of creditors and other parties in interest, that is, where third parties might ascertain the debtor’s COMI was. Here, the second, third and fourth location factors favor COMI in the United Kingdom, but the first location factor and the applicable law factor favor Bermuda. Two of the debtor’s directors resided in Bermuda and the corporate books and records were maintained and audited there, pointing to Bermuda as the debtor’s headquarters. Bermuda law governed the debtor’s establishment and operation, and Bermuda was the only place where creditors might have ascertained as the debtor’s COMI. Therefore, the fund’s COMI is in Bermuda, and the court grants recognition. In re Millennium Global Emerging Credit Master Fund Ltd., 474 B.R. 88 (S.D.N.Y. 2012).

15.1.iii The court may grant a foreign representative discovery in the U.S. concerning non-U.S. property. The foreign representatives in a foreign main proceeding that had been granted recognition by the bankruptcy court sought discovery from the debtor investment fund’s U.S. broker of documents concerning the debtor’s accounts that the broker had provided to the S.E.C. The discovery related to a proceeding that the foreign representatives had brought against the debtor’s principals in the U.K., but not to property of the debtor in the U.S. or to its recovery. The documents were generated by the broker’s Spanish affiliate but were in the U.S. broker’s possession and control. Section 1521(a)(4) authorizes the court to issue an order for “the taking of evidence or the delivery of information concerning the debtor’s assets, affairs, rights, obligations or liabilities.” Section 1507(a) permits the court to “provide additional assistance to a foreign representative”, including making Rule 2004 applicable in the case. Under these provisions, the court may order discovery of information located in the U.S., even when it does not concern property in the U.S. The provisions provide an independent basis for assisting a foreign representative in gathering information in the U.S. Therefore, the court orders the broker to provide the information to the foreign representatives. In re Millennium Global Emerging Credit Master Fund Ltd., 471 B.R. 342 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2012).

15.1.jjj A Mexican debtor may designate its foreign representative. Before commencing a concurso mercantil, a Mexican debtor appointed a Mexican individual to be its foreign representative in the proceeding. The debtor commenced the concurso, and the individual sought recognition of the proceeding in the U.S. Section 1515 permits a foreign representative to file a recognition petition. Section 1517 requires recognition if, among other things, the petitioner is a “foreign representative”. Section 101(24) defines foreign representative as “a person or body ... authorized in a foreign proceeding to administer the reorganization or the liquidation of the debtor’s assets or affairs or to act as a representative of such foreign proceeding”. Thus, whether a person is a “foreign representative” within the definition is a matter of U.S., not foreign, law. The phrase “authorized in a foreign proceeding” does not require the foreign court’s approval, as the phrase can be read to mean “authorized in the context of a foreign proceeding”. In a concurso, the debtor remains in possession, as in a chapter 11 case. It is authorized to administer the reorganization of its assets and affairs. Accordingly, the debtor may appoint the foreign representative, and the foreign representative is entitled to recognition if the other recognition requirements are met. Ad Hoc Group of Vitro Noteholders v. Vitro, S.A.B. de C.V. (In re Vitro, S.A.B. de C.V.), 470 B.R. 408 (N.D. Tex. 2012).

15.1.kkk Court grants comity to Mexican order and stays against foreign debtor’s nondebtor parent. A Mexican debtor commenced an insolvency proceeding in Mexico. The Mexican court issued an order staying action against the debtor and against its shareholder, who had guaranteed its debts. The foreign representative obtained recognition of the Mexican proceeding. The major lender then commenced an action in the U.S. against the shareholder to collect on the guarantee. The foreign representative moved in the action for a stay of the proceeding based on the Mexican court’s stay order and comity. Section 1509(b)(2) permits a foreign representative who has received recognition to apply directly to a U.S. court for appropriate relief. Section 1524 permits a recognized foreign representative to “intervene in any proceeding in a State or Federal court in which the debtor is a party”. Section 1524 does not limit section 1509(b)(2)’s scope: a foreign representative may apply to a U.S. court for relief even if the debtor is not a party to the proceeding in which the foreign representative seeks relief. Section 1509(e) makes the foreign representative “subject to applicable nonbankruptcy law”, whether or not a bankruptcy court recognizes the foreign representative. Section 1509(e) is, like 28 U.S.C. § 959, intended to make the foreign representative comply with U.S. law while acting in the U.S., not to limit the foreign representative’s rights under section 1509(b)(2) to apply for relief. Therefore, the foreign representative need not comply with Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 24 regarding intervention to apply for relief. Section 1509(b)(3) requires a U.S. court to grant comity to the foreign representative. Section 1506 permits the court to deny relief if relief would be “manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States”. Bankruptcy courts frequently issue stays of action against a debtor’s nondebtor affiliates. Accordingly, granting comity and enforcing the Mexican court’s order to stay action against the debtor’s parent on the guarantee is not manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. The court therefore grants comity and stays the proceeding. CT Inv. Mgmt Co., LLC v. Carbonell, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3356 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 11, 2012).

15.1.iii Comity is based on whether foreign law governing a foreign proceeding, not the particular proceeding, protects foreign creditors’ interests.

A French corporation commenced a French safeguard proceeding—analogous to a chapter 11 case—in France. After the commencement of the safeguard proceeding, a Canadian creditor obtained a judgment against the French company and domesticated it in Florida. It sought seizure of the French company’s assets in Florida. The French foreign representative commenced a chapter 15 case in Florida to protect the assets. The Florida bankruptcy court recognized the safeguard proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. The creditor sought discovery to determine whether its interests were fairly treated in the safeguard proceeding. Under section 1521, upon recognition, the court may grant any appropriate relief, including entrusting the administration of the debtor’s assets located in the United States to the foreign representative and the distribution of those assets by the foreign representative if “the interests of creditors in the United States are sufficiently protected”. In determining whether those interests are sufficiently protected, a court may review only the general operation of the laws governing the foreign proceeding, not whether the specific proceeding protected those interests. Such a review would set up the U.S. court as an appellate court over the foreign court. Therefore, the creditor is not entitled to discovery on conduct of the safeguard proceeding. SNP Boat Serv. S.A. v. Hotel Le St. James, 483 B.R. 776 (S.D. Fla. 2012).

15.1.mmm Court applies section 365(n) in a chapter 15 case to prevent termination of technology licenses. The German debtor filed an insolvency proceeding in Germany. The German Insolvency Administrator obtained recognition under chapter 15 of the German proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. In the German proceeding, the Insolvency Administrator elected nonperformance of the debtor's intellectual property cross-license agreements with international technology companies that operated in the United States. Under German insolvency law, upon electing nonperformance, the Insolvency Administrator may prevent the licensees from using the licensed technology, contrary to the protection that section 365(n) gives licensees in a U.S. bankruptcy case. The U.S. licensees developed expensive factories that incorporated the licensed technology and could suffer major losses of sunk costs (although the court was unable to estimate how much the losses would be) or exposure to royalty demands if they did not receive protection in the chapter 15 case comparable to the protection that section 365(n) provides. Section 1509(b) requires a U.S. court, after recognition of a foreign proceeding, to grant comity and cooperation to the foreign representative. Section 1521(a) requires the court to grant "any appropriate relief", subject to the debtor's and creditors' rights being "sufficiently protected", which requires the court to balance the relief and the interests of those affected, without unduly favoring one group over another. Here, the Insolvency Administrator will realize less value if section 365(n) applies, but section 365(n) would not impose any affirmative obligation on him. By contrast, the licensees could lose substantial value in existing investments, so they are not sufficiently protected without application of section 365(n). Section 1506 permits the court to refuse to take action that "would be manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States". A court may apply section 1506 when the foreign proceeding involves procedural unfairness or application of foreign law would "severely impinge the value and import of a U.S. statutory or constitutional right, such that granting comity would severely hinder United States bankruptcy courts' ability to carry out ... the most fundamental policies and purposes of these rights." Congress enacted section 365(n) to protect American technology and evidences a strong U.S. policy favoring technological innovation. Failure to apply it in chapter 15 cases would "slow the pace of innovation, to the detriment of the U.S. economy", which "would severely impinge an important statutory protection ... and thereby undermine a fundamental U.S. public policy. Therefore, the court applies section 365(n) and protects the licensees. In re Qimonda, 462 B.R. 165 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2011).

- 15.1.nnn Chapter 15 court denies injunction to protect debtor's nondebtor subsidiaries. A Mexican debtor issued U.S. bonds. Its Mexican and U.S. subsidiaries guaranteed the debt. During negotiations to restructure the bonds and all the guarantees, several bondholders filed involuntary chapter 11 petitions against several U.S. subsidiaries and filed state court collection actions in the U.S. against the parent and numerous non-U.S. subsidiaries and sought to attach their U.S. assets. The parent filed an insolvency proceeding in Mexico and soon after filed a chapter 15 petition for recognition of the Mexican proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. Pending recognition, the parent moved the chapter 15 court to stay all collection actions against it and the subsidiaries. Section 1519 permits the court, pending determination of a recognition petition, to grant interim relief, including staying execution against the debtor's assets and relief referred to in section 1521(a)(7), which, after recognition, permits "any additional relief that may be available to a trustee" (with certain exceptions). Section 1519's list of relief is not exclusive, so the court may issue a stay during the recognition gap period that is co-extensive with the automatic stay of section 362. The Mexican parent, which was subject to the chapter 15 petition, showed adequate cause for the injunction, which the court grants. Availability of comparable relief for the nondebtor subsidiaries requires they meet the four-part test for an injunction: likely success on the merits, irreparable injury, balance of equities and the public interest. Success on the merits in this context is measured by the likely outcome of the litigation sought to be stayed. Here, the evidence was divided. Irreparable harm may equate to lack of an available remedy at law. The subsidiaries could file insolvency proceedings in the U.S. or in Mexico, which would provide them the protection they seek. In addition, an injunction would harm the bondholders, because they would be remitted to the Mexican legal system to pursue their claims in the insolvency proceeding, despite the bonds' intent that disputes be resolved in U.S. courts. Finally, an injunction would not be in the public interest, because it would protect nondebtors, contrary to the important bankruptcy law principle that the Code generally protects only debtors, and would invite other foreign debtors to file insolvency proceedings in their home jurisdictions only for the parent and seek protection for their subsidiaries in the U.S. without filing insolvency proceedings in either jurisdiction. Therefore, the court denies the injunction. Vitro, S.A.B. de C.V. v. ACP Master, Ltd. (In re Vitro, S.A.B. de C.V.), 455 B.R. 571 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2011).

15.1.000 COMI is determined as of the date of opening of the foreign proceeding. A Bermuda-incorporated hedge fund commenced liquidation proceedings in Bermuda, where Bermudan joint liquidators were appointed and conducted the liquidation proceedings. The joint liquidators sought recognition under chapter 15 more than two years after the opening of the Bermudan liquidation proceedings to investigate and prosecute claims against a U.S. company. The court may grant recognition to a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if it is pending in the jurisdiction “where the debtor has the center of its main interests” (COMI). COMI has essentially the same meaning as “principal place of business”. Once a liquidation proceeding is commenced, the debtor no longer has a principal place of business nor any interests. Only the liquidator does. Former section 304 looked to the debtor’s principal place of business as of the opening of the foreign proceeding, among other things, to determine whether to grant comity to the foreign proceeding. The European Insolvency Regulation also looks only to the debtor’s COMI as of the opening of the initial insolvency proceedings to determine whether to recognize a proceeding commenced in another nation of the EU. Using the date of opening of insolvency proceedings promotes certainty and the ability of third parties reasonably to ascertain in advance, while they are dealing with a debtor, where a debtor’s COMI is located and reduces the possibility of forum shopping. Therefore, the court determines the debtor’s COMI for purposes of chapter 15 recognition as of the date of the opening of the foreign proceeding. In re Millennium Global Emerging Credit Master Fund Ltd., 458 B.R. 63 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

15.1.ppp A Bermuda hedge fund’s COMI was in Bermuda. A Bermuda-incorporated investment fund’s registered office, two of its three directors, its administrator, its bank account, its custodian and, its auditor were located in Bermuda. Its fund manager was located in Guernsey, its investment manager was “based in” London, its prime brokerage accounts were in London and New York, its valuation agent was located in the United States and substantially all of its funds were invested outside of Bermuda. The fund commenced liquidation proceedings in Bermuda, where Bermudan joint liquidators were appointed and conducted the liquidation proceedings. The joint liquidators sought recognition under chapter 15 more than two years after the opening of the Bermudan liquidation proceedings to investigate and prosecute claims against a U.S. company. The court may grant recognition to a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if it is pending in the jurisdiction “where the debtor has the center of its main interests” (COMI). There is a rebuttable presumption that the debtor’s COMI is where its registered office is located. Here, many of the facts point toward Bermuda as the debtor’s COMI; others point in various directions. However, the debtor’s employment of agents, such as the fund manager and investment manager, or the location of its investments, should be given less weight. Of greater importance is whether the COMI is readily ascertainable by third parties. Here, the fund’s offering memorandum made clear that the fund was located in Bermuda (leading investors to believe that any winding up would occur in Bermuda) and subject to a Bermuda-based board of directors, and investors sent their investments in the fund to Bermuda. Therefore, the fund’s COMI is in Bermuda, and the court grants recognition. In re Millennium Global Emerging Credit Master Fund Ltd., 458 B.R. 63 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

15.1.qqq A foreign representative’s withdrawal of a chapter 15 petition should not prevent the court from determining COMI. The Italian trustee appointed in an involuntary bankruptcy of a U.S. debtor in Italy sought recognition of the Italian proceeding in the U.S. under chapter 15. Upon encountering opposition, the Italian trustee withdrew the chapter 15 petition. The court may nevertheless determine the debtor’s COMI. Without such a determination, the foreign representative, if he encountered opposition in one jurisdiction, could withdraw the recognition petition and forum shop to find a jurisdiction that would recognize the foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. A court should not facilitate such conduct. In re Think3, Case no. 11-11925-hcm (Bankr. W.D. Tex. Sept 12, 2011).

15.1.rrr Court waives disclosure of creditor claim information in foreign representative's chapter 11 case. A foreign bank supervisory body placed a local bank into an administration proceeding and appointed an External Administrator. In the foreign proceeding, the External Administrator had obtained creditor and claim information under a confidentiality agreement with the creditors. The External Administrator obtained recognition under chapter 15 of the foreign proceeding. Sometime later, the External Administrator filed a chapter 11 case for the debtor. The External Administrator filed a statement of affairs and schedules of assets and liabilities, including a list of the names and addresses of all creditors, but did not list the amount owed to each creditor. Section 521(a)(1)(B) requires the debtor to file a schedule of assets and liabilities, unless the court orders otherwise. Courts dispense with full schedules in fully prepackaged chapter 11 cases and with certain other disclosure requirements, such as the filing of "payment advices" in consumer cases where appropriate. Chapter 15 requires that after recognition of a foreign proceeding, the court grant comity and cooperation to the foreign representative, permits the foreign representative to file a plenary case under the Bankruptcy Code and restricts the scope of the plenary case to the debtor's assets that are located in the United States. Respect for the confidentiality agreement with the creditors in the foreign proceeding and the lack of any apparent need for the claim information justifies excusing the foreign representative from filing the claim information in the schedule of liabilities. Charles Russell, LLP v. HSBC Bank USA, N.A. (In re Awal Bank, BSC), 455 B.R. 73 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

15.1.sss Court denies foreign representative an email redirection order. The individual debtor was the subject of an insolvency proceeding in Germany. The debtor refused to cooperate with the insolvency administrator and absconded. The debtor had no assets or place of business in the U.S. His only connection with the U.S. was that he maintained two email addresses with U.S.-based internet service providers (ISPs). In Germany, it is common practice for the German court to order redirection of the debtor's mail to the insolvency administrator, which the German court did in this case. The insolvency administrator sought recognition under chapter 15 without notice to the debtor and an order directing the ISPs to disclose to the administrator all past and future emails in the debtor's account. Section 1521(a)(4) permits the court to authorize a foreign representative to undertake "the examination of witnesses, the taking of evidence or the delivery of information concerning the debtor's assets, affairs, rights, obligations or liabilities". This authorizes the court to recognize a foreign proceeding where the debtor has no contacts with the United States and the sole purpose of the chapter 15 case is to gather evidence. Section 1507 permits the court to grant "additional assistance" that is available under the Bankruptcy Code or "other laws of the United States". However, section 1506 restricts the relief available under both sections to relief that is not "manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States". The restriction should be narrowly construed. For example, to enforce an order of the foreign court, the U.S. court need not determine that U.S. law would permit the same relief or that U.S. law and the foreign law are substantial the same. Rather, section 1506 applies only when fundamental U.S. policies are at stake. The Electronic Communications Privacy Act, the Stored Communications Act and the Wiretap Act all place substantial restrictions on the ability of even law enforcement officials to obtain access to emails from an ISP and criminalize certain access attempts. Moreover, a U.S. bankruptcy trustee does not have the power to access an individual debtor's emails; a trustee's investigatory and discovery authority are substantially more limited. Such restrictions are sufficient to render enforcement of the German court's email redirection order manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. In addition, Rule 2002(q)(1) requires notice to the debtor of a recognition petition, which was absent here. Therefore, the court denies recognition without prejudice to a later petition on notice to the debtor. In re Toft, 453 B.R. 186 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

15.1.ttt Setoff avoiding power is available in chapter 15. A foreign bank supervisory body placed a local bank into an administration proceeding and appointed an External Administrator. In the foreign proceeding, the External Administrator had obtained creditor and claim information under a confidentiality agreement with the creditors. The External Administrator obtained recognition under chapter 15 of the foreign proceeding to pursue a single asset in the United States, a claim against a U.S. bank for an improper or avoidable setoff. Sometime later, the External Administrator filed a chapter 11 case for the debtor. The External Administrator filed an adversary proceeding against the bank to avoid the setoff under section 553(a). Section 1521(a)(7) permits the court to grant the foreign administrator “any additional relief ... except for relief available under sections 522, 544, 545, 547, 548, 550 and 724(a)”. Thus, section 1521(a)(7) does not permit a foreign representative to pursue avoiding power claims in general without filing a plenary case. But section 553’s setoff avoiding power is not included in the list. As a result, a foreign administrator may seek to avoid a setoff under section 553. Moreover, the foreign administrator commenced a chapter 11 case, bolstering his ability to pursue the claim. Section 553(a) permits the trustee to avoid certain setoffs made within 90 days before the date of the filing of the petition. Section 101(42) defines “petition” to include petition for recognition under section 1508. Therefore, the foreign representative may use that date (rather than the date of recognition), even in the later chapter 11 case. Otherwise, the reachback period might run while the court determined whether to grant recognition. Moreover, section 1523(a) gives the foreign representative standing to bring avoiding power actions upon commencement of a plenary case. Such standing would be impaired if the petition date for purposes of applying the avoiding powers were the later plenary case filing date. Finally, the administration of the chapter 15 case and the chapter 11 case should be coordinated, and the filing of the chapter 11 case should be viewed in a manner that is similar to a conversion of the case from chapter 15 to chapter 11, thus preserving the date of the filing of the petition, as provided under section 348. Charles Russell, LLP v. HSBC Bank USA, N.A. (In re Awal Bank, BSC), 455 B.R. 73 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

15.1.uuu Section 108(a) applies in a chapter 15 case. The court recognized a foreign main proceeding. After obtaining recognition, the foreign representatives moved for an order granting relief under section 108, to toll any statutes of limitation that would apply against the foreign representatives, and setting the recognition order date as the date of the “order for relief” for purposes of applying section 108. They gave notice of the motion to all creditors, shareholders, directors, investment managers and service providers of the foreign debtor and to each party that had filed a notice of appearance in the case, but did not specify in any notices the claims for which or the parties against whom they sought application of section 108. Section 108(a) provides that if a statute of limitations “fixes a period within which the debtor may commence an action, and such period has not expired before the date of the filing of the petition, the trustee may commence such action ... within two years after the order for relief”. Section 103(a) provides that chapter 1 applies in a case under chapter 15. However, chapter 15 does not contemplate an “order for relief” nor appointment of a “trustee”, although section 1502(6) provides, “‘trustee’ includes a trustee, debtor in possession in a case under any chapter of this title, or a debtor in a case under chapter 9 of this title”. “Includes” is not limiting, and a foreign representative is indistinguishable from a trustee for purposes of applying section 108(a) to provide the entity stepping into the debtor’s shoes time to evaluate potential causes of action. Section 1520 supports this reading, because it exempts from the automatic stay actions against the debtor in a foreign country, implying that section 108 applies to protect a creditor who has a claim against the debtor and is stayed from proceeding in the U.S. The recognition date, rather than the petition date, is the appropriate date for applying section 108, because it is analogous to the order for relief, marking a determination that the case should proceed. In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd., 451 B.R. 52 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2011).

15.1.vvv An Australian liquidation is recognized as a foreign main proceeding, despite the pendency of a parallel receivership proceeding. An Australian corporation entered into voluntary administration proceedings in Australia. The corporation's bank lenders were secured by substantially all of the corporation's assets. The commencement of the administration proceedings defaulted the corporation's loan agreement with its banks, who then commenced a receivership proceeding for the corporation. Later, the corporation's creditors resolved to wind up the corporation and appointed the administrators as liquidators, who commenced winding up proceedings. The administrators filed a chapter 15 recognition petition in the U.S. and continued the proceeding after they were appointed as liquidators. Based on In re Betcorp Limited, 400 B.R. 266 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2009), the petitions meet the seven requirements for recognition of the Australian liquidation proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. The pendency of the receivership proceeding does not change the result. Although the banks control the receiver, who took possession of substantially all the assets for the banks' sole benefit, the liquidation proceeding remains a collective proceeding, and Australian law provides for concurrent existence of the two proceedings as separate and distinct, each confined to its proper sphere. Therefore, the court grants recognition. In re ABC Learning Centres, 2010 Bankr. LEXIS 4091 (Bankr. D. Del. Nov. 16, 2010), reconsideration granted in part, denied in part, 445 B.R. 318 (Bankr. D. Del. Jan. 21, 2011)

15.1.www Court denies turnover to a foreign representative of property subject to a U.S. attachment that is not patently wrongful or avoidable under foreign law. A non-U.S. creditor obtained a judicial attachment against the debtor's cash in a New York bank account. The sheriff levied on the bank. The debtor commenced insolvency proceedings in Bahrain, which the court recognized as a foreign main proceeding. The Bahraini administrator sought release of the attached fund to be administered in Bahrain. The New York attachment created a judicial lien. Bahraini law permits avoidance of an attachment in certain circumstances, which were not patent here. Chapter 15 encourages judicial deference to foreign insolvency proceedings. Section 1521(a)(5) permits the court to entrust the administration and, if "the court is satisfied that interests of creditors in the United States are sufficiently protected", the distribution of assets, to the foreign representative. Creditors in the United States, not just U.S. creditors, are entitled to such protection. In addition, a secured creditor is entitled under section 361 to adequate protection. Turnover may be necessary to permit administration and distribution, but it is a discretionary remedy. The court should not order turnover where turnover would result in release of an attachment lien, unless the attachment occurred after the commencement of the foreign proceeding or was plainly wrongful under the foreign law. Because the attachment is not patently voidable under Bahraini law, the court denies turnover and orders the parties to seek a ruling from the Bahraini court on the voidability of the lien. In re Int'l Banking Corp. B.S.C., 439 B.R. 614 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

15.1.xxx Chapter 15's automatic stay does not have extraterritorial reach. The debtor was a foreign bank in a rehabilitation proceeding in its center of main interest. A Swiss bank with no U.S. contacts brought an arbitration proceeding against the debtor in Switzerland to collect on a loan. The debtor's foreign representative obtained recognition of the foreign proceeding under chapter 15. The foreign representative sought to hold the Swiss bank in contempt for violating the automatic stay by pursuing the arbitration. Section 1520(a)(1) provides that upon recognition of a foreign main proceeding, "sections 361 and 362 apply with respect to the debtor and the property of the debtor that is within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States". Section 1508 requires the court, in interpreting chapter 15, to consider its international origin. Chapter 15 is intended to facilitate international cooperation in and coordination of cross-border insolvency proceedings. A chapter 15 case is ancillary to a foreign proceeding and has a narrower purpose and reach than a plenary case, and there is no estate. Literally, section 1520(a)(1) could be read to apply the automatic stay to the debtor worldwide, because the phrase "that is within the territorial jurisdiction" applies only to the debtor's property, not to the debtor. However, because of chapter 15's international and ancillary purpose, the territorial jurisdiction limitation is central to its interpretation and application. Therefore, the court should interpret section 1520(a)(1) to apply to an action against the debtor only where the action would affect property within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. To hold otherwise would establish a United States bankruptcy court in an ancillary proceeding as the gate-keeper of all litigation worldwide for a foreign debtor, despite the primacy of the foreign proceeding court in liquidating or rehabilitating the debtor. Based on this interpretation, the Swiss bank's action did not violate the automatic stay in the chapter 15 case. In re JSC BTA Bank, 434 B.R. 334 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

15.1.yyy Court recognizes place of foreign representative's activities as COMI. The debtor was a British Virgin Islands (BVI) investment fund whose charter restricted it from carrying on business with BVI residents and from owning an interest in BVI real property except to keep books and records and communicate with members. Its manager was located in New York, where its principal assets—investments with Bernard L. Madoff Investment Securities, LLC (BLMIS)—were located until 19 months before the chapter 15 petition date. Once the Madoff fraud was uncovered, the debtor soon ceased doing business, its New York-based board of directors resigned, replaced by non-U.S. directors, and it commenced liquidation activities, supervised from the BVI. Seven months later, the shareholders commenced the foreign proceeding. As of the petition date, the only remaining assets in New York were the disputed claim against the BLMIS estate and litigation against fund investors and managers. The debtor's liquid assets were held in the BVI. The court may grant recognition to a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if the debtor's center of main interests is located in the jurisdiction where the foreign proceeding is pending. Ordinarily, COMI is determined as of the chapter 15 petition date. However, a court must guard against COMI manipulation that may result from a moving COMI. Therefore, the court may review the totality of the circumstances in making the temporal assessment where there may have been an opportunistic shift in COMI. There was no opportunistic shift here. A foreign representative may relocate primary business activities to his location, thereby causing parties in interest to look to the location of the judicial manager as the COMI. Because the debtor's administrative nerve center existed in the BVI for the 19 months before the petition, the COMI was in the BVI, and the court grants recognition as a foreign main proceeding. In re Fairfield Sentry Ltd., Case No. 10-13164 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. July 22, 2010).

15.1.zzz Commencement of a chapter 15 case occurs upon the filing of the petition for recognition, not the initiation of the foreign proceeding. The debtor acquired property in the U.S., moved to the U.S. and later was declared bankrupt in England. The debtor then delivered and recorded a deed to the property to himself and his wife as tenants by the entirety. The English foreign representative sought recognition of the English proceeding two days after the delivery and recording of the deed. The court granted the foreign proceeding recognition as a foreign main proceeding. Section 1520(a)(2) provides that upon recognition of a foreign main proceeding, section 549 applies "to a transfer of an interest of the debtor in property that is [in] the United States to the same extent that the section[] would apply to property of an estate". Section 549 permits a trustee to avoid a transfer of an interest in property of the estate that is made after the commencement of the case. Section 1504 provides that a chapter 15 case "is commenced by the filing of a petition for recognition", and chapter 15 refers to the matter pending under chapter 15 as "the case". Although courts historically have not viewed an ancillary case as a traditional bankruptcy case, chapter 15's formal structure and its integration into the Code support the conclusion that section 549's reference to the commencement of the case means the filing of the petition for recognition, not the initiation of the foreign proceeding. Therefore, the trustee may not avoid the debtor's transfer under section 549. O'Sullivan v. Loy (In re Loy), 432 B.R. 551 (E.D. Va. 2010).

15.1.aaaa Foreign liquidator may exercise corporate governance rights over the foreign debtor's subsidiary without recognition. A liquidator was appointed in a foreign proceeding for the debtor's parent. The liquidator removed the debtor's managing director. The managing director ignored the removal, adopted a corporate resolution authorizing the filing of a chapter 11 case and caused the debtor to file the case. The liquidator commenced an adversary proceeding in the chapter 11 case to determine his corporate governance rights as against the managing director's rights. Chapter 15 applies where a foreign representative seeks assistance in the United States in connection with a foreign proceeding and requires that the foreign representative obtain recognition of the foreign proceeding before he may seek such assistance. Here, however, the liquidator is seeking relief only to exercise his corporate governance rights in the debtor, not to assist in the administration or liquidation of the parent in its foreign proceeding. Therefore, chapter 15 does not apply, and the liquidator may proceed without recognition. Bickerton v. Bozel S.A. (In re Bozel S.A.), 434 B.R. 86 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).

15.1.bbbb An insurance company's insolvency proceeding that gives priority to customer claims is a collective proceeding and qualifies as a foreign proceeding. Insolvency administrators were appointed in several Caribbean jurisdictions, including the Bahamas and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines (SVG), for a Bahamian-registered insurance company and its subsidiaries in those other jurisdictions. Both the Bahamian and SVG insurance laws require an insolvent insurance company's administrator to place policy holders' interests ahead of the interests of general creditors. In these cases, it did not appear that general creditors would receive any recovery, and the administrators therefore focused almost exclusively on policy holders' claims and rights. Both administrators sought recognition under chapter 15 of their respective proceedings. Chapter 15 permits recognition of a foreign proceeding, which is a "collective judicial or administrative proceeding in a foreign country" under a foreign insolvency law to reorganize or liquidate the debtor. A collective proceeding is distinguished from a receivership, for example, in which the proceeding is for the sole benefit of a single or limited group of creditors. In these cases, although the administrators focused on policy holders rather than all creditors, the applicable law recognizes that the proceeding may be for the benefit of general unsecured creditors as well, if there is adequate value to reach their claims. Therefore, the proceedings qualify as foreign proceedings. In re British Am. Ins. Co. Ltd., 425 B.R. 884 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2010).

15.1.cccc Court refuses recognition as a foreign main proceeding of a foreign proceeding pending in the debtor's jurisdiction of registration, where the debtor conducted no business. A Bahamian insurance company entered into a services agreement with its Trinidad-based subsidiary to provide all administrative, marketing, information technology, investment, actuarial, and legal services for the parent. It conducted business throughout the Caribbean, including in Saint Vincent and the Grenadines (SVG), through subsidiaries in each local jurisdiction. It did not have any activities in the Bahamas: it did not issue insurance policies there, did no claims processing or adjustment and had no employees or bank account in the Bahamas. Its only pre-insolvency contact there was that it was chartered and had a registered agent in the Bahamas. Insolvency administrators were appointed in several Caribbean jurisdictions, including the Bahamas and SVG. The local courts each charged the administrators with developing a plan to sell, continue the business of or wind up the various local entities. The Bahamian administrator supplanted the parent's board of directors, whose members had resigned, and took over supervision, from the Bahamas, of the business and the insolvency proceedings. He hired professionals, investigated the debtor, pursued assets and developed a plan, among other things, from the Bahamas, but he continued to use the Trinidadian company's services to conduct all insurance business. The SVG administrator undertook similar activities in SVG, but limited only to the SVG subsidiary. A court must recognize a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if it is pending in the jurisdiction that is the debtor's center of main interests (COMI). Courts consider, among other things, the location of the debtor's headquarters, of those who actually manage operations, of the debtor's principal assets and creditors and of the law that would apply to most disputes, as well as third parties' expectations. The debtor's headquarters and therefore its COMI is more than the location of its board of directors. It is where the breadth of management tasks occur. In this case, all management tasks occur in Trinidad under the services agreement. COMI should be determined as of the date of the chapter 15 petition, not as of the date of the commencement of the foreign proceeding, to promote commercial certainty. Even though determined as of that later date, the activities of a foreign representative alone do not provide a basis for finding a debtor's COMI, and the court must look through to the actual business operations. Based on all the foregoing, the debtor's COMI is not in the Bahamas, and the court refuses recognition of the Bahamian proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. A court may recognize a foreign proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding only if the debtor has an establishment, that is, a place of business, in the jurisdiction where the foreign proceeding is pending. The debtor here did not conduct business in the Bahamas, and the administrator's activities do not amount to the conduct of business in the Bahamas sufficient for an establishment. The court therefore also refuses to recognize the Bahamian proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding. The court grants recognition, however, to the SVG proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding because the debtor conducted business in SVG before the insolvency proceedings. In re British Am. Ins. Co. Ltd., 425 B.R. 884 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2010).

15.1.dddd Court denies recognition to the Israeli receiver of a debtor who moved his domicile to the U.S. The debtor conducted business in Israel until 1996, when his business failed. His creditors filed an involuntary bankruptcy petition against him there in 1997, and a liquidating receiver was appointed. The debtor left Israel shortly before the petition was filed and settled in the United States. He married a U.S. citizen, had five children in the U.S., worked and owned real property in the U.S., had assets only in the U.S., was a legal permanent resident of the U.S. and never returned to Israel. However, the debtor's principal assets were in Israel (until his relocation to the U.S.), all his creditors were in Israel and Israeli law governed their relations. In 2006, the Israeli receiver commenced a chapter 15 case in the U.S. and sought recognition of the Israeli bankruptcy proceeding as a foreign main proceeding or a foreign nonmain proceeding. A foreign main proceeding is a foreign proceeding pending in the country where the debtor has his center of main interests (COMI). For an individual, COMI is presumed to be the place of the debtor's habitual residence, which roughly equates with domicile, but evidence may be introduced to rebut the presumption. COMI is determined as of the chapter 15 recognition petition date, not as of the date of the foreign proceeding petition. The statute reads in the present tense, and determining COMI as of the chapter 15 petition date provides certainty to those dealing with the debtor in the interval between the foreign proceeding and the chapter 15 petition. The debtor's domicile here as of the chapter 15 petition date was in the U.S. The Israeli receiver offered evidence about the location of the debtor's assets and creditors, but that was not sufficient to prove that the debtor's COMI was Israel. A foreign nonmain proceeding is a foreign proceeding pending where the debtor has an "establishment", which is "any place of operations where the debtor carries out nontransitory economic activity", again, as of the chapter 15 petition date, such as, for an individual, a place of business or employment or a secondary residence. The foreign proceeding itself is not a nontransitory economic activity. A bankruptcy proceeding by its nature is transitory. Further, the affairs of the estate are not the debtor's economic activity, because the receiver, at least for an individual debtor, is not the debtor's agent for the purpose of administering the bankruptcy. Otherwise, every foreign proceeding would be at least a foreign nonmain proceeding. Therefore, the court denies recognition. Lavie v. Ran (In re Ran), 607 F.3d 1017 (5th Cir. 2010).

15.1.eeee Foreign liquidators' stay request in U.S. action requires prior recognition under chapter 15. A British Virgin Islands-incorporated money market fund filed an interpleader action in New York to bring about a final distribution of its assets. While the action was pending, a BVI court appointed joint provisional liquidators for the fund. The liquidators requested a stay of the New York action on the ground that upon their appointment, they supplanted the fund's board of directors and could act for the fund. Section 1517 requires that foreign representative obtain recognition under chapter 15 before applying to a court in the U.S. for relief. Chapter 15 recognition is a determination that the liquidators' appointment is valid and that they are authorized to act for the fund. Permitting the liquidators to seek a stay would constitute tacit recognition of their standing and authority, which may be done only through formal recognition under chapter 15. Therefore, the court denies the stay request. Reserve Int'l Liquidity Fund, Ltd. v. Caxton Int'l Ltd., 2010 U.S. Dist LEXIS 42216 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 29, 2010).

15.1.ffff Section 365 does not apply automatically in a chapter 15 case. The German debtor filed an insolvency proceeding in Germany. The German Insolvency Administrator obtained recognition under chapter 15 of the German proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. In the German proceeding, the Insolvency Administrator rejected intellectual property cross-license agreements with international technology companies that operated in the United States. German insolvency law does not protect intellectual property licensees as section 365(n) does in a U.S. bankruptcy case. The technology companies in the U.S. sought application of section 365(n) in the chapter 15 case so as to protect their intellectual property licenses in the U.S. Section 1520 specifies which Bankruptcy Code sections apply upon recognition of a foreign main proceeding. It does not list section 365, but it does list section 363. Section 363(f) permits sales of property of the estate, despite an ipso facto clause, but “subject to section 365”. This cross-reference to section 365 in a single subsection of section 363 does not suffice to make section 365 generally or section 365(n) specifically apply automatically in a chapter 15 case. Section 1509(b)(3) requires the bankruptcy court to grant comity to a foreign representative. Therefore, the court need not balance interests as in a typical comity analysis, and prior precedents denying comity in cross-border bankruptcy cases no longer apply. But section 1506 permits the court to refuse to take action that would be “manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States”. Mere conflict between U.S. and foreign insolvency law does not require a finding that granting comity would be manifestly contrary to U.S. public policy. However, the court should not defer to a foreign proceeding where procedural fairness is doubtful nor take action in a chapter 15 case that would frustrate the ability to administer the case or severely impinge a U.S. constitutional or statutory right. On remand, the bankruptcy court should determine whether non-application of section 365(n) would violate U.S. public policy. Micron Tech, Inc. v. Qimonda AG (In re Qimonda AG Bankr. Litig.), 433 B.R. 547 (E.D. Va. 2010).

15.1.gggg The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to hear a foreign law avoiding power action by a recognized foreign representative. The bankruptcy court recognized the winding up of a Nevis insurance company as a foreign main proceeding. The foreign representatives filed an adversary proceeding to recover under Nevis law property that the debtor had transferred before the Nevis winding up proceeding. Section 1521 permits the bankruptcy court, after recognition, to “grant any appropriate relief, ... except for relief available under sections 522, 544, 545, 547, 548, 550, and 724(a)”. Section 1523 grants the foreign representative, upon recognition, standing to initiate actions under those sections in a case concerning the debtor under another chapter. Section 1521 does not, however, exclude actions under the avoiding powers of the law of the foreign proceeding. Application of foreign avoiding power law avoids choice of law issues and prevents a foreign representative from exploiting the seams between U.S. and foreign law that permitting pursuit of U.S. avoiding power actions without commencing a full U.S. bankruptcy case would permit. Finally, in enacting chapter 15, Congress did not intend to restrict a U.S. court’s power to apply foreign law, which could protect a debtor who attempts to hide assets from the foreign representative in the U.S. Therefore, the foreign representative may pursue Nevis avoiding power actions in a chapter 15 case. Fogerty v. Petroquest Res. Inc. (In re Condor Ins. Ltd.), 601 F.3d 319 (5th Cir. 2010).

15.1.hhhh Court denies motion to dismiss involuntary chapter 7 case against chapter 15 debtor. A Canadian company and its U.S. subsidiary filed a CCCA proceeding in Canada. The Canadian monitor, who was appointed in both CCCA proceedings, sought recognition under chapter 15 of the U.S. subsidiary’s proceeding. The bankruptcy court originally found, based on an uncontested record, that the U.S. subsidiaries place of incorporation and principal assets, employees and operations were in the U.S. but that its headquarters were in Canada. It therefore granted recognition of the CCCA proceeding as a foreign main proceeding, subject to a reservation to determine the allowability against the U.S. debtor of a large intercompany claim by its Canadian parent. However, it later questioned its finding that the headquarters were in Canada. Three U.S. creditors filed an involuntary chapter 7 petition against the U.S. subsidiary. The Canadian monitor moved to dismiss under section 305, which permits dismissal in a chapter 15 case if “the purposes of chapter 15 would be best served by such dismissal”. Section 1501 lists chapter 15’s purposes to include cooperation and comity, legal certainty for trade and investment, fair and efficient administration that protects all creditors and maximization of estate value. Cooperation and comity do not support dismissal here, because the U.S. subsidiary bore all the hallmarks of a U.S. corporation and its noninsider creditors were all U.S. entities. That finding also suggests that permitting a U.S. bankruptcy case to proceed promotes legal certainty for trade and investment. Dismissal would undercut fair and efficient administration, because the principal dispute in the CCCA proceeding is over the allowability of the insider claim against the U.S. subsidiary, and neither the Canadian debtors nor their monitor could provide independent representation of the subsidiary against the parent. Finally, a chapter 7 trustee’s costs would not harm estate value maximization, because the costs would not likely exceed those of the monitor’s if the case were dismissed and the monitor administered the chapter 15 case. Therefore, the court denies the motion to dismiss. RHTC Liq’g Co. v. U. Pac. RR Co (In re RHTC Liq’g Co.), 424 B.R. 714 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2010).

- 15.1.iiii U.S. bankruptcy court may recognize and enforce third-party releases issued in a foreign proceeding. The entire Canadian asset-backed commercial paper market had collapsed in August 2007. A joint CCCA proceeding of all Canadian asset-backed commercial paper issuer conduits restructured the issuers’ obligations to the holders of the commercial paper. The CCCA plan released all participants in the market, including the issuers, the asset providers, the liquidity providers, those who sold the commercial paper and all individuals who acted on behalf of any of them. The Canadian court determined that it had jurisdiction under the CCCA to issue the broad releases and that they were proper in this case. The foreign representative of the issuers sought recognition under chapter 15 of the CCCA proceeding and enforcement of the third-party release. Chapter 15 requires recognition of a foreign main proceeding if the recognition criteria are met. Section 1507 permits the court to provide additional assistance to a foreign representative based on the just treatment of all claims holders, protection against prejudicial treatment of U.S. holders, prevention of preferences and fraudulent property dispositions, proceeds distribution substantially in accordance with title 11 rules and comity. Such additional assistance is discretionary. Section 1506 limits action if it would be “manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States”. Courts must construe this limitation narrowly to give effect to chapter 15’s overarching purpose to facilitate cooperation in cross-border bankruptcies. Differences in outcome between the foreign proceeding and a comparable U.S. proceeding are therefore permissible. Canadian judgments are generally entitled to comity in the U.S. courts, and the CCCA order here was issued after notice to all creditors and the Canadian court’s determination of its jurisdiction and the propriety of the order under the circumstances. Thus, while a U.S. court would not likely sanction a broad third-party release, the court should recognize and enforce the order here. In re Metcalfe & Mansfield Alt. Invs., 421 B.R. 685 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2010).
- 15.1.jjjj Court denies recognition to a foreign receivership in which the receiver’s appointment violated the automatic stay. The debtor was located in New York, although nearly all of its assets were in Israel. The debtor had granted a security interest in its receivables, inventory and machinery and equipment in Israel to an Israeli bank to secure its obligations to the bank. The bank seized its collateral in Israel and commenced an Israeli receivership proceeding. Before the Israeli court appointed a receiver, the debtor filed a chapter 11 case in New York, and the New York court determined that the automatic stay applied to all property of the debtor, “wherever located”. The Israeli court then appointed a receiver after it duly considered and determined that the automatic stay did not apply. The Israeli receiver sought recognition under chapter 15 of the receivership as a foreign main proceeding. Section 101(23) defines “foreign main proceeding” as “a collective judicial or administrative proceeding ... in which the assets and affairs of the debtor are subject to control or supervision by a foreign court”. A secured creditor’s receivership proceeding instituted to collect a secured claim is not a collective proceeding. It does not require the receiver to consider the rights and interests of all creditors, only of the secured creditor. In addition, it does not give the foreign court control over the debtor’s affairs, only over its assets. Finally, the appointment of the receiver violated the automatic stay in the New York chapter 11 case, because it was the continuation of a judicial proceeding to collect a prepetition debt. Even though the Israeli court determined that the stay did not apply, the U.S. bankruptcy court has exclusive jurisdiction to consider its application. Under section 1506, a court may refuse to recognize a foreign proceeding if recognition would be manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States. Recognition of a foreign proceeding in which the foreign representative was appointed in violation of the automatic stay would be contrary to U.S. public policy, because it would reward and legitimize a stay violation, limit a bankruptcy court’s jurisdiction over the debtor’s property and condone future violations. Therefore, the court denies recognition. In re Gold & Honey, Ltd., 410 B.R. 357 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2009).

15.1.kkkk The bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to hear a foreign law avoiding power action by a recognized foreign representative. The bankruptcy court recognized the winding up of a Nevis insurance company as a foreign main proceeding. The foreign representatives filed an adversary proceeding to recover under Nevis law property that the debtor had transferred before the Nevis winding up proceeding. Section 1521 permits the bankruptcy court, after recognition, to “grant any appropriate relief, ... except for relief available under sections 522, 544, 545, 547, 548, 550, and 724(a)”. Section 1523 grants the foreign representative, upon recognition, standing in a case concerning the debtor under another chapter to initiate actions under those sections. Taken together, along with their legislative history, these sections evidence Congressional intent that a foreign representative be able to bring avoiding power actions only in a full case under another Bankruptcy Code chapter, where the court can determine appropriate forum and choice of law questions. Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to hear the foreign representatives’ complaint. Fogerty v. Condor Guar., Inc. (In re Condor Ins. Ltd.), 411 B.R. 314 (S.D. Miss. 2009).

15.1.llll An individual debtor’s foreign proceeding alone does not amount to an “establishment” that entitles the foreign representative to recognition. The debtor had lived and owned and operated a business in Israel. The business failed. Shortly after the failure, creditors initiated an involuntary bankruptcy petition against the debtor. Two years later, the Israeli court declared him bankrupt. Around the time of the petition, the debtor relocated to Texas, where he has lived with his wife and children for over 10 years. All of his financial activities (bank accounts, employment, etc.) are in Texas. He is applying for U.S. citizenship and has no intention to return to Israel, where he and his family are subject to threats. Nearly 10 years after he moved to Texas and seven years after being declared bankrupt, his Israeli bankruptcy trustee sought recognition of his Israeli bankruptcy as a foreign proceeding under chapter 15. Chapter 15 permits recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if it is in the debtor’s center of main interests or as a foreign nonmain proceeding if it is not and if the debtor maintains an establishment there. Section 1508 requires a U.S. court interpreting these provisions to consider the statute’s international origins and purpose and need to promote uniformity. Therefore, the court may consider foreign sources of law, such as the Guide to Enactment of the UNICITRAL Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency, the European Union Convention on Insolvency Proceedings and the Report on the Convention on Insolvency Proceedings. The court must apply the statutory “center of main interest” and “establishment” as of the chapter 15 petition date, because the definitions speak in the present tense, rather than referring to the time when the foreign proceeding was commenced. In an individual case, center of main interest means place of habitual or permanent residence of domicile. When the Israeli bankruptcy trustee sought recognition, the debtor's domicile was in Texas. Therefore, the Israeli proceeding was not a foreign main proceeding. An "establishment" is a debtor's nontransitory place of the operations. Here, the debtor's only current contact with Israel is his bankruptcy case. The foreign proceeding itself cannot constitute an establishment. The debtor is not carrying out the activity or operation, and a bankruptcy action is a transitory action by its nature. Finally, such a result would mean that all foreign proceedings that are not foreign main proceedings are foreign nonmain proceedings, which is a result the statute, by requiring an "establishment", does not contemplate. Therefore, the court denies recognition. Lavie v. Ran, 406 B.R. 277 (S.D. Tex. 2009).

15.1.mmmm An Australian voluntary winding up is recognized as a foreign main proceeding. An Australian corporation's shareholders voted for a members' voluntary winding up of the corporation under the Australian Corporation Act and, as required by the Act, appointed liquidators. The liquidators later petitioned the bankruptcy court for recognition of the winding up as a foreign main proceeding. Section 101(23) defines "foreign proceeding" as "a collective judicial or administrative proceeding in a foreign country ... under a law relating to insolvency or adjustment of debt in which proceeding the assets and affairs of the debtor are subject to control or supervision by a foreign court, for the purpose of reorganization or liquidation." A "proceeding" involves acts and formalities set down in law. It does not require a judicial process. The Australian Corporation Act permits winding up by members through a liquidator, but the winding up process may become subject to judicial supervision, and the liquidator's actions are subject to judicial review. Once the process is begun, the directors are ousted, and the shareholders cannot stop the process. Therefore, the winding up process is a "proceeding". It is a "judicial or administrative" proceeding, because the process has an administrative character. A collective proceeding is one that differs, for example, from a receivership remedy that a single creditor initiates. A company need not be insolvent for the proceeding to be under a law relating to insolvency. Here, a voluntary winding up can apply to an insolvent corporation, although the proceeding then converts to a judicially supervised administration, and, in adopting its own version of the Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency, the Australian Parliament determined that a voluntary winding up is a proceeding under a law relating to insolvency. The winding up process is subject to judicial supervision, because the liquidator or a creditor may request a court to determine any question arising in the process, and any person aggrieved by a liquidator's actions may appeal to a court. Finally, the purpose of the winding up process is liquidation. Therefore, an Australian voluntary winding up process qualifies as a "foreign proceeding". A foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding if it is pending where the debtor's center of main interest (COMI), similar to the principal place of business, is located. The COMI determination is made as of the date of the petition for recognition, not as of the foreign proceeding commencement date. Based on these rulings, the court determines that the Australian winding up proceeding is a foreign main proceeding. In re Betcorp Limited, 400 B.R. 266 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2009).

15.1.nnnn Courts orders turnover to foreign representative of funds attached in admiralty in the U.S. Non-U.S. creditors obtained admiralty attachments against the debtor's bank accounts in New York both before and after the debtor commenced a bankruptcy case in Denmark. Danish bankruptcy law voids attachments against the debtor's property. The Danish foreign representative sought and obtained recognition of the Danish bankruptcy case in the U.S. and turnover of the funds subject to the attachments. Upon the court's recognition of a foreign main proceeding, section 1520 automatically applies the automatic stay to the debtor and its property but does not require turnover. Section 1521(a)(5) authorizes the court to entrust "the administration or realization of all or part of the debtor's assets within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States to the foreign representative", and section 1521(b) authorizes the court to "entrust the distribution of all or part of the debtor's assets located in the United States to the foreign representative ... provided that the court is satisfied that the interests of creditors in the United States are sufficiently protected". Section 1507 permits the court, "consistent with the principles of comity”, to grant additional assistance to the foreign representative. The legislative history says that chapter 15’s provisions should be interpreted consistent with prior law under section 304, which required the court to consider comity in fashioning relief. To afford comity to the Danish court’s proceedings, the court grants the foreign representative’s request that the attached funds be entrusted to her for administration in the Danish proceeding. However, the funds turned over remain subject to the attachments, the validity of which the Danish court would determine. In re Atlas Shipping A/S, 404 B.R. 726 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009).

15.1.0000 Applying section 362 as provisional relief does not require an adversary proceeding; the court may apply any Code sections in a chapter 15 case. The debtors were subject to administration in the U.K. The U.K. administrators sought recognition under chapter 15 of the U.K. proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. While the recognition application was pending, a U.S. creditor obtained a U.S. judgment and a writ of attachment against the debtors. Section 1519(a) permits the court to grant relief if urgently needed to protect creditors, including “staying execution against the debtor’s assets”, “entrusting administration or realization of [the debtor’s U.S. assets] to the foreign representative”, suspending the debtor’s right to transfer assets and providing for witness examination. Section 1519(e) provides, “The standard, procedures, and limitations applicable to an injunction shall apply to relief under this section”. Those procedures require an adversary proceeding. The U.K. administrators sought application of section 362’s automatic stay as provisional relief under section 1519. Section 1519(a) permits forms of relief that are not similar to an injunction and for which applying the standards and procedures for an injunction would not work, such as witness examination, so section 1519(e)’s procedural requirements should apply only where the provisional relief is injunctive relief. The automatic stay differs from an injunction. It is in rem, not directed at any particular person, is provisional (replaced by the discharge injunction at the end of the case) and arises automatically upon filing a U.S. bankruptcy case. Therefore, applying the automatic stay as provisional relief under section 1519(a) is not injunctive relief and does not require an adversary proceeding. Moreover, the combination of section 1519(a), authorizing provisional relief, with section 1521, authorizing additional relief upon recognition, and section 105(a), authorizing a court to issue any order necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, permits the court to apply any Code section in a chapter 15 case, despite sections 103, because it is often clearer and more complete to apply a Code section with all its case law interpretation and meaning rather than to refashion the section in the terms of the provisional relief order itself. In re Pro-Fit Intl. Ltd., 391 B.R. 850 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2008).

15.1.pppp Argentine restructuring is binding on U.S. creditors. An Argentine debtor restructured its U.S.-issued debt under a privately negotiated restructuring plan under Argentine law, known as an Acuerdo Preventivo Extrajudicial (APE), which is similar to a U.S. prepackaged chapter 11 case. The standards for approval are looser than for confirmation of a U.S. chapter 11 plan. For example, there is no minimum distribution requirement similar to the best interest of creditors test, the grounds on which creditors may object are limited and the principal focus of the Argentine court is that the proposal not be abusive, fraudulent or discriminatory. A dissenting U.S. noteholder, who first purchased notes after the debtor’s initial default and continued to purchase notes even after the Argentine court approval of the APE, and who had notice of but did not appear in the Argentine court, instructed the indenture trustee not to exchange its notes on the ground that the Trust Indenture Act (TIA) prohibits principal or interest reduction without consent of 100% of all affected noteholders. The debtor sought section 304 protection to bind the dissenting noteholder to the APE. A touchstone of section 304 relief is the “just treatment of creditors”. The availability of only limited grounds for objection to the APE under Argentine law does not preclude just treatment. A “comprehensive procedure for the orderly and equitable distribution of [the debtor’s] assets among all of its creditors” suffices. U.S. public policy does not prevent approval of a foreign proceeding whose distribution scheme does not precisely match that of chapter 11. The APE proceeding is not contrary to fundamental U.S. public policy and is therefore entitled to comity by the U.S. courts. The TIA prohibition on reducing principal or interest without noteholder consent is subject to the bankruptcy power. Because this proceeding was brought under the Bankruptcy Code, the TIA prohibition must give way, even though this proceeding was not a full U.S. bankruptcy case. Because the APE procedure provided extensive notice and opportunity to be heard and the noteholder chose not to participate, it could not complain of unjust treatment. Argo Fund Ltd. v. Board of Dir. of Telecom Argentina, S.A. (In re Board of Dir. of Telecom Argentina, S.A.), 528 F.3d 162 (2d Cir. 2008).

15.1.1111 Court recognizes postconfirmation Oversight Board as foreign representative. A Spanish debtor successfully completed a convenio (repayment plan) under the Spanish Insolvency Act (since repealed). The Spanish court retained jurisdiction during the repayment period to settle any disputes arising under the plan and to convert the proceeding into a liquidation if the debtor does not complete payments. In this case, the convenio provided for the appointment of an Oversight Committee, comprised primarily of creditor representatives, to supervise and control compliance with the plan. The Oversight Committee obtained the Spanish court's designation as a foreign representative and authorization to initiate a proceeding in the U.S. under chapter 15 to pursue a U.S. asset. Chapter 15 permits a U.S. bankruptcy court to recognize a foreign representative in a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if the proceeding is "pending" where the debtor has its center of main interests. The Spanish proceeding qualifies as a foreign proceeding, because it provides a procedure for the adjustment of the debtor's debts. The Spanish court's approval of the convenio did not terminate the foreign proceeding. Section 1515 requires that a foreign representative seeking recognition must file evidence of the existence of the foreign proceeding and of its appointment as the foreign representative. The Spanish court order sufficed for those purposes. Even viewed in the context of U.S. bankruptcy procedure and without the support of the Spanish court's order, the Spanish proceeding was a foreign postconfirmation proceeding, and the Oversight Committee qualifies as a foreign representative, similar to a postconfirmation liquidating trustee, who should be entitled to recognition in foreign countries. Finally, "pending" refers only to location, not to time. Therefore, the court grants recognition. In re Oversight and Control Comm's of Avanzit, S.A., 385 B.R. 525 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2008).

15.1.1111 Court recognizes Swiss proceeding only as a foreign nonmain proceeding. The debtor, a Swiss corporation, operated on-line foreign exchange trading for retail customers around the world. It maintained an office in Switzerland with 2 or 3 employees and a technology consultant but very few, if any, significant documents relating to the business. Its Boston office had 18 employees, operated the computer platform, handled all customer agreements and accepted customer deposits. The Swiss Federal Banking Commission (SFBC), which claimed regulatory jurisdiction over the debtor and acts as a bankruptcy court for the liquidation of banks and securities brokers, issued a decree initiating bankruptcy proceedings against the debtor, but the debtor appealed, and the proceedings were apparently stayed. U.S. creditors commenced an involuntary chapter 7 case, and the Swiss liquidators commenced a chapter 15 case, in Boston. A "foreign proceeding" is a "proceeding ... in which the assets and affairs of the debtor are subject to control or supervision by a foreign court". A "foreign court" is "a judicial or other authority competent to control or supervise a foreign proceeding". Therefore, the SFBC is a foreign court, the Swiss proceeding is a foreign proceeding, and the Swiss liquidators are foreign representatives qualified to seek chapter 15 recognition. A foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding if it is pending in the state of the debtor's "center of main interests" (COMI). Section 1516(c) creates a presumption that the registered office is the COMI, but if there is contrary evidence, the foreign representative has the burden of proof on the COMI location. The evidence here did not support a finding that the COMI was in Switzerland, but because the debtor had an office in Switzerland, the court recognizes the Swiss proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding. Finally, section 305(a)(2) permits a foreign representative to seek dismissal of a concurrent chapter 7 case if the court has recognized the foreign proceeding and dismissal would best serve the purposes of chapter 15. Here, the trustee has begun collecting assets, the vast majority of creditors are in the U.S., and the Swiss proceeding is stayed pending appeal. Therefore, the court grants relief under chapter 7 and denies dismissal of the chapter 7 case. In re Tradex Swiss AG, 384 B.R. 34 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2008).

15.1.ssss Court refuses to recognize Cayman proceeding for a Cayman entity. A U.S. investment bank operated a hedge fund that was incorporated in the Cayman Islands. The fund petitioned the Cayman court for liquidation under Cayman law. The Cayman Joint Official Liquidators sought U.S. recognition as a foreign main proceeding. The petition for recognition disclosed that the fund has no assets, employees, officers, or managers in Cayman, that all operations were conducted in the U.S., and that all books and records were located in the U.S. Chapter 15 permits recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if the proceeding is in the jurisdiction of the debtor's center of main interests (COMI), which is similar to "principal place of business". Chapter 15 presumes that the location of a debtor's registered office is its COMI's location, but contrary evidence may rebut the presumption. The absence of objections does not require the court to accept the presumption, especially where the petition itself contains evidence to the contrary. Registration alone is insufficient to establish a COMI. Therefore, the court refuses to recognize the Cayman proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. The court also refuses to recognize the proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding. The court may recognize a foreign proceeding only as a main or nonmain proceeding, but to recognize it as either, the debtor must have an "establishment" in the jurisdiction (roughly the same as a non-transitory place of business) where the foreign proceeding is pending, as opposed to having only assets in the jurisdiction. Here, Cayman law prohibits "exempted companies" such as the fund from engaging in business in the Cayman Islands. Since chapter 15's recognition regime does not carry over the flexibility that former section 304 afforded courts in permitting a case ancillary to a foreign proceeding, neither comity nor practical consideration override chapter 15's limitations on recognition. In re Bear Stearns High-Grade Structured Credit Strategies Master Fund, Ltd., 389 B.R. 325 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

15.1.tttt Section 1516's presumption that the COMI is at the registered office does not prevent a court from requiring additional evidence. Section 1517 requires recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if, among other things, the foreign proceeding is pending in the jurisdiction in which the debtor's center of main interests (COMI) is located. Section 1516 provides, "In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the debtor's registered office ... is presumed to be the center of the debtor's main interest." Here, the debtor was registered in the Cayman Islands as an exempted company. Under Cayman law, an exempted company "shall not trade in the Islands". The debtor's books and records and its attorneys and auditors were located in the Islands. Based on these facts alone and the section 1516 presumption, and declining the court's invitation to submit additional evidence on the debtor's COMI, the Joint Official Liquidators in a Cayman proceeding sought recognition of the Cayman proceeding as a foreign main proceeding on a motion for summary judgment. No one objected. Neither section 1516's presumption nor the failure of any party in interest to object prevents a court from demanding more evidence before recognizing the foreign proceeding. A court is not a rubber stamp of a recognition petition, so it must be satisfied that the necessary elements have been satisfied. Where, as here, there are enough facts in the record and in express provisions of foreign law to cast doubt on the location of the debtor's COMI, the court may require more evidence before granting recognition. The court therefore denies the summary judgment motion and sets the matter for an evidentiary hearing. In re Basis Yield Alpha Fund (Master), 381 B.R. 37 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2008).

15.1.uuuu A foreign representative does not need recognition to file a lis pendens. The debtor was a U.K. citizen and subject to an English bankruptcy case. He owned property in the U.S., where he was residing under a temporary visa. The English bankruptcy trustee sought to recover the U.S. property for the benefit of the English estate. Pending a ruling on litigation to recover the property, he filed a lis pendens with the state court, which maintains local real property records. Subject to an exception for collection of claims that a foreign debtor may own, a foreign representative must seek recognition before requesting “comity or cooperation” in any court in the United States. A lis pendens only provides notice that the interests in the real property are subject to dispute and therefore does not seek comity or cooperation from a court. Therefore, the foreign representative need not obtain recognition before filing the lis pendens. In re Loy, 380 B.R. 154 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2007).

15.1.vvvv Foreign representative does not need recognition to administer U.S. assets without judicial assistance. The Japanese debtors owned 100% of the stock of several Hawai’ian corporations. After his appointment, the debtors’ Japanese bankruptcy trustee took action as the sole shareholder of the corporations, appointing new directors and, with the Japanese bankruptcy court’s approval, authorizing the sale of the corporations’ assets. Chapter 15 does not require the Japanese trustee, as a foreign representative, to obtain recognition before proceeding to administer the Japanese debtors’ U.S. assets without judicial assistance. Under section 1509, recognition grants a foreign representative the capacity to sue and be sued in United States courts and to apply to the bankruptcy court for appropriate relief and provides a procedure for the foreign representative to seek comity or cooperation from United States courts. Section 1509 deals only with a foreign representative’s acts that require assistance from a United States court. By implication, therefore, a foreign representative’s acts that do not require such assistance do not require recognition, and the Japanese trustee was authorized to act with respect to the debtors’ Hawai’ian corporations without first obtaining recognition. Iida v. Kitahara (In re Iida), 377 B.R. 243 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2007).

15.1.wwww Court recognizes Cayman proceeding for a Cayman entity as a foreign nonmain proceeding. A U.S. debtor in possession sued a Cayman Islands fund for preference recovery. The parties settled, the fund agreeing to pay the estate substantial funds. Fund investors objected to the settlement as being too favorable to the estate. The bankruptcy court approved the settlement. The investors appealed. Under the settlement terms, the settlement was ineffective while an appeal was pending. The district court expedited the appeal. The investors then took over control of the fund and filed a Cayman insolvency proceeding for the fund. The fund later filed a voluntary Cayman liquidation proceeding. The fund’s only contact with Cayman was its registered office and activities related to maintaining registration and compliance with Cayman regulation. All of its business activities occurred in the U.S., and substantially all of its assets were located in the U.S. The Cayman foreign representative sought recognition of the proceeding in the U.S. under chapter 15 as a foreign main proceeding, which is a proceeding in the state where the entity’s center of main interest (COMI) is located. Chapter 15 contains a presumption that an entity’s registered office is its COMI, but the presumption may be rebutted by contrary evidence. The court may rely on the presumption where a party in interest does not object. Here, however, the objectors rebutted the statutory presumption. In addition, the foreign representative’s motive in seeking recognition of the Cayman proceeding was primarily to gain strategic advantage by invoking application of the automatic stay to delay the appeal of the settlement approval order and thereby obtain negotiating leverage against the U.S. debtor in possession. The taint of improper forum shopping and strategic conduct persuades the court to recognize the Cayman proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding and thereby deny the foreign representative the benefit of the automatic stay. Krys v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors (In re SPhinX, Ltd.), 371 B.R. 10 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

15.1.xxxx Court refuses to recognize Cayman proceeding for a Cayman entity. A U.S. investment bank operated a hedge fund that was incorporated in the Cayman Islands. The fund petitioned the Cayman court for liquidation under Cayman law. The Cayman Joint Provisional Liquidators’ chapter 15 petition for recognition as a foreign main proceeding disclosed that the fund has no assets, employees, officers, or managers in Cayman, that all operations were conducted in the U.S., and that all books and records were located in the U.S. Chapter 15 permits recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding if the proceeding is in the jurisdiction of the debtor's center of main interests (COMI), which is similar to "principal place of business". Chapter 15 presumes that the location of a debtor's registered office is its COMI's location, but contrary evidence may rebut the presumption. The absence of objections does not require the court to accept the presumption, especially where the petition itself contains evidence to the contrary. Registration alone is not sufficient to establish a COMI. Therefore, the court refuses to recognize the Cayman proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. The court also refuses to recognize the proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding. The court may recognize a foreign proceeding only as a main or nonmain proceeding, but to recognize it as either, the debtor must have an "establishment" in the jurisdiction (roughly the same as a non-transitory place of business), as opposed to having only assets in the jurisdiction, where the foreign proceeding is pending. Here, Cayman law prohibits "exempted companies" such as the fund from engaging in business in the Cayman Islands. Since chapter 15's recognition regime does not carry over the flexibility that former section 304 afforded courts in permitting a case ancillary to a foreign proceeding, practical considerations do not override chapter 15's limitations on recognition. In re Bear Stearns High-Grade Structured Credit Strategies Master Fund, Ltd., 374 B.R. 122 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007).

15.1.yyyy Ancillary case does not give a bankruptcy court jurisdiction over claims. The English debtor filed a case under section 304 to obtain an enforcement order for its U.K. Scheme of Arrangement. The court issued an injunction against commencing or continuing any proceeding in the U.S. related to any claim that the Scheme addressed. The debtor's former employee brought an adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy court on a claim he asserted against the debtor. Only a foreign representative may invoke section 304. Section 304 does not create an estate that requires administration, so the bankruptcy court lacks the full jurisdiction it normally has in a title 11 case. Its jurisdiction extends only to matters related to the purposes of section 304, which is to protect administration of the foreign proceeding against U.S. creditors' actions. Section 304 does not by its terms permit U.S. creditors to bring actions against the debtor or pursue claims. What's more, the former employee's claim is not related to the section 304 case, because it could not "conceivably have any effect on the estate being administered in bankruptcy." Therefore, the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to hear the former employee's claim against the debtor. The bankruptcy court may, however, determine whether it should modify the section 304 injunction to permit the former employee to pursue his claim in another forum. Osanitsch v. Marcone PLC (In re Marconi PLC), 363 B.R. 361 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

15.1.zzzz "Center of main interests" equates generally with "principal place of business." The St. Vincent and Grenadines (SVG) registered insurance company debtor operated out of its SVG office to sell and underwrite insurance policies for U.S. customers, who were the company's sole creditors. Premium checks were sent to a U.S. post office but were forwarded to SVG for processing. The liquidators in an SVG insolvency proceeding sought recognition of the proceeding in the U.S. as a foreign main proceeding. A foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding if it is in the country where the debtor's "center of main interests" (COMI) is located. Under section 1516(3), COMI is presumed to be at the location of the debtor's registered office, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. The burden of proof on the location of COMI rests with the foreign representative, but section 1516(3) places the burden of going forward with contrary evidence on any objector. The phrase "COMI" derives from the European Union Convention on Insolvency Proceedings and, consistent with section 1508's direction that chapter 15 be construed to promote international uniformity in its application, should be construed in conformity with the Convention, as well as with other countries' interpretation and application of the phrase. The Convention defines COMI as "the place where the debtor conducts the administration of his interests on a regular basis." This definition equates generally with "principal place of business," as that phrase is understood in U.S. jurisprudence. Here, that was SVG. Therefore, the court recognized the SVG proceeding as a foreign main proceeding. In re Tri-Continental Ins. Exch. Ltd., 349 B.R. 627 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 2006).

15.1.aaaaa Court recognizes Cayman proceeding for a Cayman entity as a foreign nonmain proceeding. A U.S. debtor in possession sued a Cayman Islands fund for preference recovery. The parties settled, the fund agreeing to pay the estate substantial funds. Fund investors objected to the settlement as being too favorable to the estate. The bankruptcy court approved the settlement, and the investors appealed. Under the settlement terms, the settlement was ineffective while an appeal was pending. The district court expedited the appeal. The investors then took over control of the fund and filed a Cayman insolvency proceeding for the fund. The Cayman foreign representative sought recognition of the proceeding in the U.S. under chapter 15 as a foreign main proceeding, which is a proceeding in the State where the entity's center of main interest (COMI) is located. There is little distinction between recognition as a foreign main or nonmain proceeding, except the application of section 362's automatic stay for a foreign main proceeding. Chapter 15 contains a presumption that an entity's registered office is its COMI, but the presumption may be rebutted by contrary evidence. The determination should take into account the international source of chapter 15 as well as uniformity in its application in adopting States. In addition, the absence of any foreign proceeding other than the one for which recognition is sought does not require that the foreign proceeding be recognized as the foreign main proceeding. Here, the fund's only contact with Cayman was its registered office and activities related to maintaining registration and compliance with Cayman regulation. All of its business activities occurred in the U.S. What is more, the foreign representative appeared to have sought recognition as a foreign main proceeding primarily to gain strategic advantage by invoking application of the automatic stay to delay the appeal of the settlement approval order and thereby obtain negotiating leverage against the U.S. debtor in possession. For example, the foreign representative would not agree to relief from the stay and to permit the appeal to proceed if the Cayman proceeding was recognized as a foreign main proceeding. The court concludes that chapter 15 does not require a main vs. nonmain decision immediately upon recognition and considers deferring the determination. However, the taint of improper forum shopping and strategic conduct persuades the court to recognize the Cayman proceeding as a foreign nonmain proceeding and thereby deny the foreign representative the benefit of the automatic stay. In re SPhinX, Ltd., 351 B.R. 103 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006). For a strong dissenting view about the opinion's analysis, see Daniel M. Glosband, SPhinX Chapter 15 Opinion Misses the Mark, 25 ABI Journal No. 10 (Dec. 2007), which argues that the determination of whether a foreign proceeding is main or nonmain is supposed to be objective, not flexible, and that the court should not have recognized the foreign proceeding at all, because the debtor did not have an "establishment"—that is, a "place of operations where the debtor carries out a nontransitory economic activity," §1502—in the Caymans.

15.1.bbbbb Chapter 15 permanent injunction does not require an adversary proceeding. The bankruptcy court granted a foreign representative recognition under chapter 15. The representative filed a motion for a permanent injunction against a creditor who was seeking to garnish the debtor's assets in the U.S. Section 1521(a) authorizes such an injunction; section 1521(e) applies "the standards, procedures, and limitations applicable to injunctions" to such injunctions. Bankruptcy Rule 7001(7) requires an adversary proceeding to obtain a permanent injunction. Rule 1018 specifies which Rules apply in chapter 15 cases. It does not include Rule 7007(7). An injunction was permitted under former section 304 without an adversary proceeding, and there is no indication that the enactment of chapter 15 was intended to change that procedure. Therefore, the court grants the injunction on the representative's motion. In re Lee, 348 B.R. 799 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 2006).

- 15.1.ccccc Court refuses additional restrictions on release to administration of foreign representative of seized U.S. funds. The U.S. DOJ had seized funds in the U.S. that a foreign representative claimed were property of the foreign debtor and that a U.S. creditor claimed were subject to its lien. After recognition of the foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding, the U.S. DOJ agreed to release the funds to the foreign representative for administration in the foreign proceeding, but subject to the continuing jurisdiction of the U.S. court. Section 1522 authorizes the court to impose additional restrictions so that the interests of U.S. creditors are “sufficiently protected.” The U.S. creditor sought under section 1522 to prohibit the foreign representative’s use of the funds for expenses of administration. Because the foreign representative sought to be entrusted only with “the administration or realization of” the debtor’s U.S. assets under section 1521(a)(5), not with “the distribution of all or part of the debtor’s assets located in the United States” under section 1521(b), the court refused to impose additional restrictions. Under section 1521(a)(2), section 363(c)(2)’s restrictions on the use of cash collateral apply. In addition, the foreign representative did not seek entrustment for distribution. Finally, additional restrictions could involve the U.S. court in reviewing the rulings of the court administering the foreign main proceeding. Thus, additional restrictions are unnecessary. In re Tri-Continental Ins. Exch. Ltd., 349 B.R. 627 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 2006).
- 15.1.ddddd Court recognizes and enforces foreign proceeding procedure that denies a jury trial to personal injury claimants. A Canadian bankruptcy court approved a claims resolution procedure for multiple tort claims. The procedure contemplated a hearing before a claims officer rather than a jury. The monitor in a Canadian case obtained recognition under section 1519 of the Canadian proceeding as a foreign main proceeding and sought U.S. enforcement of the claims resolution procedure, so as to require U.S. creditors to prosecute their claims only under the Canadian claims resolution procedure. Section 1506 permits the bankruptcy court to deny enforcement if the procedure is “manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States.” Chapter 15’s legislative history says the U.N.’s official Guide to the Enactment of the Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency should be consulted for guidance in construing chapter 15. The Guide directs that courts construe section 1506 narrowly and apply it only “under extraordinary circumstances concerning matters of fundamental importance for the enacting State.” The absence of a right to a jury trial for personal injury claims does not meet that standard, as long as the remaining procedural protections in the claims resolution process comport generally with due process, as they do here. RSM Richter Inc. v. Aguilar (In re Ephedra Prods. Liab. Litig.), 349 B.R. 333 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).