According to a new study from Carfax, more than 2.7 million vehicles were for sale online in 2011 with open safety recalls – and more than 100,000 of those were in Florida.

Ignoring safety recalls is a threat to public safety. Many buyers of used cars are never aware there has been a recall, which increases driving safety risks to drivers, passengers and other vehicles that share the road. Since fixes as part of a recall are free, there shouldn't be anything preventing consumers from having their vehicle fixed at their dealership.

Before you purchase a used car, visit this National Highway Traffic Safety Administration website to see if the car you are considering has been part of a recall.
