by Levitt & Slafkes, P.C. on October 10, 2013

We live in a world where people turn to the internet for almost every problem. While “do it yourself” works in many arenas, legal problems are typically not one of them. If you are considering filing a Chapter 7 or Chapter 13 bankruptcy, websites can be helpful for general guidance, but you have to be careful in relying on advice you receive online. It is important to remember that the internet cannot compare with the years of training and experience that bankruptcy lawyers at Levitt & Slafkes have.

Most of the information found on the computer is generic and it may not fit your individual situation. Nobody has the exact same finances and no two bankruptcy filings are identical. Thus, research online can help you educate yourself about the generalities of filing a bankruptcy case, but to fully understand all of your individual options, you need to speak to a real, live attorney. Open forums and chat rooms are typically not a good place to seek answers to your questions. An experienced lawyer will ask you questions regarding your finances, discuss different options available and anticipate issues that may arise. Your laptop will not do this for you.

Don't potentially set yourself up for failure before you even file your case. Go online to generally educate yourself about the bankruptcy process by using reliable sources such as government websites and licensed, bankruptcy lawyers.

Contact a qualified bankruptcy lawyer at Levitt & Slafkes to discuss your individual, financial situation and get advice you can count on.
