ITV1, a British television station, is unleashing a two-part documentary series called *The Briefs*, which gives a behind-the-scenes look at the world of criminal law. The show follows the Manchester firm, Tuckers, one of the largest criminal firms in its region. The firm's senior partner, Franklin Sinclair explains that the show reveals why criminal lawyers do what they do, and how difficult it can be. The first episode features a man facing a blackmailing charge and a mother accused of drug-dealing; the second episode stars a domestic violence case involving a gay couple and a tumultuous murder trial. Viewers are also able to see the lawyers giving advice to their clients behind bars as the cameras have been allowed into the police station.

Criminal lawyers are often misunderstood as many people can't understand why we choose to represent criminals. Sinclair tells of a judge who recently said to him: "nobody else protects the vulnerable as well as criminal lawyers do." At the end of the day, everyone has the right to good legal representation and a fair trial. Criminal acts shouldn't define a person, and I believe that everyone should have a chance to get their life back on track after a criminal conviction.
