Dutch Court Rules Active Webcam Policies Violate Human Rights

A Dutch court ruled in favor of a Dutch national employed by a U.S. company who was fired for refusing to turn on his webcam. The ruling was part of the employee's wrongful termination lawsuit against his former employer, Chetu, Inc, a Florida-based software company. Chetu's company policy requires employees to have their webcams and screens visible on remote viewing software for several hours daily. The employee was fired for "refusal to work" and "insubordination" when he refused to comply and open his webcam cover. Read more

U.K. Unveils Replacement GDPR, then Retracts It

When the U.K. disentangled from the European Union (EU), its General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) status was one of many headaches for regulators to figure out. After drawn-out negotiations over points such as requiring opt-in or opt-out models, lawmakers had settled mainly on a GDPR-like solution called the Data Protection and Digital Information Bill. The White House's AI Bill of Rights: Not for the Robots

The White House Office of Science and Technology Policy (OSTP) released its Blueprint for an AI Bill of Rights and, thankfully, it doesn't give AI any rights. This (nonbinding) document is meant to provide a best-practice guide for AI system designers and frames those systems' use as a civil rights issue. The OSTP focused on consumer AI interactions, excluding many internal business AI applications. Read more beyond-visual-line-of-sight (BVLOS) waivers from the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) to fly unmanned aerial systems (UAS or drones) for commercial inspection missions under operational guidelines as opposed to specific operations in a specific geographical area. This nationwide BVLOS waiver is based on Soaring Eagle's ability to meet specific operational parameters rather than operating within a specific timeframe in a specific area which is the more common BVLOS waiver granted by the FAA.
